It was not likely, my dear, I could ſay much to it, or name another day, had I been diſpoſed to the latter, with ſuch an hinted delay from him.

I was ſilent.

'Next day, Madam, if not to-mor-'row?'

Had he given me time to anſwer, it could not have been in the affirmative, you muſt think—But in the ſame breath, he went on—'Or the day after that?'—And taking both my hands in his, he ſtared me into a half-confuſion—Would you have had patience with him, my dear?

'No, no,' ſaid I, as calmly as poſſible, 'you cannot think, that I ſhould imagine 'there can be reaſon for ſuch a hurry. 'It will be moſt agreeable, to be ſure, for 'my lord to be preſent.'

'I am all obedience and reſignation,' returned the wretch, with a ſelf-pluming air, as if he had acquieſced to a propoſal made by me, and had complimented mented me with a great piece of self-denial.

Is it not plain, my dear, that he deſigns to vex and teaze me? Proud, yet mean, and fooliſh man, if ſo!—But you ſay all punctilio is at an end with me. Why, why, will he take pains to make a heart wrap itſelf up in reſerve, that wiſhes only, and that for his ſake as well as my own, to obſerve due decorum?

Modeſty, I think, required of me, that it ſhould paſs as he had put it: did it not?—I think it did. Would to Heaven—but what ſignifies wiſhing?

But when he would have rewarded himſelf, as he had heretofore called it, for this ſelf-ſuppoſed conceſſion, with a kiſs, I repulſed him with a juſt and very ſincere diſdain.

He ſeemed both vexed and ſurprized, as one who had made the moſt agreeable propoſals and conceſſions, and thought them ungratefully returned. He plainly ſaid, that he thought our ſituation would entitle him to ſuch an innocent freedom: and he was both amazed and grieved to be thus ſcornfully repulſed.

No reply could be made by me on ſuch a ſubject. I abruptly broke from him. I recollect, as I paſſed by one of the pier-glaſſes, that I ſaw in it his clenched hand offered in wrath to his forehead: the words, Indifference, by his ſoul, next to hatred, I heard him ſpeak: and ſomething of ice he mentioned: I heard not what.

Whether he intends to write to my lord, or to Miſs Montague, I cannot tell. But as all delicacy ought to be over with me now, perhaps I am to blame to expect it from a man who may not know what it is. If he does not, and yet thinks himſelf very polite, and intends not to be otherwiſe, I am rather to be pitied than cenſured.

And after all, ſince I muſt take him as I find him, I muſt: that is to ſay, as a man ſo vain and ſo accuſtomed to be admired, that, not being conſcious of internal defect, he has taken no pains to poliſh more than his outſide: and as his propoſals are higher than my expectations; and as, in his own opinion, he has a great deal to bear from me, I will (no new offence preventing) ſit down to anſwer them: and, if poſſible, in terms as unobjectible to him, as his are to me.

But after all, ſee you not, my dear, more and more the miſmatch that there is in our minds?

However, I am willing to compound for my fault, by giving up (if that may be all my puniſhment) the expectation of what is deemed happineſs in this life, with ſuch a huſband as I fear he will make. In ſhort, I will content myſelf to be a ſuffering perſon through the ſtate to the end of my life.—A long one it cannot be!

This may qualify him (as it may prove) from ſtings of conſcience from miſbehaviour to a firſt wife, to be a more tolerable one to a ſecond, though not perhaps a better deſerving one; while my ſtory, to all who ſhall know it, will afford theſe inſtructions: That the eye is a traitor, and ought ever to be miſtruſted: that form is deceitful. In other words; that a fine perſon is ſeldom paired by a fine mind: and that ſound principles, and a good heart, are the only baſes on which the hopes of a happy future, either with reſpect to this world, or the other, can be built.

And ſo much at preſent for Mr. Lovelace's propoſals; of which I deſire your opinion.

Four letters are written by Mr. Lovelace from the date of his laſt, giving the ſtate of affairs between him and the lady, pretty much the ſame as in hers in the ſame period, allowing for the humour in his, and for his reſentments expreſſed with vehemence on her reſolution to leave him, if her friends could be brought to be reconciled to her.—A few extracts from them will be only given.

'WHAT,' ſays he, 'might have become of me, and of my projects, had 'not her father, and the reſt of the implacables, ſtood my friends?'

After violent threatenings of revenge, he ſays—

''Tis plain ſhe would have given me 'up for ever: nor ſhould I have been 'able to prevent her abandoning of me, 'unleſs I had torn up the tree by the roots 'to come at the fruit: which I hope ſtill to 'bring down by a gentle ſhake or two, if I 'can but have patience to ſtay the ripening ſeaſon.'

Thus triumphing in his unpolite cruelty, he ſays—

'After her haughty treatment of me, 'I am reſolved ſhe ſhall ſpeak out. There 'are a thouſand beauties to be diſcovered in the face, in the accent, in the 'bluſh-beating heſitations of a woman who 'is earneſt about a ſubject which ſhe 'wants to introduce, yet knows not 'how. Silly fellows, calling themſelves 'generous ones, would value themſelves 'for ſparing a lady's confuſion: but 'they are ſilly fellows indeed; and rob 'themſelves of prodigious pleaſure by 'their

'their forwardneſs; and at the ſame 'time deprive her of diſplaying a world 'of charms, which only can be mani-'feſted on theſe occaſions.

'I'll tell thee before-hand, how it 'will be with my charmer in this caſe— 'She will be about it, and about it, ſe-'veral times: but I will not underſtand 'her. At laſt, after half a dozen hem '—ings, ſhe will be obliged to ſpeak 'out—"I think, Mr. Lovelace—I think, "Sir—I think you were ſaying ſome days "ago—" Still I will be all ſilence—her 'eyes fixed upon my ſhoe-buckles, as I 'ſit over-againſt her—Ladies, when put 'to it thus, always admire a man's ſhoe-'buckles, or perhaps ſome particular 'beauties in the carpet. "I think you "ſaid, that Mrs. Fretchville—" Then a 'cryſtal tear trickles down each crimſon 'cheek, vexed to have her virgin pride 'ſo little aſſiſted. But, "Come, my "meaning dear," cry I to myſelf, "re-"member what I have ſuffered for thee, "and what I have ſuffered by thee! "Thy tearful pauſings ſhall not be help-"ed out by me. Speak out, love!— "O the ſweet confuſion! Can I rob "myſelf of ſo many conflicting beau-"ties by the precipitate charmer-pity-"ing folly, by which a politer man, "[Thou knowe'ſt, lovely, that I am no "polite man!] betrayed by his own ten-"derneſs, and unuſed to female tears, "would have been overcome?" I will 'feign an irreſolution of mind on the 'occaſion, that ſhe may not quite abhor 'me—that her reflections on the ſcene 'in my abſence may bring to her re-'membrance ſome beauties in my part 'of it: an irreſolution that will be ow-'ing to awe, to reverence, to profound 'veneration; and that will have more 'eloquence in it, than words can have. 'Speak out then, love, and ſpare not.

'Hard heartedneſs, as it is called, is an 'eſſential of the libertine's character. Fa-'miliarized to the diſtreſſes he occaſions, 'he is ſeldom betrayed by tenderneſs in-'to a complaiſant weakneſs unworthy 'of himſelf.'

Mentioning the ſettlements, he ſays—

'I am in earneſt as to the terms. If 'I marry her, [And I have no doubt 'that I ſhall, after my pride, my ambi-'tion, my revenge, if thou wilt, is grati-'fied] I will do her noble juſtice. The 'more I do for ſuch a prudent, ſuch an 'excellent œconomiſt, the more ſhall I 'do for myſelf.—But, by my ſoul, Bel-'ford, her haughtineſs ſhall be brought 'down to own both love and obligation 'to me. Nor will this ſketch of ſettle-'ments bring us forwarder than I would 'have it. Modeſty of ſex will ſtand my 'friend at any time. At the very altar, 'our hands joined, I will engage to make 'this proud beauty leave the parſon and 'me, and all my friends who ſhould be 'preſent, though twenty in number, to 'look like fools upon one another, 'while ſhe took wing, and flew out of 'the church-door, or window; (if that 'were open, and the door ſhut) and this 'only by a ſingle word.'

He mentions his raſh expreſſion, that ſhe ſhould be his, although his damnation were to be the purchaſe.

'At that inſtant,' ſays he, 'I was upon 'the point of making a violent attempt, 'but was checked in the very moment, 'and but juſt in time to ſave myſelf, by 'the awe I was ſtruck with on again 'caſting my eye upon her terrified but 'lovely face, and ſeeing, as I thought, 'her ſpotleſs heart in every line of it.

'O virtue, virtue!' proceeds he, 'what 'is there in thee, that can thus againſt 'his will affect the heart of a Lovelace! '—Whence theſe involuntary tremors, 'and fear of giving mortal offence?— 'What art thou, that acting in the breaſt 'of a feeble woman, canſt ſtrike ſo much 'awe into a ſpirit ſo intrepid! Which 'never before, no, not in my firſt at-'tempt, young as I then was, and 'frighted at my own boldneſs, (till I 'found myſelf forgiven) had ſuch an 'effect upon me!'

He paints in lively colours, that part of the ſcene between him and the lady, where ſhe ſays, The word father has a ſweet and venerable ſound with it.

'I was exceedingly affected,' ſays he, 'upon the occaſion. But was aſhamed 'to be ſurprized into ſuch a fit of un-'manly weakneſs—So aſhamed, that I 'was reſolved to ſubdue it at the inſtant, 'and to guard againſt the like for the 'future. Yet, at that moment, I more 'than half regre ted, that I could not 'permit her to enjoy a triumph which 'ſhe ſo well deſerved to glory in—Her 'youth, her beauty, her artleſs inno-'cence, and her manner, equally be-'yond compariſon or deſcription. But 'her indifference, Belf rd! —That ſhe 'could reſolve to ſacrifice me to the 'malice of my enemies; and carry on 'the deſign in ſo clandeſtine a manner '—Yet love her, as I do, to frenzy!— 'Revere her, as I do, to adoration!— 'Theſe were the recollections with

'which I fortified my recreant heart 'againſt her!—Yet, after all, if ſhe 'perſevere, ſhe muſt conquer!—Cow-'ard, as ſhe has made me, that never 'was a coward before!'

He concludes his fourth letter in a vehement rage, upon her repulſing him, when he offered to ſalute her; having ſuppoſed, as he owns, that ſhe would have been all condeſcenſion on his propoſals to her.

'This,' ſays he, 'I will for ever re-'member againſt her, in order to ſteel 'my heart, that I may cut through a rock 'of ice to hers; and repay her for the 'diſdain, the ſcorn, which glowed in 'her countenance, and was apparent in 'her air, at her abrupt departure from 'me, after ſuch obliging behaviour on 'my ſide, and after I had ſo earneſtly 'preſſed her for an early day. The wo-'men below ſay, ſhe hates me; ſhe de-'ſpiſes me!—And 'tis true: ſhe does; 'ſhe muſt—And why cannot I take their 'advice? I will not long, my fair-one, 'be diſpiſed by thee, and laughed at by 'them!

'Let me acquaint thee, Jack,' adds he by way of poſtſcript, 'that this effort 'of hers to leave me, if ſhe could have 'been received; her ſending for a coach 'on Sunday; no doubt, reſolving not 'to return, if ſhe had gone out without 'me, (for did ſhe not declare that ſhe 'had thoughts to retire to ſome of the 'villages about town, where ſhe could 'be ſafe and private?) have, altogether, 'ſo much alarmed me, that I have been 'adding to the written inſtructions for 'my fellow and the people below how 'to act in caſe ſhe ſhould elope in my 'abſence; particularly letting Will 'know what he ſhall report to ſtrangers 'in caſe ſhe ſhall throw herſelf upon any 'ſuch with a reſolution to abandon me. 'To theſe inſtructions I ſhall further add 'as circumſtances offer.'

LETTER XXII.

MISS HOWE, TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

THURSDAY, MAY 18.

I Have neither time nor patience, my dear friend, to anſwer every material article in your laſt letters juſt now received. Mr. Lovelace's propoſals are all I like of him. And yet, (as you do) I think, that he concludes them not with that warmth and earneſtneſs which we might naturally have expected from him. Never in my life did I hear or read of ſo patient a man, with ſuch a bleſſing in his reach. But wretches of his caſt, between you and me, my dear, have not, I fancy, the ardours that honeſt men have. Who knows, as your Bell once ſpitefully ſaid, but he may have half a dozen creatures to quit his hands of before he engages for life?—Yet I believe you muſt not expect him to be honeſt on this ſide of his grand climacterick.

He, to ſuggeſt delay from a compliment to be made to Lord M. and to give time for ſettlements! He, a part of whoſe character it is, not to know what complaiſance to his relations is—I have no patience with him! You did indeed want an interpoſing friend on the affecting occaſion which you mention in yours of yeſterday morning. But, upon my word, were I to have been that moment in your ſituation, and been ſo treated, I would have torn his eyes out, and left it to his own heart, when I had done, to furniſh the reaſon for it.

Would to Heaven to-morrow, without complimenting any-body, might be his happy day! —Villain! After he had himſelf ſuggeſted the compliment!—And I think he accuſes YOU of delaying!—Fellow, that he is!—How my heart is wrung!

But, as matters now ſtand betwixt you, I am very unſeaſonable in expreſſing my reſentments againſt him.—Yet I don't know whether I am or not, neither; ſince it is the moſt cruel of fates, for a woman to be forced to have a man whom her heart deſpiſes. You muſt, at leaſt, deſpiſe him; at times, however, His clenched fiſt offered to his forehead on your leaving him in juſt diſpleaſure —I wiſh it had been a pole-axe, and in the hand of his worſt enemy.

I will endeavour to think of ſome method, of ſome ſcheme, to get you from him, and to fix you ſafely ſomewhere till your couſin Morden arrives—A ſcheme to lie by you, and to be purſued as occaſion may be given. You are ſure, that you can go abroad when you pleaſe? and that our correſpondence is ſafe? I cannot, however, (for the reaſons heretofore mentioned reſpecting your own reputation) wiſh you to leave him while he gives you not cauſe to ſuſpect his honour. But your heart I know would be the eaſier, if you were ſure of ſome aſylum in caſe of neceſſity.

Yet once more, I ſay, I can have no notion that he can or dare to mean you diſhonour. But then the man is a fool, my dear—that's all.

However, ſince you are thrown upon a fool, marry the fool, at the firſt opportunity; tunity; and though I doubt that this man will be the moſt ungovernable of fools, as all witty and vain fools are, take him as a puniſhment, ſince you cannot as a reward: in ſhort, as one given to convince you that there is nothing but imperfection in this life.

And what is the reſult of all I have written, but this? Either marry, my dear, or get from them all, and from him too.

You intend the latter, you'll ſay, as ſoon as you have opportunity. That, as above hinted, I hope quickly to furniſh you with: and then comes on a trial between you and yourſelf.

Theſe are the very fellows, that we women do not naturally hate. We don't always know what is, and what is not, in our power to do. When ſome principal point we have long had in view becomes ſo critical, that we muſt of neceſſity chuſe or refuſe, then perhaps we look about us; are affrighted at the wild and uncertain proſpect before us; and after a few ſtruggles and heart-aches, reject the untried new; draw in our horns, and reſolve to ſnail-on, as we did before, in a track we are acquainted with.

I ſhall be impatient till I have your next. I am, my deareſt friend, your ever affectionate and faithful A. HOWE.

LETTER XXIII.

MR. BELFORD, TO ROBERT LOVELACE, ESQ.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 17.

I Cannot conceal from you any thing that relates to yourſelf ſo much as the incloſed does. You will ſee what the noble writer apprehends from you, and wiſhes of you, with regard to Miſs Harlowe, and how much at heart all your relations have it that you do honourably by her. They compliment me with an influence over you, which I wiſh with all my ſoul you would let me have in this article.

Let me once more entreat thee, Lovelace, to reflect, before it be too late, (before the mortal offence be given) upon the graces and merits of this lady. Let thy frequent remorſes at laſt end in one effectual remorſe. Let not pride and wantonneſs of heart ruin thy fairer proſpects. By my faith, Lovelace, there is nothing but vanity, conceit, and nonſenſe, in our wild ſchemes. As we grow older, we ſhall be wiſer, and looking back upon our fooliſh notions of the preſent hour, (our youth diſſipated) ſhall certainly deſpiſe ourſelves when we think of the honourable engagements we might have made: thou, more eſpecially, if thou letteſt ſuch a matchleſs creature ſlide through thy fingers. A creature pure from her cradle. In all her actions and ſentiments uniformly noble. Strict in the performance of all her even unrewarded duties to the moſt unreaſonable of fathers, what a wife will ſhe make the man who ſhall have the honour to call her his!

What apprehenſions wouldſt thou have had reaſon for, had ſhe been prevailed upon by giddy or frail motives, for which one man, by importunity, might prevail, as well as another?

We all know what an inventive genius thou art maſter of: we are all ſenſible, that thou haſt a head to contrive, and a heart to execute. Have I not called thine the plotting'ſt heart in the univerſe? I called it ſo upon knowledge. What wouldſt thou more? Why ſhould it be the moſt villainous, as well as the moſt able?—Marry the lady; and when married let her know what a number of contrivances thou hadſt in readineſs to play off. Beg of her not to hate thee for the communication; and aſſure her that thou gaveſt them up from remorſe, and in juſtice to extraordinary merit; and let her have the opportunity of congratulating herſelf for ſubduing a heart ſo capable of what thou calleſt glorious miſchief. This will give her room for triumph; and even thee no leſs: ſhe, for hers over thee; thou, for thine over thyſelf.

Reflect likewiſe upon her ſufferings for thee. Actually at the time thou art forming ſchemes to ruin her, (at leaſt in her ſenſe of the word) is ſhe not labouring under a father's curſe laid upon her by thy means, and for thy ſake? And wouldſt thou give operation and completion to that curſe, which otherwiſe cannot have effect?

And what, Lovelace, all the time is thy pride?—Thou that vainly imagineſt, that the whole family of the Harlowes, and that of the Howes too, are but thy machines, unknown to themſelves, to bring about thy purpoſes, and thy revenge, why art thou more, or better, than the inſtrument even of her implacable brother, and envious ſiſter, to perpetuate the diſgrace of the moſt excellent of ſiſters, to which they are moved by vilely low and ſordid motives?—Canſt thou bear, Lovelace, to be thought the machine of thy inveterate enemy James Harlowe?—Nay, art not thou the cully of that ſtill viler Joſeph Leman, who:

who ſerves himſelf as much by thy money, as he does thee by the double part he acts by thy direction!—And further ſtill, art not thou the devil's agent, who only can, and who certainly will, ſuitably reward thee, if thou proceedeſt, and if thou effecteſt thy wicked purpoſe?

Could any man but thee put together upon paper the following queſtions with ſo much unconcern as thou ſeemeſt to have written them?—Give them a reperuſal, O heart of adamant! 'Whither 'can ſhe fly to avoid me? Her parents 'will not receive her: her beloved Nor-'ton is in their direction, and cannot: 'Miſs Howe dare not. She has not one 'friend in town but ME: is entirely a 'ſtranger to the town.'—What muſt that heart be that can triumph in a diſtreſs ſo deep, into which ſhe has been plunged by thy elaborate arts and contrivances? And what a ſweet, yet ſad reflection was that, which had like to have had it's due effect upon thee, ariſing from thy naming Lord M. for her nuptial father? Her tender years inclining her to wiſh a father, and to hope a friend.—O my dear Lovelace, canſt thou reſolve to be, inſtead of the father thou haſt robbed her of, a devil?

Thou knoweſt, that I have no intereſt, that I can have no view, in wiſhing thee to do juſtice to this admirable creature. For thy own ſake, once more I conjure thee, for thy family's ſake, and for the ſake of our common humanity, let me beſeech thee to be juſt to Miſs Clariſſa Harlowe.

No matter whether theſe expoſtulations are in character from me, or not. I have been and am bad enough. If thou takeſt my advice, which is (as the incloſed will ſhew thee) the advice of all thy family, thou wilt perhaps have it to reproach me, (and but perhaps neither) that thou art not a worſe man than myſelf. But if thou doſt not, and if thou ruineſt ſuch a virtue, all the complicated wickedneſs of ten devils, let looſe among the innocent with full power over them, will not do ſo much vile and baſe miſchief as thou wilt be guilty of.

It is ſaid, that the prince on his throne is not ſafe, if a mind ſo deſperate can be found, as values not it's own life. So may it be ſaid, that the moſt immaculate virtue is not ſafe, if a man can be met with, who has no regard to his own honour, and makes a jeſt of the moſt ſolemn vows and proteſtations.

Thou mayeſt by trick, chicane, and falſe colours, thou who art worſe than a pickeroon in love, overcome a poor lady ſo entangled as thou haſt entangled her; ſo unprotected as thou haſt made her: but conſider, how much more generous and juſt to her, and noble to thyſelf, it is, to overcome thyſelf.

Once more, it is no matter, whether my paſt or future actions countenance my preachment, as perhaps thou'lt call what I have written: but this I promiſe thee, that whenever I meet with a woman of but one half of Miſs Harlowe's perfections, who will favour me with her acceptance, I will take the advice I give, and marry. Nor will I offer to try her honour at the hazard of my own. In other words, I will not degrade an excellent creature in her own eyes, by trials, when I have no cauſe for ſuſpicion. And let me add, with reſpect to thy eagleſhip's manifeſtation, of which thou boaſteſt, in thy attempts upon the innocent and uncorrupted, rather than upon thoſe whom thou humorouſly compareſt to wrens, wagtails, and phyl-rits, as thou calleſt them, that I hope I have it not once to reproach myſelf, that I ruined the morals of any one creature, who otherwiſe would have been uncorrupted. Guilt enough in contributing to the continued guilt of other poor wretches, if I am one of thoſe who take care ſhe ſhall never riſe again, when ſhe has once fallen.

Whatever the capital devil, under whoſe banner thou haſt liſted, will let thee do, with regard to this incomparable woman, I hope thou wilt act with honour in relation to the incloſed, between Lord M. and me; ſince his lordſhip, as thou wilt ſee, deſires, that thou mayeſt not know he wrote on the ſubject; for reaſons, I think, very far from being creditable to thyſelf: and that thou will take as meant, the honeſt zeal for thy ſervice, of thy real friend,

J. BELFORD.

LETTER XXIV.

LORD M. TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

[INCLOSED IN THE PRECEDING.]

M. HALL, MONDAY, MAY 15.

SIR,

IF any man in the world has power over my nephew, it is you. I therefore write this, to beg you to interfere in the affair depending between him and the moſt accompliſhed of women, as every-one ſays; and what every-one ſays, muſt be true.

I don't know that he has any bad deſigns upon her; but I know his temper ſhe well, not to be apprehenſive upon ſuch long delays: and the ladies here have been for ſome time in fear for her. Lady Sarah in particular, who (as you muſt know) is a wiſe woman, ſays, that theſe delays, in the preſent caſe, muſt be from him, rather than from the lady.

He had always indeed a ſtrong antipathy to marriage, and may think of playing his dog's tricks by her, as he has by ſo many others. If there's any danger of this, 'tis beſt to prevent it in time: for when a thing is done, advice comes too late.

He has always had the folly and impertinence to make a jeſt of me for uſing proverbs: but as they are the wiſdom of whole nations and ages collected into a ſmall compaſs, I am not to be ſhamed out of ſentences that often contain more wiſdom in them, than the tedious harangues of moſt of our parſons and moraliſts. Let him laugh at them, if he pleaſes: you and I know better things, Mr. Belford—Though you have kept company with a wolf, you have not learnt to howl of him.

But nevertheleſs, you muſt not let him know that I have written to you on this ſubject. I am aſhamed to ſay it; but he has ever treated me as if I were a man of very common underſtanding; and would, perhaps, think never the better of the beſt advice in the world, for coming from me. Thoſe, Mr. Belford, who moſt love, are leaſt ſet by.—But who would expect velvet to be made out of a ſow's ear?

I am ſure he has no reaſon however to ſlight me as he does. He may and will be the better for me, if he outlives me; though he once told me to my face, That I might do as I would with my eſtate; for that he, for his part, loved his liberty as much as he deſpiſed money. And at another time, twitting me with my phraſes, That the man was above controul, who wanted not either to borrow or flatter. He thought, I ſuppoſe, that I could not cover him with my wings, without pecking at him with my bill; though I never nted to be pecking at him, without very great occaſion: and God knows, he might have my very heart, if he would but endeavour to oblige me, by ſtudying his own good; for that is all I deſire of him. Indeed, it was his poor mother that firſt ſpoiled him; and I have been but too indulgent to him ſince. A fine grateful diſpoſition, you'll ſay, to return evil for good! But that was always his way. It is a good ſaying, and which was verified by him with a witneſs—Children when little, make their parents fools; when great, mad. Had his parents lived to ſee what I have ſeen of him, they would have been mad indeed.

This match, however, as the lady has ſuch an extraordinary ſhare of wiſdom and goodneſs, might ſet all to rights; and if you can forward it, I would enable him to make whatever ſettlements he could wiſh; and ſhould not be unwilling to put him in poſſeſſion of another pretty eſtate beſides. I am no covetous man, he knows. And indeed, what is a covetous man to be likened to ſo fitly, as to a dog in a wheel which roaſts meat for others? And what do I live for, (as I have often ſaid) but to ſee him and my two nieces well married and ſettled? May Heaven ſettle him down to a better mind, and turn his heart to more of goodneſs and conſideration!

If the delays are on his ſide, I tremble for the lady; and, if on hers, (as he tells my niece Charlotte) I could wiſh ſhe were apprized that delays are dangerous. Excellent as ſhe is, ſhe ought not to depend on her merits with ſuch a changeable fellow, and ſuch a profeſt marriage-hater, as he has been. Deſert and reward, I can aſſure her, ſeldom keep company together.

But let him remember, that vengeance, though it comes with leaden feet, ſtrikes with iron hands. If he behaves ill in this caſe, he may find it ſo. What a pity it is, that a man of his talents and learning ſhould be ſo vile a rake! Alas! alas! Une poignee de bonne vie vaut mieux que plein muy de clerge; a handful of good life is better than a whole buſhel of learning.

You may throw it in, too, as a friend, that ſhould he provoke me, it may not be too late for me to marry. My old friend Wycherly did ſo, when he was older than I am, on purpoſe to plague his nephew: and in ſpite of this gout, I might have a child or two ſtill. I have not been without ſome thoughts that way, when he has angered me more than ordinary. But theſe thoughts have gone off hitherto, upon my conſidering, that the children of very young and very old men (though I am not ſo very old neither) laſt not long; and that old men, when they marry young women, are ſaid to make much of death. Yet who knows but that matrimony might be good againſt the gouty humours I am troubled with?

No man is every-thing—You, Mr. Belford, are a learned man. I am a peer. And do you (as you beſt know how) inculcate upon him the force of theſe wiſe ſayings which follow, as well as thoſe which went before; but yet ſo diſcreetly, as that he may not know, that you borrow your darts from my quiver. Theſe be they—Happy is the man who knows his follies in his youth. He that lives well, lives long. Again, He that lives ill one year, will ſorrow for it ſeven. And again, as the Spaniards have it—Who lives well, ſees afar off! Far off indeed; for he ſees into eternity, as a man may ſay. Then that other fine ſaying, He who periſhes in needleſs dangers, is the devil's martyr. Another proverb I picked up at Madrid, when I accompanied Lord Lexington on his embaſſy to Spain, which might teach our nephew more mercy and compaſſion than is in his nature I doubt to ſhew; which is this, That he who pities another, remembers himſelf. And this that is going to follow, I am ſure he has proved the truth of a hundred times, That he who does what he will, ſeldom does what he ought. Nor is that unworthy of his notice, Young men's frolicks, old men feel. My deviliſh gout, God help me—But I will not ſay what I was going to ſay.

I remember, that you yourſelf, complimenting me for my taſte in pithy and wiſe ſentences, ſaid a thing that gave me a high opinion of you; and it was this: 'Men of talents, ſaid you, 'are ſooner to be 'convinced by ſhort ſentences than by long 'preachments, becauſe the ſhort ſentences drive 'themſelves into the heart, and ſtay there, 'while long diſcourſes, though ever ſo good, 'tire the attention; and one good thing 'drives out another, and ſo on, till all is for-'gotten.'

May your good counſel, Mr. Belford, founded upon theſe hints which I have given, pierce his heart, and incite him to do what will be ſo happy for himſelf, and ſo neceſſary for the honour of that admirable lady whom I long to ſee his wife; and, if I may, I will not think of one for myſelf.

Should he abuſe the confidence ſhe has placed in him, I myſelf ſhall pray, that vengeance may fall upon his head—'Raro'—I quite forget all my Latin; but I think it is 'Raro antecedentem ſceleſtum 'deſeruit pede pœna claudo: Where vice 'goes before, vengeance (ſooner or later) 'will follow.' But why do I tranſlate 'theſe things for you?'

I ſhall make no apologies for this trouble. I know how well you love him and me; and there is nothing in which you could ſerve us more importantly, than in forwarding this match to the utmoſt of your power. When it is done, how ſhall I rejoice to ſee you at M. Hall! Mean time, I ſhall long to hear that you are likely to be ſucceſsful with him; and am, dear Sir, your moſt faithful friend and ſervant.

Mr. Lovelace having not returned an anſwer to Mr. Belford's expoſtulatory letter ſo ſoon as Mr. Belford expected, he wrote to him, expreſſing his apprehenſion, that he had diſobliged him by his honeſt freedom. Among other things, he ſays—

'I PASS my time here at Watford, at-'tending my dying uncle, very heavily. 'I cannot therefore, by any means, diſ-'penſe with thy correſpondence. And 'why ſhouldſt thou puniſh me, for hav-'ing more conſcience and more remorſe 'than thyſelf? Thou who never thought-'eſt either conſcience or remorſe an ho-'nour to thee. And I have, beſides, a 'melancholy ſtory to tell thee, in rela-'tion to Belton and his Thomaline; and 'which may afford a leſſon to all the 'keeping claſs.

'I have a letter from each of our 'three companions in the time. They 'have all the wickedneſs that th u haſt, 'but not the wit. Some new rogueries 'do two of them boaſt of, which, I think, 'if completed, deſerve the gallows.

'I am far from hating intrigue upon 'principle. But to have aukward fel-'lows plot, and commit their plots to 'paper, deſtitute of the ſeaſonings, of the 'acumen, which is thy talent, how ex-'tremely ſhocking muſt their letters be! '—But do thou, Lovelace, whether thou 'art, or art not, determined upon thy 'meaſures with regard to the fine lady 'in thy power, enliven my heavy heart 'by thy communications; and thou wilt 'oblige thy melancholy friend,

'J. BELFORD.'

LETTER XXV.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

FRIDAY NIGHT, MAY 19.

WHEN I have opened my views to thee ſo amply as I have done in my former letters; and have told thee, that my principal deſign is but to bring virtue to a trial, that, if virtue, it need not be afraid of; and that the reward of it will be marriage; (that is to ſay, if, after I have carried my point, I cannot prevail upon her to live with me the life of honour; for that thou knoweſt is the wiſh of my heart) I am amazed at the repetition of thy wambling nonſenſe.

I am of opinion with thee, that ſome time hence, when I am grown wiſer, I ſhall conclude, that there is nothing but wonder, conceit, and nonsense in my present self-sufficiency. But what is this saying, but that I must be first wiser?

I do not intend to let the matchless creature slide through my fingers.

Art thou able to say half the things in her praise, that I have said, and am continually saying or writing?

Her gloomy father cursed the sweet creature, because he put it out of his wicked power to compel her to have the man she hated. Thou knowest how little merit she has with me on this score. And shall I not try the virtue I intend, upon full proof, to re-ward, because her father is a tyrant?—Why art thou thus eternally reflecting upon so excellent a woman, as if thou wert assured she would fail in the trial?—Nay, thou declarest, every time thou writest on the subject, that she will, and she must yield, entangled as she is: and yet makest her virtue the pretence of thy solicitude for her.

An instrument of the vile James Harlowe, dost thou call me?—O Jack! how could I curse thee!—I an instrument of that brother! of that sister! But mark the end—And thou shalt see what will become of that brother and that sister.

Play not against me my own acknowledged sensibilities, I desire thee. Sensibilities, which at the same time that they contradict the charge of an adamantine heart in thy friend, thou hadst known nothing of, had I not communicated them to thee.

If I ruin such a virtue, sayest thou!—Eternal monotonist!—Again; 'The most 'immaculate virtue may be ruined by men who 'have no regard to their honour, and who 'make a jest of the most solemn oaths, &c.' What must be the virtue that will be ruined without oaths? Is not the world full of these deceptions? And are not lovers oaths a jest of hundreds of years standing? And are not cautions against the perfidy of our sex, a necessary part of the female education?

I do intend to endeavour to overcome myself; but I must first try, if I cannot overcome this lady. Have I not said, that the honour of her sex is concerned that I should try?

Whenever thou meetest with a woman of but half her perfections, thou wilt marry—Do, Jack.

Can a girl be degraded by trials, who is not overcome?

I am glad that thou takest crime to thyself, for not endeavouring to convert the poor wretches whom others have ruined. I will not recriminate upon thee. Belford, as I might, when thou flatterest thyself, that thou never ruinedst the morals of any young creature, who otherwise would not have been corrupted—The palliating consolation of an Hottentot heart, determined rather to gluttonize on the garbage of other foul feeders than to reform.—But tell me, Jack, wouldst thou have spared such a girl as my rosebud, had I not, by my example, engaged thy generosity? Nor was my rosebud the only girl I spared. —When my power was acknowledged, who more merciful than thy friend?

It is resistance that inflames desire,
Sharpens the darts of love, and blow it's fire.
Love is disarm'd that meets with too much ease;
He languishes, and does not care to please.

The women know this as well as the men. They love to be addressed with spirit;

And therefore 'tis their golden fruit they guard
With so much care, to make possession hard.

Whence, for a by-reflection, the ardent, the complaisant gallant is so often preferred to the cold, the unadoring husband. And yet the sex do not consider, that variety and novelty give the ardour and the obsequiousness; and that, were the rake as much used to them as the husband is, he would be [and is to his own wife, if married] as indifferent to their favours, as their husbands are; and the husband, in his turn, would, to another woman, be the rake. Let the women, upon the whole, take this lesson from a Lovelace—Always to endeavour to make themselves as new to a husband, and to appear as elegant and as obliging to him, as they are desirous to appear to a lover, and actually were to him, as such; and then the rake, which all women love, will last longer in the husband, than it generally does.

But to return:—If I have not sufficiently cleared my conduct to thee in the above; I refer thee once more to mine of the 13th of last month. And pr'ythee, Jack, lay me not under a necessity to repeat the same things so often. I hope thou readest what I write more than once.

I am not displeased that thou art so apprehensive of my resentment, that I cannot miss a day without making thee uneasy. Thy conscience, 'tis plain, tells thee, that thou hast deserved my displeasure: and if it has convinced thee of that, it will make thee afraid of repeating thy fault. See that this be the consequence. Else, now that thou hast told me how I can punish thee, it is very likely that I do punish thee by my silence, although although I have as much pleaſure in writing on this charming ſubject, as thou canſt have in reading what I write.

When a boy, if a dog ran away from me through fear, I generally looked about for a ſtone, or a ſtick; and if neither offered to my hand, I ſkimmed my hat after him, to make him afraid for ſomething. What ſignifies power, if we do not exert it?

Let my lord know, that thou haſt ſcribbled to me. But give him not the contents of thy epiſtle. Though a parcel of crude ſtuff, he would think there was ſomething in it. Poor arguments will do, when brought in favour of what we like. But the ſtupid peer little thinks that this lady is a rebel to love. On the contrary, not only he but all the world, believe her to be a volunteer in his ſervice.—So I ſhall incur blame, and ſhe will be pitied, if any thing happen amiſs.

Since my lord's heart is ſo ſet upon this match, I have written already to let him know, That my unhappy character has given my beloved an ungenerous diffidence of me. That ſhe is ſo mother-ſick and father-fond, that ſhe had rather return to Harlowe Place, than marry. That ſhe is even apprehenſive that the ſtep ſhe has taken of going off with me, will make the ladies of a family of ſuch rank and honour as ours, think ſlightly of her. That, therefore, I deſire his lordſhip (though this hint, I tell him, muſt be very delicately touched) to write me ſuch a letter as I can ſhew her. (Let him treat me in it ever ſo freely, I ſhall not take it amiſs, I tell him, becauſe I know his lordſhip takes pleaſure in writing to me in a corrective ſtile.) That he may make what offers he pleaſes on the marriage. That I deſire his preſence at the ceremony; that I might take from his hands the greateſt bleſſing that mortal man can give me.

I have not abſolutely told the lady that I would write to his lordſhip to this effect; yet have given her reaſon to think I will. So that without the laſt neceſſity I ſhall not produce the anſwer I expect from him: for I am very loth, I own, to make uſe of any of my family's names for the furthering of my deſigns. And yet I muſt make all ſecure, before I pull off my maſk. Was not this my motive for bringing her hither?

Thus, thou ſeeſt, that the old peer's letter came very ſeaſonably. I thank thee for it. But as to the ſentences, they cannot poſſibly do me good. I was early ſuffocated with his wiſdom of nations. When a boy I never aſked any thing of him, but out flew a proverb; and if the tendency of that was to deny me, I never could obtain the leaſt favour. This gave me ſo great an averſion to the very word, that when a child, I made it a condition with my tutor, who was an honeſt parſon, that I would not read my Bible at all, if he would not excuſe me one of the wiſeſt books in it: to which, however, I had no other objection, than that it was called The Proverbs. And as for Solomon, he was then a hated character with me, not becauſe of his polygamy, but becauſe I had conceived him to be ſuch another muſty old fellow as my uncle.

Well, but let us leave old ſaws to old men.—What ſignifies thy tedious whining over thy departing relation? Is it not generally agreed, that he cannot recover? Will it not be kind in thee to put him out of his miſery? I hear that he is peſtered ſtill with viſits from doctors and apothecaries, and ſurgeons; that they cannot cut ſo deep as the mortification has gone; and that in every viſit, in every ſcarification, inevitable death is pronounced upon him. Why then do they keep tormenting him? Is it not to take away more of his living fleece than of his dead fleſh?—When a man is given over, the fee ſhould ſurely be refuſed. Are they not now robbing his heirs?—What haſt thou to do, if the will be as thou'dſt have it?—He ſent for thee [Did he not?] to cloſe his eyes. He is but an uncle, is he?

Let me ſee, if I miſtake not, it is in the Bible, or ſome other good book: can it be in Herodotus?—O I believe it is in Joſephus; a half-ſacred, and half-profane author. He tells us of a king Syria, put out of his pain by his prime-miniſter, or one who deſerved to be ſo for his contrivance. The ſtory ſays, if I am right, that he ſpread a wet cloth over his face, which killing him, he reigned in his place. A notable fellow! Perhaps this wet cloth in the original, is what we now call Laudanum; a portion that overſpreads the faculties, as the wet cloth did the face of the royal patient; and the tranſlator knew not how to render it.

But how like a forlorn varlet thou ſubſcribeſt, Thy melancholy friend, 'J. BELFORD!'—Melancholy! for what? To ſtand by and ſee fair play between an old man and death? I thought thou hadſt been more of a man; thou that art not afraid of an acute death, a ſword's point, to to be ſo plagully hyp'd at the conſequences of a chronical one!—What though the ſcarificators work upon him day by day? It is only upon a caput mortuum: and pr'ythee go to, to uſe the ſtylum veterum, and learn of the royal butchers; who for ſport (an hundred times worſe than thy Lovelace) widow ten thouſand at a bruſh, and make twice as many fatherleſs—Learn of them, I ſay, how to ſupport a ſingle death.

But art thou ſure, Jack, it is a mortification?—My uncle once gave promiſes of ſuch a root-and-branch diſtemper: but alas! it turned to a ſmart gout-fit; and I had the mortification inſtead of him—I have heard that bark in proper doſes will arreſt a mortification in it's progreſs, and at laſt cure it. Let thy uncle's ſurgeon know, that it is worth more than his ears, if he preſcribe one grain of the bark.

I wiſh my uncle had given me the opportunity of ſetting thee a better example: thou ſhouldſt have ſeen what a brave fellow I had been. And had I had occaſion to write, my concluſion would have been this: 'I hope the old Trojan's 'happy. In that hope, I am ſo; and 'thy rejoicing friend, R. LOVELACE.'

Dwell not always, Jack, upon one ſubject. Let me hear poor Belton's ſtory. The ſooner the better. If I can be of ſervice to him, tell him he may command me either in purſe or perſon. Yet the former with a freer will than the latter; for how can I leave my goddeſs? But I'll iſſue my commands to my other vaſſals to attend thy ſummons.

If ye want head, let me know. If not, my quota, on this occaſion, is money.

LETTER XXVI.

MR. BELFORD, TO ROBERT LOVELACE, ESQ.

SATURDAY, MAY 20.

NOT one word will I reply to ſuch an abandoned wretch as thou haſt ſhewn thyſelf to be in thine of laſt night. I will leave the lady to the protection of that Power who only can work miracles; and to her own merits. Still I have hopes that theſe will ſave her.

I will proceed, as thou deſireſt, to poor Belton's caſe; and the rather as it has thrown me into ſuch a train of thinking upon our paſt lives, our preſent courſes, and our future views, as may be of ſervice to both, if I can give due weight to the reflections that ariſe from it.

The poor man made me a viſit on Thurſday, in this my melancholy attendance. He began with complaints of his ill health and ſpirits, his hectick cough, and his increaſed malady of ſpitting of blood; and then led to his ſtory.

A confounded one it is; and which highly aggravates his other maladies: for it has come out, that his Thomaſine (who, truly, would be new-chriſtened, you know, that her name might be nearer in ſound to the chriſtian name of the man whom ſhe pretended to doat upon) has for many years carried on an intrigue with a fellow who had been hoſtler to her father, (an innkeeper at Darking;) of whom, at the expence of poor Belton, ſhe has made a gentleman; and managed it ſo, that having the art to make herſelf his caſhier, ſhe has been unable to account for large ſums, which he thought forthcoming at demand, and had truſted to her cuſtody, in order to pay off a mortgage upon his paternal eſtate in Kent, which his heart had run upon leaving clear, but which cannot now be done, and will ſoon be foreclоſed. And yet ſhe has ſo long paſſed for his wife, that he knows not what to reſolve upon about her; nor about the two boys he was ſo fond of, ſuppoſing them to be his; whereas now he begins to doubt his ſhare in them.

So KEEPING don't do, Lovelace. 'Tis not the eligible life.—'A man may keep a woman,' ſaid the poor fellow to me, 'but 'not his eſtate!—Two intereſts!—Then, 'my tottering fabrick!' pointing to his emaciated carcaſe.

We do well to value ourſelves upon our liberty, or, to ſpeak more properly, upon the liberties we take! We had need to run down matrimony as we do, and to make that ſtate the ſubject of our frothy jeſts, when we frequently render ourſelves (for this of Tom's is not a ſingular caſe) the dupes and tools of women who generally govern us (by arts our wiſe heads penetrate not) more abſolutely than a wife would attempt to do.

Let us conſider this point a little; and that upon our own principles, as libertines, ſetting aſide what is exacted from us by the laws of our country, and it's cuſtoms; which, nevertheleſs, we cannot get over, till we have got over almoſt all moral obligations, as members of ſociety.

In the firſt place, let us conſider (we, who are in poſſeſſion of eſtates by legal deſcent) how we ſhould have liked to have been ſuch naked deſtitute varlets, as we muſt muſt have been, had our fathers been as wiſe as ourſelves; and deſpiſed matrimony as we do—And then let us aſk ourſelves, If we ought not to have the ſame regard for our poſterity, as we are glad our fathers had for theirs?

But this, perhaps, is too moral a conſideration.—To proceed, therefore, to thoſe conſiderations which will be more ſtriking to us: How can we reaſonably expect œconomy or frugality (or anything indeed but riot and waſte) from creatures who have an intereſt, and muſt therefore have views, different from our own?

They know the uncertain tenure (our fickle humours) by which they hold: and is it to be wondered at, ſuppoſing them to be provident harlots, that they ſhould endeavour, if they have the power, to lay up againſt a rainy day? Or, if they have not the power, that they ſhould ſquander all they can come at, when they are ſure of nothing but the preſent hour; and when the life they live, and the ſacrifices they have made, put conſcience and honour out of the queſtion?

Whereas a wife, having the ſame family intereſt with her huſband, lies not under either the ſame apprehenſions or temptations; and has not broken through (of neceſſity, at leaſt, has not) thoſe reſtraints which education has faſtened upon her: and if ſhe make a private purſe, which we are told by anti-matrimonialiſts, all wives love to do, and has children, it goes all into the ſame family at the long-run.

Then, as to the great article of fidelity to your bed, are not women of family, who are well-educated, under greater reſtraints, than creatures, who, if they ever had reputation, ſacrifice it to ſordid intereſt, or to more ſordid appetite, the moment they give up to you? Does not the example you furniſh, of having ſucceeded with her, give encouragement for others to attempt her likewiſe? For, with all her blandiſhments, can any man be ſo credulous, or ſo vain, as to believe, that the woman he could perſuade, another may not prevail upon?

Adultery is ſo capital a guilt, that even rakes and libertines, if not wholly abandoned, and, as I may ſay, invited by a woman's levity, diſavow and condemn it: but here, in a ſtate of KEEPING, a woman is in no danger of incurring (legally, at leaſt) that guilt; and you yourſelf have broken through and overthrown in her all the fences and boundaries of moral honeſty, and the modeſty and reſerves of her ſex: and what tie ſhall hold her againſt inclination, or intereſt? And what ſhall deter an attempter?

While a huſband has this ſecurity from legal ſanctions, that if his wife be detected in a criminal converſation with a man of fortune, (the moſt likely by bribes to ſeduce her) he may recover very great damages, and procure a divorce beſides: which, to ſay nothing of the ignominy, is a conſideration that muſt have ſome force upon both parties. And a wife muſt be vicious indeed, and a reflection upon a man's own choice, who, for the ſake of change, and where there are no qualities to ſeduce, nor affluence to corrupt, will run ſo many hazards to injure her huſband in the tendereſt of all points.

But there are difficulties in procuring a divorce, [And ſo there ought]—And 'none,' ſays the rake, 'in parting with a 'miſtreſs whenever you ſuſpect her; or 'whenever you are weary of her, and 'have a mind to change her for another.'

But muſt not the man be a brute indeed, who can caſt off a woman whom he has ſeduced, [if he take her from the town, that's another thing] without ſome flagrant reaſon; ſomething that will better juſtify him to himſelf, as well as to her, and to the world, than mere power and novelty?

But I don't ſee, if we judge by fact, and by the practice of all we have been acquainted with of the keeping-claſs, that we know how to part with them when we have them.

That we know we can if we will, is all we have for it: and this leads us to hear many things from a miſtreſs, which we would not from a wife. But, if we are good-natured and humane: if the woman has art, [And what woman wants it, who has fallen by art? and to whoſe precarious ſituation art is ſo neceſſary?] if you have given her the credit of being called by your name: if you have a ſettled place of abode, and have received and paid viſits in her company, as your wife: if ſhe has brought you children—You will allow, that theſe are ſtrong obligations upon you, in the world's eye, as well as to your own heart, againſt tearing yourſelf from ſuch cloſe connexions. She will ſtick to you as your ſkin: and it will be next to flaying yourſelf to caſt her off.

Even if there be cauſe for it, by infidelity, ſhe will have managed ill, if ſhe have not her defenders. Nor did I ever know a cauſe or a perſon ſo bad, as to want advocates, either from ill-will to the the one, or pity to the other: and you will then be thought a hard-hearted miſcreant: and even were ſhe to go off without credit to herſelf, ſhe will leave you as little; eſpecially with all thoſe whoſe good opinion a man would wiſh to cultivate.

Well, then, ſhall this poor privilege, that we may part with a woman if we will, be deemed a balance for the other inconveniences? Shall it be thought by us, who are men of family and fortune, an equivalent for giving up equality of degree; and taking for the partner of our bed, and very probably more than the partner in our eſtates, (to the breach of all family-rule and order) a low-born, a low-educated creature, who has not brought any-thing into the common ſtock; and can poſſibly make no returns for the ſolid benefits ſhe receives, but thoſe libidinous ones, which a man cannot boaſt of, but to his diſgrace, nor think of, but to the ſhame of both?

Moreover, as the man advances in years, the fury of his libertiniſm will go off. He will have different aims and purſuits, which will diminiſh his appetite to ranging, and make ſuch a regular life as the matrimonial and family-life, palatable to him, and every day more palatable.

If he has children, and has reaſon to think them his, and if his lewd courſes have left him any eſtate, he will have cauſe to regret the reſtraint his boaſted liberty has laid him under, and the valuable privilege it has deprived him of; when he finds, that it muſt deſcend to ſome relation, for whom, whether near or diſtant, he cares not one farthing; and who perhaps (if a man of virtue) has held him in the utmoſt contempt for his diſſolute life.

And were we to ſuppoſe his eſtate in his power to bequeath as he pleaſes; why ſhould a man reſolve, for the gratifying of his foolith humour only, to baſtardize his race? Why ſhould he wiſh to expoſe his children to the ſcorn and inſults of the reſt of the world? Why ſhould he, whether they are ſons or daughters, lay them under the neceſſity of complying with propoſals of marriage, either inferior as to fortune, or unequal as to age? Why ſhould he deprive the children he loves, who themſelves may be guilty of no fault, of the reſpect they would wiſh to have, and to deſerve; and of the opportunity of aſſociating themſelves with proper, that is to ſay, with reputable company? And why ſhould he make them think themſelves under obligation to every perſon of character, who will vouchſafe to viſit them? What little reaſon, in a word, would ſuch children have to bleſs their father's obſtinate defiance of the laws and cuſtoms of his country; and for giving them a mother, of whom they could not think with honour; to whoſe crime it was, that they owed their very beings, and whoſe example it was their duty to ſhun?

If the education and morals of theſe children are left to chance, as too generally they are, (for the man who has humanity and a feeling heart, and who is capable of fondneſs for his offſpring, I take it for granted, will marry;) the caſe is ſtill worſe; his crime is perpetuated, as I may ſay, by his children: and the ſea, the army, perhaps the highway, for the boys; the common for the girls; too often point out the way to a worſe cataſtrophe.

What, therefore, upon the whole, do we get by treading in theſe crooked paths, but danger, diſgrace, and a too late repentance?

And after all, do we not frequently become the cullies of our own libertiniſm; ſliding into the very ſtate with thoſe half-worn-out doxies, which perhaps we might have entered into with their ladies; at leaſt with their ſuperiors both in degree and fortune? And all the time, lived handſomely like ourſelves; not ſneaking into holes and corners; and, when we crept abroad with our women, looking about us, and at every-one that paſſed us, as if we were confeſſedly accountable to the cenſures of all honeſt people.

My couſin Tony Jenyns, thou knoweſt, He had not the actively miſchievous ſpirit, that thou, Belton, Mowbray, Tourville, and myſelf, have! but he imbibed the ſame notions we do, and carried them into practice.

How did he prate againſt wedlock! How did he ſtrut about as a wit and a ſmart! and what a wit and a ſmart did all the boys and girls of our family (myſelf among the reſt, then an urchin) think him, for the airs he gave himſelf?—Marry! No, not for the world; what man of ſenſe would bear the inſolences, the petulances, the expenſiveneſs of a wife! He could not for the heart of him think it tolerable, that a woman of equal rank and fortune, and, as it might happen, ſuperior talents to his own, ſhould look upon herſelf to have a right to ſhare the benefit of that fortune which ſhe brought him.

So,

So, after he had fluttered about the town for two or three years, in all which time he had a better opinion of himself than any-body else had, what does he do, but enter upon an affair with his fencing-master's daughter!

He succeeds; takes private lodgings for her at Hackney; visits her by stealth; both of them tender of reputations that were extremely tender, but which neither had quite given up; for rakes of either sex are always the last to condemn or cry down themselves: visited by nobody, nor visiting: the life of a thief, or of a man beset by creditors, afraid to look out of his own house, or to be seen abroad with her. And thus went he on for twelve years, and, though he had a good estate, hardly making both ends meet; for, though no glare, there was no œconomy; and beside, he had every year a child, and very fond of his children was he. But none of them lived above three years: and being now, on the death of the dozenth, grown as dully sober, as if he had been a real husband, his good Mrs. Thomas (for he had not permitted her to take his own name) prevailed upon him to think the loss of their children a judgment upon the parents for their wicked way of life; [A time will come, Lovelace, if we live to advanced years, in which reflection will take hold of the enfeebled mind;] and then it was not difficult for his woman to induce him, by way of compounding with Heaven, to marry her. When this was done, he had leisure to sit down, and contemplate; and to recollect the many offers of persons of family and fortune which he had declined in the prime of life: his expences equal at least: his reputation not only less, but lost: his enjoyments stolen: his partnership unequal, and such as he had always been ashamed of. But the woman said, That after twelve or thirteen years cohabitation, Tony did an honest thing by her. And that was all my poor cousin got by making his old mistress his new wife—Not a drum, not a trumpet, not a fife, not a tabret, nor the expectation of a new joy, to animate him on!

What Belton will do with his Thomasine I know not; nor care I to advise him: for I see the poor fellow does not like that any-body should curse her but himself. This he does very heartily. And so low is he reduced, that he blubbers over the reflection upon his past fondness for her cubs, and upon his present doubts of their being his: 'What 'a damned thing is it, Belford, if Tom 'and Hal should be the hostler dog's 'puppies, and not mine!'

Very true! and I think the strong health of the chubby-faced muscular whelps confirms the too great probability. But I say not so to him.

You, he says, are such a gay, lively mortal, that this sad tale would make no impression upon you: especially now, that your whole heart is engaged as it is. Mowbray would be too violent upon it: he has not, he says, a feeling heart. Tourville has no discretion: and, a pretty jest! although he and his Thomasine lived without reputation in the world, (people guessing that they were not married, notwithstanding she went by his name) yet he would not too much discredit the cursed ingrate neither!

Could a man act a weaker part, had he been really married; and were he sure he was going to separate from the mother of his own children?

I leave this as a lesson upon thy heart, without making any application: only with this remark, That after we libertines have indulged our licentious appetites, reflecting (in the conceit of our vain hearts) both with our lips and by our lives, upon our ancestors, and the good old ways, we find out, when we come to years of discretion, if we live till then, (what all who knew us found out before, that is to say, we find out) our own despicable folly; that those good old ways would have been best for us, as well as for the rest of the world; and that in every step we have deviated from them, we have only exposed our vanity, and our ignorance at the same time. J. BELFORD.

LETTER XXVII.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

SATURDAY, MAY 20.

I Am pleased with the sober reflection with which thou concludest thy last; and I thank thee for it. Poor Belton!—I did not think his Thomasine would have proved so very a devil. But this must everlastingly be the risque of a keeper, who takes up with a low-bred girl. This I never did. Nor had I occasion to do it. Such a one as I, Jack, needed only, till now, to shake the stateliest tree, and the mellowed fruit dropt into my mouth—Always of Montaigne's taste, thou knowest—Thought it a glory to subdue a girl of family.—More truly delightful to me the seduction-progress than the crowned act: for that's a vapour, a bubble!

ble! And moſt cordially do I thank thee for thy indirect hint, that I am right in my preſent purſuit.

From ſuch a woman as Miſs Harlowe, a man is ſecured from all the inconveniences thou expatiateſt upon.

Once more, therefore, do I thank thee, Belford, for thy approbation!—A man need not, as thou ſayeſt, ſneak into holes and corners, and ſhun the day, in the company of ſuch a woman as this. How friendly in thee, thus to abet the favourite purpoſe of my heart!—Nor can it be a diſgrace to me, to permit ſuch a lady to be called by my name!—Nor ſhall I be at all concerned about the world's cenſure, if I live to the years of diſcretion, which thou mentioneſt, ſhould I be taken in, and prevailed upon to tread with her the good old path of my anceſtors.

A bleſſing on thy heart, thou honeſt fellow! I thought thou wert in jeſt, and but acquitting thyſelf of an engagement to Lord M. when thou wert pleading for matrimony in behalf of this lady!—It could not be principle, I knew, in thee: it could not be compaſſion—A little envy, indeed, I ſuſpected!—But now I ſee thee once more thyſelf: and once more, ſay I, a bleſſing on thy heart, thou true friend, and very honeſt fellow!

Now will I proceed with courage in all my ſchemes, and oblige thee with the continued narrative of my progreſſions towards bringing them to effect!—But I could not forbear to interrupt my ſtory, to ſhew my gratitude.

LETTER XXVIII.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

AND now will I favour thee with a brief account of our preſent ſituation.

From the higheſt to the loweſt we are all extremely happy.—Dorcas ſtands well in her lady's graces. Polly has aſked her advice in relation to a courtſhip-affair of her own. No oracle ever gave better. Sally has had a quarrel with her woollen-draper; and made my charmer lady-chancellor in it. She blamed Sally for behaving tyrannically to a man who loves her. Dear creature! to ſtand againſt a glaſs, and to ſhut her eyes becauſe ſhe will not ſee her face in it!—Mrs. Sinclair has paid her court to ſo unerring a judge, by requeſting her advice with regard to both nieces.

This the way we have been in for ſeveral days with the people below. Yet ſola generally at her meals, and ſeldom at other times in their company. They now, uſed to her ways, [Perſeverance muſt conquer] never preſs her; ſo when they meet, all is civility on both ſides. Even married people, I believe, Jack, prevent abundance of quarrels, by ſeeing one another but ſeldom.

'But how ſtands it between thyſelf 'and the lady,' methinks thou aſkeſt, 'ſince her abrupt departure from thee, 'and undutiful repulſe of Wedneſday 'morning?'

Why, pretty well in the main. Nay, very well. For why? The dear ſaucy-face knows not how to help herſelf. Can fly to no other protection. And has, beſides, over-heard a converſation [Who would have thought ſhe had been ſo near?] which paſſed between Mrs. Sinclair, Miſs Martin, and myſelf, that very Wedneſday afternoon; which has ſet her heart at eaſe with reſpect to ſeveral doubtful points.

Such as, particularly, Mrs. Fretchville's unhappy ſtate of mind—Moſt humanely pitied by Miſs Martin, who knows her very well—The huſband ſhe has loſt, and herſelf, (as Sally ſays) lovers from their cradles. Pity from one begets pity from another, be the occaſion for it either ſtrong or weak; and ſo many circumſtances were given to poor Mrs. Fretchville's diſtreſs, that it was impoſſible but my beloved muſt extremely pity her whom the leſs tender-hearted Miſs Martin greatly pitied.

My Lord M.'s gout his only hindrance from viſiting my ſpouſe. Lady Betty and Miſs Montague ſoon expected in town.

My earneſt deſire ſignified to have my ſpouſe receive thoſe ladies in her own houſe, if Mrs. Fretchville would but know her own mind; and I pathetically lamented the delay occaſioned by her not knowing it.

My intention to ſtay at Mrs. Sinclair's, as I ſaid I had told them before, while my ſpouſe reſides in her own houſe, (when Mrs. Fretchville could be brought to quit it) in order to gratify her utmoſt punctilio.

My paſſion for my beloved (which, as I told them in a high and fervent accent, was the trueſt that man could have for woman) I boaſted of. It was, in ſhort, I ſaid, of the true Platonick kind; or I had no notion of what Platonick love was.

So it is, Jack; and muſt end as Platonick love generally does end.

Sally and Mrs. Sinclair next praiſed, but not groſsly, my beloved. Sally particularly ticularly admired her purity; called it exemplary; yet (to avoid ſuſpicion) expreſſed her thoughts that ſhe was rather over-nice, if ſhe might preſume to ſay ſo before me. But nevertheleſs ſhe applauded me for the ſtrict obſervation I made of my vow.

I more freely blamed her reſerves to me; called her cruel; inveighed againſt her relations; doubted her love. Every favour I aſked of her denied me. Yet my behaviour to her as pure and delicate when alone, as when before them—Hinted at ſomething that had paſſed between us that very day, that ſhewed her indifference to me in ſo ſtrong a light, that I could not bear it. But that I would aſk her for her company to the play of Venice Preſerved, given out for Saturday night as a benefit-play, the prime actors to be in it; and this, to ſee if I were to be denied every favour.—Yet, for my own part, I loved not tragedies; though ſhe did, for the ſake of the inſtruction, the warning, and the example generally given in them.

I had too much feeling, I ſaid. There was enough in the world to make our hearts ſad, without carrying grief into our diverſions, and making the diſtreſſes of others our own.

True enough, Belford; and I believe, generally ſpeaking, that all the men of our caſt are of my mind—They love not any tragedies but thoſe in which they themſelves act the parts of tyrants and executioners; and afraid to truſt themſelves with ſerious and ſolemn reflections, run to comedies, in order to laugh away compunction on the diſtreſſes they have occaſioned, and to find examples of men as immoral as themſelves. For very few of our comick performances, as thou knoweſt, give us good ones.—I anſwer, however, for myſelf—Yet thou, I think, on recollection, loveſt to deal in the lamentable.

Sally anſwered for Polly, who was abſent; Mrs. Sinclair for herſelf, and for all her acquaintance, even for Miſs Partington, in preferring the comick to the tragick ſcenes.—And I believe they are right; for the devil's in it, if a confided-in rake does not give a girl enough of tragedy in his comedy.

I aſked Sally to oblige my fair-one with her company. She was engaged. [That was right, thou'lt ſuppoſe.] I aſked Mrs. Sinclair's leave for Polly. To be ſure, ſhe anſwered, Polly would think it an honour to attend Mrs. Lovelace; but the poor thing was tender-hearted; and as the tragedy was deep, would weep herſelf blind.

Sally, mean time, objected Singleton, that I might anſwer the objection, and ſave my beloved the trouble of making it, or debating the point with me; and on this occaſion I regretted that her brother's projects were not laid aſide; ſince, if they had been given up, I would have gone in perſon to bring up the ladies of my family to attend my ſpouſe.

I then, from a letter juſt before received from one in her father's family, warned them of a perſon who had undertaken to find us out, and whom I thus in writing [having called for pen and ink] deſcribed, that they might arm all the family againſt him—A ſun-burnt, pock-fretten ſailor, ill-looking, big-boned; his ſtature about ſix foot; an heavy eye, an over-hanging brow, a deck-treading ſtride in his walk; a couteau generally by his ſide; lips parched from his gums, as if by ſtaring at the ſun in hot climates; a brown coat; a coloured handkerchief about his neck; an oaken plant in his hand near as long as himſelf, and proportionably thick.

No queſtions aſked by this fellow muſt be anſwered. They ſhould call me to him. But not let my beloved know a tittle of this, ſo long as it could be helped. And I added, that if her brother or Singleton came, and if they behaved civilly, I would for her ſake, be civil to them: and in this caſe, ſhe had nothing to do, but to own her marriage, and there could be no pretence for violence on either ſide. But moſt fervently I ſwore, that if ſhe were conveyed away, either by perſuaſion or force, I would directly, on miſſing her but one day, go to demand her at Harlowe Place, whether ſhe were there or not; and if I recovered not a ſiſter. I would have a brother; and ſhould find out a captain of a ſhip as well as he.

And now, Jack, doſt thou think ſhe'll attempt to get from me, do what I will?

Mrs. Sinclair began to be afraid of miſchief in her houſe—I was apprehenſive that ſhe would over-do the matter, and be out of character. I therefore winked at her. She primmed; nodded, to ſhew ſhe took me; twanged out a high-ho through her noſe, lapped one horſe-lip over the other, and was ſilent.

Here's preparation, Belford!—Doſt think I will throw it all away for anything thou canſt ſay, or Lord M. write? —No indeed!—as my charmer ſays, when ſhe bridles.

And what muſt neceſſarily be the conſequence of all this with regard to my beloved's behaviour to me? Canſt thou doubt, that it was all complaiſance next time ſhe admitted me into her preſence?

Thurſday we were very happy. All the morning extremely happy. I kiſſed her charming hand.—I need not deſcribe to thee her hand and arm. When thou ſaweſt her, I took notice that thy eyes dwelt upon them whenever thou couldſt ſpare them from that beauty-ſpot of wonders, her face—Fifty times kiſſed her hand, I believe—Once her cheek, intending her lip, but ſo rapturouſly, that ſhe could not help ſeeming angry.

Had ſhe not thus kept me at arms-length; had ſhe not denied me thoſe innocent liberties which our ſex, from ſtep to ſtep, aſpire to; could I but have gained acceſs to her in her hours of heedleſſneſs and diſhabille; [For full-dreſs creates dignity, augments conſciouſneſs, and compels diſtance] we had familiarized to each other long ago. But keep her up ever ſo late; meet her ever ſo early; by breakfaſt-time ſhe is dreſſed for the day; and at her earlieſt hour, as nice as others dreſſed. All her forms thus kept up, wonder not that I have made ſo little progreſs in the propoſed trial.—But how muſt all this diſtance ſtimulate!

Thurſday morning, as I ſaid, we were extremely happy—About noon, ſhe numbered the hours ſhe had been with me; all of them to me but as one minute; and deſired to be left to herſelf. I was loth to comply: but obſerving the ſun-ſhine begin to ſhut in, I yielded.

I dined out. Returning, I talked of the houſe, and of Mrs. Fretchville—Had ſeen Mennell—Had preſſed him to get the widow to quit. She pitied Mrs. Fretchville. [Another good effect of the over-heard converſation]—Had written to Lord M. expected an anſwer ſoon from him. I was admitted to ſup with her. I urged for her approbation or correction of my written terms. She again promiſed an anſwer as ſoon as ſhe had heard from Miſs Howe.

Then I preſſed for her company to the play on Saturday night. She made objections, as I had foreſeen: her brother's projects, warmth of the weather, &c. But in ſuch a manner as if half-afraid to diſoblige me. [Another happy effect of the over-heard converſation.] I ſoon got over theſe therefore; and ſhe conſented to favour me.

Friday paſſed as the day before.

Here were two happy days to both. Why cannot I make every day equally happy? It looks as if it were in my power to do ſo. Strange, I ſhould thus delight in teazing a woman I ſo dearly love! I muſt, I doubt, have ſomething in my temper like Miſs Howe, who loves to plague the man who puts himſelf in her power.—But I could not do thus by ſuch an angel as this, did I not believe, that after her probation-time ſhall be expired; and if ſhe be not to be brought to cohabitation, (my darling view) I ſhall reward her as ſhe wiſhes.

Saturday is half-over. We are equally happy—Preparing for the play. Polly has offered her company, and is accepted. I have directed her where to weep: and this not only to ſhew her humanity, [A weeping eye indicates a gentle heart] but to have a pretence to hide her face with a fan or handkerchief.—Yet Polly is far from being every man's girl; and we ſhall ſit in the gallery green-box.

The woes of others, ſo well repreſented as thoſe of Belvidera particularly will be, muſt, I hope, unlock and open my charmer's heart. Whenever I have been able to prevail upon a girl to permit me to attend her to a play, I have thought myſelf ſure of her. The female heart (all gentleneſs and harmony by nature) expands, and forgets it's forms, when it's attention is carried out of itſelf at an agreeable or affecting entertainment—Muſick, and perhaps a collation afterwards, co-operating.

Indeed, I have no hope of ſuch an effect here; but I have more than one end to anſwer by getting her to a play. To name but one—Dorcas has a maſter-key, as I have told thee.—But it were worth while to carry her to the play of Venice Preſerved, were it but to ſhew her, that there have been, and may be, much deeper diſtreſſes than ſhe can poſſibly know.

Thus exceedingly happy are we at preſent. I hope we ſhall not find any of Nat. Lee's left-handed gods at work, to daſh our bowl of joy with wormwood.

R. Lovelace.

LETTER XXIX.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE TO MISS HOWE.

FRIDAY, MAY 19.

I Would not, if I could help it, be ſo continually brooding over the dark and gloomy face of my condition [All nature, you know, my dear, and every-thing in it, has a bright and gloomy ſide] ſide] as to be thought unable to enjoy a more hopeful proſpect. And this, not only for my own ſake, but for yours, who take ſuch generous concern in all that befals me.

Let me tell you then, my dear, that I have known four-and-twenty hours together not unhappy ones, my ſituation conſidered.

[She then gives the particulars of the converſation which ſhe had over-heard between Mr. Lovelace, Mrs. Sinclair, and Miſs Martin: but accounts more minutely than he had done, for the opportunity ſhe had of over-hearing it, unknown to them.]

[She gives the reaſons ſhe has to be pleaſed with what ſhe heard from each: but is ſhocked at the meaſure he is reſolved to take, if he miſſes her but for one day. Yet is pleaſed, that he propoſes to avoid aggreſſive violence, if her brother and he meet in town.]

Even Dorcas, ſays ſhe, appears leſs exceptionable to me than before; and I cannot but pity her for her neglected education, as it is matter of ſo much regret to herſelf: elſe there would not be much in it; as the low and illiterate are the moſt uſeful people in the commonwealth, (ſince ſuch conſtitute the labouring part of the publick) and as a lettered education but too generally ſets people above thoſe ſervile offices, by which the buſineſs of the world is carried on. Nor have I any doubt that there are, take the world through, twenty happy people among the unlettered, to one among thoſe who have had a ſchool-education.

This, however, concludes not againſt learning or letters; ſince one would wiſh to lift to ſome little diſtinction, and more genteel uſefulneſs, thoſe who have capacity, and whoſe parentage one reſpects, or whoſe ſervices one would wiſh to reward.

Were my mind quite at eaſe, I could enlarge, perhaps not unuſefully, upon this ſubject; for I have conſidered it with as much attention as my years, and little experience and obſervation, will permit.

But the extreme illiterateneſs and indocility of this maid are ſurprizing, conſidering that ſhe wants not inquiſitiveneſs, appears willing to learn, and in other reſpects, has quick parts. This confirms to me what I have heard remarked, That there is a docible ſeaſon, a learning-time, as I may ſay, for every perſon, in which the mind may be led ſtep by ſtep, from the lower to the higher (year by year) to improvement. How induſtriouſly ought theſe ſeaſons, as they offer, to be taken hold of, by tutors, parents, and other friends, to whom the cultivation of the genius of children and youth is committed; ſince once elapſed, and no foundation laid, they hardly ever return!—And yet it muſt be confeſſed, that there are ſome geniuſes, which, like ſome fruits, ripen not till late. And induſtry and perſeverance will do prodigious things—But for a learner to have thoſe firſt rudiments to maſter at twenty years of age ſuppoſe, which others are taught, and they themſelves might have attained, at ten, what an up-hill labour!

Theſe kind of obſervations you have always wiſhed me to interſperſe, as they ariſe to my thoughts. But it is a ſign that my proſpects are a little mended, or I ſhould not, among ſo many more intereſting ones, that my mind has been of late filled with, have had heart's eaſe enough to make them.

Let me give you my reflections on my more hopeful proſpects.

I am now, in the firſt place, better able to account for the delays about the houſe, than I was before—Poor Mrs. Fretchville!—Though I know her not, I pity her!—Next, it looks well, that he had apprized the women (before this converſation with them) of his intention to ſtay in this houſe, after I was removed to the other. By the tone of his voice he ſeemed concerned for the appearance the new delay would have with me.

So handſomely did Miſs Martin expreſs herſelf of me, that I am ſorry, methinks, that I judged ſo hardly of her, when I firſt came hither—Free people may go a great way, but not all the way: and as ſuch are generally unguarded, precipitate, and thoughtleſs, the ſame quickneſs, changeableneſs, and ſuddenneſs of ſpirit, as I may call it, may intervene (if the heart be not corrupted) to recover them to thought and duty.

His reaſon for declining to go in perſon to bring up the ladies of his family, while my brother and Singleton continue their machinations, carries no bad face with it; and one may the rather allow for their expectations, that ſo proud a ſpirit as his ſhould attend them for this purpoſe, as he ſpeaks of them ſometimes as perſons of punctilio.

Other reaſons I will mention for my being eaſier in my mind than I was before fore I over-heard this converſation.

Such as, the advice he has received in relation to Singleton's mate; which agrees but too well with what you, my dear, wrote to me in yours of May the 20th.

His not intending to acquaint me with it.

His cautions to the ſervants about the ſailor, if he ſhould come, and make enquiries about us.

His reſolution to avoid violence, were he to fall in either with my brother, or this Singleton; and the eaſy method he has chalked out, in this caſe, to prevent miſchief; ſince I need only not to deny my being his. But yet I ſhould be exceedingly unhappy in my own opinion, to be driven into ſuch a tacit acknowledgment to any new perſons, till I am ſo, although I have been led (ſo much againſt my liking) to give countenance to the belief of the perſons below that we are married.

I think myſelf obliged from what paſſed between Mr. Lovelace and me on Wedneſday, and from what I over-heard him ſay, to conſent to go with him to the play; and the rather, as he had the diſcretion to propoſe one of the nieces to accompany me.

I cannot but acknowledge that I am pleaſed to find that he has actually written to Lord M.

I have promiſed to give Mr. Lovelace an anſwer to his propoſals as ſoon as I have heard from you, my dear, on the ſubject.

I hope that in my next letter I ſhall have reaſon to confirm theſe favourable appearances. Favourable I muſt think them in the wreck I have ſuffered.

I hope that in the trial which you hint may happen between me and myſelf, (as you expreſs it) if he ſhould ſo behave, as to oblige me to leave him, I ſhall be able to act in ſuch a manner, as to bring no diſcredit upon myſelf in your eye; and that is all I now have to wiſh for. But if I value him ſo much as you are pleaſed to ſuppoſe I do, the trial which you imagine will be ſo difficult to me, will not, I conceive, be upon getting from him, when the means to effect my eſcape are lent me; but how I ſhall behave when got from him; and if, like the Iſraelites of old, I ſhall be ſo weak as to wiſh to return to my Egyptian bondage.

I think it will not be amiſs, notwithſtanding the preſent favourable appearances, that you ſhould perfect the ſcheme (whatever it be) which you tell me you have thought of, in order to procure for me an aſylum, in caſe of neceſſity. Mr. Lovelace is certainly a deep and dangerous man; and it is therefore but prudence to be watchful, and to be provided againſt the worſt. Lord bleſs me, my dear, how am I reduced!—Could I ever have thought to be in ſuch a ſituation, as to be obliged to ſtay with a man, of whoſe honour by me I could have but the ſhadow of a doubt!—But I will look forward, and hope the beſt.

I am certain, that your letters are ſafe.—Be perfectly eaſy, therefore, on that head.

Mr. Lovelace will never be out of my company by his good will, otherwiſe I have no doubt that I am miſtreſs of my goings-out and comings-in; and did I think it needful, and were I not afraid of my brother and Captain Singleton, I would oftener put it to trial.

LETTER XXX.

MISS HOWE, TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

SATURDAY, MAY 20.

I Did not know, my dear, that you deferred giving an anſwer to Mr. Lovelace's propoſals, till you had my opinion of them. A particular hand occaſionally going to town, will leave this at Wilſon's, that no delay may be made on that account.

I never had any doubt of the man's juſtice and generoſity in matters of ſettlement; and all his relations are as noble in their ſpirits, as in their deſcent: but now it may not be amiſs for you to wait, to ſee what return my lord makes to his letter of invitation.

The ſcheme I think of is this.

There is a perſon whom I believe you have ſeen with me; her name Townſend, who is a great dealer in Indian ſilks, Bruſſels and French laces, cambricks, linen, and other valuable goods; which ſhe has a way of coming at, duty free; and has a great vend for them (and for other curioſities which ſhe imports) in the private families of the gentry around us.

She has her days of being in town, and then it is a chamber ſhe rents at an inn in Southwark, where ſhe keeps patterns of all her ſilks, and much of her portable goods, for the conveniency of her London cuſtomers. But her place of reſidence and where ſhe has her principal warehouſe, is at Deptford, for the opportunity of getting her goods on ſhore.

She was firſt brought to me by my mother, to whom she was recommended on the supposal of my speedy marriage, that I might have an opportunity to be as fine as a princess, was my mother's expression, at a moderate expence.

Now, my dear, I must own, that I do not love to encourage these contraband traders. What is it, but bidding defiance to the laws of our country, when we do; and hurting fair traders; and at the same time robbing our prince of his legal due, to the diminution of those duties which possibly must be made good by new levies upon the publick?

But however Mrs. Townsend and I, though I have not yet had dealings with her, are upon a very good foot of understanding. She is a sensible woman; she has been abroad, and often goes abroad in the way of her business; and gives very entertaining accounts of all she has seen. And having applied to me, to recommend her to you, (as it is her view to be known to young ladies who are likely to change their condition) I am sure I can engage her to give you protection at her house at Deptford; which she says is a populous village; and one of the last, I should think, in which you would be sought for. She is not much there, you will believe, by the course of her dealings; but, no doubt, must have somebody on the spot, in whom she can confide: and there perhaps you might be safe, till your cousin comes. And I should not think it amiss, that you write to him out of hand. I cannot suggest to you what you should write. That must be left to your own discretion. For you will be afraid, no doubt, of the consequence of a variance between the two men.

But notwithstanding all this, and were I sure of getting you safely out of his hands, I will nevertheless forgive you, were you to make all up with him, and marry to-morrow. Yet I will proceed with my projected scheme in relation to Mrs. Townsend; though I hope there will be no occasion to prosecute it, since your prospects seem to be changed, and since you have had twenty-four not unhappy hours together. How my indignation rises for this poor consolation in the courtship [Courtship must I call it?] of such a woman! Let me tell you, my dear, that were you once your own absolute and independent mistress, I should be tempted, notwithstanding all I have written, to wish you the wife of any man in the world, rather than the wife of either Lovelace or Solmes.

Mrs. Townsend, as I have recollected, has two brothers, each a master of a vessel; and who knows, as she and they have concerns together, but that, in case of need, you may have a whole ship's crew at your devotion? If Lovelace give you cause to leave him, take no thought for the people at Harlowe Place. Let them take care of one another. It is a care they are used to. The law will help to secure them. The wretch is no assassin, no night-murderer. He is an open, because a fearless enemy; and should he attempt any thing that would make him obnoxious to the laws of society, you might have a fair riddance of him either by flight or the gallows; no matter which.

Had you not been so minute in your account of the circumstances that attended the opportunity you had of overhearing the dialogue between Mr. Lovelace and two of the women, I should have thought the conference contrived on purpose for your ear.

I shewed Mr. Lovelace's proposals to Mr. Hickman, who had chambers once at Lincoln's Inn, being designed for the law, had his elder brother lived. He looked so wise, so proud, and so important, upon the occasion; and wanted to take so much consideration about them —Would take them home if I pleased— and weigh them well—and so-forth— and the like—and all that—that I had no patience with him, and snatched them back with anger.

O dear!—to be so angry, an't please me, for his zeal!—

Yes, zeal without knowledge, I said —like most other zeals—If there were no objections that struck him at once, there were none.

'So hasty, dearest madam!'

'And so slow, un-dearest Sir,' I could have said—'But SURELY,' said I, with a look which implied, 'Would you rebel, 'Sir!'

He begged my pardon—Saw no objection, indeed!—But might he be allowed once more—

No matter—No matter—I would have shewn them to my mother, I said, who, though of no inn of court, knew more of these things than half the lounging lubbers of them; and that at first sight—only that she would have been angry at the confession of our continued correspondence.

But, my dear, let the articles be drawn up, and engrossed; and solemnize upon them; and there's no more to be said.

Let me add, that the ſailor-fellow has been tampering with my Kitty, and offered a bribe, to find where to direct to you. Next time he comes, I will have him laid hold of; and if I can get nothing out of him, will have him drawn through one of our deepeſt fiſh-ponds. His attempt to corrupt a ſervant of mine will juſtify my orders.

I ſend this letter away directly. But will follow it by another; which ſhall have for it's ſubject only my mother, myſelf, and your uncle Antony. And as your proſpects are more promiſing than they have been, I will endeavour to make you ſmile upon the occaſion. For you will be pleaſed to know, that my mother has had a formal tender from that grey gooſe, which may make her ſkill in ſettlements uſeful to herſelf, were ſhe to encourage it.

May your proſpects be ſtill more and more happy, prays your own

ANNA HOWE.

LETTER XXXI.

MISS HOWE, TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

SAT. SUNDAY, MAY 20, 21.

NOW, my dear, for the promiſed ſubject. You muſt not aſk me, how I came by the originals [ſuch they really are] that I am going to preſent you with: for my mother would not read to me thoſe parts of your uncle's letter, which bore hard upon myſelf, and which leave him without any title to mercy from me: nor would ſhe let me hear but what ſhe pleaſed of hers in anſwer; for ſhe has condeſcended to anſwer him —with a denial, however: but ſuch a denial, as no one but an old batchelor would take from a widow.

Any-body, except myſelf, who could have been acquainted with ſuch a fallal courtſhip as this muſt have been had it proceeded, would have been glad it had gone on: and I dare ſay, but for the fancy daughter, it had. My good mamma, in that caſe, would have been ten years the younger for it, perhaps: and could I but have approved of it, I ſhould have been conſidered by her as if ten years older than I am: ſince, very likely it would have been; 'We widows, my 'dear, know not how to keep men at a 'diſtance—So as to give them pain, in 'order to try their love.'—You muſt 'adviſe me, child: you muſt teach me 'to be cruel—Yet not too cruel neither '—So as to make a man heartleſs, who 'has no time, God wot, to throw away.' Then would my behaviour to Mr. Hickman have been better liked; and my mother would have bridled like her daughter.

O my dear, how might we have been diverted, by the practiſings for the recovery of the long-forgottens! could I have been ſure that it would have been in my power to have put them aſunder, in the Iriſh ſtyle, before they had come together. But there's no truſting to a widow whoſe goods and chattels are in her own hands, addreſſed by an old batchelor, who has fine things, and offers to leave her ten thouſand pounds better than he found her, and ſole miſtreſs, beſides, of all her notables! for theſe, as you will ſee by-and-by, are his propoſals.

The old Triton's addreſs carries the writer's marks upon the very ſuperſcription—'[To the equally amiable, and worthy 'admired' [There's for you!] Mrs. 'ANNABELLA HOWE, widow, the laſt word added, I ſuppoſe, as eſquire to a man, as a word of honour; or for fear the bella to Anna, ſhould not enough diſtinguiſh the perſon meant from the ſpinſter: [Vain huſſy you'll call me, I know] and then follows—'Theſe humbly 'preſent.'—Put down as a memorandum, I preſume, to make a leg, and behave handſomely at preſenting it; he intending very probably to deliver it himſelf.

And now ſtand by—To ſee

Enter OLD NEPTUNE,

His head adorned with ſea-weed, and a crown of cockle-ſhells; as we ſee him decked out in Mrs. Robinſon's ridiculous grotto.

MONDAY, MAY 15.

'MADAM,

'I DID make a ſort of reſolution ten 'years ago, never to marry. I ſaw in 'other families, where they lived beſt, 'you will be pleaſed to mark that, queer-'neſſes I could not away with. Then, 'liked well enough to live ſingle for the 'ſake of my brother's family; and for 'one child in it more than the reſt. But 'that girl has turned us all off the hin-'ges: and why I ſhould deny myſelf 'any comforts for them as will not thank 'me for ſo doing, I don't know.

'So much for my motives as from 'ſelf and family: but the dear Mrs. 'Howe makes me go further.

'I have a very great fortune, I bleſs 'God for it, all of my own getting, or 'moſt of it; you will be pleaſed to mark 'that! for I was the yougeſt brother of 'three. You have alſo, God be thank-'ed,

'ed, a great eſtate, which you have im'proved by your own frugality and wiſe
'management. Frugality, let me ſtop
'to ſay, is one of the greateſt virtues in
'this mortal life, becauſe it enables us
'to do juſtice to all, and puts it in our 'power to benefit ſome by it, as we ſee
'they deſerve.

'You have but one child; and I am
'a batchelor, and have never a one—
'All batchelors cannot ſay ſo: where-
'fore your daughter may be the better
'for me, if ſhe will keep up with my 'humour; which was never thought bad:
'eſpecially to my equals. Servants, in'deed, I don't matter being angry with
'when I pleaſe: they are paid for bear'ing it, and too-too often deſerve it, as 'we have frequently taken notice of to 'one another. And moreover, if we 'keep not ſervants at diſtance, they will 'be familiar. I always made it a rule
'to find fault, whether reaſonable or 'not, that ſo I might have no reaſon to 'find fault. Young women and ſervants
'in general, (as worthy Mr. Solmes ob'ſerves) are better governed by fear than
'love. But this my humour as to ſer-
'vants, will not either affect you or Miſs,
'you know.

'I will make very advantageous ſet-
'tlements; ſuch as any common friend
'ſhall judge to be ſo. But muſt have
'all in my own power, while I live: be-
'cauſe, you know, Madam, it is as cre-
'ditable to the wife, as to the huſband,
'that it ſhould be ſo.

'I am not at fine words. We are not 'children; though it is hoped we may 'have ſome; for I am a very healthy
'ſound man, I bleſs God for it: and 'never brought home from my voyages
'or travels, a worſer conſtitution than I 'took out with me. I was none of 'thoſe, I will aſſure you. But this I 'will undertake, that if you are the ſur-
'vivor, you ſhall be at the leaſt ten thou-
'ſand pounds the better for me. What,
'in the contrary caſe, I ſhall be the bet'ter for you, I leave to you, as you
'ſhall think my kindneſs to you ſhall
'deſerve.

'But one thing, Madam, I ſhould
'be glad of, that Miſs Howe might not 'live with us then. [She need not know
'I write thus]—But go home to Mr.
'Hickman, as ſhe is upon the point of 'marriage, I hear: and if ſhe behaves
'dutifully, as ſhe ſhould do, to us both,
'ſhe ſhall be the better; for ſo I ſaid
'before.

'You ſhall manage all things, both 'mine and your own; for I know but 'little of land-matters. All my oppo-
'poſition to you ſhall be out of love,
'when I think you take too much upon
'you for your health.

'It will be very pretty for you, I
'ſhould think, to have a mam of expe'rience, in a long winter's evening, to 'ſit down by you, and tell you ſtories of 'foreign parts, and the cuſtoms of the 'nations he has conſorted with. And I 'have fine curioſities of the Indian
'growth, ſuch as ladies love, and ſome
'that even my niece Clary, when ſhe
'was good, never ſaw. Theſe, one by 'one, as you are kind to me, (which I
'make no queſtion of, becauſe I ſhall
'be kind to you) ſhall be all yours.—
'Prettier entertainment by much, than
'ſitting with a too ſmartiſh daughter, ſome-
'times out of humour, and thwarting,
'and vexing, as daughters will, (when 'women-grown eſpecially, as I have 'heard you often obſerve;) and think'ing their parents old, without paying 'them the reverence due to years; when,
'as in your caſe, I make no ſort of doubt,
'they are young enough to wipe their
'noſes. You underſtand me, Madam.

'As for me myſelf, it will be very 'happy, and I am delighted with the 'thinking of it, to have, after a pleaſant
'ride, or ſo, a lady of like experience
'with myſelf, to come home to, and but
'one intereſt betwixt us: to reckon up
'our comings-in together; and what
'this day and this week has produced—
'O how this will increaſe love!—Moſt
'mightily will it increaſe it!—And I 'believe I ſhould never love you
'enough, or be able to ſh^w you all my 'love.

'I hope, Madam, there need not be
'ſuch maiden niceties and hangings off,
'as I may call them, between us, (for 'hanging-off ſake) as that you will deny
'me a line or two to this propoſal, writ'ten down, although you would not an-
'ſwer me ſo readily when I ſpoke to you;
'your daughter being, I ſuppoſe, hard
'by; for you looked round you, as if 'not willing to be over-heard. So I
'reſolved to write: that my writing may
'ſtand as upon record, for my upright
'meaning; being none of your Love-
'laces; you will mark that, Madam;
'but a downright, true, honeſt, faith'ful Engliſhman. So hope you will not,
'diſdain to write a line or two to this
'my propoſal: and I ſhall look upon
'it as a great honour, I will aſſure you,
'and be proud thereof. What can I ſay
'more?—For you are your own miſ-
'treſs, as I am my own maſter: and you
'ſhall

'shall always be your own miſtreſs, be 'pleaſed to mark that; for ſo a lady of 'your prudence and experience ought 'to be.

'This is a long letter. But the ſub-'jeſt requires it; becauſe I would not 'write twice where once would do. So 'would explain my ſenſe and meaning 'at one time.

'I have had writing in my head, two 'whole months very near; but hardly knew 'how (being unpractiſed in theſe mat-'ters) to begin to write. And now, good 'lady, be favourable to your moſt humble 'lover, and obedient ſervant,

'ANT. HARLOWE.'

Here's a letter of courtſhip, my dear! —And let me ſubjoin to it, that if now, or hereafter, I ſhould treat this hideous lover, who is ſo free with me to my mo-ther, with aſperity, and you ſhould be diſguſted at it; I ſhall think you don't give me that preference in your love, which you have in mine.

And now, which ſhall I firſt give you; the anſwer of my good mamma; or the dialogue that paſſed between the widow mother, and the pert daughter, upon her letting the latter know that ſhe had a love-letter?

I think you ſhall have the dialogue. But But let me premiſe one thing; that if you think me too free, you muſt not let it run in your head, that I am writing of your uncle, or of my mother; but of a couple of old lovers, no matter whom. Reverence is too apt to be forgotten by children, where the reverends forget firſt what belongs to their own characters. A grave remark, and therefore at your ſervice, my dear.

Well then, ſuppoſe my mamma (after twice coming into my cloſet to me, and as often going out, with very meaning features, and lips ready to burſt open, but ſtill cloſed, as if by compulſion, a ſpeech going off in a flight cough, that never went near the lungs) grown more reſolute the third time of entrance, and ſitting down by me, thus begin.

Mother. 'I have a very ſerious mat-'ter to talk with you upon, Nancy, 'when you are diſpoſed to attend to 'matters within ourſelves, and not let 'matters without ourſelves wholly en-'groſs you.'

A good ſelve-iſh ſpeech!—But I thought that friendſhip, gratitude, and humanity, were matters that ought to be deemed of the moſt intimate concern to us. But not to dwell upon words:

Daughter. 'I am now diſpoſed to at-'tend to every-thing my mamma is diſ-'poſed to ſay to me.'

M. 'Why then, child—Why then, 'my dear'—[And the good lady's face looked ſo plump, ſo ſmooth, and ſo ſhin-ing!]—'I ſee you are all attention, 'Nancy!—But don't be ſurprized!— 'Don't be uneaſy!—But I have—I have '—Where is it?'—[And yet it lay next her heart, never another near it—So no difficulty to have found it]—'I have a 'letter my dear!'—[And out from her boſom it came: but ſhe ſtill held it in her hand]—'I have a letter, child.—It 'is—It is—It is from—from a gentleman, 'I aſſure you!'—[Lifting up her head, and ſmiling.]

'There is no delight to a daughter,' thought I, 'in ſuch ſurprizes as ſeem to 'be collecting. I will deprive my mother 'of the ſatisfaction of making a gradual 'diſcovery.'

D. 'From Mr. Antony Harlowe, I 'ſuppoſe, Madam?'

M. [Lips drawn cloſer: eye raiſed] 'Why, my dear!—I cannot but own— 'But how, I wonder, could you think 'of Mr. Antony Harlowe?'

D. 'How, Madam, could I think of 'any-body elſe?'

M. 'How could you think of any-'body elſe!'—[Angry and drawing back her face.] 'But do you know the ſub-'jeſt, Nancy?'

D. 'You have told it, Madam, by 'your manner of breaking it to me. But, 'indeed, I queſtioned not that he had two 'motives in his viſits here—Both equally 'agreeable to me; for all that family 'love me dearly.'

M. 'No love loſt, if ſo, between you 'and them. But this' [Riſing] is what 'I get—So like your papa!—I never 'could open my heart to him!'

D. 'Dear Madam, excuſe me. Be ſo 'good as to open your heart to me.—I 'don't love the Harlowes—But pray ex-'cuſe me.'

M. 'You have put me quite out with 'your forward temper!' [Angrily ſitting down again.]

D. 'I will be all patience and atten-'tion. May I be allowed to read his 'letter?'

M. 'I wanted to adviſe with you upon 'it.—But you are ſuch a ſtrange crea-'ture!—You are always for anſwering 'one before one ſpeaks!'

D. 'You'll be ſo good as to forgive 'me, Madam.—But I thought every-'body (he among the reſt) knew, that 'you had always declared againſt a ſe-'cond marriage.'

M. 'And ſo I have. But then it was in the mind I was in. 'Things may 'offer—'

'in

I ſtared.

M. 'Nay, don't be ſurprized!—I don't 'intend—I don't intend—'

D. 'Not perhaps, in the mind you are 'in, Madam.

M. 'Pert creature!' [Riſing again] —'We ſhall quarrel! I ſee!—There's 'no—'

D. 'Once more, dear Madam, I beg 'your excuſe. I will attend in ſilence. '—Pray, Madam, ſit down again— 'Pray do.' [She ſat down]—'May I ſee 'the letter?'

'No; there are ſome things in it you 'won't like.—Your temper is known, I 'find, to be unhappy. But nothing bad 'againſt you; intimations, on the con-'trary, that you ſhall be the better for 'him, if you oblige him.'

Not a living ſoul but the Harlowes, I ſaid, thought me ill-tempered: and I was contented that they ſhould, who could do as they had done by the moſt univerſally acknowledged ſweetneſs in the world.

Here we broke out a little; but at laſt, ſhe read me ſome of the paſſages in the letter. But not the moſt mightily ridiculous; yet I could hardly keep my countenance neither, eſpecially when ſhe came to that paſſage which mentions his ſound health; and at which ſhe ſtopt; ſhe beſt knew why—But ſoon reſuming;

M. 'Well now, Nancy, tell me what 'you think of it.'

D. 'Nay, pray, Madam, tell me 'what you think of it.'

M. 'I expect to be anſwered by an 'anſwer; not by a queſtion!—You don't 'uſe to be ſo ſhy to ſpeak your mind.'

D. 'Not when my mamma commands 'me to do ſo.'

M. 'Then ſpeak it now.'

D. 'Without hearing the whole of the 'letter?'

M. 'Speak to what you have heard.'

D. 'Why then, Madam—You won't 'be my mamma HOWE, if you give way 'to it.'

M. 'I am ſurprized at your aſſurance, 'Nancy!'

D. 'I mean, Madam, you will then 'be my mamma HARLOWE.'

M. 'O dear heart!—But I am not a 'fool.'

And her colour went and came.

D. 'Dear Madam, [But, indeed, I 'don't love a Harlowe—that's what I 'mean] I am your child, and muſt be 'your child, do what you will.'

M. 'A very pert one, I am ſure, as 'ever mother bore! And you muſt be 'my child, do what I will!—As much 'as to ſay, you would not, if you could 'help it, if I—'

D. 'How could I have ſuch a thought! '—It would be forward, indeed, if I 'had—when I don't know what your 'mind is as to the propoſal:—when the 'propoſal is ſo very advantageous a one 'too.'

M. [Looking a little leſs diſcompoſed] 'Why, indeed, ten thouſand 'pounds—'

D. 'And to be ſure of outliving him, 'Madam!'

This ſtaggered her a little.

M. 'Sure!—Nobody can be ſure— 'But it is very likely, that—'

D. 'Not at all, Madam. You was 'going to read ſomething (but ſtopt) 'about his conſtitution: his ſobriety is 'well known—Why, Madam, theſe 'gentlemen who have uſed the ſea, and 'been in different climates, and come 'home to relax from cares in a tempe-'rate one, and are ſober—are the like-'lieſt to live long of any men in the 'world. Don't you ſee that his very 'ſkin is a fortification of buff?'

M. 'Strange creature!'

D. 'God forbid, that any-body I 'love and honour, ſhould marry a man 'in hopes to bury him—But ſuppoſe, Ma-'dam, at your time of life—'

M. 'My time of life?—Dear heart! '—What is my time of life, pray?'

D. 'Not old, Madam; and that you 'are not, may be your danger!'

As I hope to live, (my dear) my mother ſmiled, and looked not diſpleaſed with me.

M. 'Why, indeed, child—Why, in-'deed, I muſt needs ſay—And then I 'ſhould chuſe to do nothing (froward as 'you are ſometimes) to hurt you.'

D. 'Why, as to that, Madam, I 'can't expect that you ſhould deprive 'yourſelf of any ſatisfaction—'

M. 'Satisfaction, my dear!—I don't 'ſay, it would be a ſatisfaction—But 'could I do any-thing that would be-'nefit you, it would perhaps be an in-'ducement to hold one conference upon 'the ſubject.'

D. 'My fortune already will be more 'conſiderable than my match, if I am to 'have Mr. Hickman.'

M. 'Why ſo?—Mr. Hickman has 'fortune enough to entitle him to yours.

D. 'If you think ſo, that's enough.'

M. 'Not but I ſhould think the [illegible] 'of myſelf, if I deſired any-body's [illegible] 'but I think, as you ſay, Mr. An[illegible] 'Harlowe is a healthy man, and [illegible] 'fair for a long life.'

'Bleſs me,' thought I, 'how ſhall I 'do to know whether this be an objecti-'on or a recommendation!'

D. 'Will you forgive me, Madam?'

M. 'What would the girl ſay?' [Looking as if ſhe was half afraid to hear what.]

D. 'Only, that if you marry a man 'of his time of life, you ſtand two chan-'ces inſtead of one, to be a nurſe at your 'time of life.'

M. 'Saucebox!'

D. 'Dear Madam!—What I mean 'is only, that theſe healthy old men 'ſometimes fall into lingering diſorders 'all at once. And I humbly conceive, 'that the infirmities of age are uneaſily 'borne with, where the remembrance 'of the pleaſanter ſeaſon comes not in to 'relieve the healthier of the two.'

M. 'A ſtrange girl!—Yet his healthy 'conſtitution an objection juſt now!—'But I always told you, that you know 'either too much to be argued with, or 'too little for me to have patience with 'you.'

D. 'I can't but ſay, I ſhould be glad 'of your commands, Madam, how to 'behave myſelf to Mr. Antony Harlowe 'next time he comes.'

M. 'How to behave yourſelf!—Why, 'if you retire with contempt to him, 'when he next comes, it will be but as 'you have been uſed to do of late.'

D. 'Then he is to come again, Ma-'dam?'

M. 'And ſuppoſe he be?'

D. 'I can't help it, if it be your plea-'ſure, Madam. He deſires a line in an-'ſwer to his fine letter. If he come, it 'will be in purſuance of that line, I pre-'ſume?'

M. 'None of your arch and pert leers, 'girl!—You know I won't bear them. 'I had a mind to hear what you would 'ſay to this matter. I have not written; 'but I ſhall preſently.'

D. 'It is mighty good of you, Ma-'dam, (I hope the man will think ſo) 'to anſwer his firſt application by letter. '—Pity he ſhould write twice, if once will 'do.'

M. 'That fetch won't let you into my 'intention, as to what I ſhall write. It 'is too faucily put.'

D. 'Perhaps I can gueſs at your in-'tention, Madam, were it to become 'me ſo to do.'

M. 'Perhaps I would not make a Mr. 'Hickman of any man; uſing him the 'worſe for reſpecting me.'

D. 'Nor, perhaps, would I, Madam, 'if I liked his reſpects.'

M. 'I underſtand you. But, perhaps, 'it is in your power to make me hearken, 'or not, to Mr. Harlowe.'

D. 'Young men, who have probably 'a great deal of time before them, need 'not be in haſte for a wife. Mr. Hick-'man, poor man! muſt ſtay his time, 'or take his remedy.'

M. 'He bears more from you, than a 'man ought.'

D. 'Then, I doubt, he gives a rea-'ſon for the treatment he meets with.'

M. 'Provoking creature!'

D. 'I have but one requeſt to make 'to you, Madam.'

M. 'A dutiful one, I ſuppoſe. What 'is it, pray?'

'D. 'That if you marry, I may be 'permitted to live ſingle.'

M. 'Perverſe creature, I'm ſure!'

D. 'How can I expect, Madam, that 'you ſhould refuſe ſuch terms? Ten 'thouſand pounds!—At the leaſt ten thou-'ſand pounds!—A very handſome pro-'poſal!—So many fine things too, to give 'you one by one!—Deareſt Madam, for-'give me!—I hope it is not yet ſo far 'gone, that rallying this man will be 'thought want of duty to you.'

M. 'Your rallying of him, and your 'reverence to me, it is plain have one 'ſource.'

D. 'I hope not, Madam. But ten 'thouſand pounds—'

M. 'Is no unhandſome propoſal.'

D. 'Indeed I think ſo. I hope, Ma-'dam, you will not be behind-hand with 'him in generoſity.'

M. 'He won't be ten thouſand pounds 'the better for me, if he ſurvive me.'

D. 'No, Madam; he can't expect 'that as you have a daughter, and as he 'is a batchelor, and has not a child!—Poor 'old ſoul!'

M. 'Old ſoul, Nancy!—And thus to 'call him for being a batchelor, and not 'having a child?—Does this become 'you?'

D. 'Not old ſoul for that, Madam—'But half the ſum; five thouſand 'pounds; you can't engage for leſs, 'Madam.'

M. 'That ſum has your approbation 'then?' [Looking as if ſhe'd be even with me.]

D. 'As he leaves it to your generoſity, 'Madam, to reward his kindneſs to you, 'it can't be leſs.—Do, dear Madam, 'permit me, without incurring your 'diſpleaſure, to call him poor old ſoul 'again.'

M. 'Never was ſuch a whimſical 'creature!'—[Turning away to hide her involuntary ſmile, for I believe I look-ed very archly; at leaſt I intended to do ſo]—'I hate that wicked ſly look. You 'give yourſelf very free airs—Don't 'you?'

D. I ſnatched her hand, and kiſſed it —'My dear mamma, be not angry with 'your girl!—You have told me, that 'you was very lively formerly.'

M. 'Formerly! Good lack!—But were 'I to encourage his propoſals, you may 'be ſure, that for Mr. Hickman's ſake, 'as well as yours, I ſhould make a wiſe 'agreement.'

D. 'You have both lived to years of 'prudence, Madam.'

M. 'Yes, I ſuppoſe I am an old ſoul 'too.'

D. 'He alſo is for making a wiſe agree-ment, or hinting at one, at leaſt.'

M. 'Well, the ſhort and the long I 'ſuppoſe is this: I have not your con-'ſent to marry.'

D. 'Indeed, Madam, you have not 'my wiſhes to marry.'

M. 'Let me tell you, that if prudence 'conſiſts in wiſhing well to one's ſelf, I ſee 'not but the young flirts are as prudent as 'the old ſouls.'

D. 'Dear Madam, would you blame 'me, if to wiſh you not to marry Mr. 'Antony Harlowe, is to wiſh well to 'myſelf?'

M. 'You are mighty witty. I wiſh 'you were as dutiful.'

D. 'I am more dutiful, I hope, than 'witty; or I ſhould be a fool, as well as 'a ſaucebox.'

M. 'Let me judge of both—Parents 'are only to live for their children, let 'them deſerve it or not. That's their 'dutiful notion!'

D. 'Heaven forbid that I ſhould wiſh, 'if there be two intereſts between my 'mother and me, that my mother poſt-'pone her own for mine! or give up any 'thing that would add to the real com-'forts of her life, to oblige me!—Tell 'me, my dear mamma, if you think the 'cloſing with this propoſal will?

M. 'I ſay, That ten thouſand pounds 'is ſuch an acquiſition to one's family, 'that the offer of it deſerves a civil re-'turn.'

D. 'Not the offer, Madam: the chance 'only!—If, indeed, you have a view to 'an increaſe of family, the money may 'provide——'

M. 'You can't keep within tolerable 'bounds!—That ſaucy ſleer I cannot 'away with—'

D. 'Deareſt, deareſt Madam, for-'give me; but old ſoul ran in my head 'again!—Nay, indeed and upon my 'word, I will not be robbed of that 'charming ſmile!' And again I kiſſed her hand.

M. 'Away, bold creature! Nothing 'can be ſo provoking as to be made to 'ſmile when one would chuſe, and ought, 'to be angry.'

D. 'But, dear Madam, if it be to be, 'I preſume you won't think of it before 'next winter.'

M. 'What now would the pert one 'be at?'

D. 'Becauſe he only propoſes to en-'tertain you with pretty ſtories of fo-'reign nations in a winter's evening. 'Deareſt, deareſt Madam, let me have 'the reading of his letter through. I 'will forgive him all he ſays about me.'

M. 'It may be a very difficult thing, 'perhaps, for a man of the beſt ſenſe to 'write a love-letter, that may not be 'cavilled at.'

D. 'That's becauſe lovers in their 'letters hit not the medium. They either 'write too much nonſenſe, or too little. 'But do you call this odd ſoul's letter '[No more will I call him old ſoul, if I 'can help it] a love-letter?'

M. 'Well, well, I ſee you are averſe 'to this matter. I am not to be your 'mother; you will live ſingle, if I marry. 'I had a mind to ſee if generoſity gov-'erned you in your views. I ſhall pur-'ſue my own inclinations: and if they 'ſhould happen to be ſuitable to yours, 'pray let me for the future be better 'rewarded by you, than hitherto I have 'been.'

And away ſhe flung, without ſtaying for a reply.—Vexed, I dare ſay, that I did not better approve of the propoſal—Were it only that the merit of denying might have been all her own, and to lay the ſtronger obligation upon her ſaucy daughter.

She wrote ſuch a widow-like refuſal when ſhe went from me, as might not exclude hope in any other wooer; what-ever it may do in Mr. Tony Harlowe.

It will be my part, to take care to beat her off the viſit ſhe half-promiſes to make him, (as you will ſee in her an-ſwer) upon condition that he withdraw his ſuit. For who knows what effect the old batchelor's exoticks [Far-fetched and dear-bought you know is a proverb] might otherwiſe have upon a woman's mind, wanting nothing but unneceſſaries, gewgaws, and fineries, and offered ſuch as are not eaſily to be met with, or pur-chaſed?

Well, but now I give you [illegible] to read read here, in this place, the copy of my mother's answer to your uncle's letter. Not one comment will I make upon it. I know my duty better. And here, therefore, taking the liberty to hope, that I may, in your present less disagreeable, though not wholly agreeable situation, provoke a smile from you, I conclude myself, your ever-affectionate and faithful ANNA HOWE.

'MRS. ANNABELLA HOWE, TO ANTONY HARLOWE, ESQ.

'FRIDAY, MAY 19.

'MR. ANTONY HARLOWE,

'SIR,

'IT is not usual, I believe, for our 'sex to answer by pen and ink the first 'letter on these occasions. The first let-'ter! How odd is that! As if I expected 'another; which I do not. But then 'I think, as I do not judge proper to 'encourage your proposal, there is no 'reason why I should not answer in ci-'vility where so great a civility is in-'tended. Indeed, I was always of opi-'nion, that a person was entitled to that, 'and not to ill-usage, because he had a 'respect for me. And so I have often 'and often told my daughter.

'A woman, I think, makes but a poor 'figure in a man's eye afterwards, and 'does no reputation to her sex neither, 'when she behaves like a tyrant to him 'before-hand.

'To be sure, Sir, if I were to change 'my condition, I know not a gentleman 'whose proposal could be more agree-'able. Your nephew and your nieces 'have enough without you: my daugh-'ter is a fine fortune without me, and I 'should take care to double it, living or 'dying, were I to do such a thing; so 'nobody need to be the worse for it. 'But Nancy would not think so.

'All the comfort I know of in chil-'dren, is, that when young they do with 'us what they will, and all is pretty in 'them to their very faults; and when 'they are grown up, they think their 'parents must live for them only; and 'deny themselves every-thing for their 'sakes. I know Nancy could not bear a 'father-in-law. She would fly at the 'very thought of my being in earnest to 'give her one. Not that I stand in fear 'of my daughter neither. It is not fit I 'should. But she has her poor papa's 'spirit. A very violent one that was. 'And one would not chuse, you know, 'Sir, to enter into any affair, that, one 'knows, one must renounce a daughter 'for, or she a mother.—Except indeed 'one's heart were much in it; which, I 'bless God, mine is not.

'I have now been a widow these ten 'years; nobody to controul me: and I 'am said not to bear controul: so, Sir, 'you and I are best as we are, I believe: 'nay, I am sure of it: for we want not 'what either has; having both more than 'we know what to do with. And I know 'I could not be in the least accountable 'for any of my ways.

'My daughter, indeed, though she is 'a fine girl, as girls go, [She has too 'much sense, indeed, for one of her sex; 'and knows she has it] is more a check 'to me than one would wish a daughter 'to be: for who would chuse to be al-'ways snapping at each other? But she 'will soon be married; and then, not 'living together, we shall only come to-'gether when we are pleased, and stay 'away when we are not; and so like 'other lovers, never see any-thing but 'the best sides of each other.

'I own, for all this, that I love her 'dearly; and she me, I dare say: so 'would not wish to provoke her to do 'otherwise. Besides, the girl is so much 'regarded every-where, that having 'lived so much of my time a widow, I 'would not lay myself open to her cen-'sures, or even to her indifference, you 'know.

'Your generous proposal requires all 'this explicitness. I thank you for your 'good opinion of me. When I know 'you acquiesce with this my civil refu-'sal, [And indeed, Sir, I am as much 'in earnest in it, as if I had spoken 'broader] I don't know but Nancy and 'I may, with your permission, come to 'see your fine things; for I am a great 'admirer of rarities that come from 'abroad.

'So, Sir, let us only converse occa-'sionally as we meet as we used to do, 'without any other view to each other, 'than good wishes: which I hope may 'not be lessened for this declining. And 'then I shall always think myself your 'obliged servant, ANNABELLA HOWE.

'P. S. I sent word by Mrs. Lorimer, 'that I would write an answer: but 'would take time for consideration. 'So hope, Sir, you won't think it a 'slight, I did not write sooner.'

LETTER XXXII.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

SUNDAY, MAY 21.

I Am too much troubled in my mind, to think of any-thing but revenge; or or I did intend to give thee an account of Miſs Harlowe's obſervations on the play. Miſs Harlowe's I ſay. Thou knoweſt that I hate the name of Harlowe; and I am exceedingly out of humour with her, and with her ſaucy friend.

'What's the matter now?' thou'lt aſk.

Matter enough; for while we were at the play, Dorcas, who had her orders, and a key to her lady's chamber, as well as a maſter key to her drawers and mahogany-cheſt, cloſet-key and all, found means to come at ſome of Miſs Howe's laſt-written letters. The vigilant wench was directed to them by ſeeing her lady take a letter out of her ſtays, and put it to the others, before ſhe went out with me—Afraid, as the women upbraidingly tell me, that I ſhould find it there.

Dorcas no ſooner found them, than ſhe aſſembled three ready writers of the Non-apparents; and Sally, and ſhe, and they employed themſelves with the utmoſt diligence, in making extracts, according to former directions, from theſe curſed letters, for my uſe. Curſed, I may well call them—Such abuſes!—Such virulence!—O this little fury Miſs Howe!—Well might her ſaucy friend (who has been equally free with me, or the occaſion could not have been given) be ſo violent as ſhe lately was, at my endeavouring to come at one of theſe letters.

I was ſure, that the fair one, at ſo early an age, with a conſtitution ſo firm, health ſo blooming, eyes ſo ſparkling, expectations, therefore, ſo lively, and hope ſo predominating, could not be abſolutely, and from her own vigilance, ſo guarded, and ſo apprehenſive, as I have found her to be.

Sparkling eyes, Jack, when the poetical tribe have ſaid all they can for them, are an infallible ſign of a rogue, or room for a rogue, in the heart.

Thou mayeſt go on with thy preachments, and Lord M. with his wiſdom of nations, I am now more aſſured of her than ever. And now my revenge is up, and joined with my love, all reſiſtance muſt fall before it. And moſt ſolemnly do I ſwear, that Miſs Howe ſhall come in for her ſnack.

And here, juſt now, is another letter brought from the ſame little virulent devil. I hope to procure tranſcripts from that too, very ſpeedily, if it be put to the teſt; for the ſaucy fair-one is reſolved to go to church this morning; not ſo much from a ſpirit of devotion, I have reaſon to think, as to try whether ſhe can go out without check, controul, or my attendance.

I HAVE been denied breakfaſting with her. Indeed ſhe was a little diſpleaſed with me laſt night: becauſe, on our return from the play, I obliged her to paſs the reſt of the night with the women and me, in their parlour, and to ſtay till near one. She told me at parting, that ſhe expected to have the whole next day to herſelf. I had not read the extracts then; ſo was all affectionate reſpect, awe, and diſtance; for I had reſolved to begin a new courſe, and, if poſſible, to baniſh all jealouſy and ſuſpicion from her heart: and yet I had no reaſon to be much troubled at her paſt ſuſpicions; ſince, if a woman will continue with a man whom ſhe ſuſpects, when ſhe can get from him, or thinks ſhe can, I am ſure it is a very hopeful ſign.

SHE is gone. Slipt down before I was aware. She had ordered a chair, on purpoſe to exclude my perſonal attendance. But I had taken proper precautions. Will attended her by conſent; Peter, the houſe-ſervant; was within Will's call.

I had, by Dorcas, repreſented her danger from Singleton, in order to diſſuade her from going at all, unleſs ſhe allowed me to attend her; but I was anſwered, with her uſual ſaucy ſmartneſs, That if there were no cauſe of fear of being met with at the play-houſe, when there were but two play-houſes, ſurely there was leſs at church, when there were ſo many churches. The chairmen were ordered to carry her to St. James's church.

But ſhe would not be ſo careleſs of obliging me, if ſhe knew what I have already come at, and how the women urge me on; for they are continually complaining of the reſtraint they lie under, in their behaviour; in their attendance; neglecting all their concerns in the front-houſe; and keeping this elegant back one entirely free from company, that ſhe may have no ſuſpicion of them. They doubt not my generoſity, they ſay: but why, for my own ſake, in Lord M.'s ſtile, ſhould I make ſo long a harveſt of ſo little corn?

Women, ye reaſon well. I think I will begin my operations the moment ſhe comes in.

I HAVE come at the letter brought her from Miſs Howe to-day. Plot, conjuration, ſorcery, witchcraft, all going forward! I ſhall not be able to ſee this Miſs Harlowe with patience. As the nymphs below aſk, ſo do I. Why is night neceſſary? And Sally and Polly upbraidingly remind me of my firſt attempts upon themſelves. Yet force anſwers not my end—And yet it may, if there be truth in that part of the libertine's creed,

That

That once ſubdued, is always ſubdued! And what woman anſwers affirmatively to the queſtion?

SHE is returned: but refuſes to admit me: and inſiſts upon having the day to herſelf. Dorcas tells me, that ſhe believes her denial is from motives of piety —Oons, Jack, is there impiety in ſeeing me! — Would it not be the higheſt act of piety, to reclaim me? And is this to be done by her refuſing to ſee me, when ſhe is in a devouter frame than uſual?—But I hate her, hate her heartily! She is old, ugly, and deformed.—But O the blaſphemy! Yet ſhe is an Harlowe: and I do and can hate her for that.

But ſince I muſt not ſee her, [She will be miſtreſs of her own will, and of her time, truly!] let me fill up my time, by telling thee what I have come at.

The firſt letter the women met with, is dated April 27. Where can ſhe have put the preceding ones!—It mentions Mr. Hickman as a buſy fellow between them. Hickman had beſt take care of himſelf. She ſays in it, 'I hope you have 'no cauſe to repent returning my Norris—It 'is forthcoming on demand.' Now what the devil can this mean!—Her Norris forthcoming on demand!—The devil take me, if I am out-Norris'd!—If ſuch innocents can allow themſelves to plot, (to Norris) well may I.

She is ſorry, that her Hannah can't be with her—And what if ſhe could?—What could Hannah do for her in ſuch a houſe as this?

The women in the houſe are to be found out in one breakfaſting. The women are enraged at both the correſpondents for this; and more than ever make a point of my ſubduing her. I had a good mind to give Miſs Howe to them in full property. Say the word, Jack, and it ſhall be done.

She is glad that Miſs Harlowe had thoughts of taking me at my word. She wondered I did not offer again. Adviſes her, if I don't ſoon, not to ſtay with me. Cautions her, to keep me at diſtance; not to permit the leaſt familiarity—See, Jack!—See, Belford!—Exactly as I thought!—Her vigilance is all owing to a cool friend; who can ſit down quietly, and give that advice, which in her own caſe ſhe could not take. What an encouragement to me to proceed in my devices, when I have reaſon to think, that my beloved's reſerves are owing more to Miſs Howe's cautions, than to her own inclinations! But it is my intereſt to be honeſt, Miſs Howe tells her—INTEREST, fools!—I thought theſe girls knew, that my intereſt was ever ſubſervient to my pleaſure.

What would I give to come at the copies of the letters to which thoſe of Miſs Howe are anſwers!

The next letter is dated May 3. In this the little termagant expreſſes her aſtoniſhment, that her mother ſhould write to Miſs Harlowe, to forbid her to correſpond with her daughter. Mr. Hickman, ſhe ſays, is of opinion, that ſhe ought not to obey her mother. How the creeping fellow trims between both! I am afraid, that I muſt puniſh him, as well as this virago; and I have a ſcheme rumbling in my head, that wants but half an hour's muſing to bring into form, that will do my buſineſs upon both. I cannot bear, that the parental authority ſhould be thus deſpiſed, thus trampled under foot —But obſerve the vixen, 'Tis well he is of her opinion; for her mother having ſet her up, ſhe muſt have ſomebody to quarrel with. —Could a Lovelace have allowed himſelf a greater licence? This girl's a deviliſh rake in her heart. Had ſhe been a man, and one of us, ſhe'd have outdone us all in enterprize and ſpirit.

She wants but very little farther provocation, ſhe ſays, to fly privately to London. And if ſhe does, ſhe will not leave her till ſhe ſees her either honourably married, or quit of the wretch.—Here, Jack, the tranſcriber Sally has added a prayer—'For the 'Lord's ſake, dear Mr. Lovelace, get 'this fury to London!'—Her fate I can tell thee, Jack, if we had her among us, ſhould not be ſo long deciding as her friend's. What a gantlope would ſhe run, when I had done with her, among a dozen of her own pitileſs ſex, whom my charmer ſhall never ſee!—But more of this anon.

I find by this letter, that my ſaucy captive had been drawing the characters of every varlet of ye. Nor am I ſpared in it more than you. 'The man's a fool, 'to be ſure, my dear,'—Let me periſh, if they either of them find me one!—'A 'ſilly fellow at leaſt'—Curſed contemptible!—'I ſee not but they are a ſet of infernals'—There's for thee, Belford!—'and 'he the Beelzebub.—There's for thee, Lovelace!—And yet ſhe would have her friend marry a Beelzebub.—And what have any of us done, (within the knowledge of Miſs Harlowe) that ſhe ſhould give ſuch an account of us, as ſhould excuſe ſo much abuſe from Miſs Howe! —But the occaſion that ſhall warrant this abuſe is to come!

She blames her, for not admitting Miſs Par-

Partington to her bed—'Watchful as you 'are, what could have happened?—If vio- 'lence were intended he would not ſtay for 'the night.' I am aſhamed to have this hinted to me by this virago. Sally writes upon this hint—'See, Sir, what is 'expected from you. An hundred and an hundred times have we told you of this.'—And ſo they have. But, to be ſure, the advice from them was not of half the efficacy as it will be from Miſs Howe.—'You might have ſat up after her, or not 'gone to bed,' proceeds ſhe.

But can there be ſuch apprehenſions between them, yet the one adviſe her to ſtay, and the other reſolve to wait my imperial motion for marriage? I am glad I know that.

She approves of my propoſal of Mrs. Fretchville's houſe. She put her upon expecting ſettlements; upon naming a day: and concludes with inſiſting upon her writing, notwithſtanding her mother's prohibitions: or bids her take the conſequence. Undutiful wretches! How I long to vind cate againſt them both the inſulted parental character!

Thou wilt ſay to thyſelf, by this time, 'And can this proud and inſolent girl 'be the ſame Miſs Howe, who ſighed for 'honeſt Sir George Colmar; and who, 'but for this her beloved friend, would 'have followed him in all his broken 'fortunes, when he was obliged to quit 'the kingdom?'

Yes, ſhe is the very ſame. And I always found in others, as well as in myſelf, that a firſt paſſion thoroughly ſubdued, made the conqueror of it a rover; the conqueresſ a tyrant.

Well, but now comes mincing in a letter from one who has the honour of dear Miſs Howe's commands, to acquaint Miſs Harlowe, that Miſs Howe is exceſſively concerned for the concern ſhe has given her.

'I have great temptations, on this occa- 'ſion,' ſays the prim Gothamite, 'to ex- 'preſs my own reſentments upon your preſent 'ſtate.'

'My own reſentments!'—And why did he not fall into this temptation?—Why, truly, becauſe he knew not what that ſtate was which gave him ſo tempting a ſubject—Only by a conjecture, and ſo-forth.

He then dances in his ſtile, as he does in his gaite! To be ſure, to be ſure, he muſt have made the grand tour, and come home by the way of Tipperary.

'And being moreover forbid,' ſays the prancer, 'to enter into the cruel ſubject.'—This prohibition was a mercy to thee, friend Hickman!—But why cruel ſubject, if thou knoweſt not what it is, but conjecture*ſt* only from the diſturbance it gives to a girl, that is her mother's diſturbance, will be thy diſturbance, and the diſturbance, in turn, of every-body with whom ſhe is intimately acquainted, unleſs I have the humbling of her?

In another letter, the little fury profeſſes, that ſhe will write, and that no man ſhall write for her, as if ſome medium of that kind had been propoſed. She approves of her fair friend's intention to leave me, if ſhe can be received by her relations. I am a wretch, a fooliſh wretch. She hates me for my teazing ways. She has juſt made an acquaintance with one who knows a vaſt deal of my private hiſtory. A curſe upon her, and upon her hiſtoriographer!—'The man is a villain, an execrable one.'—Devil take her!—Had I a dozen lives, I might have forfeited them all twenty crimes ago. An odd way of reckoning, Jack!

Miſs Betterton, Miſs Lockyer, are named—The man (ſhe irreverently repeats) ſhe again calls a villain. Let me periſh, I repeat, if I am called a villain for nothing!—She will have her uncle (as Miſs Harlowe requeſts) ſounded about receiving her. Dorcas is to be attached to her intereſt: my letters are to be come at by ſurprize or trick.

What thinkeſt thou of this, Jack?

Miſs Howe is alarmed at my attempt to come at a letter of hers.

Were I to come at the knowledge of her freedoms with my character, ſhe ſays, ſhe ſhould be afraid to ſtir out without a guard. I would adviſe the vixen to get her guard ready.

I am at the head of a gang of wretches, [Thee, Jack, and thy brother varlets, ſhe owns ſhe means] who join together to betray innocent creatures, and to ſupport one another in their villainies—What ſayeſt thou to this, Belford?

She wonders not at her melancholy reflections for meeting me, for being forced upon me, and tricked by me.—I hope, Jack, thou'lt have done preaching after this!

But ſhe comforts her, that ſhe will be both a warning and example to all her ſex. I hope the ſex will thank me for this.

The nymphs had not time, they ſay, to tranſcribe all that was worthy of my reſentment in this letter: ſo I muſt find an opportunity to come at it myſelf. Noble rant, they ſay, it contains—But I am a ſeducer, and an hundred vile fellows, in it.—And the devil, it ſeems, took poſſeſſion of my heart, and of the hearts of all her friends, in the ſame dark hour, in order to provoke her to meet me. Again, There is a fate in her error, ſhe ſays.—

Why then ſhould ſhe grieve?—Adverſity is her ſhining time, and I cant't tell what—Yet never to thank the man to whom ſhe owes the ſhine!

In the next letter, Wicked as I am, ſhe fears I muſt be her lord and maſter.

I hope ſo.

She retracts what ſhe ſaid againſt me in her laſt.—My behaviour to my Roſebud; Miſs Harlowe to take poſſeſſion of Mrs. Fretchville's houſe; I to ſtay at Mrs. Sinclair's; the ſtake I have in my country; my reverſions: my œconomy; my perſon; my addreſs, [Something like in all this!] are brought in my favour, to induce her now not to leave me. How do I love to puzzle theſe long-ſighted girls!

Yet my teazing ways, it ſeems, are intolerable.—Are women only to teaze, I trow?—The ſex may thank themſelves for teaching me to out-teaze them. So the headſtrong Charles XII. of Sweden taught the Czar Peter to beat him, by continuing a war with the Muſcovites againſt the ancient maxims of his kingdom.

'May eternal vengeance PURSUE the 'villain,' [Thank Heaven, ſhe does not ſay overtake] 'if he give room to doubt his 'honour!'—Women can't ſwear, Jack—ſweet ſouls! they can only curſe.

I am ſaid, to doubt her love—Have I not reaſon? And ſhe, to doubt my ardour—Ardour, Jack!—Why, 'tis very right—Women, as Miſs Howe ſays, and as every rake knows, love ardours!

She apprizes her of the ill ſucceſs of the application made to her uncle—By Hickman no doubt!—I muſt have this fellow's ears in my pocket, very quickly, I believe.

She ſays, She is equally ſhocked, and enraged againſt all her family: Mrs. Norton's weight has been tried upon Mrs. Harlowe, as well as Mr. Hickman's upon the uncle. 'But never were there,' ſays the vixen, 'ſuch determined brutes in the world. Her uncle concludes her ruined already.'—Is not that a call upon me, as well as a reproach?—They all expected applications from her when in diſtreſs—but were reſolved not to ſtir an inch to ſave her life. She was accuſed of premeditation and contrivance. Miſs Howe is concerned, ſhe tells her, for the revenge my pride may put me upon taking for the diſtance ſhe has kept me at—And well ſhe may.—It is now evident to her, that ſhe muſt be mine (for her couſin Morden, it ſeems, is ſet againſt her too)—An act of neceſſity, of convenience!—Thy friend, Jack, to be already made a woman's convenience! Is this to be borne by a Lovelace?

I ſhall make great uſe of this letter. From Miſs Howe's hints of what paſſed between her uncle Harlowe and Hickman, [It muſt be Hickman] I can give room for my invention to play; for ſhe tells her, that ſhe will not reveal all. I muſt endeavour to come at this letter myſelf. I muſt have the very words: extracts will not do. This letter, when I have it, muſt be my compaſs to ſteer by.

The fire of friendſhip then blazes and crackles. I never before imagined that ſo fervent a friendſhip could ſubſiſt between two fiſter beauties, both toaſts. But even here it may be inflamed by oppoſition, and by that contradiction which gives vigour to female ſpirits of a warm and romantick turn.

She raves about coming up, if by ſo doing ſhe could prevent ſo noble a creature from ſtooping too low, or ſave her from ruin.—One reed to ſupport another! I think I will contrive to bring her up.

How comes it to paſs, that I cannot help being pleaſed with this virago's ſpirit, though I ſuffer by it? Had I her but here, I'd engage, in a week's time, to teach her ſubmiſſion without reſerve. What pleaſure ſhould I have in breaking ſuch a ſpirit! I ſhould wiſh for her but for one month, in all, I think. She would be too tame and ſpiritleſs for me after that. How ſweetly pretty to ſee the two lovely friends, when humbled and tame, both ſitting in the darkeſt corner of a room, arm in arm, weeping and ſobbing for each other!—And I their emperor, their then acknowledged emperor, reclined at my eaſe in the ſame room, uncertain to which I ſhould firſt, grand ſignior like, throw out my handkerchief!

Again mind the girl: ſhe is enraged at the Harlowes: ſhe is angry at her own mother; ſhe is exaſperated againſt her fooliſh and low-vanity'd Lovelace. FOOLISH, a little toad! [God forgive me for calling a virtuous girl a toad!] 'Let us ſtoop to 'lift the wretch out of his dirt, though we 'ſoil our fingers in doing it! He has not 'been guilty of direct indecency to you.'—It ſeems extraordinary to Miſs Howe that I have not. 'Nor dare he.'—She ſhould be ſure of that. If women have ſuch things in their heads, why ſhould not I in my heart?—Not ſo much of a devil as that comes to neither. Such villainous intentions would have ſhewn themſelves before now if I had them.—Lord help them!

She then puts her friend upon urging for ſettlements, licence, and ſo-forth.—No room for delicacy now, ſhe ſays; and tells tells her what she shall say, to bring all forward from me.—Is it not as clear to thee, Jack, as it is to me, that I should have carried my point long ago, but for this vixen? She reproaches her for having MODESTY'D away, as she calls it, more than one opportunity, that she ought not to have slipt.—Thus thou seest, that the noblest of the sex mean nothing in the world by their shyness and distance, but to pound the poor fellow they dislike not when he comes into their purlieus.

Though trick'd into this man's power, she tells her, she is not meanly subjugated to it. There are hopes of my reformation, it seems, from my reverence for her; since before her I never had any reverence for what was good! I am a great, a specious deceiver. I thank her for this, however. A good moral use, she says, may be made of my having prevailed upon her to swerve. I am glad that any good may flow from my actions.

Annexed to this letter is a paper the most saucy that ever was written of a mother by a daughter. There are in it such free reflections upon widows and batchelors, that I cannot but wonder how Miss Howe came by her learning. Sir George Colmar, I can tell thee, was a greater fool than thy friend, if she had it all for nothing.

The contents of this paper acquaint Miss Harlowe, that her uncle Antony has been making propofals of marriage to her mother.

The old fellow's heart ought to be a tough one, if he succeed; or she who broke that of a much worthier man, the late Mr. Howe, will soon get rid of him.

But be this as it may, the stupid family is made more irreconcileable than ever to their goddess-daughter for old Antony's thoughts of marrying: so I am more secure of her than ever. And yet I believe at last, that my tender heart will be moved in her favour. I did not wish, that she should have nothing but persecution and distress.—But why loves she the brutes, as Miss Howe justly calls them, so much; me so little?

I have still more unpardonable transcripts from other letters.

LETTER XXXIII.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

THE next letter is of such a nature, that, I dare say, these proud rogues would not have had it fall into my hands for the world.

I see by it to what her displeasure with me, in relation to my propofals, was owing. They were not summed up, it seems, with the warmth, with the ardours which she had expected.

This whole letter was transcribed by Dorcas, to whose lot it fell. Thou shalt have copies of them all at full length shortly.

Men of our cast, this little devil says, she fancies, cannot have the ardours that honest men have. Miss Howe has very pretty fancies, Jack. Charming girl! Would to Heaven I knew whether my fair-one answers her as freely as she writes! 'Twould vex a man's heart that this virago should have come honestly by her fancies.

Who knows but I may have half a dozen creatures to get off my hands before I engage for life?—Yet, lest this should mean me a compliment, as if I would reform, she adds her belief, that she must not expect me to be honest on this side my grand climacterick. She has an high opinion of her sex, to think they can charm so long a man so well acquainted with their identicalness.

'He to suggest delays,' she says, 'from 'a compliment to be made to Lord M.!'—Yes, I, my dear—Because a man has not been accustomed to be dutiful, must he never be dutiful?—In so important a case as this too! the hearts of his whole family engaged in it! 'You did indeed,' says she, 'want an interposing friend—But 'were I to have been in your situation, I would 'have torn his eyes out, and left it to his 'heart to furnish the reason for it.' See! see! What sayest thou to this, Jack?

'Villain—Fellow that he is!' follow. And for what? Only for wishing that the next day were to be my happy one; and for being dutiful to my nearest relation.

'It is the cruellest of fates,' she says, 'for 'a woman to be forced to have a man whom 'her heart despises.'—That was what I wanted to be sure of.—I was afraid, that my beloved was too conscious of her talents; of her superiority! I was afraid that she indeed despised me.—And I cannot bear to think she does. But, Belford, I do not intend that this lady shall be bound down by so cruel a fate. Let me perish, if I marry a woman who has given her most intimate friend reason to say, she despises me?—A Lovelace to be despised, Jack!

'His clenched fist to his forehead on your 'leaving him in just displeasure;'—that is, when she was not satisfied with my ardours, if it please ye!—I remember the motion: but her back was towards me at the time. Are these watchful ladies all eye?—But observe what follows; 'I 'wish it had been a pell-ax, and in the hands 'of his worst enemy.'

I will have patience, Jack; I will have patience! My day is at hand.—Then will I steel my heart with these remembrances.

But here is a scheme to be thought of, in order to get my fair prize out of my hands, in case I give her reason to suspect me.

This indeed alarms me. Now the contention becomes arduous. Now wilt thou not wonder, if I let loose my plotting genius upon them both. I will not be out-Norris'd, Belford.

But once more, she has no notion, she says, that I can or dare to mean her dishonour. But—'Then the man is a fool—'that's all.'—I should indeed be a fool, to proceed as I do, and mean matrimony! 'However, since you are thrown upon 'a fool,' says she, 'marry the fool, at the 'first opportunity; and though I doubt that 'this man will be the most unmanageable of 'fools, as all witty and vain fools are, take 'him as a punishment, since you cannot as a 'reward.'—Is there any bearing this, Belford?

But such men as myself, are the men that women do not naturally hate.—True as the gospel, Jack!—The truth is out at last. Have I not always told thee so? Sweet creatures and true Christians these young girls! They love their enemies. But rakes in their hearts all of them! Like turns to like; that's the thing. Were I not well assured of the truth of this observation of the vixen, I should have thought it worth while, if not to be a good man, to be more of an hypocrite, than I found it needful to be.

But in the letter I came at to-day, while she was at church, her scheme is farther opened; and a cursed one it is.

Mr. Lovelace then transcribes from his short-hand notes, that part of Miss Howe's letter, which relates to the design of engaging Mrs. Townsend (in case of necessity) to give her protection till Colonel Morden comes: and repeats his vows of revenge; especially for these words; that should he attempt any-thing that would make him obnoxious to the laws of society, she might have a fair riddance of him, either by flight or the gallows; no matter which.

He then adds—'Tis my pride, to subdue girls who know too much to doubt their knowledge; and to convince them, that they know too little, to defend themselves from the inconveniences of knowing too much.

How passion drives a man on! proceeds he.—I have written a prodigious quantity in a very few hours! Now my resentments are warm, I will see, and perhaps will punish, this proud, this double-armed beauty. I have sent to tell her, that I must be admitted to sup with her. We have neither of us dined. She refused to drink tea in the afternoon: and I believe neither of us will have much stomach to our supper.

LETTER XXXIV.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

SUNDAY MORNING, SEVEN O'CLOCK.

I Was at the play last night with Mr. Lovelace and Miss Horton. It is, you know, a deep and most affecting tragedy in the reading. You have my remarks upon it, in the little book you made me write upon the principal acting plays. You will not wonder, that Miss Horton, as well as I, was greatly moved at the representation, when I tell you, and have some pleasure in telling you, that Mr. Lovelace himself was very sensibly touched with some of the most affecting scenes. I mention this in praise of the author's performance; for I take Mr. Lovelace to be one of the most hard-hearted men in the world. Upon my word, my dear, I do.

His behaviour, however, on this occasion, and on our return, was unexceptionable; only that he would oblige me to stay to supper with the women below, when we came back, and to sit up with him and them till near one o'clock this morning. I was resolved to be even with him; and indeed I am not very sorry to have the pretence; for I love to pass the Sundays by myself.

To have the better excuse to avoid his teazing, I am ready dressed to go to church this morning. I will go only to St. James's church, and in a chair; that I may be sure I can go out and come in when I please, without being intruded upon by him, as I was twice before.

NEAR NINE O'CLOCK.

I HAVE your kind letter of yesterday. He knows I have. And I shall expect, that he will be inquisitive next time I see him after your opinion of his proposals. I doubted not your approbation of them, and had written an answer on that presumption; which is ready for him. He must study for occasions of procrastination, on, and to diſoblige me, if now any thing happens to ſet us at variance again.

He is very importunate to ſee me. He has deſired to attend me to church. He is angry that I have declined to breakfaſt with him. I am ſure that I ſhould not have been at my own liberty if I had—I bid Dorcas tell him, that I deſired to have this day to myſelf. I would ſee him in the morning as early as he pleaſed. She ſays, ſhe knows not what ails him, but that he is out of humour with everybody.

He has ſent again in a peremptory manner. He warns me of Singleton. I ſent him word, that if he was not afraid of Singleton at the play-houſe laſt night, I need not at church to-day: ſo many churches to one play-houſe. I have accepted of his ſervant's propoſed attendance. But he is quite diſpleaſed, it ſeems. I don't care. I will not be perpetually at his inſolent beck.—Adieu, my dear, till I return. The chair waits. He won't ſtop me, ſure, as I go down to it.

I DID not ſee him as I went down. He is, it ſeems, exceſſively out of humour. Dorcas ſays, Not with me, neither; ſhe believes: but ſomething has vexed him. This is put on perhaps to make me dine with him. But I will not, if I can help it. I ſhan't get rid of him for the reſt of the day, if I do.

HE was very earneſt to dine with me. But I was reſolved to carry this one ſmall point; and ſo denied to dine myſelf. And indeed I was endeavouring to write to my couſin Morden; and had begun three different times, without being able to pleaſe myſelf.

He was very buſy in writing, Dorcas ſays; and purſued it without dining, becauſe I denied him my company.

He afterwards demanded, as I may ſay, to be admitted to afternoon-tea with me: and appealed by Dorcas to his behaviour to me laſt night; as if, as I ſent him word by her, he thought he had a merit in being unexceptionable. However, I repeated my promiſe to meet him as early as he pleaſed in the morning, or to breakfaſt with him.

Dorcas ſays, he raved: I heard him loud, and I heard his ſervant fly from him, as I thought. You, my deareſt friend, ſay, in one of yours, that you muſt have ſomebody to be angry at, when your mother ſets you up. I ſhould be very loth to draw compariſons: but the workings of paſſion, when indulged, are but too much alike, whether in man or woman.

HE has juſt ſent me word, that he inſiſts upon ſupping with me. As we had been in a good train for ſeveral days paſt, I thought it not prudent to break with him for little matters. Yet, to be, in a manner, threatened into his will, I know not how to bear that.

WHILE I was conſidering, he came up, and, tapping at my door, told me, in a very angry tone, he muſt ſee me this night. He could not reſt, till he had been told what he had done to deſerve the treatment I gave him.

Treatment I gave him! A wretch! Yet perhaps he has nothing new to ſay to me. I ſhall be very angry with him.

[As the lady could not know what Mr. Lovelace's deſigns were, nor the cauſe of his ill-humour, it will not be improper to purſue the ſubject from his letter.]

[Having deſcribed his angry manner of demanding, in perſon, her company at ſupper; he proceeds as follows.]

'"Tis hard,' anſwered the fair perverſe, 'that I am to be ſo little my own 'miſtreſs. I will meet you in the din-'ing-room half an hour hence.'

'I went down to wait that half hour. 'All the women ſet me hard to give her 'cauſe for this tyranny. They demon-'ſtrated, as well from the nature of the 'ſex, as of the caſe, that I had nothing to 'hope for from my tameneſs, and could 'meet with no worſe treatment, were I 'to be guilty of the laſt offence. They 'urged me vehemently to try at leaſt 'what effect ſome greater familiarities 'than I had ever taken with her would 'have: and their arguments being 'ſtrengthened by my juſt reſentments 'on the diſcoveries I had made, I was 'reſolved to take ſome liberties, and, as 'they were received, to take ſtill greater, 'and lay all the fault upon her tyranny. 'In this humour I went up, and never 'had paralytick ſo little command of 'his joints, as I had, while I walked 'about the dining-room, attending her 'motions.

'With an erect mien ſhe entered, her 'face averted, her lovely boſom ſwel-'ling, and the more charmingly pro-'tuberant for the erectneſs of her mien. 'O Jack! that ſullenneſs and reſerve 'ſhould add to the charms of this haugh-'ty maid! But in every attitude, in every 'humour, in every geſture, is beauty 'beautiful.—By her averted face, and 'indignant aſpect, I ſaw the dear inſo-'lent was diſpoſed to be angry—But by

'the

'the fierceneſs of mine, as my trembling 'hands ſeized hers, I ſoon made fear her 'predominant paſſion.' And yet the mo-'ment I beheld her, my heart was daſ-'tardized; and my reverence for the 'virgin purity ſo viſible in her whole 'deportment, again took place. Surely, 'Belford, this is an angel. And yet, 'had ſhe not been known to be a female, 'they would not from babyhood have 'dreſſed her as ſuch, nor would ſhe, but 'upon that conviction, have continued 'the dreſs.

"Let me aſk you, Madam, I beſeech "you tell me, what I have done to de-"ſerve this diſtant treatment?"

"And let me aſk you, Mr. Lovelace, "why are my retirements to be thus in-"vaded?—What can you have to ſay "to me ſince laſt night, that I went with "you ſo much againſt my will to the "play? And after ſitting up with you, "equally againſt my will, till a very late "hour?"

"This I have to ſay, Madam, that I "cannot bear to be kept at this diſtance "from you under the ſame roof."

"Under the ſame roof! Sir!—How came "you——"

"Hear me out, Madam," [letting go 'her trembling hands, and ſnatching 'them back again with an eagerneſs that 'made her ſtart]—"I have a thouſand "things to ſay, to talk of, relating to "our preſent and future proſpects; but "when I want to open my whole ſoul "to you, you are always contriving to "keep me at a diſtance. You make me "inconſiſtent with myſelf. Your heart "is ſet upon delays. You muſt have "views that you will not own. Tell "me, Madam, I conjure you to tell me, "this moment, without ſubterfuge or "reſerve, in what light am I to appear "to you in future? I cannot bear this "diſtance. The ſuſpence you hold me "in I cannot bear."

"In what light, Mr. Lovelace!" '[Viſibly terrified.] "In no bad light, "I hope.—Pray, Mr. Lovelace, do not "graſp my hands ſo hard." [Endea-'vouring to withdraw them.] "Pray "let me go."

"You hate me, Madam."

"I hate nobody, Sir."

"You hate me, Madam," repeated I.

'Inſtigated and reſolved, as I came 'up, I wanted ſome new provocation. 'The devil indeed, as ſoon as my angel 'made her appearance, crept out of my 'heart; but he had left the door open, 'and was no farther off than my elbow.

"You come up in no good temper, I "ſee, Mr. Lovelace—But pray be not "violent—I have done you no hurt—Pray "be not violent!"

"Sweet creature!" And I claſped one 'arm about her, holding one hand in 'my other.—"You have done me no hurt—" 'I could have devoured her—But re-'ſtraining myſelf—"You have done me "the greateſt hurt!—In what have I de-"ſerved the diſtance you keep me at?" '—I knew not what to ſay.

'She ſtruggled to diſengage herſelf— "Pray, Mr. Lovelace, let me withdraw. "I know not why this is. I know not "what I have done to offend you. I "ſee you are come with a deſign to quar-"rel with me. If you would not terrify "me by the ill-humour you are in, per-"mit me to withdraw. I will hear all "you have to ſay another time—To-"morrow morning, as I ſent you word "—But indeed you frighten me. I be-"ſeech you, if you have any value for "me, permit me to withdraw."

'Night, mid-night, is neceſſary, Bel-'ford. Surprize, terror, muſt be neceſ-'ſary to the ultimate trial of this charm-'ing creature, ſay the women below 'what they will. I could not hold my 'purpoſes. This was not the firſt time 'that I had intended to try if ſhe could 'forgive.

'I kiſſed her hand with a fervour, as 'if I would have left my lips upon it.— —"Withdraw, then, deareſt and ever-"dear creature. Indeed I entered in a "very ill humour. I cannot bear the "diſtance at which you ſo cauſeleſsly "keep me. Withdraw, Madam, ſince "it is your will to withdraw; and judge "me generouſly; judge me but as I de-"ſerve to be judged; and let me hope "to meet you to-morrow morning early "in ſuch a temper as becomes our pre-"ſent ſituation, and my future hopes."

'And ſo ſaying, I conducted her to 'the door, and left her there. But in-'ſtead of going down to the women, I 'went into my own chamber, and locked 'myſelf in; aſhamed of being awed by 'her majeſtick loveline's, and apprehen-'ſive virtue, into ſo great a change of 'purpoſe, notwithſtanding I had ſuch 'juſt provocations from the letters of 'her ſaucy friend, founded on her own 'repreſentations of facts and ſituations 'between herſelf and me.'

as I saw plainly he was resolved to quarrel with me—And for what?—What had I done to him?—I never in my life beheld in any body such wild, such angry, such impatient airs. I was terrified; and instead of being as angry as I intended to be, I was forced to be all mildness. I can hardly remember what were his first words, I was so frighted. But, 'You 'hate me, Ma'am! You hate me, Madam!' were some of them—with such a fierceness—I wished myself a thousand miles distant from him. 'I hate nobody,' said I: 'I thank God I hate nobody—You 'terrify me, Mr. Lovelace—Let me 'leave you.'—The man, my dear, looked quite ugly—I never saw a man look so ugly as passion made him look—And for what?—And he so grasped my hands!—Fierce creature!—He so grasped my hands! In short, he seemed by his looks, and by his words, (once putting his arms about me) to wish me to provoke him. So that I had nothing to do but to beg of him (which I did repeatedly) to permit me to withdraw: and to promise to meet him at his own time in the morning.

It was with a very ill grace that he complied, on that condition; and at parting he kissed my hand with such a savageness, that a redness remains upon it still.

Do you not think, my dear, that I have reason to be incensed at him, my situation considered? Am I not under a necessity, as it were, of quarrelling with him; at least every other time I see him? No prudery, no coquetry, no tyranny in my heart, or in my behaviour to him, that I know of. No affected procrastination. Aiming at nothing but decorum. He as much concerned, and so he ought to think, as I, to have that observed. Too much in his power: cast upon him by the cruelty of my relations. No other protection to fly to but his. One plain path before us; yet such embarrasses, such difficulties, such subjects for doubt, for cavil, for uneasiness; as fast as one is obviated, another to be introduced, and not by myself—know not how introduced—What pleasure can I propose to myself in meeting such a wretch?

Perfect for me, my dearest Miss Howe, perfect for me, I beseech you, your kind scheme with Mrs. Townsend; and I will then leave this man.

My temper, I believe, is changed. No wonder if it be. I question whether ever it will be what it was. But I cannot make him half so uneasy by the change, as I am myself. See you not how, from step to step, he grows upon me?—I tremble to look back upon his encroachments. And now to give me cause to apprehend more evil from him than indignation will permit me to express!—O my dear, perfect your scheme, and let me fly from so strange a wretch!

Yet, to be first an eloper from my friends to him, as the world supposes; and now to be so from him, [To whom I know not!] how hard to one who ever endeavoured to shun intricate paths! But he must certainly have views in quarrelling with me thus, which he dare not own!—Yet what can they be?—I am terrified but to think of what they may be!

Let me but get from him!—As to my reputation, if I leave him—That is already too much wounded for me, now, to be careful about any-thing, but how to act so, as that my own heart shall not reproach me. As to the world's censure, I must be content to suffer that—An unhappy composition, however,—What a wreck have my fortunes suffered, to be obliged to throw overboard so many valuables, to preserve, indeed, the only valuable!—A composition that once it would have half broken my heart to think there would have been the least danger that I should be obliged to submit to.

You, my dear, could not be a stranger to my most secret feelings, although you would not tell me of them. What a pride did I take in the applause of everyone!—What a pride even in supposing I had not that pride!—Which concealed itself from my unexamining heart under the specious veil of humility, doubling the merit to myself by the supposed, and indeed imputed gracefulness in the manner of conferring benefits, when I had not a single merit in what I did, vastly over-paid by the pleasure of doing some little good, and impelled, as I may say, by talents given me—For what!—Not to be proud of.

So desirous, in short, to be considered as an example! A vanity which my partial admirers put into my head!—And so secure in my own virtue!

I am punished enough, enough mortified, for this my vanity—I hope enough, if it so please the all-gracious Inflictor: since now, I verily think, I more despise myself for my presumptuous self-security, as well as vanity, than ever I secretly vaunted myself on my good inclinations: secretly, I say, however; for indeed I had not given myself leisure to reflect, reflect, till I was thus mortified, how very imperfect I was; nor how much truth there is in what divines tell us, That we sin in our best performances.

But I was very young—But here let me watch over myself again: for in those four words, I was very young, is there not a palliation couched, that were enough to take all efficacy from the discovery and confession?

What strange imperfect beings!—But self here, which is at the bottom of all we do, and of all we wish, is the grand misleader.

I will not apologize to you, my dear, for these grave reflections. Is it not enough to make the unhappy creature look into herself, and endeavour to detect herself, who, from such an high reputation, left to proud and presumptuous self, should, by one thoughtless step, be brought to the dreadful situation I am in?

Let me, however, look forward: to despond, would be to add sin to sin. And whom have I to raise me up, whom to comfort me, if I desert myself?—Thou, O Father, who, I hope, hast not yet deserted, hast not yet cursed me!—For I am thine!—It is fit that meditation should supply the rest.

I WAS so disgusted with him, as well as frightened by him, that on my return to my chamber, in a fit of passionate despair, I tore almost in two, the answer I had written to his proposals

I will see him in the morning, because I promised I would. But I will go out, and that without him, or any attendant. If he account not tolerably for his sudden change of behaviour, and a proper opportunity offer of a private lodging in some creditable house, I will not any more return to this:—at present I think so.—And there will I either attend the perfecting of your scheme; or, by your epistolary mediation, make my own terms with the wretch; since it is your opinion that I must be his, and cannot help myself: or perhaps take a resolution to throw myself at once into Lady Betty's protection; and this will hinder him from making his insolently threatened visit to Harlowe Place.

[The lady writes again on Monday evening; and gives her friend an account of all that passed between herself and Mr. Lovelace that day; and of her being terrified out of her purpose, of going out: but Mr. Lovelace's next letters giving a more ample account of all, hers are omitted.]

[It is proper, however, to mention, that she re-urges Miss Howe (from the dissatisfaction she has reason for from what passed between Mr. Lovelace and herself) to perfect her scheme in relation to Mrs. Townsend. She concludes this letter in these words:]

I should say something of your last favour, (but a few hours ago received) and of your dialogue with your mother—Are you not very whimsical, my dear? I have but two things to wish for on this occasion.—The one, that your charming pleasantry had a better subject than that you find for it in this dialogue—The other, that my situation were not such, as must too often damp that pleasantry in you, and will not permit me to enjoy it, as I used to do. Be, however, happy, in yourself, though you cannot in your

CLARISSA HARLOWE.

LETTER XXXV.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

MONDAY MORNING, MAY 22.

NO generosity in this lady. None at all. Wouldst thou not have thought, that after I had permitted her to withdraw, primed for mischief as I was, she would meet me next morning early; and that with a smile; making me one of her best curtsies?

I was in the dining-room before six, expecting her. She opened not her door. I went up stairs and down; and hemm'd; and called Will; called Dorcas; threw the doors hard to; but still she opened not her door. Thus till half an hour after eight, I fooled away my time; and then (breakfast ready) I sent Dorcas to request her company.

But I was astonished, when (following the wench, as she did at the first invitation) I saw her enter dressed, all but her gloves, and those and her fan in her hand; in the same moment bidding Dorcas to direct Will to get her a chair to the door.

'Cruel creature,' thought I, 'to expose me thus to the derision of the women below!

'Going abroad, Madam?'

'I am, Sir.'

I looked cursed silly, I am sure, 'You will breakfast first, I hope, Madam;' and a very humble strain; yet with an hundred tenter-hooks in my heart.

Had she given me more notice of her intention, I had perhaps wrought myself up to the frame I was in the day before, and begun my vengeance. And immediately diately came into my head all the virulence that had been tranſcribed for me from Miſs Howe's letters, and in that letter which I had tranſcribed myſelf.

Yes, ſhe would drink one diſh; and then laid her gloves and fan in the window juſt by.

I was perfectly diſconcerted. I hemm'd, and was going to ſpeak ſeveral times; but I knew not in what key. 'Who's 'modeſt now!' thought I. 'Who's in-'ſolent now!'—How a tyrant of a woman confounds a bathful man! She was acting Miſs Howe, I thought; and I the ſpiritleſs Hickman.

At laſt, 'I will begin,' thought I.

She a diſh—I a diſh.

Sip, her eyes her own, ſhe; like an haughty and imperious ſovereign, conſcious of dignity, every look a favour.

Sip, like her vaſſal, I; lips and hands trembling, and not knowing that I ſipp'd or taſted.

'I was—I was—' I ſipp'd—(drawing in my breath and the liquor together, though I ſcalded my mouth with it) 'I was in hopes, Madam—'

Dorcas came in juſt then.—'Dorcas,' ſaid ſhe, 'is a chair gone for?'

'Damn'd impertinence,' thought I, 'thus to put me out in my ſpeech!' And I was forced to wait for the ſervant's anſwer to the inſolent miſtreſs's queſtion.

'William is gone for one, Madam.'

This coſt me a minute's ſilence before I could begin again. And then it was with my hopes, and my hopes, and my hopes, that I ſhould have been early admitted to—

'What weather is it, Dorcas?' ſaid ſhe, as regardleſs of me as if I had not been preſent.

'A little lowering, Madam—The ſun 'is gone in—It was very fine half an 'hour ago.'

I had no patience. Up I roſe. Down went the tea-cup, ſaucer and all—'Con-'found the weather, the ſun-ſhine, and 'the wench!—Begone for a devil, when 'I am ſpeaking to your lady, and have 'ſo little opportunity given me.'

Up roſe the ſaucy-face, half-frighted; and ſnatched from the window her gloves and fan.

'You muſt not go, Madam!'—Seizing her hand—'By my ſoul you muſt 'not.'

'Muſt not, Sir!—But I muſt—you can 'curſe your maid in my abſence as well 'as if I were preſent—Except—Except '—you intend for me, what you direct to 'her.'

'Deareſt creature, you muſt not go '—You muſt not leave me. Such deter-'mined ſcorn!—Such contempts!—'Queſtions aſked your ſervant of no 'meaning but to break in upon me—I 'cannot bear it!'

'Detain me not,' ſtruggling. I will 'not be withheld. I like you not, nor 'your ways. You ſought to quarrel 'with me yeſterday, for no reaſon in the 'world that I can think of, but becauſe I was 'too obliging. You are an ungrateful 'man: and I hate you with my whole 'heart, Mr. Lovelace.'

'Do not make me deſperate, Madam. 'Permit me to ſay, that you ſhall not 'leave me in this humour. Wherever 'you go, I will attend you. Had Miſs 'Howe been my friend, I had not been 'thus treated. It is but too plain to 'whom my difficulties are owing. I 'have long obſerved, that every letter 'you received from her, makes an al-'teration in your behaviour to me. She 'would have you treat me as ſhe treats 'Mr. Hickman, I ſuppoſe: but neither 'does that treatment become your ad-'mirable temper to offer, nor me to re-'ceive.'

This ſtartled her. She did not care to have me think hardly of Miſs Howe.

But recollecting herſelf—'Miſs Howe,' ſaid ſhe, 'is a friend to virtue, and to 'good men. If ſhe like not you, it is 'becauſe you are not one of thoſe.'

'Yes, Madam; and therefore to ſpeak 'of Mr. Hickman and myſelf, as you 'both, I ſuppoſe, think of each, ſhe 'treats him as ſhe would not treat a Love-'lace.—I challenge you, Madam, to 'ſhew me one of the many letters you 'have received from her, where I am 'mentioned.'

'Miſs Howe is juſt; Miſs Howe is 'good,' replied ſhe. 'She writes, ſhe 'ſpeaks of every-body as they deſerve. 'If you point me out but any one oc-'caſion, upon which you have reaſon to 'build a merit to yourſelf, as either juſt 'or good, or even generous, I will look 'out for her letter on that occaſion, '[if ſuch an occaſion there be, I have 'certainly acquainted her with it;] and 'will engage it ſhall be in your favour.'

Deviliſh ſevere! and as indelicate as ſevere, to put a modiſh man upon hunting backward after his own merits.

She would have flung from me: 'I 'will not be detained, Mr. Lovelace. 'I will go out.'

'Indeed you muſt not, Madam, in 'this humour.' And I placed myſelf between her and the door.—And then, fanning, she threw herself into a chair, her sweet face all crimsoned over with passion.

I cast myself at her feet. 'Be gone, 'Mr. Lovelace,' said she, with a rejecting motion, her fan in her hand; 'for 'your own sake leave me!—My soul is 'above thee, man!'—with both her hands pushing me from her!—'Urge me 'not to tell thee, how sincerely I think 'my soul above thee!—Thou hast in 'mine, a proud, a too proud heart, 'to contend with!—Leave me, and 'leave me for ever!—Thou hast a proud 'heart to contend with!'

Her air, her manner, her voice, were bewitchingly noble, though her words were so severe.

'Let me worship an angel,' said I, 'no 'woman. Forgive me, dearest crea-'ture!—Creature if you be, forgive 'me!—Forgive my inadvertencies!—'Forgive my inequalities!—Pity my in-'firmities!—Who is equal to my Cla-'rissa?'

I trembled between admiration and love! and wrapped my arms about her knees, as she sat. She tried to rise at the moment; but my clasping round her thus ardently, drew her down again; and never was woman more affrighted. But free as my clasping emotion might appear to her apprehensive heart, I had not, at the instant, any thought but what reverence inspired. And till she had actually withdrawn, [Which I permitted under promise of a speedy return, and on her consent to dismiss the chair] all the motions of my heart were as pure as her own.

She kept not her word. An hour I waited before I sent to claim her promise. She could not possibly see me yet, was her answer. As soon as she could, she would.

Dorcas says, she still excessively trembled; and ordered her to give her hartshorn and water.

A strange apprehensive creature! Her terror is too great for the occasion.—Evils are often greater in apprehension than in reality. Hast thou never observed, that the terrors of a bird caught, and actually in the hand, bear no comparison to what we might have supposed those terrors would be, were we to have formed a judgment of the same bird by it's shyness before it was taken?

Dear creature!—Did she never romp? Did she never, from girlhood to now, hoyden? The innocent kinds of freedom taken and allowed on these occasions, would have familiarized her to greater. Sacrilege but to touch the hem of her garment!—Excess of delicacy!—O the consecrated beauty! how can she think to be a wife?

But how do I know till I try, whether she may not by a less alarming treatment be prevailed upon, or whether [Day, I have done with thee!] she may not yield to nightly surprizes?—This is still the burden of my song, I can marry her when I will. And if I do, after prevailing, (whether by surprize, or by reluctant consent) whom but myself shall I have injured?

It is now eleven o'clock. She will see me as soon as she can, she tells Polly Horton, who made her a tender visit, and to whom she is less reserved than to any-body else. Her emotion, she assures her, was not owing to perverseness, to nicety, to ill-humour; but to weakness of heart. She has not strength of mind sufficient, she says, to enable her to support her condition.

Yet what a contradiction!—Weakness of heart, says she, with such a strength of will!—O Belford! she is a lion-hearted lady, in every case where her honour, her punctilio rather, calls for spirit. But I have had reason more than once in her case, to conclude, that the passions of the gentle, slower to be moved than those of the quick, are the most irresistible, when raised.—Yet her charming body is not equally organized. The unequal partners pull two ways; and the divinity within her tears her silken frame. But had the same soul informed a masculine body, never would there have been a truer hero.

MONDAY, TWO O'CLOCK.

Not yet visible!—My beloved is not well. What expectations had she from my ardent admiration of her!—More rudeness than revenge apprehended. Yet, how my soul thirsts for revenge upon both these ladies! I must have recourse to my master-strokes. This cursed project of Miss Howe and her Mrs. Townsend, (if I cannot contrive to render it abortive) will be always a sword hanging over my head. Upon every little disobligation my beloved will be for taking wing; and the pains I have taken to deprive her of every other refuge or protection, in order to make her absolutely dependent upon me, will be all thrown away. But perhaps I shall find out a smuggler to counterplot Miss Howe.

Thou remembrest the contention between tween the ſun and the north-wind, in the fable; which ſhould firſt make an honeſt traveller throw off his cloak.

Boreas began firſt. He puffed away moſt vehemently; and often made the poor fellow curve and ſtagger; but with no other effect than to cauſe him to wrap his ſurtout cloſer about him.

But when it came to Phœbus's turn, he ſo played upon the traveller with his beams, that he made him firſt unbutton, and then throw it quite off—Nor left he, till he obliged him to take to the friendly ſhade of a ſpreading beach; where proſtrating himſelf on the thrown-off cloak, he took a comfortable nap.

The victor-god then laughed outright, both at Boreas and the traveller, and purſued his radiant courſe, ſhining upon, and warming and cheriſhing a thouſand new objects as he danced along: and at night, when he put up his fiery courſers, he diverted his Thetis with the relation of his pranks in the paſſed day.

I, in like manner, will diſcard all my boiſterous inventions: and if I can oblige my ſweet traveller to throw aſide, but for one moment, the cloak of her rigid virtue, I ſhall have nothing to do, but, like the ſun, to bleſs new objects with my rays. But my choſen hours of converſation and repoſe, after all my peregrinations, will be devoted to my goddeſs.

AND now, Belford, according to my new ſyſtem, I think this houſe of Mrs. Fretchville an embarraſs upon me. I will get rid of it; for ſome time at leaſt. Mennell, when I am out, ſhall come to her, enquiring for me. 'What for?' thou'lt aſk. What for!—Haſt thou not heard what has befallen poor Mrs. Fretchville?—Then I'll tell thee.

One of her maids, about a week ago, was taken with the ſmall-pox. The reſt kept their miſtreſs ignorant of it till Friday; and then ſhe came to know it by accident. The greater half of the plagues poor mortals of condition are tormented with, proceed from the ſervants they take, partly for ſhow, partly for uſe, and with a view to leſſen their cares.

This has ſo terrified the widow, that ſhe is taken with all the ſymptoms that threaten an attack from that dreadful enemy of fair faces.—So muſt not think of removing: yet cannot expect that we ſhould be further delayed on her account.

She now wiſhes, with all her heart, that ſhe had known her own mind, and gone into the country at firſt when I treated about the houſe: this evil then had not happened!—A curſed croſs accident for us, too!—High-ho! Nothing elſe, I think, in this mortal life! People need not ſtudy to bring croſſes upon themſelves by their petulancies.

So this affair of the houſe will be over; at leaſt, for one while. But then I can fall upon an expedient which will make amends for this diſappointment. I muſt move ſlow, in order to be ſure. I have a charming contrivance or two in my head, even ſuppoſe my beloved ſhould get away, to bring her back again.

But what is become of Lord M. I trow, that he writes not to me, in anſwer to my invitation? If he would ſend me ſuch a letter as I could ſhew, it might go a great way towards a perfect reconciliation. I have written to Charlotte about it. He ſhall ſoon hear from me, and that in a way he won't like, if he writes not quickly. He has ſometimes threatened to diſinherit me: but if I ſhould renounce him, it would be but juſtice, and would vex him ten times more, than any-thing he can do, will vex me. Then, the ſettlements unavoidably delayed, by his neglect!—How ſhall I bear ſuch a life of procraſtination!—I, who, as to my will, and impatience, and ſo-forth, am of the true lady-make, and can as little bear controul and diſappointment as the beſt of them!

ANOTHER letter from Miſs Howe, I ſuppoſe it is that which ſhe promiſes in her laſt to ſend her relating to the courtſhip between old Tony the uncle, and Annabella the mother. I ſhould be extremely rejoiced to ſee it. No more of the ſmuggler-plot in it, ſurely! This letter, it ſeems, ſhe has put in her pocket. But I hope I ſhall ſoon find it depoſited with the reſt.

MONDAY EVENING.

AT my repeated requeſt ſhe condeſcended to meet me in the dining-room to afternoon-tea, and not before.

She entered with baſhfulneſs, as I thought; in a pretty confuſion, for having carried her apprehenſions too far. Sullen and ſlow moved ſhe towards the tea-table.—Dorcas preſent, buſy in tea-cup preparations. I took her reluctant hand, and preſſed to my lips—'Deareſt, 'lovelieſt of creatures, why this diſtance? 'Why this diſpleaſure?—How can you 'thus torture the faithfulleſt heart in 'the world?'

She diſengaged her hand. Again I would have ſnatched it.

'Be quiet,' peeviſhly withdrawing it. And down ſhe ſat; a gentle palpitation in the beauty of beauties indicating mingled ſullenneſs and reſentment; her ſnowy handkerchief riſing and falling, and a ſweet flush over-ſpreading her charming cheeks.

'For God's ſake, Madam!'—And a third time I would have taken her repulſing hand.

'And for the ſame ſake, Sir, no more 'teazing.'

Dorcas retired; I drew my chair nearer hers, and with the moſt reſpectful tenderneſs took her hand; and told her, that I could not forbear to expreſs my apprehenſions, (from the diſtance ſhe was ſo deſirous to keep me at) that if any man in the world was more indifferent to her, to uſe no harſher word, than another, it was the unhappy wretch before her.

She looked ſteadily upon me, for a moment, and with her other hand, not withdrawing that I held, pulled her handkerchief out of her pocket; and by a twinkling motion urged forward a tear or two, which having ariſen in each ſweet eye, it was plain by that motion, ſhe would rather have diſſipated: but anſwered me only with a ſigh, and an averted face.

I urged her to ſpeak; to look up at me; to bleſs me with an eye more favourable.

I had reaſon, ſhe told me, for my complaint of her indifference. She ſaw nothing in my mind that was generous. I was not a man to be obliged or favoured. My ſtrange behaviour to her ſince Saturday night, for no cauſe at all that ſhe knew of, convinced her of this. Whatever hopes ſhe had conceived of me, were utterly diſſipated: all my ways were diſguſtful to her.

This cut me to the heart. The guilty, I believe, in every caſe, leſs patiently bear the detecting truth, than the innocent do the degrading falſhood.

I beſpoke her patience, while I took the liberty to account for this change on my part.—I re-acknowledged the pride of my heart, which could not bear the thought of that want of preference in the heart of a lady whom I hoped to call mine, which ſhe had always manifeſted. Marriage, I ſaid, was a ſtate that was not to be entered upon with indifference on either ſide.

'It is inſolence,' interrupted ſhe, 'it 'is a preſumption, Sir, to expect tokens 'of value, without reſolving to deſerve 'them. You have no whining creature 'before you, Mr. Lovelace, overcome 'by weak motives, to love where there 'is no merit. Miſs Howe can tell you, 'Sir, that I never loved the faults of 'my friend; nor ever wiſhed her to 'love me for mine. It is a rule with 'us not to ſpare each other. And would 'a man who has nothing but faults, (for 'pray, Sir, what are your virtues?) 'expect that I ſhould ſhew a value for 'him? Indeed, if I did, I ſhould not de'ſerve even his value; but ought to be 'deſpiſed by him.'

'Well have you, Madam, kept up to 'this noble manner of thinking. You 'are in no danger of being deſpiſed for 'any marks of tenderneſs or favour 'ſhewn to the man before you. You 'have been perhaps, you'll think, laudably ſtudious of making and taking occaſions to declare, that it was far from 'being owing to your choice, that you 'had any thoughts of me. My whole 'ſoul, Madam, in all its errors, in all 'its wiſhes, in all its views; had been 'laid open and naked before you, had I 'been encouraged by ſuch a ſhare in 'your confidence and eſteem, as would 'have ſecured me againſt your appre'hended worſt conſtructions of what 'I ſhould from time to time have reveal'ed to you, and conſulted you upon. 'For never was there a franker heart: 'nor a man ſo ready to accuſe himſelf,' [This, Belford, is true.] 'But you know, 'Madam, how much otherwiſe it has 'been between us.—Doubt, diſtance, 'reſerve, on your part, begat doubt, 'fear, awe, on mine.—How little con'fidence! as if we apprehended each 'other to be a plotter rather than a 'lover. How have I dreaded every let'ter that has been brought you from 'Wilſon's!—And with reaſon: ſince 'the laſt, from which I expected ſo 'much, on account of the propoſals I 'made you in writing, has, if I may 'judge by the effects, and by your de'nial of ſeeing me yeſterday, (though 'you could go abroad, and in a chair 'too, to avoid my attendance on you) ſet 'you againſt me more than ever.'

'I was guilty, it ſeems, of going to 'church,' ſaid the indignant charmer; 'and without the company of a man, 'whoſe choice it would have been not 'to go, had I not gone—I was guilty of 'deſiring to have the whole Sunday to 'myſelf, after I had obliged you, againſt 'my will, at a play, and after you had 'detained me (equally to my diſlike) to 'a very late hour over-night.—Theſe 'were my faults: for theſe I was to be 'puniſhed: I was to be compelled to 'ſee you, and to be terrified when I did 'ſee you, by the moſt ſhocking ill-humour that was ever ſhewn to a creature 'in my circumſtances, and not bound to

'bear it. You have pretended to find 'fault with my father's temper, Mr. 'Lovelace: but the worſt that he ever 'ſhewed after marriage, was not in the 'leaſt to be compared to what you have 'ſhewn before-hand.—And what are my 'proſpects with you at the very beſt?— 'My indignation riſes againſt you, Mr. 'Lovelace, while I ſpeak to you, when 'I recollect the many inſtances, equally 'ungenerous and unpolite, of your be-'haviour to one whom you have brought 'into diſtreſs—And I can hardly bear 'you in my ſight.'

She turned from me, ſtanding up; and lifting up her folded hands, and charming eyes ſwimming in tears, 'O my fa-'ther!' ſaid the inimitable creature, 'you might have ſpared your heavy 'curſe, had you known how I have been 'puniſhed, ever ſince my ſwerving feet 'led me out of your garden-doors to 'meet this man!'—Then, ſinking into her chair, a burſt of paſſionate tears forced their way down her glowing cheeks.

'My deareſt life,' taking her ſtill folded hands in mine, 'who can bear an 'invocation ſo affecting, though ſo paſ-'ſionate?'

And as I hope to live, my noſe tingled, as I once, when a boy, remember it did, (and indeed once more very lately) juſt before ſome tears came into my eyes; and I durſt hardly truſt my face in view of hers.

'What have I done to deſerve this 'impatient exclamation?—Have I at 'any time, by words, by deeds, by looks, 'given you cauſe to doubt my honour, 'my reverence, my adoration, I may 'call it, of your virtues? All is owing to 'miſapprehenſion, I hope, on both ſides. 'Condeſcend to clear up but your part, 'as I will mine, and all muſt ſpeedily be 'happy.—Would to Heaven I loved 'that Heaven as I love you! And yet, 'if I doubted a return in love, let me 'periſh if I ſhould know to wiſh you 'mine!—Give me hope, deareſt creu-'ture, give me but hope, that I am your 'preferable choice!—Give me but hope, 'that you hate me not: that you do 'not deſpiſe me.

'O Mr. Lovelace, we have been long 'enough together, to be tired of each 'other's humours and ways; ways and 'humours ſo different, that perhaps you 'ought to diſlike me, as much as I do 'you.—I think—I think, that I cannot 'make an anſwerable return to the va-'lue you profeſs for me. My temper 'is utterly ruined. You have given me 'an ill opinion of all mankind; of your-'ſelf in particular: and withal ſo bad a 'one of myſelf, that I ſhall never be 'able to look up, having utterly and 'for ever loſt all that ſelf-complacency, 'and conſcious pride, which are ſo ne-'ceſſary to carry a woman through this 'life with tolerable ſatisfaction to her-'ſelf.'

She pauſed. I was ſilent. 'By my 'ſoul,' thought I, 'this ſweet creature 'will at laſt undo me!'

She proceeded:—'What now remains, 'but that you pronounce me free of all 'obligation to you? And that you hin-'der me not from purſuing the deſtiny 'that ſhall be allotted me?'

Again ſhe pauſed. I was ſtill ſilent; meditating whether to renounce all further deſigns upon her; whether I had not received ſufficient evidence of a virtue, and of a greatneſs of ſoul, that could not be queſtioned or impeached.

She went on:—'Propitious to me be 'your ſilence, Mr. Lovelace!—Tell me, 'that I am free of all obligation to you. 'You know, I never made you promiſes. 'You know, that you are not under any 'to me.—My broken fortunes I matter 'not——'

She was proceeding—'My deareſt 'life,' ſaid I, 'I have been all this time, 'though you fill me with doubts of your 'favour, buſy in the nuptial preparations, 'I am actually in treaty for equipage.'

'Equipage, Sir!—Trappings, tinſel! '—What is equipage—what is life— 'what is any-thing, to a creature ſunk 'ſo low as I am in my own opinion!— 'Labouring under a father's curſe!— 'Unable to look backward without ſelf-'reproach, or forward without terror! '—Theſe reflections ſtrengthened by 'every croſs accident!—And what but 'croſs accidents befal me!—All my 'darling ſchemes daſhed in pieces, all 'my hopes at an end; deny me not the 'liberty to refuge myſelf in ſome obſcure 'corner, where neither the enemies you 'have made me, nor the few friends you 'have left me, may ever hear of the ſup-'poſed raſh-one, till thoſe happy mo-'ments are at hand, which ſhall expi-'ate for all!'

I had not a word to ſay for myſelf. Such a war in my mind had I never known. Gratitude, and admiration of the excellent creature before me, combating with villainous habit, with reſolutions ſo premeditatedly made, and with views ſo much gloried in!—An hundred new contrivances in my head, and in my heart, that to be honeſt, as it is called, called, must all be given up, by a heart delighting in intrigue and difficulty—Miss Howe's virulences endeavoured to be recollected—Yet recollection refusing to bring them forward with the requisite efficacy—I had certainly been a lost man, had not Dorcas come seasonably in, with a letter.—'Be pleased, Sir, to open it now.'

I retired to the window—opened it—It was from Dorcas herself.—These the contents—'Be pleased to detain my lady: 'a paper of importance to transcribe. I 'will cough when I have done.'

I put the paper in my pocket, and turned to my charmer, less disconcerted, as she, by that time, had also a little recovered herself.—'One favour, dearest 'creature—Let me but know, whether 'Miss Howe approves or disapproves of 'my proposals?—I know her to be my 'enemy. I was intending to account to 'you for the change of behaviour you 'accused me of at the beginning of the 'conversation; but was diverted from 'it by your vehemence. Indeed, my 'beloved creature, you were very vehe-'ment. Do you think, it must not be 'matter of high regret to me, to find 'my wishes so often delayed and post-poned in favour of your predominant 'view to a reconciliation with your re-'lations who will not be reconciled to 'you?—To this was owing your declin-'ing to celebrate our nuptials before we 'came to town, though you were so at-'trociously treated by your sister, and 'your whole family; and though so ar-'dently pressed to celebrate by me—To 'this was owing the ready offence you 'took at my four friends; and at the 'unavailing attempt I made to see a 'dropt letter; little imagining, from 'what two such ladies could write to 'each other, that there could be room 'for mortal displeasure—To this was 'owing the week's distance you held me 'at, till you knew the issue of another 'application.—But when they had re-'jected that; when you had sent my 'cold-received proposals to Miss Howe 'for her approbation or advice, as indeed 'I advised; and had honoured me with 'your company at the play on Saturday 'night, (my whole behaviour unobjec-'tionable to the last hour;) must not, 'Madam, the sudden change in your 'conduct the very next morning, asto-'nish and distress me?—And this per-'sisted in with still stronger declarations, 'after you had received the impatiently-'expected letter from Miss Howe; must 'I not conclude, that all was owing to 'her influence; and that some other ap-'plication or project was meditating, 'that made it necessary to keep me again 'at distance till the result were known, 'and which was to deprive me of you 'for ever? for was not that your con-'stantly proposed preliminary?—Well, 'Madam, might I be wrought up to a 'half-phrenzy by this apprehension; and 'well might I charge you with hating 'me.—And now, my dearest creature, 'let me know, I once more ask you, 'What is Miss Howe's opinion of my 'proposals?

'Were I disposed to debate with you, 'Mr. Lovelace, I could very easily an-'swer your fine harangue. But at pre-'sent, I shall only say, that your ways 'have been very unaccountable. You 'seem to me, if your meanings were al-'ways just, to have taken great pains to 'embarrass them. Whether owing in 'you to the want of a clear head, or a 'sound heart, I cannot determine; but 'it is to the want of one of them, I ve-'rily think, that I am to ascribe the 'greatest part of your strange conduct.'

'Curse upon the heart of that little 'devil,' said I, 'who instigates you to 'think so hardly of the faithfullest heart 'in the world!'

'How dare you, Sir!' And there she stopt; having almost overshot herself; as I designed she should.

'How dare I what, Madam?' And I looked with meaning. 'How dare I 'what?'

'Vile man!—And do you—' And there again she stopt.

'Do I what, Madam?—And why 'vile man?'

'How dare you curse any-body in my 'presence?'

O the sweet receder! But that was not to go off so with a Lovelace.

'Why then, dearest creature, is there 'any-body that instigates you?—If there 'be, again I curse them, be they whom 'they will.'

She was in a charming pretty passion. And this was the first time that I had the odds in my favour.

'Well, Madam, it is just as I thought. 'And now I know how to account for 'a temper that I hope is not natural to 'you.'

'Artful wretch! And is it thus you 'would entrap me? But know, Sir, 'that I received letters from nobody but 'Miss Howe. Miss Howe likes some 'of your ways as little as I do; for I 'have set every-thing before her. Yet 'she is thus far your enemy, as she is 'mine. She thinks I should not refuse

'your

'your offers; but endeavour to make 'the beſt of my lot. And now you 'have the truth. Would to Heaven 'you were capable of dealing with equal 'ſincerity!'

'I am, Madam. And here, on my 'knee, I renew my vows, and my ſup-'plication, that you will make me yours. 'Yours for ever. And let me have 'cauſe to bleſs you and Miſs Howe in 'the ſame breath.'

To ſay the truth, Belford, I had before begun to think, that the vixen of a girl, who certainly likes not Hickman, was in love with me.

'Riſe, Sir, from your too ready knees, 'and mock me not.'

'Too-ready knees!' thought I. 'Though 'this humble poſture ſo little affects this 'proud beauty, ſhe knows not how much 'I have obtained of others of her ſex, 'nor how often I have been forgiven for 'the laſt attempts by kneeling.'

'Mock you, Madam!' And I aroſe, and re-urged her for the day. I blamed myſelf at the ſame time, for the invitation I had given to Lord M. as it might ſubject me to delay from his infirmities: but told her that I would write to him to excuſe me, if ſhe had no objection; or to give him the day ſhe would give me, and not wait for him, if he could not come in time.

'My day, Sir,' ſaid ſhe, 'is never. 'Be not ſurprized. A perſon of polite-'neſs judging between us, would not be 'ſurprized that I ſay ſo. But indeed, 'Mr. Lovelace,' [and wept through impatience] 'you either know not how 'to treat with a mind of the leaſt degree 'of delicacy, notwithſtanding your birth 'and education, or you are an ingrateful 'man, and' [after a pauſe] 'a worſe than 'ingrateful one. But I will retire. I will 'ſee you again to-morrow. I cannot 'before. I think I hate you. You may 'look. Indeed I think I hate you. And 'if, upon a re-examination of my own 'heart, I find I do, I would not for the 'world that matters ſhould go any far-'ther between us.'

But I ſee, I ſee, ſhe does not hate me! How it would mortify my vanity, if I thought there was a woman in the world, much more this, that could hate me! 'Tis evident, villain as ſhe thinks me, that I ſhould not be an odious villain, if I could but at laſt in one inſtance ceaſe to be a villain! She could not hold it, determined as ſhe had thought herſelf, I ſaw by her eyes, the moment I endeavoured to diſſipate her apprehenſions, on my too-ready knees, as ſhe calls them. The moment the rough covering my teazing behaviour has thrown over her affections is quite removed, I doubt not to find all ſilk and ſilver at the bottom, all ſoft, bright, and charming.

I was however too much vexed, diſconcerted, mortified, to hinder her from retiring. And yet ſhe had not gone, if Dorcas had not coughed.

The wench came in, as ſoon as her lady had retired, and gave me the copy ſhe had taken. And what ſhould it be but of the anſwer the truly-admirable creature had intended to give to my written propoſals in relation to ſettlements?

I have but juſt dipt into this affecting paper. Were I to read it attentively, not a wink ſhould I ſleep this night. To-morrow it ſhall obtain my ſerious conſideration.

LETTER XXXVI.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

TUESDAY MORNING, MAY 23.

THE dear creature deſires to be excuſed ſeeing me till evening. She is not very well, as Dorcas tells me.

Read here, if thou wilt, the paper tranſcribed by Dorcas. It is impoſſible that I ſhould proceed with my projects againſt this admirable woman, were it not that I am reſolved, after a few trials more, if as nobly ſuſtained as thoſe ſhe has already paſſed through, to make her (if ſhe really hate me not) legally mine.

'TO MR. LOVELACE.

'WHEN a woman is married, that 'ſupreme earthly obligation requires 'that in all inſtances where her huſband's 'real honour is concerned, ſhe ſhould 'yield her own will to his. But, be-'fore-hand, I could be glad, conform-'ably to what I have always ſignified, 'to have the moſt explicit aſſurances, 'that every poſſible way ſhould be tried 'to avoid litigation with my father. 'Time and patience will ſubdue all 'things. My proſpects of happineſs 'are extremely contracted. A huſ-'band's right will be always the ſame. 'In my life-time I could wiſh nothing 'to be done of this ſort. Your circum-'ſtances, Sir, will not oblige you to ex-'tort violently from him what is in his 'hands. All that depends upon me, 'either with regard to my perſon, to 'my diverſions, or to the œconomy that 'no married woman, of whatever rank 'or quality, ſhould be above inſpecting, 'ſhall be done, to prevent a neceſſity for 'such measures being taken. And if 'there will be no necessity for them, it is 'to be hoped that motives less excusable 'will not have force—Motives which 'must be founded in a littleness of mind 'which a woman, who has not that little-'ness of mind, will be under such temp-'tations as her duty will hardly be able 'at all times to check, to despise her 'husband for having; especially in 'cases where her own family, so much 'a part of herself, and which will have 'obligations upon her (though then 'but secondary ones) from which she can 'never be freed, is intimately con-'cerned.

'This article, then, I urge to your 'most serious consideration, as what lies 'next my heart. I enter not here mi-'nutely into the fatal misunderstanding 'between them and you: the fault 'may be in both. But, Sir, yours was 'the foundation-fault: at least, you gave 'a too plausible pretence for my bro-'ther's antipathy to work upon. Con-'descension was no part of your study. 'You chose to bear the imputations laid 'to your charge, rather than to make 'it your endeavour to obviate them.

'But this may lead into hateful re-'crimination—Let it be remembered, 'I will only say, in this place, that, in 'their eye, you have robbed them of a 'daughter they doated upon; and that 'their resentments on this occasion rise 'but in proportion to their love, and 'their disappointment. If they were 'faulty in some of the measures they 'took, while they themselves did not 'think so, who shall judge for them? 'You, Sir, who will judge every-body 'as you please, and will let nobody 'judge you in your own particular, must 'not be their judge.—It may therefore 'be expected, that they will stand out.

'As for myself, Sir, I must leave it '[So seems it to be destined] to your 'justice, to treat me as you shall think 'I deserve: but if your future behavi-'our to them is not governed by that 'harsh-sounding implacableness, which 'you charge upon some of their tem-'pers, the splendor of your family, and 'the excellent character of some of them, '(of all indeed, unless your own consci-'ence furnishes you with one only excep-'tion) will, on better consideration, do 'every-thing with them: for they may 'be overcome; perhaps, however, with 'the more difficulty, as the greatly pros-'perous less bear controul and disap-'pointment than others: for I will own 'to you, that I have often in secret la-'mented, that their great acquirements 'have been a snare to them; perhaps as 'great a snare, as some other accidentals 'have been to you; which being less 'immediately your own gifts, you have 'still less reason than they to value 'yourself upon them.

'Let me only, on this subject, further 'observe, that condescension is not 'meanness. There is a glory in yield-'ing, that hardly any violent spirit can 'judge of. My brother perhaps is no 'more sensible of this than you. But as 'you have talents, which he has not, '(who, however, has, I hope, that re-'gard for morals, the want of which 'makes one of his objections to you) I 'could wish it may not be owing to you, 'that your mutual dislikes to each other 'do not subside; for it is my earnest hope, 'that in time you may see each other, 'without exciting the fears of a wife 'and a sister for the consequence. Not 'that I should wish you to yield in points 'that truly concerned your honour: no, 'Sir; I would be as delicate in such, as 'you yourself: more delicate, I will ven-'ture to say, because more uniformly so. 'How vain, how contemptible, is that 'pride, which shews itself in standing 'upon diminutive observances; and 'gives up, and makes a jest of, the most 'important duties!

'This article being considered as I 'wish, all the rest will be easy. Were 'I to accept of the handsome separate 'provision you seem to intend me; added 'to the considerable sums arisen from 'my grandfather's estate since his death, '(more considerable than perhaps you 'may suppose from your offer;) I should 'think it my duty to lay up for the fa-'mily good, and for unforeseen events, 'out of it: for, as to my donations, I 'would generally confine myself in them 'to the tenth of my income, be it what 'it would. I aim at no glare in what I 'do of that sort. All I wish for, is the 'power of relieving the lame, the blind, 'the sick, and the industrious poor, and 'those whom accident has made so, or 'sudden distress reduced. The common 'or bred beggars I leave to others, and 'to the publick provision. They can-'not be lower: perhaps they wish not 'to be higher: and, not able to do for 'every-one, I aim not at works of su-'pererogation. Two hundred pounds 'a year would do all I wish to do of the 'separate sort: for all above I would 'content myself to ask you; except, 'mistrusting your own œconomy, you 'would give up to my management and 'keeping, in order to provide for future 'contingencies, a larger portion; for

'which, as your ſteward, I would regu'larly account.

'As to cloaths, I have particularly 'two ſuits, which, having been only in 'a manner tried on, would anſwer for 'any preſent occaſion. Jewels I have
'of my grandmother's, which want only
'new ſetting: another ſet I have, which
'on particular days I uſed to wear. Al-
'though theſe are not ſent me, I have no
'doubt, being merely perſonals, but 'they will, when I ſend for them in ano-
'ther name: till when I ſhould not chuſe
'to wear any.

'As to your complaints of my diffiden-
'ces, and the like, I appeal to your own 'heart, if it be poſſible for you to make 'my caſe your own for one moment, and
'to retroſpect ſome parts of your beha'viour, words, and actions, whether I 'am not rather to be juſtified than cen-
'ſured: and whether, of all men in the 'world, avowing what you avow, you ought 'not to think ſo. If you do not, let me
'admoniſh you, Sir, from the very great
'miſmatch, that then muſt appear to be
'in our minds, never to ſeek, nor ſo
'much as wiſh, to bring about the moſt
'intimate union of intereſts between your-
'ſelf and 'C. HARLOWE.

'MAY, 20.

The original of this charming paper, as Dorcas tells me, was torn almoſt in two. In one of her pets, I ſuppoſe! What buſineſs have the ſex, whoſe principal glory is meekneſs, and patience, and reſignation, to be in a paſſion I trow? —Will not ſhe who allows herſelf ſuch liberties as a maiden, take greater when married?

And a wife to be in a paſſion!—Let me tell the ladies it is an impudent thing, begging their pardon, and as imprudent as impudent, for a wife to be in a paſſion, if ſhe mean not eternal ſeparation, or wicked defiance by it: for is it not rejecting at once all that expoſtulatory meekneſs, and gentle reaſoning, mingled with ſighs as gentle, and graced with bent knees, ſupplicating hands, and eyes lifted up to your imperial countenance, juſt running over, that ſhould make a reconciliation ſpeedy, and as laſting as ſpeedy?—Even ſuppoſe the huſband is in the wrong, will not his being ſo give the greater force to her expoſtulation?

Now I think of it, a man ſhould be in the wrong now-and-then, to make his wife ſhine. Miſs Howe tells my charmer, that adverſity is her ſhining-time. 'Tis a generous thing in a man, to make his wife ſhine at his own expence: to give her leave to triumph over him by patient reaſoning: for were he to be too imperial to acknowledge his fault on the ſpot, ſhe will find the benefit of her duty and ſubmiſſion in future, and in the high opinion he will conceive of her prudence and obligingneſs—And ſo, by degrees, ſhe will become her maſter's maſter.

But for a wife to come up with a kemboed arm, the other hand thrown out, perhaps with a pointing finger—'Look 'ye here, Sir!—Take notice!—If you are 'wrong, I'll be wrong!—If you are in a 'paſſion, I'll be in a paſſion! Rebuff for 'rebuff, Sir!—If you fly, I'll tear!—If 'you ſwear, I'll curſe!—And the ſame 'room, and the ſame bed, ſhall not hold 'us, Sir!—For, remember, I am mar-'ried, Sir!—I am a wife, Sir!—You 'can't help yourſelf, Sir!—Your ho-'nour, as well as your peace, is in my 'keeping! And, if you like not this treat-'ment, you may have worſe, Sir!'

Ah! Jack! Jack! What man, who has obſerved theſe things, either implied or expreſſed, in other families, would wiſh to be an huſband!

Dorcas found this paper in one of the drawers of her lady's dreſſing-table. She was re-peruſing it, as ſhe ſuppoſes, when the honeſt wench carried my meſſage to deſire her to favour me at the tea-table; for ſhe ſaw her pop a paper into the drawer as ſhe came in; and there, on her miſtreſs's going to meet me in the dining-room, ſhe found it; and to be this.

But I had better not to have had a copy of it, as far as I know: for, determined as I was before upon my operations, it inſtantly turned all my reſolutions in her favour. Yet I would give ſomething to be convinced, that ſhe did not pop it into her drawer before the wench, in order for me to ſee it; and perhaps (if I were to take notice of it) to diſcover whether Dorcas, according to Miſs Howe's advice, were moſt my friend, or hers.

The very ſuſpicion of this will do her no good: for I cannot bear to be artfully dealt with. People love to enjoy their own peculiar talents in monopoly, as I may ſay. I am aware, that it will ſtrengthen thy arguments againſt me in her behalf. But I know every tittle thou canſt ſay upon it. Spare therefore thy wambling nonſenſe, I deſire thee; and leave this ſweet excellence and me to our fate: that will determine for us, as it ſhall pleaſe itſelf, for as Cowley ſays—

'An unſeen hand makes all our moves:
'And ſome are great, and ſome are ſmall;
'Some climb to good, ſome from good fortune fall:
'Some wiſe men, and ſome fools we call:
'Figures, alas! of ſpeech!—For deſtiny plays us all.'

But, after all, I am ſorry, almoſt ſorry, (for how ſhall I do to be quite ſorry, when it is not given to me to be ſo?) that I cannot, until I have made further trials, reſolve upon wedlock.

I have juſt read over again this intended anſwer to my propoſals: and how I adore her for it!

But yet; another yet!—She has not given it or ſent it to me.—It is not therefore her anſwer. It is not written for me; though to me.

Nay, ſhe has not intended to ſend it to me: ſhe has even torn it, perhaps with indignation, as thinking it too good for me. By this action ſhe abſolutely retracts it. Why then does my fooliſh fondneſs ſeek to eſtabliſh for her the ſame merit in my heart, as if ſhe avowed it? Pr'ythee, dear Belford, once more, leave us to our fate; and do not thou interpoſe with thy nonſenſe, to weaken a ſpirit already too ſqueamiſh, and ſtrengthen a conſcience that has declared itſelf of her party.

Then again, 'Remember they recent 'diſcoveries, Lovelace! Remember her 'indifference, attended with all the appearance of contempt and hatred. 'View her, even now, wrapt up in reſerve and myſtery; meditating plots, 'as far as thou knoweſt, againſt the ſovereignty thou haſt, by right of conqueſt, 'obtained over her. Remember, in ſhort, 'all thou haſt threatened to remember 'againſt this inſolent beauty, who is a 'rebel to the power ſhe has liſted under.'

'But yet, how doſt thou propoſe to 'ſubdue thy ſweet enemy!'—Abhorred be force, be the neceſſity of force, if that can be avoided! There is no triumph in force—No conqueſt over the will—No prevailing by gentle degrees, over the gentle paſſions!—Force is the devil!'

My curſed character, as I have often ſaid, was againſt me at ſetting-out—Yet is ſhe not a woman? Cannot I find one yielding or but half-yielding moment, if ſhe do not abſolutely hate me?

But with what can I tempt her?—RICHES ſhe was born to, and deſpiſes, knowing what they are. JEWELS and ornaments, to a mind ſo much a jewel, and ſo richly ſet, her worthy conſciouſneſs will not let her value. LOVE—If ſhe be ſuſceptible of love, it ſeems to be ſo much under the direction of prudence, that one unguarded moment, I fear, cannot be reaſonably hoped for: and ſo much VIGILANCE, ſo much apprehenſiveneſs, that her fears are ever aforehand with her dangers. Then her LOVE OF VIRTUE ſeems to be principle, native principle, or, if not native, ſo deeply rooted, that it's fibres have ſtruck into her heart, and, as ſhe grew up, ſo blended and twiſted themſelves with the ſtrings of life, that I doubt there is no ſeparating of the one without cutting the others aſunder.

What then can be done to make ſuch a matchleſs creature get over her firſt teſts, in order to put her to the grand proof, whether once overcome, ſhe will not be always overcome?

Our mother and her nymphs ſay, I am a perfect Craven, and no Lovelace: and ſo I think. But this is no ſimpering, ſmiling charmer, as I have found others to be, when I have touched upon affecting ſubjects at a diſtance; as once or twice I have tried to her, the mother introducing them (to make ſex palliate the freedom to ſex) when only we three together. She is above the affectation of not ſeeming to underſtand you. She ſhews by her diſpleaſure, and a fierceneſs not natural to her eye, that ſhe judges of an impure heart by an impure mouth, and darts dead at once even the embryo hopes of an encroaching lover, however diſtantly inſinuated, before the meaning hint can dawn into double entendre.

By my faith, Jack, as I ſit gazing upon her, my whole ſoul in my eyes, contemplating her perfections, and thinking, when I have ſeen her eaſy and ſerene, what would be her thoughts, did ſhe know my heart as well as I know it; when I behold her diſturbed and jealous, and think of the juſtneſs of her apprehenſions, and that ſhe cannot fear ſo much, as there is room for her to fear; my heart often miſgives me.

'And muſt,' think I, 'O creature ſo 'divinely excellent, and ſo beloved of 'my ſoul, thoſe arms, thoſe encircling 'arms, that would make a monarch 'happy, be uſed to repel brutal force; 'all their ſtrength, unavailingly perhaps, 'exerted to repel it, and to defend a 'perſon ſo delicately framed? Can vio'lence enter into the heart of a wretch, 'who might entitle himſelf to all her 'willing, yet virtuous love, and make 'the bleſſings he aſpireth after, her duty 'to confer?—Be gone, villain-purpoſes! 'Sink ye all to the hell that could only

'inſpire

'inſpire ye!' And I am then ready to throw myſelf at her feet, to confeſs my villainous deſigns, to avow my repentance, and put it out of my power to act unworthily by ſuch an excellence.

How then comes it that all theſe compaſſionate, and as ſome would call them, honeſt ſenſibilities go off?—Why, Miſs Howe will tell thee: ſhe ſays, I am the devil—By my conſcience, I think he has at preſent a great ſhare in me.

There's ingenuouſneſs!—How I lay myſelf open to thee!—But feeſt thou not, that the more I ſay againſt myſelf, the leſs room there is for thee to take me to taſk?—O Belford, Belford! I cannot, cannot, (at leaſt at preſent) I cannot marry.

Then her family, my bitter enemies—To ſupple to them, or if I do not, to make her as unhappy as ſhe can be from my attempts.

Then does ſhe not love them too much, me too little?

She now ſeems to deſpiſe me: Miſs Howe declares, that ſhe really does deſpiſe me. To be deſpiſed by a WIFE—What a thought is that!—To be excelled by a WIFE too, in every part of praiſeworthy knowledge!—To take leſſons, to take inſtructions, from a WIFE!—More than deſpiſe me, ſhe herſelf has taken time to conſider whether ſhe does not hate me:—'I hate you, Lovelace, with 'my whole heart!' ſaid ſhe to me but yeſterday, 'My ſoul is above thee, man! Urge 'me not to tell thee, how ſincerely I think my 'ſoul above thee!'—How poor indeed was I then, even in my own heart!—So viſible a ſuperiority, to ſo proud a ſpirit as mine!—And here from below, from BELOW indeed! from theſe women! I am ſo goaded on—

Yet 'tis poor too, to think myſelf a machine in the hands of ſuch wretches.—I am no machine.—Lovelace, thou art baſe to thyſelf, but to ſuppoſe thyſelf a machine.

But having gone thus far, I ſhould be unhappy, if after marriage, in the petulance of ill humour, I had it to reproach myſelf, that I did not try her to the utmoſt. And yet I don't know how it is, but this lady, the moment I come into her preſence, half-aſſimilates me to her own virtue.—Once or twice (to ſay nothing of her triumph over me on Sunday night) I was prevailed upon to fluſter myſelf, with an intention to make ſome advances, which, if obliged to recede, I might lay upon raiſed ſpirits: but the inſtant I beheld her, I was ſoberized into awe and reverence; and the majeſty of her even viſible purity firſt damped, and then extinguiſhed, my double flame.

What a ſurprizingly powerful effect, ſo much and ſo long in my power ſhe! ſo inſtigated by ſome of her own ſex, and ſo ſtimulated by paſſion, I!—How can this be accounted for, in a Lovelace?

But, what a heap of ſtuff have I written!—How have I been run away with!—By what?—Canſt thou ſay, by what?—O thou lurking varletes, CONSCIENCE?—Is it thou, that haſt thus made me of party againſt myſelf?—How cameſt thou in?—In what diſguiſe, thou egregious haunter of my more agreeable hours?—Stand thou, with fate, but neuter in this controverſy; and, if I cannot do credit to human nature, and to the female ſex, by bringing down ſuch an angel as this to claſs with, and adorn it, (for adorn it ſhe does in her very foibles) then I am all yours, and never will reſiſt you more.

Here I aroſe. I ſhook myſelf. The window was open. Away the trouble-ſome boſom-viſitor, the intruder, is flown.—I ſee it yet!—I ſee it yet!—And now it leſſens to my aching eye!—And now the cleft air is cloſed after it, and it is out of ſight!—And once more I am ROBERT LOVELACE.

LETTER XXXVII.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

TUESDAY, MAY 23.

WELL did I, and but juſt in time, conclude to have done with Mrs. Fretchville and the houſe: for here Mennell has declared, that he cannot in conſcience and honour go any farther.—He would not for the world be acceſſary to the deceiving of ſuch a lady!—I was a fool to let either you or him ſee her; for ever ſince ye have both had ſcruples, which neither would have had, were a woman to have been in the queſtion.

Well, I can't help it!

Mennell has, however, though with ſome reluctance, conſented to write me a letter, provided I will allow it to be the laſt ſtep he ſhall take in this affair.

I preſumed, I told him, that if I could cauſe Mrs. Fretchville's woman to ſupply his place, he would have no objection to that.

'None,' he ſays—'But is it not pity—'

A pitiful fellow! Such a ridiculous kind of pity his, as thoſe ſilly ſouls have, who would not kill an innocent chicken for the world; but when killed to their hands, are always the moſt greedy devourers of it.

Now this letter gives the ſervant the ſmall-pox: and ſhe has given it to her unhappy vapouriſh lady. Vapouriſh people are perpetual ſubjects for diſeaſes to work upon. Name but the malady, and it is theirs in a moment. Ever fitted for inoculation.—The phyſical tribe's milch-cows.—A vapouriſh or ſplenetick patient is a fiddle for the doctors; and they are eternally playing upon it. Sweet muſick does it make them. All their difficulty, except a caſe extraordinary happens, (as poor Mrs. Fretchville's, who has realized her apprehenſions) is but to hold their countenance, while their patient is drawing up a bill of indictment againſt himſelf—and when they have heard it, proceed to puniſh:—the right word for preſcribe. Why ſhould they not, when the criminal has confeſſed his guilt?—And puniſh they generally do with a vengeance.

Yet, ſilly toads too, now I think of it. For why, when they know they cannot do good, may they not as well endeavour to gratify, as to naufeate, the patient's palate?

Were I a phyſician, I'd get all the trade to myſelf: for Malvoſey, and Cyprus, and the generous product of the Cape, a little diſguiſed, ſhould be my principal doſes: as theſe would create new ſpirits, how would the revived patient covet the phyſick, and adore the doctor!

Give all the paraders of the faculty whom thou knoweſt, this hint.—There could but one inconvenience ariſe from it. The APOTHECARIES would find their medicines coſt them ſomething: but the demand for quantities would anſwer that; ſince the honeſt NURSE would be the patient's taſter; perpetually requiring repetition of the laſt cordial julap.

Well, but to the letter—Yet what need of further explanation after the hints in my former? The widow can't be removed, and that's enough: and Mennel's work is over; and his conſcience left to plague him for his own ſins, and not another man's: and, very poſſibly, plague enough will give him for thoſe.

This letter is directed, 'To Robert 'Lovelace, Eſq. or, in his abſence, To his 'lady.' She had refuſed dining with me, or ſeeing me: and I was out when it came. She opened it: ſo is my lady by her own conſent, proud and ſaucy as ſhe is.

I am glad at my heart that it came before we entirely make up. She would elſe perhaps have concluded it to be contrived for a delay: and now, moreover, we can accommodate our old and new quarrels together; and that's contrivance, you know. But how is her dear haughty heart humbled to what it was when I knew her firſt, that ſhe can apprehend any delays from me; and have nothing to do but to vex at them!

I came in to dinner. She ſent me down the letter, deſiring my excuſe for opening it.—Did it before ſhe was aware. Lady-pride, Belford! — Recollection, then retrogradation!

I requeſted to ſee her upon it that moment.—But ſhe deſires to ſuſpend our interview till morning. I will bring her to own, before I have done with her, that ſhe can't ſee me too often.

My impatience was ſo great, on an occaſion ſo unexpected, that I could not help writing to tell her, how much vexed I was at the accident; but that it need not delay my happy day, as that did not depend upon the houſe. [She knew that before, ſhe'll think; and ſo did I:] and as Mrs. Fretchville, by Mr. Mennel, ſo handſomely expreſſed her concern upon it, and her wiſhes that it could ſuit us to bear with the unavoidable delay, I hoped, that going down to the Lawn for two or three of the ſummer-months, when I was made the happieſt of men, would be favourable to all round.

The dear creature takes this incident to heart, I believe: ſhe has ſent word to my repeated requeſts to ſee her notwithſtanding her denial, that ſhe cannot till the morning. It ſhall be then at ſix o'clock, if I pleaſe!

To be ſure I do pleaſe!

Can ſee her but once a day now, Jack!

Did I tell thee, that I wrote a letter to my couſin Montague, wondering that I heard not from Lord M. as the ſubject was ſo very intereſting? In it I acquainted her with the houſe I was about taking; and with Mrs. Fretchville's vapouriſh delays.

I was very loth to engage my own family, either man or woman in this affair; but I muſt take my meaſures ſecurely: and already they all think as bad of me as they well can. You obſerve by my Lord M.'s letter to yourſelf, that the well-manner'd peer is afraid I ſhould play this admirable creature one of my uſual dog's tricks.

I have received juſt now an anſwer from Charlotte.

Charlotte i'n't well. A ſtomach diſorder!

No wonder a girl's ſtomach ſhould plague her. A ſingle woman; that's it. When ſhe has a man to plague, it will have have ſomething beſides itſelf to prey upon. Knoweſt thou not moreover, that man is the woman's ſun; woman is the man's earth?—How dreary, how deſolate, the earth, that the ſun ſhines not upon!

Poor Charlotte! But I heard ſhe was not well: that encouraged me to write to her; and to expreſs myſelf a little concerned, that ſhe had not of her own accord thought of a viſit in town to my charmer.

Here follows a copy of her letter. Thou wilt ſee by it, that every little monkey is to catechiſe me. They all depend upon my good-nature.

'M. HALL, MAY 22.

'DEAR COUSIN,

'WE have been in daily hope for a 'long time, I muſt call it, of hearing 'that the happy knot was tied. My lord 'has been very much out of order: and 'yet nothing would ſerve him, but he 'would himſelf write an anſwer to your 'letter. It was the only opportunity he 'ſhould ever have, perhaps, to throw in 'a little good advice to you, with the 'hope of its being of any ſignification; 'and he has been ſeveral hours in a day, 'as his gout would let him, buſied in it. 'It wants now only his laſt reviſal. He 'hopes it will have the greater weight 'with you, if it appear all in his own 'hand-writing.

'Indeed, Mr. Lovelace, his worthy 'heart is wrapt up in you. I wiſh you 'loved yourſelf but half as well. But 'I believe too, that if all the family 'loved you leſs, you would love your-'ſelf more.

'His lordſhip has been very buſy, at 'the times he could not write, in con-'ſulting Pritchard about thoſe eſtates, 'which he propoſes to tranſfer to you 'on the happy occaſion, that he may 'anſwer your letter in the moſt accept-'able manner; and ſhew, by effects, 'how kindly he takes your invitation. 'I aſſure you, he is mighty proud of 'it.

'As for myſelf, I am not at all well, 'and have not been for ſome weeks paſt, 'with my old ſtomach-diſorder. I had 'certainly elſe before now have done 'myſelf the honour you wonder I have 'not done myſelf. Lady Betty, who 'would have accompanied me, (for we 'had laid it out) has been exceedingly 'buſy in her law-affair; her antagoniſt, 'who is actually on the ſpot, having been 'making propoſals for an accommoda-'tion. But you may aſſure yourſelf, 'that when our dear relation-elect ſhall 'be entered upon the new habitation you 'tell me of, we will do ourſelves the 'honour of viſiting her; and if any de-'lay ariſes from the dear lady's want of 'courage, (which, conſidering her man, 'let me tell you, may very well be) we 'will endeavour to inſpire her with it, 'and be ſponſors for you;—for, couſin, 'I believe you have need to be chriſten-'ed over again, before you are entitled 'to ſo great a bleſſing. What think 'you?

'Juſt now, my lord tells me, he will 'diſpatch a man on purpoſe with his let-'ter to-morrow: ſo I needed not to have 'written. But now I have, let it go; 'and by Empſon, who ſets out directly 'on his return to town.

'My beſt compliments, and ſiſter's, to 'the moſt deſerving lady in the world, '[you will need no other direction to the 'perſon meant] conclude me your affec-'tionate couſin and ſervant,

'CHARL. MONTAGUE.

Thou ſeeſt how ſeaſonably this letter comes. I hope my lord will write nothing but what I may ſhew to my beloved. I have actually ſent her up this letter of Charlotte's; and hope for happy effects from it. R. L.

The lady in her next letter gives Miſs Howe an account of what has paſſ'd between Mr. Lovelace and herſelf. She reſents his behaviour with her uſual dignity: but when ſhe comes to mention Mr. Mennell's letter, ſhe re-urges Miſs Howe to perfect her ſcheme for her deliverance; being reſolved to leave him. But, dating again, on his ſending up to her Miſs Montague's letter, ſhe alters her mind, and deſires her to ſuſpend for the preſent her application to Mrs. Townſend.

'I HAD begun,' ſays ſhe, 'to ſuſpect all 'he had ſaid of Mrs. Fretchville and her 'houſe; and even Mr. Mennell him-'ſelf, though ſo well-appearing a man. 'But now that I find Mr. Lovelace had 'apprized his relations of his intention 'to take it, and had engaged ſome of 'the ladies to viſit me there: I could 'hardly forbear blaming myſelf for cen-'ſuring him as capable of ſo vile an im-'poſture. But may he not thank him-'ſelf for acting ſo very unaccountably, 'and taking ſuch needleſsly-awry ſteps, 'as he has done; embarraſſing, as I 'told him, his own meanings, if they 'were good?'

LET-

LETTER XXXVIII.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 24.

He gives his friend an account of their interview that morning; and of the happy effects of his cousin Montague's letter in his favour. Her reserves, however, he tells him, are not absolutely banished. But this he imputes to form.

IT is not in the power of woman, says he, to be altogether sincere on these occasions. But why?—Do they think it so great a disgrace to be found out to be really what they are?

I regretted the illness of Mrs. Fretchville; as the intention I had to fix her dear self in the house before the happy knot was tied, would have set her in that independence in appearance, as well as fact, which was necessary to shew to all the world, that her choice was free; and as the ladies of my family would have been proud to make their court to her there; while the settlements and our equipages were preparing. But on any other account, there was no great matter in it; since, when my happy day was over, we could, with so much convenience, go down to the Lawn, to my Lord M.'s, and to Lady Sarah or Lady Betty's, in turn; which would give full time to provide ourselves with servants, and other accommodations.

How sweetly the charmer listened!

I asked her, If she had had the small-pox?

'Ten thousand pounds the worse in my 'estimation,' thought I, 'if she has not; 'for not one of her charming graces can 'I dispense with.'

'Twas always a doubtful point with her mother and Mrs. Norton, she owned. But although she was not afraid of it, she chose not unnecessarily to rush into places where it was.

'Right,' thought I—Else, I said, it would not have been amiss for her to see the house before she went into the country; for if she liked it not, I was not obliged to have it.

She asked, If she might take a copy of Miss Montague's letter?

I said, she might keep the letter itself, and send it to Miss Howe, if she pleased; for that, I supposed, was her intention.

She bowed her head to me.

There, Jack! I shall have her curtsey to me by-and-by, I question not. What a-devil had I to do, to terrify the sweet creature by my termagant projects!—Yet it was not amiss, I believe, to make her afraid of me, She says, I am an unpolite man—And every polite instance from such a one, is deemed a favour.

Talking of the settlements, I told her, I had rather that Pritchard (mentioned by my cousin Charlotte) had not been consulted on this occasion. Pritchard, indeed, was a very honest man; and had been for a generation in the family; and knew the estates, and the condition of them, better than either my lord or myself: but Pritchard, like other old men, was diffident and slow; and valued himself upon his skill as a draughts-man; and for the sake of that paltry reputation, must have all his forms preserved, were an imperial crown to depend upon his dispatch.

I kissed her unrepulsing hand no less than five times during this conversation. Lord, Jack, how my generous heart ran over!—She in a manner asked me leave to retire; to re-peruse Charlotte's letter.—I think she bent her knees to me; but I won't be sure.—How happy might we have been long ago, had the dear creature been always as complaisant to me! For I do love respect, and, whether I deserve it or not, always had it, till I knew this proud beauty.

And now, Belford, are we in a train, or the deuce is in it. Every fortified town has it's strong and it's weak place. I had carried on my attacks against the impregnable parts. I have no doubt but I shall either shine or smuggle her out of her cloak, since she and Miss Howe have intended to employ a smuggler against me.—All we wait for now is my lord's letter.

But I had like to have forgot to tell thee, that we have been not a little alarmed, by some enquires that have been made after me and my beloved, by a man of good appearance; who yesterday procured a tradesman in the neighbourhood to send for Dorcas: of whom he asked several questions relating to us; and particularly (as we boarded, and lodged in one house) whether we were married?

This has given my beloved great uneasiness. And I could not help observing upon it, to her, how right a thing it was, that we had given out below, that we were married. The enquiry, most probably, I said, was from her brother's quarter; and now perhaps that our marriage was owned, we should hear no more of his machinations. The person, it seems, was curious to know the day that the ceremony was performed. But Dorcas refused to give him any other par-particulars, than that we were married; and she was the more reserved, as he declined to tell her the motives of his enquiry.

LETTER XXXIX.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

MAY 24.

THE devil take this uncle of mine! He has at last sent me a letter, which I cannot shew, without exposing the head of our family for a fool. A confounded parcel of pop-guns has he let off upon me. I was in hopes he had exhausted his whole stock of this sort, in his letter to you.—To keep it back, to delay sending it, till he had recollected all this farrago of nonsense—Confound his wisdom of nations, if so much of it is to be scraped together, in disgrace of itself, to make one egregious simpleton! —But I am glad I am fortified with this piece of flagrant folly, however; since, in all human affairs, the convenient and inconvenient, the good and the bad, are so mingled, that there is no having the one without the other.

I have already offered the bill inclosed in it to my beloved; and read to her part of the letter. But she refused the bill: and as I am in cash myself, I shall return it. She seemed very desirous to peruse the whole letter. And when I told her, that were it not for exposing the writer, I would oblige her, she said, It would not be exposing his lordship to shew it to her; and that she always preferred the heart to the head. I knew her meaning; but did not thank her for it.

All that makes for me in it, I will transcribe for her—Yet hang it, she shall have the letter, and my soul with it, for one consenting kiss.

SHE has got the letter from me, without the reward. Deuce take me, if I had the courage to propose the condition. A new character this of bashfulness in thy friend. I see, that a truly modest woman may make even a confident man keep his distance. By my soul, Belford, I believe, that nine women in ten, who fall, fall either from their own vanity, or levity, or for want of circumspection, and proper reserves.

I DID intend to take my reward on her returning a letter so favourable to us both. But she sent it to me, sealed up, by Dorcas. I might have thought that there were two or three hints in it, that she would be too nice immediately to appear to. I send it to thee; and here will stop, to give thee time to read it. Return it as soon as thou hast perused it.

LETTER XL.

LORD M. TO ROBERT LOVELACE, ESQ.

TUESDAY, MAY 23.

IT is a long lane that has no turning—Do not despise me for my proverbs—You know I was always fond of them; and if you had been so too, it would have been the better for you, let me tell you. I dare swear, the fine lady you are so likely to be soon happy with, will be far from despising them; for I am told, that she writes well, and that all her letters are full of sentences. God convert you! for nobody but He and this lady can.

I have no manner of doubt now but that you will marry, as your father, and all your ancestors, did before you: else you would have had no title to be my heir; nor can your descendants have any title to be yours, unless they are legitimate; that's worth your remembrance, Sir!—No man is always a fool, every man is sometimes.—But your follies, I hope, are now at an end.

I know, you have vowed revenge against this fine lady's family: but no more of that, now. You must look upon them all as your relations; and forgive and forget. And when they see you make a good husband and a good father. [Which God send, for all our sakes!] they will wonder at their nonsensical antipathy, and beg your pardon: but while they think you a vile fellow, and a rake, how can they either love you, or excuse their daughter?

And methinks I could wish to give a word of comfort to the lady, who, doubtless, must be under great fears, how she shall be able to hold-in such a wild creature, as you have hitherto been. I would hint to her, that by strong arguments, and gentle words, she may do any-thing with you; for though you are apt to be hot, gentle words will cool you, and bring you into the temper that is necessary for your cure.

Would to God, my poor lady, your aunt, who is dead and gone, had been a proper patient for the same remedy! God rest her soul! No reflections upon her memory! Worth is best known by want! I know hers now; and if I had went first, she would by this time have known mine.

There is great wisdom in that saying, God send me a friend, that may tell me of my faults:

friends: if not, an enemy, and he will. Not that I am your enemy; and that you well know. The more noble any one is, the more humble: ſo bear with me, if you would be thought noble.—Am I not your uncle? And do I not deſign to be better to you than your father could be? Nay, I will be your father too, when the happy day comes; ſince you deſire it: and pray make my compliments to my dear niece; and tell her, I wonder much that ſhe has ſo long deferred your happineſs.

Pray let her know as that I will preſent HER (not you) either my Lancaſhire ſeat, or The Lawn in Hertfordſhire, and ſettle upon her a thouſand pounds a year penny-rents; to ſhew her, that we are not a family to take baſe advantages: and you may have writings drawn, and ſettle as you will.—Honeſt Pritchard has the rent-roll of both theſe eſtates; and as he has been a good old ſervant, I recommend him to your lady's favour. I have already conſulted him: he will tell you what is beſt for you, and moſt pleaſing to me.

I am ſtill very bad with the gout, but will come in a litter, as ſoon as the day is fixed: it would be the joy of my heart to join your hands! And let me tell you, if you do not make the beſt of huſbands to ſo good a young lady, and one who has had ſo much courage for your ſake, I will renounce you, and ſettle all I can upon her and hers by you, and leave you out of the queſtion.

If any-thing be wanting for your further ſecurity, I am ready to give it; though you know, that my word has always been looked upon as my bond. And when the Harlowes know all this, let us ſee whether they are able to bluſh, and take ſhame to themſelves.

Lady Sarah and Lady Betty want only to know the day, to make all the country round them blaze, and all their tenants mad. And if any-one of mine be ſober upon the occaſion, Pritchard ſhall eject him. And, on the birth of the firſt child, if a ſon, I will do ſomething more for you, and repeat all our rejoicings.

I ought indeed to have written ſooner. But I knew, that if you thought me long, and were in haſte, as to your nuptials, you would write and tell me ſo. But my gout was very troubleſome: and I am but a ſlow writer, you know, at beſt: for compoſing is a thing, that though formerly I was very ready at it, (as my Lord Lexington uſed to ſay;) yet having left it off a great while, I am not ſo now. And I choſe, on this occaſion, to write all out of my own head and memory: and to give you my beſt advice; for I may never have ſuch an opportunity again. You have had [God mend you!] a ſtrange way of turning your back upon all I have ſaid: this once, I hope, you will be more attentive to the advice I give you for your own good.

I had ſtill another end; nay, two other ends.

The one was, That now you are upon the borders of wedlock, as I may ſay, and all your wild oats will be ſown, I would give you ſome inſtructions as to your publick as well as private behaviour in life; which, intending you ſo much good as I do, you ought to hear; and perhaps would never have liſtened to, on any leſs extraordinary occaſion.

The ſecond is, That your dear lady-elect (who is, it ſeems, herſelf ſo fine and ſo ſententious a writer) will ſee by this, that it is not our faults, nor for want of the beſt advice, that you was not a better man than you have hitherto been.

And now, in a few words, for the conduct I would wiſh you to follow in publick, as well as in private, if you would think me worthy of adviſing.—It ſhall be ſhort; ſo be not uneaſy.

As to the private life: Love your lady as ſhe deſerves. Let your actions praiſe you. Be a good huſband; and ſo give the lie to all your enemies; and make them aſhamed of their ſcandals. And let us have pride in ſaying, that Miſs Harlowe had not done either herſelf or family any diſcredit by coming among us. Do this; and I, and Lady Sarah, and Lady Betty, will love you for ever.

As to your publick conduct—This as follows is what I could wiſh: but I reckon your lady's wiſdom will put us both right—No diſparagement, Sir; ſince with all your wit, you have not hitherto ſhewn much wiſdom, you know.

Get into parliament as ſoon as you can: for you have talents to make a great figure there. Who ſo proper to aſſiſt in making new holding laws, as thoſe whom no laws in being could hold?

Then, for ſo long as you will give attendance in St. Stephen's Chapel—It's being called a chapel, I hope, will not diſguſt you: I am ſure I have known many a riot there:—a ſpeaker has a hard time of it! But we peers have more decorum—But what was I going to ſay?—I muſt go back.

For ſo long as you will give your attendance tendance in parliament, for ſo long will you be out of miſchief; out of private miſchief, at leaſt: and may St. Stephen's fate be yours, if you wilfully do publick miſchief!

When a new election comes, you will have two or three boroughs, you know, to chuſe out of,—but if you ſtay till then, I had rather you were for the ſhire.

You will have intereſt enough, I am ſure; and being ſo handſome a man, the women will make their huſbands vote for you.

I ſhall long to read your ſpeeches. I expect you will ſpeak, if occaſion offer, the very firſt day. You want no courage; and think highly enough of yourſelf, and lowly enough of every body elſe, to ſpeak on all occaſions.

As to the methods of the houſe, you have ſpirit enough, I fear, to be too much above them: take care of that.—I don't ſo much fear your want of good-manners. To men, you want no decency, if they don't provoke you: as to that, I wiſh you only to learn to be as patient of contradiction from others, as you would have other people be to you.

Although I would not have you to be a courtier; neither would I have you to be a malcontent. I remember (for I have it down) what my old friend Archibald Hutcheſon ſaid; and it was a very good ſaying—(to Mr. Secretary Craggs, I think, it was)—'I look upon an adminiſtration, as entitled to every vote, 'I can with good conſcience give it; for 'a Houſe of Commons ſhould not needleſsly put drags upon the wheels of 'government: and when I have not 'given it my vote, it was with regret: 'and for my country's ſake, I wiſhed 'with all my heart, the meaſure had 'been ſuch as I could have approved.'

And another ſaying he had, which was this; 'Neither can an oppoſition, nei-'ther can a miniſtry be always wrong. 'To be a plumb man therefore with ei-'ther, is an infallible mark, that that 'man muſt mean more and worſe than 'he will own he does mean.'

Are theſe ſayings bad, Sir? Are they to be deſpiſed?—Well then, why ſhould I be deſpiſed for remembering them, and quoting them, as I love to do? Let me tell you, if you loved my company more than you do, you would not be the worſe for it. I may ſay ſo without any vanity; ſince it is other men's wiſdom, and not my own, that I am fond of.

But to add a word or two more on this occaſion; and I may never have ſuch another; for you muſt read this through—Love honeſt men, and herd with them in the houſe and out of the houſe; by whatever names they be dignified or diſtinguiſhed; Keep good men company, and you ſhall be of their number. But did I, or did I not, write this before?—Writing at ſo many different times, and ſuch a quantity, one may forget.

You may come in for the title when I am dead and gone—God help me!—So I would have you keep an equilibrium. If once you get the name of being a fine ſpeaker, you may have any-thing, and, to be ſure, you have naturally a good deal of elocution; a tongue that would delude an angel, as the women ſay—To their ſorrow, ſome of them, poor creatures!—A leading man in the Houſe of Commons is a very important character; becauſe that houſe has the giving of money: and money makes the mare to go; aye, and queens and kings too, ſometimes, to go in a manner very different from what they might otherwiſe chuſe to go, let me tell you.

However, methinks, I would not have you take a place neither—It will double your value, and your intereſt, if it be believed, that you will not: for, as you will then ſtand in no man's way, you will have no envy; but pure ſterling reſpect; and both ſides will court you.

For your part, you will not want a place, as ſome others do, to piece up their broken fortunes. If you can now live reputably upon two thouſand pounds a year, it will be hard if you cannot hereafter live upon ſeven or eight—Leſs you will not have, if you oblige me; as now by marrying ſo fine a lady, very much you will—And all this over and above Lady Betty's and Lady Sarah's favours! What in the name of wonder, could poſſibly poſſeſs the proud Harlowes!—That ſon, that ſon of theirs!—But, for his dear ſiſter's ſake, I will ſay no more of him.

I never was offered a place myſelf: and the only one I would have taken, had I been offered it, was maſter of the buckhounds; for I loved hunting when I was young; and it carries a good ſound with it for us who live in the country. Often have I thought of that excellent old adage; He that eats the king's gooſe, ſhall be choaked with his feathers. I wiſh to the Lord, this was thoroughly conſidered by place-hunters! It would be better for them, and for their poor families.

I could ſay a great deal more, and all equally to the purpoſe. But really I am tired; and ſo I doubt are you. And beſides, ſides, I would reſerve ſomething for converſation.

My nieces Montague, and Lady Sarah, and Lady Betty, join in compliments to my niece that is to be. If ſhe would chuſe to have the knot tied among us, pray tell her that we ſhall ſee it ſecurely done: and we will make all the country ring and blaze for a week together. But ſo I believe I ſaid before.

If any-thing farther may be needful toward promoting your reciprocal felicity, let me know it; and how you order about the day; and all that. The incloſed bill is very much at your ſervice. 'Tis payable at ſight, as whatever elſe you may have occaſion for, ſhall be.

So God bleſs you both; and make things as convenient to my gout as you can; though be it whenever it will, I will hobble to you; for I long to ſee you; and ſtill more to ſee my niece; and am (in expectation of that happy opportunity) your moſt affectionate uncle,

LETTER XLI.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

THURSDAY, MAY 25.

THOU ſeeſt, Belford, how we now drive before the wind.—The dear creature now comes almoſt at the firſt word, whenever I deſire the honour of her company. I told her laſt night, that apprehending delay from Pritchard's ſlowneſs, I was determined to leave it to my lord to make his compliments in his own way; and had actually that afternoon put my writings into the hands of a very eminent lawyer, counſellor Williams, with directions for him to draw up ſettlements from my own eſtate, and conformable to thoſe of my mother; which I put into his hands at the ſame time. It had been, I aſſured her, no ſmall part of my concern, that her frequent diſpleaſure, and our mutual miſapprehenſions, had hindered me from adviſing with her before on this ſubject. 'Indeed, indeed, my deareſt life,' ſaid I, 'you have hitherto afforded me but a 'very thorny courtſhip.'

She was ſilent. Kindly ſilent. For well know I, that ſhe could have recriminated upon me with vengeance. But I was willing to ſee, if ſhe were not loth to diſoblige me now. I comforted myſelf, I ſaid, with the hopes, that all my difficulties were now over, and that every paſt diſobligation would be buried in oblivion.

Now, Belford, I have actually depoſited theſe writings with counſellor Williams; and I expect the draughts in a week at fartheſt. So ſhall be doubly armed. For if I attempt and fail, theſe will be ready to throw in, to make her have patience with me till I can try again.

I have more contrivances ſtill in embryo. I could tell thee of an hundred, and yet hold another hundred in petto, to pop in as I go along, to excite thy ſurprize, and to keep up thy attention. Nor rave thou at me; but, if thou art my friend, think of Miſs Howe's letters, and of her ſmuggling ſcheme. All owing to my fair captive's informations and incitements. Am I not a villain, a fool, a Beelzebub, with them already?—Yet no harm done by me, nor ſo much as attempted?

Every-thing of this nature, the dear creature anſwered (with a downcaſt eye, and a bluſhing cheek) ſhe left to me.

I propoſed my lord's chapel for the celebration, where we might have the preſence of Lady Betty, Lady Sarah, and my two couſins Montague.

She ſeemed not to favour a publick celebration; and waved the ſubject for the preſent. I doubted not but ſhe would be as willing as I, to decline a publick wedding; ſo I preſſed not this matter farther juſt then.

But patterns I actually produced; and a jeweller was to bring as this day ſeveral ſets of jewels for her choice. But the patterns ſhe would not open. She ſighed at the mention of them: the ſecond patterns, ſhe ſaid, that had been offered to her. And very peremptorily forbid the jeweller's coming, as well as declined my offer of cauſing my mother's to be new-ſet at leaſt for the preſent.

I do aſſure thee, Belford, I was in earneſt in all this. My whole eſtate is nothing to me, put in competition with her hoped-for favour.

She then told me, that ſhe had put into writing her opinion of my general propoſals; and there had expreſſed her mind, as to cloaths and jewels: but on my ſtrange behaviour to her (for no cauſe that ſhe knew of) on Sunday night, ſhe had torn the paper in two.

I earneſtly preſſed her to let me be favoured with a ſight of this paper, torn as it was. And after ſome heſitation, ſhe withdrew, and ſent it to me by Dorcas.

I peruſed it again. It was in a manner new to me, though I had read it ſo lately: and by my ſoul, I could hardly ſtand it. An hundred admirable creatures I called her to myself. But I charge thee, write not a word to me in her favour, if thou meaneſt her well; for if I ſpare her, it muſt be all ex mero motu.

You may eaſily ſuppoſe, when I was re-admitted to her preſence, that I ran over in her praiſes, and in vows of gratitude and everlaſting love. But here's the devil; ſhe ſtill receives all I ſay with reſerve; or if it be not with reſerve, ſhe receives it ſo much as her due, that ſhe is not at all raiſed by it. Some women are undone by praiſe, by flattery. I myſelf, a man, am proud of praiſe. Perhaps thou wilt ſay, that thoſe are moſt proud of it, who leaſt deſerve it; as thoſe are of riches and grandeur, who are not born to either. I own that to be ſuperior to thoſe foibles, it requires a ſoul. Have I not then a ſoul?—Surely, I have.—Let me then be conſidered as an exception to this rule.

Now have I foundation to go upon in my terms. My lord, in the exuberance of his generoſity, mentions a thouſand pounds a year penny-rents. This I know, that were I to marry this lady, he would rather ſettle upon her all he has a mind to ſettle, than upon me. He has even threatened, that if I prove not a good huſband to her, he will leave all he can at his death from me to her. Yet conſiders not that a woman ſo perfect can never be diſpleaſed with her huſband but to his diſgrace; for who will blame her?—Another reaſon, why a LOVELACE ſhould not wiſh to marry a CLARISSA.

But what a pretty fellow of an uncle is this fooliſh peer, to think to make a wife independent of her emperor, and a rebel of courſe; yet ſmarted himſelf for an error of this kind!

My beloved, in her torn paper, mentions but two hundred pounds a year for her ſeparate uſe. I inſiſted upon her naming a larger ſum. She ſaid, it might then be three; and I, for fear ſhe ſhould ſuſpect very large offers, named only five; but added the entire diſpoſal of all arrears in her father's hands, for the benefit of Mrs. Norton, or whom ſhe pleaſed.

She ſaid that the good woman would be uneaſy if any-thing more than a competency were done for her. She was for ſuiting all her diſpoſitions of this kind, ſhe ſaid, to the uſual way of life of the perſon. To go beyond it, was but to put the benefited upon projects, or to make them awkward in a new ſtate; when they might ſhine in that to which they were accuſtomed. And to put it into ſo good a mother's power to give her ſon a beginning in his buſineſs at a proper time; yet to leave her ſomething for herſelf to ſet her above want, or above the neceſſity of taking back from her child what ſhe had been enabled to beſtow upon him; would be the height of ſuch a worthy parent's ambition.

Here's prudence! here's judgment in ſo young a creature! How do I hate the Harlowes for producing ſuch an angel!—O why, why did ſhe refuſe my ſincere addreſs to tie the knot before we came to this houſe!

But yet, what mortifies my pride is, that this exalted creature, if I were to marry her, would not be governed in her behaviour to me by love, but by generoſity merely, or by blind duty; and had rather live ſingle than be mine.

I cannot bear this. I would have the woman, whom I honour with my name, if ever I confer this honour upon any, forego even her ſuperior duties for me. I would have her look after me when I go out as far as ſhe can ſee me, as my roſe-bud after her Johnny; and meet me at my return with rapture. I would be the ſubject of her dreams, as well as of her waking thoughts. I would have her think every moment loſt, that is not paſſed with me: ſing to me, read to me, play to me, when I pleaſed; no joy ſo great as in obeying me. When I ſhould be inclined to love, overwhelm me with it; when to be ſerious or ſolitary, if apprehenſive of intruſion, retiring at a nod; approaching me only if I ſmiled encouragement: ſteal not into my preſence with ſilence; out of it, if not noticed, on tiptoe. Be a Lady Eaſy to all my pleaſures, and valuing thoſe moſt who moſt contribnted to them; only ſighing in private, that it was not herſelf at the time. Thus of old did the contending wives of the honeſt patriarchs; each recommending her handmaid to her lord, as ſhe thought it would oblige him, and looking upon the genial product as her own.

The gentle Waller ſays, Women are born to be controul'd. Gentle as he was, he knew that. A tyrant huſband makes a dutiful wife. And why do the ſex love rakes, but becauſe they know how to direct their uncertain wills, and manage them?

ANOTHER agreeable converſation. The day of days the ſubject. As to fixing a particular one, that need not be done, my charmer ſays, till the ſettlements are completed. And as to marrying at my lord's chapel, the ladies of my family present, that would be making a publick affair of it; and the dear creature observed with regret, that it seemed to be my lord's intention to make it so.

It could not be imagined, I said, but that his lordship's setting out in a litter, and coming to town, as well as his taste for glare, and the joy he would take to see me married at last, and to her dear self, would give it as much the air of a publick marriage, as if the ceremony were performed at his own chapel, all the ladies present.

'I cannot,' said she, 'endure the 'thoughts of a publick day. It will car-'ry with it an air of insult upon my 'whole family. And for my part, if 'my lord will not take it amiss, [And 'perhaps he will not, as the motion 'came not from himself but from you, 'Mr Lovelace] I will very willingly 'dispense with his lordship's presence; 'the rather, as dress and appearance will 'then be unnecessary; for I cannot bear 'to think of decking my person while 'my parents are in tears.'

How excellent this! Yet do not her parents richly deserve to be in tears?

See, Belford, with so charming a niceness, we might have been long time ago upon the verge of the state, and yet found a great deal to do, before we entered into it.

All obedience, all resignation—No will but hers. I withdrew, and wrote directly to my lord; and she not disapproving of it, I sent it away. The purport as follows? for I took no copy.

That I was much obliged to his lordship for his intended goodness to me, on an occasion the most solemn of my life. That the admirable lady, whom he so justly praised, thought his lordship's proposals in her favour too high. That she chose not to make a publick appearance, if, without disobliging my friends, she could avoid it, till a reconciliation with her own could be effected. That although she expressed a grateful sense of his lordship's consent to give her to me with his own hand; yet presuming, that the motive to this kind intention was rather to do her honour, than it otherwise would have been his own choice, (especially as travelling would be at this time so inconvenient to him) she thought it advisable to save his lordship trouble on this occasion; and hoped he would take as meant her declining the favour.

That the Lawn will be most acceptable to us both to retire to; and the rather, as it is so to his lordship.

But, if he pleases, the jointure may be made from my own estate; leaving to his lordship's goodness the alternative.

I conclude with telling him, That I had offered to present the lady his lordship's bill; but on her declining to accept of it, (having myself no present occasion for it) I return it inclosed, with my thanks, &c.

And is not this going a plaguy length? What a figure should I make in rakish annals, if at last I should be caught in my own gin?

The sex may say what they will, but a poor innocent fellow had need to take great care of himself, when he dances upon the edge of the matrimonial precipice. Many a faint-hearted man, when he began in jest, or only designed to ape gallantry, has been forced into earnest, by being over-prompt, and taken at his word, not knowing how to own that he meant less than the lady meant. I am the better enabled to judge that this must have been the case of many a sneaking varlet; because I, who know the female world as well as any man in it of my standing, am so frequently in doubt of myself, and know not what to make of the matter.

Then these little sly rogues, how they lie couchant, ready to spring upon us harmless fellows the moment we are in their reach!—When the ice is once broken for them, how swiftly can they make to port—Mean time, the subject they can least speak to, they most think of. Nor can you talk of the ceremony before they have laid out in their minds how it is all to be. Little saucy-face designers! how first they draw themselves in, then us!

But be all these things as they will, Lord M. never in his life received so handsome a letter as this from his nephew

LOVELACE.

The lady, after having given to Miss Howe the particulars contained in Mr. Lovelace's last letter, thus expresses herself:

'A PRINCIPAL consolation arising 'from these favourable appearances, is, 'that I, who have now but one only 'friend, shall most probably, and if it 'be not my own fault, have as many 'new ones as there are persons in Mr. 'Lovelace's family; and this whether 'Mr. Lovelace treat me kindly or not. 'And who knows, but that by degrees, 'those new friends, by their rank and 'merit, may have weight enough to get 'me restored to the favour of my relati'ons?

'ons? Till which can be effected, I shall 'not be tolerably easy. Happy I never 'expect to be. Mr. Lovelace's mind 'and mine are vastly different; different 'essentials.

'But as matters are at present circum-'stanced, I pray you, my dear friend, 'to keep to yourself every-thing that 'might bring discredit to him, if reveal-'ed.—Better any-body expose a man 'than a wife, if I am to be his; and 'what is said by you will be thought to 'come from me.

'It shall be my constant prayer, that 'all the felicities which this world can 'afford, may be yours: and that the 'Almighty will never suffer you nor 'yours, to the remotest posterity, to 'want such a friend as my Anna Howe 'has been to her 'CL. HARLOWE.'

LETTER XLII.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

AND now, that my beloved seems secure in my net, for my project upon the vixen Miss Howe, and upon her mother: in which the officious prancer Hickman is to come in for a dash.

'But why upon her mother,' methinks thou askest; 'who, unknown to herself, 'has only acted, by thy impulse, through 'thy agent Joseph Leman, upon the 'folly of old Tony the uncle?'

No matter for that: she believes she acts upon her own judgment; and deserves to be punished for pretending to judgment, when she has none.—Every living soul, but myself, I can tell thee, shall be punished, that treats either cruelly or disrespectfully so adored a lady.—What a plague! is it not enough that she is teazed and tormented in person by me?

I have already broken the matter to our three confederates; as a supposed, not a resolved on case indeed. And yet they know, that with me, in a piece of mischief, execution with it's swiftest feet, is seldom three paces behind projection, which hardly ever limps neither.

MOWBRAY is not against it. It is a scheme, he says, worthy of us: and we have not done any-thing for a good while, that has made a noise.

BELTON indeed hesitates a little, because matters go wrong between him and his Thomasine; and the poor fellow has not the courage to have his sore place probed to the bottom.

TOURVILLE has started a fresh game, and shrugs his shoulders, and should not chuse to go abroad at present, if I please. For I apprehend that (from the nature of the project) there will be a kind of necessity to travel, till all is blown over.

TO ME, one country is as good as another; and I shall soon, I suppose, chuse to quit this paltry island; except the mistress of my fate will consent to cohabit at home; and so lay me under no necessity of surprizing her into foreign parts. TRAVELLING, thou knowest, gives the sexes charming opportunities of being familiar with one another. A very few days and nights must now decide all matters betwixt me and my fair inimitable.

DOLEMAN, who can act in these causes only as chamber-counsel, will inform us by pen and ink, [his right-hand and right-side having not yet been struck, and the other side beginning to be sensible] of all that shall occur in our absence.

As for THEE, we had rather have thy company than not; for, although thou art a wretched fellow at contrivance, yet art thou intrepid at execution. But as thy present engagements make thy attendance uncertain, I am not for making thy part necessary to our scheme; but for leaving thee to come after us when abroad. I know thou canst not long live without us.

The project, in short, is this:—Mrs. Howe has an elder sister in the Isle of Wight, who is lately a widow; and I am well informed, that the mother and daughter have engaged, before the latter is married, to pay a visit to this lady, who is rich, and intends Miss for her heiress; and in the interim will make her some valuable presents on her approaching nuptials; which, as Mrs. Howe, who loves money more than any-thing but herself, told one of my acquaintance, would be worth fetching.

Now, Jack, nothing more need be done, than to hire a little trim vessel, which shall sail a pleasuring backward and forward to Portsmouth, Spithead, and the Isle of Wight, for a week or fortnight before we enter upon our parts of the plot. And as Mrs. Howe will be for making the best bargain she can for her passage, the master of the vessel may have orders (as a perquisite allowed him by his owners) to take what she will give: and the master's name, be it what you will, shall be Ganmore on the occasion; for I know a rogue of that name, who is not obliged to be of any country, any more than we.

Well

Well, then, we will imagine them on board. I will be there in diſguiſe. They know not any of ye four—ſuppoſing (the ſcheme ſo inviting) that thou canſt be one.

'Tis plaguy hard, if we cannot find, or make a ſtorm.

Perhaps they will be ſea-ſick: but whether they be or not, no doubt they will keep their cabin.

Here will be Mrs. Howe, Miſs Howe, Mr. Hickman, a maid, and a footman, I ſuppoſe; and thus we will order it:

I know it will be hard weather: I know it will: and before there can be the leaſt ſuſpicion of the matter, we ſhall be in ſight of Guernſey, Jerſey, Dieppe, Cherbourg, or any-whither on the French coaſt that it ſhall pleaſe us to agree with the winds to blow us: and then, ſecuring the footman, and the women being ſeparated, one of us, according to lots that may be caſt, ſhall overcome, either by perſuaſion or force, the maid-ſervant: that will be no hard taſk; and ſhe is a likely wench: [I have ſeen her often] one, Mrs. Howe; nor can there be much difficulty there; for ſhe is full of health and life; and has been long a widow: another, ['That,' ſays the princely lion, 'muſt be I!'] the ſaucy daughter; who will be too much frighted to make great reſiſtance: [Violent ſpirits, in that ſex, are ſeldom true ſpirits—'Tis but where they can.]—and after beating about the coaſt for three or four days for recreation's ſake, and to make ſure work, and till we ſee our ſullen birds begin to eat and ſip, we will ſet them all on ſhore where it will be moſt convenient; ſell the veſſel, [To Mrs. Townſend's agents, with all my heart, or to ſome other ſmugglers] or give it to Ganmore; and purſue our travels, and tarry abroad till all is huſhed up.

Now I know thou wilt make difficulties, as it is thy way; while it is mine to conquer them. My other vaſſals made theirs; and I condeſcended to obviate them: as thus I will thine, firſt ſtating them for thee according to what I know of thy phlegm.

'What,' in the firſt place, wilt thou aſk, 'ſhall be done with Hickman? who 'will be in full parade of dreſs and 'primneſs, in order to ſhew the old 'aunt what a deviliſh clever fellow of a 'nephew ſhe is to have.'

What!—I'll tell thee—Hickman, in good manners, will leave the women in their cabin—and, to ſhew his courage with his breeding, be upon deck.

'Well, and ſuppoſe he is?'

Suppoſe he is!—Why then I hope it is eaſy for Ganmore, or any-body elſe, myſelf ſuppoſe in my pea-jacket and great watch-coat, (if any other make a ſcruple to do it) while he ſtands in the way, gaping and ſtaring like a novice, to ſtumble againſt him, and puſh him overboard!—A rich thought!—Is it not, Belford?—He is certainly plaguy officious in the ladies correſpondence; and, I am informed, plays double between mother and daughter, in fear of both. —Doſt not ſee him, Jack?—I do—popping up and down, his wig and hat floating by him; and paddling, pawing, and daſhing, like a frighted mongrel—I am afraid he never ventured to learn to ſwim.

'But thou wilt not drown the poor 'fellow; wilt thou?'

No, no!—That is not neceſſary to the project—I hate to do miſchiefs ſupererogatory. The ſkiff ſhall be ready to ſave him, while the veſſel keeps it's courſe: he ſhall be ſet on ſhore with the loſs of wig and hat only, and of half of his little wits, at the place where he embarked, or any-where elſe.

'Well, but ſhall we not be in danger 'of being hanged for three ſuch enor-'mous rapes, although Hickman ſhould 'eſcape with only a bellyfull of ſea-'water?'

Yes, to be ſure, when caught—But is there any likelihood of that?—Beſides, have we not been in danger before now for worſe facts?—And what is there in being only in danger?—If we actually were to appear in open day in England before matters are made up, there will be greater likelihood, that theſe women will not proſecute, than that they will.—For my own part, I ſhould with they may. Would not a brave fellow chuſe to appear in court to ſuch an arraignment, confronting women who would do credit to his attempt? This country is more merciful in theſe caſes, than in any others: I ſhould therefore like to put myſelf upon my country.

Let me indulge a few reflections upon what thou mayeſt think the worſt that can happen. I will ſuppoſe that thou art one of us; and that all five are actually brought to trial on this occaſion: how bravely ſhall we enter a court, I at the head of you, dreſſed out each man, as if to his wedding appearance! —You are ſure of all the women, old and young, of your ſide.—'What brave 'fellows!—What fine gentlemen!—'There goes a charming handſome man!'

—meaning me, to be ſure!—'Who 'could find in their hearts to hang ſuch 'a gentleman as that?' whiſpers one lady, ſitting perhaps on the right-hand of the recorder: [I ſuppoſe the ſcene to be in London] while another diſbelieves that any woman could fairly ſwear againſt me. All will croud after me: it will be each man's happineſs (if ye ſhall chance to be baſhful) to be neglected. I ſhall be found to be the greateſt criminal; and my ſafety, for which the general voice will be engaged, will be yours.

But then comes the triumph of triumphs, that will make the accuſed look up, while the accuſers are covered with confuſion.

'Make room there!—Stand by—Give 'back!—One receiving a rap, another an elbow, half a ſcore a puſh apiece!

Enter the ſlow-moving, hood-faced, down-looking plaintiffs.

And firſt the widow, with a ſorrowful countenance, though half-veiled, pitying her daughter more than herſelf. The people, the women eſpecially, who on this occaſion will be five-ſixths of the ſpectators, reproaching her—'You'd 'have the conſcience, would you, to 'have five ſuch brave gentlemen as theſe 'hanged for you know not what?'

Next comes the poor maid—who perhaps had been raviſhed twenty times before; and had not appeared now, but for company-ſake; mincing, ſimpering, weeping, by turns; not knowing whether ſhe ſhould be ſorry or glad.

But every eye dwells upon Miſs!—'See, ſee, the handſome gentleman bow 'to her!'

To the very ground, to be ſure, I ſhall bow; and kiſs my hand.

'See her confuſion! See! She turns 'from him!'—'Ah! that's becauſe it is 'in open court!' cries an arch one. While others admire her—'Ay! that's 'a girl worth venturing one's neck for!'

Then ſhall we be praiſed—Even the judges, and the whole crouded bench, will acquit us in their hearts; and every ſingle man wiſh he had been me!—The women, all the time, diſclaiming proſecution, were the caſe to be their own. To be ſure, Belford, the ſufferers cannot put half ſo good a face upon the matter as we.

Then what a noiſe will this matter make! Is it not enough, ſuppoſe us moving from the priſon to the Seſſions Houſe, to make a noble heart thump it away moſt gloriouſly, when ſuch an one finds himſelf attended to his trial by a parade of guards and officers, of miens and aſpects warlike and unwarlike; himſelf their whole care, and their buſineſs!—weapons in their hands, ſome bright, ſome ruſty, equally venerable for their antiquity and inoffenſiveneſs! others of more authoritative demeanor, ſtrutting before with fine painted ſtaves! ſhoals of people following, with a 'Which is 'he whom the young lady appears againſt?'—Then, let us look down, look up, look round, which way we will, we ſhall ſee all the doors, the ſhops, the windows, the ſign-irons, and balconies, (garrets, gutters, and chimney-tops included) all white-capt, black-hooded, and periwigged, or crop-eared up by the immobile vulgus: while the floating ſtreet-ſwarmers, who have ſeen us paſs by at one place, run with ſtretching-out necks, and ſtrained eye-balls, a round-about way, and elbow and ſhoulder themſelves into places by which we have not paſſed, in order to obtain another ſight of us; every ſtreet continuing to pour out it's ſwarms of late-comers, to add to the gathering ſnowball; who are content to take deſcriptions of our perſons, behaviour, and countenances, from thoſe who had the good fortune to have been in time to ſee us.

Let me tell thee, Jack, I ſee not why (to judge according to our principles and practices) we ſhould not be as much elated in our march, were this to happen to us, as others may be upon any other the moſt mob-attracting occaſion—Suppoſe a lord-mayor on his gawdy; ſuppoſe a victorious general, or ambaſſador, on his publick entry—Suppoſe (as I began with the loweſt) the grandeſt parade that can be ſuppoſed, a coronation—For, in all theſe, do not the royal-guard, the heroick train bands, the pendent, clinging throngs of ſpectators, with their waving heads rolling to-and-fro from houſe-tops to houſe-bottoms and ſtreet-ways, as I have above deſcribed, make the principal part of the raree-ſhew?

And let me aſk thee, If thou doſt not think, that either the mayor, the ambaſſador, or the general, would not make very pitiful figures on their galas, did not the trumpets and tabrets call together the canaille to gaze at them?—Nor perhaps ſhould we be the moſt guilty heroes neither: for who knows how the magiſtrate may have obtained his gold chain? While the general probably returns from cutting of throats, and from murders, ſanctified by cuſtom only.—Cæſar, we are told, had won, at the age of fifty-ſix, when he was aſſaſſinated, fifty pitched battles, had taken by aſſault above a thouſand towns, and ſlain near 1,200,000 men; I ſuppoſe excluſive of thoſe who fell on his own ſide in ſlaying them. Are not you and I, Jack, innocent men, and babes in ſwadling-cloaths, compared to Cæſar, and to his predeceſſor in heroiſm, Alexander, dubbed for murders and depredation Magnus?

by

The principal difference that ſtrikes me in the compariſon between us and the mayor, the ambaſſador, the general, on their gawdies, is, that the mob make a greater noiſe, a louder huzzaing, in the one caſe than the other, which is called acclamation, and ends frequently in higher taſte, by throwing dead animals at one another, before they diſperſe; in which they have as much joy, as in the former part of the triumph: while they will attend us with all the marks of an awful or ſilent (at moſt only a whiſpering) reſpect; their mouths diſtended, as if ſet open with gags, and their voices generally loſt in goggle-eyed admiration.

Well, but ſuppoſe, after all, we are convicted; what have we to do, but in time to make over our eſtates, that the ſheriffs may not revel in our ſpoils?—There is no fear of being hanged for ſuch a crime as this, while we have money or friends.—And ſuppoſe even the worſt, that two or three were to die, have we not a chance, each man of us, to eſcape? The devil's in them, if they'll hang five for raviſhing three!

I know I ſhall get off for one—were it but for family-ſake: and being a handſome fellow, I ſhall have a dozen or two of young madens, all dreſſed in white, go to court to beg my life—And what a pretty ſhew they will make, with their white hoods, white gowns, white petticoats, white ſcarves, white gloves, kneeling for me, with their white handkerchiefs at their eyes, in two pretty rows, as his majeſty walks through them, and nods my pardon for their ſakes!—And, if once pardoned, all is over: for, Jack, in a crime of this nature there lies no appeal, as in a murder.

So thou ſeeſt the worſt that can happen, ſhould we not make the grand tour upon this occaſion, but ſtay and take our trials. But it is moſt likely, that they will not proſecute at all. If not, no riſque on our ſide will be run: only taking our pleaſure abroad, at the worſt; leaving friends tired of us, in order, after a time, to return to the ſame friends endeared to us, as we to them, by abſence.

This, Jack, is my ſcheme, at the firſt running. I know it is capable of improvement—For example: I can land theſe ladies in France; whip over before they can get a paſſage back, or before Hickman can have recovered his fright; and ſo find means to entrap my beloved on board—And then all will be right; and I need not care if I were never to return to England.

Memorandum. To be conſidered of—Whether, in order to complete my vengeance, I cannot contrive to kidnap away either James Harlowe or Solmes? or both? A man, Jack, would not go into exile for nothing.

LETTER XLIII.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

IF, Belford, thou likeſt not my plot upon Miſs Howe, I have three or four more as good in my own opinion; better, perhaps, they will be in thine: and ſo 'tis but getting looſe from thy preſent engagement, and thou ſhalt pick and chuſe. But as for thy three brethren, they muſt do as I would have them: and ſo, indeed, muſt thou—Elſe why am I your general? But I will refer this ſubject to it's proper ſeaſon. Thou knoweſt that I never abſolutely conclude upon a project, till 'tis time for execution; and then lightning ſtrikes not quicker than I.

And now to the ſubject next my heart.

Wilt thou believe me, when I tell thee, that I have ſo many contrivances riſing up and crouding upon me for preference, with regard to my Gloriana, that I hardly know which to chuſe?—I could tell thee of no leſs than ſix princely ones, any of which muſt do. But, as the dear creature has not grudged giving me trouble, I think I ought not, in gratitude, to ſpare combuſtibles for her; but on the contrary, to make her ſtare and ſtand aghaſt, by ſpringing three or four mines at once.

Thou remembereſt what Shakeſpeare, in his Troilus and Creſſida, makes Hector, who, however, is not uſed to boaſt, ſay to Achilles in an interview between them; and which, applied to this watchful lady, and to the vexation ſhe has given me, and to the certainty I now think I have of ſubduing her, will run thus: Suppoſing the charmer before me; and I meditating her ſweet perſon from head to foot—

'Henceforth, O watchful fair one! guard thee
'well:

'For

For I'll not kill thee there! nor there! nor there!

'But by the zone that circles Venus' waiſt,
'I'll kill thee every where;-yea, o'er and o'er.
'Thou, wiſeſt Belford, pardon me this brag:
'Her watchfulneſs draws folly from my lips;
'But I'll endeavour deeds to match the words,
'Or may I never——'

Then, I imagine thee interpoſing to qualify my impatience, as Ajax did to Achilles—

'—— Do not chafe thee, couſin:
'—— And let theſe threats alone,
'Till accident or purpoſe bring thee to it.'

All that vexes me, in the midſt of my gloried-in devices, is, that there is a ſorry fellow in the world, who has preſumed to queſtion, whether the prize when obtained, is worthy of the pains it coſts me: yet knows, with what patience and trouble a bird-man will ſpread an acre of ground with gins and ſnares; ſet up his ſtalking horſe, his glaſſes; plant his decoy-birds, and invite the feathered throng by his whiſtle; and all his prize at laſt (the reward of early hours, and of a whole morning's pains) only a ſimple linnet.

To be ſerious, Belford, I muſt acknowledge, that all our purſuits, from childhood to manhood, are only trifles of different ſorts and ſizes, proportioned to our years and views: but then is not a fine woman the nobleſt trifle, that ever was or could be obtained by man?—And to what purpoſe do we ſay obtained, if it be not in the way we wiſh for?—If a man is rather to be her prize, than ſhe his?

And now, Belford, what doſt think?

'That thou art a curſed fellow if—'

If—No if's—But I ſhall be very ſick to-morrow. I ſhall, 'faith.

'Sick!—Why ſick? What a devil ſhouldſt thou be ſick for?'

For more good reaſons than one, Jack.

'I ſhould be glad to hear but one.—'Sick, quotha! Of all thy roguiſh in-'ventions I ſhould not have thought of 'this.'

Perhaps thou thinkeſt my view to be, to draw the lady to my bedſide. That's a trick of three or four thouſand years old; and I ſhould find it much more to my purpoſe, if I could get to hers. However, I'll condeſcend to make thee as wiſe as myſelf.

I am exceſſively diſturbed about this ſmuggling ſcheme of Miſs Howe. I have no doubt, that my fair-one, were I to make an attempt, and miſcarry, will fly from me, if ſhe can. I once believed ſhe loved me: but now I doubt whether ſhe does or not: at leaſt, that it is with ſuch an ardour, as Miſs Howe calls it, as will make her overlook a premeditated fault, ſhould I be guilty of one.

'And what will being ſick do for 'thee?'

Have patience. I don't intend to be ſo very bad as Dorcas ſhall repreſent me to be. But yet I know I ſhall reach confoundedly, and bring up ſome clotted blood. To be ſure, I ſhall break a veſſel: there's no doubt of that: and a bottle of Eaton's Styptick ſhall be ſent for; but no doctor. If ſhe has humanity, ſhe will be concerned. But if ſhe has love, let it have been puſhed ever ſo far back, it will, on this occaſion, come forward, and ſhew itſelf; not only in her eye, but in every line of her ſweet face.

I will be very intrepid. I will not fear death, or any-thing elſe. I will be ſure of being well in an hour or two, having formerly found great benefit by this aſtringent medicine, on occaſion of an inward bruiſe by a fall from my horſe in hunting, of which perhaps this malady may be the remains. And this will ſhew her, that though thoſe about me may make the moſt of it, I do not; and ſo can have no deſign in it.

'Well,' methinks thou ſayeſt, 'I be-'gin to think tolerably of this device.'

I knew thou wouldſt, when I explained myſelf. Another time prepare to wonder; and baniſh doubt.

Now, Belford, I ſhall expect, that ſhe will ſhew ſome concern at the broken veſſel, as it may be attended with fatal effects, eſpecially to one ſo fiery in his temper as I have the reputation to be thought to be: and the rather, as I ſhall calmly attribute the accident to the harraſſes and doubts under which I have laboured for ſome time paſt. And this will be a further proof of my love, and will demand a grateful return—

'And what then, thou egregious con-'triver?'

Why then I ſhall have the leſs remorſe, if I am to uſe a little violence: for can ſhe deſerve compaſſion, who ſhews none?

'And what if ſhe ſhew a great deal of 'concern?'

Then ſhall I be in hopes of building on a good foundation. Love hides a multitude of faults, and diminiſhes thoſe it cannot hide. Love, when acknowledged, authorizes freedom; and freedom begets freedom; and I ſhall then ſee how far I can go.

'Well

'Well but, Lovelace, how the deuce 'wilt thou, with that full health and 'vigour of conſtitution, and with that 'bloom in thy face, make any-body be-'lieve thou art ſick?'

How!—Why, take a few grains of ipecacuanha; enough to make me reach like a fury.

'Good!—But how wilt thou manage 'to bring up blood, and not hurt thy-'ſelf?'

Fooliſh fellow! Are there not pigeons and chickens, in every poulterer's ſhop? Cry thy mercy.

But then I will be perſuaded by Mrs. Sinclair, that I have of late confined myſelf too much; and ſo will have a chair called, and be carried to the Park; where I will try to walk half the length of the Mall, or ſo; and in my return, amuſe myſelf at White's or the Cocoa.

'And what will this do?'

Queſtioning again!—I am afraid thou'rt an infidel, Belford—Why then ſhall I not know if my beloved offers to go out in my abſence?—And ſhall I not ſee whether ſhe receives me with tenderneſs at my return? But this is not all: I have a foreboding that ſomething affecting will happen while I am out. But of this more in it's place.

And now, Belford, wilt thou, or wilt thou not, allow, that it is a right thing to be ſick?—Lord, Jack, ſo much delight do I take in my contrivances, that I ſhall be half-ſorry, when the occaſion for them is over; for never, never, ſhall I again have ſuch a charming exerciſe for my invention.

Mean time theſe plaguy women are ſo impertinent, ſo full of reproaches, that I know not how to do any-thing but curſe them. And then, truly, they are for helping me out with ſome of their trite and vulgar artifices. Sally particularly, who pretends to be a mighty contriver, has juſt now in an inſolent manner told me, on my rejecting her proffered aids, that I had no mind to conquer; and that I was ſo wicked as to intend to marry, though I would not own it to her.

Becauſe this little devil made her firſt ſacrifice at my altar, ſhe thinks ſhe may take any liberty with me: and what makes her outrageous at times, is, that I have, for a long time, ſtudiouſly, as ſhe ſays, ſlighted her too readily-offered favours: but is it not very impudent in her to think, that I will be any man's ſucceſſor? It is not come to that neither. This thou knoweſt, was always my rule —Once any other man's, and I know it, and never more mine. It is for ſuch as thou, and thy brethren, to take up with harlots. I have been always aiming at the merit of a firſt diſcoverer.

The more devil I, perhaps thou wilt ſay, to endeavour to corrupt the uncorrupted.

But I ſay, not; ſince, hence, I have but very few adulteries to anſwer for.

One affair, indeed, at Paris, with a married lady [I believe I never told thee of it] touched my conſcience a little: yet brought on by a ſpirit of intrigue, more than by ſheer wickedneſs. I'll give it thee in brief:

A French marquis, ſomewhat in years, employed by his court in a publick function at that of Madrid, had put his charming young new-married wife under the controul and wardſhip, as I may ſay, of his inſolent ſiſter, an old prude.

I ſaw the lady at the opera. I liked her at firſt ſight, and better at ſecond, when I knew the ſituation ſhe was in. So pretending to make my addreſſes to the prude, got admittance to both.

The firſt thing I had to do, was to compliment my prude into ſhyneſs by complaints of ſhyneſs; next to take advantage of the marquiſe's ſituation, between her huſband's jealouſy, and his ſiſter's arrogance; and to inſpire her with reſentment; and, as I hoped, with a regard to my perſon. The French ladies have no diſlike to intrigue.

The ſiſter began to ſuſpect me: the lady had no mind to part with the company of the only man who had been permitted to viſit there; and told me of her ſiſter's ſuſpicions. I put her upon concealing the prude, as if unknown to me, in a cloſet in one of her own apartments, locking her in, and putting the key in her own pocket: and ſhe was to queſtion me on the ſincerity of my profeſſions to her ſiſter, in her ſiſter's hearing.

She complied. My miſtreſs was locked up. The lady and I took our ſeats. I owned fervent love, and made high profeſſions: for the marquiſe put it home to me. The prude was delighted with what ſhe heard.

And how doſt think it ended?—I took my advantage of the lady herſelf, who durſt not for her life cry out; and drew her after me to the next apartment, on pretence of going to ſeek her ſiſter, who all the time was locked up in the cloſet.

No woman ever gave me a private meeting for nothing; my deareſt Miſs Harlowe excepted.

My ingenuity obtained my pardon: the lady being unable to forbear laughing through the whole affair, to find both ſo uncommonly tricked; her gaoleress her priſoner, ſafe locked up, and as much pleaſed as either of us.

The Engliſh, Jack, do not often outwit the French.

We had contrivances afterwards equally ingenious, in which the lady, the ice once broken, [Once ſubdued, always ſubdued] co-operated—But a more tender tell-tale revealed the ſecret—revealed it before the marquis could come to cover the diſgrace. The ſiſter was inveterate; the huſband irreconcileable; in every reſpect unfit for a huſband, even for a French one—made, perhaps, more delicate to theſe particulars by the cuſtoms of a people among whom he was then reſident, ſo contrary to thoſe of his own countrymen. She was obliged to throw herſelf into my protection—Nor thought herſelf unhappy in it till child-bed pangs ſeized her: then penitence, and death, overtook her the ſame hour!

Excuſe a tear, Belford!—She deſerved a better fate! What had ſuch a vile inexorable huſband to anſwer for!—The ſiſter was puniſhed effectually—That pleaſes me on reflection—The ſiſter was effectually puniſhed!—But perhaps I told thee this ſtory before.

LETTER XLIV.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

FRIDAY EVENING.

JUST returned from an airing with my charmer, complied with after great importunity. She was attended by the two nymphs. They both topt their parts; kept their eyes within bounds; made moral reflections now-and-then. O Jack! what devils are women, when all teſts are got over, and we have completely ruined them!

The coach carried us to Hampſtead, to Highgate, to Muſwell Hill; back to Hampſtead to the Upper Flaſk: there, in compliment to the nymphs, my beloved conſented to alight, and take a little repaſt. Then home early by Kentiſh Town.

Delightfully eaſy ſhe, and ſo reſpectful and obliging I, all the way, and as we walked out upon the Heath, to view the variegated proſpects which that agreeable elevation affords, that ſhe promiſed to take now-and-then a little excurſion with me. 'I think, Miſs Howe, 'I think,' ſaid I to myſelf, every now-and-then as we walked, 'that thy wicked devices are ſuperſeded.'

But let me give thee a few particulars of our converſation in the circumvolation we took, while in the coach.—She had received a letter from Miſs Howe yeſterday, I preſumed?

She made no anſwer. How happy ſhould I think myſelf to be admitted into their correſpondence? I would joyfully make an exchange of communications.

So, though I hoped not to ſucceed by her conſent, [and little did ſhe think I had ſo happily in part ſucceeded without it] I thought it not amiſs to urge for it, for ſeveral reaſons: among others, that I might account to her for my conſtant employment at my pen; in order to take off her jealouſy, that ſhe was the ſubject of thy correſpondence and mine: and that I might juſtify my ſecreſy and uncommunicativeneſs by her own.

I proceeded therefore—That I loved familiar-letter-writing, as I had more than once told her, above all the ſpecies of writing: it was writing from the heart, (without the fetters preſcribed by method or ſtudy) as the very word correſpondence implied. Not the heart only; the ſoul was in it. Nothing of body, when friend writes to friend; the mind impelling ſovereignly the vaſſal-fingers. It was, in ſhort, friendſhip recorded; friendſhip given under hand and ſeal; demonſtrating that the parties were under no apprehenſion of changing, from time or accident, when they ſo liberally gave teſtimonies, which would always be ready, on a failure or infidelity, to be turned againſt them.—For my own part, it was the principal diverſion I had in her abſence; but for this innocent amuſement, the diſtance ſhe ſo frequently kept me at, would have been intolerable.

Sally knew my drift; and ſaid, She had had the honour to ſee two or three of my letters, and of Mr. Belford's; and ſhe thought them the moſt entertaining that ſhe had ever read.

My friend Belford, I ſaid, had a happy talent in the letter-writing way; and upon all ſubjects.

I expected my beloved would have been inquiſitive after our ſubject: but (lying perdue, as I ſaw) not a word ſaid ſhe. So I touched upon this article myſelf.

Our topicks were various and diffuſe: ſometimes upon literary articles; [ſhe was very attentive upon this] ſometimes upon the publick entertainments; ſometimes amuſing each other with the fruits of the different correſpondences we held with people abroad, with whom we had contracted friendſhips; ſometimes upon the foibles and perfections of our particular friends; ſometimes upon our own preſent and future hopes; ſometimes aiming at humour and raillery upon each other.—It might indeed appear to favour of vanity, to ſuppoſe my letters would entertain a lady of her delicacy and judgment: but yet I could not but ſay, that perhaps ſhe would be far from thinking ſo hardly of me as ſometimes ſhe had ſeemed to do, if ſhe were to ſee the letters which generally paſſed between Mr. Belford and me. [I hope, Jack, thou haſt more manners than to give me the lye, though but in thy heart.]

She then ſpoke; after declining my compliment in ſuch a manner, as only a perſon could do, who deſerved it, ſhe ſaid, for her part, ſhe had always thought me a man of ſenſe. [A man of ſenſe, Jack! What a niggardly praiſe?]—And ſhould therefore hope, that, when I wrote, it exceeded even my ſpeech: for it was impoſſible, be the letters written in as eaſy and familiar ſtile as they would, but that they muſt have that advantage from ſitting down to write them which prompt ſpeech could not always have. She ſhould think it very ſtrange therefore, if my letters were barren of ſentiment; and as ſtrange, if I gave myſelf liberties upon premeditation, which could have no excuſe at all, but from a thoughtleſſneſs, which itſelf wanted excuſe.—But if Mr. Belford's letters and mine were upon ſubjects ſo general, and ſome of them equally (ſhe preſumed) inſtructive and entertaining, ſhe could not but ſay, that ſhe ſhould be glad to ſee any of them; and particularly thoſe which Miſs Martin had ſeen and praiſed.

This was put cloſe.

I looked at her, to ſee if I could diſcover any tincture of jealouſy in this hint; that Miſs Martin had ſeen what I had not ſhewn to her. But ſhe did not look it: ſo I only ſaid, I ſhould be very proud to ſhew her not only thoſe, but all that paſſed between Mr. Belford and me; but I muſt remind her, that ſhe knew the condition.

'No, indeed!' with a ſweet lip pouted out, as faucy as pretty; implying a lovely ſcorn, that yet can only be lovely in youth ſo blooming, and beauty ſo divinely diſtinguiſhed.

How I long to ſee ſuch a motion again! Her mouth only can give it.

But I am mad with love—Yet eternal will be the diſtance, at the rate I go on: now fire, now ice, my ſoul is continually upon the hiſs, as I may ſay. In vain, however, is the trial to quench—what, after all, is unquenchable.

Pr'ythee, Belford, forgive my nonſenſe, and my Vulcan-like metaphors—Did I not tell thee, not that I am ſick of love, but that I am mad with it? Why brought I ſuch an angel into ſuch a houſe? into ſuch company?—And why do I not ſtop my ears to the ſyrens, who, knowing my averſion to wedlock, are perpetually touching that ſtring?

I was not willing to be anſwered ſo eaſily: I was ſure, that what paſſed between two ſuch young ladies (friends ſo dear) might be ſeen by every-body: I had more reaſon than any-body to wiſh to ſee the letters that paſſed between her and Miſs Howe; becauſe I was ſure they muſt be full of admirable inſtruction, and one of the dear correſpondents had deigned to wiſh my entire reformation.

She looked at me, as if ſhe would look me through: I thought I felt eye-beam, after eye-beam, penetrate my ſhivering reins.—But ſhe was ſilent. Nor needed her eyes the aſſiſtance of ſpeech.

Nevertheleſs, a little recovering myſelf, I hoped that nothing unhappy had befallen either Miſs Howe or her mother. The letter of yeſterday ſent by a particular hand; ſhe opening it with great emotion—ſeeming to have expected it ſooner—were the reaſons for my apprehenſions.

We were then at Muſwel Hill: a pretty country within the eye, to Polly, was the remark, inſtead of replying to me.

But I was not ſo to be anſwered—I ſhould expect ſome charming ſubjects and characters from two ſuch pens: I hoped every-thing went on well between Mr. Hickman and Miſs Howe. Her mother's heart, I ſaid, was ſet upon that match: Mr. Hickman was not without his merits: he was what the ladies called a SOBER man: but I muſt needs ſay, that I thought Miſs Howe deſerved a huſband of a very different caſt!

This, I ſuppoſed, would have enraged her into a ſubject from which I could have wiredrawn ſomething:—for Hickman is one of her favourites—Why, I can't divine, except for the ſake of oppoſition of character to that of thy honeſt friend.

But ſhe cut me ſhort by a look of diſapprobation, and another cool remark upon a diſtant view; and, 'How far off, Miſs Horton, do you think that clump of trees may be?' pointing out of the coach—So I had done.

Here endeth all I have to write concerning cerning our converſation on this our agreeable airing.

We have both been writing ever ſince we came home. I am to be favoured with her company for an hour, before ſhe retires to reſt.

All that obſequious love can ſuggeſt, in order to engage her tendereſt ſentiments for me againſt to-morrow's ſickneſs, will I aim at when we meet. But at parting will complain of a diſorder in my ſtomach.

We have met. All was love and unexceptionable reſpect on my part. Eaſe and complaiſance on hers. She was concerned for my diſorder. So ſudden! —Juſt as we parted! But it was nothing. I ſhould be quite well by morning.

Faith, Jack, I think I am ſick already. Is it poſſible for ſuch a giddy fellow as me to perſuade myſelf to be ill! I am a better mimick at this rate than I wiſh to be. But every nerve and fibre of me is always ready to contribute it's aid, whether by health or by ailment, to carry a reſolved-on roguery into execution.

Dorcas has tranſcribed for me the whole letter of Miſs Howe, dated Sunday, May 14, of which before I had only extracts. She found no other letter added to that parcel: but this and that which I copied myſelf in character laſt Sunday while ſhe was at church, relating to the ſmuggling ſcheme, are enough for me.

Dorcas tells me, that her lady has been removing her papers from the mahogany cheſt into a wainſcot-box, which held her linen, and which ſhe put into her dark cloſet. We have no key of that at preſent. No doubt but all her letters, previous to thoſe I have come at, are in that box. Dorcas is uneaſy upon it: yet hopes that her lady does not ſuſpect her; for ſhe is ſure that ſhe laid in every-thing as ſhe found it.

LETTER XLV.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

COCOA-TREE, SATURDAY, MAY 27.

THIS ipecacuanha is a moſt diſagreeable medicine. That theſe curſed phyſical folks can find out nothing to do us good, but what would poiſon the devil! In the other world, were they only to take phyſick, it would be puniſhment enough of itſelf for a miſ-ſpent life. A doctor at one elbow, and an apothecary at the other, and the poor ſoul labouring under their preſcribed operations, he need no worſe tormentors.

But now this was to take down my countenance. It has done it: for, with violent reachings, having taken enough to make me ſick, and not enough water to carry it off, I preſently looked as if I had kept my bed a fortnight. Ill jeſting, as I thought in the midſt of the exerciſe, with edge tools, and worſe with phyſical ones.

Two hours it held me. I had forbid Dorcas to let her know any-thing of the matter; out of tenderneſs to her; being willing, when ſhe knew my prohibition, to let her ſee that I expected her to be concerned for me.

Well, but Dorcas was, nevertheleſs, a woman, and ſhe can whiſper to her lady the ſecret ſhe is enjoined to keep!

'Come hither, toad,' [ſick as a devil at the inſtant;] 'let me ſee what a mixture of grief and ſurprize may be beat up together in thy pudding-face.

'That won't do. That dropt jaw, and mouth diſtended into the long oval, is more upon the horrible, than the grievous.

'Nor that pinking and winking with thy odious eyes, as my charmer once called them.

'A little better that; yet not quite right: but keep your mouth cloſer. You have a muſcle or two which you have no command of, between your cheek-bone and your lips, that ſhould carry one corner of your mouth up towards your crow's-foot, and that down to meet it.

'There! Be gone! Be in a plaguy hurry running up ſtairs and down, to fetch from the dining-room what you carry up on purpoſe to fetch, till motion extraordinary put you out of breath, and give you the ſigh-natural.'

'What's the matter, Dorcas?'

'Nothing, Madam.'

My beloved wonders ſhe has not ſeen me this morning, no doubt; but is too ſhy to ſay ſhe wonders. Repeated 'What's the matter!' however, as Dorcas runs up and down ſtairs by her door, bring on, 'Oh! Madam!—my poor maſter!—my poor maſter!'

'What! How! When!'—And all the monoſyllables of ſurprize.

[Within parentheſes let me tell thee, that I have often thought, that the little words in the republick of letters, like the little folks in a nation, are the moſt ſignificant. The triſyllables, and the numbers of ſyllables more than three, are but the good-for-little magnates.]

'I muſt

'I muſt not tell you, Madam—My maſter ordered me not to tell you—But he is in a worſe way than he thinks for! But he would not have you frighted.'

High concern took poſſeſſion of every ſweet feature. She pitied me!—By my ſoul, ſhe pitied me!

'Where is he?'

Too much in a hurry for good-manners, [Another parentheſis, Jack! Good-manners are ſo little natural, that we ought to be compoſed to obſerve them: politeneſs will not live in a ſtorm.] 'I 'cannot ſtay to anſwer queſtions,' cries the wench—though deſirous to anſwer.—[A third parentheſis—Like the people crying proclamations, running away from the cuſtomers they want to ſell to.] This hurry puts the lady in a hurry to aſk, [A fourth, by way of embelliſhing the third!] as the other does the people in a hurry to buy. And I have in my eye now a whole ſtreet raiſed, and running after a proclamation or expreſs-crier, as if the firſt was a thief, the other his purſuers.

At laſt, 'O Lord! let Mrs. Lovelace 'know—There is danger, to be ſure!' whiſpered from one nymph to another; but at the door, and ſo loud, that my liſtening fair one might hear.

Out ſhe darts—'As how!—as how, 'Dorcas!'

'O Madam—A vomiting of blood! 'A veſſel broke, to be ſure!'

Down ſhe haſtens; finds every-one as buſy over my blood in the entry, as if it were that of the Neapolitan Saint.

In ſteps my charmer, with a face of ſweet concern.

'How do you, Mr Lovelace?'

'O my beſt love!—Very well!—Very 'well!—Nothing at all!—Nothing of 'conſequence!—I ſhall be well in an 'inſtant!'—Straining again! for I was indeed plaguy ſick, though no more blood came.

In ſhort, Belford, I have gained my end. I ſee the dear ſoul loves me. I ſee ſhe forgives me all that's paſt. I ſee I have credit for a new ſcore.

Miſs Howe, I defy thee, my dear—Mrs. Townſend!—Who the devil are you?—Troop away with your contra-bands. No ſmuggling! nor ſmuggler, but myſelf! Nor will the choiceſt of my fair-one's favours be long prohibited goods to me.

EVERY-ONE now is ſure that ſhe loves me. Tears were in her eyes more than once for me. She ſuffered me to take her hand, and kiſs it as often as I pleaſed. On Mrs. Sinclair's mentioning, that I too much confined myſelf, ſhe preſſed me to take an airing; but obligingly deſired me to be careful of myſelf. Wiſhed I would adviſe with a phyſician. God made phyſicians, ſhe ſaid.

I did not think that, Jack. God, indeed, made us all. But I fancy ſhe meant phyſick inſtead of phyſicians; and then the phraſe might mean what the vulgar phraſe means—God ſends meat, the devil cooks.

I was well already, on taking the ſyptick from her dear hands.

On her requiring me to take the air, I aſked if I might have the honour of her company in a coach; and this, that I might obſerve if ſhe had an intention of going out in my abſence.

If ſhe thought a chair were not a more proper vehicle for my caſe, ſhe would with all her heart!

'There's a precious!'

I kiſſed her hand again! She was all goodneſs!—'Would to Heaven I better 'deſerved it!' I ſaid.—But all were golden days before us!—Her preſence and generous concern had done every-thing. I was well! Nothing ailed me. But ſince my beloved will have it ſo, I'll take a little airing!—Let a chair be called!—'O my charmer! were I to have owed this indiſpoſition to my late harraſſes, and to the uneaſineſs I have had for diſo-'bliging you; all is infinitely compenſat-'ed by your goodneſs—All the art of 'healing is in your ſmiles!—Your late 'diſpleaſure was the only malady!'

While Mrs. Sinclair, and Dorcas, and Polly, and even poor ſilly Mabell, [for Sally went out, as my angel came in] with uplifted hands and eyes, ſtood thanking Heaven that, I was better, in audible whiſpers: 'See the power of 'love!' cried one.—'What a charming 'huſband!' another.—'Happy couple!' all.

O how the dear creature's cheek mantled!—How her eyes ſparkled!—How ſweetly acceptable is praiſe to conſcious merit, while it but reproaches when applied to the undeſerving!—What a new, what a gay creation it makes at once in a diffident or diſpirited heart!

And now, Belford, was it not worth while to be ſick? And yet I muſt tell thee, that too many pleaſanter expedients offer themſelves, to make trial any more of this confounded ipecacuanha.

LETTER XLVI.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

SATURDAY, MAY 27.

MR. Lovelace, my dear, has been very ill. Suddenly taken. With a vomiting of blood in great quantities. Some veſſel broken. He complained of a diſorder in his ſtomach over-night. I was the more affected with it, as I am afraid it was occaſioned by the violent contentions between us.—But was I in fault?

How lately did I think I hated him!—But hatred and anger, I ſee, are but temporary paſſions with me. One cannot, my dear, hate people in danger of death, or who are in diſtreſs or affliction. My heart, I find, is not proof againſt kindneſs, and acknowledgement of errors committed.

He took great care to have his illneſs concealed from me as long as he could. So tender in the violence of his diſorder!—So deſirous to make the beſt of it!—I wiſh he had not been ill in my ſight. I was too much affected—Every-body alarming me with his danger—The poor man, from ſuch high health, ſo ſuddenly taken!—And ſo unprepared!

He is gone out in a chair. I adviſed him to do ſo. I fear that my advice was wrong; ſince quiet in ſuch a diſorder muſt needs be beſt. We are apt to be ſo ready, in caſes of emergency, to give our advice, without judgment, or waiting for it!—I propoſed a phyſician indeed; but he would not hear of one. I have great honour for the faculty; and the greater, as I have always obſerved, that thoſe who treat the profeſſors of the art of healing contemptuouſly, too generally treat higher inſtitutions in the ſame manner.

I am really very uneaſy. For I have, I doubt, expoſed myſelf to him, and to the women below. They indeed will excuſe me, as they think us married. But if he be not generous, I ſhall have cauſe to regret this ſurprize; which (as I had reaſon to think myſelf unaccountably treated by him) has taught me more than I knew of myſelf.

'Tis true, I have owned more than once, that I could have liked Mr. Lovelace above all men. I remember the debates you and I uſed to have on this ſubject, when I was your happy gueſt. You uſed to ſay, and once you wrote, that men of his caſt are the men that our ſex do not naturally diſlike: while I held, that ſuch were not (however that might be) the men we ought to like. But what with my relations precipitating of me, on one hand, and what with his unhappy character, and embarraſſing ways, on the other, I had no more leiſure than inclination to examine my own heart in this particular. And this reminds me of a paſſage in one of your former letters, which I will tranſcribe, though it was written in raillery. 'May it not be,' ſay you, 'that you have had 'ſuch perſons to deal with, as have not al- 'lowed you to attend to the throbs; or, if you 'had them a little now-and-then, whether, 'having had two accounts to place them to, 'you have not by miſtake put them to the 'wrong one?' A paſſage, which, although it came into my mind when Mr. Lovelace was leaſt exceptionable, yet that I have denied any efficacy to, when he has teazed and vexed me, and given me cauſe of ſuſpicion. For, after all, my dear, Mr. Lovelace is not wiſe in all his ways. And ſhould we not endeavour, as much as is poſſible, (where we are not attached by natural ties) to like and diſlike as reaſon bids us, and according to the merit or demerit of the object? If love, as it is called, is allowed to be an excuſe for our moſt unreaſonable follies, and to lay level all the fences that a careful education has ſurrounded us by, what is meant by the doctrine of ſubduing our paſſions?—But, O my deareſt friend, am I not guilty of a puniſhable fault, were I to love this man of errors? And has not my own heart deceived me, when I thought I did not? And what muſt be that love, that has not ſome degree of purity for it's object? I am afraid of recollecting ſome paſſages in my couſin Morden's letter.—And yet why fly I from ſubjects that, duly conſidered, might tend to correct and purify my heart? I have carried, I doubt, my notions on this head too high, not for practice, but for my practice. You think me not guilty of prudery neither; for had I found out as much of myſelf before; or, rather, had he given me heart's eaſe enough before to find it out, you ſhould have had my confeſſion ſooner.

Nevertheleſs, let me tell you, (what I hope I may juſtly tell you) that if again he give me cauſe to reſume diſtance and reſerve, I hope my reaſon will gather ſtrength enough from his imperfections, to enable me to keep my paſſions under.—What can we do more than govern ourſelves by the temporary lights lent us?

You

You will not wonder that I am grave on this detection—Detection, muſt I call it? What can I call it?

Diſſatisfied with myſelf, I am afraid to look back upon what I have written: and yet know not how to have done writing. I never was in ſuch an odd frame of mind.—I know not how to deſcribe it.—Was you ever ſo?—Afraid of the cenſure of her you love—Yet not conſcious that you deſerve it?

Of this, however, I am convinced, that I ſhould indeed deſerve cenſure, if I kept any ſecret of my heart from you.

But I will not add another word, after I have aſſured you, that I will look ſtill more narrowly into myſelf: and that I am your equally ſincere and affectionate CL. HARLOWE.

LETTER XLVII.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

SAT. EVENING.

I Had a charming airing. No return of my malady. My heart perfectly eaſy, how could my ſtomach be otherwiſe?

But when I came home, I found that my ſweet ſoul had been alarmed by a new incident—The enquiry after us both, in a very ſuſpicious manner, and that by deſcription of our perſons, and not by names, by a ſervant in a blue livery turned up and trimmed with yellow.

Dorcas was called to him, as the upper-ſervant; and ſhe refuſing to anſwer any of the fellow's queſtions, unleſs he told his buſineſs, and from whom he came, the fellow (as ſhort as ſhe) ſaid, That if ſhe would not anſwer him, perhaps ſhe might anſwer ſomebody elſe; and went away out of humour.

Dorcas hurried up to her lady, and alarmed her not only with the fact, but with her own conjectures; adding, that he was an ill-looking fellow, and ſhe was ſure could come for no good.

The livery and the features of the ſervant were particularly enquired after, and as particularly deſcribed—Lord bleſs her! no end of her alarms, ſhe thought! And then did her apprehenſions anticipate every evil that could happen.

She wiſhed Mr. Lovelace would come in.

Mr. Lovelace came in ſoon after; all lively, grateful, full of hopes, of duty, of love, to thank his charmer, and to congratulate with her upon the cure ſhe had performed. And then ſhe told the ſtory, with all it's circumſtances; and Dorcas, to point her lady's fears, told us, that the ſervant was a ſunburnt fellow, and looked as if he had been at ſea.

He was then, no doubt, Captain Singleton's ſervant, and the next news we ſhould hear was, that the houſe was ſurrounded by a whole ſhip's crew; the veſſel lying no farther off, as ſhe underſtood, than Rotherhithe.

'Impoſſible,' I ſaid. 'Such an attempt 'would not be uſhered in by ſuch a man- 'ner of enquiry. And why may it not 'rather be a ſervant of your couſin Mor- 'den, with notice of his arrival, and of 'his deſign to attend you?'

This ſurmiſe delighted her. Her apprehenſions went off, and ſhe was at leiſure to congratulate me upon my ſudden recovery; which ſhe did in the moſt obliging manner.

But we had not ſat long together, when Dorcas again came fluttering up to tell us, that the footman, the very footman was again at the door, and enquired, whether Mr. Lovelace and his lady, by name, had not lodgings in this houſe? He aſked, he told Dorcas, for no harm: but his diſavowing of harm, was a demonſtration with my apprehenſive fair-one, that harm was intended. And as the fellow had not been anſwered by Dorcas, I propoſed to go down to the ſtreet-parlour, and hear what he had to ſay.

'I ſee your cauſeleſs terror, my dear- 'eſt life,' ſaid I, 'and your impatience '—Will you be pleaſed to walk down '—And without being obſerved, (for 'he ſhall come no farther than the par- 'lour-door) you may hear all that 'paſſes?'

She conſented. We went down. Dorcas bid the man come forward. 'Well, 'friend, what is your buſineſs with Mr. 'and Mrs. Lovelace?'

Bowing, ſcraping. 'I am ſure you 'are the gentleman, Sir. Why, Sir, my 'buſineſs is only to know if your honour 'be here, and to be ſpoken with; or if 'you ſhall be here for any time?'

'Whom came you from?'

'From a gentleman who ordered me 'to ſay, if I was made to tell, but not 'elſe, it was from a friend of Mr. 'John Harlowe, Mrs. Lovelace's eldeſt 'uncle.'

The dear creature was ready to ſink upon this. It was but of late that ſhe had provided herſelf with ſalts. She pulled them out.

'Do you know any thing of Colonel 'Morden, friend?' ſaid I.

'No;

'No; I never heard of his name.'

'Of Captain Singleton?'

'No, Sir. But the gentleman, my 'maſter, is a captain too.'

'What is his name?'

'I don't know if I ſhould tell.'

'There can be no harm in telling the 'gentleman's name, if you come upon 'a good account.'

'That I do; for my maſter told me 'ſo; and there is not an honeſter gen-'tleman on the face of God's yearth.—His 'name is Captain Tomlinſon, Sir.'

'I don't know ſuch a one.'

'I believe not, Sir. He was pleaſed 'to ſay, He don't know your honour, 'Sir; but I heard him ſay as how he 'ſhould not be an unwelcome viſitor to 'you for all that.'

'Do you know ſuch a man as Captain 'Tomlinſon, my deareſt life,' [Aſide] 'your uncle's friend?'

'No; but my uncle may have ac-'quaintance, no doubt, that I don't 'know.—But I hope [Trembling] this 'is not a trick.'

'Well, friend, if your maſter has any-'thing to ſay to Mr. Lovelace, you may 'tell him that Mr. Lovelace is here; 'and will ſee him whenever he pleaſes.'

The dear creature looked as if afraid that my engagement was too prompt for my own ſafety; and away went the fellow—I wondering, that ſhe might not wonder, that this Captain Tomlinſon, whoever he were, came not himſelf, or ſent not a letter the ſecond time, when he had reaſon to ſuppoſe that I might be here.

Mean time, for fear that this ſhould be a contrivance of James Harlowe, who, I ſaid, loved plotting, though he had not a head turned for it, I gave ſome precautionary directions to the ſervants, and the women, whom, for the greater parade, I aſſembled before us: and my beloved was reſolved not to ſtir abroad till ſhe ſaw the iſſue of this odd affair.

And here muſt I cloſe, though in ſo great a puzzle.

Only let me add, that poor Belton wants thee; for I dare not ſtir for my life.

Mowbray and Tourville ſkulk about like vagabonds, without heads, without hands, without ſouls; having neither you nor me to conduct them. They tell me, they ſhall ruſt beyond the power of oil or action to brighten them up, or give them motion.

How goes it with thy uncle?

LETTER XLVIII.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

SUNDAY, MAY 28.

THIS ſtory of Captain Tomlinſon employed us not only for the time we were together laſt night, but all the while we ſat at breakfaſt this morning. She would ſtill have it, that it was the prelude to ſome miſchief from Singleton. I inſiſted, (according to my former hint) that it might much more probably be a method taken by Colonel Morden to alarm her, previous to a perſonal viſit. Travelled gentlemen affected to ſurprize in this manner. 'And 'why, deareſt creature,' ſaid I, 'muſt 'every thing that happens, which we 'cannot immediately account for, be 'what we leaſt with?'

She had had ſo many diſagreeable things befal her of late, that her fears were too often ſtronger than her hopes.

'And thus, Madam, makes me ap-'prehenſive, that you will get into ſo 'low-ſpirited a way, that you will not be 'able to enjoy the happineſs that ſeems 'to await us.'

Her duty and her gratitude, ſhe gravely ſaid, to the Diſpenſer of all good, would ſecure her, ſhe hoped, againſt all unthankfulneſs. And a thankful ſpirit was the ſame as a joyful one.

So, Belford, for all her future joys ſhe depends entirely upon the Inviſible Good. She is certainly right; ſince thoſe who fix leaſt upon ſecond cauſes are the leaſt likely to be diſappointed—And is not this gravity for her gravity?

She had hardly done ſpeaking, when Dorcas came running up in a hurry—She ſet even my heart into a palpitation—Thump, thump, thump, like a precipitated pendulum in a clock-caſe—Flutter, flutter, flutter, my charmer's, as by her ſweet boſom riſing to her chin I ſaw.

This lower claſs of people, my beloved herſelf obſerved, were for ever aiming at the ſtupid wonderful, and for making even common incidents matter of ſurprize.

'Why the devil,' ſaid I to the wench, 'this alarming hurry?—And with your 'ſpread fingers, and your O Madams, 'and O Sirs!—and be curs'd to you! 'Would there have been a ſecond of 'time difference, had you come up 'ſlowly?'

'Captain Tomlinſon, Sir!'

'Captain Devilſon, what care I?—

'Do you see how you have disordered 'your lady?'

'Good Mr. Lovelace,' said my charmer trembling, [See, Jack, when she has an end to serve, I am good Mr. Lovelace] 'if—if my brother—if Captain Singleton should appear—Pray 'now—I beseech you—Let me beg of 'you—to govern your temper—My brother is my brother—Captain Singleton 'is but an agent.'

'My dearest life,' folding my arms about her, ['When she asks favours,' thought I, 'the devil's in it, if she will 'not allow of such innocent freedom as 'this, from good Mr. Lovelace too] 'you shall be witness of all that passes 'between us.—Dorcas, desire the gentleman to walk up.'

'Let me retire to my chamber first! '—Let me not be known to be in the 'house!'

Charming dear!—Thou seest, Belford, she is afraid of leaving me!—O the little witchcrafts! Were it not for surprizes now-and-then, how would an honest man know where to have them?

She withdrew to listen—And though this incident has not turned out to answer all I wished from it, yet is it necessary, if I would acquaint thee with my whole circulation, to be very particular in what passed between Captain Tomlinson and me.

Enter Captain Tomlinson in a riding-dress, whip in hand.

'Your servant, Sir—Mr. Lovelace, I 'presume?'

'My name is Lovelace, Sir.'

'Excuse the day, Sir.—Be pleased 'to excuse my garb. I am obliged to 'go out of town directly, that I may re'turn at night.'

'The day is a good day. Your garb 'needs no apology.'

'When I sent my servant, I did not 'know that I should find time to do myself this 'honour. All that I thought I could do, 'to oblige my friend this journey, was 'only to assure myself of your abode; 'and whether there were a probability 'of being admitted to the speech either 'of you, or your lady.'

'Sir, you best know your own motives. What your time will permit 'you to do, you also best know. And 'here I am attending your pleasure.'

My charmer owned afterwards her concern on my being so short. Whatever I shall mingle of her emotions, thou wilt easily guess I had afterwards.

'Sir, I hope no offence. I intend 'none.'

'None—None at all, Sir.'

'Sir, I have no interest in the affair I 'am come about. I may appear officious; and if I thought I should, I would 'decline any concern in it, after I have 'just hinted what it is.'

'And pray, Sir, what is it?'

'May I ask you, Sir, without offence, 'whether you wish to be reconciled, 'and to co-operate upon honourable 'terms, with one gentleman of the name 'of Harlowe; preparative, it may be 'hoped, to a general reconciliation?'

'O how my heart fluttered!' cried my charmer.

'I can't tell, Sir:'—[And then it fluttered still more, no doubt] 'the whole fa'mily have used me extremely ill. 'They have taken greater liberties with 'my character than are justifiable; and 'with my family too; which I can less 'forgive.'

'Sir, Sir, I have done. I beg pardon 'for this intrusion.'

My beloved was then ready to sink, and thought very hardly of me.

'But, pray, Sir, to the immediate pur'pose of your present commission; since 'a commission it seems to be?'

'It is a commission, Sir; and such a 'one, as I thought would be agreeable 'to all parties, or I should not have 'given myself concern about it.'

'Perhaps it may, Sir, when known. 'But let me ask you one previous ques'tion; Do you know Colonel Morden, 'Sir?'

'No, Sir, if you mean personally, I do 'not. But I have heard my good friend 'Mr. John Harlowe talk of him with 'great respect; and as a co-trustee with 'him in a certain trust.'

Lovel. 'I thought it probable, Sir, 'that the colonel might be arrived; 'that you might be a gentleman of his 'acquaintance; and that something of 'an agreeable surprize might be in'tended.'

Capt. 'Had Colonel Morden been in 'England, Mr. John Harlowe would 'have known it; and then I should not 'have been a stranger to it.'

Lovel. 'Well, but, Sir, have you then 'any commission to me from Mr. John 'Harlowe?'

Capt. 'Sir, I will tell you as briefly 'as I can, the whole of what I have to 'say; but you'll excuse me also a pre'vious question, for which curiosity is 'not my motive; but it is necessary to 'be answered before I can proceed: as 'you will judge when you hear it.'

Lovel. 'What, pray, Sir, is your 'question?'

Capt.

Capt. 'Briefly, Whether you are actually, and bona fide, married to Miſs Clariſſa Harlowe?'

I ſtarted, and, in a haughty tone, 'Is this, Sir, a queſtion that muſt be anſwered before you can proceed in the buſineſs you have undertaken?'

'I mean no offence, Mr. Lovelace. Mr. Harlowe ſought to me to undertake this office. I have daughters and nieces of my own. I thought it a good office, or I, who have many conſiderable affairs upon my hands, had not accepted of it. I know the world; and will take the liberty to ſay, That if that young lady——'

'Captain Tomlinſon, I think you are called?'

'My name is Tomlinſon.'

'Why then, Captain Tomlinſon, no liberty, as you call it, will be taken well, that is not extremely delicate, when that lady is mentioned.'

'When you had heard me out, Mr. Lovelace, and had found, I had ſo behaved, as to make the caution neceſſary, it would have been juſt to have given it.—Allow me to ſay, I know what is due to the character of a woman of virtue, as well as any man alive.'

'Why, Sir! Why, Captain Tomlinſon, you ſeem warm. If you intend any-thing by this,' ['O how I trembled!' ſaid the lady, when ſhe took notice of this part of our converſation afterwards] 'I will only ſay, that this is a privileged place. It is at preſent my home, and an aſylum for any gentleman who thinks it worth his while to enquire after me, be the manner or end of this enquiry what it will.'

'I know not, Sir, that I have given occaſion for this. I make no ſcruple to attend you elſewhere, if I am troubleſome here. I was told, I had a warm young gentleman to deal with: but as I knew my intention, and that my commiſſion was an amicable one, I was the leſs concerned about that. I am twice your age, Mr. Lovelace, I dare ſay: but I do aſſure you, that if either my meſſage, or my manner, give you offence, I can ſuſpend the one or the other for a day, or for ever, as you like. And ſo, Sir, any time before eight to-morrow morning, you will let me know your further commands.'—And was going to tell me where he might be found.

'Captain Tomlinſon,' ſaid I, 'you anſwer well. I love a man of ſpirit. Have you not been in the army?'

'I have, Sir; but have turned my ſword into a plough-ſhare, as the Scripture has it.' [There was a clever fellow, Jack!—He was a good man with ſomebody, I warrant! O what a fine coat and cloak for an hypocrite will a text of Scripture, properly applied, make at any time in the eye of the pious!—How eaſily are the good folks taken in!]—'And all my delight,' added he, 'for ſome years paſt, has been in cultivating my paternal eſtate. I love a brave man, Mr. Lovelace, as well as ever I did in my life. But let me tell you, Sir, that when you come to my time of life, you will be of opinion, that there is not ſo much true bravery in youthful choler, as you may now think there is.'

A clever fellow again, Belford!—Ear and heart, both at once, he took in my charmer!—"'Tis well,' ſhe ſays, 'there are ſome who have wiſdom in their anger."

'Well, captain, that is reproof for reproof. So we are upon a foot. And now give me the pleaſure of hearing the import of your commiſſion.'

'Sir, you muſt firſt allow me to repeat my queſtion: are you really, and bona fide, married to Miſs Clariſſa Harlowe? Or are you not yet married?'

'Bluntly put, captain. But if I anſwer that I am, what then?'

Why then, Sir, I ſhall ſay, that you are a man of honour.'

'That I hope I am, whether you ſay it or not, Captain Tomlinſon.'

'Sir, I will be very frank in all I have to ſay on this ſubject—Mr. John Harlowe has lately found out, that you and his niece are both in the ſame lodgings; that you have been long ſo; and that the lady was at the play with you yeſterday ſe'ennight; and he hopes that you are actually married. He has indeed heard that you are; but as he knows your enterprizing temper, and that you have declared, that you diſdain a relation to their family, he is willing by me to have your marriage confirmed from your own mouth, before he take the ſteps he is inclined to take in his niece's favour. You will allow me to ſay, Mr. Lovelace, that he will not be ſatisfied with an anſwer that admits of the leaſt doubt.'

'Let me tell you, Captain Tomlinſon, that it is a high degree of vileneſs for any man to ſuppoſe—'

'Sir—Mr. Lovelace—don't put yourſelf into a paſſion. The lady's relations are jealous of the honour of their family. They have prejudices to over-

'come as well as you—Advantage may 'have been taken—and the lady, at the 'time, not to blame.'

'This lady, Sir, could give no such 'advantages: and if she had, what must 'the man be, Captain Tomlinson, who 'could have taken them?—Do you know 'the lady, Sir?'

'I never had the honour to see her but 'once: and that was at church; and 'should not know her again.'

'Not know her again, Sir?—I thought 'there was not a man living who had 'once seen her, and would not know her 'among a thousand.'

'I remember, Sir, that I thought I 'never saw a finer woman in my life. 'But, Mr. Lovelace, I believe, you will 'allow, that it is better that her relati- 'ons should have wronged you, than you 'the lady. I hope, Sir, you will per- 'mit me to repeat my question?'

Enter Dorcas, in a hurry.

'A gentleman, this minute, Sir, de- 'sires to speak with your honour.—[My 'lady, Sir!—Aside.]

Could the dear creature put Dorcas upon telling this fib, yet want to save me one?

'Desire the gentleman to walk into 'one of the parlours. I will wait on 'him presently.'

[Exit Dorcas.

The dear creature, I doubted not, wanted to instruct me how to answer the captain's home-put. I knew how I intended to answer it—Plumb, thou mayest be sure—But Dorcas's message staggered me. And yet I was upon one of my master-strokes—Which was, To take advantage of the captain's enquiries, and to make her own her marriage before him, as she had done to the people below; and if she had been brought to that, to induce her, for her uncle's satisfaction, to write him a letter of gratitude; which of course must have been signed 'Clarissa 'Lovelace.' I was loth, therefore, thou mayest believe, to attend her sudden commands: and yet, afraid of pushing matters beyond recovery with her, I thought proper to lead him from the question, to account for himself, and for Mr. Harlowe's coming at the knowledge of where we are; and for other particulars which I knew would engage her attention; and which might possibly convince her of the necessity there was for her to acquiesce in the affirmative I was disposed to give. And this for her own sake; for what, as I asked her afterwards, is it to me, whether I am ever reconciled to her family?—A family, Jack, which I must for ever despise.

'You think, captain, that I have an- 'swered doubtfully to the question you 'put. You may think so. And you must 'know, that I have a good deal of pride; 'and, only that you are a gentleman, 'and seem in this affair to be governed 'by generous motives, or I should ill 'brook being interrogated as to my hon- 'our to a lady so dear to me.—But be- 'fore I answer more directly to the 'point, pray satisfy me in a question or 'two that I shall put to you.'

'With all my heart, Sir. Ask me 'what questions you please, I will answer 'them with sincerity and candour.'

'You say, Mr. Harlowe has found 'out that we were at a play together: 'and that we were both in the same 'lodgings—How, pray, came he at his 'knowledge?—For, let me tell you, 'that I have for certain considerations '(not respecting myself, I will assure 'you) condescended, that our abode 'should be kept secret. And this has 'been so strictly observed, that even 'Miss Howe, though she and my be- 'loved correspond, knows not directly 'whither to send to us.'

'Why, Sir, the person who saw you 'at the play, was a tenant of Mr. John 'Harlowe. He watched all your mo- 'tions. When the play was done, he 'followed your coach to your lodgings. 'And early the next day, Sunday, he 'took horse, and acquainted his land- 'lord with what he had observed.'

Lovel. 'How oddly things come about! '—But does any other of the Harlowes 'know where we are?'

Capt. 'It is an absolute secret to every 'other person of the family; and so it 'is intended to be kept: as also that Mr. 'John Harlowe is willing to enter into 'treaty with you, by me, if his niece be 'actually married; for perhaps he is a- 'ware, that he shall have difficulty 'enough with some people to bring 'about the desirable reconciliation, al- 'though he could give them this assur- 'ance.'

'I doubt it not, captain—To James 'Harlowe is all the family-folly owing. '—Fine fools!' [heroically stalking about] 'to be governed by one to whom malice, 'and not genius, gives the busy livelі- 'ness that distinguishes him from a na- 'tural!—But how long, pray, Sir, has 'Mr. John Harlowe been in the pacifick 'disposition?'

'I will tell you, Mr. Lovelace, and 'the occasion; and be very explicit 'upon

'upon it, and upon all that concerns you 'to know of me, and of the commiſſion 'I have undertaken to execute; and 'this the rather, as when you have heard 'me out, you will be ſatisfied, that I 'am not an officious man in this my 'preſent addreſs to you.'

'I am all attention, Captain Tom-'linſon.'

And ſo I doubt not was my beloved.

Capt. 'You muſt know, Sir, that I 'have not been many months in Mr. John 'Harlowe's neighbourhood. I removed 'from Northamptonſhire, partly for the 'ſake of better managing one of two 'executorſhips, which I could not avoid 'engaging in, (the affairs of which fre-'quently call me to town, and are part 'of my preſent buſineſs;) and partly for 'the ſake of occupying a neglected farm, 'which has lately fallen into my hands. 'But though an acquaintance of no lon-'ger ſtanding, and that commencing on 'the bowling-green,' [Uncle John is a great bowler, Belford] 'upon my deciſi-'on of a point to every-one's ſatisfacti-'on, which was appealed to me by all 'the gentlemen; and which might have 'been attended with bad conſequences) 'no two brothers have a more cordial 'eſteem for each other. You know, Mr. 'Lovelace, that there is a conſent, as I 'may call it, in ſome minds, which will 'unite them ſtronger together in a few 'hours, than years can do with others, 'whom yet we ſee not with diſguſt.'

Lovel. 'Very true, captain.'

Capt. 'It was on the foot of this 'avowed friendſhip on both ſides, that 'on Monday the 15th, as I very well 'remember, Mr. Harlowe invited him-'ſelf home with me. And when there, 'he acquainted me with the whole of 'the unhappy affair that had made them 'all ſo uneaſy. Till then I knew it only 'by report; for, intimate as we were, 'I forbore to ſpeak of what was ſo near 'his heart, till he began firſt. And then 'he told me, that he had had an appli-'cation made to him, two or three days 'before, by a gentleman whom he nam-'ed, to induce him not only to be re-'conciled himſelf to his niece, but to 'forward for her a general reconcilia-'tion.

'A like application, he told me, had 'been made to his ſiſter Harlowe, by a 'good woman whom every-body re-'ſpected; who had intimated, that his 'niece, if encouraged, would again put 'herſelf into the protection of her friends, 'and leave you: but if not, that ſhe muſt unavoidably be yours.

'I hope, Mr. Lovelace, I make no 'miſchief.—You look concerned—You 'ſigh, Sir!'

'Proceed, Captain Tomlinſon. Pray 'proceed.'—And I ſighed ſtill more profoundly.

Capt. 'They all thought it extremely 'particular, that a lady ſhould decline 'marriage with a man ſhe had ſo lately 'gone away with.'

'Pray, captain—Pray, Mr. Tomlin-'ſon—No more of this ſubject. My 'beloved is an angel. In every-thing un-'blameable. Whatever faults there have 'been, have been theirs and mine. What 'you would further ſay, is, that the un-'forgiving family rejected her applicati-'on. They did. She and I had had a miſ-'underſtanding. The falling out of lovers '—you know, captain.—We have been 'happier ever ſince.'

Capt. 'Well, Sir; but Mr. John 'Harlowe could not but better conſider 'the matter afterwards. And he de-'ſired my advice how to act in it. He 'told me that no father ever loved a 'daughter as he loved this niece of his; 'whom, indeed, he uſed to call his 'daughter-niece. He ſaid, ſhe had really 'been unkindly treated by her brother 'and ſiſter: and as your alliance, Sir, 'was far from being a diſcredit to their 'family, he would do his endeavour to 'reconcile all parties, if he could be 'ſure that ye were actually man and 'wife.'

Lovel. 'And what, pray, captain, 'was your advice?'

Capt. 'I gave it as my opinion, that 'if his niece were unworthily treated, 'and in diſtreſs, (as he apprehended 'from the application to him) he would 'ſoon hear of her again: but that it 'was likely, that this application was 'made without expecting it would ſuc-'ceed; and as a ſalvo only, to herſelf, 'for marrying without their conſent. 'And the rather thought I ſo, as he had 'told me, that it came from a young 'lady her friend, and not in a direct way 'from herſelf; which young lady was no 'favourite of the family; and therefore 'would hardly have been employed, 'had ſucceſs been expected.'

Lovel. 'Very well, Captain Tom-'linſon—Pray proceed.'

Capt. 'Here the matter reſted till laſt 'Sunday evening, when Mr. John Har-'lowe came to me with the man who 'had ſeen you and your lady (as I pre-'ſume ſhe is) at the play; and who had 'aſſured him, that you both lodged in 'the ſame houſe.—And then the appli'cation

'cation having been ſo lately made, 'which implied, that you were not then 'married, he was ſo uneaſy for his 'niece's honour, that I adviſed him to 'diſpatch to town ſome one in whom he 'could confide, to make proper en-'quiries.'

Lovel. 'Very well, captain—And was 'ſuch a perſon employed on ſuch an er-'rand by her uncle?'

Capt. 'A truſty and diſcreet perſon 'was accordingly ſent; and laſt Tueſ-'day, I think it was, (for he returned 'to us on the Wedneſday) he made the 'enquiries among the neighbours firſt.' [The very enquiry, Jack, that gave us all ſo much uneaſineſs.] 'But finding that 'none of them could give any ſatisfac-'tory account, the lady's woman was 'come at, who declared, that you were 'actually married. But the enquiriſt 'keeping himſelf on the reſerve as to his 'employers, the girl refuſed to tell the 'day, or to give him other particulars.'

Lovel. 'You give a very clear ac-'count of every thing, Captain Tomlin-'ſon. Pray proceed.'

Capt. 'The gentleman returned: and 'on his report Mr. Harlowe, having 'ſtill doubts, and being willing to pro-'ceed on ſome grounds in ſo important 'a point, beſought me (as my affairs 'called me frequently to town) to un-'dertake this matter. "You, Mr. "Tomlinſon," he was pleaſed to ſay, "have children of your own: you know "the world: you know what I drive at: "you will proceed, I am ſure, with un-"derſtanding and ſpirit: and whatever "you are ſatisfied with, ſhall ſatisfy "me."

Enter Dorcas again in a hurry.

'Sir, the gentleman is impatient.'

'I will attend him preſently.'

The captain then accounted for his not calling in perſon, when he had rea-ſon to think us here.

He ſaid he had buſineſs of conſequence a few miles out of town, whither he thought he muſt have gone yeſterday, and having been obliged to put off his little journey till this day, and under-ſtanding that we were within, not know-ing whether he ſhould have ſuch ano-ther opportunity, he was willing to try his good fortune before he ſet out; and this made him come booted and ſpur-red, as I ſaw him.

He dropped a hint in commendation of the people of the houſe; but it was in ſuch a way, as to give no room to ſuſ-pect that he thought it neceſſary to en-quire after the character of perſons who make ſo genteel an appearance, as he obſerved they do.

And here let me remark, that my be-loved might collect another circumſtance in favour of the people below, had ſhe doubted their characters, from the ſilence of her uncle's enquiriſt on Tueſ-day among the neighbours.

Capt. 'And now, Sir, that I believe 'I have ſatisfied you in every thing re-'lating to my commiſſion, I hope you 'will permit me to repeat my queſtion '—which is—'

Enter Dorcas again, out of breath.

'Sir, the gentleman will ſtep up to 'you. [My lady is impatient. She wonders 'at your honour's delay.' Aſide.]

'Excuſe me, captain, for one mo-'ment.'

'I have ſtaid my full time, Mr. Love-'lace. What may reſult from my queſ-'tion and your anſwer, whatever it 'ſhall be, may take us up time.—And 'you are engaged. Will you permit me 'to attend you in the morning, before I 'ſet out on my return?'

'You will then breakfaſt with me, 'captain?'

'It muſt be early if I do. I muſt reach 'my own houſe to-morrow night, or I 'ſhall make the beſt of wives unhappy. 'And I have two or three places to call 'at in my way.'

'It ſhall be by ſeven o'clock, if you 'pleaſe, captain. We are early folks. 'And this I will tell you, that if ever 'I am reconciled to a family ſo impla-'cable as I have always found the Har-'lowes to be, it muſt be by the media-'tion of ſo cool and ſo moderate a gen-'tleman as yourſelf.'

And ſo, with the higheſt civilities on both ſides, we parted. But for the pri-vate ſatisfaction of ſo good a man, I left him out of doubt that we were man and wife, though I did not directly aver it.

LETTER XLIX.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

SUNDAY NIGHT.

THIS Captain Tomlinſon is one of the happieſt as well as one of the beſt men in the world. What would I give to ſtand as high in my beloved's opinion as he does! But yet I am as good a man as he, were I to tell my own ſtory, and have equal credit given to it. But the devil ſhould have had him before I had had ſeen him on the account he came upon, had I thought I ſhould not have anſwered my principal end in it. I hinted to thee in my laſt what that was.

But to the particulars of the conferrence between my fair-one and me, on her haſty meſſages; which I was loth to come to, becauſe ſhe has had an half triumph over me in it.

After I had attended the captain down to the very paſſage, I returned to the dining-room, and put on a joyful air, on my beloved's entrance into it—'O 'my deareſt creature,' ſaid I, 'let me 'congratulate you on a proſpect ſo a-'greeable to your wiſhes!' And I ſnatched her hand, and ſmothered it with kiſſes.

I was going on; when interrupting me, 'You ſee, Mr. Lovelace,' ſaid ſhe, 'how you have embarraſſed yourſelf, 'by your obliquities! You ſee, that you 'have not been able to return a direct 'anſwer to a plain and honeſt queſtion, 'though upon it depends all the happi-'neſs on the proſpect of which you con-'gratulate me.'

'You know, my beſt love, what my 'prudent, and I will ſay, my kind mo-'tives were, for giving out that we were 'married. You ſee, that I have taken 'no advantage of it; and that no in-'convenience has followed it. You ſee 'that your uncle wants only to be aſ-'ſured from ourſelves, that it is ſo——'

'Not another word on this ſubject, 'Mr. Lovelace. I will not only riſque, 'but I will forfeit, the reconciliation ſo 'near my heart, rather than I will go on 'to countenance a ſtory ſo untrue!'

'My deareſt ſoul—Would you have 'me appear—'

'I would have you appear, Sir, as 'you are! I am reſolved that I will ap-'pear to my uncle's friend, and to my 'uncle, as I am.'

'For one week, my deareſt life! Can-'not you for one week—only till the 'ſettlements—'

'Not for one hour, with my own con-'ſent. You don't know, Sir, how much 'I have been afflicted, that I have ap-'peared to the people below what I am 'not. But my uncle, Sir, ſhall never 'have it to upbraid me, nor will I to 'upbraid myſelf, that I have wilfully 'paſſed upon him in falſe lights.'

'What, my dear, would you have 'me ſay to the captain to-morrow morn-'ing? I have given him room to think—'

'Then put him right, Mr. Lovelace. 'Tell the truth. Tell him what you 'pleaſe of the favour of your relations 'to me: tell him what you will about the 'ſettlements: and if, when drawn, you 'will ſubmit them to his peruſal and ap-'probation, it will ſhew him how much 'you are in earneſt.'

'My deareſt life!—Do you think, that 'he would diſapprove of the terms I 'have offered?'

'No.'

'Then may I be accurſed, if I willing-'ly ſubmit to be trampled under-foot by 'my enemies!'

'And may I, Mr. Lovelace, never be 'happy in this life, if I ſubmit to the 'paſſing upon my uncle Harlowe a wil-'ful and premeditated falſhood for 'truth! I have too long laboured under 'the affliction which the rejection of all 'my friends has given me, to purchaſe 'my reconciliation with them now at ſo 'dear a price as that of my veracity.'

'The women below, my dear—'

'What are the women below to me? 'I want not to eſtabliſh myſelf with 'them. Need they know all that paſſes 'between my relations and you and 'me?'

'Neither are they any-thing to me, 'Madam. Only, that when, for the 'ſake of preventing the fatal miſchiefs 'which might have attended your bro-'ther's projects, I have made them 'think us married, I would not appear 'to them in a light which you yourſelf 'think ſo ſhocking. By my ſoul, Ma-'dam, I had rather die, than contra-'dict myſelf ſo flagrantly, after I have 'related to them ſo many circumſtances 'of our marriage.'

'Well, Sir, the women may believe 'what they pleaſe. That I have given 'countenance to what you told them, is 'my error. The many circumſtances 'which you own one untruth has drawn 'you in to relate, is a juſtification of my 'refuſal in the preſent caſe.'

'Don't you ſee, Madam, that your 'uncle wiſhes to find that we are marri-'ed? May not the ceremony be private-'ly over, before his mediation can take 'place?'

'Urge this point no farther, Mr. 'Lovelace. If you will not tell the truth, 'I will to-morrow morning (if I ſee 'Captain Tomlinſon) tell it myſelf. In-'deed I will.'

'Will you, Madam, conſent that 'things paſs as before with the people 'below? This mediation of Tomlinſon 'may come to nothing. Your brother's 'ſchemes may be purſued; the rather, 'that now he will know (perhaps from 'your uncle) that you are not under a 'legal

'legal protection.—You will, at leaſt, 'conſent, that things paſs here as be-'fore?'

'To permit this, is to go on in an er-'ror, Mr. Lovelace. But as the occa-'ſion for ſo doing (if there can be in your 'opinion an occaſion that will warrant 'an untruth) will, as I preſume, ſoon 'be over, I ſhall the leſs diſpute that 'point with you. But a new error I will 'not be guilty of, if I can avoid it.'

'Can I, do you think, Madam, have 'any diſhonourable view in the ſtep I 'ſuppoſed you would not ſcruple to take 'towards a reconciliation with your own 'family? Not for my own ſake, you know, 'did I wiſh you to take it; for what is 'it to me, if I am never reconciled to 'your family? I want no favours from 'them.'

'I hope, Mr. Lovelace, there is no 'occaſion, in our preſent not diſagree-'able ſituation, to anſwer ſuch a queſ-'tion. And let me ſay, that I ſhall think 'my proſpects ſtill more agreeable, if, 'to-morrow morning, you will not only 'own the very truth, but give my un-'cle's friend ſuch an account of the ſteps 'you have taken, and are taking, as may 'keep up my uncle's favourable inten-'tions towards me. This you may do 'under what reſtrictions of ſecreſy you 'pleaſe. Captain Tomlinſon is a pru-'dent man; a promoter of family-peace, 'you find; and, I dare ſay, may be 'made a friend.'

I ſaw there was no help. I ſaw that the inflexible Harlowe ſpirit was all up in her.—A little witch!—A little—Forgive me, Love, for calling her names!—And ſo I ſaid, with an air, 'We have 'had too many miſunderſtandings, Ma-'dam, for me to wiſh for new ones: I 'will obey you without reſerve. Had I 'not thought I ſhould have obliged you 'by the other method, (eſpecially as the 'ceremony might have been over, be-'fore any-thing could have operated 'from your uncle's intentions, and of 'conſequence no untruth perſiſted in) I 'would not have propoſed it. But think 'not, my beloved creature, that you 'ſhall enjoy, without condition, this tri-'umph over my judgment.'

And then, claſping my arms about her, I gave her averted cheek (her charming lip deſigned) a fervent kiſs.—'And your 'forgiveneſs of this ſweet freedom,' [Bowing] 'is that condition.'

She was not mortally offended. And now muſt I make out the reſt as well as I can. But this I will tell thee, that although her triumph has not diminiſhed my love for her; yet it has ſtimulated me more than ever to revenge, as thou wilt be apt to call it. But victory or conqueſt is the more proper word.

There is a pleaſure, 'tis true, in ſubduing one of theſe watchful beauties. But, by my ſoul, Belford, men of our caſt take twenty times the pains to be rogues, that it would coſt them to be honeſt: and dearly, with the ſweat of our brows, and to the puzzling of our brains, (to ſay nothing of the hazards we run) do we earn our purchaſe; and ought not therefore to be grudged our ſucceſs when we meet with it—Eſpecially as, when we have obtained our end, ſatiety ſoon follows; and leaves us little or nothing to ſhew for it. But this, indeed, may be ſaid of all worldly delights. And is not that a grave reflection from me?

I was willing to write up to the time. Although I have not carried my principal point, I ſhall make ſomething turn out in my favour from Captain Tomlinſon's errand. But let me give thee this caution; that thou do not pretend to judge of my devices by parts; but have patience till thou ſeeſt the whole. But once more I ſwear, that I will not be out-Norris'd by a pair of novices. And yet I am very apprehenſive at times, of the conſequences of Miſs Howe's ſmuggling ſcheme.

My conſcience, I ſhould think, ought not to reproach me for a contrivance, which is juſtified by the contrivances of two ſuch girls as theſe: one of whom (the more excellent of the two) I have always, with her own approbation as I imagine, propoſed for my imitation.

But here, Jack, is the thing that concludes me, and caſes my heart with adamant: I find by Miſs Howe's letters, that it is owing to her, that I have made no greater progreſs with my blooming fair-one. She loves me. The ipecacuanha contrivance convinces me, that ſhe loves me. Where there is love, there muſt be confidence, or a deſire of having reaſon to confide. Generoſity founded on my ſuppoſed generoſity, has taken hold of her heart. Shall I not now ſee (ſince I muſt be for ever unhappy, if I marry her, and leave any trial uneſſayed) what I can make of her love, and her newly-raiſed confidence?—Will it not be to my glory to ſucceed? And to hers and to the honour of her ſex, if I cannot?—Where then will be the hurt to either, to make the trial? And cannot I, as I have often ſaid, reward her when I will by marriage?

'Tis

'Tis late, or rather early; for the day begins to dawn upon me. I am plaguy heavy. Perhaps I need not to have told thee that. But will only indulge a doze in my chair for an hour; then ſhake myſelf, waſh and refreſh. At my time of life, with ſuch a conſtitution as I am bleſſed with, that's all that's wanted.

Good night to me!—it cannot be broad day till I am awake.—Aw-w-w-whaugh—Pox of this yawning!

Is not thy uncle dead yet?

What's come to mine, that he writes not to my laſt?—Hunting after more wiſdom of nations, I ſuppoſe!—Yaw-yaw-yawning again!—Pen, be gone!

LETTER L.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

MONDAY, MAY 29.

NOW have I eſtabliſhed myſelf for ever in my charmer's heart.

The captain came at ſeven, as promiſed, and ready equipped for his journey. My beloved choſe not to give us her company till our firſt converſation was over—Aſhamed, I ſuppoſe, to be preſent at that part of it, which was to reſtore her to her virgin ſtate by my confeſſion, after her wifehood had been reported to her uncle. But ſhe took her cue nevertheleſs, and liſtened to all that paſſed.

The modeſteſt women, Jack, muſt think, and think deeply ſometimes. I wonder whether they ever bluſh at thoſe things by themſelves, at which they have ſo charming a knack of bluſhing in company. If not; and if bluſhing be a ſign of grace or modeſty; have not the ſex as great a command over their bluſhes, as they are ſaid to have over their tears? This reflection would lead me a great way into female minds, were I diſpoſed to purſue it.

I told the captain, that I would prevent his queſtion; and accordingly (after I had enjoined the ſtricteſt ſecreſy, that no advantage might be given to James Harlowe; and which he anſwered for as well on Mr. Harlowe's part as his own) I acknowledged nakedly and fairly the whole truth—To wit, That we were not yet married. I gave him hints of the cauſes of procraſtination. Some of them owing to unhappy miſunderſtandings: but chiefly to the lady's deſire of previous reconciliation with her friends; and to a delicacy that had no example.

Leſs nice ladies than this, Jack, love to have delays, wilful and ſtudied delays, imputed to them in theſe caſes—Yet are indelicate in their affected delicacy; for do they not thereby tacitly confeſs, that they expect to be the greateſt gainers in wedlock; and that there is ſelf-denial in the pride they take in delaying?

I told him the reaſon of our paſſing to the people below as married—Yet as under a vow of reſtriction, as to conſummation, which had kept us both to the height, one of forbearing, the other of vigilant punctilio; even to the denial of thoſe innocent freedoms, which betrothed lovers never ſcruple to allow and to take.

I then communicated to him a copy of my propoſal of ſettlement; the contents of my letter of invitation to Lord M. to be her nuptial-father; and of my lord's generous reply. But ſaid, that having apprehenſions of delay from his infirmities, and my beloved chuſing by all means (and that from principles of unrequited duty) a private ſolemnization, I had written to excuſe his lordſhip's preſence; and expected an anſwer every hour.

The ſettlements, I told him, were actually drawing by Counſellor Williams, of whoſe eminence he muſt have heard.

He had.

And of the truth of this he might ſatisfy himſelf before he went out of town.

When theſe were drawn, approved, and engroſſed, nothing, I ſaid, but ſigning, and the nomination of my happy day, would be wanting. I had a pride, I declared, in doing the higheſt juſtice, to ſo beloved a creature, of my own voluntary motion, and without the intervention of a family from whom I had received the greateſt inſults. And this being our preſent ſituation, I was contented that Mr. John Harlowe ſhould ſuſpend his reconciliatory purpoſes, till our marriage were actually ſolemnized.

The captain was highly delighted with all I ſaid: yet owned, that as his dear friend Mr. Harlowe had expreſſed himſelf greatly pleaſed to hear that we were actually married, he could have wiſhed it had been ſo. But nevertheleſs, he doubted not that all would be well.

He ſaw my reaſons, he ſaid, and approved of them, for making the gentlewomen below [Whom again he underſtood to be good ſort of people] believe, that the ceremony had paſſed; which ſo well accounted for what the lady's maid had told Mr. Harlowe's friend. Mr. James Harlowe, he ſaid, had certainly ends to anſwer in keeping open the breach; and as certainly had formed a design to get his sister out of my hands. Wherefore it as much imported his worthy friend to keep this treaty a secret, as it did me; at least, till he had formed his party, and taken his measures. Ill-will and passion were dreadful misrepresenters. It was amazing to him, that animosity could be carried so high against a man capable of views so pacifick and so honourable, and who had shewn such a command of his temper, in this whole transaction, as I had done. Generosity, indeed, in every case, where love of stratagem and intrigue (I would excuse him) were not concerned, was a part of my character.

He was proceeding, when breakfast being ready, in came the empress of my heart, irradiating all around her, as with a glory—A benignity and graciousness in her aspect, that, though natural to it, had been long banished from it.

Next to prostration lowly bowed the captain. O how the sweet creature smiled her approbation of him! Reverence from one begets reverence from another. Men are more of monkeys in imitation, than they think themselves—Involuntarily, in a manner, I bent my knee—'My 'dearest life—' and made a very fine speech on presenting the captain to her. No title, myself, to her lip or cheek, 'tis well he attempted not either. He was indeed ready to worship her—could only touch her charming hand.

'I have told the captain, my dear 'creature—' And then I briefly repeated (as if I had supposed she had not heard it) all I had told him.

He was astonished, that any-body could be displeased one moment with such an angel. He undertook her cause as the highest degree of merit to himself.

Never, I must need say, did the angel so much look the angel. All placid, serene, smiling, self-assured: a more lovely flush than usual heightening her natural graces, and adding charms even to radiance, to her charming complexion.

After we had seated ourselves, the agreeable subject was renewed, as we took our chocolate. How happy should she be in her uncle's restored favour!

The captain engaged for it—No more delays, he hoped, on her part! Let the happy day be but once over, all would then be right. But was it improper to ask for copies of my proposals, and of her answer, in order to shew them to his dear friend her uncle?

As Mr. Lovelace pleased—O that the dear creature would always say so!

It must be in strict confidence then, I said. But would it not be better to shew her uncle the draught of the settlements, when drawn?'

'And will you be so good, as to allow 'of this, Mr. Lovelace?'

There, Belford! We were once The Quarrelsome, but now we are The Polite Lovers.

'Indeed, my dear creature, I will, 'if you desire it, and if Captain Tomlin-'son will engage, that Mr. Harlowe shall 'keep them absolutely a secret; that I 'may not be subjected to the cavil and 'controul of any others of a family that 'have used me so very ill.'

'Now, indeed, Sir, you are very oblig-'ing.'

Dost think, Jack, that my face did not now also shine?

I held out my hand (first consecrating it with a kiss) for hers. She condescended to give it me. I pressed it to my lips: 'You know not, Captain Tomlinson,' (with an air) 'all storms overblown, 'what an happy man—'

'Charming couple!' [His hands lifted up] 'How will my good friend rejoice! 'O that he were present!—You know 'not, Madam, how dear you still are to 'your uncle Harlowe!'

'I am unhappy ever to have disobliged 'him.'

'Not too much of that, however, fairest!' thought I.

The captain repeated his resolutions of service, and that in so acceptable a manner, that the dear creature wished, that neither he, nor any of his, might ever want a friend of equal benevolence.

Nor any of his, she said; for the captain brought it in, that he had five children living, by one of the best wives and mothers, whose excellent management made him as happy, as if his eight hundred pounds a year (which was all he had to boast of) were two thousand.

Without œconomy, the oraculous lady said, no estate was large enough. With it, the least was not too small.

'Lie still, teazing villain! lie still!'—I was only speaking to my conscience, Jack.

'And let me ask you, Mr. Lovelace,' said the captain; 'yet not so much from 'doubt, as that I may proceed upon 'sure grounds—are you willing to co-'operate with my dear friend in a gene-'ral reconciliation?'

'Let me tell you, Mr. Tomlinson, 'that

'that if it can be diſtinguiſhed, that my 'readineſs to make up with a family, of 'whoſe generoſity I have not had reaſon 'to think highly, is entirely owing to 'the value I have for this angel of a wo-'man, I will not only co-operate with 'Mr. John Harlowe, as you aſk; but I 'will meet Mr. James Harlowe, ſenior, 'and his lady, all the way. And fur-'thermore, to make the ſon James and 'his ſiſter Arabella quite eaſy, I will 'abſolutely diſclaim any further intereſt, 'whether living or dying, in any of the 'three brothers eſtates; contenting my-'ſelf with what my beloved's grandfa-'ther has bequeathed to her: for I have 'reaſon to be abundantly ſatisfied with 'my own circumſtances and proſpects— 'Enough rewarded, were ſhe not to bring 'a ſhilling in dowry, in a woman who 'has a merit ſuperior to all the goods of 'fortune.'—True as the goſpel, Bel-ford!—Why had not this ſcene a real foundation!

The dear creature, by her eyes, ex-preſſed her gratitude, before her lips could utter it. 'O Mr. Lovelace!' ſaid ſhe—'You have infinitely—' And there ſhe ſtopt.

The captain run over in my praiſe. He was really affected.

'O that I had not ſuch a mixture of 'revenge and pride in my love!' thought I. —But (my old plea) cannot I make her amends at any time? And is not her vir-tue in the height of it's probation?—Would ſhe lay aſide, like the friends of my uncontending Roſebud, all thoughts of defiance—Would ſhe throw herſelf upon my mercy, and try me but one fortnight in the life of honour—What then?—I cannot ſay, What then.

Do not deſpiſe me, Jack, for my in-conſiſtency—in no two letters perhaps agreeing with myſelf—Who expects conſiſtency in men of our character?—But I am mad with love—Fired by re-venge—Puzzled with my own devices —My invention is my curſe—My pride my puniſhment—Drawn five or ſix ways at once, can ſhe poſſibly be ſo unhappy as I?—O why, why, was this woman ſo divinely excellent!—Yet how know I that ſhe is? What have been her trials? Have I had the courage to make a ſingle one upon her perſon, though a thouſand upon her temper?—Know, I hope, to make her afraid of ever diſobliging me more!

I MUST baniſh reflection, or I am a loſt man. For theſe two hours paſt have I hated myſelf for my own contrivances. And this not only from what I *have re-*lated to thee; but from what I have further to relate. But I have now once more ſteeled my heart. My vengeance is uppermoſt; for I have been re-peruſing ſome of Miſs Howe's virulence. The con-tempt they have both held me in, I can-not bear.

The happieſt breakfaſt-time, my be-loved owned, that ſhe had ever known ſince ſhe had left her father's houſe; [She might have let this alone.] The captain renewed all his proteſtations of ſervice. He would write me word how his dear friend received the account he ſhould give him of the happy ſituation of our affairs, and what he thought of the ſet-tlements, as ſoon as I ſhould ſend him the draughts ſo kindly promiſed. And we parted with great profeſſions of mu-tual eſteem; my beloved putting up vows for the ſucceſs of his generous media-tion.

When I returned from attending the captain down ſtairs, which I did to the outward door, my beloved met me as I entered the dining-room; complacency reigning in every lovely feature.

'You ſee me already,' ſaid ſhe, 'ano-'ther creature. You know not, Mr. 'Lovelace, how near my heart this ho-'ped-for reconciliation is. I am now 'willing to baniſh every diſagreeable 'remembrance. You know not, Sir, 'how much you have obliged me. And, 'Oh, Mr. Lovelace, how happy ſhall I 'be, when my heart is lightened from 'the all-ſinking weight of a father's 'curſe! When my dear mamma—You 'don't know, Sir, half the excellences 'of my dear mamma! and what a kind 'heart ſhe has, when it is left to follow 'it's own impulſes—When this bleſſed 'mamma ſhall once more fold me to her 'indulgent boſom! When I ſhall again 'have uncles and aunts, and a brother 'and ſiſter, all ſtriving who ſhall ſhew 'moſt kindneſs and favour to the poor 'outcaſt, then no more an outcaſt—And 'you, Mr. Lovelace, to behold all this, 'and to be received into a family ſo dear 'to me, with welcome—What though 'a little cold at firſt? when they come 'to know you better, and to ſee you 'oftener, no freſh cauſes of diſguſt oc-'curring, and you, as I hope, having 'entered upon a new courſe, all will be 'warmer and warmer love on both ſides, 'till every-one will perhaps wonder, 'how they came to ſet themſelves againſt 'you.'

on a ſudden, as if recollecting that ſhe had been led by her joy to an expreſſion of it which ſhe had not intended I ſhould ſee, ſhe retired to her chamber with precipitation; leaving me almoſt as unable to ſtand it as herſelf.

In ſhort, I was—I want words to ſay how I was—My noſe had been made to tingle before; my eyes have before been made to gliſten by this ſoul-moving beauty; but ſo very much affected, I never was—for, trying to check my ſenſibility, it was too ſtrong for me, and I even ſobbed, and was forced to turn from her before ſhe had well finiſhed her affecting ſpeech.

I want, methinks, now I have owned the odd ſenſation, to deſcribe it to thee—The thing was ſo ſtrange to me—Something choaking, as it were, in my throat—I know not how—Yet, I muſt needs ſay, though I am out of countenance upon the recollection, that there was ſomething very pretty in it; and I wiſh I could know it again, that I might have a more perfect idea of it, and be better able to deſcribe it to thee.

But this effect of her joy on ſuch an occaſion gives me a high notion of what that virtue muſt be, [What other name can I call it?] which in a mind ſo capable of delicate tranſport, ſhould be able to make ſo charming a creature, in her very bloom, all froſt and ſnow to every advance of love from the man ſhe hates not. This muſt be all from education too—Muſt it not, Belford? Can education have ſtronger force in a woman's heart than nature?—Sure it cannot. But if it can, how entirely right are parents to cultivate their daughters minds, and to inſpire them with notions of reſerve and diſtance to our ſex; and indeed to make them think highly of their own! For pride is an excellent ſubſtitute, let me tell thee, where virtue ſhines not out, as the ſun, in it's own unborrowed luſtre.

LETTER LI.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

AND now it is time to confeſs, (and yet I know that thy conjectures are aforehand with my expoſition) that this Captain Tomlinſon, who is ſo great a favourite with my charmer, and who takes ſo much delight in healing breaches, and reconciling differences, is neither a greater man nor a leſs, than honeſt Patrick M'Donald, attended by a diſcarded footman of his own finding out.

Thou knoweſt what a various-lifed raſcal he is; and to what better hopes born and educated. But that ingenious knack of forgery, for which he was expelled the Dublin univerſity, and a detection ſince in evidenceſhip, have been his ruin. For theſe have thrown him from one country to another; and at laſt, into the way of life, which would make him a fit huſband for Miſs Howe's Townſend with her contrabands. He is, thou knoweſt, admirably qualified for any enterprize that requires adroitneſs and ſolemnity. And can there, after all, be a higher piece of juſtice, than to keep one ſmuggler in readineſs to play againſt another?

'Well, but, Lovelace,' (methinks thou queſtioneſt) 'how cameſt thou to venture 'upon ſuch a contrivance as this, when, 'as thou haſt told me, the lady uſed to 'be a month at a time at this uncle's; 'and muſt, therefore, in all probability, 'know, that there was not a Captain 'Tomlinſon in all the neighbourhood; 'at leaſt no one of the name ſo intimate 'with him, as this man pretends to be?'

This objection, Jack, is ſo natural a one, that I could not help obſerving to my charmer, that ſhe muſt ſurely have heard her uncle ſpeak of this gentleman. 'No,' ſhe ſaid, ſhe never had. Beſides ſhe had not been at her uncle Harlowe's for near ten months, [This I had heard her ſay before:] and there were ſeveral gentlemen who uſed the ſame green, whom ſhe knew not.

We are all very ready, thou knoweſt, to believe what we like.

And what was the reaſon, thinkeſt thou, that ſhe had not been of ſo long a time at this uncle's?—Why this old ſinner, who imagines himſelf entitled to call me to account for my freedoms with the ſex, has lately fallen into familiarities, as it is ſuſpected, with his houſekeeper; who aſſumes airs upon it.—A curſed deluding ſex!—In youth, middle-age, or dotage, they take us all in.

Doſt thou not ſee, however, that this houſekeeper knows nothing, nor is to know any-thing, of the treaty of reconciliation deſigned to be ſet on foot; and therefore the uncle always comes to the captain, the captain goes not to the uncle? And this I ſurmiſed to the lady. And then it was a natural ſuggeſtion, that the captain was the rather applied to, as he is a ſtranger to the reſt of the family—Need I tell thee the meaning of all this?

But this intrigue of the ancient is a piece of private hiſtory, the truth of which my beloved cares not to own, and indeed indeed affects to disbelieve: as she does also some puisny gallantries of her foolish brother; which, by way of recrimination, I have hinted at, without naming my informant in their family.

'Well but,' methinks thou questioneſt again, 'is it not probable that Miſs 'Howe will make enquiry after ſuch a 'man as Tomlinſon?—And when ſhe 'cannot——'

I know what thou wouldſt ſay—But I have no doubt, that Wilſon will be ſo good, if I deſire it, as to give into my own hands any letter that may be brought by Collins to his houſe, for a week to come. And now I hope thou art ſatisfied.

I will conclude with a ſhort ſtory.

Two neighbouring ſovereigns were at war together, about ſome pitiful chuck-farthing thing or other; no matter what; for the leaſt trifles will ſet princes and children at loggerheads. Their armies had been drawn up in battalia ſome days, and the news of a deciſive action was expected every hour to arrive at each court. At laſt iſſue was joined; a bloody battle was fought; and a fellow who had been a ſpectator of it, arriving, with the news of a complete victory, at the capital of one of the princes ſome time before the appointed couriers, the bells were ſet a ringing, bonfires and illuminations were made, and the people went to bed intoxicated with joy and good liquor. But the next day all was reverſed: the victorious enemy, purſuing his advantage, was expected every hour at the gates of the almoſt defenceleſs capital. The firſt reporter was hereupon ſought for, and found; and being queſtioned, pleaded a great deal of merit, in that he had, in ſo diſmal a ſituation, taken ſuch a ſpace of time from the diſtreſs of his fellow-citizens, and given it to feſtivity, as were the hours between the falſe good news and the real bad.

Do thou, Belford, make the application. This I know, that I have given greater joy to my beloved, than ſhe had thought would ſo ſoon fall to her ſhare. And as the human life is properly ſaid to be chequer-work, no doubt but a perſon of her prudence will make the beſt of it, and ſet off ſo much good againſt ſo much bad, in order to ſtrike as juſt a balance as poſſible.

The lady, in three ſeveral letters, acquaints her friend with the moſt material paſſages and converſations contained in thoſe of Mr. Lovelace preceding. Theſe are her words, on relating what the commiſſion of the pretended Tomlinſon was, after the apprehenſions that his diſtant enquiry had given her:

'At laſt, my dear, all theſe doubts 'and fears were cleared up, and baniſh-'ed; and, in their place, a delightful 'proſpect was opened to me. For it 'comes happily out, (but at preſent it 'muſt be an abſolute ſecret, for reaſons 'which I ſhall mention in the ſequel) 'that the gentleman was ſent by my un-'cle Harlowe, [I thought he could not 'be angry with me for ever:] all owing 'to the converſation that paſſed between 'your good Mr. Hickman and him. 'For although Mr. Hickman's applica-'tion was too harſhly rejected at the time, 'my uncle could not but think better of 'it afterwards, and of the arguments 'that worthy gentleman uſed in my fa-'vour.

'Who, upon a paſſionate repulſe, 'would deſpair of having a reaſonable 'requeſt granted?—Who would not, by 'gentleneſs and condeſcenſion, endea-'vour to leave favourable impreſſions 'upon an angry mind; which, when it 'comes coolly to reflect, may induce it 'to work itſelf into a condeſcending 'temper? To requeſt a favour, as I have 'often ſaid, is one thing; to challenge 'it as our due, is another. And what 'right has a petitioner to be angry at a 'repulſe, if he has not a right to demand 'what he ſues for as a debt?'

She deſcribes Captain Tomlinſon, on his breakfaſt viſit, to be, a grave good ſort of a man, And in another place, a genteel man, of great gravity, and a good aſpect; ſhe believes upwards of fifty years of age. 'I liked him,' ſays ſhe, 'as ſoon as I ſaw him.'

As her proſpects are now, as ſhe ſays, more favourable than heretofore, ſhe wiſhes, that her hopes of Mr. Lovelace's ſo often-promiſed reformation were better grounded than ſhe is afraid they can be.

'We have both been extremely puz-'zled, my dear,' ſays ſhe, 'to recon-'cile ſome parts of Mr. Lovelace's character 'with other parts of it: his good with 'his bad; ſuch of the former in parti-'cular, as his generoſity to his tenants; 'his bounty to the innkeeper's daughter; 'his readineſs to put me upon doing 'kind things by my good Mrs. Norton, 'and others.

'A ſtrange mixture in his mind, as I 'have told him! For he is certainly (as

'I have

'I have reaſon to ſay, looking back upon his paſt behaviour to me in twenty inſtances) a hard-hearted man. Indeed, my dear, I have thought more than once, that he had rather ſee me in tears, than give me reaſon to be pleaſed with him.

'My couſin Morden ſays, that free livers are remorſeleſs. And ſo they muſt be in the very nature of things.

'Mr. Lovelace is a proud man. We have both long ago obſerved, that he is. And I am truly afraid, that his very generoſity is more owing to his pride and his vanity, than that philanthropy (ſhall I call it?) which diſtinguiſhes a beneficent mind.

'Money he values not, but as a means to ſupport his pride and his independence. And it is eaſy, as I have often thought, for a perſon to part with a ſecondary appetite, when, by ſo doing, he can promote or gratify a firſt.

'I am afraid my dear, that there muſt have been ſome fault in his education. His natural bias was not, I fancy, ſufficiently attended to. He was inſtructed, perhaps (as his power was likely to be large) to do good and beneficent actions; but not, I doubt, from proper motives.

'If he had, his generoſity would not have ſtopt at pride, but would have ſtruck into humanity; and then would he not have contented himſelf with doing praiſe-worthy things by fits and ſtarts, or, as if relying on the doctrine of merits, he hoped by a good action to atone for a bad one; but he would have been uniformly noble, and done the good for it's own ſake.

'O my dear! what a lot have I drawn! Pride this poor man's virtue; and revenge his other predominating quality!—This one conſolation, however, remains: he is not an infidel, and unbeliever: had he been an infidel, there would have been no room at all for hope of him; but (priding himſelf, as he does, in his fertile invention) he would have been utterly abandoned, irreclaimable, and a ſavage.'

When ſhe comes to relate thoſe occaſions, which Mr. Lovelace in his narrative acknowledges himſelf to be affected by, ſhe thus expreſſes herſelf:

'He endeavoured, as once before, to conceal his emotion. But why, my dear, ſhould theſe men (for Mr. Lovelace is not ſingular in this) think themſelves above giving theſe beautiful proofs of a feeling heart? Were it in my power again to chuſe, or to refuſe, I would reject the man with contempt, who ſought to ſuppreſs, or offered to deny, the power of being viſibly affected upon proper occaſions, as either a ſavage-hearted creature, or as one who was ſo ignorant of the principal glory of the human nature, as to place his pride in a barbarous inſenſibility.

'Theſe lines tranſlated from Juvenal by Mr. Tate, I have been often pleaſed with:

" Compaſſion proper to mankind appears:
" Which Nature witneſs'd, when ſhe lent us
" tears
" Of tender ſentiments WE only give
" Theſe proofs: to weep is OUR prerogative:
" To ſhew by pitying looks, and melting
" eyes,
" How with a ſuff'ring friend we ſympathize.
" Who can all ſenſe of others ills eſcape,
" Is but a brute at beſt, in human ſhape."

'It cannot but yield me ſome pleaſure, hardly as I have ſometimes thought of the people of the houſe, that ſuch a good man as Captain Tomlinſon had ſpoken well of them, upon enquiry.

'And here I ſtopt a minute, my dear, to receive, in fancy, your kind congratulation.

'My next, I hope, will confirm my preſent, and open ſtill more agreeable proſpects. Mean time be aſſured, that there cannot poſſibly any good fortune befal me, which I ſhall look upon with equal delight to that I have in your friendſhip.

'My thankful compliments to your good Mr. Hickman, to whoſe kind intervention I am ſo much obliged on this occaſion, conclude me, my deareſt Miſs Howe, your ever-affectionate and grateful CL. HARLOWE.'

LETTER LII.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

TUESDAY, MAY 30.

I Have a letter from Lord M. Such an one as I would wiſh for, if I intended matrimony. But as matters are circumſtanced, I cannot think of ſhewing it to my beloved.

My lord regrets that he is not to be the lady's nuptial father. He ſeems apprehenſive that I have ſtill, ſpecious as my reaſons are, ſome miſchief in my head.

He graciouſly conſents, that I may marry when I pleaſe; and offers one or both of my couſins to aſſiſt my bride, and to ſupport her ſpirits on the occaſion; ſince, ſince, as he underſtands, ſhe is ſo much afraid to venture with me.

Pritchard, he tells me, has his final orders to draw up deeds for aſſigning over to me in perpetuity 1000*l. per annum*; which he will execute the ſame hour that the lady in perſon owns her marriage.

He conſents, that the jointure be made from my own eſtate.

He wiſhes that the lady would have accepted of his draught; and commends me for tendering it to her. But reproaches me for pride in not keeping it myſelf. 'What the right ſide gives up, the left,' he ſays, 'may be the better for.'

The girls, the left-ſided girls, he means.

With all my heart. If I can have my Clariſſa, the devil take every-thing elſe.

A good deal of other ſtuff writes the ſtupid peer; ſcribbling in ſeveral places half a dozen lines, apparently for no other reaſon, but to bring in as many muſty words in an old ſaw.

If thou aſkeſt, How I can manage, ſince my beloved will wonder, that I have not an anſwer from my lord to ſuch a letter as I wrote to him; and if I own I have one, will expect that I ſhould ſhew it to her, as I did my letter?—This I anſwer—That I can be informed by Pritchard, that my lord has the gout in his right-hand; and has ordered him to attend me in form, for my particular orders about the tranſfer: and I can ſee Pritchard, thou knoweſt, at the King's Arms, or wherever I pleaſe, at an hour's warning; though he be at M. Hall, I in town; and he, by word of mouth, can acquaint me with every-thing in my lord's letter that is neceſſary for my charmer to know.

Whenever it ſuits me, I can reſtore the old peer to his right hand, and then can make him write a much more ſenſible letter than this that he has now ſent me.

Thou knoweſt, that an adroitneſs in the art of manual imitation, was one of my earlieſt attainments. It has been ſaid, on this occaſion, that had I been a bad man in meum and tuum matters, I ſhould not have been fit to live. As to the girls, we hold it no ſin to cheat them. And are we not told, that in being well deceived conſiſts the whole of human happineſs?

WEDNESDAY, MAY 31.

ALL ſtill happier and happier. A very high honour done me: a chariot inſtead of a coach, permitted, purpoſely to indulge me in the ſubject of ſubjects.

Our diſcourſe in this ſweet airing turned upon our future manner of life. The day is baſhfully promiſed me. Soon was the anſwer to my repeated urgency. Our equipage, our ſervants, our liveries, were parts of the delightful ſubject. A deſire that the wretch who had given me intelligence out of the family (honeſt Joſeph Leman) might not be one of our menials; and her reſolution to have her faithful Hannah, whether recovered or not; were ſignified; and both as readily aſſented to.

Her wiſhes, from my attentive behaviour, when with her at St. Paul's, that I would often accompany her to the divine ſervice, were gently intimated, and as readily engaged for. I aſſured her, that I ever had reſpected the clergy in a body: and ſome individuals of them (her Dr. Lewen for one) highly: and that were not going to church an act of religion, I thought it [as I told thee once] a moſt agreeable ſight to ſee rich and poor, all of a company, as I might ſay, aſſembled once a week in one place, and each in his or her beſt attire, to worſhip the God that made them. Nor could it be a hardſhip upon a man liberally educated, to make one on ſo ſolemn an occaſion, and to hear the harangue of a man of letters (though far from being the principal part of the ſervice, as it is too generally looked upon to be) whoſe ſtudies having taken a different turn from his own, he muſt always have ſomething new to ſay.

She ſhook her head, and repeated the word new: but looked as if willing to be ſatisfied for the preſent with the anſwer. To be ſure, Jack, ſhe means to do great deſpight to his Satanick majeſty in her hopes of reforming me. No wonder therefore if he exerts himſelf to prevent her, and to be revenged—But how came this in?—I am ever of party againſt myſelf.—One day, I fancy, I ſhall hate myſelf on recollecting what I am about at this inſtant. But I muſt ſtay till then. We muſt all of us do ſomething to repent of.

The reconciliation-proſpect was enlarged upon. If her uncle Harlowe will but pave the way to it, and if it can be brought about, ſhe ſhall be happy.—Happy, with a ſigh, as it is now poſſible ſhe can be!

She won't forbear, Jack!

I told her, that I had heard from Pritchard, juſt before we ſet out on our airing, and expected him in town to-morrow from Lord M. to take my directions. I ſpoke with gratitude of my lord's kindneſs to me; and with pleaſure of

Lady

Lady Sarah's, Lady Betty's, and my two cousins Montagues veneration for her: and also of his lordship's concerns that his gout hindered him from writing a reply with his own hand to my last.

She pitied my lord. She pitied poor Mrs. Fretchville too; for she had the goodness to enquire after her. The dear creature pitied ever-body that seemed to want pity. Happy in her own prospects, she had leisure to look abroad, and wishes every-body equally happy.

It is likely to go very hard with Mrs. Fretchville. Her face, which she had valued herself upon, will be utterly ruined. This good, however, as I could not but observe, she may reap from so great an evil.—As the greater malady generally swallows up the less, she may have a grief on this occasion, that may diminish the other grief, and make it tolerable.

I had a gentle reprimand for this light turn on so heavy an evil—For what was the loss of beauty to the loss of a good husband?—Excellent creature!

Her hopes (and her pleasures upon those hopes) that Miss Howe's mother would be reconciled to her, were also mentioned. Good Mrs. Howe was her word, for a woman so covetous, and so remorseless in her covetousness, that no one else will call her good. But this dear creature has such an extension in her love, as to be capable of valuing the most insignificant animal related to those whom she respects. 'Love me, and love my dog,' I have heard Lord M. say.— —Who knows, but that I may in time, in compliment to myself, bring her to think well of thee, Jack?

But what am I about? Am I not all this time arraigning my own heart?—I know I am, by the remorse I feel in it, while my pen bears testimony to her excellence. But yet I must add, (for no selfish consideration shall hinder me from doing justice to this admirable creature) that in this conversation she demonstrated so much prudent knowledge in every-thing that relates to that part of the domestick management which falls under the care of a mistress of a family, that I believe she has no equal of her years in the world.

But, indeed, I know not the subject on which she does not talk with admirable distinction; insomuch that could I but get over my prejudices against matrimony, and resolve to walk in the dull beaten path of my ancestors, I should be the happiest of men—And if I cannot, perhaps I may be ten times more to be pitied than she.

My heart, my heart, Belford, is not to be trusted—I break off, to re-peruse some of Miss Howe's virulence.

CURSED letters, these of Miss Howe, Jack!—Do thou turn back to those of mine, where I take notice of them—I proceed.

Upon the whole, my charmer was all gentleness, all ease, all serenity, throughout this sweet excursion. Nor had she reason to be otherwise: for it being the first time that I had the honour of her company alone, I was resolved to encourage her, by my respectfulness, to repeat the favour.

On our return, I found the counsellor's clerk waiting for me, with a draught of the marriage-settlements.

They are drawn, with only the necessary variations, from those made by my mother. The original of which, (now returned by the counsellor) as well as the new draughts, I have put into my beloved's hands.

These settlements of my mother made the lawyer's work easy; nor can she have a better precedent; the great Lord S. having settled them at the request of my mother's relations; all the difference, my charmer's are 100*l. per annum* more than my mother's.

I offered to read to her the old deed, while she looked over the draught; for she had refused her presence at the examination with the clerk: but this she also declined.

I suppose she did not care to hear of so many children, first, second, third, fourth, fifth, sixth and seventh sons, and as many daughters, to be begotten upon the body of the said Clarissa Harlowe.

Charming matrimonial recitativoes!—though it is always said lawfully begotten too—As if a man should beget children unlawfully upon the body of his own wife.—But thinkest thou not that these arch rogues the lawyers hereby intimate that a man may have children by his wife before marriage?—This must be what they mean. Why will these sly fellows put an honest man in mind of such rogueries?—But hence, as in numberless other instances, we see, that law and gospel are two very different things.

Dorcas, in our absence, tried to get at the wainscot-box in the dark closet. But it cannot be done without violence. And to run a risque of consequence now, for mere curiosity-sake, would be inexcusable.

Mrs. Sinclair and the nymphs are all of opinion, that I am now so much a favourite, and have such a visible share in her

her confidence, and even in her affections, that I may do what I will, and plead for excuse violence of paſſion; which, they will have it, makes violence of action pardonable with their ſex; as well as an allowed extenuation with the unconcerned of both ſexes; and they all offer their helping hands. 'Why not?' they ſay: has ſhe not paſſed for my wife before them all?—And is ſhe not in a fine way of being reconciled to her friends? And was not the want of that reconciliation the pretence for poſtponing the conſummation?

They again urge me, ſince it is ſo difficult to make night my friend, to an attempt in the day. They remind me, that the ſituation of their houſe is ſuch, that no noiſes can be heard out of it; and ridicule me for making it neceſſary for a lady to be undreſſed. It was not always ſo with me, poor old man! Sally told me; ſaucily flinging her handkerchief in my face.

LETTER LIII.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

FRIDAY, JUNE 2.

NOtwithſtanding my ſtudied-for politeneſs and complaiſance for ſome days paſt; and though I have wanted courage to throw the maſk quite aſide, yet I have made the dear creature more than once look about her, by the warm, though decent expreſſion of my paſſion. I have brought her to own, that I am more than indifferent with her: but as to LOVE, which I preſſed her to acknowledge, What need of acknowledgments of that ſort, when a woman conſents to marrying?—And once repulſing me with diſpleaſure, The proof of true love I was vowing for her, was RESPECT, not FREEDOM. And offering to defend myſelf, ſhe told me, that all the conception ſhe had been able to form of a faulty paſſion, was, that it muſt demonſtrate itſelf as mine ſought to do.

I endeavoured to juſtify my paſſion, by laying over-delicacy at her door. Over-delicacy, ſhe ſaid, was not my fault, if it were hers. She muſt plainly tell me, that I appeared to her incapable of diſtinguiſhing what were the requiſites of a pure mind. Perhaps, had the libertine preſumption to imagine, that there was no difference in heart, nor any but what proceeded from difference of education and cuſtom, between the pure and the impure—And yet cuſtom alone, as ſhe obſerved, if I did ſo think, would make a ſecond nature, as well in good as in bad habits.

I HAVE juſt now been called to account for ſome innocent liberties which I thought myſelf entitled to take before the women; as they ſuppoſe us to be married, and now within view of conſummation.

I took the lecture very hardly; and with impatience wiſhed for the happy day and hour when I might call her all my own, and meet with no check from a niceneſs that had no example.

She looked at me with a baſhful kind of contempt. I thought it contempt, and required the reaſon for it; not being conſcious of offence, as I told her.

'This is not the firſt time, Mr. Love-'lace,' ſaid ſhe, 'that I have had cauſe 'to be diſpleaſed with you, when you, 'perhaps, have not thought yourſelf ex-'ceptionable.—But, Sir, let me tell you, 'that the married ſtate, in my eye, is a 'ſtate of purity, and' [I think ſhe told me], 'not of licentiouſneſs;' ſo, at leaſt, I underſtood her.

Marriage purity, Jack!—Very comical, 'faith—Yet, ſweet dears, half the female world ready to run away with a rake, becauſe he is a rake: and for no other reaſon; nay, every other reaſon againſt their choice of ſuch a one.

But have not you and I, Belford, ſeen young wives, who would be thought modeſt; and when maids, were fantaſtically ſhy; permit freedoms in publick from their uxorious huſbands, which have ſhewn, that both of them have forgotten what belongs either to prudence or decency? While every modeſt eye has ſunk under the ſhameleſs effrontery, and every modeſt face been covered with bluſhes for thoſe who could not bluſh.

I once, upon ſuch an occaſion, propoſed to a circle of a dozen, thus ſcandalized, to withdraw; ſince they muſt needs ſee that as well the lady, as the gentleman, wanted to be in private. This motion had it's effect upon the amorous pair; and I was applauded for the check given to their licentiouſneſs.

But, upon another occaſion of this ſort, I acted a little more in character. For I ventured to make an attempt upon a bride, which I ſhould not have had the courage to make, had not the unbluſhing paſſiveneſs with which ſhe received her fond huſband's publick toyings, (looking round her with triumph rather than with ſhame, upon every lady preſent) incited my curioſity to know if the ſame complacency might not be ſhewn to a private friend. 'Tis true, I was in honour obliged to keep the ſecret. But I never ſaw the turtles bill afterwards, but I thought of number Two to the ſame ſentence; and in my heart thanked the good husband for the leſſon he had taught his wife.

From what I have ſaid, thou wilt ſee, that I approve of my beloved's exception to publick loves. That, I hope, is all the charming icicle means by marriage-parity. But to return.

From the whole of what I have mentioned to have paſſed between my beloved and me, thou wilt gather, that I have not been a mere dangler, a Hickman, in the paſſed days, though not abſolutely active, and a Lovelace.

The dear creature now conſiders herſelf as my wife-elect. The unſaddened heart, no longer prudiſh, will not now, I hope, give the fable turn to every addreſs of the man ſhe diſlikes not. And yet ſhe muſt keep up ſo much reſerve, as will juſtify paſt inflexibilities. Many and many a pretty fool would yield, were ſhe not afraid that the man ſhe favoured would think the worſe of her for it. This is alſo a part of the rake's creed. But ſhould ſhe reſent ever ſo ſtrongly, ſhe cannot now break with me; ſince, if ſhe does, there will be an end of the family reconciliation; and that in a way highly diſcreditable to herſelf.

SATURDAY, JUNE 3.

JUST returned from Doctors Commons. I have been endeavoring to get a licence. Very true, Jack. I have the mortification to find a difficulty, as the lady is of rank and fortune, and as there is no conſent of father or next friend, in obtaining this all-ſettering inſtrument.

I made report of this difficulty. 'It 'is very right,' ſhe ſays, 'that ſuch dif-'ficulties ſhould be made.'—But not to a man of my known fortune, ſurely, Jack, though the woman were the daughter of a duke.

I aſked, if ſhe approved of the ſettlements? She ſaid, She had compared them with my mother's, and had no objection to them. She had written to Miſs Howe upon the ſubject, ſhe owned; and to inform her of our preſent ſituation.

JUST now, in high good humour, my beloved returned me the draughts of the ſettlements; a copy of which I had ſent to Captain Tomlinſon. She complimented me, that ſhe never had any doubt of my honour in caſes of this nature.

In matters between man and man nobody ever had, thou knoweſt.

I had need, thou wilt ſay, to have ſome good qualities.

Great faults and great virtues are often found in the ſame perſon. In nothing very bad, but as to women: and did not one of them begin with me?

We have held, that women have no ſouls. I am a very Turk in this point, and willing to believe they have not. And if ſo, to whom ſhall I be accountable for what I do to them? Nay, if ſouls they have, as there is no ſex in etherials, nor need of any, what plea can a lady hold of injuries done her in her lady ſtate, when there is an end of her lady ſhip?

LETTER LIV.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

MONDAY, JUNE 5.

I Am now almoſt in deſpair of ſucceeding with this charming froſt-piece by love or gentleneſs.—A copy of the draughts, as I told thee, has been ſent to Captain Tomlinſon; and that by a ſpecial meſſenger. Engroſſments are proceeding with. I have been again at the Commons.—Should in all probability have procured a licence by Mallory's means, had not Mallory's friend the proctor been ſuddenly ſent for to Cheſhunt, to make an old lady's will. Pritchard has told me by word of mouth, though my charmer ſaw him not, all that was neceſſary for her to know in the letter my lord wrote, which I could not ſhew her: and taken my directions about the eſtates to be made over to me on my nuptials.—Yet, with all theſe favourable appearances, no conceding moment to be found, no improveable tenderneſs to be raiſed.

But never, I believe, was there ſo true, ſo delicate a modeſty in the human mind as in that of this lady. And this has been my ſecurity all along; and, in ſpite of Miſs Howe's advice to her, will be ſo ſtill; ſince, if her delicacy be a fault, ſhe can no more overcome it than I can my averſion to matrimony. Habit, habit, Jack, ſeeſt thou not? may ſubject us both to weakneſſes. And ſhould ſhe not have charity for me, as I have for her?

Twice indeed with rapture, which once ſhe called rude, did I ſalute her; and each time reſenting the freedom, did ſhe retire; though, to do her juſtice, ſhe favoured me again with her preſence at my firſt entreaty, and took no notice of the cauſe of her withdrawing.

Is it policy to ſhew ſo open a reſentment for innocent liberties, which, in her ſituation, ſhe muſt ſo ſoon forgive?

Yet

Yet the woman who reſents not initiatory freedoms muſt be loſt. For love is an encroacher. Love never goes backward. Love is always aſpiring. Always muſt aſpire. Nothing but the higheſt act of love can ſatisfy an indulged love. And what advantages has a lover who values not breaking the peace, over his miſtreſs who is ſolicitous to keep it!

I have now at this inſtant wrought myſelf up, for the dozenth time, to a half-reſolution. A thouſand agreeable things I have to ſay to her. She is in the dining-room. Juſt gone up. She always expects me when there.

HIGH diſpleaſure!—followed by an abrupt departure.

I ſat down by her. I took both her hands in mine. I would have it ſo. All gentle my voice. Her father mentioned with reſpect. Her mother with reverence. Even her brother amicably ſpoken of. I never thought I could have wiſhed ſo ardently, as I told her I did with, for a reconciliation with her family.

A ſweet and grateful bluſh then overſpread her fair face; a gentle ſigh now-and-then heaved her handkerchief.

I perfectly longed to hear from Captain Tomlinſon. It was impoſſible for the uncle to find fault with the draught of the ſettlements. I would not, however, be underſtood, by ſending them down, that I intended to put it in her uncle's power to delay my happy day. When, when, was it to be?

I would haſten again to the Commons; and would not return without the licence.

The Lawn I propoſed to retire to, as ſoon as the happy ceremony was over. This day and that day I propoſed.

It was time enough to name the day, when the ſettlements were completed, and the licence obtained. Happy ſhould ſhe be, could the kind Captain Tomlinſon obtain her uncle's preſence privately.

A good hint!—It may perhaps be improved upon—Either for a delay or a pacifier.

No new delays for Heaven's ſake, I beſought her; and reproached her gently for the paſt. Name but the day—(an early day, I hoped it would be, in the following week)—that I might hail it's approach, and number the tardy hours.

My cheek reclined on her ſhoulder—kiſſing her hands by turns. Ra her baſhfully than angrily reluctant, her hands ſought to be withdrawn; her ſhoulder avoiding my reclined cheek—Apparently loth, and more loth to quarrel with me; her downcaſt eye confeſſing more than her lips could utter. 'Now, 'ſurely,' thought I, 'is my time to try 'if ſhe can forgive a ſtill bolder freedom 'than I had ever yet taken.'

I then gave her ſtruggling hands liberty, I put one arm round her waiſt; I imprinted a kiſs on her ſweet lip, with a 'Be quiet' only, and an averted face, as if ſhe feared another.

Encouraged by ſo gentle a repulſe, the tendereſt things I ſaid; and then, with my other hand, drew aſide the handkerchief that concealed the beauty of beauties, and preſſed with my burning lips the moſt charming breaſt that ever my ravithed eyes beheld.

A very contrary paſſion to that which gave her boſom ſo delightful a ſwell, immediately took place. She ſtruggled out of my encircling arms with indignation. I detained her reluctant hand. 'Let me go,' ſaid ſhe. 'I ſee there is no 'keeping terms with you. Baſe encroach-'er! Is this the deſign of your flatter-'ing ſpeeches? Far as matters have 'gone, I will for ever renounce you. 'You have an odious heart. Let me go, 'I tell you.'

I was forced to obey, and ſhe flung from me, repeating baſe, and adding flattering, encroacher.

IN vain have I urged by Dorcas for the promiſed favour of dining with her: She would not dine at all. She could not.

But why makes ſhe every inch of her perſon thus ſacred?—So near the time too, as ſhe muſt ſuppoſe, that all will be my own by deed of purchaſe and ſettlement?

She has read, no doubt, of the art of the eaſtern monarchs, who ſequeſter themſelves from the eyes of their ſubjects, in order to excite their adoration, when, upon ſome ſolemn occaſions, they think fit to appear in publick.

But let me aſk thee, Belford, whether (on theſe ſolemn occaſions) the preceding cavalcade; here a great officer, and there a great miniſter, with their ſatellites, and glaring equipages; do not prepare the eyes of the wondering beholders, by degrees, to bear the blaze of canopied majeſty, (what though but an ugly old man perhaps himſelf!) yet glittering in the collected riches of his vaſt empire?

And ſhould not my beloved, for her own ſake, deſcend, by degrees, from goddeſs-hood into humanity! If it be pride that reſtrains her, ought not that pride to be punished). If, as in the eastern emperors, it be art as well as pride, art is what the of all women need not use. If shame, what a shame to be ashamed to communicate to her adorer's sight the most admirable of her personal graces!

Let me perish, Belford, if I would not forego the brightest diadem in the world, for the pleasure of seeing a twin Lovelace at each charming breast, drawing from it his first sustenance; the pious milk, (for physical reasons*, continued for one month and no more!

Now, methinks, behold this most charming of women in this sweet office: her conscious eye now dropt on one, now on the other, with a sigh of maternal tenderness, and then raised up to my delighted eye, full of wishes, for the sake of the pretty varlets, and for her own sake, that I would deign to legitimate; that I would condescend to put on the nuptial fetters.

LETTER LV.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

MONDAY AFTERNOON.

A Letter received from the worthy Captain Tomlinson has introduced me into the presence of my charmer sooner perhaps than I should otherwise have been admitted.

Sullen her brow, at her first entrance into the dining-room. But I took no notice of what had passed, and her anger of itself subsided.

The captain, after letting me know, that he chose not to write, till he had the promised draught of the settlements, he acquaints me, that his friend Mr. John Harlowe, in their first conference, (which was held as soon as he got down) was extremely surprized, and even grieved, (as he feared he would be) to hear that we were not married. The world, he said, who knew my character, would be very censorious, were it owned, that we had lived so long together unmarried in the same lodgings; although our marriage were now to be ever so publickly celebrated.

His nephew James, he was sure, would make a great handle of it against any motion that might be made towards a reconciliation; and with the greater success, as there was not a family in the kingdom more jealous of their honour than theirs.

This is true of the Harlowes, Jack: they have been called The proud Harlowes: and I have ever found, that all young honour is supercilious and touchy.

But seest thou not how right I was in my endeavour to persuade my fair-one to allow her uncle's friend to think us married; especially as he came prepared to believe it; and as her uncle hoped it was so?—But nothing on earth is so perverse, as a woman when she is set upon carrying a point, and has a meek man, or one who loves his peace, to deal with.

My beloved was vexed. She pulled out her handkerchief: but was more inclined to blame me, than herself:

'Had you kept your word, Mr. Love-'lace, and left me when we came to 'town——' And there she stopt; for she knew, that it was her own fault that we were not married before we left the country; and how could I leave her afterwards, while her brother was plotting to carry her off by violence?

Nor has this brother yet given over his machinations.

For as the captain proceeds, Mr. John Harlowe owned to him, (but in confidence) that his nephew is at this time busied in endeavouring to find out where we are; being assured (as I am not to be heard of at any of my relations, or at my usual lodgings) that we are together. And that we are not married, is plain, as he will have it, from Mr. Hickman's application so lately made to her uncle; and which was seconded by Mrs. Norton to her mother. And her brother cannot bear that I should enjoy such a triumph unmolested.

A profound sigh and the handkerchief again lifted to the eye. But did not the sweet soul deserve this turn upon her for feloniously resolving to rob me of herself, had the application made by Hickman succeeded?

I read on to the following effect:

Why (asked Mr. Harlowe) was it said to his other enquiring friend, that we were married; and that by his niece's woman, who ought to know? Who could give convincing reasons, no doubt—

Here again she wept; took a turn across the room; then returned—'Read 'on,' says she.

'Will you, my dearest life, read it 'yourself?'

'I will take the letter with me, by-'and-by—I cannot see to read it just now,' wiping her eyes—'Read on—Let me

* In Pamela, Vol. IV. Letter VI. these reasons are given, and are worthy of every parent's consideration, as is the whole letter, which contains the debate between Mr. B. and his Pamela, on the important subject of mothers being nurses to their own children.

hear

'hear it all—that I may know your sen'timents upon this letter, as well as give
'my own.'

The captain then told uncle John, the reaſons that induced me to give out that we were married; and the conditions, on which my beloved was brought to countenance it: which had kept us at the moſt punctilious diſtance.

But ſtill, Mr. Harlowe objected my character. And went away diſſatisfied. And the captain was alſo ſo much concerned, that he cared not to write what the reſult of his firſt conference was.

But in the next, which was held on receipt of the draughts, at the captain's houſe, (as the former was, for the greater ſecreſy) when the old gentleman had read them, and had the captain's opinion, he was much better pleaſed. And yet he declared, that it would not be eaſy to perſuade any other perſon of his family to believe ſo favourably of the matter, as he was now willing to believe, were they to know that we had lived ſo long together unmarried.

And then the captain ſays, his dear friend made a propoſal:—It was this—That we ſhould marry out of hand, but as privately as poſſible, as indeed he found we intended—(for he could have no objection to the draughts)—But yet, he expected to have preſent one truſty friend of his own, for his better ſatisfaction.—

Here I ſtopt, with a deſign to be angry—But ſhe deſiring me to read on, I obeyed.

—But that it ſhould paſs to every-one living, except to that truſty perſon, to himſelf, and to the captain, that we were married from the time that we had lived together in one houſe; and that this time ſhould be made to agree with that of Mr. Hickman's application to him from Miſs Howe.

'This, my deareſt life,' ſaid I, 'is 'a very conſiderate propoſal. We have 'nothing to do, but to caution the peo-'ple below properly on this head. I 'did not think your uncle Harlowe ca-'pable of hitting upon ſuch a charming 'expedient as this. But you ſee how 'much his heart is in the reconciliation.'

This was the return I met with—'You 'have always, as a mark of your polite-'neſs, let me know, how meanly you 'think of every-one of my family.'

Yet, thou wilt think, Belford, that I could forgive her for the reproach.

The captain does not know, he ſays, how this propoſal will be reliſhed by us. But, for his part, he thinks it an expedient that will obviate many difficulties, and may poſſibly put an end to Mr. James Harlowe's further deſigns: and on this account he has, by the moſt ſpecial advice, already declared to two ſeveral perſons, by whoſe means it may come to that young gentleman's ears, that he [Captain Tomlinſon] has very great reaſon to believe, that we were married ſoon after Mr. Hickman's application was rejected.

'And this, Mr. Lovelace,' (ſays the captain) 'will enable you to pay a com-'pliment to the family, that will not 'be unſuitable to the generoſity of ſome 'of the declarations you were pleaſed to 'make to the lady before me, (and which 'Mr. John Harlowe may make ſome ad-'vantage of in favour of a reconciliati-'on;) in that you have not demanded 'your lady's eſtate ſo ſoon as you were 'entitled to make the demand.' An excellent contriver, ſurely, ſhe muſt think this worthy Mr Tomlinſon to be!

But the captain adds, that if either the lady or I diſapprove of his report of our marriage, he will retract it. Nevertheleſs, he muſt tell me, that Mr. John Harlowe is very much ſet upon this way of proceeding; as the only one, in his opinion, capable of being improved into a general reconciliation. But if we do acquieſce in it, he beſeeches my fair-one not to ſuſpend my day, that he may be authorized in what he ſays, as to the truth of the main fact. [How conſcientious this good man!] Nor muſt it be expected, he ſays, that her uncle will take one ſtep towards the wiſhed-for reconciliation, till the ſolemnity is actually over.

He adds, that he ſhall be very ſoon in town on other affairs; and then propoſes to attend us, and give us a more particular account of all that has paſſed, or ſhall further paſs, between Mr. Harlowe and him.

'Well, my deareſt life, what ſay you 'to your uncle's expedient? Shall I 'write to the captain, and acquaint him, 'that we have no objection to it?'

She was ſilent for a few minutes. At laſt, with a ſigh, 'See, Mr. Lovelace,' ſaid ſhe, 'what you have brought me 'to, by treading after you in ſuch crook-'ed paths!—See what diſgrace I have 'incurred!—Indeed you have not acted 'like a wiſe man.'

'My beloved creature, do you not 'remember, how earneſtly I beſought 'the honour of your hand before we came 'to town?—Had I been then favour-'ed——'

'Well, well, Sir—There has been 'much amiſs ſomewhere; that's all I 'will ſay at preſent. And ſince what's 'paſſed passed cannot be recalled, my uncle must be obeyed, I think.'

Charmingly dutiful!—I had nothing then to do, that I might not be behindhand with the worthy captain and her uncle, but to press for the day. This I fervently did. But (as I might have expected) she repeated her former answer; to wit, That when the settlements were completed; when the licence was actually obtained; it would be time enough to name the day: 'And, O Mr. Love-'lace!' said she, turning from me with a grace inimitably tender, her handkerchief at her eyes, 'what a happiness, if 'my dear uncle could be prevailed up-'on to be personally a father, on this oc-'casion, to the poor father-less girl!'

What's the matter with me!—Whence this dew-drop!—A tear!—As I hope to be saved, it is a tear, Jack!—Very ready methinks!—Only on reciting!—But her lovely image was before me, in the very attitude she spoke the words—And indeed at the time she spoke them, these lines of Shakespeare came into my head—

'Thy heart is big. Get thee apart, and weep!
'Passion, I see, is catching—For my eyes,
'Seeing those beads of sorrow stand in thine,
'Begin to water.'—

I withdrew, and wrote to the captain to the following effect—I desired, that he would be so good as to acquaint his dear friend, that we entirely acquiesced with what he had proposed; and had already properly cautioned the gentlewoman of the house, and their servants, as well as our own: and to tell him, that if he would in person give me the blessing of his dear niece's hand, it would crown the wishes of both. In this case, I consented, that his own day, as I presumed it would be a short one, should be ours: that by this means the secret would be with fewer persons: that I myself, as well as he, thought the ceremony could not be too privately performed; and this not only for the sake of the wife end he had proposed to answer by it, but because I would not have Lord M. think himself slighted; since that nobleman, as I had told him, [the captain] had once intended to be our nuptial-father; and actually made the offer; but that we had declined to accept of it, and that for no other reason than to avoid a publick wedding; which his beloved niece would not come into, while she was in disgrace with her friends—But that if he chose not to do us this honour, I wished that Captain Tomlinson might be the trusty person whom he would have to be present on the happy occasion.

I shewed this letter to my fair-one. She was not displeased with it. So Jack, we cannot now move too fast, as to settlements and licence: the day is her uncle's day, or Captain Tomlinson's, perhaps, as shall best suit the occasion. Miss Howe's smuggling-scheme is now surely provided against in all events.

But I will not by anticipation make thee a judge of all the benefits that may flow from this my elaborate contrivance. Why will these girls put me upon my master-strokes?

And now for a little mine which I am getting ready to spring. The first that I have sprung, and at the rate I go on, (now a resolution, and now a remorse) perhaps the last that I shall attempt to spring.

A little mine, I call it. But it may be attended with great effects. I shall not, however, absolutely depend upon the success of it, having much more effectual ones in reserve. And yet great engines are often moved by small springs. A little spark falling by accident into a powder-magazine, hath done more execution in a siege, than an hundred cannon.

Come the worst, the hymeneal torch, and a white sheet, must be my amende honorable, as the French have it.

LETTER LVI.*

MR. BELFORD, TO ROBERT LOVELACE, ESQ.

TUESDAY, JUNE 6.

UNSUCCESSFUL as hitherto my application to you has been, I cannot for the heart of me forbear writing once more in behalf of this admirable woman: and yet am unable to account for the zeal which impels me to take her part with an earnestness so sincere.

But all her merit thou acknowledgest; all thy own vileness thou confessest, and even gloriest in it: what hope then of moving so hardened a man?—Yet, as it is not too late, and thou art nevertheless upon the crisis, I am resolved to try what another letter will do. It is but my writing in vain, if it do no good; and if thou wilt let me prevail, I know thou wilt hereafter think me richly entitled to thy thanks.

To argue with thee would be folly. The case cannot require it. I will only entreat thee, therefore, that thou wilt not let such an excellence lose the reward of her vigilant virtue.

I believe

I believe there never were libertines so vile, but purposed, at some future period of their lives, to set about reforming; and let me beg of thee, that thou wilt, in this great article, make thy future repentance as easy, as some time hence thou wilt wish thou hadst made it.

If thou proceedest, I have no doubt, that this affair will end tragically, one way or other. It must. Such a woman must interest both gods and men in her cause. But what I most apprehend, is, that with her own hand, in resentment of the perpetrated outrage, she (like another Lucretia) will assert the purity of her heart: or, if her piety preserve her from this violence, that wasting grief will soon put a period to her days. And in either case, will not the remembrance of thy ever-during guilt, and transitory triumph, be a torment of torments to thee?

'Tis a seriously sad thing, after all, that so fine a creature should have fallen into such vile and remorseless hands: for, from thy cradle, as I have heard thee own, thou ever delightedst to sport with and torment the animal, whether bird or beast, that thou lovedst, and hadst a power over.

How different is the case of this fine woman from that of any other whom thou hast seduced!—I need not mention to thee, nor insist upon the striking difference: justice, gratitude, thy interest, thy vows, all engaging thee; and thou certainly loving her, as far as thou art capable of love, above all her sex. She not to be drawn aside by art, or to be made to suffer from credulity, nor for want of wit and discernment; (that will be another cutting reflection to so fine a mind as hers:) the contention between you only unequal, as it is between naked innocence and armed guilt. In everything else, as thou owneſt, her talents greatly superior to thine!—What a fate will hers be, if thou art not at last overcome by thy reiterated remorses!

At first, indeed, when I was admitted into her presence; (and till I observed her meaning air, and heard her speak) I supposed, that she had no very uncommon judgment to boast of: for I made, as I thought, but just allowances for her blossoming youth, and for that loveliness of person, and for that ease and elegance in her dress, which I imagined must have taken up half her time and study to cultivate; and yet I had been prepared by thee to entertain a very high opinion of her sense and her reading. 'Her choice of this gay fellow, upon 'such hazardous terms,' (thought I) 'is 'a confirmation that her wit wants that 'maturity which only years and experience can give it. Her knowledge' (argued I to myself) 'must be all theory; 'and the complaisance ever consorting 'with an age so green and so gay, will 'make so inexperienced a lady at least 'forbear to shew herself disgusted at freedoms of discourse in which those present of her own sex, and some of ours, '(so learned, so well read, and so travelled) allow themselves.'

In this presumption, I ran on; and having the advantage, as I conceited, of all the company but you, and being desirous to appear in her eyes a mighty clever fellow, I thought I shewed away, when I said any foolish things that had more sound than sense in them: and when I made silly jests, which attracted the smiles of thy Sinclair, and the specious Partington: and that Miss Harlowe did not smile too. I thought was owing to her youth or affectation, or to a mixture of both, perhaps to a greater command of her features.—Little dreamt I, that I was incurring her contempt all the time.

But when, as I said, I heard her speak, which she did not till she had fathomed us all; when I heard her sentiments on two or three subjects, and took notice of that searching eye, darting into the very inmost cells of our frothy brains; by my faith, it made me look about me; and I began to recollect, and be ashamed of all I had said before; in short, was resolved to sit silent, till every one had talked round to keep my folly in countenance. And then I raised the subjects, that she could join in; and which she did join in, so much to the confusion and surprize of every-one of us!—For even thou, Lovelace, so noted for smart wit, repartee, and a vein of raillery, that delighteth all who come near thee, satest in palpable darkness, and lookedst about thee, as well as we.

One instance only, of this, shall I remind thee of?

We talked of wit, and of wits, and aimed at it, bandying it like a ball from one to another, and reflng it chiefly with thee, who wert always proud enough and vain enough of the attribute; and then more especially as thou hadst assembled us, as far as I know, principally to shew thy lady thy superiority over us; and us thy triumph over her. And then Tourville (who is always satisfied with wit at second-hand; wit upon memory; other mens wit) repeated some verses, as applicable to the ſubject; which two of us applauded, though full of double entendre. Thou, ſeeing the lady's ſerious air on one of their repetitions, appliedſt thyſelf to her, deſiring her notions of wit: a quality, thou ſaidſt, which every-one prized, whether flowing from himſelf, or found in another.

Then it was that ſhe took all our attention. It was a quality much talked of, ſhe ſaid, but, ſhe believed, very little underſtood. At leaſt, if ſhe might be ſo free as to give her judgment of it from what had paſſed in the preſent converſation, ſhe muſt ſay, that wit with men was one thing; with women, another.

This ſtartled us all:—how the women looked!—How they purſed in their mouths; a broad ſmile the moment before, upon each, from the verſes they had heard repeated, ſo well underſtood, as we ſaw, by their looks! While I beſought her to let us know, for our inſtruction, what wit was with women; for ſuch I was ſure it ought to be with men.

Cowley, ſhe ſaid, had defined it prettily by negatives. Thou deſiredſt her to repeat his definition.

She did; and with ſo much graceful eaſe, and beauty, and propriety of accent, as would have made bad poetry delightful.

> 'A thouſand different ſhapes it bears;
> 'Comely in thouſand ſhapes appears.
> 'Tis not a tale, 'tis not a jeſt,
> Admir'd with laughter at a feaſt,
> Nor florid talk, which muſt this title gain:
> The proofs of wit for ever muſt remain.
> 'Much leſs can that have any place
> At which a virgin hides her face.
> Such droſs the fire muſt purge away:—'Tis > 'juſt
> The author bluſh there, where the reader
> 'muſt.'

Here ſhe ſtopt, looking round her upon us all with conſcious ſuperiority, as I thought. Lord, how we ſtared! Thou attemptedſt to give us thy definition of wit, that thou mighteſt have ſomething to ſay, and not ſeem to be ſurprized into ſilent modeſty.

But, as if ſhe cared not to truſt thee with the ſubject, referring to the ſame author as for his more poſitive deciſion, ſhe thus, with the ſame harmony of voice and accent, emphatically decided upon it.

> 'Wit, like a luxuriant vine,
> Unleſs to Virtue's prop it join,
> Firm and erect, tow'rd Heaven bound,
> Though it with beauteous leaves and plea-
> 'ſant fruit be crown'd,
> Its lies deform'd, and rotting on the ground.'

If thou recollecteſt this part of the converſation, and how like fools we looked at one another; how much it put us out of conceit with ourſelves, and made us fear her, when we found our converſation thus excluded from the very character which our vanity had made us think unqueſtionably ours; and if thou profiteſt properly by the recollection, thou wilt be of my mind, that there is not ſo much wit in wickedneſs as we had flattered ourſelves there was.

And after all, I have been of opinion ever ſince that converſation, that the wit of all the rakes and libertines I ever converſed with, from the brilliant Bob Lovelace down to little Johnny Hartop, the punſter, conſiſts moſtly in ſaying bold and ſhocking things, with ſuch courage as ſhall make the modeſt bluſh, the impudent laugh, and the ignorant ſtare.

And why doſt thou think I mention theſe things, ſo mal-à-propos, as it may ſeem!—Only, let me tell thee, as an inſtance (among many that might be given from the ſame evening's converſation) of this fine woman's ſuperiority in thoſe talents which ennoble nature, and dignify her ſex—Evidenced not only to each of us, as we offended, but to the flippant Partington, and the groſſer, but egregiouſly hypocritical Sinclair, in the correcting eye, the diſcouraging bluſh, in which was mixed as much diſpleaſure as modeſty, and ſometimes, as the occaſion called for it, (for we were ſome of us hardened above the ſenſe of feeling delicate reproof) by the ſovereign contempt, mingled with a diſdainful kind of pity, that ſhewed at once her own conſcious worth, and our deſpicable worthleſſneſs.

O Lovelace! what then was the triumph, even in my eye, and what is it ſtill upon reflection, of true modeſty, of true wit, and true politeneſs, over frothy jeſt, laughing impertinence, and an obſcenity ſo ſhameful, even to the guilty, that they cannot hint at it but under a double meaning!

Then, as thou haſt ſomewhere obſerved, all her correctives avowed by her eye. Not poorly, like the generality of her ſex, affecting ignorance of meanings too obvious to be concealed; but ſo reſenting, as to ſhew each impudent laugher, the offence given to, and taken by, a purity, that had miſtaken it's way, when it fell into ſuch company.

Such is the woman, ſuch is the angel, whom thou haſt betrayed into thy power, and wouldſt deceive and ruin.—Sweet creature! did ſhe but know how ſhe is ſurrounded, (as I then thought, as well as now think) and what is intended, how much ſooner would death be her choice, than ſo dreadful a ſituation!—And how effectually would her ſtory, were it generally known, warn all the ſex againſt throwing themſelves into the power of ours, let our vows, oaths, and proteſtations, be what they will!

But let me beg of thee, once more, my dear Lovelace, if thou haſt any regard for thine own honour, for the honour of thy family, for thy future peace, or for my opinion of thee, (who yet pretend not to be ſo much moved by principle, as by that dazzling merit which ought ſtill more to attract thee) to be prevailed upon—to be—to be humane, that's all—Only, that thou wouldeſt not diſgrace our common humanity!

Hardened as thou art, I know, that they are the abandoned people in the houſe who keep thee up to a reſolution againſt her. O that the ſagacious fair-one (with ſo much innocent charity in her own heart) had not ſo reſolutely held thoſe women at diſtance!—That, as the boarded there, ſhe had often*er* tabled with them! Specious as they are, in a week's time, ſhe would have ſeen through them; they could not have been always ſo guarded, as they were when they ſaw her but ſeldom, and when they prepared themſelves to ſee her; and ſhe would have fled their houſe as a place infected. And yet, perhaps, with ſo determined an enterprizer, this diſcovery might have accelerated her ruin.

I know that thou art nice in thy loves. But are there not hundreds of women, who, though not utterly abandoned, would be taken with thee for mere perſonal regards! Make a toy, if thou wilt, of principle with reſpect to ſuch of the ſex as regard it as a toy; but rob not an angel of thoſe purities, which, in her own opinion, conſtitute the difference between angelick and brutal qualities.

With regard to the paſſion itſelf, the leſs of ſoul in either man or woman, the more ſenſual are they. Thou, Lovelace, haſt a ſoul, though a corrupted one; and art more intent (as thou even glorieſt) upon the preparative ſtratagem, than upon the end of conquering.

See we not the natural bent of ideots and the crazed? the very appetite is body; and when we ourſelves are moſt fools, and crazed, then are we moſt eager in theſe purſuits. See what fools this paſſion makes the wiſeſt men! What ſnivellers, what dotards, when they ſuffer themſelves to be run away with by it!—An unpermanent paſſion! Since, if (aſhamed of it's more proper name) we muſt call it love, love gratified, is love ſatisfied—And love ſatisfied, is indifference begun. And this is the caſe where conſent on one ſide adds to the obligation on the other. What then but remorſe can follow a forcible attempt?

Do not even chaſte lovers chuſe to be alone in their courtſhip preparations, aſhamed to have even a child to witneſs to their fooliſh actions, and more fooliſh expreſſions? Is this deified paſſion, in it's greateſt altitudes, fitted to ſtand the day? Do not the lovers, when mutual conſent awaits their wills, retire to coverts, and to darkneſs, to complete their wiſhes? And ſhall ſuch a ſneaking paſſion as this, which can be ſo eaſily gratified by viler objects, be permitted to debaſe the nobleſt?

Were not the delays of thy vile purpoſes owing more to the awe which her majeſtick virtue has inſpired thee with, than to thy want of adroitneſs in villainy; [I muſt write my free ſentiments in this caſe; for have I not ſeen the angel?] I ſhould be ready to cenſure ſome of thy contrivances and pretences to ſuſpend the expected day, as trite, ſtale, and (to me, who know thy intention) poor; and too often reſorted to, as nothing comes of them, to be gloried in; particularly that of Mennel, the vapouriſh lady, and the ready-furniſhed houſe.

She muſt have thought ſo too, at times, and in her heart deſpiſed thee for them, or love thee (ungrateful as thou art!) to her misfortune; as well as entertain hope againſt probability. But this would afford another warning to the ſex, were they to know her ſtory; as it would ſhew them what poor pretences they muſt ſeem to be ſatisfied with, if once they put themſelves into the power of a deſigning man.

If trial only was thy end, as once was thy pretence, enough ſurely haſt thou tried this paragon of virtue and vigilance. But I knew thee too well, to expect, at the time, that thou wouldeſt ſtop there. Men of our caſt put no other bound to their views upon any of the ſex, than what want of power compels them to put. I knew that from one advantage gained, thou wouldeſt proceed to attempt another. Thy habitual averſion to wedlock, too well I knew; and indeed thou avoweſt thy hope to bring her to cohabitation, in that very letter in which thou pretendeſt trial to be thy principal view.

But do not even thy own frequent and involuntary remorſes, when thou haſt time, place, company, and every other circumſtance, to favour thee in thy wicked deſign, convince thee, that there can be no room for a hope ſo preſumptuous?—Why then, ſince thou wouldeſt chuſe to marry her rather than loſe her, wilt thou make her hate thee for ever?

But if thou dareſt to meditate perſonal trial, and art ſincere in thy reſolution to reward her, as ſhe behaves in it, let me beſeech thee to remove her from this vile houſe. That will be to give her and thy conſcience fair play. So entirely now does the ſweet deluded excellence depend upon her ſuppoſed happier proſpects, that thou needeſt not to fear that ſhe will fly from thee, or that ſhe will wiſh to have recourſe to that ſcheme of Miſs Howe, which has put thee upon what thou calleſt thy maſter-ſtroke.

But whatever be thy determination on this head; and if I write not in time, but that thou haſt actually pulled off the maſk; let it not be one of thy devices, if thou wouldeſt avoid the curſes of every heart, and hereafter of thy own, to give her, no not for one hour, (be her reſentment ever ſo great) into the power of that villainous woman, who has, if poſſible, leſs remorſe than thyſelf; and whoſe trade it is to break the reſiſting ſpirit, and utterly to ruin the heart unpractiſed in evil.—O Lovelace, Lovelace, how many dreadful ſtories could this horrid woman tell the ſex! And ſhall that of a Clariſſa ſwell the guilty liſt?

But this I might have ſpared. Of this, devil as thou art, thou canſt not be capable. Thou couldſt not enjoy a triumph ſo diſgraceful to thy wicked pride, as well as to humanity.

Shouldeſt thou think, that the melancholy ſpectacle hourly before me has made me more ſerious than uſual, perhaps thou wilt not be miſtaken. But nothing more is to be inferred from hence (were I even to return to my former courſes) but that whenever the time of cool reflection comes, whether brought on by our own diſaſters, or by thoſe of others, we ſhall undoubtedly, if capable of thought, and if we have time for it, think in the ſame manner.

We neither of us are ſuch fools as to diſbelieve a futurity, or to think, whatever be our practice, that we came hither by chance, and for no end but to do all the miſchief we have it in our power to do. Nor am I aſhamed to own, that in the prayers which my poor uncle makes me read to him, in the abſence of a very good clergyman who regularly attends him, I do not forget to put in a word or two for myſelf.

If, Lovelace, thou laugheſt at me, thy ridicule will be more conformable to thy actions than to thy belief.—Devils believe and tremble. Canſt thou be more abandoned than they?

And here let me add, with regard to my poor old man, that I often wiſh thee preſent but for one half-hour in a day, to ſee the dregs of a gay life running off in the moſt excruciating tortures, that the colick, the ſtone, and the ſurgeon's knife, can unitedly inflict, and to hear him bewail the diſſoluteneſs of his paſt life, in the bittereſt anguiſh of a ſpirit every hour expecting to be called to it's laſt account.—Yet, by all his confeſſions, he has not to accuſe himſelf, in ſixty-ſeven years of life, of half the very vile enormities, which you and I have committed in the laſt ſeven only.

I conclude with recommending to your ſerious conſideration all I have written, as proceeding from the heart and ſoul of your aſſured friend,

JOHN BELFORD.

LETTER LVII.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

TUESDAY AFTERNOON, JUNE 6.

DIFFICULTIES ſtill to be got over in procuring this plaguy licence. I ever hated, and ever ſhall hate, theſe ſpiritual lawyers, and their court.

And now, Jack, if I have not ſecured victory, I have a retreat.

But hold—Thy ſervant with a letter.

A CONFOUNDED long one, though not a narrative one—Once more in behalf of this lady!—Lie thee down, oddity! What canſt thou write that can have force upon me at this criſis?—And have I not, as I went along, made thee to ſay all that was neceſſary for thee to ſay?

YET once more, I will take thee up. Trite, ſtale, poor, (ſayeſt thou) are ſome of my contrivances? That of the widow particularly!—I have no patience with thee. Had not that contrivance it's effect at that time, for a procraſtination?—And had I not then reaſon to fear, that the lady would find enough to make her diſlike this houſe? And was it not right (intending what I intended) to lead her on from time to time, with a notion, that a houſe of her own would be ready for her ſoon, in order to induce her to continue here till it was?

Trite, ſtale, and poor!—Thou art a ſilly fellow, and no judge, when thou ſayeſt this. Had I not, like a blockhead, revealed to thee, as I went along, the ſecret purpoſes of my heart, but had kept all in, till the event had explained my myſteries, I would have defied thee to have been able, any more than the lady, to have gueſſed at what was to befal her, till it had actually come to paſs. Nor doubt I, in this caſe, that, inſtead of preſuming to reflect upon her for credulity, as loving me to her misfortune, and for hoping againſt probability, thou wouldeſt have been readier, by far, to cenſure her for nicety and over-ſcrupulouſneſs. And, let me tell thee, that had ſhe loved me as I wiſhed her to love me, ſhe could not poſſibly have been ſo very apprehenſive of my deſi ns, nor ſo ready to be influenced by Miſs Howe's precautions, as ſhe has always been, although my general character made not for me with her.

But in thy opinion, I ſuffer for that ſimplicity in my contrivances, which is their principal excellence. No machinery make I neceſſary. No unnatural flights aim I at. All pure nature, taking advantage of nature, as nature tends; and ſo ſimple my devices, that when they are known, thou, even thou, imagineſt, thou couldeſt have thought of the ſame. And indeed thou ſeemeſt to own, that the ſlight thou putteſt upon them, is owing to my letting thee into them before-hand—undiſtinguiſhing, as well as ungrateful as thou art!

Yet, after all, I would not have thee think, that I do not know my weak places. I have formerly told thee, that it is difficult for the ableſt general to ſay what he will do, or what he can do, when he is obliged to regulate his motions by thoſe of a watchful enemy. If thou giveſt due weight to this conſideration thou wilt not wonder that I ſhould make many marches and countermarches, ſome of which may appear to a ſlight obſerver unneceſſary.

But let me curſorily enter into debate with thee on this ſubject, now I am within ſight of my journey's end.

Abundance of impertinent things thou telleſt me in this letter; ſome of which thou hadſt from myſelf; others that I knew before.

All that thou ſayeſt in this charming creature's praiſe, is ſhort of what I have ſaid and written, on the inexhauſtible ſubject.

Her virtue, her reſiſtance, which are her merits, are my ſtimulatives. Have I not told thee ſo twenty times over?

Devil, as theſe girls between them call me, what of devil am I, but in my contrivances? I am not more a devil, than others, in the end I aim at; for when I have carried my point, it is ſtill but one ſeduction. And I have perhaps been ſpared the guilt of many ſeductions in the time.

What of uncommon would there be in this caſe, but for her watchfulneſs?—As well as I love intrigue and ſtratagem, doſt think, that I had not rather have gained my end with leſs trouble and leſs guilt?

The man, let me tell thee, who is as wicked as he can be, is a worſe man than I am. Let me aſk any rake in England, if, reſolving to carry his point, he would have been ſo long about it? or have had ſo much compunction as I have had?

Were every rake, nay, were every man, to ſet down, as I do, and write all that enters into his head, or into his heart, and to accuſe himſelf with equal freedom and truth, what an army of miſcreants ſhould I have to keep me in countenance!

It is a maxim with ſome, that if they are left alone with a woman, and make not an attempt upon her, ſhe will think herſelf affronted—Are not ſuch men as theſe worſe than I am? What an opinion muſt they have of the whole ſex?

Let me defend the ſex I ſo dearly love. If theſe elder brethren of ours think they have general reaſon for their aſſertion, they muſt have kept very bad company, or muſt judge of women's hearts by their own. She muſt be an abandoned woman, who will not ſhrink as a ſnail into it's ſhell, at a groſs and ſudden attempt. A modeſt woman muſt be naturally cold, reſerved, and ſhy. She cannot be ſo much, and ſo ſoon affected as libertines are apt to imagine. She muſt, at leaſt, have ſome confidence in the honour and ſilence of a man, before deſire can poſſibly put forth in her, to encourage and meet his flame. For my own part, I have been always decent in the company of women, till I was ſure of them. Nor have I ever offered a great offence, till I have found little ones paſſed over; and that they ſhunned me not, when they knew my character.

My divine Clariſſa has puzzled me, and beat me out of my play: at one time, I hoped to overcome by intimidating her; at another, by love; by the amorous ſee-ſaw, as I have called it.

And I have only now to join surprize to the other two, and see what can be done by all three.

And whose property, I pray thee, shall I invade, if I pursue my schemes of love and vengeance? Have not those who have a right to her, renounced that right? Have they not wilfully exposed her to dangers? Yet must know, that such a woman would be considered as lawful prize, by as many as could have the opportunity to attempt her?—And had they not thus cruelly exposed her, is she not a single woman? And need I tell thee, Jack, that men of our cast, the best of them, [the worst stick at nothing] think it a great grace and favour done to the married men, if they leave them their wives to themselves: and compound for their sisters, daughters, wards, and nieces? Shocking as these principles must be to a reflecting mind, yet such thou knowest are the principles of thousands, (who would not act so generously, as I have acted by almost all the sex, over whom I have obtained a power;) and as often carried into practice, as their opportunities or courage will permit.—Such therefore have no right to blame me.

Thou repeatedly pleadest her sufferings from her family. But I have too often answered this plea, to need to say any more now, than that she has not suffered for my sake. For has she not been made the victim of the malice of her rapacious brother and envious sister, who only waited for an occasion to ruin her with her other relations; and took this as the first to drive her out of the house; and as it happened, into my arms?—Thou knowest how much against her inclination.

As for her own sins, how many has the dear creature to answer for to love and to me!—Twenty times, and twenty times twenty, has she not told me, that she refused not the odious Solmes in favour to me? And as often has she not offered to renounce me for the single life, if the implacables would have received her on that condition?—Of what repetitions does thy weak pity make me guilty?

To look a little farther back: Canst thou forget what my sufferings were from this haughty beauty in the whole time of my attendance upon her proud motions, in the purlieus of Harlowe Place, and at the little White Hart at Neale, as we called it?—Did I not threaten vengeance upon her then, (and had I not reason?) for disappointing me of a promised interview?

O Jack! what a night had I in the bleak coppice adjoining to her father's paddock! My linen and wig frozen; my limbs absolutely numbed; my fingers only sensible of so much warmth, as enabled me to hold a pen; and that obtained by rubbing the skin off, and by beating with my hands my shivering sides! Kneeling on the hoar moss on one knee, writing on the other, if the stiff scrawl could be called writing! My feet, by the time I had done, seeming to have taken root, and actually unable to support me for some minutes!—Love and rage then kept my heart in motion, [and only love and rage could do it] or how much more than I did suffer, must I have suffered!

I told thee, at my melancholy return, what were the contents of the letter I wrote. And I shewed thee afterwards, her tyrannical answer to it. Thou, then, Jack, lovedst thy friend; and pitiedst thy poor suffering Lovelace. Even the affronted god of Love approved then of my threatened vengeance against the fair promiser; though now with thee, in the day of my power, forgetful of the night of my sufferings, he is become an advocate for her.

Nay, was it not he himself that brought to me my adorable Nemesis; and both together put me upon this very vow, That I would never rest till I had drawn in this goddess-daughter of the Harlowes to cohabit with me; and that in the face of all their proud family?

Nor canst thou forget this vow.—At this instant I have thee before me, as then thou sorrowfully lookedst. Thy strong features glowing with compassion for me; thy lips twisted; thy forehead furrowed; thy whole face drawn out from the stupid round into the ghastly oval; every muscle contributing it's power to complete the aspect grievous; and not one word couldst thou utter, but amen to my vow.

And what of distinguishing love, or favour, or confidence, have I had from her since, to make me forego this vow?

I renewed it not, indeed, afterwards; and actually, for a long season, was willing to forget it; till repetitions of the same faults revived the remembrance of the former. And now adding to those the contents of some of Miss Howe's virulent letters, so lately come, what canst thou say for the rebel, consistent with thy loyalty to thy friend?

Every man to his genius and constitution. Hannibal was called The father of warlike stratagems. Had Hannibal been a private a private man, and turned his plotting head againſt the other ſex, or had I been a general, and turned mine againſt ſuch of my fellow creatures of my own, as I thought myſelf entitled to conſider as my enemies, becauſe they were born and lived in a different climate; Hannibal would have done leſs miſchief; Lovelace more.—That would have been the difference.

Not a ſovereign on earth, if he be not a good man, and if he be of a warlike tempe, but muſt do a thouſand times more miſchief than I. And why? Becauſe he has it in his power to do more.

An honeſt man, perhaps thou'lt ſay, will not wiſh to have it in his power to do hurt. He ought not, let me tell him: for, if he have it, a thouſand to one but it makes him both wanton and wicked.

In what, then, am I ſo ſingularly vile?

In my contrivances, thou wilt ſay, (for thou art my echo) if not in my propoſed end of them.

How difficult does every man find it, as well as I, to forego a predominant paſſion! I have three paſſions that ſway me by turns; all imperial ones. Love, Revenge, Ambition, or a deſire of conqueſt.

As to this particular contrivance of Tomlinſon and the uncle, which perhaps thou wilt think a black one; that had been ſpared, had not theſe innocent ladies put me upon finding a huſband for their Mrs. Townſend: that device, therefore, is but a preventive one. Thinkeſt thou, that I could bear to be outwitted? And may not this very contrivance ſave a world of miſchief? For doſt thou think, I would have tamely given up the lady to Townſend's tars?

What meaneſt thou, except to overthrow thy own plea, when thou ſayeſt, that men of our caſt know no other bound to their wickedneſs, but want of power; yet knoweſt this lady to be in mine?

Enough, ſayeſt thou, have I tried this paragon of virtue. Not ſo; for I have not tried her at all—All I have been doing, is but preparation to a trial.

But thou art concerned for the means that I may have recourſe to in the trial, and for my veracity.

Silly fellow!—Did ever any man, thinkeſt thou, deceive a woman, but at the expence of his veracity; how, otherwiſe, can he be ſaid to deceive?

As to the means, thou doſt not imagine, that I expect a direct conſent. My main hope is but in a yielding reluctance; without which I will be ſworn, whatever rapes have been attempted, none ever were committed, one perſon to one perſon. And good Queen Beſs of England, had ſhe been living, and appealed to, would have declared herſelf of my mind.

It would not be amiſs for the ſex to know what our opinions are upon this ſubject. I love to warn them. I wiſh no man to ſucceed with them but myſelf. I told thee once, that though a rake, I am not a rake's friend.

Thou ſayeſt, that I ever hated wedlock. And true thou ſayeſt. And yet as true, when thou telleſt me, that I would rather marry than loſe this lady. And will ſhe deteſt me for ever, thinkeſt thou, if I try her, and ſucceed not?—Take care, Jack!—Seeſt thou not, that thou warneſt me, that I do not try without reſolving to conquer?

I muſt add, that I have for ſome time been convinced that I have done wrong, to ſcribble to thee ſo freely as I have done, (and the more ſo, if I make the lady legally mine;) for has not every letter I have written to thee been a bill of indictment againſt myſelf? I may partly curſe my vanity for it; and I think I will refrain for the future; for thou art really very impertinent.

A good man, I own, might urge many of the things thou urgeſt; but by my ſoul, they come very awkwardly from thee. And thou muſt be ſenſible, that I can anſwer every tittle of what thou writeſt, upon the foot of the maxims we have long held and purſued.—By the ſpecimen above, thou wilt ſee that I can.

And pr'ythee tell me, Jack, what but this that follows would have been the epitome of mine and my beloved's ſtory, after ten years cohabitation, had I never written to thee upon the ſubject, and had I not been my own accuſer?

'Robert Lovelace, a notorious wo'man-eater, makes his addreſſes in an
'honourable way to Miſs Clariſſa Har-
'lowe; a young lady of the higheſt me-
'rit—Fortunes on both ſides out of the 'queſtion.

'After encouragement given, he is 'inſulted by her violent brother; who 'thinks it his intereſt to diſcountenence
'the match; and who at laſt challeng'ing him is obliged to take his worthleſs
'life at his hands.

'The family as much enraged, as if 'he had taken the life he gave, inſult him
'perſonally, and find out an odious
'lover for the young lady.

'To avoid a forced marriage, ſhe is prevailed

'prevailed upon to take a ſtep, which 'throws her into Mr. Lovelace's pro-'tection.

'Yet, diſclaiming any paſſion for him, 'ſhe repeatedly offers to renounce him 'for ever, if, on that condition, her re-'lations will receive her, and free her 'from the addreſs of the man ſhe hates.

'Mr. Lovelace, a man of ſtrong paſ-'ſions, and, as ſome ſay, of great pride, 'thinks himſelf under very little obliga-'tion to her on this account; and not 'being naturally fond of marriage, and 'having ſo much reaſon to hate her re-'lations, endeavours to prevail upon 'her to live with him, without the calls the 'life of honour: and at laſt, by ſtratagem, 'art, and contrivance, prevails.

'He reſolves never to marry any other 'woman: takes a pride to have her call-'ed by his name: a church-rite all the 'difference between them: treats her 'with deſerved tenderneſs. Nobody 'queſtions their marriage but thoſe 'proud relations of hers, whom he 'wiſhes to queſtion it. Every year a 'charming boy. Fortunes to ſupport 'the increaſing family with ſplendor. 'A tender father. Always a warm 'friend; a generous landlord, and a 'punctual paymaſter. Now-and-then, 'however, perhaps, indulging with a 'new object, in order to bring him back 'with greater delight to his charming 'Clariſſa—His only fault love of the 'ſex—Which, nevertheleſs, the women 'ſay, will cure itſelf—Defenſible thus 'far, that he breaks no contracts by his 'rovings.'

And what is there ſo very greatly amiſs, AS THE WORLD GOES, in all this?

Let me aver, that there are thouſands and ten thouſands, who have worſe ſto-ries to tell than this would appear to be, had I not intereſted thee in the progreſs to my great end. And beſides, thou knoweſt that the character I gave myſelf to Joſeph Leman, as to my treatment of my miſtreſſes, is pretty near the truth.

Were I to be as much in earneſt in my defence, as thou art warm in my ar-raignment, I could convince thee, by other arguments, obſervations, and compariſons, [Is not all human good and evil comparative?] that though from my ingenuous temper, (writing only to thee, who art maſter of every ſecret of my heart) I am ſo ready to accuſe myſelf in my narrations; yet I have ſome-thing to ſay for myſelf to myſelf, as I go along; though no one elſe, perhaps, that was not a rake, would allow any weight to it.—And this caution might I give to thouſands, who would ſtoop for a ſtone to throw at me: 'See that your own 'predominant paſſions, whatever they be, 'hurry you not into as much wicked-'neſs, as mine do me. See, if ye happen 'to be better than I in ſome things, 'that ye are not worſe in others; and in 'points too, that may be of more ex-'tenſive bad conſequences, than that of 'ſeducing a girl, (and taking care of her 'afterwards) who from her cradle is armed 'with cautions againſt the deluſions of men.'

And yet I am not ſo partial to my own follies as to think lightly of this fault, when I allow myſelf to think.

Another grave thing will I add, now my hand is in: So dearly do I love the ſex, that had I found, that a character for virtue had been generally neceſſary to recommend me to them, I ſhould have had a much greater regard to my morals as to the ſex than I have had.

To ſum up all—I am ſufficiently ap-prized, that men of worthy and honeſt hearts, who never allowed themſelves in premeditated evil, and who take into the account the excellencies of this fine crea-ture, will and muſt not only condemn, but abhor me, were they to know as much of me as thou doſt. But, me-thinks, I would be glad to eſcape the cenſure of thoſe men and thoſe women too, who have never known what capi-tal trials and temptations are; of thoſe who have no genius for enterprize; of thoſe who want rather courage than will; and moſt particularly of thoſe, who have kept their ſecret better than I have kept, or wiſh to keep, mine. Were theſe exceptions to take place, perhaps, Jack, I ſhould have ten to ac-quit, to one that ſhould condemn me. Have I not often ſaid, That human na-ture is a rogue?

I THREATENED above to refrain writ-ing to thee. But take it not to heart, Jack—I muſt write on, and cannot help it.

LETTER LVIII.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

WEDNESDAY NIGHT, 11 O'CLOCK.

FAITH, Jack, thou hadſt half un-done me with thy nonſenſe, though I would not own it in my yeſterday's letter: my conſcience of thy party be-fore.—But I think I am my own man again.

So near to execution my plot; ſo near ſpringing my mine; all agreed upon be-tween tween the women and me; or I believe thou hast overthrown me.

I have time for a few lines preparative to what is to happen in an hour or two; and I love to write to the moment.

We have been extremely happy. How many agreeable days have we known together!—What may the next two hours produce?

When I parted with my charmer, (which I did, with infinite reluctance, half an hour ago) it was upon her promise, that she would not sit up to write or read. For so engaging was the conversation to me, (and indeed my behaviour throughout the whole of it was confessedly agreeable to her) that I insisted, if she did not directly retire to rest, that we should add another happy hour to the former.

To have sat up writing or reading half the night, as she sometimes does, would have frustrated my view, as thou wilt observe, when my little plot unravels.

'WHAT—What—What now!—'Bounding villain! wouldst thou choak 'me.'

I was speaking to my heart, Jack!—It was then at my throat.—And what is all this for?—These shy women, how, when a man thinks himself near the mark, do they tempest him!

'Is all ready, Dorcas? Has my be-'loved kept her word with me?'—Whether are these billowy heavings owing more to love or to fear? I cannot tell for the soul of me, of which I have most. If I can but take her before her apprehension, before her eloquence, is awake—

Limbs, why thus convulsed?—Knees, till now so firmly knit, why thus relaxed? Why beat you thus together? Will not these trembling fingers, which twice have refused to direct the pen, fail me in the arduous moment?

Once again, Why and for what all these convulsions? This project is not to end in matrimony, surely!

But the consequences must be greater than I had thought of till this moment—My beloved's destiny or my own may depend upon the issue of the two next hours!

I will recede, I think!—

SOFT, O virgin saint, and safe as soft, be thy slumbers!

I will now once more turn to my friend Belford's letter. Thou shalt have fair play, my charmer. I will re-peruse what thy advocate has to say for thee. Weak arguments will do, in the frame I am in.

But, what, what's the matter!—What a double—But the uproar abates!—What a double coward am I?—Or is it that I am taken in a cowardly minute? For heroes have their fits of fear; cowards their brave moments; and virtuous women, all but my Clarissa, their moment critical.

But thus coolly enjoying thy reflections in a hurricane!—Again the confusion is renewed!

What!—Where!—How came it!
Is my beloved safe—
O wake not too roughly my beloved!

LETTER LIX.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

THURS. MORN. 5 O'CLOCK, (JUNE 8.)

NOW is my reformation secured; for I never shall love any other woman! O she is all variety! she must be ever new to me! Imagination cannot form; much less can the pencil paint; nor can the soul of painting, Poetry, describe an angel so exquisitively, so elegantly lovely!—But I will not by anticipation pacify thy impatience. Although the subject is too hallowed for profane contemplation, yet shalt thou have the whole before thee as it passed: and this not from a spirit wantoning in description upon so rich a subject; but with a design to put a bound to thy roving thoughts. It will be iniquity greater than a Lovelace ever was guilty of, to carry them farther than I shall acknowledge.

Thus then connecting my last with the present, I lead to it.

Didst thou not, by the conclusion of my former, perceive the consternation I was in, just as I was about to re-peruse thy letter, in order to prevail upon myself to recede from my purpose of awaking in terrors my slumbering charmer? And what dost think was the matter?

I'll tell thee—

At a little after two, when the whole house was still, or seemed to be so, and, as it proved, my Clarissa in bed, and fast asleep; I also in a manner undressed (as indeed I was for an hour before) and in my gown and slippers, though, to oblige thee, writing on; I was alarmed by a trampling noise over head, and a confused buz of mixed voices, some louder than others, like scolding, and little short of screaming. While I was wondering what could be the matter, down down ſtairs ran Dorcas, and at my door, in an accent rather frightedly and hoarſely inward, than ſhrilly clamorous, ſhe cried out 'Fire! Fire!' And this the more alarmed me, as ſhe ſeemed to endeavour to cry out louder, but could not.

My pen (it's laſt ſcrawl a benediction on my beloved) dropt from my fingers; and up ſtarted I; and making but three ſteps to the door, opening it, I cried out, 'Where! where!' almoſt as much tertified as the wench: while ſhe, more than half-undreſſed, her petticoats in her hand, unable to ſpeak diſtinctly, pointed up ſtairs.

I was there in a moment, and found all owing to the careleſſneſs of Mrs. Sinclair's cook-maid, who having ſat up to read the ſimple Hiſtory of Doraſtus and Fawnia when ſhe ſhould have been in bed, had ſet fire to an old pair of callico window-curtains.

She had the preſence of mind, in her fright, to tear down the half-burnt-valens, as well as curtains, and had got them, though blazing, into the chimney, by the time I came up; ſo that I had the ſatisfaction to find the danger happily over.

Mean time Dorcas, after ſhe had directed me up ſtairs, not knowing the worſt was over, and expecting every minute the houſe would be in a blaze, out of tender regard for her lady, [I ſhall for ever love the wench for it] ran to her door, and rapping loudly at it, in a recovered voice, cried out with a ſhrillneſs equal to her love, 'Fire! fire! '—The houſe is on fire!—Riſe! Madam! '—This inſtant riſe—if you would not be 'burnt in your bed!'

No ſooner had ſhe made this dreadful outcry, but I heard her lady's door, with haſty violence, unbar, unbolt, unlock, and open, and my charmer's voice ſounding like that of one going into a fit.

Thou mayeſt believe that I was greatly affected. I trembled with concern for her, and haſtened down faſter than the alarm of fire had made me run up, in order to ſatisfy her, that all the danger was over.

When I had flown down to her chamber-door, there I beheld the moſt charming creature in the world, ſupporting herſelf on the arm of the gaſping Dorcas, ſighing, trembling, and ready to faint, with nothing on but an under-petticoat, her lovely boſom half-open, and her feet juſt ſlipt into her ſhoes. As ſoon as ſhe ſaw me, ſhe panted, and ſtruggled to ſpeak; but could only ſay, 'Oh, Mr. Lovelace!' and down was ready to ſink.

I claſped her in my arms with an ardour ſhe never felt before: 'My deareſt 'life! fear nothing: I have been up— 'The danger is over—The fire is got 'under—And how, fooliſh devil!' [to Dorcas] 'could you thus, by your hide-'ous yell, alarm and frighten my angel!'

O Jack! how her ſweet boſom, as I claſped her to mine, heaved and panted! I could even diſtinguiſh her dear heart flutter, flutter, flutter, againſt mine; and for a few minutes, I feared ſhe would go into fits.

Leſt the half-lifeleſs charmer ſhould catch cold in this undreſs, I lifted her to her bed, and ſat down by her upon the ſide of it, endeavouring with the utmoſt tenderneſs, as well of action as expreſſion, to diſſipate her terrors.

But what did I get by this my generous care of her, and by my ſucceſsful endeavour to bring her to herſelf?—Nothing (ungrateful as ſhe was!) but the moſt paſſionate exclamations: for we had both already forgotten the occaſion, dreadful as it was, which had thrown her into my arms: I, from the joy of incircling the almoſt diſrobed body of the loveliеſt of her ſex; ſhe, from the greater terrors that aroſe from finding herſelf in my arms, and both ſeated on the bed, from which ſhe had been ſo lately frighted.

And now, Belford, reflect upon the diſtance at which the watchful charmer had hitherto kept me? reflect upon my love, and upon her ſuffering for her: reflect upon her vigilance, and how long I had laid in wait to elude it; the awe I had ſtood in, becauſe of her frozen virtue and over-niceneſs; and that I never before was ſo happy with her; and then think how ungovernable muſt be my tranſports in thoſe happy moments!—And yet, in my own account, I was both decent and generous.

But, far from being affected, as I wiſhed, by an addreſs ſo fervent, (although from a man for whom ſhe had ſo lately owned a regard, and with whom, but an hour or two before, ſhe had parted with ſo much ſatisfaction) I never ſaw a bitterer or more moving grief, when ſhe came fully to herſelf.

She appealed to Heaven againſt my treachery, as ſhe called it; while I, by the moſt ſolemn vows, pleaded my own equal fright, and the reality of the danger that had alarmed us both.

She conjured me, in the moſt ſolemn and and affecting manner, by turns threatening and ſoothing, to quit her apartment, and permit her to hide herſelf from the light, and from every human eye.

I beſought her pardon, yet could not avoid offending; and repeatedly vowed, that the next morning's ſun ſhould witneſs our eſpouſals: but, taking, I ſuppoſe, all my proteſtations of this kind as an indication that I intended to proceed to the laſt extremity, ſhe would hear nothing that I ſaid; but redoubling her ſtruggles to get from me, in broken accents, and exclamations the moſt vehement, ſhe proteſted, that ſhe would not ſurvive what ſhe called a treatment ſo diſgraceful and villainous; and, looking all wildly round her, as if for ſome inſtrument of miſchief, ſhe eſpied a pair of ſharp-pointed ſciſſars on a chair by the bed-ſide, and endeavoured to catch them up, with a deſign to make her words good on the ſpot.

Seeing her deſperation, I begged her to be pacified; that ſhe would hear me ſpeak but one word; declaring that I intended no diſhonour to her: and having ſeized the ſciſſars, I threw them into the chimney; and ſhe ſtill inſiſting vehemently upon my diſtance, I permitted her to take the chair.

But, O the ſweet diſcompoſure!—Her bared ſhoulders, and arms ſo inimitably fair and lovely: her ſpread hands croſſed over her charming neck; yet not half concealing it's gloſſy beauties: the ſcanty coat, as ſhe roſe from me, giving the whole of her admirable ſhape, and fine-turn'd limbs: her eyes running over, yet ſeeming to threaten future vengeance: and at laſt her lips uttering what every indignant look and glowing feature portended; exclaiming as if I had done the worſt I could do, and vowing never to forgive me; wilt thou wonder if I reſumed the incenſed, the already too-much-provoked fair-one?

I did; and claſped her once more to my boſom: but, conſidering the delicacy of her frame, her force was amazing, and ſhewed how much in earneſt ſhe was in her reſentment; for it was with the utmoſt difficulty that I was able to hold her: nor could I prevent her ſliding through my arms, to fall upon her knees: which ſhe did at my feet? and there, in the anguiſh of her ſoul, her ſtreaming eyes lifted up to my face with ſupplicating ſoftneſs, hands folded, diſhevelled hair; for her night head-dreſs having fallen off in her ſtruggling, her charming treſſes fell down in naturally ſhining ringlets, as if officious to conceal the dazzling beauties of her neck and ſhoulders; her lovely boſom too heaving with ſighs, and broken ſobs, as if to aid her quivering lips, in pleading for her—In this manner, but when her grief gave way to her ſpeech, in words pronounced with that emphatical propriety, which diſtinguiſhes this admirable creature in her elocution from all the women I ever heard ſpeak; did ſhe implore my compaſſion, and my honour.

'Conſider me, dear Lovelace,' [dear was her charming word!] 'on my knees 'I beg you to conſider me, as a poor 'creature who has no protector but you; 'who has no defence but your honour: 'by that honour! By your humanity! 'By all you have vowed! I conjure you 'not to make me abhor myſelf!—Not 'to make me vile in my own eyes!'

I mentioned to-morrow as the happieſt day of my life.

'Tell me not of to-morrow. If in-'deed you mean me honourably, now, 'this very inſtant NOW! you muſt ſhew 'it, and be gone! You can never in a 'whole long life repair the evils you 'may NOW make me ſuffer.

'Wicked wretch!—Inſolent villain!' —Yes, ſhe called me inſolent villain, although ſo much in my power! And for what?—only for kiſſing (with paſſion indeed) her inimitable neck, her lips, her cheeks, her forehead, and her ſtreaming eyes, as this aſſemblage of beauties offered itſelf at once to my raviſhed ſight; ſhe continuing kneeling at my feet as I ſat.

'If I am a villain, Madam—' And then my graſping, but trembling hand —I hope I did not hurt the tendereſt and loveliеſt of all her beauties—'If I am 'a villain, Madam—'

She tore my ruffle, ſhrunk from my happy hand, with amazing force and agility, as with my other arm I would have encircled her waiſt.

'Indeed you are!—The worſt of vil-'lains!—Help! dear bleſſed people!' and ſcreamed—'No help for a poor 'creature!'

'Am I then a villain, Madam?—Am 'I then a villain, ſay you?'—and claſped both my arms about her, offering to raiſe her to my bounding heart.

'O no!—And yet you are!'—And again I was her dear Lovelace!—Her hands again claſped over her charming boſom: 'Kill me! Kill me!—If I am 'odious enough in your eyes, to deſerve 'this treatment; and I will thank you! '—Too long, much too long, has my 'life been a burden to me!—Or,' wildly looking all round her, 'give me but the 'means, and I will inſtantly convince 'you,

'you, that my honour is dearer to me
'than my life!'

Then, with ſtill folded hands, and freſh ſtreaming eyes, I was her bleſſed Lovelace; and ſhe would thank me with her lateſt breath, if I would permit her to make that preference, or free her from further indignities.

I ſat ſuſpended for a moment: 'By 'my ſoul,' thought I, 'thou art, upon
'full proof, an angel and no woman!'
Still, however, cloſe claſping her to my boſom, as I had raiſed her from her knees, ſhe again ſlid through my arms, and dropt upon them:—'See, Mr. Love-
'lace!—Good God! that I ſhould live
'to ſee this hour, and to bear this treat'ment!—See at your feet a poor crea'ture, imploring your pity, who, for 'your ſake, is abandoned of all the 'world! Let not my father's curſe thus 'dreadfully operate! Be not you the in-
'flicter, who have been the cauſe of it:
'but ſpare me, I beſeech you ſpare me!
'—For how have I deſerved this treat'ment from you?—For your own ſake,
'if not for my ſake, and as you would
'that God Almighty, in your laſt hour,
'ſhould have mercy upon you, ſpare me!'

What heart but muſt have been penetrated?

I would again have raiſed the dear ſuppliant from her knees; but ſhe would not be raiſed, till my ſoftened mind, ſhe ſaid, had yielded to her prayer, and bid her riſe to be innocent.

'Riſe then, my angel! Riſe, and be 'what you are, and all you wiſh to be!
'Only pronounce me pardoned for what 'has paſſed, and tell me you will conti'nue to look upon me with that eye of 'favour and ſerenity which I have been 'bleſſed with for ſome days paſt, and I
'will ſubmit to my beloved conquereſs,
'whoſe power never was at ſo great an 'height with me, as now, and retire to
'my apartment.'

'God Almighty,' ſaid ſhe, 'hear your 'prayers in your moſt arduous moments,
'as you have heard mine! And now
'leave me, this moment leave me, to 'my own recollection: in that you will 'leave me to miſery enough, and more 'than you ought to wiſh to your bitter-
'eſt enemy.'

'Impute not every-thing, my beſt be'loved, to deſigh, for deſign it was not.

'O, Mr. Lovelace!'

'Upon my ſoul, Madam, the fire was 'real.'—[And ſo it was, Jack!]—The 'houſe, my deareſt life, might have been
'conſumed by it, as you will be con'vinced in the morning by ocular de-
'monſtration.'

'O, Mr. Lovelace!'

'Let my paſſion for you, Madam,
'and the unexpected meeting of you at
'your chamber-door, in an attitude ſo
'charming—'

'Leave me, leave me, this moment!
'I beſeech you leave me;' looking wildly and in confuſion about her, and upon herſelf.

'Excuſe me, deareſt creature, for 'thoſe liberties, which, innocent as they 'were, your too great delicacy may make
'you take amiſs.'

'No more!—No more!—Leave me,
'I beſeech you!' Again looking upon herſelf, and round her, in a ſweet confuſion—'Be gone! Be gone!'

Then weeping, ſhe ſtruggled vehemently to withdraw her hands, which all the while I held between mine.—Her ſtruggles!—O what additional charms, as I now reflect, did her ſtruggles give to every feature, every limb, of a perſon ſo ſweetly elegant and lovely!

'Impoſſible, my deareſt life, till you
'pronounce my pardon!—Say but you
'forgive me!—Say but you forgive me!'

'I beſeech you, be gone! Leave me
'to myſelf, that I may think what I can
'do, and what I ought to do.'

'That, my deareſt creature, is not 'enough. You muſt tell me, that I 'am forgiven; that you will ſee me to'morrow, as if nothing had happened.'

And then I claſped her again in my arms, hoping ſhe would not forgive me—

'I will—I do forgive you.—Wretch
'that you are!'

'Nay, my Clariſſa! And is it ſuch
'a reluctant pardon, mingled with a 'word ſo upbraiding, that I am to be 'put off with, when you are thus' [Claſping her cloſe to me] 'in my 'power?'

'I do, I do forgive you!'

'Heartily?'

'Yes, heartily!'

'And freely?'

'Freely!'

'And will you look upon me to-mor'row as if nothing had paſſed?'

'Yes, yes!'

'I cannot take theſe peeviſh affirma-
'tives, ſo much like intentional nega-
'tives!—Say you will, upon your ho'nour.'

'Upon my honour, then—O now,
'be gone! be gone!—And never, ne'ver—'

'What never, my angel!—Is this
'forgiveneſs?'

'Never,' ſaid ſhe, 'let what has paſſed
'be remembered more!'

I inſiſted upon one kiſs to ſeal my pardon

don—And retired like a fool, a woman's fool, as I was!—I ſneakingly retired!—Couldſt thou have believed it?

But I had no ſooner entered my own apartment, than, reflecting upon the opportunity I had loſt, and that all I had gained was but an increaſe of my own difficulties; and upon the ridicule I ſhould meet with below upon a weakneſs ſo much out of my uſual character; I repented, and haſtened back, in hope, that through the diſtreſs of mind which I left her in, ſhe had not ſo ſoon faſtened the door; and I was fully reſolved to execute all my purpoſes, be the conſequence what it would; 'For,' thought I, 'I have already ſinned beyond cordial 'forgiveneſs, I doubt; and if fits and 'deſperation enſue, I can but marry at 'laſt, and then I ſhall make her amends.'

But I was juſtly puniſhed; for her door was faſt: and hearing her ſigh and ſob, as if her heart would burſt, 'My be-'loved creature,' ſaid I, rapping gently, [Her ſobbings then ceaſing] 'I want 'but to ſay three words to you, which 'muſt be the moſt acceptable you ever 'heard from me. Let me ſee you but 'for one moment.'

I thought I heard her coming to open the door, and my heart leapt in that hope; but it was only to draw another bolt, to make it ſtill the faſter: and ſhe either could not or would not anſwer me, but retired to the further end of her apartment, to her cloſet probably: and more like a fool than before, again I ſneaked away.

This was my mine, my plot! And this was all I made of it!

I love her more than ever!—And well I may!—Never ſaw I poliſhed ivory ſo beautiful as her arms and ſhoulders; never touched I velvet ſo ſoft as her ſkin: her virgin boſom—O Belford! ſhe is all perfection! Then ſuch an elegance!—In her ſtruggling loſing her ſhoe, (but juſt ſlipt on, as I told thee) her pretty foot equally white and delicate as the hand of any other woman!

But ſeeſt thou not that I have a claim of merit for a grace that every-body hitherto hath denied me? And that is, for a capacity of being moved by prayers and tears—Where, where, on this occaſion, was the callus, where the flint, by which my heart was ſaid to be ſurrounded?

This, indeed, is the firſt inſtance, in the like caſe, that ever I was wrought upon. But why? Becauſe, I never before encountered a reſiſtance ſo much in earneſt: a reſiſtance, in ſhort, ſo irreſiſtible.

What a triumph has her ſex obtained in my thoughts by this trial, and this reſiſtance?

But if ſhe can now forgive me—Can!—She muſt.—Has ſhe not upon her honour already done it?—But how will the dear creature keep that part of her promiſe, which engages her to ſee me in the morning, as if nothing had happened?

She would give the world, I fancy, to have the firſt interview over!—She had not beſt reproach me—Yet not to reproach me!—What a charming puzzle!—Let her break her word with me at her peril. Fly me ſhe cannot—No appeals lie from my tribunal—What friend has ſhe in the world, if my compaſſion exert not itſelf in her favour?—And then the worthy Captain Tomlinſon, and her uncle Harlowe, will be able to make all up for me, be my next offence what it will.

As to thy apprehenſions of her committing any raſhneſs upon herſelf, whatever ſhe might have done in her paſſion if ſhe could have ſeized upon her ſciſſars, or found any other weapon, I dare ſay, there is no fear of that from her deliberate mind. A man has trouble enough with theſe truly pious, and truly virtuous girls; [Now I believe there are ſuch] he had need to have ſome benefit from, ſome ſecurity in, the rectitude of their minds.

In ſhort, I fear nothing in this lady but grief: yet that's a ſlow worker, you know; and gives time to pop in a little joy between it's ſullen fits.

LETTER I.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

THURSDAY MORN. EIGHT O'CLOCK.

HER chamber-door has not yet been opened. I muſt not expect ſhe will breakfaſt with me. Nor dine with me, I doubt. A little ſilly ſoul, what trouble does ſhe make to herſelf by her overniceneſs!—All I have done to her, would have been looked upon as a frolick only, a romping-bout, and laughed off by nine parts in ten of the ſex accordingly. The more ſhe makes of it, the more painful to herſelf, as well as to me.

Why now, Jack, were it not better, upon her own notions, that ſhe ſeemed not ſo ſenſible as ſhe will make herſelf to be, if ſhe is very angry?

But perhaps I am more afraid than I need. I believe I am. From her over-niceneſs ariſes my fear, more than from any extraordinary reaſon for reſentment. Next time, ſhe may count herſelf very happy, if ſhe come off no worſe.

The dear creature was ſo frightened, and ſo fatigued, laſt night, no wonder ſhe lies it out this morning.

I hope ſhe has had more reſt than I have had. Soft and balmy, I hope, have been her ſlumbers, that ſhe may meet me in tolerable temper. All ſweetly bluſhing and confounded—I know how ſhe will look!—But why ſhould ſhe, the ſufferer, be aſhamed, when I, the treſpaſſer, am not?

But cuſtom's a prodigious thing. The women are told how much their bluſhes brighten their graces: they practiſe for them therefore: bluſhes come as haſtily when they call for them, as their tears: aye, that's it! while we men, taking bluſhes for a ſign of guilt or ſheepiſhneſs, are equally ſtudious to ſuppreſs them.

By my troth, Jack, I am half as much aſhamed to ſee the women below, as my fair-one can be to ſee me. I have not yet opened my door, that I may not be obtruded upon by them.

After all, what devils may one make of the ſex! To what a height of—What ſhall I call it?—muſt thoſe of it be arrived, who once loved a man with ſo much diſtinction, as both Polly and Sally loved me; and yet can have got ſo much above the pangs of jealouſy, ſo much above the mortifying reflections that ariſe from dividing and ſharing with new objects the affections of them they prefer to all others, as to wiſh for and promote a competitorſhip in his love, and make their ſupreme delight conſiſt in reducing others to their level!—For thou canſt not imagine, how even Sally Martin rejoiced laſt night in the thought that the lady's hour was approaching.

PAST TEN O'CLOCK.

I NEVER longed in my life for anything with ſo much impatience, as to ſee my charmer. She has been ſtirring, it ſeems, theſe two hours.

Dorcas juſt now tapped at her door, to take her morning commands.

She had none for her, was the anſwer.

She deſired to know, If ſhe would not breakfaſt?

A ſullen and low-voiced negative received Dorcas.

I will go myſelf.

THREE different times tapped I at the door; but had no anſwer.

'Permit me, deareſt creature, to enquire after your health. As you have not been ſeen to-day, I am impatient to know how you do.'

Not a word of anſwer; but a deep ſigh, even to ſobbing.

'Let me beg of you, Madam, to accompany me up another pair of ſtairs —You'll rejoice to ſee what a happy eſcape we have all had.'

A happy eſcape indeed, Jack!—For the fire had ſcorched the window-board ſinged the hangings, and burnt through the ſlit-deal lining of the window-jambs.

'No anſwer, Madam! — Am I not worthy of one word?—Is it thus you keep your promiſe with me?—Shall I not have the favour of your company for two minutes' [Only for two minutes] in the dining-room?'

'Hem!'—And a deep ſigh!—were all the anſwer.

'Anſwer me but how you do! Anſwer me but that you are well! Is this the forgiveneſs that was the condition of my obedience?'

Then, in a faintiſh, but angry voice, 'Be gone from my door!—Wretch! inhuman, barbarous, and all that is baſe and treacherous!—be gone from my door!—Nor teaze thus a poor creature, entitled to protection, not outrage.'

'I ſee, Madam, how you keep your word with me!—If a ſudden impulſe, the effects of an unthought-of accident, cannot be forgiven—'

'O the dreadful weight of a father's curſe, thus in the very letter of it—'

And then her voice dying away in murmurs inarticulate, I looked though the key-hole, and ſaw her on her knees, her face, though not towards me, lifted up, as well as hands, and theſe folded, deprecating, I ſuppoſe, that gloomy tyrant's curſe.

I could not help being moved.

'My deareſt life! admit me to your preſence but for two minutes, and confirm your promiſed pardon; and may lightning blaſt me on the ſpot, if I offer any-thing but my penitence, at a ſhrine ſo ſacred!—I will afterwards leave you for the whole day; and till to-morrow morning; and then attend you with writings, all ready to ſign, a licence obtained, or if it cannot, a miniſter without one. This once believe me! When you ſee the reality of the danger that gave occaſion for this your unhappy reſentment, you will think leſs hardly of me. And let me beſeech you to perform a promiſe on which I made a reliance not altogether ungenerous.'

'I cannot ſee you! Would to Heaven 'I never had! If I write, that's all I can 'do.'

'Let your writing then, my deareſt 'life, confirm your promiſe: and I will 'withdraw in expectation of it.'

PAST ELEVEN O'CLOCK.

She rung her bell for Dorcas; and, with her door in her hand, only half-opened, gave her a billet for me.

'How did the dear creature look, 'Dorcas?'

'She was dreſſed. She turned her face 'quite from me; and ſighed, as if her 'heart would break.'

'Sweet creature!'—I kiſſed the wet wafer, and drew it from the paper with my breath.

Theſe are the contents.—No inſcriptive 'Sir!' No 'Mr. Lovelace!'

'I CANNOT ſee you: nor will I, if I 'can help it. Words cannot expreſs the 'anguiſh of my ſoul on your baſeneſs 'and ingratitude.

'If the circumſtances of things are 'ſuch, that I can have no way for re'conciliation with thoſe who would have 'been my natural protectors from ſuch 'outrages, but through you, [The only 'inducement I can have to ſtay a mo'ment longer in your knowledge] pen 'and ink muſt be, at preſent, the only 'means of communication between us.

'Vileſt of men! and moſt deteſtable of 'plotters! how have I deſerved from 'you the ſhocking indignities—But no 'more—Only for your own ſake, wiſh 'not, at leaſt for a week to come, to ſee 'the undeſervedly injured and inſulted

So thou ſeeſt, nothing could have ſtood me in ſtead, but this plot of Tomlinſon and her uncle! To what a pretty paſs, nevertheleſs, have I brought myſelf!—Had Cæſar been ſuch a fool, he had never paſſed the rubicon. But after he had paſſed it, had he retreated re infecta, intimidated by a ſenatorial edict, what a pretty figure would he have made in hiſtory!—I might have known, that to attempt a robbery, and put a perſon in bodily fear, is as puniſhable as if the robbery had been actually committed.

But not to ſee her for a week!—Dear pretty fool! how ſhe anticipates me in every-thing! The counſellor will have finiſhed the writings to-day or to-morrow, at furtheſt: the licence with the parſon, or the parſon without the licence, muſt be alſo procured within the next four-and-twenty hours; Pritchard is as good as ready with his indentures tripartite: Tomlinſon is at hand with a favourable anſwer from her uncle—Yet not to ſee her for a week!—Dear ſweet ſoul!—Her good angel is gone a journey: is truanting at leaſt. But nevertheleſs, in thy week's time, or in much leſs, my charmer, I doubt not to complete my triumph!

But what vexes me of all things, is, that ſuch an excellent creature ſhould break her word:—Fie, fie, upon her!—But nobody is abſolutely perfect! 'Tis human to err, but not to perſevere—I hope my charmer cannot be inhuman!

LETTER II.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

KING'S-ARMS, PALL MALL, THURSDAY, TWO O'CLOCK.

SEVERAL billets paſſed between us before I went out, by the internunciaſhip of Dorcas: for which reaſon mine are ſuperſcribed by her married name.—She would not open her door to receive them; leſt I ſhould be near it, I ſuppoſe: ſo Dorcas was forced to put them under the door; (after copying them for thee) and thence to take the anſwers. Read them, if thou wilt, at this place.

'TO MRS. LOVELACE.

'INDEED, my deareſt life, you carry this matter too far. What will the people below, who ſuppoſe us one as to the ceremony, think of ſo great a niceneſs? Liberties ſo innocent! the occaſion of accidental!—You will expoſe yourſelf as well as me—Hitherto they know nothing of what has paſſed. And what indeed has paſſed, to occaſion all this reſentment?—I am ſure, you will not, by a breach of your word of honour, give me reaſon to conclude, that had I not obeyed you, I could have fared no worſe.

'Moſt ſincerely do I repent the offence given to your delicacy—But muſt I, for ſo accidental an occurrence, be branded by ſuch ſhocking names?—Vileſt of men, and moſt deteſtable of plotters, are hard words!—From the pen of ſuch a lady too.

'If you ſtep up another pair of ſtairs, you will be convinced, that, however deteſtable I may be to you, I am no plotter in this affair.

'I muſt inſiſt upon ſeeing you, in order to take your directions upon ſome of the ſubjects we talked of yeſterday in the evening.

'All that is more than neceſſary is too much. I claim your promiſed pardon, and wiſh to plead it on my knees.

'I beg your preſence in the dining-room for one quarter of an hour, and I will then leave you for the day. I am, my deareſt life, your ever-adoring and truly penitent,

'LOVELACE.'

'TO MR. LOVELACE.

'I WILL not ſee you. I cannot ſee you. I have no directions to give you. Let Providence decide for me as it pleaſes.

'The more I reflect upon your vileneſs, your ingrateful, your barbarous vileneſs, the more I am exaſperated againſt you.

'You are the laſt perſon, whoſe judgment I will take upon what is or is not carried too far in matters of decency.

''Tis grievous to me to write, or even to think of you at preſent. Urge me no more then. Once more, I will not ſee you. Nor care I, now you have made me vile to myſelf, what other people think of me.'

'TO MRS. LOVELACE.

'AGAIN, Madam, I remind you of your promiſe: and beg leave to ſay, I inſiſt upon the performance of it.

'Remember, deareſt creature, that the fault of a blameable perſon cannot warrant a fault in one more perfect. Over-niceneſs my be under-niceneſs!

'I cannot reproach myſelf with anything that deſerves this high reſentment.

'I own that the violence of my paſſion for you might have carried me beyond fit bounds—But that your commands and adjurations had power over me at ſuch a moment, I humbly preſume to ſay, deſerves ſome conſideration.

'You enjoin me not to ſee you for a week. If I have not your pardon before Captain Tomlinſon comes to town, what ſhall I ſay to him?

'I beg once more your preſence in the dining-room. By my ſoul, Madam, I muſt ſee you.

'I want to conſult you about the licence, and other particulars of great importance. The people below think us married; and I cannot talk to you upon ſuch ſubjects with the door between us.

'For

'For Heaven's sake, favour me with your presence for a few minutes: and I will leave you for the day.

'If I am to be forgiven, according to your promise, the earlier forgiveness will be most obliging, and will save great pain to yourself as well as to your truly contrite and afflicted

'LOVELACE.'

'TO MR. LOVELACE.

'THE more you teaze me, the worse it will be for you.

'Time is wanted to consider whether I ever should think of you at all.

'At present, it is my sincere wish, that I may never more see your face.

'All that can afford you the least shadow of favour from me, arises from the hoped-for reconciliation with my real friends, not my Judas protector.

'I am careless at present of consequences. I hate myself: and who is it I have reason to value?—Not the man who could form a plot to disgrace his own hopes, as well as a poor friendless creature, (made friendless by himself) by insults not to be thought of with patience.'

'TO MRS. LOVELACE.

'MADAM,

'I WILL go to the Commons, and proceed in every particular as if I had not the misfortune to be under your displeasure.

'I must insist upon it, that however faulty my passion on so unexpected an incident, made me appear to a lady of your delicacy, yet my compliance with your entreaties at such a moment [As it gave you an instance of your power over me, which few men could have shewn] ought, duly considered, to entitle me to the effects of that solemn promise which was the condition of my obedience.

'I hope to find you in a kinder, and, I will say, juster disposition on my return. Whether I get the licence, or not, let me beg of you to make the soon you have been pleased to bid me hope for, to-morrow morning. This will reconcile every-thing, and make me the happiest of men.

'The settlements are ready to sign, or will be by night.

'For Heaven's sake, Madam, do not carry your resentment into a displeasure so disproportionate to the offence. 'For that would be, to expose us both to the people below; and, what is of infinitely more consequence to us, to Captain Tomlinson. Let us be able, I beseech you, Madam, to assure him, on his next visit, that we are one.

'As I have no hope to be permitted to dine with you, I shall not return till evening: and then, I presume to say, 'I expect [Your promise authorizes me to use the word] to find you disposed to bless, by your consent for to-morrow, 'your adoring, 'LOVELACE.'

WHAT pleasure did I propose to take, how to enjoy the sweet confusion in which I expected to find her, while all was so recent!—But she must, she shall, see me on my return. It were better for herself, as well as for me, that she had not made so much ado about nothing. I must keep my anger alive, lest it sink into compassion. Love and compassion, be the provocation ever so great, are hard to be separated: while anger converts what would be pity without it, into resentment. Nothing can be lovely in a man's eye, with which he is thoroughly displeased.

I ordered Dorcas, on putting the last billet under the door, and finding it taken up, to tell her, that I hoped an answer to it before I went out.

Her reply was verbal, 'Tell him that I 'care not whither he goes, nor what he does.' —And this, re-urged by Dorcas, was all she had to say to me.

I looked through the key-hole at my going by her door, and saw her on her knees, at her bed's feet, her head and bosom on the bed, her arms extended; [Sweet creature, how I adore her!] and in an agony she seemed to be, sobbing, as I heard at that distance, as if her heart would break—By my soul, Jack, I am a pitiful fellow. Recollection is my enemy! —Divine excellence! —Happy with her for so many days together! Now so unhappy!—And for what?——But she is purity herself.—And why, after all, should I thus torment—But I must not trust myself with myself, in the humour I am in.

WAITING here for Mowbray and Mallory, by whose aid I am to get the licence, I took papers out of my pocket, to divert myself; and thy last popt officiously the first into my hand. I gave it the honour of a re-perusal; and this revived the subject with me, with which I had resolved not to trust myself.

I remember, that the dear creature, in her torn answer to my proposals, says That condescension is not meanness. She better better knows how to make this out, than any mortal breathing. Condescension indeed implies dignity: and dignity ever was there in her condescension. Yet such a dignity, as gave grace to the condescension; for there was no pride, no insult, no apparent superiority, indicated by it.—This, Miss Howe confirms to be a part of her general character

I can tell her, how she might behave, to make me her own for ever. She knows she cannot fly me. She knows she must see me sooner or later; the sooner the more gracious.—I would allow her to resent; [Not because the liberties I took with her require resentment, were she not a CLARISSA; but as it becomes her particular niceness to resent:] but would she shew more love than abhorrence of me in her resentment; would she seem, if it were but to seem, to believe the fire no device, and all that followed merely accidental; and descended, upon it, to tender expostulation, and upbraiding for the advantage I would have taken of her surprize; and would she, at last, be satisfied (as well she may) that it was attended with no further consequence; and place some generous confidence in my honour; [Power loves to be trusted, Jack;] I think I would put an end to all her trials, and pay her my vows at the altar.

Yet, to have taken such bold steps, as with Tomlinson and her uncle—To have made such a progress—O Belford, Belford, how have I puzzled myself, as well as her!—This cursed aversion to wedlock how it has entangled me!—What contradictions has it made me guilty of!

How pleasing to myself, to look back upon the happy days I gave her; though mine would doubtless have been more unmixedly so, could I have determined to lay aside my contrivances, and to be as sincere all the time, as she deserved that I should be!

If I find this humour hold but till to-morrow morning, [And it has now lasted two full hours, and I seem, methinks, to have pleasure in encouraging it] I will make thee a visit, I think, or get thee to come to me; and then will I—consult thee upon it.

But she will not trust me. She will not confide in my honour. Doubt, in this case, is defiance. She loves me not well enough to forgive me generously. She is so greatly above me! How can I forgive her for a merit so mortifying to my pride! She thinks, she knows, she has told me, that she is above me. These words are still in my ears, 'Be gone, Lovelace! '—My soul is above thee, man!—Thou 'hast a proud heart to contend with!—'My soul is above thee, man.' Miss Howe thinks her above me too. Thou, even thou, my friend, my intimate friend and companion, art of the same opinion. Then I fear her as much as I love her.—How shall my pride bear these reflections? My wife (as I have often said, because it so often recurs to my thoughts) to be so much my superior!—Myself to be considered but as the second person in my own family!—Canst thou teach me to bear such a reflection as this!—To tell me of my acquisition in her, and that she, with all her excellences, will be mine in full property, is a mistake—It cannot be so—For shall I not be hers; and not my own?—Will not every act of her duty (as I cannot deserve it) be a condescension, and a triumph over me?—And must I owe it merely to her goodness, that she does not despise me?—To have her condescend to bear with my follies!—To wound me with an eye of pity!—A daughter of the Harlowes thus to excel the last, and as I have heretofore said, not the meanest of the Lovelaces—Forbid it!

Yet forbid it not—For do I not now—do I not every moment—see her before me all over charms, and elegance and purity, as in the struggles of the past midnight? And in these struggles, heart, voice, eyes, hands, and sentiments, so greatly, so gloriously consistent with the character she has sustained from her cradle to the present hour?

But what advantages do I give thee? Yet have I not always done her justice? Why then thy teazing impertinence?

However, I forgive thee, Jack—Since (so much generous love am I capable of!) I had rather all the world should condemn me, than that her character should suffer the least impeachment.

The dear creature herself once told me, that there was a strange mixture in my mind.

I have been called devil and Beelzebub, between the two proud beauties: I must indeed be a Beelzebub, if I had not some tolerable qualities.

But as Miss Howe says, the suffering-time of this excellent creature is her shining-time. Hitherto she has done nothing but shine.

She called me villain, Belford, within these few hours. And what is the sum of the present argument; but that had I not been a villain in her sense of the stand, but had not been so much an angel!

O Jack, Jack! This midnight attempt has made me mad; has utterly undone me! How can the dear creature say, I have made her vile in her own eyes, when her behaviour under such a surprise, and her resentment under such circumstances, have so greatly exalted her in mine?

Whence, however, this strange rhapsody?—Is it owing to my being here? That I am not at Sinclair's? But if there be infection in that house, how has my beloved escaped it?

But no more in this strain!—I will see what her behaviour will be on my return—Yet already do I begin to apprehend some little sinkings, some little retrogradations: for I have just now a doubt arisen, whether, for her own sake, I should wish her to forgive me lightly, or with difficulty?

I AM in a way to come at the wished-for licence.

I have now given every-thing between my beloved and me a full consideration; and my puzzle is over. What has brought me to a speedier determination, is, that I think I have found out what she means by the week's distance at which she intends to hold me. It is, that she may have time to write to Miss Howe, to put in motion that cursed scheme of hers, and to take measures upon it which shall enable her to abandon and renounce me for ever. Now, Jack, if I obtain not admission to her presence on my return; but am refused with haughtiness; if her week be insisted upon, (such prospects before her:) I shall be confirmed in my conjecture; and it will be plain to me, that weak at best was that love, which could give place to punctilio, at a time when the all-reconciling ceremony, as she must think, waits her command:—then will I recollect all her perverseness; then will I re-peruse Miss Howe's letters, and the transcripts from others of them; give way to my aversion to the life of shackles: and then shall she be mine in my own way.

But, after all, I am in hopes, that she will have better considered of every-thing by the evening; that her threat of a week's distance was thrown out in the heat of passion; and that she will allow, that I have as much cause to quarrel with her for breach of her word, as she has with me for breach of the peace.

These lines of Rowe have got into my head; and I shall repeat them very devoutly all the way the chairmen shall poppet me towards her by-and-by.

'Teach me, some power, the happy art of 'speech,
'To dress my purpose up in gracious words;
'Such as may softly steal upon her soul,
'And never waken the tempestuous passions.'

LETTER III.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

THURSDAY EVENING, JUNE 8.

O For a curse to kill with!—Ruined! Undone! Outwitted! Tricked!—Zounds, man, the lady is gone off!—Absolutely gone off!—Escaped!

Thou knowest not, nor canst conceive the pangs that wring my heart!—What can I do!—O Lord, O Lord, O Lord!

And thou, too, who hast endeavoured to weaken my hands, wilt but clap thy dragon's wings at the tidings!

Yet I must write, or I shall go distracted. Little less have I been these two hours; dispatching messengers to every stage, to every inn, to every waggon or coach, whether flying or creeping, and to every house with a bill up, for five miles round.

The little hypocrite, who knows not a soul in this town, [I thought I was sure of her at any time] such an unexperienced traitress; giving me hope too, in her first billet, that her expectation of the family-reconciliation would withold her from taking such a step as this—Curse upon her contrivances!—I thought, that it was owing to her bashfulness, to her modesty, that, after a few innocent freedoms, she could not look me in the face; when, all the while, she was impudently [Yes, I say, impudently, though she be Clarissa Harlowe] contriving to rob me of the dearest property I had ever purchased—Purchased by a painful servitude of many months; fighting through the wild-beasts of her family for her, and combating with a wind-mill virtue, which had cost me millions of perjuries only to attempt; and which now, with it's damn'd air-fans, has tost me a mile and an half beyond hope!—And this, just as I had arrived within view of the consummation of all my wishes!

O devil of love! God of love no more—How have I deserved this of thee!—Never before the friend of frozen virtue!—Powerless demon, for powerless thou must be, if thou mean'st not to frustrate my hopes; who shall henceforth kneel at thy altars!—May every enterprizing heart abhor, despise, execrate, renounce thee, as I do!—But, O Belford, Belford, what signifies cursing now!

How she could effect this her wicked escape, is my astonishment; the whole sisterhood having charge of her:—for, as yet, I have not had patience enough to enquire into the particulars, nor to let a soul of them approach me.

Of this I am sure, or I had not brought her hither; there is not a creature belonging to this house, that could be corrupted either by virtue or remorse: the highest joy every infernal nymph of this worse than infernal habitation, could have known, would have been to reduce this proud beauty to her own level.—And as to my villain, who also had charge of her, he is such a seasoned varlet, that he delights in mischief for the sake of it: no bribe could seduce him to betray his trust, were there but wickedness in it!—'Tis well, however, he was out of my way when the cursed news was imparted to me!—Gone, the villain! in quest of her: not to return, nor to see my face [so it seems he declared] till he has heard some tidings of her; and all the out-of-place varlets of his numerous acquaintance are summoned and employed in the same business.

To what purpose brought I this angel (angel I must yet call her) to this hellish house?—And was I not meditating to do her deserved honour! By my soul, Belford, I was resolved—But thou knowest what I had conditionally resolved—And now, who can tell into what hands she may have fallen?

I am mad, stark mad, by Jupiter, at the thoughts of this!—Unprovided, destitute, unacquainted—some villain, worse than myself, who adores her not as I adore her, may have seized her, and taken advantage of her distress!—Let me perish, Belford, if a whole hecatomb of innocents, as the little plagues are called, shall atone for the broken promise and wicked artifices of this cruel creature!

Going home, as I did, with resolutions favourable to her, judge thou of my distraction, when her escape was first hinted to me, although but in broken sentences! I knew not what I said, nor what I did. I wanted to kill somebody. I flew out of one room into another, while all avoided me but the veteran Betty Carberry, who broke the matter to me. I charged bribery and corruption, in my first fury, upon all; and threatened destruction to old and young, as they should come in my way.

Dorcas continues hold up from me: Sally and Polly have not yet dared to appear: the vile Sinclair—

But here comes the odious devil. She taps at the door, though that's only a-jar, whining and snuffling, to try, I suppose, to coax me into temper.

What a helpless state, where a man can only execrate himself and others; the occasion of his rage remaining; the evil increasing upon reflection; time itself conspiring to deepen it!—O how I cursed her!

I have her now, methinks, before me, blubbering—How odious does sorrow make an ugly face!—Thine, Jack, and this old beldam's, in penitentials, instead of moving compassion, must evermore confirm hatred; while beauty in tears, is beauty heightened, and what my heart has ever delighted to see.

'What excuse!—Confound you, and 'your cursed daughters, what excuse can 'you make?—Is she not gone?—Has she 'not escaped?—But before I am quite 'distracted, before I commit half an 'hundred murders, let me hear how it 'was.'

I have heard her story!—Art, damn'd, confounded, wicked, unpardonable art, in a woman of her character—But shew me a woman, and I'll shew thee a plotter!—This plaguy sex is art itself: every individual of it is a plotter by nature.

This is the substance of the old wretch's account.

She told me, That I had no sooner left the vile house, than Dorcas acquainted the syren [Do, Jack, let me call her names!—I beseech thee, Jack, to permit me to call her names! than Dorcas acquainted her lady] with it; and that I had left word, that I was gone to Doctors Commons, and should be heard of for some hours at the Horn there, if enquired after by the counsellor, or any-body else: that afterwards I should be either at the Cocoa-Tree, or King's Arms, and should not return till late. She then urged her to take some refreshment.

She was in tears when Dorcas approached her; her saucy eyes swelled with weeping: she refused either to eat or drink; sighed as if her heart would break.—False grief! not the humble, silent grief, that only deserves pity!—Contriving to ruin me, to deſpoil me of all that I held valuable, in the very midſt of it.

Nevertheleſs, being reſolved not to ſee me for a week at leaſt, ſhe ordered her to bring up three or four French rolls, with a little butter, and, a decanter of water; telling her ſhe would diſpenſe with her attendance; and that ſhould be all ſhe would live upon in the interim. So, artful creature! pretending to lay up for a week's ſiege.—For, as to ſubſtantial food, ſhe, no more than other angels—Angels, ſaid I?—The devil take me if ſhe ſhall be any more an angel!—For ſhe is odious in my eyes; and I hate her mortally!

'But, oh! Lovelace, thou lyeſt!—'She is all that is lovely!—All that is 'excellent!'

But is ſhe, can ſhe be gone!—O how Miſs Howe will triumph!—But if that little fury receive her, fate ſhall make me rich amends; for then will I contrive to have them both.

I was looking back for connexion—but the devil take connexion; I have no buſineſs with it: the contrary beſt befits diſtraction, and that will ſoon be my lot!

Dorcas conſulted the old wretch about obeying her: 'O yes, by all means;' for Mr. Lovelace knew how to come at her at any time; and directed a bottle of Sherry to be added.

This cheerful compliance ſo obliged her, that ſhe was prevailed upon to go up, and look at the damage done by the fire; and ſeemed not only ſhocked at it, but, as they thought, ſatisfied it was no trick; as ſhe owned ſhe had at firſt apprehended it to be. All this made them ſecure; and they laughed in their ſleeves, to think what a childiſh way of ſhewing her reſentment ſhe had found out; Sally throwing out her witticiſms, that Mrs. Lovelace was right, however, not to quarrel with her bread and butter.

Now this very childiſhneſs, as they imagined it, in ſuch a genius, would have me ſuſpect either her head, after what had happened the night before; or her purpoſe, when the marriage was (ſo far as ſhe knew) to be completed within the week in which ſhe was reſolved to ſecrete herſelf from me in the ſame houſe.

She ſent Will with a letter to Wilſon's, directed to Miſs Howe, ordering him to enquire if there were not one for her there.

He only pretended to go, and brought word there was none; and put her letter in his pocket for me.

She then ordered him to carry another (which ſhe gave him) to the Horn Tavern to me. All this done without any ſeeming hurry; yet ſhe appeared to be very ſolemn; and put her handkerchief frequently to her eyes.

Will pretended to come to me, with this letter. But though the dog had the ſagacity to miſtruſt ſomething on her ſending him out a ſecond time, (and to me, whom ſhe had refuſed to ſee;) which he thought extraordinary; and mention his miſtruſts to Sally, Polly, and Dorcas; yet they made light of his ſuſpicions; Dorcas aſſuring them all, that her lady ſeemed more ſtupid with her grief, than active; and that ſhe really believed ſhe was a little turned in her head, and knew not what ſhe did. But all of them depended upon her inexperience, her open temper, and upon her not making the leaſt motion towards going out, or to have a coach or chair called, as ſometimes ſhe had done: and ſtill more upon the preparations ſhe had made for a week's ſiege, as I may call it.

Will went out, pretending to bring the letter to me; but quickly returned; his heart ſtill miſgiving him, on recollecting my frequent cautions, that he was not to judge for himſelf, when he had poſitive orders; but if any doubt occurred, from circumſtances I could not foreſee, literally to follow them, as the only way to avoid blame.

But it muſt have been in this little interval, that ſhe eſcaped; for ſoon after his return, they made faſt the ſtreet-door and hatch, the mother and the two nymphs taking a little turn into the garden; Dorcas going up ſtairs, and Will (to avoid being ſeen by his lady, or his voice heard) down into the kitchen.

About half an hour after, Dorcas, who had planted herſelf where ſhe could ſee her lady's door open, had the curioſity to go to look through the key-hole, having a miſgiving, as ſhe ſaid, that her lady might offer ſome violence to herſelf, in the mood ſhe had been in all day; and finding the key in the door which was not very uſual, ſhe tapped at it three or four times, and having no anſwer, opened it, with 'Madam, Madam, did you 'call?'—Suppoſing her in her cloſet.

Having no anſwer, ſhe ſtept forward, and was aſtoniſhed to find ſhe was not there. She haſtily ran into the dining-room, then into my apartments; ſearched every cloſet; dreading all the time to behold ſome ſad cataſtrophe.

Not finding her any-where, ſhe ran down to the old creature, and her nymphs, nymphs, with a 'Have you seen my 'lady?—Then she's gone!—She's no-'where above!'

They were sure she could not be gone out.

The whole house was in an uproar in an instant, some running up-stairs, some down, from the upper rooms to the lower; and all screaming, How should they look me in the face!

Will cried out he was a dead man; he blamed them; they him; and every-one was an accuser, and an excuser at the same time.

When they had searched the whole house, and every closet in it, ten times over, to no purpose, they took it into their heads to send to all the porters, chairmen, and Hackney-coachmen, that had been near the house for two hours past to enquire if any of them saw such a young lady; describing her.

This brought them some light: the only dawning for hope, that I can have, and which keeps me from absolute despair. One of the chairmen gave them this account: That he saw such a one come out of the house a little before four, (in a great hurry, and as if frighted) with a little parcel tied up in an handkerchief, in her hand: that he took notice to his fellow, who plied her without her answering, that she was a fine young lady: that he'd warrant, she had either a bad husband, or very cross parents; for that her eyes seemed swelled with crying. Upon which, a third fellow replied, That it might be a doe escaped from mother Damnable's park. This Mrs. Sinclair told me with a curse, and a wish that she knew the saucy villain: —She thought, truly, that she had a better reputation; so handsomely as she lived, and so justly as she paid every-body for what she bought; her house visited by the best and civilest of gentlemen; and no noise or brawls ever heard, or known in it.

From these appearances, the fellow who gave this information, had the curiosity to follow her, unperceived. She often looked back. Every-body who passed her, turned to look after her; passing their verdict upon her tears, her hurry, and her charming person; till coming to a stand of coaches, a coachman plied her; was accepted; alighted; opened the coach-door in a hurry, seeing her hurry; and in it she stumbled for haste; and, as the fellow believed, hurt her shins with the stumble.

The devil take me, Belford, if my generous heart is not moved for her, notwithstanding her wicked deceit, to think what must be her reflections and apprehensions at the time:—A mind so delicate, heeding no censures; yet, poor baby, afraid of being laid hold of by a Lovelace in every-one she saw! At the same time, not knowing to what dangers she was about to expose herself; nor of whom she could obtain shelter; a stranger to the town, and to all its ways; the afternoon far gone; but little money; and no cloaths but those she had on!

It is impossible, in this little interval since last night, that Miss Howe's Townsend could be co-operating.

But how she must abhor me, to run all these risques; how heartily must she detest me, for my freedoms of last night! O that I had given her greater reason for a resentment so violent!—As to her virtue, I am too much enraged to give her the merit due to that. To virtue it cannot be owing that she should fly from the charming prospects that were before her; but to malice, hatred, contempt, Harlowe pride, (the worst of pride) and to all the deadly passions that ever reigned in a female breast—And if I can but recover her—But be still, be calm, be hushed, my stormy passions; for is it not Clarissa [Harlowe must I say?] that thus I rave against!

The fellow heard her say, 'Drive 'fast! Very fast!'—'Where, Madam?' —'To Holborn Bars,' answered she; repeating, 'Drive very fast!'—And up she pulled both the windows: and he lost sight of the coach in a minute.

Will, as soon as he had this intelligence, speeded away in hopes to trace her out; declaring, that he would never think of seeing me, till he had heard some tidings of his lady.

And now, Belford, all my hope is, that this fellow (who attended us in our airing to Hampstead, to Highgate, to Muswell Hill, to Kentish Town) will hear of her at some one or other of those places. And on this I the rather build, as I remember she was once, after our return, very inquisitive about the stages, and their prices; praising the conveniency to passengers in their going off every hour; and this in Will's hearing, who was then in attendance. Woe be to the villain, if he recollect not this!

I HAVE been traversing her room, meditating, or taking up every-thing she but touched or used: the glass she dressed at, I was ready to break, for not giving me the personal image it was wont to reflect, of her, whose idea is far never prevail with me. I call for her, now in the tenderest, now in the most reproachful terms, as if within hearing: wanting her, I want my own soul, at least every-thing dear to it. What a void in my heart! what a chilness in my blood, as if its circulation were arrested! From her room to my own; in the dining-room, and in and out of every place where I have seen the beloved of my heart, do I hurry; in none can I tarry; her lovely image in every one, in some lively attitude, rushing cruelly upon me, in differently remembered conversations.

But when in my first fury, at my return, I went up two pair of stairs, resolved to find the locked-up Dorcas, and behold the vainly-burnt window-board, and recollected my baffled contrivances, baffled by my own weak folly, I thought my distraction compleated; and down I ran as one frighted at a spectre, ready to howl for vexation; my head and my temples shooting with a violence I had never felt before; and my back aching as if the vertebræ were disjointed, and falling in pieces.

But now that I have heard the mother's story, and contemplated the dawning hopes given by the chairman's information, I am a good deal easier, and can make cooler reflections. Most heartily pray I for Will's success, every four or five minutes. If I lose her, all my rage will return with redoubled fury. The disgrace to be thus out-witted by a novice, an infant in stratagem and contrivance, added to the violence of my passion for her, will either break my heart, or (what saves many an heart, in evils insupportable) turn my brain. What had I to do to go out a licence-hunting, at least till I had seen her, and made up matters with her? And, indeed, were it not the privilege of a principal to lay all his own faults upon his underlings, and never be to blame himself, I should be apt to reflect, that I am more in fault than any-body. And as the sting of this reflection will sharpen upon me, if I recover her not, how shall I be able to bear it?

If ever—

Here Mr. Lovelace lays himself under a curse, too shocking to be repeated, if he revenge not himself upon the lady, should he once more get her into his hands.

I HAVE just now dismissed the snivelling toad Dorcas, who was introduced to me for my pardon by the whining mother. I gave her a kind of negative and ungracious forgiveness. Yet I shall as violently curse the two nymphs, by-and-by, for the consequences of my own folly: and this will be a good way too, to prevent their ridicule upon me, for losing so glorious an opportunity as I had last night, or rather this morning.

I have collected, from the result of the enquiries made of the chairman, and from Dorcas's observations before the cruel creature escaped, a description of her dress; and am resolved, if I cannot otherwise hear of her, to advertise her in the Gazette, as an eloped wife, both by her maiden and acknowledged name; for her elopement will soon be known by every enemy: why then should not my friends be made acquainted with it, from whose enquiries and informations I may expect some tidings of her.

She had on a brown lustring night-gown, fresh, and looking like new, as every-thing she wears does, whether new or not, from an elegance natural to her. A beaver hat, a black ribband about her neck, and blue knots on her breast. A quilted petticoat of carnation-coloured satin; a rose-diamond ring, supposed on her finger; and in her whole person and appearance, as I shall express it, a dignity, as well as beauty, that commands the repeated attention of every-one who sees her.

The description of her person I shall take a little more pains about. My mind must be more at ease, before I can undertake that. And I shall threaten, that if, after a certain period given for her voluntary return, she be not heard of, I will prosecute any person who presumes to entertain, harbour, abett, or encourage her, with all the vengeance that an injured gentleman and husband may be warranted to take by law, or otherwise.

FRESH cause of aggravation!—But for this scribling vein, or I should still run mad.

Again, going into her chamber, because it was hers, and sighing over the bed, and every piece of furniture in it, I cast my eyes towards the drawers of the dressing-glass, and saw peep out, as it were, in one of the half-drawn drawers, the corner of a letter. I snatched it out, and found it superscribed, by her, 'To Mr. Lovelace.' The sight of it made my heart leap, and I trembled so, that I could hardly open the seal.

How does this damn'd love unman me!

me!—but nobody ever loved as I love!—It is even increased by her unworthy flight, and my disappointment. Ingrateful creature, to fly from a passion thus ardently flaming! which, like the palm, rises the more for being depressed and slighted.

I will not give thee a copy of this letter. I owe her not so much service.

But wouldst thou think that this haughty promise-breaker could resolve as she does, absolutely and for ever to renounce me for what passed last night? That she could resolve to forego all her opening prospects of reconciliation; that reconciliation with a worthless family, on which she had set her whole heart?—Yet she does—She acquits me of all obligation to her, and herself of all expectations from me—And for what?—O that indeed I had given her real cause! Damn'd confounded niceness, prudery, affectation, or pretty ignorance, if not affectation!—By my soul, Belford, I told thee all—I was more indebted to her struggles, than to my own forwardness. I cannot support my own reflections upon a decency so ill-requited.—She could not, she would not have been so much a Harlowe in her resentment, had I deserved, as I ought to have done, her resentment. All she feared, had then been over; and her own good-sense, and even modesty, would have taught her to make the best of it.

But if ever again I get her into my hands, art and more art, and compulsion too, if she make it necessary, [And 'tis plain that nothing else will do] shall she experience from the man whose fear of her has been above even his passion for her; and whose gentleness and forbearance she has thus perfidiously triumphed over. Well says the poet—

'Tis nobler like a lion to invade
When appetite directs, and seize my prey,
Than to wait tamely, like a begging dog,
Till dull consent throws out the scraps of love.'

Thou knowest what I have so lately vowed—And yet at times, [Cruel creature, and ingrateful as cruel!] I can subscribe with too much truth to those lines of another poet—

'She reigns more fully in my soul than ever;
She garrisons my breast, and mans against me
E'en my own rebel thoughts, with thousand graces,
Ten thousand charms, and new-discovered beauties!'

LETTER IV.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

A Letter is put into my hands by Wilson himself—Such a letter!

A letter from Miss Howe to her cruel friend!

I made no scruple to open it.

It is a miracle that I fell not into fits at the reading of it; and at the thought of what might have been the consequence had it come to the hands of this Clarissa Harlowe. Let my justly-excited rage excuse my irreverence.

Collins, though not his day, brought it this afternoon to Wilson's, with a particular desire, that it might be sent with all speed to Miss Beaumont's lodgings, and given, if possible, into her own hands. He had before been here, (at Mrs. Sinclair's) with intent to deliver it to the lady with his own hand; but was told, [Too truly told!] that she was abroad; but that they would give her any-thing he should leave for her, the moment she returned. But he cared not to trust them with his business, and went away to Wilson's, (as I find by the description of him at both places) and there left the letter; but not till he had a second time called here, and found her not come in.

The letter [which I shall inclose; for it is too long to transcribe] will account to thee for Collins's coming hither.

O this devilish Miss Howe—Something must be resolved upon and done, with that little fury!

THOU wilt see the margin of this cursed letter crouded with indices. [☞] I put them to mark the places which call for vengeance upon the vixen writer, or which require animadversion. Return thou it to me the moment thou hast perused it.

Read it here; and avoid trembling for me, if thou canst.

'TO MISS LÆTITIA BEAUMONT.

'WEDNESDAY, JUNE 7.

'MY DEAREST FRIEND,

'YOU will perhaps think, that I have been too long silent. 'But I had begun two letters at 'different times since my last, and 'written a great deal each time; 'and with spirit enough, I assure 'you; incensed as I was against ☞ 'the abominable wretch you are 'with; particularly on reading 'yours of the 21st of the past month.

'The

'The first I intended to keep open 'till I could give you some account 'of my proceedings with Mrs. 'Townsend. It was some days be- 'fore I saw her: and this interve- 'nient space giving me time to re- 'peruse what I had written, I 'thought it proper to lay that aside, 'and to write in a style a little less 'fervent; for you would have blam- 'ed me, I know, for the freedom 'of some of my expressions. [Ex- 'ecrations, if you please] And when 'I had gone a good way in the se- 'cond, the change in your prospects, 'on his communicating to you 'Miss Montague's letter, and his 'better behaviour, occasioning a 'change in your mind, I laid that 'aside also. And in this uncer- 'tainty, thought I would wait to 'see the issue of affairs between you 'before I wrote again; believing 'that all would soon be decided one 'way or other.

'I had still, perhaps, held this 'resolution, [As every appearance 'according to your letters, was 'more and more promising] had 'not the two past days furnished me 'with intelligence which it highly 'imports you to know.

'But I must stop here and take 'a little walk, to try to keep down 'that just indignation which rises 'to my pen, when I am about to 'relate to you what I must com- 'municate.

'I AM not my own mistress enough '—Then my mother—Always up 'and down—And watching as if I 'were writing to a fellow—But I 'will try if I can contain myself in 'tolerable bounds.

'The women of the house where 'you are—O my dear—The wo- 'men of the house—But you never 'thought highly of them—So it 'cannot be very surprizing—Nor 'would you have staid so long with 'them, had not the notion of removing 'to one of your own, made you less 'uneasy, and less curious about 'their characters, and behaviour. 'Yet I could now wish, that you 'had been less reserved among 'them—But I teaze you—In short, 'my dear, you are certainly in a 'devilish house!—Be assured, that 'the woman is one of the vilest of 'women—Nor does she go to you 'by her right name—Very true! '—Her name is not Sinclair—nor 'is the street she lives in, Dover 'Street—Did you never go out by 'yourself, and discharge the coach 'or chair, and return by another 'coach or chair? If you did, [Yet I 'don't remember that you ever 'wrote to me, that you did] you 'would never have found your way 'to the vile house, either by the 'woman's name, Sinclair, or by the 'street's name, mentioned by that 'Doleman in his letter about the 'lodgings.

'The wretch might indeed have 'held out these false lights a little 'more excuseably, had the house 'been an honest house; and had his 'end only been to prevent mischief 'from your brother.—But this con- 'trivance was antecedent, as I 'think, to your brother's project: 'so that no excuse can be made for 'his intentions at the time—The 'man, whatever he may now intend, 'was certainly then, even then, a 'villain in his heart!

'I AM excessively concerned, that 'I should be prevailed upon, be- 'tween your over-niceness, on one 'hand, and my mother's positiveness, 'on the other, to be satisfied with- 'out knowing how to direct to you 'at your lodgings. I think too, 'that the proposal that I should be 'put off to a third-hand knowledge, 'or rather veiled in a first-hand ig- 'norance, came from him—and 'that it was only acquiesced in 'by you, as it was by me, upon 'needless and weak considerations '—Because, truly, I might have it 'to say, if challenged, that I knew 'not where to send to you!—I am 'ashamed of myself!—Had this 'been at first excusable, it could not 'be a good reason for going on in 'the folly, when you had no liking 'to the house, and when he began to 'play tricks, and delay with you.— 'What! I was to mistrust myself, was 'I?—I was to allow it to be thought, 'that I could not keep my own se- 'cret?—But the house to be taken 'at this time, and at that time, led us 'both on—like fools, like tame 'fools, in a string.—Upon my life, 'my dear, this man is a vile, a con- 'temptible villain—I must speak 'out!—How has he laughed in his 'sleeve at us both, I warrant, for I 'can't tell how long!

'And yet who could have thought, 'that a man of fortune and some re-

'putation—[This Doleman, I mean; 'not your wretch to be ſure!] for- 'merly a rake indeed—[I en- 'quired after him—long ago; and 'ſo was the eaſier ſatisfied]—but 'married to a woman of family— 'having had a palſy blow—and 'one would think a penitent— ☞ 'ſhould recommend ſuch a houſe '[Why, my dear, he could not en- 'quire of it, but muſt find it to be 'bad] to ſuch a man as Lovelace, 'to bring his future, nay, his then 'ſuppoſed, bride to?

☞ 'I WRITE, perhaps, with too 'much violence, to be clear. But 'I cannot help it. Yet I lay down 'my pen, and take it up every ten 'minutes, in order to write with 'ſome temper—My mother too in 'and out—What need I (ſhe aſks 'me) lock myſelf in, if I am only 'reading paſt correſpondencies?— ☞ 'for that is my pretence, when ſhe 'comes poking in with her face 'ſharpened to an edge, as I may ☞ 'ſay, by a curioſity that gives her 'more pain than pleaſure—The 'Lord forgive me; but I believe 'I ſhall huff her next time ſhe 'comes in.

'Do you forgive me, too, my 'dear. My mother ought; becauſe 'ſhe ſays I am my father's girl; 'and becauſe I am ſure I am hers. 'I don't know what to do—I don't 'know what to write next—I have 'ſo much to write, yet have ſo 'little patience, and ſo little op- 'portunity.

'But I will tell you how I came ☞ 'by my intelligence. That being a 'fact, and requiring the leſs atten- 'tion, I will try to account to you 'for that.

'Thus then it came about—Miſs 'Lardner, (whom you have ſeen 'at her couſin Biddulph's) ſaw you 'at St. James's church on Sunday 'was fortnight. She kept you in 'her eye during the whole time; 'but could not once obtain the no- 'tice of yours, though ſhe curt- 'ſeyed to you twice. S[illegible] thought 'to pay her compliments to you 'when the ſervice was over; for ſhe 'doubted not but you were mar ☞ 'ried—and for an odd reaſon—Be- 'cauſe you came to church by your- 'ſelf. 'Every eye (as uſual, where- ever 'you are, ſhe ſaid) was upon you; 'and this ſeeming to give you hur- 'ry, and you being nearer the 'door than ſhe, you ſlid out, be- 'fore ſhe could get to you. But 'ſhe ordered her ſervant to follow 'you till you were houſed. This 'ſervant ſaw you ſtep into a chair, 'which waited for you; and you 'ordered the men to carry you to 'the place where they took you up.

'The next day, Miſs Lardner 'ſent the ſame ſervant, out of mere 'curioſity, to make private en- 'quiry whether Mr. Lovelace were, 'or were not, with you there. And 'this enquiry brought out, from ☞ 'different people, that the houſe was 'ſuſpected to be one of thoſe gen- 'teel wicked houſes, which receive 'and accommodate faſhionable peo- 'ple of both ſexes.

'Miſs Lardner, confounded at 'this ſtrange intelligence, made 'further enquiry; enjoining ſecre- 'cy to the ſervant ſhe had ſent, as 'well as to the gentleman whom 'ſhe employed; who had it con- ☞ 'firmed from a rakiſh friend, who 'knew the houſe; and told him, 'that there were two houſes; the 'one in which all decent appearances 'were preſerved, and ladies rarely 'admitted; the other, the receptacle 'of thoſe who were abſolutely en- 'gaged, and broken to the vile 'yoke.

☞ 'Say—my dear creature—ſay— 'Shall I not execrate the wretch? '—But words are weak—What 'can I ſay, that will ſuitably ex- 'preſs my abhorrence of ſuch a 'villain as he muſt have been, when 'he meditated to carry a Clariſſa to 'ſuch a place!

'Miſs Lardner kept this to her- 'ſelf ſome days, not knowing what 'to do; for ſhe loves you, and ad- 'mires you of all women. At 'laſt, ſhe revealed it, but in con- 'fidence, to Miſs Biddulph, by 'letter. Miſs Biddulph, in like 'confidence, being afraid it would 'diſtract me, were I to know it, 'communicated it to Miſs Lloyd; 'and ſo like a whiſpered ſcandal, 'it paſſed through ſeveral canals; 'and then it came to me. Which 'was not till laſt Monday.

'I thought I ſhould have faint- 'ed upon the ſurprizing communi- 'cation. But rage taking place, 'it blew away the ſudden illneſs. 'I beſought Miſs Lloyd to re-en- 'join ſecrecy to every-one. I told 'her, that I would not for the 'world that my mother, or any of 'your

☞ 'your family, ſhould know it. And 'I inſtantly cauſed a truſty friend 'to make what enquiries he could 'about Tomlinſon.

☞ 'I had thoughts to have done it 'before I had this intelligence: 'but not imagining it to be need-'ful, and little thinking that you 'could be in ſuch a houſe, and as 'you were pleaſed with your chang-☞ 'ed proſpects, I forbore. And 'the rather forbore, as the matter 'is ſo laid, that Mrs. Hodges is 'ſuppoſed to know nothing of the 'projected treaty of accommoda-'tion; but on the contrary, that 'it was deſigned to be a ſecret to 'her, and to every-body but im-'mediate parties; and it was Mrs. 'Hodges that I had propoſed to 'ſound by a ſecond hand.

☞ 'Now, my dear, it is certain, 'without applying to that too-much 'favoured houſekeeper, that there 'is not ſuch a man within ten miles 'of your uncle. Very true! One 'Tomkins there is about four miles 'off; but he is a day-labourer: 'and one Thompſon about five miles 'diſtant the other way; but he is a 'pariſh ſchoolmaſter, poor, and 'about ſeventy.

☞ 'A man, though but of 800*l.* a 'year, cannot come from one coun-'ty to ſettle in another, but every-'body in both muſt know it, and 'talk of it.

☞ 'Mrs. Hodges may yet be found-'ed at a diſtance, if you will. Your 'uncle is an old man. Old men 'imagine themſelves under obliga-'tion to their paramours, if younger ☞ 'than themſelves and ſeldom keep 'any-thing from their knowledge. 'But if we ſuppoſe him to make a 'ſecret of the deſigned treaty, it is 'impoſſible, before that treaty was 'thought of, but ſhe muſt have 'ſeen him, at leaſt have heard your 'uncle ſpeak praiſefully of a man 'he is ſaid to be ſo intimate with, 'let him have been ever ſo little a 'while in thoſe parts.

☞ 'Yet, methinks, the ſtory is ſo 'plauſible: Tomlinſon, as you de-'ſcribe him, is ſo good a man, and 'ſo much of a gentleman; the end ☞ 'to be anſwered by his being an 'impoſter, ſo much more than neceſ-'ary if Lovelace has villainy in his 'head; and as you are in ſuch a ☞ 'houſe—Your wretch's behaviour 'to him was ſo petulant and lordly; 'and Tomlinſon's anſwer ſo full of ☞ 'ſpirit and circumſtance; and then 'what he communicated to you of 'Mr. Hickman's application to 'your uncle, and Mrs. Norton's to ☞ 'your mother; [ſome of which par-'ticulars, I am ſatisfied his vile 'agent Joſeph Leman could not 'reveal to his viler employer] his 'preſſing on the marriage-day in 'the name of your uncle, which it ☞ 'could not anſwer any wicked pur-'poſe for him to do; and what he 'writes of your uncle's propoſal, 'to have it thought that you were 'married from the time that you 'have lived in one houſe together; 'and that to be made to agree with 'the time of Mr. Hickman's viſit to ☞ 'your uncle: the inſiſting on a 'truſty perſon's being preſent at 'the ceremony, at that uncle's no-'mination—Theſe things make me 'willing to try for a tolerable conſtruc-'tion to be made of all; though I am 'ſo much puzzled by what occurs ☞ 'on both ſides of the queſtion, that 'I cannot but abhor the deviliſh 'wretch, whoſe inventions and con-☞ 'trivances are for ever employing 'an inquiſitive head, as mine is, 'without affording the means of ab-'ſolute detection.

'But this is what I am ready to 'conjecture, that Tomlinſon, ſpe-'cious as he is, is a machine of 'Lovelace; and that he is employ-☞ 'ed for ſome end, which has not 'yet been anſwered. This is cer-'tain, that not only Tomlinſon, 'but Mennell, who, I think, at-'tended you more than once at this 'vile houſe, muſt know it to be a 'vile houſe.

'What can you think of Tom-'linſon's declaring himſelf in favour 'of it, upon enquiry?

'Lovelace too muſt know it to be 'ſo; if not before he brought you 'to it, ſoon after.

☞ 'Perhaps the company he found 'there, may be the moſt probable 'way of accounting for his bearing 'with the houſe, and for his ſtrange 'ſuſpenſions of marriage, when it 'was in his power to call ſuch an 'angel of a woman his.

☞ 'O my dear, the man is a vil-'lain! the greateſt of villains, in 'every light!—I am convinced that 'he is. And this Doleman muſt 'be another of his implements!

☞ 'There are ſo many wretches who 'think

'think that to be no ſin, which is 'one of the greateſt, and moſt in-'grateful of all ſins, to ruin young 'creatures of our ſex who place 'their confidence in them; that the 'wonder is leſs than the ſhame, 'that people of figure, of ap-'pearance at leaſt, are found to 'promote the horrid purpoſes of 'proſligates of fortune and intereſt!

☞ 'But can I think, [you will aſk 'with indignant aſtoniſhment] that 'Lovelace can have deſigns upon 'your honour?

☞ 'That ſuch deſigns he has had, 'if he ſtill hold them not, I can 'have no doubt, now that I know 'the houſe he has brought you to, 'to be a vile one. This is a clue 'that has led me to account for all 'his behaviour to you ever ſince 'you have been in his hands.

'Allow me a brief retroſpection 'of it all.

'We both know, that pride, re-'venge, and a delight to trade in 'unbeaten paths, are principal in-'gredients in the character of this 'finiſhed libertine.

☞ 'He hates all your family, your-'ſelf excepted; and I have ſeveral 'times thought, that I have ſeen 'him ſtung and mortified that love 'has obliged him to kneel at your ☞ 'footſtool, becauſe you are a Har-'lowe.—Yet is this wretch a ſavage 'in love.—Love that humanizes the ☞ 'fierceſt ſpirits, has not been able 'to ſubdue his. His pride, and the ☞ 'credit which a few plauſible qua-'lities, ſprinkled among his odious 'ones, have given him, have ſecur-'ed him too good a reception from 'our eye-judging, our undiſtin-'guiſhing, our ſelf-flattering, our 'too-confiding ſex, to make aſſi-'duity and obſequiouſneſs, and a 'conqueſt of his unruly paſſions, 'any part of his ſtudy.

☞ 'He has ſome reaſon for his ani-'moſity to all the men, and to one 'woman of your family. He has 'always ſhewn you, and his own fa-☞ 'mily too, that he prefers his pride 'to his intereſt. He is a declared 'marriage-hater: a notorious in-'triguer: full of his inventions; 'and glorying in them. He never 'could draw you into declarations 'of love: nor till your wife relati-'ons perſecuted you, as they did, to 'receive his addreſſes as a lover.—☞ 'He knew that you profeſſedly diſ-'liked him for his immoralities: he 'could not therefore juſtly blame 'you for the coldneſs and indiffe-'rence of your behaviour to him.

☞ 'The prevention of miſchief was 'your firſt main view in the correſ-'pondence he drew you into. He 'ought not, then, to have wonder-'ed, that you declared your pre-'ference of the ſingle life to any ma-'trimonial engagement. He knew, 'that this was always your prefer-'ence; and that before he tricked ☞ 'you away ſo artfully. What was 'his conduct to you afterwards, 'that you ſhould of a ſudden change 'it?

'Thus was your whole behavi-'our regular, conſiſtent, and duti-'ful to thoſe to whom by birth you 'owed duty; and neither prudiſh, 'coquettiſh, nor tyrannical to him.

☞ 'He had agreed to go on with 'you upon thoſe your own terms, 'and to rely only on his own merits 'and future reformation, for your 'favour.

☞ 'It was plain to me, indeed, to 'whom you communicated all that 'you knew of your own heart, 'though not all of it that I found out, 'that love had pretty early gained 'footing in it. And this you your-'ſelf would have diſcovered ſooner ☞ 'than you did, had not his alarm-'ing, his unpolite, his rough con-'duct, kept it under.

☞ 'I knew, by experience, that 'love is a fire that is not to be play-'ed with, without burning one's 'fingers: I knew it to be a dangerous 'thing for two ſingle perſons of dif-'ferent ſexes, to enter into famili-'arity and correſpondence with each 'other; ſince, as to the latter, muſt 'not a perſon be capable of preme-'ditated art, who can ſit down to 'write, and not write from the 'heart?—And a woman to write 'her heart to a man practiſed in de-'ceit, or even to a man of ſome cha-'racter, what advantage does it 'give him over her?

☞ 'As this man's vanity had made 'him imagine, that no woman could 'be proof againſt love, when his 'addreſs was honourable; no won-'der that he ſtruggled, like a lion 'held in toils, againſt a paſſion that 'he thought not returned. And how 'could you, at firſt, ſhew a return 'in love, to ſo fierce a ſpirit, and 'who had ſeduced you away by vile

'artifices, but to the approval of 'thoſe artifices?

☞ 'Hence, perhaps, it is not diffi- 'cult to believe, that it became 'poſſible for ſuch a wretch as this 'to give way to his old prejudices 'againſt marriage; and to that re- 'venge which had always been a 'firſt paſſion with him.

'This is the only way, I think, to 'account for his horrid views in 'bringing you to a vile houſe.

'And now may not all the reſt be 'naturally accounted for?—His de- 'lays — His teazing ways — His 'bringing you to bear with his lodg- 'ing in the ſame houſe—His mak- 'ing you paſs to the people of it, 'as his wife; though reſtrictively ſo, 'yet with hope, no doubt, (vileſt ☞ 'of villains as he is!) to take you ☞ 'at advantage—His bringing you 'into the company of his libertine 'companions: the attempt of im- 'poſing upon you that Miſs Part- 'ington for a bedfellow, very pro- 'bably his own invention for the 'worſt of purpoſes: his terrifying 'you at many different times: his 'obtruding himſelf upon you when 'you went out to church; no doubt 'to prevent your finding out what 'the people of the houſe were: the 'advantages he made of your bro- 'ther's fooliſh project with Single- 'ton.

'See, my dear, how naturally all 'this follows from the diſcovery 'made by Miſs Lardner. See how ☞ 'the monſter, whom I thought, 'and ſo often called, a fool, comes 'out to have been all the time one ☞ 'of the greateſt villains in the 'world!

'But if this be ſo, what [it 'would be aſked by an indifferent 'perſon] has hitherto ſaved you? 'Glorious creature!—What, mo- 'rally ſpeaking, but your watch- 'fulneſs! What but that, and the 'majeſty of your virtue; the native 'dignity, which, in a ſituation ſo 'very difficult, (friendleſs, deſti- 'tute, paſſing for a wife, caſt into 'the company of creatures accuſ- 'tomed to betray and ruin inno- 'cent hearts) has hitherto enabled 'you to baffle, over-awe, and con- 'found, ſuch a dangerous libertine 'as this; ſo habitually remorſeleſs, 'as you have obſerved him to be; 'ſo very various in his temper; ſo 'inventive, ſo ſeconded, ſo ſup- 'ported, ſo inſtigated, too proba- 'bly, as he has been!—That native 'dignity, that heroiſm I will call it, 'which has, on all proper occaſions, 'exerted itſelf in it's full luſtre, un- ☞ 'mingled with that charming ob- 'ligingneſs and condeſcending 'ſweetneſs, which is evermore the 'ſoftener of that dignity, when 'your mind is free and unappre- 'henſive!

☞ 'Let me ſtop to admire, and to 'bleſs my beloved friend, who, un- 'happily for herſelf, at an age ſo 'tender, unacquainted as ſhe was 'with the world, and with the vile 'arts of libertines, having been 'called upon to ſuſtain the hardeſt 'and moſt ſhocking trials, from 'perſecuting relations on one hand, 'and from a villainous lover on the 'other, has been enabled to give 'ſuch an illuſtrious example of for- 'titude and prudence, as never 'woman gave before her; and who, 'as I have heretofore obſerved, has 'made a far greater figure in adver- 'ſity, than ſhe poſſibly could have 'made, had all her ſhining qualities 'been exerted in their full force 'and power, by the continuance of ☞ 'that proſperous run of fortune 'which attended her for eighteen 'years of life out of nineteen.

☞ 'But now, my dear, do I ap- 'prehend, that you are in greater 'danger than ever yet you have 'been in; if you are not married 'in a week; and yet ſtay in this a- 'bominable houſe. For were you 'out of it, I own I ſhould not be 'much afraid for you.

'Theſe are my thoughts on the 'moſt deliberate conſideration: that 'he is now convinced, that he has 'not been able to draw you off your 'guard: that therefore, if he can 'obtain no new advantage over 'you as he goes along, he is re- 'ſolved to do you all the poor juſtice 'that it is in the power of ſuch a 'wretch as he, to do you. He is 'the rather induced to this, as he 'ſees, that all his own family have 'warmly engaged themſelves in 'your cauſe: and that it is his ☞ 'higheſt intereſt to be juſt to you. 'Then the horrid wretch loves you '(as well he may) above all women. 'I have no doubt of this; with ſuch 'a love as ſuch a wretch is capable ☞ 'of: with ſuch a love as Herod

'loved

'loved his Mariamne. He is now 'therefore, very probably, at laſt, 'in earneſt.

'I took time for enquiries of 'different natures, as I knew by 'the train you are in, that what-'ever his deſigns are, they cannot 'ripen either for good or evil, till ☞ 'ſomething ſhall reſult from this 'new device of his about Tomlin-'ſon and your uncle.

'Device I have no doubt that it 'is, whatever this dark, this im-'penetrable ſpirit intends by it.

☞ 'And yet I find it to be true, 'that Counſellor Williams (whom 'Mr. Hickman knows to be a man 'of eminence in his profeſſion) has ☞ 'actually as good as finiſhed the 'ſettlements: that two draughts of 'them have been made; one avow-'edly to be ſent to one Captain 'Tomlinſon, as the clerk ſays— 'And I find that a licence has actu-'ally been more than once endea-'voured to be obtained; and that 'difficulties have hitherto been 'made, equally to Lovelace's vex-☞ 'ation and diſappointment. My 'mother's proctor, who is very in-'timate with the proctor applied to 'by the wretch, has come at this 'information in confidence; and 'hints, that, as Mr. Lovelace is a 'man of high fortunes, theſe diffi-'culties will probably be got over.

'But here follow the cauſes of 'my apprehenſion of your danger; 'which I ſhould not have had a ☞ 'thought of, (ſince nothing very 'vile has yet been attempted) but 'on finding what a houſe you are in, 'and, on that diſcovery, laying to-'gether and ruminating on paſt oc-'currences.

'You are obliged, from the pre-☞ 'ſent favourable appearances, to 'give him your company whenever 'he requeſts it.—You are under a 'neceſſity of forgetting, or ſeeming 'to forget, paſt diſobligations; and 'to receive his addreſſes as thoſe of 'a betrothed lover.—You will in-'cur the cenſure of prudery and 'affectation, even perhaps in your 'own apprehenſion, if you keep ☞ 'him at that diſtance which has 'hitherto been your ſecurity.—His 'ſudden (and as ſuddenly recover-'ed) illneſs has given him an op-'portunity to find out, that you 'love him. [Alas, my dear, I knew 'you loved him!] He is, as you re-☞ 'late, every hour more and more 'an encroacher, upon it. He has 'ſeemed to change his nature, and 'is all love and gentleneſs. The 'wolf has put on the ſheep's cloath-'ing; yet more than once has ☞ 'ſhewn his teeth, and his hardly-'ſheathed claws. The inſtance you 'have given of his freedom with 'your perſon, which you could not 'but reſent; and yet, as matters 'are circumſtanced between you, 'could not but paſs over, when Tom-'linſon's letter called you into his ☞ 'company, ſhew the advantage he 'has now over you; and alſo, that 'if he can obtain greater, he will.— 'And for this very reaſon (as I ap-'prehend) it is, that Tomlinſon is 'introduced; that is to ſay, to give ☞ 'you the greater ſecurity, and to 'be a mediator, if mortal offence 'be given you, by any villainous 'attempt.—The day ſeems not now 'to be ſo much in your power as it 'ought to be, ſince that now partly 'depends on your uncle, whoſe pre-'ſence, at your own motion, he 'has wiſhed on the occaſion.—A 'wiſh, were all real, very unlikely, 'I think, to be granted.

☞ 'And thus ſituated, ſhould he 'offer greater freedoms, muſt you 'not forgive him?

'I fear nothing (as I know who 'has ſaid) that devil carnate or in-'carnate can fairly do againſt a vir-☞ 'tue ſo eſtabliſhed.—But ſurprizes, 'my dear, in ſuch a houſe as that 'you are in, and in ſuch circum-'ſtances as I have mentioned, I ☞ 'greatly fear!—The man, one, who 'has already triumphed over perſons 'worthy of his alliance.

☞ 'What then have you to do, but 'to fly this houſe, this infernal 'houſe!—O that your heart would 'let you fly the man!

☞ 'If you ſhould be diſpoſed ſo to 'do, Mrs. Townſend ſhall be ready 'at your command.—But if you 'meet with no impediments, no 'new cauſes of doubt, I think your 'reputation in the eye of the 'world, though not your happineſs, 'is concerned, that you ſhould be ☞ 'his.—And yet I cannot bear, that 'theſe libertines ſhould be reward-'ed for their villainy with the beſt 'of the ſex, when the worſt of it 'are too good for them.

'But if you meet with the leaſt 'ground for ſuſpicion; if he would 'detain

'detain you at the odious houſe, or 'wiſh you to ſtay, now you know ☞ 'what the people are; fly him, what-'ever your proſpects are, as well 'as them.

'In one of your next airings, if 'you have no other way, refuſe to ☞ 'return with him. Name me for 'your intelligencer, that you are in 'a bad houſe; and if you think you 'cannot now break with him, ſeem 'rather to believe that he may not 'know it to be ſo; and that I do ☞ 'not believe he does: and yet this 'belief in us both muſt appear to 'be very groſs.

'But ſuppoſe you deſire to go out 'of town for the air, this ſultry 'weather, and inſiſt upon it? You 'may plead your health for ſo do-☞ 'ing. He dare not reſiſt ſuch a plea. 'Your brother's fooliſh ſcheme, I 'am told, is certainly given up; ſo 'you need not be afraid on that 'account.

'If you do not fly the houſe upon 'reading of this, or ſome way or 'other get out of it, I ſhall judge 'of his power over you, by the lit-'tle you will have over either him 'or yourſelf.

☞ 'One of my informers has made 'ſlight enquiries concerning Mrs. 'Fretchville. Did he ever name 'to you the ſtreet or ſquare ſhe liv-'ed in?—I don't remember that 'you, in any of yours, mentioned 'the place of her abode to me. ☞ 'Strange, very ſtrange, this, I 'think! No ſuch perſon or houſe 'can be found, near any of the new 'ſtreets or ſquares, where the lights 'I had from your letter led me to 'imagine her houſe might be—Aſk ☞ 'him, What ſtreet the houſe is in, 'if he has not told you? And let 'me know. If he make a difficul-'ty of that circumſtance, it will a-☞ 'mount to a detection.—And yet, 'I think, you have enough with-'out this.

'I ſhall ſend this long letter by 'Collins, who changes his day to 'oblige me; and that he may try '(now I know where you are) to 'get it into your own hands. If 'he cannot, he will leave it at Wil-'ſon's. As none of our letters by 'that conveyance have miſcarried 'when you have been in more ap-'parently diſagreeable ſituations 'than you are in at preſent, I hope 'that this will go ſafe, if Collins 'ſhould be obliged to leave it there.

☞ 'I wrote a ſhort letter to you in 'my firſt agitations. It contained 'not above twenty lines, all full 'of fright, alarm, and execration. 'But being afraid, that my vehe-'mence would too much affect you, 'I thought it better to wait a little, 'as well for the reaſons already 'hinted at, as to be able to give 'you as many particulars as I could; 'and my thoughts upon all. And 'now, I think, taking to your aid 'other circumſtances, as they have 'offered or may offer, you will be 'ſufficiently armed to reſiſt all his 'machinations, be what they will.

☞ 'One word more. Command 'me up, if I can be of the leaſt ſer-'vice or pleaſure to you. I value 'not fame; I value not cenſure; 'nor even life itſelf, I verily think, 'as I do your honour, and your 'friendſhip—For, is not your hon-'our my honour? And is not your 'friendſhip the pride of my life?

'May Heaven preſerve you, my 'deareſt creature, in honour and 'ſafety, is the prayer, the hourly 'prayer, of your ever-faithful and 'affectionate

'ANNA HOWE.

'THURSDAY MORN. 5.
'I have written all night.'

'TO MISS HOWE.

'MY DEAREST CREATURE,

'HOW you have ſhocked, confound-'ed, ſurprized, aſtoniſhed me, by your 'dreadful communication!—My heart is 'too weak to bear up againſt ſuch a ſtroke 'as this!—When all hope was with me! 'When my proſpects were ſo much 'mended!—But can there be ſuch vil-'lainy in men, as in this vile principal, 'and equally vile agent!

'I am really ill—Very ill—Grief and 'ſurprize, and, now I will ſay, deſpair, 'have overcome me!—All, all, you 'have laid down as conjecture, appears 'to me now to be more than conjecture!

'O that your mother would have the 'goodneſs to permit me the preſence of 'the only comforter that my afflicted, 'my half-broken heart, could be raiſed 'by! But I charge you, think not of 'coming up without her indulgent per-'miſſion. I am too ill at preſent, my 'dear, to think of combating with this 'dreadful man; and of flying from this 'horrid houſe!—My bad writing will ſhew 'you this.—But my illneſs will be my

'preſent

'present security, should he indeed
'have meditated villainy.—Forgive, O
'forgive, my dearest friend, the trouble
'I have given you!—All must soon—
'But why add I grief to grief, and 'trouble to trouble?—But I charge you,
'my beloved creature, not to think of 'coming up without your mother's leave,
'to the truly desolate and broken-
'spirited 'CLARISSA HARLOWE.'

WELL, Jack!—And what thinkest thou of this last letter? Miss Howe values not either fame or censure; and thinkest thou, that this letter will not bring the little fury up, though she could procure no other conveyance than her higgler's paniers, one for herself, the other for her maid? She knows whither to come now. Many a little villain have I punished for knowing more than I would have her know, and that by adding to her knowledge and experience. What thinkest thou, Belford, if, by getting hither this virago, and giving cause for a lamentable letter from her to the fair fugitive, I should be able to recover her? Would she not visit that friend in her distress, thinkest thou, whose intended visit to her in hers brought her into the condition from which she herself had so perfidiously escaped?

Let me enjoy the thought!

Shall I send this letter?—Thou seest I have left room, if I fail in the exact imitation of so charming a hand, to avoid too strict a scrutiny. Do they not both deserve it of me? Seest thou not how the raving girl threatens her mother? Ought she not to be punished? And can I be a worse devil, or villain, or monster, than she calls me in the long letter I inclose, (and has called me in her former letters) were I to punish them both as my vengeance urges me to punish them? And when I have executed that my vengeance, how charmingly satisfied may they both go down into the country, and keep house together, and have a much better reason than their pride could give them, for living the single life they have both seemed so fond of!

I will set about transcribing it this moment, I think. I can resolve afterwards. Yet what has poor Hickman done to deserve this of me?—But gloriously would it punish the mother, (as well as daughter) for all her sordid avarice; and for her undutifulness to honest Mr. Howe, whose heart she actually broke. I am on tiptoe, Jack, to enter upon this project. Is not one country as good to me as another, if I should be obliged to take another tour upon it?

BUT I will not venture. Hickman is a good man, they tell me. I love a good man. I hope one of these days to be a good man myself. Besides, I have heard within this week something of this honest fellow that shews he has a soul; when I thought, if he had one, that it lay a little of the deepest to emerge to notice, except on very extraordinary occasions; and that then it presently sunk again into it's cellula adiposa.—The man is a plump man.—Didst ever see him, Jack?

But the principal reason that withholds me, [For 'tis a tempting project!] is, for fear of being utterly blown up, if I should not be quick enough with my letter, or if Miss Howe should deliberate on setting out, or try her mother's consent first; in which time a letter from my frighted beauty might reach her; for I have no doubt, wherever she has refuged, but her first work was to write to her vixen friend. I will therefore go on patiently; and take my revenge upon the little fury at my leisure.

But, in spite of my compassion for Hickman, whose better character is sometimes my envy, and who is one of those mortals that bring clumsiness into credit with the mothers, to the disgrace of us clever fellows, and often to our disappointment, with the daughters, and who has been very busy in assisting these double-armed beauties against me; I swear by all the Dii Majores, as well as Minores, that I will have Miss Howe, if I cannot have her more exalted friend! And then, if there be as much flaming love between these girls as they pretend, what will my charmer profit by her escape?

And now, that I shall permit Miss Howe to reign a little longer, let me ask thee, If thou hast not, in the inclosed letter, a fresh instance, that a great many of my difficulties with her sister-toast are owing to this flighty-girl?—'Tis true, that here was naturally a confounded sharp winter air; and if a little cold water was thrown into the path, no wonder that it was instantly frozen; and that the poor honest traveller found it next to impossible to keep his way; one foot sliding back as fast as the other advanced, to the endangering of his limbs or neck. But yet I think it impossible, that she should have baffled me as she has done, (novice as she is, and never before from under her parents wings) had she not been armed by a virago, who was formerly very near shewing, that she could better advise than practise. But this, I believe, I have said more than once before.

I am loth to reproach myself, now the cruel creature has escaped me; for what would that do, but add to my torment? since evils self caused, and avoidable, admit not of palliation or comfort. And yet, if thou tellest me, that all her strength was owing to my weakness, and that I have been a cursed coward in this whole affair; why then, Jack, I may blush, and be vexed; but, by my soul, I cannot contradict thee.

But this, Belford, I hope—that if I can turn the poison of the inclosed letter into wholesome aliment; that is to say, if I can make use of it to my advantage; I shall have thy free consent to do it.

I am always careful to open covers cautiously, and to preserve seals entire. I will draw out from this cursed letter an alphabet. Nor was Nick Rowe ever half so diligent to learn Spanish, at the Quixote recommendation of a certain peer, as I will be to gain the mastery of this vixen's hand.

LETTER V.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

THURSDAY EVENING, JUNE 8.

AFTER my last, so full of other hopes, the contents of this will surprize you. O my dearest friend, the man has at last proved himself to be a villain!

It was with the utmost difficulty last night, that I preserved myself from the vilest dishonour. He extorted from me a promise of forgiveness, and that I would see him next day, as if nothing had happened: but if it were possible to escape from a wretch, who, as I have too much reason to believe, formed a plot to fire the house, to frighten me, almost naked, into his arms, how could I see him the next day?

I have escaped—Heaven be praised that I have!—And have now no other concern, than that I fly from the only hope that could have made such an husband tolerable to me; the reconciliation with my friends, so agreeably undertaken by my uncle.

All my present hope is, to find some reputable family, or person of my own sex, who is obliged to go beyond sea, or who lives abroad; I care not whither; but if I might chuse, in some one of our American colonies—Never to be heard of more by my relations, whom I have so grievously offended.

Nor let your generous heart be moved at what I write. If I can escape the dreadfullest part of my father's malediction, (for the temporary part is already in a manner fulfilled, which makes me tremble in apprehension of the other) I shall think the wreck of my worldly fortunes a happy composition.

Neither is there need of the renewal of your so often tendered goodness to me: for I have with me rings and other valuables, that were sent me with my cloaths, which will turn into money to answer all I can want, till Providence shall be pleased to put me into some way to help myself, if, for my further punishment, my life is to lengthened beyond my wishes.

Impute not this scheme, my beloved friend, either to dejection on one hand, or to that romantick turn on the other, which we have supposed generally to obtain with our sex, from fifteen to twenty-two: for, be pleased to consider my unhappy situation, in the light in which it really must appear to every considerate person, who knows it. In the first place, the man, who has had the assurance to think me, and to endeavour to make me, his property, will hunt me from place to place, and search after me as a stray: and he knows he may do so with impunity; for whom have I to protect me from him?

Then as to my estate, the envied estate, which has been the original cause of all my misfortunes, it shall never be mine upon litigated terms. What is there in being enabled to boast, that I am worth more than I can use, or wish to use? And if my power is circumscribed, I shall not have that to answer for, which I should have, if I did not use it as I ought: which very few do. I shall have no husband, of whose interest I ought to be so regardful, as to prevent me doing more than justice to others, that I may not do less to him. If, therefore, my father will be pleased (as I shall presume, in proper time, to propose to him) to pay two annuities out of it, one to my dear Mrs. Norton, which may make her easy for the remainder of her life, as she is now growing into years; the other of 50 l. per annum, to the same good woman, for the use of my poor, as I have had the vanity to call a certain set of people, concerning whom she knows all my mind; that so as few as possible may ſuffer by the conſequences of my error; God bleſs them, and give them heart's-eaſe and content, with the reſt!

Other reaſons for my taking the ſtep I have hinted at, are theſe:

This wicked man knows I have no friend in the world but you: your neighbourhood, therefore, would be the firſt he would ſeek for me in, were you to think it poſſible for me to be concealed in it: and in this caſe you might be ſubjected to inconveniences greater even than thoſe which you have already ſuſtained on my account.

From my couſin Morden, were he to come, I could not hope protection; ſince, by his letter to me, it is evident, that my brother has engaged him in his party: nor would I, by any means, ſubject ſo worthy a man to danger; as might be the caſe, from the violence of this ungovernable ſpirit.

Theſe things conſidered, what better method can I take, than to go abroad to ſome one of the Engliſh colonies; where nobody but yourſelf ſhall know anything of me; nor you, let me tell you, preſently, nor till I am fixed, and (if it pleaſe God) in a courſe of living tolerably to my mind? For it is no ſmall part of my concern, that my indiſcretions have laid ſo heavy a tax upon you, my dear friend, to whom, once, I hoped to give more pleaſure than pain.

I am at preſent at one Mrs. Moore's at Hampſtead. My heart miſgave me at coming to this village, becauſe I had been here with him more than once: but the coach hither was ſo ready a conveniency, that I knew not what to do better. Then I ſhall ſtay here no longer than till I can receive your anſwer to this: in which you will be pleaſed to let me know, if I cannot be hid, according to your former contrivance, [Happy, had I given into it at the time!] by Mrs. Townſend's aſſiſtance, till the heat of his ſearch be over. The Deptford road, I imagine, will be the right direction to hear of a paſſage, and to get ſafely aboard.

O why was the great fiend of all unchained, and permitted to aſſume ſo ſpecious a form, and yet allowed to conceal his feet and his talons, till with the one he was ready to trample upon my honour, and to ſtrike the other into my heart!—And what had I done, that he ſhould be let looſe particularly upon me!

Forgive me this murmuring queſtion, the effect of my impatience, my guilty impatience, I doubt: for, as I have eſcaped with my honour, and nothing but my worldly proſpects, and my pride, my ambition, and my vanity, have ſuffered in this wreck of my hopefuller fortunes, may I not ſtill be more happy than I deſerve to be? And is it not in my own power ſtill, by the Divine favour, to ſecure the great ſtake of all? And who knows but that this very path into which my inconſideration has thrown me, ſtrew'd as it is with briers and thorns, which tear in pieces my gaudier trappings, may not be the right path to lead me into the great road to my future happineſs; which might have been endangered by evil communication?

And after all, are there not ſtill more deſerving perſons than I, who never failed in any capital point of duty, that have been more humbled than myſelf; and ſome too, by the errors of parents and relations, by the tricks and baſeneſs of guardians and truſtees, and in which their own raſhneſs or folly had no part?

I will then endeavour to make the beſt of my preſent lot. And join with me, my beſt, my only friend, in praying, that my puniſhment may end here; and that my preſent afflictions may be ſanctified to me.

This letter will enable you to account for a line or two, which I ſent to Wilſon's, to be carried to you, only for a feint, to get his ſervant out of the way. He ſeemed to be left, as I thought, for a ſpy upon me. But he returning too ſoon, I was forced to write a few lines for him to carry to his maſter, to a tavern near Doctors Commons, with the ſame view; and this happily anſwered my end.

I wrote early in the morning a bitter letter to the wretch, which I left for him obvious enough; and I ſuppoſe he has it by this time. I kept no copy of it. I ſhall recollect the contents, and give you the particulars of all, at more leiſure.

I am ſure you will approve of my eſcape—The rather, as the people of the houſe muſt be very vile: for they, and that Dorcas too, did hear me (I know they did) cry out for help. If the fire had been other than a villainous plot, (although in the morning, to blind them, I pretended to think it otherwiſe) they would have been alarmed as much as I; and have run in, hearing me ſcream, to comfort me, ſuppoſing my terror was the fire; to relieve me, ſuppoſing it were any-thing elſe. But the vile Dorcas went away as ſoon as ſhe ſaw saw the wretch throw his arms about me!—Bleſs me, my dear, I had only my ſlippers and an under-petticoat on. I was frighted out of my bed, by her cries of fire; and that I ſhould be burnt to aſhes in a moment—And ſhe to go away, and never to return, nor anybody elſe! And yet I heard women's voices in the next room; indeed I did. —An evident contrivance of them all: —God be praiſed, I am out of their houſe!

My terror is not yet over: I can hardly think myſelf ſafe. Every well-dreſſed man I ſee from my windows, whether on horſeback or on foot, I think to be him.

I know you will expedite an anſwer. A man and horſe will be procured me to-morrow early, to carry this. To be ſure, you cannot return an anſwer by the ſame man, becauſe you muſt ſee Mrs. Townſend firſt: nevertheleſs, I ſhall wait with impatience till you can; having no friend but you to apply to; and being ſuch a ſtranger to this part of the world, that I know not which way to turn myſelf; whither to go; nor what to do—What a dreadful hand have I made of it!

Mrs. Moore, at whoſe houſe I am, is a widow, and of good character: and of this one of her neighbours, of whom I bought a handkerchief, purpoſely to make enquiry before I would venture, informed me.

I will not ſet my foot out of doors, till I have your direction: and I am the more ſecure, having dropt words to the people of the houſe where the coach ſet me down, as if I expected a chariot to meet me in my way to Hendon; a village a little diſtance from this. And when I left their houſe, I walked backward and forward upon the hill; at firſt, not knowing what to do; and afterwards, to be certain that I was not watched before I ventured to enquire after a lodging.

You will direct for me, my dear, by the name of Mrs. Harriot Lucas.

Had I not made my eſcape when I did, I was reſolved to attempt it again and again. He was gone to the Commons for a licence, as he wrote me word; for I refuſed to ſee him, notwithſtanding the promiſe he extorted from me.

How hard, how next-to-impoſſible, my dear, to avoid many leſſer deviations, when we are betrayed into a capital one!

For fear I ſhould not get away at my firſt effort, I had appriz'd him, that I would not ſet eye upon him under a week, in order to gain myſelf time for it in different ways—And were I ſo to have been watched as to have made it neceſſary, I would, after ſuch an inſtance of the connivance of the women of the houſe, have run out into the ſtreet, and thrown myſelf into the next houſe I could have entered, or claimed protection from the firſt perſon I had met—Women to deſert the cauſe of a poor creature of their own ſex in ſuch a ſituation, what muſt they be!—Then, ſuch poor guilty ſort of figures did they make in the morning after he was gone out—ſo earneſt to get me up ſtairs, and to convince me, by the ſcorched window-boards, and burnt curtains and vallens, that the fire was real—that (although I ſeemed to believe all they would have me believe) I was more and more reſolved to get out of their houſe at all adventures.

When I began, I thought to write but a few lines. But, be my ſubject what it will, I know not how to conclude when I write to you. It was always ſo: it is not therefore owing peculiarly to that moſt intereſting and unhappy ſituation, which you will allow however, to engroſs at preſent the whole mind of your unhappy, but ever-affectionate

CLARISSA HARLOWE.

LETTER VI.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

FRIDAY MORN. PAST 2 O'CLOCK.

IO triumphe! Io Clariſſa, ſing!—Once more, what a happy man thy friend! —A ſilly dear novice, to be heard to tell the coachman whither to carry her!—And to go to Hampſtead, of all the villages about London!—The place where we had been together more than once!

Methinks I am ſorry ſhe managed no better!—I ſhall find the recovery of her too eaſy a taſk, I fear! Had ſhe but known how much difficulty enhances the value of any-thing with me, and had ſhe had the leaſt notion of obliging me by it, ſhe would never have ſtopt ſhort at Hampſtead, ſurely.

Well, but after all this exultation, thou wilt aſk, If I have already got back my charmer?—I have not: but knowing where ſhe is, is almoſt the ſame thing as having her in my power. And it delights me to think how ſhe will ſtart and tremble when I firſt pop upon her! How ſhe will look with conſcious guilt, that will more than wipe off my guilt of Wedneſday night, when ſhe ſees her injured lover, and acknowledged husband, from whom, the greatest of felonies, she would have stolen herself.

But thou wilt be impatient to know how I came by my lights. Read the inclosed here, and remember the instructions which from time to time, as I have told thee, I have given my fellow, in apprehension of such an elopement; and that will tell thee all, and what I may reasonably expect from the rascal's diligence and management, if he wishes ever to see my face again.

I received it about half an hour ago, just as I was going to lie down in my cloaths: and it has made me so much alive, that, midnight as it is, I have sent for a Blunt's chariot, to attend me here, by day-peep, with my usual coachman, if possible; and knowing not what else to do with myself, I sat down, and, in the joy of my heart, have not only written thus far, but have concluded upon the measures I shall take when admitted to her presence: for well am I aware of the difficulties I shall have to contend with from her perverseness.

'HONNORED SUR,

'THIS is to sertifie your honner, as 'how I am heer at Hamestet, wher 'I have found out my lady to be in 'logins at one Mrs. Moore's, near upon 'Hamstet Hethe. And I have so or-'dered matters, that her ladiship can-'not stur but I must have notice of her 'goins and comins. As I knowed I 'dursted not look into your honner's 'fase, if I had not found out my lady, 'thoff she was gone off the prems's in a 'quar er of an hour, as a man may say; 'so I knowed you would be glad at hart 'to know I had found her out: and so 'I send this by Petur Patrick, who is to 'have 5 shillins, it being now near 12 'of the clock at nite; for he would not 'stur without a hearty drink too be-'sides: and I was willing all shulde be 'snug likeways at the logins before I 'sent.

'I have munny of youre honner's; 'but I thought as how if the man was 'payed by me beforend, he mought play 'trix; so left that to your honner.

'My lady knows nothing of my be-'ing hereaway. But I thoute it best 'not to leve the plase, because she has 'taken the logins but for a fue nites.

'If your honner come to the Upper 'Flax, I will be in site all the day about 'the tapp-house or the hethe. I have 'borrowed another cote, instead of your 'honner's liferie, and a blacke wigg; 'so cannot be knoen by my lady, iff as 'howe she should see me: and have made 'as if I had the toothe-ake; so with 'my hancriffe at my mothe, the teth 'which your honner was pleased to 'betr out with your honner's fyste, and 'my dam'd wide mothe, as your honner 'notifys it to be, cannot be knoen to be mine.

'The tow inner letters I had from my 'lady, before she went off the prems's. 'One was to be left at Mr. Wilson's for 'Miss How. The next was to be for 'your honner. But I knowed you was 'not at the plase directed; and being 'afear'd of what fell out, so I kept them 'for your honner, and so could not 'give um to you, until I seed you. Miss 'How's I only made belief to her ladi-'ship as I carried it, and sed as how 'there was nothing left for hur, as she 'wished to knoe: so here they be bothe.

'I am, may it plese your honner, your 'honner's most dutiful, and, wonce more, 'happy servant,

'WM. SUMMERS.'

The two inner letters, as Will calls them, 'tis plain, were written for no other purpose, but to send him out of the way with them, and one of them to amuse me. That directed to Miss Howe is only this:

THURSDAY, JUNE 8.

'I Write this, my dear Miss Howe, only 'for a feint, and to see if it will go 'current. I shall write at large very 'soon, if not miserably prevented!!!

'CL. H.'

Now, Jack, will not her feints justify mine! Does she not invade my province, thinkest thou? And is it not now fairly come to who shall most deceive and cheat the other? So, I thank my stars, we are upon a par, at last, as to this point—Which is a great ease to my conscience, thou must believe. And if what Hudibras tells us is true, the dear fugitive has also abundance of pleasure to come.

'Doubtless the pleasure is as great
'In being cheated, as to cheat.
'As lookers-on find most delight,
'Who least perceive the juggler's sleight;
'And still the less they understand,
'The more admire the slight of hand.'

This my dear juggler's letter to me; the other inner letter sent by Will.

'THURSDAY, JUNE 8.

'MR. LOVELACE,

'DO not give me cause to dread your 'return. If you would not that 'I should hate you for ever, send me half a line by the bearer, to assure me that you will not attempt to see me for a week to come. I cannot look you in the face without equal confusion and indignation. The obliging me in this is but a poor atonement for your last night's vile behaviour.

'You may pass this time in a journey to Lord M.'s: and I cannot doubt, if the ladies of your family are as favourable to me as you have assured me they are, but that you will have interest enough to prevail with one of them to oblige me with her company. After your baseness of last night, you will not wonder, that I insist upon this proof of your future honour.

'If Captain Tomlinson comes mean time, I can hear what he has to say, and send you an account of it.

'But in less than a week if you see me, it must be owing to a fresh act of violence, of which you know not the consequence.

'Send me the requested line, if ever you expect to have the forgiveness confirmed, the promise of which you extorted from the unhappy CL. H.'

Now, Belford, what canst thou say in behalf of this sweet rogue of a lady? What canst thou say for her? 'Tis apparent that she was fully determined upon an elopement, when she wrote it: and thus would she make me of party against myself, by drawing me in to give her a week's time to complete it: and, more wicked still, send me upon a fool's errand to bring up one of my cousins.—When we came to have the satisfaction of finding her gone off, and me exposed for ever!—What punishment can be bad enough for such a little villain of a lady!

But mind, moreover, how plausibly she accounts by this billet, (supposing she should not find an opportunity of eloping before I returned) for the resolution of not seeing me for a week; and for the bread and butter expedient!—So childish, as we thought it!

The chariot is not come; and if it were, it is yet too soon for every-thing but my impatience. And as I have already taken my measures, and can think of nothing but my triumph, I will resume her violent letter, in order to strengthen my resolutions against her. I was before in too gloomy a way to proceed with it; but now the subject is all alive to me, and my gayer fancy, like the sun-beams, will irradiate it, and turn the solemn deep-green into a brighter verdure.

When I have called upon my charmer to explain some parts of her letter, and to atone for others, I will send it, or a copy of it, to thee.

Suffice it at present to tell thee, in the first place, that she is determined never to be my wife—To be sure, there ought to be no compulsion in so material a case. Compulsion was her parent's fault, which I have censured so severely, that I shall hardly be guilty of the same. I am therefore glad I know her mind as to this essential point.

I have ruined her, she says!—Now that's a fib, take it her own way—If I had, she would not perhaps, have run away from me.

She is thrown upon the wide world: now I own that Hampstead Heath affords very pretty and very extensive prospects; but 'tis not the wide world neither: and suppose that to be her grievance, I hope soon to restore her to a narrower.

I am the enemy of her soul, as well as of her honour!—Confoundedly severe! Nevertheless, another fib!—For I love her soul very well; but think no more of it in this case than of my own.

She is to be thrown upon strangers!—And is not that her own fault!—Much against my will, I am sure!

She is cast from a state of independency into one of obligation. She never was in a state of independency; nor is it fit a woman should, of any age, or in any state of life. And as to the state of obligation, there is no such thing as living without being beholden to somebody. Mutual obligation is the very essence and soul of the social and commercial life:—why should she be exempt from it:—I am sure the person she raves at, desires not such an exemption—has been long dependent upon her; and would rejoice to owe further obligations to her than he can boast of hitherto.

She talks of her father's curse—But have I not repaid him for it an hundred fold in the same coin? But why must the faults of other people be laid at my door? Have I not enough of my own?

But the grey-eyed dawn begins to peep—Let me sum up all.

In short, then, the dear creature's letter is a collection of invectives not very new to me; though the occasion for them, no doubt, is new to her. A little sprinkling of the romantick and contradictory runs through it. She loves, and she hates: she encourages me to pursue her, by telling me I safely may; and yet she begs I will not. She apprehends poverty and want, yet resolves to give away her eſtate; to gratify whom? —Why, in ſhort, thoſe who have been the cauſe of her misfortunes. And finally, though ſhe reſolves never to be mine, yet ſhe has ſome regrets at leaving me, becauſe of the opening proſpects of a reconciliation with her friends.

But never did morning dawn ſo tardily as this!—Neither is the chariot yet come.

'A GENTLEMAN to ſpeak with me, 'Dorcas!—Who can want me thus 'early?

'Captain Tomlinſon, ſayeſt thou: 'ſurely he muſt have travelled all night! '—Early riſer as I am, how could he 'think to find me up thus early?'

But let the chariot come, and he ſhall accompany me in it to the bottom of the hill, (though he return to town on foot; for the captain is all obliging goodneſs) that I may hear all he has to ſay, and tell him all my mind, and loſe no time.

Well, now I am ſatisfied that this rebellious flight will turn to my advantage, as all cruſhed rebellions do to the advantage of a ſovereign in poſſeſſion.

'DEAR captain, I rejoice to ſee you— 'Juſt in the nick of time—See! See!

"The roſy-finger'd morn appears,
"And from her mantle ſhakes her tears;
"The ſun ariſing, mortals cheers;
"And drives the riſing miſts away,
"In promiſe of a glorious day."

'Excuſe me, Sir, that I ſalute you 'from my favorite bard. He that riſes 'with the lark, will ſing with the lark. 'Strange news ſince I ſaw you, captain! '—Poor miſtaken lady!—But you have 'too much goodneſs, I know, to reveal 'to her uncle Harlowe the errors of this 'capricious beauty. It will all turn out 'for the beſt. You muſt accompany 'me part of the way. I know the de'light you take in compoſing differences. 'But 'tis the taſk of the prudent to heal 'the breaches made by the raſhneſs and 'folly of the imprudent.'

AND now (all round me ſo ſtill, and ſo ſilent) the rattling of the chariot-wheels at a ſtreet's diſtance do I hear!—And to this angel of a woman I fly!

Reward, O god of Love, [the cauſe is thy own] reward thou as it deſerves, my ſuffering perſeverance!—Succeed my endeavours to bring back to thy obedience this charming fugitive!—Make her acknowledge her raſhneſs; repent her inſults; implore my forgiveneſs; beg to be reinſtated in my favour, and that I will bury in oblivion the remembrance of her heinous offence againſt thee, and againſt me, thy faithful votary.

THE chariot at the door!—I come! I come!

'I attend you, good captain—'

'Indeed, Sir—'

'Pray, Sir—Civility is not ceremony.'

And now, dreſſed like a bridegroom, my heart elated beyond that of the moſt deſiring one, (attended by a footman whom my beloved never ſaw) I am already at Hampſtead!

LETTER VII.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

UPPER FLASK, HAMPSTEAD, FRID. MORN. 7 O'CLOCK. (JUNE 9.)

I Am now here, and here have been this hour and a half. What an induſtrious ſpirit have I!—Nobody can ſay, that I eat the bread of idleneſs. I take true pains for all the pleaſure I enjoy. I cannot but admire myſelf ſtrangely; for, certainly, with this active ſoul, I ſhould have made a very great figure in whatever ſtation I had filled. But had I been a prince! To be ſure I ſhould have made a moſt noble prince! I ſhould have led up a a military dance equal to that of the great Macedonian. I ſhould have added kingdom to kingdom, and deſpoiled all my neighbouring-ſovereigns, in order to have obtained the name of Robert the Great. And I would have gone to war with the Great Turk, and the Perſian, and Mogholl, for the ſeraglios; for not one of thoſe eaſtern monarchs ſhould have had a pretty woman to bleſs himſelf with, till I had done with her.

And now I have ſo much leiſure upon my hands, that after having informed myſelf of all neceſſary particulars, I am ſet to my ſhort-hand writing in order to keep up with time as well as I can: for the ſubject is now become worthy of me; and it is yet too ſoon, I doubt, to pay my compliments to my charmer, after all her fatigues for two or three days paſt: and, moreover, I have abundance of matters preparative to my future proceedings to recount, in order to connect and render all intelligible.

I parted with the captain at the foot of the hill, trebly inſtructed; that is to ſay, as to the fact, to the probable, and to the poſſible. If my beloved and I can meet, and make up without the mediating of this worthy gentleman, it will be ſo much the better. As little foreign aid as poſſible in my amorous conflicts has always been a rule with me; though here I have been obliged to call in ſo much. And who knows but it may be the better for the lady the leſs ſhe makes neceſſary? I cannot bear that ſhe ſhould ſit ſo indifferent to me as to be in earneſt to part with me for ever upon ſo ſlight, or even upon any occaſion. If I find ſhe is—But no more threatenings till ſhe is in my power—Thou knoweſt what I have vowed.

ſo

All Will's account from the lady's flight to his finding her again, all the accounts of the people of the houſe, the coachman's information to Will, and ſo forth, collected together, ſtand thus.

The Hampſtead coach, when the dear fugitive came to it, had but two paſſengers in it. But ſhe made the fellow go off directly, paying for the vacant places.

The two paſſengers directing the coachman to ſet them down at the Upper Flaſk, ſhe bid him ſet her down there alſo.

They took leave of her, [very reſpectfully no doubt;] and ſhe went into the houſe, and aſked, if ſhe could not have a diſh of tea, and a room to herſelf for half an hour.

They ſhewed her up to the very room where I now am. She ſat at the very table I now write upon; and, I believe, the chair I ſit in was hers. O Belford, if thou knoweſt what love is, thou wilt be able to account for theſe minutiæ.

She ſeemed ſpiritleſs and fatigued. The gentlewoman herſelf choſe to attend ſo genteel and lovely a gueſt. She aſked her, If ſhe would have bread and butter with her tea?

No. She could not eat.

They had very good biſcuits.

As ſhe pleaſed.

The gentlewoman ſtept out for ſome; and returning on a ſudden, ſhe obſerved the ſweet fugitive endeavouring to reſtrain a violent burſt of grief to which ſhe had given way in that little interval.

However, when the tea came, ſhe made the landlady ſit down with her, and aſked her abundance of queſtions about the villages and roads in that neighbourhood.

The gentlewoman took notice to her, that ſhe ſeemed to be troubled in mind.

Tender ſpirits, ſhe replied, could not part with dear friends without concern.

She meant me, no doubt.

She made no enquiry about a lodging, though by the ſequel, thou'lt obſerve, that ſhe ſeemed to intend to go no farther that night than Hampſtead. But after ſhe had drank two diſhes, and put a biſcuit in her pocket—[Sweet ſoul! to ſerve for her ſupper perhaps] ſhe laid down half a crown; and refuſing change, ſighing, took leave, ſaying, ſhe would proceed towards Hendon; the diſtance to which had been one of her queſtions.

They offered to ſend to know, if a Hampſtead coach were not to go to Hendon that evening.

No matter, ſhe ſaid—Perhaps ſhe might meet the chariot.

Another of her feints I ſuppoſe: for how, or with whom, could any thing of this ſort have been concerted ſince yeſterday morning?

She had, as the people took notice to one another, ſomething ſo uncommonly noble in her air, and in her perſon and behaviour, that they were ſure ſhe was of quality. And having no ſervant with her of either ſex, her eyes [Her fine eyes, the gentlewoman called them, ſtranger as ſhe was, and a woman!] being ſwelled and red, they were ſure there was an elopement in the caſe, either from parents or guardians; for they ſuppoſed her too young and too maidenly to be a married lady: and were ſhe married, no huſband would let ſuch a fine young creature be unattended and alone; nor give her cauſe for ſo much grief, as ſeemed to be ſettled in her countenance. Then, at times, ſhe ſeemed to be ſo bewildered, they ſaid, that they were afraid ſhe had it in her head to make away with herſelf.

All theſe things put together, excited their curioſity; and they engaged a peery ſervant, as they called a footman who was drinking with Kit the hoſtler at the taphouſe, to watch all her motions. This fellow reported the following particulars, as they were re-reported to me.

She indeed went towards Hendon, paſſing by the ſign of the Caſtle on the Heath; then, ſtopping, looked about her, and down into the valley before her. Then, turning her face towards London, ſhe ſeemed, by the motion of her handkerchief to her eyes, to weep; repenting [Who knows?] the raſh ſtep ſhe had taken, and wiſhing herſelf back again.

Better for her, if ſhe do, Jack, once more I ſay!—Woe be to the girl who could think of marrying me, yet be able to run away from me, and renounce me for ever!

Then, continuing on a few paces, ſhe ſtopt again; and, as if diſliking her road, again ſeeming to weep, directed her courſe back towards Hampſtead.

I am glad ſhe wept ſo much, becauſe

no heart bursts (be the occasion for the sorrow what it will) which has that kindly relief. Hence I hardly ever am moved at the sight of these pellucid fugitives in a fine woman. How often, in the past twelve hours, have I wished, that I could cry most confoundedly!

She then saw a coach-and-four driving towards her empty. She crossed the path she was in, as if to meet it; and seemed to intend to speak to the coachman, had he stopt or spoken first. He as earnestly looked at her. Every-one did so, who passed her, (so the man who dogged her was the less suspected)—Happy rogue of a coachman, hadst thou known whose notice thou didst engage, and whom thou mightest have obliged?—It was the divine Clarissa Harlowe at whom thou gazedst!—Mine own Clarissa Harlowe!—But it was well for me thou wert as undistinguishing as the beasts thou drovest; otherwise what a wild-goose chace had I been led?

The lady, as well as the coachman, in short, seemed to want resolution; the horses kept on, [The fellow's head and eyes, no doubt, turned behind him;] and the distance soon lengthened beyond recal. With a wistful eye she looked after him; sighed and wept again; as the servant, who then slily passed her, observed.

By this time she had reached the houses. She looked up at every one, as she passed; now-and-then breathing upon her bared hand, and applying it to her swelled eyes, to abate the redness, and dry the tears. At last, seeing a bill up for letting lodgings, she walked backwards and forwards half a dozen times, as if unable to determine what to do. And then went far her into the town; and there the fellow, being spoken to by one of his familiars, lost her for a few minutes: but he soon saw her come out of a linen-drapery shop, attended with a servant-maid, having, as he believed, bought some little matters, and, as it proved, got that maid-servant to go with her to the house where she is now at.

The fellow, after waiting about an hour, and not seeing her come out, returned, concluding that she had taken lodgings there.

And here, supposing my narrative of the dramatick kind, ends act the first. And now begins,

ACT II.

Enter my Rascal.

WILL having got at all these particulars, by exchanging others as frankly against them, with which I had formerly prepared him both verbally and in writing; I found the people already of my party, and full of good wishes for my success, repeating to me all they told him.

But he had first acquainted me with the accounts he had given them of his lady and me. It is necessary that I give thee the particulars of his tale—And I have a little time upon my hands; for the maid of the house, who had been out of an errand, tells us, that she saw Mrs. Moore [with whom must be my first business] go into the house of a young gentleman, within a few doors of her, who has a maiden sister, Miss Rawlins by name, so notify'd for prudence, that none of her acquaintance undertake any-thing of consequence without consulting her.

Meanwhile my honest coachman is walking about Miss Rawlins's door, in order to bring me notice of Mrs. Moore's return to her own house. I hope her gossip's-tale will be as soon told as mine. Which take as follows.

Will told them, before I came, That his lady was but lately married to one of the finest gentlemen in the world. But that he, being very gay and lively, she was mortal jealous of him; and in a fit of that sort, had eloped from him. For although she loved him dearly, and he doated upon her, (as well he might, since as they had seen, she was the finest creature that ever the sun shone upon;) yet she was apt to be very wilful and sullen, if he might take the liberty to say so--but truth was truth;—and if she could not have her own way in every thing, would be for leaving him. That she had three or four times played his master such tricks; but with all the virtue and innocence in the world; running away to an intimate friend of hers, who, though a young lady of honour, was but too indulgent to her in this her only failing; for which reason his master had brought her to London-lodgings; their usual residence being in the country: and that, on his refusing to satisfy her about a lady he had been seen with in St. James's Park, she had, for the first time since she came to town, served his master thus; whom he had left half-distracted on that account.

'And truly well he might, poor gen-'tleman!' cried the honest folks, pitying me before they saw me.

He told them how he came by this intelligence of her; and made himself such an interest with them, that they helped him him to a change of cloaths for himself; and the landlord, at his request, privately enquired, if the lady actually remained at Mrs. Moore's; and for how long she had taken the lodgings: which he found only to be for a week certain: but she had said, that she believed she should hardly stay so long. And then it was that he wrote his letter, and sent it by honest Peter Patrick, as thou hast heard.

When I came, my person and dress having answered Will's description, the people were ready to worship me. I now-and-then sighed, now-and-then put on a lighter air; which, however, I designed, should shew more of vexation ill-disguised, than of real cheerfulness: and they told Will it was a thousand pities so fine a lady should have such skittish tricks; adding, that she might expose herself to great dangers by them; for that there were rakes every-where, [Lovelaces in every corner, Jack!] and many about that town, who would leave nothing unattempted to get into her company: and although they might not prevail upon her, yet might they, nevertheless, hurt her reputation; and, in time, estrange the affections of so fine a gentleman from her.

Good sensible people, these!—Hay, Jack!

'Here, landlord; one word with you. '—My servant, I find, has acquainted 'you with the reason of my coming this 'way. An unhappy affair, landlord! 'A very unhappy affair! But never was 'there a more virtuous woman.'

'So, Sir, she seems to be. A thou-'sand pities her ladyship has such ways '—And to so good-humoured a gentle-'man as you seem to be, Sir.'

'Mother-spoilt, landlord!—Mother-'spoilt! that's the thing!—But,' sighing, 'I must make the best of it. What 'I want you to do for me, is to lend me 'a great coat. I care not what it is. If 'my spouse should see me at a distance, 'she would make it very difficult for me 'to get at her speech. A great coat 'with a cape, if you have one. I must 'come upon her before she is aware.'

'I am afraid, Sir, I have none fit for 'such a gentleman as you.'

'O any-thing will do!—The worse 'the better.'

Exit Landlord. Re-enter with two great coats.

'Aye, landlord, this will be best; for 'I can button the cape over the lower 'part of my face. Don't I look devilishly 'down and concerned, landlord?'

'I never saw a gentleman with a bet-'ter-natured look. 'Tis pity you should 'have such trials, Sir.'

'I must be very unhappy, no doubt 'of it, landlord. And yet I am a little 'pleased, you must needs think, that I 'have found her out before any great 'inconvenience has arisen to her. How-'ever, if I cannot break her of these 'freaks, she'll break my heart; for I 'do love her with all her failings.'

The good woman, who was within hearing of all this, pitied me much.

'Pray, your honour,' said she, 'if 'I may be so bold, was Madam ever a 'mamma?'

'No!'—and I sighed—'We have been 'but a little while married; and, as I 'may say to you, it is her own fault that 'she is not in that way.' [Not a word of a lie in this, Jack.] But to tell you truth, 'Madam, she may be compared to the 'dog in the manger.'

'I understand you, Sir,' [simpering.] 'She is but young, Sir. I have heard 'of one or two such skittish young ladies, 'in my time, Sir—But when Madam is 'in that way, I dare say, as she loves you, '(and it would be strange if she did not!) 'all this will be over, and she may make 'the best of wives.'

'That's all my hope.'

'She is as fine a lady as ever I beheld. 'I hope, Sir, you won't be too severe. 'She'll get over all these freaks, if once 'she be a mamma, I warrant.'

'I can't be severe to her; she knows 'that. The moment I see her, all re-'sentment is over with me, if she give 'me but one kind look.'

All this time, I was adjusting my horseman's coat, and Will was putting in the ties of my wig, and buttoning the cape over my chin.

I asked the gentlewoman for a little powder. She brought me a powder-box, and I slightly shook the puff over my hat, and flapped one side of it, though the lace looked a little too gay for my covering; and touching it over my eyes, 'Shall I be known, think you, Ma-'dam?'

'Your honour is so expert, Sir!—I 'wish, if I may be so bold, your lady 'has not some cause to be jealous. But 'it will be impossible, if you keep your 'laced cloaths covered, that any-body 'should know you in that dress to be the 'same gentleman—Except they find you 'out by your clocked stockings.'

'Well observed—Can't you, land-'lord, lend or sell me a pair of stock-'ings, that will draw over these? I can 'cut

'cut off the feet, if they won't go into 'my ſhoes.'

He could let me have a pair of coarſe, but clean, ſtirrup-ſtockings, if I pleaſed.

'The beſt in the world for the pur-'poſe.'

He fetched them. Will drew them on; and my legs then made a good gouty appearance.

The good woman, ſmiling, wiſhed me ſucceſs; and ſo did the landlord: and as thou knoweſt that I am not a bad mimick, I took a cane, which I borrowed of the landlord, and ſtooped in the ſhoulders to a quarter of a foot of leſs height, and ſtumped away acroſs to the bowling-green, to practiſe a little the hobbling gaite of a gouty man. The landlady whiſpered her huſband, as Will tells me, 'He's a good one, I warrant him—I dare 'ſay the fault lies not all of one ſide.' While mine hoſt replied, that I was ſo lively and ſo good-natured a gentleman, that he did not know who could be angry with me, do what I would. A ſenſible fellow!—I wiſh my charmer were of the ſame opinion.

And now I am going to try, if I can't agree with Goody Moore for lodgings and other conveniences for my ſick wife.

'Wife, Lovelace?' methinks thou interrogateſt.

Yes, wife; for who knows what cautions the dear fugitive may have given in apprehenſion of me?

'But has Goody Moore any other 'lodgings to let?'

Yes, yes; I have taken care of that; and find that ſhe has juſt ſuch conveniences as I want. And I know that my wife will like them. For, although married, I can do every-thing I pleaſe; and that's a bold word, you know. But had ſhe only a garret to let, I would have liked it; and been a poor author afraid of arreſts, and made that my place of refuge; yet would have made ſhift to pay before-hand for what I had. I can ſuit myſelf to any condition, that's my comfort.

THE widow Moore returned! ſay you—Down, down flutterer!—This impertinent heart is more troubleſome to me than my conſcience, I think.—I ſhall be obliged to hoarſen my voice, and roughen my character, to keep up with it's puppily dancings.

But let me ſee, Shall I be angry or pleaſed, when I am admitted to my beloved's preſence?

Angry to be ſure.—Has ſhe not broken her word with me?—At a time too when I was meditating to do her grateful juſtice?—And is not breach of word a dreadful crime in good folks? I have ever been for forming my judgment of the nature of things and actions, not ſo much from what they are in themſelves, as from the character of the actors. Thus it would be as odd a thing in ſuch as we to keep our words with a woman, as it would be wicked in her to break hers to us.

Seeſt thou not, that this unſeaſonable gravity is admitted to quell the palpitations of this unmanageable heart? But ſtill it will go on with it's boundings. I'll try as I ride in my chariot to tranquilize.

'Ride, Bob! ſo little a way?'

Yes, ride, Jack; for am I not lame? And will it not look well to have a lodger who keeps his chariot? What widow, what ſervant, aſks queſtions of a man who keeps an equipage?

My coachman, as well as my other ſervant, is under Will's tuition.

Never was there ſuch a hideous raſcal as he has made himſelf. The devil only and his other maſter can know him. They both have ſet their marks upon him. As to my honour's mark, it will never be out of his damned wide mouth, as he calls it. For the dog will be hanged before he can loſe the reſt of his teeth by age.

I am gone.

LETTER VIII.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

HAMPSTEAD, FRIDAY NIGHT, JUNE 9.

NOW, Belford, for the narrative of narratives. I will continue it, as I have opportunity; and that ſo dexterouſly, that if I break off twenty times, thou ſhalt not diſcern where I piece my thread.

Although grievouſly afflicted with the gout, I alighted out of my chariot, (leaning very hard on my cane with one hand, and on my new ſervant's ſhoulder with the other) the ſame inſtant almoſt that he had knocked at the door, that I might be ſure of admiſſion into the houſe.

I took care to button my great coat about me, and to cover with it even the pummel of my ſword; it being a little too gay for my years. I knew not what occaſion I might have for my ſword. I ſtooped forward; blinked with my eyes to conceal their luſtre, [No vanity in ſaying that, Jack;] my chin wrapt up for the tooth-ache; my flouched, laced hat, and ſo much of my wig as was viſible, giving me the appearance of an antiquated beau.

My wife, I reſolved before-hand, ſhould have a complication of diſorders.

The maid came to the door. I aſked for her miſtreſs. She ſhewed me into one of the parlours; and I ſat down with a gouty 'Oh!'

Enter Goody Moore.

'Your ſervant, Madam—But you 'muſt excuſe me; I cannot well ſtand. '—I find by the bill at the door, that 'you have lodgings to let,' [Mumbling my words as if, like my man Will, I had loſt ſome of my fore-teeth:] 'be 'pleaſed to inform me what they are; 'for I like your ſituation—And I will 'tell you my family—I have a wife, a 'good old woman—Older than myſelf, 'by the way, a pretty deal. She is in 'a bad ſtate of health, and is adviſed into 'the Hampſtead air. She will have 'two maid-ſervants and a footman. The 'coach or chariot (I ſhall not have them 'up both together) we can put any-'where, and the coachman will be with 'his horſes.'

'When, Sir, ſhall you want to come 'in?'

'I will take them from this very day; 'and, if convenient, will bring my wife 'in the afternoon.'

'Perhaps, Sir, you would board, as 'well as lodge?'

'That as you pleaſe. It will ſave me 'the trouble of bringing my cook, if 'we do. And I ſuppoſe you have ſer-'vants who know how to dreſs a couple 'of diſhes. My wife muſt eat plain food, 'and I don't love kick-ſhaws.'

'We have a ſingle lady, who will be 'gone in two or three days. She has 'one of the beſt apartments: that will 'then be at liberty.'

'You have one or two good ones mean 'time, I preſume, Madam, juſt to re-'ceive my wife; for we have loſt time.—'Theſe damned phyſicians—Excuſe me, 'Madam, I am not uſed to curſe; but 'it is owing to the love I have for my 'wife—They have kept her in hand, till 'they are aſhamed to take more fees, and 'now adviſe her to the air. I wiſh we 'had ſent her hither at firſt. But we 'muſt now make the beſt of it.

'Excuſe me, Madam,' [for ſhe looked hard at me] 'that I am muffled up in 'this warm weather. I am but too ſen-'ſible, that I have left my chamber 'ſooner than I ought, and perhaps ſhall 'have a return of my gout for it. I came 'out thus muffled up with a dreadful 'pain in my jaws; an ague in them, I 'believe. But my poor dear will not 'be ſatisfied with any-body's care but 'mine. And, as I told you, we have 'loſt time.'

'You ſhall ſee what accommodations 'I have, if you pleaſe, Sir. But I doubt 'you are too lame to walk up-ſtairs.'

'I can make ſhift to hobble up now I 'have reſted a little. I'll juſt look up-'on the apartment my wife is to have. 'Any-thing may do for the ſervants: 'and as you ſeem to be a good ſort of 'gentlewoman, I ſhan't ſtand for a price, 'and will pay well beſides for the trou-'ble I ſhall give.'

She led the way; and I, helping my-ſelf by the baniſters, made ſhift to get up with leſs fatigue than I expected from ancles ſo weak. But, oh! Jack, what was Sixtus the Vth's artful depreſſion of his natural powers to mine, when, as the half-dead Montalto, he gaped for the pretendedly unſought pontificate, and the moment he was choſen leapt upon the prancing beaſt, which it was thought by the amazed conclave he was not able to mount without help of chairs and men? Never were there a more joyous heart and lighter heels than mine, joined together; yet both denied their functi-ons; the one fluttering in ſecret, ready to burſt it's bars for relief-ful expreſſion, the others obliged to an hobbling mo-tion; when, unreſtrained, they would, in their maſter's imagination, have mounted him to the lunar world without the help of a ladder.

There were three rooms on a floor: two of them handſome; and the third, ſhe ſaid, ſtill handſomer; but the lady was in it.

I ſaw, I ſaw ſhe was! for as I hobbled up, crying out upon my weak ancles, in the hoarſe mumbling voice I had aſſum-ed, I beheld a little piece of her as ſhe juſt caſt an eye (with the door a-jar, as they call it) to obſerve who was coming up; and, ſeeing ſuch an old clumſy fel-low, great-coated in weather ſo warm, ſlouched, and muffled up, ſhe withdrew, ſhutting the door without any emotion. But it was not ſo with me; for thou canſt not imagine how my heart danced to my mouth, at the very glimpſe of her; ſo that I was afraid the thump, thump, thumping villain, which had ſo lately thumped as much to no purpoſe, would have choaked me.

I liked the lodging well; and the more as ſhe ſaid the third room was ſtill hand-ſomer. 'I muſt ſit down, Madam:' [And choſe the darkeſt part of the room] 'won't 'you rave! You will not eaſily recover 'from the effects of this violence. Have 'patience, my love. Be pacified; and 'we will coolly talk this matter over: 'for you expoſe yourſelf as well as me: 'theſe ladies will certainly think you 'have fallen among robbers, and that 'I am the chief of them.'

'So you are! ſo you are!' ſtamping, her face ſtill covered; [She thought of Wedneſday night, no doubt] and, ſighing as if her heart was breaking, ſhe put her hand to her forehead—'I ſhall be quite 'diſtracted!'

'I will not, my deareſt love, uncover 'your face. You ſhall not look upon 'me, ſince I am ſo odious to you. But 'this is a violence I never thought you 'capable of.'

And I would have preſſed her hand, as I held it, with my lips; but ſhe drew it from me with indignation.

'Unhand me, Sir,' ſaid ſhe. 'I will 'not be touched by you. Leave me to 'my fate. What right, what title, have 'you to perſecute me thus?'

'What right, what title, my dear! But 'this is not a time—I have a letter from 'Captain Tomlinſon—Here it is,' offering it to her.

'I will receive nothing from your 'hands—Tell me not of Captain Tom-'linſon—Tell me not of any-body—'You have no right to invade me thus '—Once more leave me to my fate—'Have you not made me miſerable 'enough?'

I touched a delicate ſtring, on purpoſe to ſet her in ſuch a paſſion before the women, as might confirm the intimation I had given of a phrenſical diſorder.

'What a turn is here!—Lately ſo 'happy—Nothing wanting but a recon-'ciliation between you and your friends! 'That reconciliation in ſuch a happy 'train—Shall ſo ſlight, ſo accidental an 'occaſion be ſuffered to overturn all 'our happineſs!'

She ſtarted up with a trembling impatience, her apron falling from her indignant face—'Now,' ſaid ſhe, 'that 'thou dareſt to call the occaſion ſlight 'and accidental, and that I am happily 'out of thy vile hands, and out of a 'houſe I have reaſon to believe as vile, 'traitor and wretch that thou art, I will 'venture to caſt an eye upon thee—And 'O that it were in my power, in mercy 'to my ſex, to look thee firſt into ſhame 'and remorſe, and then into death!

This violent tragedy-ſpeech, and the high manner in which ſhe uttered it, had it's deſired effect. I looked upon the women, and upon her by turns, with a pitying eye, and they ſhook their wiſe heads, and beſought me to retire, and her to lie down to compoſe herſelf.

This hurricane, like other hurricanes, was preſently allayed by a ſhower. She threw herſelf once more on her armed chair, and begged pardon of the women for her paſſionate exceſs; but not of me: yet I was in hopes, that when compliments were ſtirring, I ſhould have come in for my ſhare.

'Indeed, ladies,' ſaid I, [with aſſurance enough, thou'lt ſay] 'this violence 'is not natural to my beloved's temper '—Miſapprehenſion—' 'Miſapprehenſion, wretch!—And 'want I excuſes from thee!'

By what a ſcorn was every lovely feature agitated!

Then turning her face from me, 'I 'have not patience, O thou guileful be-'trayer, to look upon thee! Be gone! 'Be gone! With a face ſo unbluſhing, 'how dareſt thou appear in my pre-'ſence?'

I thought then that the character of a huſband obliged me to be angry.

'You may one day, Madam, repent 'this treatment:—by my ſoul you may. 'You know I have not deſerved it of 'you—You know I have not.'

'Do I know you have not?—Wretch! 'Do I know—'

'You do, Madam—And never did 'a man of my figure and conſideration' [I thought it was proper to throw that in] 'meet with ſuch treatment—'

She lifted up her hands; indignation kept her ſilent.

'But all of a piece with the charge 'you bring againſt me of deſpoiling you 'of all ſuccour and help, of making you 'poor and low, and with other unprece-'dented language. I will only ſay, be-'fore theſe two gentlewomen, that ſince 'it muſt be ſo, and ſince your former 'eſteem for me is turned into ſo rivetted 'an averſion, I will ſoon, very ſoon, 'make you entirely eaſy. I will be gone: '—I will leave you to your own fate, as 'you call it; and may that be happy! '—Only, that I may not appear to be a 'ſpoiler, a robber indeed, let me know 'whither I ſhall ſend your apparel, and 'every-thing that belongs to you, and I 'will ſend it.'

'Send it to this place; and aſſure me, 'that you will never moleſt me more; 'never more come near me; and that 'is all I aſk of you.'

'I will do ſo, Madam,' ſaid I, with a dejected air. 'But did I ever think I 'ſhould be ſo indifferent to you!—How'ever,

'ever, you must permit me to insist on 'your reading this letter; and on your 'seeing Captain Tomlinson, and hear-'ing what he has to say from your un-'cle. He will be here by-and-by.'

'Don't trifle with me,' said she, in an imperious tone. 'Do as you offer. I 'will not receive any letters from your 'hands. If I see Captain Tomlinson, 'it shall be on his own account; not 'on yours. You tell me you will send 'me my apparel: if you would have 'me believe any-thing you say, let this 'be the test of your sincerity—Leave me 'now, and send my things.'

The women stared. They did nothing but stare; and appeared to be more and more at a loss what to make of the matter between us.

I pretended to be going from her in a pet: but when I had got to the door, I turned back; and, as if I had recollected myself, 'One word more, my 'dearest creature!—Charming even in 'your anger!—O my fond soul!' said I, turning half-round, and pulling out my handkerchief.

I believe, Jack, my eyes did glisten a little. I have no doubt but they did. The women pitied me. Honest souls! They shewed, that they had each of them a handkerchief as well as I. So, hast thou not observed (to give a familiar illustration) every man in a company of a dozen or more, obligingly pull out his watch, when some one has asked, 'What's o'clock?' As each man of a like number, if one talks of his beard, will fall to stroking his chin with his four fingers and thumb.

'One word, only, Madam,' repeated I, (as soon as my voice had recovered it's tone:) 'I have represented to Cap-'tain Tomlinson in the most favoura-'ble light the cause of our present mis-'understanding. You know what your 'uncle insists upon; and with which you 'have acquiesced. The letter in my 'hand' [and again I offered it to her] 'will acquaint you with what you have 'to apprehend from your brother's ac-'tive malice.'

She was going to speak in a high accent, putting the letter from her with an open palm—'Nay, hear me out, Madam '—The captain, you know, has report-'ed our marriage to two different per-'sons. It is come to your brother's 'ears. My own relations have also 'heard of it. Letters were brought me 'from town this morning from Lady 'Betty Lawrance and Miss Montague. 'Here they are.' [I pulled them out of my pocket, and offered them to her, with that of the captain; but she held back her still open palm, that she might not receive them.] 'Reflect, Madam, I be-'seech you reflect, upon the fatal con-'sequences with which this your high 'resentment may be attended.'

'Ever since I knew you,' said she, 'I 'have been in a wilderness of doubt and 'error. I bless God that I am out of 'your hands. I will transact for my-'self what relates to myself. I dismiss 'all your solicitude for me. Am I 'not my own mistress?—Have you any 'title—'

The women stared, ['The devil stare 'ye!' thought I. 'Can you do nothing 'but stare?'] It was high time to stop her here.

I raised my voice to drown hers—'You used, my dearest creature, to have 'a tender and apprehensive heart—You 'never had so much reason for such a 'one as now—'

'Let me judge for myself upon what 'I shall see, not upon what I shall hear '—Do you think I shall ever—'

I dreaded her going on—'I must be 'heard, Madam,' raising my voice still higher. 'You must let me read one pa-'ragraph or two of this letter to you, 'if you will not read it yourself.'

'Be gone from me, man!—Be gone 'from me with thy letters! What pre-'tence hast thou for tormenting me thus '—What right—What title!'

'Dearest creature, what questions you 'ask! Questions that you can as well 'answer yourself.'

'I can, I will—And thus I answer 'them—

Still louder raised I my voice. She was overborne. 'Sweet soul! It would 'be hard,' thought I, [and yet I was very angry with her] 'if such a spirit as 'thine cannot be brought to yield to 'such a one as mine!'

I lowered my voice on her silence. All gentle, all intreative, my accent: my head bowed; one hand held out; the other on the honest heart:—'For 'Heaven's sake, my dearest creature, 'resolve to see Captain Tomlinson with 'temper. He would have come along 'with me: but I was willing to try to 'soften your mind first on this fatal mis-'apprehension; and this for the sake of 'your own wishes: for what is it other-'wise to me whether your friends are or 'are not reconciled to us? Do I want 'any favour from them?*—For your own

'mind's ſake, therefore, fruſtrate not 'Capt. Tomlinſon's negociation. That 'worthy gentleman will be here in 'the afternoon.—Lady Betty will be in 'town with my couſin Montague, in a 'day or two. They will be your vi-'ſitors. I beſeech you do not carry 'this miſunderſtanding ſo far, as that 'Lord M. and Lady Betty, and Lady 'Sarah may know it.'—[How conſider-able this made me look to the women!]—'Lady Betty will not let you reſt till 'you conſent to accompany her to her 'own ſeat—And to that lady may you 'ſafely entruſt your cauſe.'

Again, upon my pauſing a moment, ſhe was going to break out. I liked not the turn of her countenance, nor the tone of her voice—'And thinkeſt thou, 'baſe wretch!—were the words ſhe did utter. I again raiſed my voice and drowned hers—'Baſe wretch, Madam?—'You know that I have not deſerved 'the violent names you have called me. 'Words ſo opprobrious! from a mind ſo 'gentle!—But this treatment is from 'you, Madam!—From you, whom I love 'more than my own ſoul!—By that 'ſoul, I ſwear that I do.'—[The women looked upon each other. They ſeemed pleaſed with my ardour. Women, whether wives, maids, or widows, love ardours. Even Miſs Howe, thou knoweſt, ſpeaks up for ardours.]—'Ne-'verthleſs, I muſt ſay, that you have 'carried matters too far for the occaſion. 'I ſee you hate me.'

She was juſt going to ſpeak—'If we 'are to ſeparate for ever,' in a ſtrong and ſolemn voice, proceeded I, 'this 'iſland ſhall not long be troubled with 'me. Mean time, only be pleaſed to 'give theſe letters a peruſal, and con-'ſider what is to be ſaid to your uncle's 'friend, and what he is to ſay to your 'uncle. Any-thing will I come into, '(renounce me if you will) that ſhall 'make for your peace, and for the re-'conciliation your heart was ſo lately ſet 'upon. But I humbly conceive, that it 'is neceſſary, that you ſhould come into 'better temper with me, were it but 'to give a favourable appearance to 'what has paſſed, and weight to any fu-'ture application to your friends, in what-'ever way you ſhall think proper to 'make it.'

I then put the letters into her lap, and retired into the next apartment with a low bow and a very ſolemn air.

I was ſoon followed by the two women. Mrs. Moore withdrew to give the fair perverſe time to read them: Miſs Rawlins for the ſame reaſon; and becauſe ſhe was ſent for home.

The widow beſought her ſpeedy return. I joined in the ſame requeſt; until ſhe was ready enough to promiſe to oblige us.

I excuſed myſelf to Mrs. Moore for the diſguiſe I had appeared in at firſt, and for the ſtory I had invented. I told her, that I held myſelf obliged to ſatisfy her for the whole floor we were upon; and for an upper-room for my ſervant; and that for a month certain.

She made many ſcruples, and begged ſhe might not be urged on this head, till ſhe had conſulted Miſs Rawlins.

I conſented; but told her, that ſhe had taken my earneſt; and I hoped there was no room for diſpute.

Juſt then Miſs Rawlins returned, with an air of eager curioſity; and having been told, what had paſſed between Mrs. Moore and me, ſhe gave herſelf airs of office immediately: which I humoured, plainly perceiving, that if I had her with me, I had the other.

She wiſhed, if there were time for it, and if it were not quite impertinent in her to deſire it, that I would give Mrs. Moore and her a brief hiſtory of an affair, which, as ſhe ſaid, bore the face of novelty, myſtery, and ſurprize: for ſometimes it looked to her as if we were married; at other times, that point appeared doubtful; and yet the lady did not abſolutely deny it; but, upon the whole, thought herſelf highly injured.

I ſaid, That ours was a very particular caſe: that were I to acquaint them with it, ſome part of it would hardly appear credible. But, however, as they ſeemed to be perſons of diſcretion, I would give them a brief account of the whole; and this in ſo plain and ſincere a manner, that it ſhould clear up to their ſatisfaction every-thing that had paſſed, or might hereafter paſs between us.

They ſat down by me, and threw every feature of their faces into attention. I was reſolved to go as near the truth as poſſible, leaſt any-thing ſhould drop from my ſpouſe to impeach my veracity; and yet keep in view what paſſed at the Flaſk.

It is neceſſary, although thou knoweſt my whole ſtory, and a good deal of my views, that thou ſhouldſt be apprized of the ſubſtance of what I told them.

I gave them, in as conciſe a manner as I was able, the hiſtory of our families, fortunes, alliances, antipathies; her brother's and mine particularly. I averred the truth of our private marrance. The captain's letter, which I will inclose, will give thee my reasons for that. And besides, the women might have proposed a parlon to me by way of compromise. I told them the condition my spouse had made me swear to; and how much she held me, in order, I said, to induce me the sooner to be reconciled to her relations.

I owned, that this restraint made me sometimes ready to fly out. And Mrs. Moore was so good as to declare, that she did not much wonder at it.

'Thou art a very good sort of a wo-'man, Mrs. Moore,' thought I.

As Miss Howe has actually detected our mother; and might possibly find some way still to acquaint her friend with her discoveries; I thought it proper to prepossess them in favour of Mrs. Sinclair and her two nieces.

I said, They were gentlewomen born; that they had not bad hearts; that indeed my spouse did not love them; they having once jointly taken the liberty to blame her for her over-niceness with regard to me. People, I said, even good people, who knew themselves to be guilty of a fault they had no inclination to mend, were too often least patient, when told of it; as they could less bear than others, to be thought indifferently of.

Too often the case they owned.

'Mrs. Sinclair's house was a very 'handsome house, and fit to receive the 'first quality.' [True enough, Jack!] 'Mrs. Sinclair was a woman very easy 'in her circumstances: a widow gentle-'woman — as you, Mrs. Moore, are. 'Lets lodgings—as you, Mrs. Moore, 'do. Once had better prospects—as 'you, Mrs Moore, may have had: the 'relict of Colonel Sinclair: you, Mrs. 'Moore, might know Colonel Sinclair '—He had lodgings at Hampstead.'

She had heard of the name.

'O, he was related to the best families 'in Scotland: and his widow is not to 'be reflected upon, because she lets 'lodgings, you know, Mrs. Moore— 'You know, Miss Rawlins.'

Very true—and, very true: and they must needs say, it did not look quite so pretty in such a lady, as my spouse, to be so censorious.

'A foundation here,' thought I, 'to 'procure these womens help to get back 'the fugitive, or their connivance at least 'at my doing so; as well as for antici-'pating any future information from 'Miss Howe.'

I gave them a character of that virago: and intimated, that for a head to contrive mischief, and a heart to execute it, she had hardly her equal in her sex.

To this Miss Howe it was, Mrs. Moore said, she supposed, that my spouse was so desirous to dispatch a man and horse, by day-dawn, with a letter she wrote before she went to bed last night; proposing to stay no longer than till she had received an answer to it.

'The very same,' said I. 'I knew she 'would have immediate recourse to her. 'I should have been but too happy, 'could I have prevented such a letter 'from passing, or so to have managed, 'as to have it given into Mrs. Howe's 'hands, instead of her daughter's. 'Women who had lived some time in 'the world knew better than to encou-'rage such skittish pranks in young 'wives.'

Let me just stop to tell thee, while it is in my head, that I have since given Will his cue to find out where the man lives who is gone with the fair fugitive's letter; and, if possible, to see him on his return, before he sees her.

I told the women, I despaired that it would ever be better with us while Miss Howe had so strange an ascendency over my spouse, and remained herself unmarried; and until the reconciliation with her friends could be effected; or a still happier event—'as I should think 'it, who am the last male of my family; 'and which my foolish vow, and her 'rigour, had hitherto——'

Here I stopt, and looked modest, turning my diamond-ring round my finger: while Goody Moore looked mighty significant, calling it a very particular case: and the maiden fanned away, and primmed and pursed, to shew, that what I said needed no farther explanation.

I told them the occasion of our present difference: I avowed the reality of the fire: but owned, that I would have made no scruple of breaking the unnatural oath she had bound me in, (having an husband's right on my side) when she was so accidentally frighted into my arms: and I blamed myself excessively, that I did not; since she thought fit to carry her resentment so high, and had the injustice to suppose the fire to be a contrivance of mine.

'Nay, for that matter,' Mrs. Moore said—as we were married, and Madam was so odd—'Every gentleman would 'not—— And stopt there Mrs. Moore.

'To suppose I should have recourse 'to such a poor contrivance,' said I, 'when I saw the dear creature every 'hour——'

'hour ——' Was not this a bold put, Jack?

'A moſt extraordinary caſe, truly!' cried the maiden; fanning, yet coming in with her 'Well buts; and her ſitting 'Pray Sirs!' and her reſtraining 'Enough Sirs!'—flying from the queſtion to the queſtion; her ſeat now-and-then uneaſy, for fear my want of delicacy ſhould hurt her abundant modeſty; and yet it was difficult to ſatisfy her ſuper-abundant curioſity.

My beloved's jealouſy, [and jealouſy of itſelf, to female minds, accounts for a thouſand unaccountableneſſes] and the imputation of her half-phrenzy brought upon her by her father's wicked curſe, and by the previous perſecutions ſhe had undergone from all her family, were what I dwelt upon, in order to provide againſt what might happen.

In ſhort, I owned againſt myſelf moſt of the offences which I did not doubt but ſhe would charge me with in their hearing: and as every cauſe has a black and white ſide, I gave the worſt parts of our ſtory the gentleſt turn. And when I had done, acquainted them with ſome of the contents of that letter of Captain Tomlinſon which I had left with the lady. I concluded with cautioning them to be guarded againſt the enquiries of James Harlowe, and of Captain Singleton, or of any ſailor-looking men.

This thou wilt ſee from the letter itſelf was neceſſary to be done. Here, therefore, thou mayeſt read it. And a charming letter to my purpoſe wilt thou find it to be, if thou giveſt the leaſt attention to it's contents.

'TO ROBERT LOVELACE, ESQ.

'DEAR SIR, WED. JUNE 7.

ALTHOUGH I am obliged to be in 'town to-morrow, or next day at far-'theſt, yet I would not diſpenſe with writing to you, by one of my ſervants, '(whom I ſend up before me upon a par-'ticular occaſion) in order to adviſe 'you, that it is probable you will hear from 'ſome of your own relations on your [*ſuppo-'ſed] nuptials. One of the perſons (Mr. 'Lilburne by name) to whom I hinted 'my belief of your marriage, happens 'to be acquainted with Mr. Spurrier, 'Lady Betty Lawrance's ſteward; and '(not being under any reſtriction) men-'tioned it to Mr. Spurrier, and he to 'Lady Betty, as a thing certain: and 'this (though I have not the honour to 'be perſonally known to her ladyſhip) 'brought on an enquiry from her lady-'ſhip to me by her gentleman: who 'coming to me in company with Mr. 'Lilburne, I had no way but to con-'firm the report. And I underſtand, 'that Lady Betty takes it amiſs, that ſhe 'was not acquainted with ſo deſirable 'a piece of news from yourſelf.

'Her ladyſhip, it ſeems, has buſineſs 'that calls her to town, [and you will poſ-'ſibly chuſe to put her right. If you 'do, it will, I preſume, be in confidence; 'that nothing may perſpire from your 'own family to contradict what I have 'given out.]

'[I have ever been of opinion, That 'truth ought to be ſtrictly adhered to on all 'occaſions: and am concerned that I have '(though with ſo good a view) depart-'ed from my old maxim. But my dear 'friend Mr. John Harlowe would have 'it ſo. Yet I never knew a departure 'of this kind a ſingle departure. But, 'to make the beſt of it now, allow me, 'Sir, to beg the lady, as ſoon as poſ-'ble, to authenticate the report given 'out.] When both you and the lady 'join in the acknowledgement of your 'marriage, it will be impertinent in any-'one to be inquiſitive as to the day or 'week: [and, if as privately celebrated 'as you intend, (while the gentlewomen 'with whom you lodge are properly in-'ſtructed, as you ſay they are, and who 'actually believe you were married long 'ago) who ſhall be able to give a contra-'diction to my report?]

'And yet it is very probable, that 'minute enquiries will be made; and 'this is what renders precaution neceſ-'ſary. For Mr. James Harlowe will not 'believe that you are married; and is 'ſure, he ſays, that you both lived to-'gether when Mr. Hickman's applica-'tion was made to Mr. John Harlowe: 'and if you lived together any time un-'married, he infers from your character, 'Mr. Lovelace, that it is not probable, 'that you would ever marry. And he 'leaves it to his two uncles to decide, if 'you even ſhould be married, whether 'there be not room to believe, that his 'ſiſter was firſt diſhonoured; and if ſo, to 'judge of the title ſhe will have to their 'favour, or to the forgiveneſs of any 'of her family. I believe, Sir, this part 'of my letter had beſt be kept from the 'lady.

'Young Mr. Harlowe is reſolved to

* What is between hooks [] thou mayeſt ſuppoſe, Jack, I ſunk upon the women, in the account I gave them of the contents of this letter.

'find this out, and to come at his ſiſter's ſecret likewiſe; and for that purpoſe 'sets out to-morrow, as I am well in-'formed, with a large attendance armed; 'and Mr. Solmes is to be of the party. And 'what makes him the more earneſt to 'find it out, is this: Mr. John Harlowe 'has told the whole family that he will 'alter and new ſettle his will. Mr. 'Antony Harlowe is reſolved to do the 'ſame by his; for, it ſeems, he has 'given over all thoughts of changing 'his condition, having lately been diſap-'pointed in a view he had of that ſort with 'Mrs. Howe. Theſe two brothers gene-'rally act in concert; and Mr. James 'Harlowe dreads (and let me tell you, 'that he has reaſon for it, on my Mr. 'Harlowe's account) that his younger 'ſiſter will be, at laſt, more benefited 'than he wiſhes for, by the alteration 'intended. He has already been en-'deavouring to ſound his uncle Harlowe 'on the ſubject; and wanted to know 'whether any new application had been 'made to him on his ſiſter's part. Mr. 'Harlowe avoided a direct anſwer, and 'expreſſed his wiſhes for a general re-'conciliation, and his hopes that his 'niece were married. This offended 'the furious young man, and he re-'minded his uncle of engagements they 'had all entered into at his ſiſter's going 'away, not to be reconciled but by general 'conſent.

'Mr. John Harlowe complains to me 'often, of the uncontroulableneſs of his 'nephew; and ſays, that now, that the 'young man has not any-body of whoſe 'ſuperior ſenſe he ſtands in awe, he ob-'ſerves not decency in his behaviour to 'any of them. And this makes my Mr. 'Harlowe ſtill more deſirous than ever of 'bringing his younger niece into favour 'again. I will not ſay all I might of 'this young man's extraordinary rapa-'ciouſneſs:—but one would think, 'that theſe graſping men expect to live for 'ever!

'I took the liberty but within theſe 'two hours, to propoſe to ſet on foot '(and offered my cover to) a corre-'ſpondence between my friend, and his 'daughter-niece, as he ſtill ſometimes 'fondly calls her. She was miſtreſs of 'ſo much prudence, I ſaid, that I was 'ſure ſhe could better direct every-'thing to it's deſirable end, than any-'body elſe could. But he ſaid, he did 'not think himſelf entirely at liberty to 'take ſuch a ſtep at preſent; and that it 'was beſt that he ſhould have it in his 'power to ſay, occaſionally, that he had 'not any correſpondence with her, or 'letter from her.

'You will ſee, Sir, from all this, the 'neceſſity of keeping our treaty an ab-'ſolute ſecret; and if the lady has men-'tioned it to her worthy friend, Miſs 'Howe, I hope it is in confidence.

'[And now, Sir, a few lines in anſwer 'to yours of Monday laſt.]

'[Mr. Harlowe was very well pleaſed 'with your readineſs to come into his 'propoſal. But as to what you both de-'ſire, that he will be preſent at the ce-'remony, he ſaid, that his nephew 'watched all his ſteps ſo narrowly, that 'he thought it was not practicable (if 'he were inclinable) to oblige you: but 'that he conſented with all his heart, 'that I ſhould be the perſon whom he 'ſtipulated ſhould be privately preſent 'at the ceremony on his part.]

'[However, I think, I have an expe-'dient for this, if your lady continues 'to be very deſirous of her uncle's pre-'ſence; (except he ſhould be more de-'termined than his anſwer to me ſeemed 'to import) of which I ſhall acquaint 'you, and perhaps of what he ſays to it, 'when I have the pleaſure to ſee you in town. 'But, indeed, I think you have no time 'to loſe. Mr. Harlowe is impatient to 'hear, that you are actually one; and 'I hope I may carry him down word, 'when I leave you next, that I ſaw the 'ceremony performed.]

'[If any obſtacle ariſes from the lady, '(from you it cannot) I ſhall be tempted 'to think a little hardly of her punctilio.]

'Mr. Harlowe hopes, Sir, that you 'will rather take pains to avoid, than to 'meet, this violent young man. He has 'the better opinion of you, let me tell 'you, Sir, from the account I gave him 'of your moderation and politeneſs; 'neither of which are qualities with his 'nephew. But we have all of us ſomething 'to amend.

'You cannot imagine how dearly my 'friend ſtill loves this excellent niece of 'his—I will give you an inſtance of it, 'which affected me a good deal—"If "once more," ſaid he, (the laſt time 'but one we were together) "I can but "ſee this ſweet child gracing the upper-"end of my table, as miſtreſs of my "houſe, in my allotted month; all the reſt "of my family preſent but as her gueſts; "for ſo I formerly would have it; and "had her mother's conſent for it—" There 'he ſtopt; for he was forced to turn his 'reverend face from me. Tears ran 'down his cheeks. Fain would he have 'hid them: but he could not—"Yet—

LOVELACE reading LADY BETTY'S
Letter to CLARISSA.

Published by Alex.r Hogg. Aug.t 17.th 1793.

" yet," said he—" how—how"—[Poor ' gentleman, he perfectly sobbed]—" how shall I be able to bear the first " meeting!"

'I bless God I am no hard-hearted 'man, Mr. Lovelace: my eyes shewed 'to my worthy friend, that he had no 'reason to be ashamed of his humanity 'before me.

'I will put an end to this long epistle. 'Be pleased to make my compliments 'acceptable to the most excellent of wo-'men; as well as believe me to be, dear 'Sir, your faithful friend, and humble ser-'vant, 'ANTONY TOMLINSON.'

During the conversation between me and the women, I had planted myself at the farther end of the apartment we were in, over-against the door, which was open; and opposite to the lady's chamber door, which was shut. I spoke so low, that it was impossible for her, at that distance, to hear what we said; and in this situation I could see if her door opened.

I told the women, that what I had mentioned to my spouse of Lady Betty's coming to town with her niece Montague, and of their intention to visit my beloved, whom they had never seen, nor she them, was real; and that I expected news of their arrival every hour. I then shewed them copies of the other two letters, which I had left with her; the one from Lady Betty, the other from my cousin Montague.—And here thou mayest read them if thou wilt.

Eternally reproaching, eternally upbraiding me, are my impertinent relations. But they are fond of occasions to find fault with me. Their love, their love, Jack, and their dependence on my known good-humour, are their inducements.

'TO ROBERT LOVELACE, ESQ.

'WED. MORN. JUNE 7.

'DEAR NEPHEW,

'I UNDERSTAND, that at length 'all our wishes are answered in your 'happy marriage. But I think, we 'might as well have heard of it directly 'from you, as from the round-about 'way by which we have been made ac-'quainted with it. Methinks, Sir, the 'power and the will we have to oblige 'you, should not expose us the more to 'your slights and negligence. My bro-'ther had set his heart upon giving to 'you the wife we have all so long wished 'you to have. But if you were actually 'married at the time you made him that 'request, (supposing, perhaps, that his 'gout would not let him attend you) it is but 'like you.—If your lady had her reasons 'to wish it to be private while the dif-'ferences between her family and self 'continue, you might nevertheless have 'communicated it to us with that restric-'tion; and we should have forborne 'the publick manifestations of our joy, 'upon an event we have so long desired.

'The distant way we have come to 'know it is by my steward; who is ac-'quainted with a friend of Captain Tom-'linson, to whom that gentleman reveal-'ed it: and he, it seems, had it from 'yourself and lady, with such circum-'stances as leave it not to be doubted.

'I am, indeed, very much disobliged 'with you: so is Lady Sarah. But I 'shall have a very speedy opportunity 'to tell you so in person; being obliged 'to go to town on my old Chancery-'affair. My cousin Leeson, who is, it 'seems, removed to Albemarle Street, 'has notice of it. I shall be at her house, 'where I bespeak your attendance on 'Sunday night. I have written to my 'cousin Charlotte for either her, or her 'sister, to meet me at Reading, and ac-'company me to town. I shall stay but 'a few days; my business being matter 'of form only. On my return I shall 'pop upon Lord M. at M. Hall, to see 'in what way his last fit has left him.

'Mean time, having told you my mind 'on your negligence, I cannot help con-'gratulating you both on the occasion—'Your fair lady particularly, upon her 'entrance into a family which is prepar-'ed to admire and love her.

'My principal intention of writing 'to you (dispensing with the necessary 'punctilio) is, that you may acquaint 'my dear new niece, that I will not be 'denied the honour of her company 'down with me into Oxfordshire. I 'understand, that your proposed house 'and equipages cannot be soon ready. 'She shall be with me till they are. I 'insist upon it. This shall make all up. 'My house shall be her own. My ser-'vants and equipages hers.

'Lady Sarah, who has not been out 'of her own house for months, will 'oblige me with her company for a week, 'in honour of a niece so dearly beloved, 'as I am sure, she will be of us all.

'Being but in lodgings in town, nei-'ther you nor your lady can require 'much preparation.

'Some time on Monday I hope to at-'tend the dear young lady, to make her 'my compliments; and to receive her

'apology

'apology for your negligence: which, 'and her going down with me, as I ſaid 'before, ſhall be full ſatisfaction. Mean 'time, God bleſs her for her courage; '[Tell her I ſay ſo] and bleſs you both 'in each other; and that will be happi-'neſs to us all—particularly to your tru-'ly affectionate aunt,

'ELIZ. LAWRANCE.'

'TO ROBERT LOVELACE, ESQ.

'DEAR COUSIN,

'AT laſt, as we underſtand, there is 'ſome hope of you. Now does my good 'lord run over his bead-roll of pro-'verbs; of black oxen, wild oats, long 'lanes, and ſo-forth.

'Now, couſin, ſay I, is your time 'come; and you will be no longer, I 'hope, an infidel either to the power or 'excellence of the ſex you have pretend-'ed hitherto ſo much to undervalue; 'nor a ridiculer or ſcoffer at an inſtitu-'tion which all ſober people reverence, 'and all rakes, ſooner or later, are 'brought to reverence, or to wiſh they 'had.

'I want to ſee how you become your 'ſilken fetters: whether the charming 'yoke ſits light upon your ſhoulders. 'If with ſuch a ſweet yoke-fellow it does 'not, my lord, and my ſiſter, as well as 'I, think that you will deſerve a cloſer 'tie about your neck.

'His lordſhip is very much diſpleaſed, 'that you have not written him word of 'the day, the hour, the manner, and 'every-thing. But I aſk him, How he 'can already expect any mark of defe-'rence or politeneſs from you? He muſt 'ſtay, I tell him, till that ſign of reform-'ation, among others, appear from the 'influence and example of your lady: but 'that, if ever you will be good for any-'thing, it will be quickly ſeen. And, 'O couſin, what a vaſt, vaſt journey 'have you to take from the dreary land 'of libertiniſm, through the bright pro-'vince of reformation into the ſerene 'kingdom of happineſs!—You had need 'to loſe no time. You have many a 'weary ſtep to tread, before you can 'overtake thoſe travellers, who ſet out 'for it from a leſs remote quarter. But 'you have a charming pole-ſtar to guide 'you, that's your advantage. I wiſh 'you joy of it: and as I have never yet 'expected any highly complaiſant thing 'from you, I make no ſcruple to begin firſt; 'but it is purely, I muſt tell you, in 'reſpect to my new couſin; whoſe ac-'ceſſion into our family we moſt heartily 'congratulate and rejoice in.

'I have a letter from Lady Betty. 'She commands either my attendance 'or my ſiſter's at Reading, to proceed 'with her to town, to couſin Leſton's. 'She puts Lord M. in hopes, that ſhe 'ſhall certainly bring down with her 'our lovely new relation; for ſhe ſays, 'ſhe will not be denied. His lordſhip 'is the willinger to let me be the per-'ſon, as I am in a manner wild to ſee 'her; my ſiſter having two years ago 'had that honour at Sir Robert Bid-'dulph's. So get ready to accompany 'us in our return; except your lady has 'objections ſtrong enough to ſatisfy us 'all. Lady Sarah longs to ſee her; and 'ſays, This acceſſion to the family will 'ſupply to it the loſs of her beloved 'daughter.

'I ſhall ſoon, I hope, pay my com-'pliments to the dear lady in perſon: ſo 'have nothing to add, but that I am your 'old mad playfellow and couſin,

'CHARLOTTE MONTAGUE.'

The women having read the copies of theſe two letters, I thought that I might then threaten and ſwagger—'But very 'little heart have I,' ſaid I, 'to encou-'rage ſuch a viſit from Lady Betty and 'Miſs Montague to my ſpouſe. For 'after all, I am tired out with her ſtrange 'ways. She is not what ſhe was, and '(as I told her in your hearing, ladies) 'I will leave this plaguy iſland, though 'the place of my birth, and though the 'ſtake I have in it is very conſiderable; 'and go and reſide in France or Italy, 'and never think of myſelf as a married 'man, nor live like one.'

'O dear!' ſaid one.

'That would be a ſad thing!' ſaid the other.

'Nay, Madam,' [Turning to Mrs. Moore]—'Indeed, Madam,' [To Miſs Rawlins]—'I am quite deſperate. I 'can no longer bear ſuch uſage. I have 'had the good fortune to be favoured 'by the ſmiles of very fine ladies, though 'I ſay it,' [and I looked modeſt] 'both 'abroad and at home.'—[Thou knoweſt 'this to be true, Jack] 'With regard to 'my ſpouſe here, I had but one hope 'left; (for as to the reconciliation with 'her friends, I ſcorn them all too much 'to value that, but for her ſake) and 'that was, that if it pleaſed God to bleſs 'us with children, ſhe might entirely re-'cover her uſual ſerenity; and we might 'then be happy. But the reconciliation 'her heart is ſo much ſet upon, is now, 'as I hinted before, entirely hopeleſs—'Made ſo, by this raſh ſtep of hers, and

'by

'by the rather temper she is in; since, '(as you will believe) her brother and 'sister, when they come to know it, will 'make a fine handle of it against us both '—affecting, as they do at present, to 'disbelieve our marriage—and the dear 'creature herself too ready to counte-'nance such a disbelief—as nothing more 'than the ceremony—as nothing more— 'hem!—as nothing more than the ceremo-'ny—'

Here, as thou wilt perceive, I was bashful; for Miss Rawlins, by her preparatory primness, put me in mind, that it was proper to be so.

I turned half round; then facing the fan-player, and the matron—'You your-'selves, ladies, knew not what to believe 'till now, that I have told you our story: 'and I do assure you, that I shall not 'give myself the same trouble to con-'vince people I hate; people from whom 'I neither expect nor desire any favour; 'and who are determined not to be con-'vinced. And what, pray, must be the 'issue, when her uncle's friend comes, 'although he seems to be a truly worthy 'man? Is it not natural for him to say, "To what purpose, Mr. Lovelace, should "I endeavour to bring about a reconci-"liation between Mrs. Lovelace and her "friends, by means of her elder uncle, "when a good understanding is wanting "between yourselves?"—A fair infer-'ence, Mrs. Moore!—A fair inference, 'Miss Rawlins!—And here is the un-'happiness—Till she is reconciled to 'them, this cursed oath, in her notion, 'is binding.'

The women seemed moved; for I spoke with great earnestness, though low—And besides, they love to have their sex, and it's favours, appear of importance to us. They shook their deep heads at each other, and looked sorrowful: and this moved my tender heart too.

''Tis an unheard of case, ladies—Had 'she not preferred me to all mankind—' There I stopped—'And that,' resumed I, feeling for my handkerchief, 'is what 'staggered Captain Tomlinson when he 'heard of her flight; who, the last time 'he saw us together, saw the most affec-'tionate couple on earth!—The most 'affectionate couple on earth!'—in the accent-grievous, repeated I.

Out then I pulled my handkerchief, and putting it to my eyes, arose and walked to the window—'It makes me 'weaker than a woman! Did I not love 'her as never man loved his wife—' [I have no doubt but I do, Jack.]

There again I stopt; and resuming—'Charming creature, as you see she is, 'I wish I had never beheld her face! 'Excuse me, ladies;' traversing the room. And having rubbed my eyes till I supposed them red, I turned to the women; and, pulling out my letter-case, 'I will shew you one letter—Here it is—'Read it, Miss Rawlins, if you please '—It will confirm to you, how much all 'my family are prepared to admire her. 'I am freely treated in it;—so I am in 'the two others: but after what I have 'told you, nothing need be a secret to 'you two.'

She took it with an air of eager curiosity, and looked at the seal, ostentatiously coroneted; and at the superscription, reading out, 'To Robert Lovelace, 'Esq.'—'Aye, Madam—Aye, Miss—'that's my name,' [giving myself an air, though I had told it to them before] 'I 'am not ashamed of it. My wife's maid-'en name—Unmarried name, I should 'rather say—fool that I am!'—and I rubbed my cheek for vexation [Fool enough in conscience, Jack!] 'was Har-'lowe—Clarissa Harlowe—You heard 'me call her my Clarissa.'

'I did—but thought it to be a feigned 'or love-name,' said Miss Rawlins.

I wonder what is Miss Rawlins's love-name, Jack. Most of the fair romancers have in their early womanhood chosen love-names. No parson ever gave more real names, than I have given fictitious ones. And to very good purpose: many a sweet dear has answered me a letter for the sake of owning a name which her godmother never gave her.

No—It was her real name, I said.

I bid her read out the whole letter. 'If the spelling be not exact, Miss Raw-'lins,' said I, 'you will excuse it; the 'writer is a lord. But perhaps, I may 'not shew it to my spouse; for if those 'I have left with her have no effect upon 'her, neither will this: and I shall not 'care to expose my lord M. to her scorn. 'Indeed I begin to be quite careless of 'consequences.'

Miss Rawlins, who could not but be pleased with this mark of my confidence, looked as if she pitied me.

And here thou mayest read the letter, No. III.

'TO ROBERT LOVELACE, ESQ.

'M. HALL, WEDN. JUNE 7.

'COUSIN LOVELACE,

'I THINK you might have found 'time to let us know of your nuptials 'being actually solemnized. I might 'have

'have expected this piece of civility from 'you. But perhaps the ceremony was 'performed at the very time that you 'asked me to be your lady's father—'But I shall be angry if I proceed in 'my guesses—And little said is soon amend-'ed.

'But I can tell you, that Lady Betty 'Lawrance, whatever Lady Sarah does, 'will not so soon forgive you, as I have 'done. Women resent slights longer than 'men. You that know so much of the 'sex (I speak it not however to your 'praise) might have known that. But 'never was you before acquainted with 'a lady of such an amiable character. 'I hope there will be but one soul be-'tween you. I have before now said, 'that I will disinherit you, and settle all 'I can upon her, if you prove not a good 'husband to her.

'May this marriage be crowned with 'a great many fine boys (I desire no 'girls) to build up again a family so an-'cient! The first boy shall take my sur-'name by act of parliament. That is 'my will.

Lady Betty and niece Charlotte will 'be in town about business before you 'know where you are. They long to pay 'their compliments to your fair bride. 'I suppose you will hardly be at the 'Lawn when they get to town; because 'Greme informs me, you have sent no 'orders there for your lady's accommo-'dation.

'Pritchard has all things in readiness 'for signing. I will take no advantage 'of your slights. Indeed I am too much 'used to them—More praise to my pa-'tience, than to your complaisance, how-'ever.

'One reason for Lady Betty's going 'up, as I may tell you under the rose, is 'to buy some suitable presents for Lady 'Sarah and all of us to make on this 'agreeable occasion.

'We would have blazed it away, could 'we have had timely notice, and thought 'it would have been agreeable to all 'round. The like occasions don't happen 'every day.

'My most affectionate compliments 'and congratulations to my new niece, 'conclude me, for the present, in violent 'pain, that with all your heroicalness 'would make you mad, your truly affec-'tionate uncle, M.'

This letter clench'd the nail. Not but that, Miss Rawlins said, she saw I had been a wild gentleman; and, truly, she thought so, the moment she beheld me. They began to intercede for my spouse (so nicely had I turned the tables;) and that I would not go abroad, and disap-point a reconciliation so much wished for on one side, and such desirable pros-pects on the other in my own family.

'Who knows,' thought I to myself, 'but more may come of this plot, than 'I had even promised myself? What a 'happy man shall I be, if these women 'can be brought to join to carry my 'marriage into consummation!

'Ladies, you are exceeding good to 'us both. I should have some hopes, 'if my unhappily nice spouse could be 'brought to dispense with the unnatural 'oath she has laid me under. You see 'what my case is. Do you think I may 'not insist upon her absolving me from 'this abominable oath? Will you be so 'good, as to give your advice, that one 'apartment may serve for a man and 'his wife at the hour of retirement?'—Modestly put, Belford!—And let me here observe, that few rakes would find a language so decent as to engage modest women to talk with him in, upon such subjects.

They both simpered, and looked upon one another.

These subjects always make women simper, at least. No need but of the most delicate hints to them. A man who is gross in a woman's company, ought to be knocked down with a club: for, like so many musical instruments, touch but a single wire, and the dear souls are sensible all over.

'To be sure,' Miss Rawlins learnedly said, playing with her fan, 'a casuist 'would give it, that the matrimonial 'vow ought to supersede any other obli-'gation.'

Mrs. Moore, for her part, was of opi-nion, that, if the lady owned herself to be a wife, she ought to behave like one.

'Whatever be my luck,' thought I, 'with this all-eyed fair one, any other 'woman in the world from fifteen to 'five-and-twenty, would be mine upon 'my own terms before the morning.

'And now, that I may be at hand to 'take all advantages, I will endeavour,' said I to myself, 'to make sure of good 'quarters.'

'I am your lodger, Mrs. Moore, in 'virtue of the earnest I have given you 'for these apartments, and for any one 'you can spare above for my servants. 'Indeed for all you have to spare—for 'who knows what my spouse's brother 'may attempt? I will pay you your own 'demand; and that for a month or two 'certain,

'certain, (board included) as I ſhall or 'ſhall not be your hindrance. Take 'that as a pledge; or in part of pay-'ment.'—Offering her a thirty pound Bank note.

She declined taking it: deſiring ſhe might conſult the lady firſt; adding, that ſhe doubted not my honour; and that ſhe would not let her apartments to any other perſon, whom ſhe knew not ſomething of, while I and the lady were here.

The lady! The lady! from both the womens mouths continually, (which ſtill implied a doubt in their hearts:) and not your ſpouſe, and your lady, Sir.

'I never met with ſuch women,' thought I:—'ſo thoroughly convinced 'but this moment, yet already doubt-'ing—I am afraid I have a couple of 'ſcepticks to deal with.'

I knew no reaſon, I ſaid, for my wife to object to my lodging in the ſame houſe with her here, any more than in town, at Mrs. Sinclair's. But were ſhe to make ſuch objection, I would not quit poſſeſſion; ſince it was not unlikely, that the ſame freakiſh diſorder which brought her to Hampſtead, might carry her abſolutely out of my knowledge.

They both ſeemed embarraſſed; and looked upon one another; yet with ſuch an air, as if they thought there was reaſon in what I ſaid. And I declared myſelf her boarder, as well as lodger: and dinner time approaching, was not denied to be the former.

LETTER IX.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

I Thought it was now high time to turn my whole mind to my beloved; who had had full leiſure to weigh the contents of the letters I had left with her.

I therefore requeſted Miſs Moore to ſtep in, and deſire to know whether ſhe would be pleaſed to admit me to attend her in her apartment, on occaſion of the letters I had left with her; or whether ſhe would favour me with her company in the dining-room.

Mrs. Moore deſired Miſs Rawlins to accompany her in to the lady. They tapped at the door, and were both admitted.

I cannot but ſtop here for one minute, to remark, though againſt myſelf, upon the ſecurity which innocence gives, that, nevertheleſs, had better have in it a greater mixture of the ſerpent than the dove. For here, heedleſs of all I could ſay behind her back, becauſe ſhe was ſatisfied with her own worthineſs, ſhe permitted me to go on with my own ſtory, without interruption, to perſons as great ſtrangers to her as to me; and who, as ſtrangers to both, might be ſuppoſed to lean to the ſide moſt injured: and that, as I managed it, was to mine. 'A dear ſilly ſoul,' thought I, at the time, 'to depend upon the goodneſs of 'her own heart, when the heart cannot 'be ſeen into but by it's actions; and 'ſhe, to appearance, a runaway, an 'eloper, from a tender, a moſt indul-'gent huſband!—To neglect to culti-'vate the opinions of individuals, when 'the whole world is governed by ap-'pearance!'

Yet, what can be expected of an angel under twenty?—She has a world of knowledge; knowledge ſpeculative, as I may ſay: but no experience! How ſhould ſhe?—Knowledge by the theory only is a vague uncertain light: a Will o'the Wiſp, which as often miſleads the doubting mind, as puts it right.

There are many things in the world, could a moralizer ſay, that would afford inexpreſſible pleaſure to a reflecting mind, were it not for the mixture they come to us with. To be graver ſtill: I have ſeen parents [Perhaps my own did ſo] who delighted in thoſe very qualities in their children, while young, the natural conſequences of which (too much indulged and encouraged) made them, as they grew up, the plague of their hearts—To bring this home to my preſent purpoſe. I muſt tell thee, that I adore this charming creature for her vigilant prudence; but yet I would not, methinks, wiſh her, by virtue of that prudence, which is, however, neceſſary to carry her above the devices of all the reſt of the world, to be too wiſe for mine.

My revenge, my ſworn revenge, is nevertheleſs (adore her as I will) uppermoſt in my heart—Miſs Howe ſays, that my love is an Herodian love: by my ſoul, that girl's a witch! I am half ſorry to ſay, that I find a pleaſure in playing the tyrant over what I love. Call it an ungenerous pleaſure, if thou wilt: ſofter hearts than mine know it. The women to a woman know it, and ſhew it too, whenever they are truſted with power. And why ſhould it be thought ſtrange, that I, who love them ſo dearly, and ſtudy them ſo much, ſhould catch the infection of them?

LETTER X.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

I Will now give thee the ſubſtance of the dialogue that paſſed between the two women and the lady.

Wonder not, that a perverſe wife makes a liſtening huſband. The event, however, as thou wilt find, juſtified the old obſervation, That liſteners ſeldom hear good of themſelves. Conſcious of their own demerits, if I may gueſs by myſelf, [There's ingenuouſneſs, Jack!] and fearful of cenſure, they ſeldom find themſelves diſappointed. There is ſomething of ſenſe, after all, in theſe proverbs, in theſe phraſes, in this wiſdom of nations.

Mrs. Moore was to be the meſſenger; but Miſs Rawlins began the dialogue.

'Your SPOUSE, Madam—' [Devil! —Only to fiſh for a negative or affirmative declaration,]

Cl. 'My ſpouſe, Madam!'

Miſs R. 'Mr. Lovelace, Madam, avers, that you are married to him; 'and begs admittance, or your compa'ny in the dining-room, to talk upon 'the ſubject of the letters he left with 'you.'

Cl. 'He is a poor wicked wretch. 'Let me beg of you, Madam, to favour 'me with your company as often as poſ'ſible while he is hereabouts, and I re'main here.'

Miſs R. 'I ſhall with pleaſure attend 'you, Madam. But, methinks, I could 'wiſh you would ſee the gentleman, and 'hear what he has to ſay on the ſubject 'of the letters.'

Cl. 'My caſe is a hard, a very hard one —I am quite bewildered!—I know not 'what to do!—I have not a friend in 'the world, that can or will help me! —Yet had none but friends till I knew 'that man!'

Miſs R. 'The gentleman neither looks 'nor talks like a bad man.—Not a very 'bad man; as men go.'

'As men go!—Poor Miſs Rawlins!' thought I—'And doſt thou know, how 'men go?'

Cl. 'O Madam, you know him not! —He can put on the appearance of an 'angel of light; but has a black, a 'very black heart!'

Poor!!

Miſs R. 'I could not have thought it truly!—But men are very deceitful 'now-a-days.'

'Now-a-days!'—A fool!—Have not her hiſtory-books told her, that they 'were always ſo.'

Mrs. Moore, ſighing. 'I have found it 'ſo, I am ſure, to my coſt!'

Who knows but in her time, poor Goody Moore may have met with a Lovelace, or a Belford, or ſome ſuch vile fellow?—My little hare-um-ſcare-um beauty knows not what ſtrange hiſtories every woman living, who has had the leaſt independence of will could tell her, were ſuch to be as communicative as ſhe is.—But here's the thing;—I have given her cauſe enough of offence; but not enough to make her hold her tongue.

Cl. 'As to the letters he has left with 'me, I know not what to ſay to them: '—But am reſolved never to have any'thing to ſay to him.'

Miſs R. 'If, Madam, I may be al'lowed to ſay ſo, I think you carry mat'ters very far.'

Cl. 'Has he been making a bad cauſe 'a good one with you, Madam?—That 'he can do with thoſe who know him 'not. Indeed I heard him talking, 'though not what he ſaid, and am in'different about it. But what account 'does he give of himſelf?'

I was pleaſed to hear this. 'To ar'reſt, to ſtop her paſſion,' thought I, 'in the height of it's career, is a charm'ing preſage.'

Then the buſy Miſs Rawlins fiſhed on, to find out from her either a confirmation or diſavowal of my ſtory.—Was Lord M. my uncle? Did I court her at firſt with the allowance of her friends, her brother excepted? Had I a rencounter with that brother? Was ſhe ſo perſecuted in favour of a very diſagreeable man, one Solmes, as to induce her to throw herſelf into my protection?

None of theſe were denied. All the objections ſhe could have made, were ſtifled, or kept in, by the conſideration, (as ſhe mentioned) that ſhe ſhould ſtay there but a little while; and that her ſtory was too long. But Miſs Rawlins would not be thus eaſily anſwered.

Miſs R. 'He ſays, Madam, that he 'could not prevail for marriage, till he 'had conſented, under a ſolemn oath, 'to ſeparate beds, while your family 'remained unreconciled.'

Cl. 'O the wretch! What can be ſtill 'in his head, to endeavour to paſs theſe 'ſtories upon ſtrangers?'

'So no direct denial,' though I.— 'Admirable!—All will do by-and-'by!'

Miſs R. 'He has owned, that an ac'cidental fire had frightened you very 'much on Wedneſday night—And that

'—And

'—And that—And that—an accidental 'fire had frightened you—Very much 'frightened you—laſt Wedneſday night!'

Then, after a ſhort pauſe—'In ſhort, he owned, that he had taken ſome in-'nocent liberties, which might have led 'to a breach of the oath you had impoſ-'ed upon him: and that this was the 'cauſe of your diſpleaſure.'

I would have been glad to ſee how my charmer then looked.—To be ſure ſhe was at a loſs in her own mind, to juſtify herſelf for reſenting ſo highly an offence ſo trifling.—She heſitated—Did not preſently ſpeak—When ſhe did, ſhe wiſhed, That ſhe, Miſs Rawlins, might never meet with any man who would take ſuch innoc nt liberties with her.

Miſs Rawlins puſhed further.

'Your caſe, to be ſure, Madam, is 'very particular. But if the hope of a 'reconciliation with your own friends is 'made more diſtant by your leaving him, 'give me leave to ſay, that 'tis pity—'tis pity—' [I ſuppoſe the maiden then primmed, fanned, and bluſhed;]—'tis pity the oath cannot be diſpenſed 'with; eſpecially as he owns he has not 'been ſo ſtrict a liver.'

I could have gone in and kiſſed the girl.

Cl. 'You have heard his ſtory. Mine, 'as I told you before, is too long, and 'too melancholy; my diſorder on ſeeing 'the wretch is too great; and my time 'here is too ſhort, for me to enter upon 'it. And if he has any end to ſerve by 'his own vindication, in which I ſhall 'not be a perſonal ſufferer, let him make 'himſelf appear as white as an angel; 'with all my heart.'

My love for her, and the excellent character I gave her were then pleaded.

Cl. 'Specious ſeducer!—Only tell me, 'if I cannot get away from him by ſome 'back-way?'

How my heart then went pit-a-pat! to ſpeak in the female dialect.

Cl. 'Let me look out—' [I heard the ſaſh lifted up] 'Whither does that path 'lead? Is there no poſſibility of getting 'to a coach?—Surely, he muſt deal with 'ſome fiend, or how could he have found 'me out?—Cannot I ſteal to ſome neigh-'bouring houſe, where I may be con-'cealed till I can get quite away?—You 'are good people!—I have not been al-'ways among ſuch!—O help me, help 'me, ladies!'—[with a voice of impatience] 'or I am ruined!'

Then pauſing, 'Is that the way to 'Hendon?' [pointing, I ſuppoſe]—'Is 'Hendon a private place?—The Hamp-'ſtead coach, I am told, will carry paſ-'ſengers thither.'

Mrs. Moore. 'I have an honeſt friend 'at Mill-Hill,'—['Devil fetch her!' thought I] 'where, if ſuch be your de-'termination, Madam, and if you think 'yourſelf in danger, you may be ſafe, I 'believe.'

Cl. 'Any-whither, if I can but eſcape 'from this man!—Whither does that path 'lead, out yonder?—What is that town 'on the right-hand called?'

Mrs. M. 'Highgate, Madam.'

Miſs R. 'On the ſide of the Heath is a 'little village called North-End. A 'kinſwoman of mine lives there. But 'her houſe is ſmall. I am not ſure ſhe 'could accommodate ſuch a lady.'

'Devil take her too!' thought I.—I imagined, that I had made myſelf a better intereſt in theſe women. But the whole ſex love plotting—And plotters too, Jack.

Cl. 'A barn, an out-houſe, a garret, 'will be a palace to me, if it will but 'afford me a refuge from this man!'

'Her ſenſes,' thought I, 'are much 'livelier than mine. What a devil have 'I done, that ſhe ſhould be ſo very im-'placable!'—I told thee, Belford, all I did: was there any-thing in it ſo very much amiſs?—Such proſpects of family-reconciliation before her too?—To be ſure ſhe is a very ſenſible lady!

She then eſpied my new ſervant walking under the window, and aſked, if he were not one of mine?

Will was on the look-out for old Grimes, [So is the fellow called whom my beloved has diſpatched to Miſs Howe.] And being told that the man ſhe ſaw was my ſervant; 'I ſee,' ſaid ſhe, 'that there is no eſcaping, unleſs 'you, Madam,' [to Miſs Rawlins, I ſuppoſe] 'can befriend me till I can 'get farther. I have no doubt that the 'fellow is planted about the houſe to 'watch my ſteps. But the wicked wretch 'his maſter has no right to controul me. 'He ſhall not hinder me from going 'whither I pleaſe. I will raiſe the town 'upon him, if he moleſts me. Dear la-'dies, is there no back-door for me to 'get out at while you hold him in 'talk?'

Miſs R. 'Give me leave to aſk you, 'Madam, Is there no room to hope for 'accommodation? Had you not better 'ſee him? He certainly loves you dearly: 'he is a fine gentleman: you may exaſ-'perate him, and make matters more 'unhappy for yourſelf.'

Cl. 'O Mrs. Moore!—O Miſs Raw-

'fits—you know not the man!—I wish 'not to see his face, nor to exchange 'another word with him as long as I 'live.'

Mrs. Moore. 'I don't find, Miss Rawlins, that the gentleman has misrepresented any-thing.—You see, Madam,' [to my Clarissa] 'how respectful he is; 'not to come in till permitted. He certainly loves you dearly. Pray, Madam, let him talk to you, as he wishes 'to do, on the subject of the letters.'

Very kind of Mrs. Moore!—'Mrs. 'Moore,' thought I, 'is a very good 'woman.' I did not curse her then.

Miss Rawlins said something; but so low, that I could not hear what it was. Thus it was answered.

Cl. 'I am greatly distressed! I know 'not what to do!—But, Mrs. Moore, 'be so good as to give his letters to him —Here they are.—Be pleased to tell 'him, That I wish him and Lady Betty 'and Miss Montague a happy meeting. 'He never can want excuses to them for 'what has happened, any more than 'pretences to those he would delude. 'Tell him, that he has ruined me in the 'opinion of my own friends. I am for 'that reason the less solicitous how I appear to his.'

Mrs. Moore then came to me; and I, being afraid that something would pass mean time between the other two, which I should not like, took the letters, and entered the room, and found them retired into the closet; my beloved whispering with an air of earnestness to Miss Rawlins, who was all attention.

Her back was towards me; and Miss Rawlins, by pulling her sleeve, giving intimation of my being there—'Can I 'have no retirement uninvaded, Sir?' said she, with indignation, as if she were interrupted in some talk her heart was in.—'What business have you here, or 'with me?—You have your letters, have 'you not?'

Lovel. 'I have, my dear; and let me 'beg of you to consider what you are 'about. I every moment expect Captain Tomlinson here. Upon my soul, 'I do. He has promised to keep from 'your uncle what has happened: but 'what will he think if he find you hold 'in this strange humour?'

Cl. 'I will endeavour, Sir, to have 'patience with you for a moment or 'two, while I ask you a few questions 'before this lady, and before Mrs. 'Moore,' [who just then came in] both 'of whom you have prejudiced in your 'favour by your specious stories—Will 'you say, Sir, that we are married together? Lay your hand upon your 'heart, and answer me, Am I your 'wedded wife?'

'I am gone too far,' thought I, 'to 'give up for such a push as this, home-'one as it is.

'My dearest soul! how can you put 'such a question? Is it either for your 'honour or my own, that it should be 'doubted?—Surely, surely, Madam, 'you cannot have attended to the con-'tents of Captain Tomlinson's letter.'

She complained often of want of spirits throughout our whole contention, and of weakness of person and mind, from the fits she had been thrown into: but little reason had she for this complaint, as I thought, who was able to hold me to it, as she did. I own that I was excessively concerned for her several times.

'You and I!—Vilest of men!—'

'My name is Lovelace, Madam—'

'Therefore it is, that I call you the 'vilest of men.' [Was this pardonable, Jack?]—'You and I know the truth, the 'whole truth—I want not to clear up my 'reputation with these gentlewomen: '—That is already lost with every-one 'I had most reason to value: but let me 'have this new specimen of what you are 'capable of—Say, wretch, (say, Love-'lace, if thou hadst rather) Art thou 'really and truly my wedded husband? '—Say; answer without hesitation.'

She trembled with impatient indignation; but had a wildness in her manner, which I took some advantage of, in order to parry this cursed thrust. And a cursed thrust it was; since, had I positively averred it, she never would have believed any-thing I said: and had I owned that I was not married, I had destroyed my own plot, as well with the women as with her; and could have no pretence for pursuing her, or hindering her from going whithersoever she pleased. Not that I was ashamed to aver it, had it been consistent with policy. I would not have thee think me such a milk-sop neither.

Lovel. 'My dearest love, how wildly 'you talk! What would you have me 'answer? Is it necessary that I should 'answer? May I not re-appeal this to 'your own breast, as well as to Captain 'Tomlinson's treaty and letter? You 'know yourself how matters stand be-'tween us.—And Captain Tomlin-'son——'

Cl. 'O wretch! Is this an answer to 'my question? Say, Are we married, 'or are we not?'

Lovel. 'What makes a marriage, we all

'all know. If it be the union of two 'hearts,' [There was a turn, Jack!] 'to my utmoſt grief, I muſt ſay we are 'not; ſince now I ſee you hate me. If 'it be the completion of marriage, to my 'confuſion and regret, I muſt own we 'are not. But, my dear, will you be 'pleaſed to conſider what anſwer half a 'dozen people whence you came, could 'give to your queſtion? And do not 'now, in the diſorder of your mind, and in 'the height of paſſion, bring into queſ-'tion before theſe gentlewomen a point 'you have acknowledged before thoſe 'who know us better.'

I would have whiſpered her about the treaty with her uncle, and about the contents of the captain's letter; but, retreating, and with a rejecting hand, 'Keep thy diſtance, man!' cried the dear inſolent—'To thine own heart I appeal, 'ſince thou evadeſt me thus pitifully!— 'I own no marriage with thee!—Bear 'witneſs, ladies, I do not. And ceaſe 'to torment me, ceaſe to follow me.— 'Surely, ſurely, faulty as I have been, 'I have not deſerved to be thus perſecu-'ted!—I reſume, therefore, my former 'language: you have no right to purſue 'me: you know you have not: be gone, 'then, and leave me to make the beſt of 'my hard lot. O my dear cruel father!' ſaid ſhe, in a violent fit of grief, [falling upon her knees, and claſping her up-lifted hands together] 'thy heavy curſe 'is completed upon thy devoted daugh-'ter! I am puniſhed, dreadfully puniſhed, 'by the very wretch in whom I had placed my 'wicked confidence!'

By my ſoul, Belford, the little witch with her words, but more by her man-ner, moved me! Wonder not then, that her action, her grief, her tears, ſet the women into the like compaſſionate ma-niſeſtations.

Had I not a curſed taſk of it?

The two women withdrew to the fur-ther end of the room, and whiſpered, 'A ſtrange caſe! There is no prenzy 'here,'—I juſt heard ſaid.

The charming creature threw her handkerchief over her head and neck, continuing kneeling, her back towards me, and her face hid upon a chair, and repeatedly ſobbed with grief and paſ-ſion.

I took this opportunity to ſtep to the women, to keep them ſteady.

'You ſee, ladies,' [whiſpering] 'what 'an unhappy man I am! You ſee what 'a ſpirit this dear creature has!—All, 'all owing to her implacable relations, 'and to her father's curſe.—A curſe 'upon them all! they have ſtarved the 'head of the moſt charming woman in 'the world!'

'Ah! Sir, Sir,' replied Miſs Raw-lins, 'whatever be the cauſe of her re-'lations, all is not as it ſhould be be-'tween you and her. 'Tis plain ſhe does 'not think herſelf married: 'tis plain 'ſhe does not: and if you have any va-'lue for the poor lady, and would not 'totally deprive her of her ſenſes, you 'had better withdraw, and leave to time 'and cooler conſideration the event in 'your favour.'

'She will compel me to this at laſt, I 'fear, Miſs Rawlins; I fear ſhe will; 'and then we are both undone: for I 'cannot live without her; ſhe knows it 'too well: and ſhe has not a friend who 'will look upon her: this alſo ſhe knows. 'Our marriage, when her uncle's friend 'comes, will be proved inconteſtably. 'But I am aſhamed to think I have given 'her room to believe it no marriage: 'that's what ſhe harps upon!'

'Well, 'tis a ſtrange caſe, a very 'ſtrange one,' ſaid Miſs Rawlins; and was going to ſay further, when the an-gry beauty, coming towards the door, ſaid 'Mrs. Moore, I beg a word with 'you.' And they both ſtepped into the dining-room.

I ſaw her juſt before put a parcel into her pocket; and followed them out, for fear ſhe ſhould ſlip away; and ſtepping to the ſtairs, that ſhe might not go by me, 'Will!' cried I, aloud, [though I knew he was not near]—'Pray, child,' to a maid, who anſwered, 'call either of 'my ſervants to me.'

She then came up to me, with a wrathful countenance: 'Do you call 'your ſervant, Sir, to hinder me, be-'tween you, from going whither I 'pleaſe?'

'Don't, my deareſt life, miſinterpret 'every thing I do. Can you think me 'ſo mean and ſo unworthy as to employ 'a ſervant to conſtrain you?—I call him 'to ſend to the publick-houſes, or inns 'in this town, to enquire after Captain 'Tomlinſon, who may have alighted at 'ſome one of them, and be now, per-'haps, needleſsly adjuſting his dreſs; 'and I would have him come, were he 'to be without cloaths, God forgive me! 'for I am ſtabbed to the heart by your 'cruelty.'

Anſwer was returned, that neither of my ſervants was in the way.

'Not in the way!' ſaid I.—'Whither 'can the dogs be gone?'

'O Sir!' with a ſcornful air; 'not 'far,

'for, I'll warrant. One of them was under the window just now; according to order, I suppose, to watch my steps.—But I will do what I please, and go whither I please; and that to your face.'

'God forbid, that I should hinder you in any-thing that you may do with safety to yourself!'

Now I verily believe, that her design was, to slip out in pursuance of the closet-whispering between her and Miss Rawlins; perhaps to Miss Rawlins's house.

She then stept back to Mrs. Moore, and gave her something, which proved to be a diamond-ring, and desired her [Not whisperingly, but with an air of defiance to me] that that might be a pledge for her, till she defrayed her demands; which she should soon find means to do; having no more money about her, than she might have occasion for before she came to an acquaintance's.

Mrs. Moore would have declined taking it; but she would not be denied; and then, wiping her eyes, she put on her gloves—'Nobody has a right to stop 'me!' said she.—'I will go!—Whom 'should I be afraid of?'—Her very question, charming creature! testifying her fear.

'I beg pardon, Madam,' [Turning to Mrs. Moore, and curtseying] 'for the 'trouble I have given you.—I beg par-'don, Madam,' to Miss Rawlins, [Curtseying likewise to her]—'You may both 'hear of me in a happier hour, if such 'a one fall to my lot—And God bless 'you both!'—struggling with her tears till she sobbed—and away was tripping.

I stepped to the door: I put it to; and setting my back against it, took her struggling hand—'My dearest life! My 'angel!' said I, 'why will you thus 'distress me?—Is this the forgiveness 'which you so solemnly promised?'

'Unhand me, Sir!—You have no 'business with me! You have no right 'over me! You know you have not.'

'But whither, whither, my dearest 'love, would you go?—Think you not 'that I will follow you, were it to the 'world's end?—Whither would you 'go?'

'Well do you ask me, whither I 'would go, who have been the occa-'sion that I have not a friend left!—But 'God, who knows my innocence, and 'my upright intentions, will not wholly 'abandon me when I am out of your 'power—But while in it, I cannot ex-'pect a gleam of the Divine grace or 'favour to reach me.'

'How severe is this!—How shocking-'ly severe!—Out of your presence, my 'angry fair-one, I can neither hope for 'the one nor the other. As my cousin 'Montague, in the letter you have read, 'observes, you are my pole-star, and 'my guide; and if ever I am to be hap-'py, either here or hereafter, it must 'be in and by you.'

She would then have opened the door. But I respectfully opposing her, 'Be 'gone, man! Be gone, Mr. Lovelace!' 'said she: 'stop not my way. If you 'would not that I should attempt the 'window, give me passage by the door; 'for, once more, you have no right to 'detain me.'

'Your resentments, my dearest life, 'I will own to be well grounded. I will 'acknowledge, that I have been all in 'fault. On my knee,' [And down I dropt] 'I ask your pardon. And can 'you refuse to ratify your own promise? '—Look forward to the happy prospect 'before us. See you not my Lord M. 'and Lady Sarah longing to bless you, 'for blessing me, and their whole family? 'Can you take no pleasure in the pro-'mised visit of Lady Betty and my cou-'sin Montague? And in the protection 'they offer you, if you are dissatisfied 'with mine? Have you no wish to see 'your uncle's friend? Stay only till Cap-'tain Tomlinson comes. Receive from 'him the news of your uncle's compliance 'with the wishes of both.'

She seemed altogether distressed; was ready to sink; and forced to lean against the wainscot, as I kneeled at her feet. A stream of tears at last burst from her less indignant eyes—'Good Heaven!' said she, lifting up her lovely face, and clasped hands, 'what is at last to be my 'destiny!—Deliver me from this dange-'rous man; and direct me! I know not 'what I do; what I can do; nor what 'I ought to do!'

The women, as I had owned our marriage to be but half completed, heard nothing in this whole scene to contradict (not flagrantly to contradict) what I had asserted: they believed they saw in her returning temper, and staggered resolution, a love for me, which her indignation had before suppressed; and they joined to persuade her to tarry till the captain came, and to hear his proposals; representing the dangers to which she would be exposed; the fatigues she might endure; a lady of her appearance, unguarded,

unguarded, unprotected. On the other hand, they dwelt upon my declared contrition, and on my promises; for the performance of which they offered to be bound. So much had my kneeling humility affected them.

Women, Jack, tacitly acknowledge the inferiority of their sex, in the pride they take to behold a kneeling lover at their feet.

She turned from me, and threw herself into a chair.

I arose, and approached her with reverence. 'My dearest creature,' said I—and was proceeding—But, with a face glowing with conscious dignity, she interrupted me—'Ungenerous, ungrateful Lovelace!—You know not the value of the heart you have insulted! Nor can you conceive how much my soul despises your meanness. But meanness must ever be the portion of the man, who can act vilely!'

The women believing we were likely to be on better terms, retired. The dear perverse opposed their going; but they saw I was desirous of their absence. And when they had withdrawn, I once more threw myself at her feet, and acknowledged my offences; implored her forgiveness for this one time, and promised the most exact circumspection for the future.

It was impossible for her, she said, to keep her memory, and forgive me. 'What hadst thou seen in the conduct of Clarissa Harlowe, that should encourage such an insult upon her, as thou didst dare to make? How meanly must thou think of her, that thou couldst presume to be so guilty, and expect her to be so weak as to forgive thee?'

I besought her to let me read over to her Captain Tomlinson's letter. I was sure it was impossible she could have given it the requisite attention.

'I have given it the requisite attention,' said she; 'and the other letters too. So that what I say, is upon deliberation. And what have I to fear from my brother and sister?—They can but complete the ruin of my fortunes with my father and uncles. Let them and welcome. You, Sir, I thank you, have lowered my fortunes: but I bless God, that my mind is not sunk with my fortunes. It is, on the contrary, raised above fortune, and above you; and for half a word, they shall have the estate they have envied me for, and an acquittal from me of all expectations from my family that may make them uneasy.'

I lifted up my hands and eyes in silent admiration of her.

'My brother, Sir, may think me ruined. To the praise of your character he may think it impossible to be with you, and be innocent. You have but too well justified their harshest censures by every part of your conduct. But now, that I have escaped from you, and that I am out of the reach of your mysterious devices, I will wrap myself up in mine own innocence,' [And then the passionate beauty folded her arms about herself] 'and leave to time, and to my future circumspection, the re-establishment of my character.—Leave me then, Sir—Pursue me not!'

'Good Heaven!' interrupting her—'And all this, for what?—Had I not yielded to your entreaties, (Forgive me, Madam) you could not have carried farther your resentments.'

'Wretch!—Was it not crime enough to give occasion for those entreaties? Wouldst thou make a merit to me, that thou didst not utterly ruin her whom thou oughtest to have protected?—Be gone, man!' turning from me, her face crimsoned over with passion—'See me no more!—I cannot bear thee in my sight!'

'Dearest, dearest creature!'

'If I forgive thee, Lovelace—'And there she stopped. 'To endeavour,' proceeded she, 'to endeavour, by premeditation, by low contrivance, by coming of fire—to terrify a poor creature who had consented to take a wretched chance with thee for life!'

'For Heaven's sake—' offering to take her repulsing hand as she was flying from me towards the closet.

'What hast thou to do, to plead the sake of Heaven in thy favour, O darkest of human minds!'

Then turning from me, wiping her eyes, and again turning towards me, but her sweet face half-aside, 'What difficulties hast thou involved me in!—That thou hadst a plain path before thee, after thou hadst betrayed me into thy power—At once my mind takes in the whole of thy crooked behaviour; and if thou thinkest of Clarissa Harlowe as her proud heart tells her thou oughtest to think of her, thou wilt seek thy fortunes elsewhere. How often hast thou provoked me to tell thee, that my soul is above thee?'

'For Heaven's sake, Madam, for a soul's sake, which it is in your power to save from perdition, forgive me the past offence. I am the greatest villain on

'on earth, if it was a premeditated one. 'Yet I presume not to excuse myself. 'On your mercy I throw myself. I will 'not offer at any plea, but that of pe'nitence. See but Captain Tomlinson. 'See but Lady Betty and my cousin; let 'them plead for me; let them be guaran'tees for my honour.

'If Captain Tomlinson come while I 'stay here, I may see him. But as for 'you, Sir—'

'Dearest creature! let me beg of you 'not to aggravate my offence to the 'captain, when he comes. Let me beg 'of you—'

'What askest thou?—Is it not, that 'I shall be of party against myself!—'That I shall palliate—'

'Do not charge me, Madam,' interrupted I, 'with villainous premeditati'on!—Do not give such a construction 'to my offence, as may weaken your 'uncle's opinion—as may strengthen 'your brother's—'

She flung from me to the further end of the room [She could go no further]—And just then Mrs. Moore came up, and told her, that dinner was ready; and that she had prevailed upon Miss Rawlins to give her her company.

'You must excuse me, Mrs. Moore,' said she. 'Miss Rawlins I hope also 'will—But I cannot eat—I cannot go 'down.—As for you, Sir, I suppose you 'will think it right to depart hence; at 'least till the gentleman comes whom 'you expect.'

I respectfully withdrew into the next room, that Mrs. Moore might acquaint her, [I durst not myself] that I was her lodger and boarder, as [whisperingly] I desired she would: and meeting Miss Rawlins in the passage, 'Dearest Miss 'Rawlins,' said I, 'stand my friend: 'join with Mrs. Moore to pacify my 'spouse, if she has any new slights upon 'my having taken lodgings, and intend'ing to board here. I hope she will have 'more generosity than to think of hin'dering a gentlewoman from letting her 'lodgings.'

I suppose Mrs. Moore (whom I left with my fair-one) had apprized her of this before Miss Rawlins went in; for I heard her say, while I with-held Miss Rawlins—'No, indeed; he is much 'mistaken—Surely he does not think I 'will.'

They both expostulated with her, as I could gather from bits and scraps of what they said; for they spoke so low, that I could not hear any distinct sentence, but from the fair-perverse, whose anger made her louder. And to this purpose I heard her deliver herself in answer to different parts of their talk to her:—'Good Mrs. Moore—dear Miss 'Rawlins—press me no further:—I can'not sit down at table with him!'

They said something, as I suppose in my behalf—'O the insinuating wretch! '—What defence have I against a man, 'who, go where I will, can turn every'one, even of the virtuous of my sex, in 'his favour?'

After something else said, which I heard not distinctly—'This is execra'ble cunning!—Were you to know his 'wicked heart, he is not without hope 'of engaging you two good persons to 'second him in the vilest of his machi'nations.'

'How came she,' (thought I at the instant) 'by all this penetration? My 'devil surely does not play me booty. 'If I thought he did, I would marry, 'and live honest, to be even with him.'

I suppose then, they urged the plea which I hinted to Miss Rawlins at going in, that she would not be Mrs. Moore's hindrance; for thus she expressed herself—'He will no doubt pay 'you your own price. You need not 'question his liberality. But one house 'cannot hold us. Why, if it would, 'did I fly from him, to seek refuge a'mong strangers?'

Then, in answer to somewhat else they pleaded—''Tis a mistake, Madam; I 'am not reconciled to him. I will be'lieve nothing he says. Has he not given 'you a flagrant specimen of what a man 'he is, and of what he is capable, by the 'disguises you saw him in? My story is 'too long, and my stay here will be but 'short; or I could convince you, that 'my resentments against him are but too 'well founded.'

I suppose then, that they pleaded for her leave, for my dining with them: for she said; 'I have nothing to say to that '—It is your own house, Mrs. Moore—'It is your own table—You may admit 'whom you please to it—Only leave me 'at my liberty to chuse my company.'

Then in answer, as I suppose, to their offer of sending her up a plate—'A bit of bread, if you please, and a 'glass of water: that's all I can swallow 'at present. I am really very much 'discomposed. Saw you not how bad I 'was?—Indignation only could have 'supported my spirits!

'I have no objection to his dining 'with you, Madam;' added she, in reply, I suppose, to a farther question of the the same nature—'But I will not stay 'a night in any house where he lodges.'

I presume Miss Rawlins had told her, that she would not stay dinner—for she said, 'Let me not deprive Mrs. Moore 'of your company, Miss Rawlins. You 'will not be displeased with his talk. 'He can have no design upon you.'

Then I suppose they pleaded what I might say behind her back, to make my own story good:—'I care not what he 'says, or what he thinks of me. Re-'pentance and amendment are all the 'harm I wish him, whatever becomes 'of me!'

By her accent, she wept when she spoke these last words.

They came out both of them wiping their eyes; and would have persuaded me to relinquish the lodgings, and to depart till her uncle's friend came. But I knew better. I did not care to trust the devil, well as she and Miss Howe suppose me to be acquainted with him, for finding her out again, if once more she escaped me.

What I am most afraid of, is, that she will throw herself among her own relations; and if she does, I am confident they will not be able to withstand her affecting eloquence. But yet, as thou'lt see, the captain's letter to me is admirably calculated to obviate my apprehensions on this score; particularly in that passage, where it is said, that her uncle thinks not himself at liberty to correspond directly with her, or to receive applications from her—But through Captain Tomlinson, as is strongly implied.

I must own (notwithstanding the revenge I have so solemnly vowed) that I would very fain have made for her a merit with myself in her returning favour, and have owed as little as possible to the mediation of Captain Tomlinson. My pride was concerned in this: and this was one of my reasons for not bringing him with me. Another was; that, if I were obliged to have recourse to his assistance, I should be better able (by visiting her without him) to direct him what to say or to do, as I should find out the turn of her humour.

I was, however, glad at my heart, that Mrs. Moore came up so seasonably with notice, that dinner was ready. The fair fugitive was all in alt. She had the game in her own hands; and by giving me so good an excuse for withdrawing, I had time to strengthen myself; the captain had time to come; and the lady to cool. Shakespeare advises well—

'Oppose not rage, whilst rage is in it's force;
'But give it way awhile, and let it waste.
'The rising deluge is not stopt with dams;
'Those it o'erbears, and drowns the hope of 'harvest.
'But wisely managed, it's divided strength
'Is drain'd in channels, and securely drain'd
'And when it's force is spent, and unsup-
'plied,
'The ruins with mounds may be refrain'd,
'And dry-shod we may pass the ruined field.'

I went down with the women to dinner. Mrs. Moore sent her fair boarder up a plate; but she only ate a little bit of bread, and drank a glass of water. I doubted not but she would keep her word, when it was once gone out. Is she not an Harlowe?—She seems to be enuring herself to hardships, which at the worst she can never know; since, though she should ultimately refuse to be obliged to me, or (to express myself more suitable to my own heart) to oblige me, every one who sees her must befriend her.

But let me ask thee, Belford, Art thou not solicitous for me in relation to the contents of the letter which the angry beauty had written and dispatched away by man and horse; and for what may be Miss Howe's answer to it? Art thou not ready to enquire, Whether it be not likely that Miss Howe, when she knows of her saucy friend's flight, will be concerned about her letter, which she supposes could not be at Wilson's till after that flight; and so, probably would fall into my hands?

All these things, as thou'lt see in the sequel, are provided for with as much contrivance as human foresight can admit.

I have already told thee that Will is upon the look out for old Grimes—Old Grimes is it seems a gossiping foolish rascal; and if Will can but light of him, I'll answer for the consequence; for has not Will been my servant upwards of seven years?

LETTER XI.

MR. LOVELACE. IN CONTINUATION.

WE had at dinner, besides Miss Rawlins, a young widow-niece of Mrs. Moore, who is come to stay a month with her aunt—Beau her name; very forward, very lively, and a great admirer of me, I assure you;—hanging smirkingly upon all I said; and prepared to approve of every word before I spoke: and who, by the time we had half-dined, (by the help of what she had collected before) was as much acquainted with our story, as either of the other two.

As it behoved me to prepare them in my favour against whatever might come from Miss Howe, I improved upon the hint I had thrown out above-stairs against that mischief-making lady. I represented her to be an arrogant creature, revengeful, artful, enterprizing, and one who, had she been a man, would have sworn and cursed, and committed rapes, and played the devil, as far as I knew; [I have no doubt of it, Jack] but who, nevertheless, by advantage of a female education, and pride and insolence, I believed was personally virtuous.

Mrs. Bevis allowed, that there was a vast deal in education—and in pride too, she said. While Miss Rawlins came with a prudish 'God forbid, that virtue 'should be owing to education only!' However, I declared that Miss Howe was a subtle contriver of mischief; one who had always been my enemy: her motives I knew not: but despised the man whom her mother was desirous she should have, one Hickman; although I did not directly aver, that she would rather have had me; yet they all immediately imagined that that was the ground of her animosity to me, and of her envy to my beloved: and it was pity, they said, that so fine a young lady did not see through such a pretended friend.

'And yet nobody' [added I] 'has 'more reason than she to know by ex- 'perience the force of a hatred founded 'in envy—as I hinted to you above, Mrs. 'Moore—and to you, Miss Rawlins—in 'the case of her sister Arabella.'

I had compliments made to my person and talents on this occasion; which gave me a singular opportunity of disclaiming my modesty, by disclaiming the merit of them, with a 'No, indeed!—I should be 'very vain, ladies, if I thought so.' While thus abasing myself, and exalting Miss Howe, I got their opinion both for modesty and generosity; and had all the graces which I disclaimed thrown in upon me besides.

In short, they even oppressed that modesty, which (to speak modestly of myself) their praises created, by disbelieving all I said against myself.

And, truly, I must needs say, they have almost persuaded even me myself, that Miss Howe is actually in love with me. I have often been willing to hope this. And who knows but she may? The captain and I have agreed, that it shall be so insinuated occasionally—And what's thy opinion, Jack? She certainly hates Hickman: and girls who are disengaged seldom hate, though they may not love: and if she had rather have another, why not that other ME? For am I not a smart fellow, and a rake? And do not your sprightly ladies love your smart fellows, and your rakes? And where is the wonder, that the man who could engage the affections of Miss Harlowe, should engage those of a lady (with her Alas's) who would be honoured in being deemed her second?

Nor accuse thou me of SINGULAR vanity in this presumption, Belford. Wert thou to know the secret vanity that lurks in the hearts of those who disguise or cloak it best, thou wouldst find great reason to acquit, at least, to allow for, me: since it is generally the conscious over-fulness of conceit, that makes the hypocrite most upon his guard to conceal it.—Yet with these fellows, proudly-humble as they are, it will break out sometimes in spite of their cloaks, though but in self-denying, compliment-begging self degradation.

But now I have undervalued myself, in apologizing to thee on this occasion, let me use another argument in favour of my observation, that the ladies generally prefer a rake to a sober man; and of my presumption upon it, that Miss Howe is in love with me: it is this: common fame says, That Hickman is a very virtuous innocent fellow—a male-virgin, I warrant!—An odd dog I always thought him. Now women, Jack, like not novices. Two maidenheads meeting together in wedlock, the first child must be a fool, is their common aphorism. They are pleased with the love of the sex that is founded in the knowledge of it. Reason good; novices expect more than they can possibly find in the commerce with them. The man who knows them, yet has ardours for them, to borrow a word from Miss Howe, though those ardours are generally owing more to the devil within him, than to the witch without him, is the man who makes them the highest and most grateful compliment. He knows what to expect, and with what to be satisfied.

Then the merit of a woman, in some cases, must be ignorance, whether real or pretended. The man, in these cases, must be an adept. Will it then be wondered at, that a woman prefers a libertine to a novice?—While she expects in the one the confidence she wants, she considers the other and herself as two parallel lines, which, though they run ſide by ſide, can never meet.

Yet in this the ſex is generally miſtaken too; for theſe ſheepiſh fellows are ſly. I myſelf was modeſt once; and this, as I have elſewhere hinted to thee, has better enabled me to judge of both ſexes.

But to proceed with my narrative:

Having thus prepared every-one againſt any letter ſhould come from Miſs Howe, and againſt my beloved's meſſenger returns, I thought it proper to conclude that ſubject with a hint, that my ſpouſe could not bear to have any-thing ſaid, that reflected upon Miſs Howe; and, with a deep ſigh, added, that I had been made very unhappy more than once by the ill-will of ladies whom I had never offended.

The widow Bevis believed that might very eaſily be.

Theſe hints within-doors, joined with others to Will both without and within, [For I intend he ſhall fall in love with widow Moore's maid, and have ſaved one hundred pounds in my ſervice, at leaſt] will be great helps, as things may happen.

LETTER XII.

MR. LOVELACE. IN CONTINUATION.

WE had hardly dined, when my coachman who kept a look out for Captain Tomlinſon, as Will did for old Grimes, conducted hither that worthy gentleman, attended by one ſervant, both on horſeback. He alighted. I went out to meet him at the door.

Thou knoweſt his ſolemn appearance, and unbluſhing freedom; and yet canſt not imagine what a dignity the raſcal aſſumed, nor how reſpectful to him I was.

I led him into the parlour, and preſented him to the women, and them to him. I thought it highly imported me (as they might ſtill have ſome diffidences about our marriage, from my fair-one's home-puſhed queſtions on that head) to convince them entirely of the truth of all I had aſſerted. And how could I do this better than by dialoguing a little with him before them?

'Dear captain, I thought you long, 'for I have had a terrible conflict with 'my ſpouſe.'

Capt. 'I am ſorry that I am later than 'my intention—My account with my 'banker' [There's a dog, Jack!] took 'me up longer time to adjuſt, than I had 'foreſeen:' [all the time pulling down and ſtroking his ruffles] 'for there was 'a ſmall difference between us—only 'twenty pounds, indeed, which I had 'taken no account of.'

The raſcal has not ſeen twenty pounds of his own theſe ten years.

Then had we between us the characters of the Harlowe family; I railed againſt them all; the captain taking his dear friend Mr. John Harlowe's part; with a 'Not ſo faſt!—Not ſo faſt, young 'gentleman!'—and the like free aſſumptions.

He accounted for their animoſity by my defiances: no good family, having ſuch a charming daughter, would care to be defied, inſtead of courted: he muſt ſpeak his mind: never was a double-tongued man.—He appealed to the ladies, if he were not right?

He got them of his ſide.

The correction I had given the brother, he told me, muſt have aggravated matters.

How valiant this made me look to the women!—The ſex love us mettled fellows at their hearts.

Be that as it would, I ſhould never love any of the family but my ſpouſe; and wanting nothing from them, I would not, but for her ſake, have gone ſo far as I had gone towards a reconciliation.

This was very good of me, Mrs. Moore ſaid.

'Very good indeed;' Miſs Rawlins.

'Good;—it is more than good; it is 'very generous;' ſaid the widow.

Capt. 'Why ſo it is, I muſt needs ſay: 'for I am ſenſible, that Mr. Lovelace 'has been rudely treated by them all—'More rudely, than it could have been 'imagined a man of his quality and ſpirit 'would have put up with.—But then, 'Sir,' [turning to me] I think you are 'amply rewarded in ſuch a lady; and 'that you ought to forgive the father 'for the daughter's ſake.'

Mrs. Moore. 'Indeed ſo I think.'

Miſs R. 'So muſt every-one think, 'who has ſeen the lady.'

Widow B. 'A fine lady, to be ſure! 'But ſhe has a violent ſpirit; and ſome 'very odd humours too, by what I have 'heard. The value of good huſbands is 'not known till they are loſt!'

Her conſcience then drew a ſigh from her.

Lovel. 'Nobody muſt reflect upon 'my angel—An angel ſhe is—Some lit-'tle blemiſhes, indeed, as to her over-'haſty ſpirit, and as to her unforgiving 'temper. But this ſhe has from the 'Harlowes; inſtigated too by that Miſs 'Howe.—But her innumerable excel-'lences are all her own.'

Capt. 'Aye, talk of ſpirit, there's a 'ſpirit, now you have named Miſs Howe!' [And ſo I led him to confirm all I had ſaid of that vixen.] 'Yet ſhe was to 'be pitied too;' looking with meaning at me.

As I have already hinted, I had before agreed with him to impute ſecret love occaſionally to Miſs Howe, as the beſt means to invalidate all that might come from her in my diſfavour.

Capt. 'Mr. Lovelace, but that I 'know your modeſty, or you could give 'a reaſon——'

Lovel. Looking down, and very modeſt—'I can't think ſo, captain—But 'let us call another cauſe.'

Every woman preſent could look me in the face, ſo baſhful was I.

Capt. 'Well, but as to our preſent 'ſituation—Only it mayn't be proper—' looking upon me, and round upon the women.

Lovel. 'O captain, you may ſay any-'thing before this company—Only, 'Andrew,' [to my new ſervant, who attended us at table] 'do you with-'draw: this good girl'—[looking at the maid-ſervant]—'will help us to all we 'want.'

Away went Andrew: he wanted not his cue; and the maid ſeemed pleaſed at my honour's preference of her.

Capt. 'As to our preſent ſituation, I 'ſay, Mr. Lovelace—Why, Sir, we 'ſhall be all untwiſted, let me tell you, 'if my friend Mr. John Harlowe were 'to know what that is. He would as 'much queſtion the truth of your be-'ing married, as the reſt of the family 'do.'

Here the women perked up their ears; and were all ſilent attention.

Capt. 'I aſked you before for particu-'lars, Mr. Lovelace; but you declined 'giving them.—Indeed it may not be pro-'per for me to be acquainted with them. '—But I muſt own, that it is paſt my 'comprehenſion, that a wife can reſent 'any-thing a huſband can do, (that is 'not a breach of the peace) ſo far as to 'think herſelf juſtified for eloping from 'him.'

Lovel. 'Captain Tomlinſon—Sir—I 'do aſſure you, that I ſhall be offended '—I ſhall be extremely concerned—'if I hear that word eloping mentioned 'again.'

Capt. 'Your nicety, and your love, 'Sir, may make you take offence—But 'it is my way to call every-thing by 'it's proper name, let who will be of-'fended.'

Thou canſt not imagine, Belford, how brave, and how independent, the raſcal looked.

Capt. 'When, young gentleman, you 'ſhall think proper to give us particu-'lars, we will find a word for this raſh 'act in ſo admirable a lady, that ſhall 'pleaſe you better—You ſee, Sir, that, 'being the repreſentative of my dear 'friend Mr. John Harlowe, I ſpeak as 'freely as I ſuppoſe he would do, if 'preſent. But you bluſh, Sir—I beg 'your pardon, Mr. Lovelace: it be-'comes not a modeſt man to pry into 'thoſe ſecrets, which a modeſt man can-'not reveal.'

I did not bluſh, Jack; but denied not the compliment, and looked down: the women ſeemed delighted with my modeſty: but the widow Bevis was more inclined to laugh at me, than praiſe me for it.

Capt. 'Whatever be the cauſe of this 'ſtep, (I will not again, Sir, call it elope-'ment, ſince that harſh word wounds 'your tenderneſs) I cannot but expreſs 'my ſurprize upon it, when I recollect 'the affectionate behaviour, to which 'I was witneſs between you, when I 'attended you laſt. Over-love, Sir, I 'think you once mentioned—but over-'love,' [ſmiling] 'give me leave to ſay, 'Sir, is an odd cauſe of quarrel—Few 'ladies—'

Lovel. 'Dear captain!' And I tried to bluſh.

The women alſo tried; and being more uſed to it, ſucceeded better.—Mrs. Bevis indeed has a red-hot countenance, and always bluſhes.

Miſs R. 'It ſignifies nothing to mince 'the matter: but the lady above as good 'as denies her marriage.—You know, 'Sir, that ſhe does;' turning to me.

Capt. 'Denies her marriage! Hea-'vens! how then have I impoſed upon 'my dear friend Mr. John Harlowe!'

Lovel. 'Poor dear!—But let not her 'veracity be called in queſtion. She would 'not be guilty of a wilful untruth for 'the world.'

Then I had all their praiſes again.

Lovel. 'Dear creature!—She thinks 'ſhe has reaſon for her denial.—You 'know, Mrs. Moore—you know, Miſs 'Rawlins—what I owned to you above, 'as to my vow—'

I looked down, and, as once before, turned round my diamond-ring.

Mrs. Moore looked awry; and with a leer leer at Miſs Rawlins, as to her partner in the hinted-at reference.

Miſs Rawlins looked down as well as I; her eye-lid half-cloſed, as if mumbling a Pater-noſter, meditating her ſnuff-box, the diſtance between her noſe and chin lengthened by a cloſe-ſhut mouth.

She put me in mind of the pious Mrs. Fetheritone at Oxford, whom I pointed out to thee once, among other groteſque figures, at St. Mary's Church, whither we went to take a view of her two ſiſters: her eyes ſhut, not daring to truſt her heart with them open; and but juſt half-rearing her lids, to ſee who the next-comer was; and falling them again, when her curioſity was ſatisfied.

The widow Bevis gazed, as if on the hunt for a ſecret.

The captain looked archly, as if half in poſſeſſion of one.

Mrs. Moore at laſt broke the baſhful ſilence. Mrs. Lovelace's behaviour, ſhe ſaid, could be no otherwiſe ſo well accounted for, as by the ill-offices of that Miſs Howe; and by the ſeverity of her relations; which might but too probably have affected her head a little at times: adding, that it was very generous in me to give way to the ſtorm when it was up, rather than to exaſperate at ſuch a time.

'But let me tell you, Sirs,' ſaid the widow Bevis, 'that is not what one huſ-'band in a thouſand would have done.'

I deſired, that no part of this converſation might be hinted to my ſpouſe; and looked ſtill more baſhfully. Her great fault, I muſt own, was over-delicacy.

The captain leered round him; and ſaid, He believed he could gueſs from the hints I had given him in town, (of my over-love) and from what had now paſſed, that we had not conſummated our marriage.

O Jack! how ſheepiſhly then looked, or endeavoured to look, thy friend!—how primly Goody Moore!—how affectedly Miſs Rawlins!—while the honeſt widow Bevis gazed around her fearleſs; and though only ſimpering with her mouth, her eyes laughed out-right, and ſeemed to challenge a laugh from every eye in the company.

He obſerved, that I was a phœnix of a man, if ſo; and he could not but hope, that all matters would be happily accommodated in a day or two; and that then he ſhould have the pleaſure to aver to her uncle, that he was preſent, as he might ſay, on our wedding-day.

The women ſeemed all to join in the ſame hope.

'Ah, captain!—Ah, ladies!—how 'happy ſhould I be, if I could bring my 'dear ſpouſe to be of the ſame mind!'

'It would be a very happy concluſion of a very knotty affair,' ſaid widow Bevis; 'and I ſee not why we may 'not make this very night a merry one.'

The captain ſuperciliouſly ſmiled at me. He ſaw plainly enough, he ſaid, that we had been at children's play hitherto. A man of my character, who could give way to ſuch a caprice as this, muſt have a prodigious value for his lady. But one thing he would venture to tell me; and that was this—That, however deſirous young ſkittiſh ladies might be to have their way in this particular, it was a very bad ſetting-out for the man; as it gave his bride a very high proof of the power ſhe had over him: and he would engage, that no woman, thus humoured, ever valued the man the more for it; but very much the contrary—And there were reaſons to be given why ſhe ſhould not.

'Well, well, captain, no more of this 'ſubject before the ladies.—One feels,' [ſhrugging my ſhoulders, in a baſhful try-to-bluſh manner] 'that one is ſo ridi-'culous—I have been puniſhed enough 'for my tender folly.'

Miſs Rawlins had taken her fan, and would needs hide her face behind it—I ſuppoſe becauſe her bluſh was not quite ready.

Mrs. Moore hemmed, and looked down; and by that, gave hers over.

While the jolly widow, laughing out, praiſed the captain as one of Hudibras's metaphyſicians, repeating—

'He knew what's what, and that's as high
'As metaphyſick wit can fly.'

This made Miſs Rawlins bluſh indeed:—'Fie, fie, Mrs. Bevis!' cried ſhe, unwilling, I ſuppoſe, to be thought abſolutely ignorant.

Upon the whole, I began to think, that I had not made a bad exchange of our profeſſing mother, for the unprofeſſing Mrs. Moore. And indeed the women and I, and my beloved too, all mean the ſame thing: we only differ about the manner of coming at the propoſed end.

LETTER XIII.

MR. LOVELACE. IN CONTINUATION.

IT was now high time to acquaint my ſpouſe, that Captain Tomlinſon was come. And the rather, as the maid told us, that the lady had aſked her, if ſuch a gen-a gentleman [deſcribing him] was not in the parlour?

Mrs. Moore went up, and requeſted, in my name, that ſhe would give us audience.

But ſhe returned, reporting my beloved's deſire, that Captain Tomlinſon would excuſe her for the preſent. She was very ill. Her ſpirits were too weak to enter into converſation with him; and ſhe muſt lie down.

I was vexed, and at firſt extremely diſconcerted. The captain was vexed too. And my concern, thou mayeſt believe, was the greater on his account.

She had been very much fatigued, I own. Her fits in the morning muſt have diſordered her: and ſhe had carried her reſentment ſo high, that it was the leſs wonder ſhe ſhould find herſelf low, when her raiſed ſpirits had ſubſided. Very low, I may ſay; if ſinkings are proportioned to riſings; for ſhe had been lifted up above the ſtandard of a common mortal.

The captain, however, ſent up his own name, that if he could be admitted to drink one diſh of tea with her, he ſhould take it for a favour: and would go to town, and diſpatch ſome neceſſary buſineſs, in order, if poſſible, to leave his morning free to attend her.

But ſhe pleaded a violent head-ache; and Mrs. Moore confirmed the plea to be juſt.

I would have had the captain lodge there that night, as well in compliment to him, as introductory to my intention of entering myſelf upon my new-taken apartment: but his hours were of too much importance to him to ſtay the evening.

It was indeed very inconvenient for him, he ſaid, to return in the morning; but he is willing to do all in his power to heal this breach, and that as well for the ſakes of me and my lady, as for that of his dear friend Mr. John Harlowe; who muſt not know how far this miſunderſtanding had gone. He would therefore only drink one diſh of tea with the ladies and me.

And accordingly, after he had done ſo, and I had had a little private converſation with him, he hurried away.

His fellow had given him, in the interim, a high character to Mrs. Moore's ſervants: and this reported by the widow Bevis, (who, being no proud woman, is hail fellow, well met, as the ſaying is, with all her aunt's ſervants) he was a fine gentleman, a diſcreet gentleman, a man of ſenſe and breeding, with them all: and it was pity, that, with ſuch great buſineſs upon his hands, he ſhould be obliged to come again.

'My life for yours,' audibly whiſpered the widow Bevis, 'there is humour as 'well as head-ache in ſomebody's declin-'ing to ſee this worthy gentleman.—Ah, 'Lord! how happy might ſome people 'be if they would!'

'No perfect happineſs in this world,' ſaid I, very gravely, and with a ſigh; for the widow muſt know that I heard her. 'If we have not real unhappineſs, 'we can make it, even from the over-'flowings of our good fortune.'

'Very true,' and, 'Very true,' the two widows. 'A charming obſervation!' Mrs. Bevis. Miſs Rawlins ſmiled her aſſent to it; and I thought ſhe called me in her heart, 'Charming man!' For ſhe profeſſes to be a great admirer of moral obſervations.

I had hardly taken leave of the captain, and ſat down again with the women, when Will came; and calling me out, 'Sir, Sir!' ſaid he, grinning with a familiarity in his looks as if what he had to ſay entitled him to take liberties; 'I have got the fellow down!—I have 'got old Grimes—Hah, hah, hah, hah! '—He is at the Lower-Flaſk—Almoſt 'in the condition of David's Sow, and 'pleaſe your honour.'—[The dog himſelf not much better] 'Here is his letter '—from—from Miſs Howe—ha, ha, ha, 'ha,' laughed the varlet; holding it faſt, as if to make conditions with me, and to excite my praiſes, as well as my impatience.

I could have knocked him down; but he would have his ſay out—'Old Grimes 'knows not that I have the letter—I 'muſt get back to him before he miſſes 'it—I only made a pretence to go out 'for a few minutes—but—but'—and then the dog laughed again—'He muſt 'ſtay—Old Grimes muſt ſtay—till I go 'back to pay the reckoning.'

D—n the prater!—Grinning raſcal! —'The letter!—The letter!'

He gathered in his wide mouth, as he calls it, and gave me the letter; but with a ſtrut, rather than a bow; and then fidled off like one of widow Sorlings's dunghill-cocks, exulting after a great feat performed. And all the time that I was holding up the billet to the light, to try to get at it's contents without breaking the ſeal, [for, diſpatched in a hurry, it had no cover] there ſtood he, laughing, ſhrugging, playing off his legs; now ſtroking his ſhining chin; now turning his hat upon his thumb; then leering

ing

ing in my face, flourishing with his head —'O Chriſt!' now-and-then cried the raſcal.

What joy has this dog in miſchief!—More than I can have in the completion of my moſt favourite purpoſes!—Theſe fellows are happier than their maſters.

I was once thinking to rumple up this billet till I had broken the ſeal. Young families [Miſs Howe's is not an ancient one] love oſtentatious ſealings: and it might have been ſuppoſed to have been ſqueezed in pieces, in old Grimes's breeches-pocket. But I was glad to be ſaved the guilt as well as ſuſpicion of having a hand in ſo dirty a trick; for thus much of the contents (enough for my purpoſe) I was enabled to ſcratch out in character, without it; the folds depriving me only of a few connecting words; which I have ſupplied between hooks.

My Miſs Harlowe, thou knoweſt, had before changed her name to Miſs Lætitia Beaumont. Another alias now, Jack, to it; for this billet was directed to her by the name of Mrs. Harriot Lucas. I have learned her to be half a rogue, thou ſeeſt.

'I CONGRATULATE you, my 'dear, with all my heart and ſoul, upon '[your eſcape] from the villain. [I 'long] for the particulars of all. [My 'mother] is out; but, expecting her re-'turn every minute, I diſpatched [your] 'meſſenger inſtantly. [I will endeavour 'to come at] Mrs. Townſend without 'loſs of time; and will write at large 'in a day or two, if in that time I can 'ſee her. [Mean time I] am exceſſively 'uneaſy for a letter I ſent you yeſterday 'by Collins, [who muſt have left it at] 'Wilſon's after you got away. [It is 'of very] great importance. [I hope 'the] villain has it not. I would not 'for the world [that he ſhould.] Im-'mediately ſend for it, if by ſo doing, the 'place you are at [will not be] diſcover-'ed. If he has it, let me know it by 'ſome way [out of] hand. If not, you 'need not ſend. Ever, ever yours,

'JUNE 9. A. H.'

O Jack, what heart's-eaſe does this interception give me!—I ſent the raſcal back with the letter to Old Grimes, and charged him to drink no deeper. He owned, that he was half ſeas over.

'Dog!' ſaid I, 'are you not to court 'one of Mrs. Moore's maids to-night?'

'Cry your mercy, Sir!—I will be 'ſober.—I had forgot that—But old 'Grimes is plaguy tough—I thought I 'ſhould never have got him down.'

'Away, villain!—Let old Grimes 'come; and on horſeback too, to the 'door.'

'He ſhall, and pleaſe your honour, if 'I can get him on the ſaddle, and if he 'can ſit.'

'And charge him not to have alight-'ed, nor to have ſeen any-body.'

'Enough, Sir!' familiarly nodding his head, to ſhew he took me. And away went the villain—Into the parlour, to the women, I.

In a quarter of an hour came old Grimes on horſeback, waving to his ſad-dle-bow, now on this ſide, now on that; his head, at others, joining to that of his more ſober beaſt.

It looked very well to the women, that I made no effort to ſpeak to old Grimes; (though I wiſhed before them, that I knew the contents of what he brought) but, on the contrary, deſired that they would inſtantly let my ſpouſe know that her meſſenger was returned.

Down ſhe flew, violently as ſhe had the head-ache!

O how I prayed for an opportunity to be revenged of her for the ungrate-ful trouble ſhe had given to her uncle's friend!

She took the letter from old Grimes with her own hands, and retired to an inner-parlour to read it.

She preſently came out again to the fellow, who had much ado to ſit his horſe —'Here is your money, friend. I thought 'you long. But what ſhall I do to get 'ſomebody to go to town immediately 'for me? I ſee you cannot.'

Old Grimes took his money; let fall his hat in d'offing it; had it given him; and rode away; his eyes iſing-glaſs, and ſet in his head, as I ſaw through the win-dow; and in a manner ſpeechleſs; all his language hiccoughs. My dog need-ed not to have gone ſo deep with this tough old Grimes. But the raſcal was in his kingdom with him.

The lady applied to Mrs. Moore: ſhe mattered not the price. Could a man and horſe be engaged for her?—Only to go for a letter left for her, at one Mr. Wilſon's in Pall Mall.

A poor neighbour was hired. A horſe procured for him. He had his directions.

In vain did I endeavour to engage my beloved, when ſhe was below. Her head-ache, I ſuppoſe, returned. She, like the reſt of her ſex, can be ill or well when ſhe pleaſes.

'I ſee her drift,' thought I: 'it is to 'have all her lights from Miſs Howe be-'fore ſhe reſolves; and to take her mea-'ſures accordingly.'

Up she went, expreſſing great impatience about the letter ſhe had ſent for; and deſired Mrs. Moore to let her know if I offered to ſend any of my ſervants to town—To get at the letter, I ſuppoſe, was her fear: but ſhe might have been quite eaſy on that head; and yet perhaps would not, had ſhe known, that the worthy Captain Tomlinſon (who will be in town before her meſſenger) will leave there the important letter: which I hope will help to pacify her, and reconcile her to me.

O Jack! Jack! thinkeſt thou that I will take all this roguiſh pains, and be ſo often called a villain, for nothing?

But yet, is it not taking pains to come at the fineſt creature in the world, not for a tranſitory moment only, but for one of our lives! The ſtruggle only, Whether I am to have her in my own way, or in hers?

But now I know thou wilt be frightened out of thy wits for me—'What, 'Lovelace! wouldſt thou let her have 'a letter that will inevitably blow thee 'up; and blow up the mother, and all 'her nymphs!—yet not intend to re'form, nor intend to marry?'

Patience, puppy! Canſt thou not truſt thy matter?

LETTER XIV.

MR. LOVELACE. IN CONTINUATION.

I Went up to my new-taken apartment, and fell to writing in character, as uſual. I thought I had made good my quarters. But the cruel creature, underſtanding that I intended to take up my lodgings there, declared with ſo much violence againſt it, that I was obliged to ſubmit, and to accept of another lodging, about twelve doors off, which Mrs. Moore recommended. And all the advantage I could obtain was, that Will, unknown to my ſpouſe, and for fear of a freak, ſhould lie in the houſe.

Mrs Moore, indeed, was unwilling to diſoblige either of us. But Miſs Rawlins was of opinion, that nothing more ought to be allowed me: and yet Mrs. Moore owned, that the refuſal was a ſtrange piece of tyranny to an huſband, if I were an huſband.

I had a good mind to make Miſs Rawlins ſmart for it. Come and ſee Miſs Rawlins, Jack—If thou likeſt her, I'll get her for thee with a wet finger, as the ſaying is!

The widow Bevis indeed ſtickled hard for me. [An innocent or injured man will have friends every-where] She ſaid, That to bear much with ſome wives, was to be obliged to bear more: and I reflected, with a ſigh, that tame ſpirits muſt always be impoſed upon. And then, in my heart, I renewed my vows of revenge upon this haughty and perverſe beauty.

The ſecond fellow came back from town about nine o'clock, with Miſs Howe's letter of Wedneſday laſt, Collins, it ſeems, when he left it, had deſired, that it might be ſafely and ſpeedily delivered into Miſs Lætitia Beaumont's own hands. But Wilſon, underſtanding, that neither ſhe nor I were in town, [He could not know of our difference thou muſt think] reſolved to take care of it till our return, in order to give it into one of our own hands; and now delivered it to her meſſenger.

This was told her. Wilſon, I doubt not, is in her favour upon it.

She took the letter with great eagerneſs; opened it in a hurry, [I am glad ſhe did; yet, I believe, all was right] before Mrs. Moore and Mrs. Bevis; [Miſs Rawlins was gone home] and ſaid, She would not for the world that I ſhould have had that letter, for the ſake of her dear friend the writer; who had written to her very uneaſily about it.

'Her dear friend!' repeated Mrs. Bevis, when ſhe told me this:—'ſuch 'miſchief-makers are always deemed 'dear friends till they are found out!'

The widows ſays, that I am the fineſt gentleman ſhe ever beheld.

I have found a warm kiſs now-and-then very kindly taken.

I might be a very wicked fellow, Jack, if I were to do all the miſchief in my power. But I am ever-more for quitting a too eaſy prey to reptile rakes. What but difficulty (though the lady is an angel) engages me to ſo much perſeverance here? And here, conquer or die! is now the determination!

I HAVE juſt now parted with this honeſt widow. She called upon me at my new lodgings. I told her, that I ſaw I muſt be farther obliged to her in the courſe of this difficult affair. She muſt allow me to make her a handſome preſent when all was happily over. But I deſired, that ſhe would take no notice of what ſhould paſs between us, not even to her aunt; for that ſhe, as I ſaw, was in the power of Miſs Rawlins: and Miſs Rawlins being a maiden gentlewoman, knew not the right and the fit in matrimonial matters, as ſhe, my dear widow, did.

'Very

'Very true: how should she?' ſaid Mrs. Bevis, proud of knowing—nothing! But, for her part, ſhe deſired no preſent. It was enough if ſhe could contribute to reconcile man and wife, and diſappoint miſchief-makers. She doubted not, that ſuch an envious creature as Miſs Howe was glad that Mrs. Lovelace had eloped—Jealouſy and love was Old Nick!

See, Belford, how charmingly things work between me and my new acquaintance the widow!—Who knows, but that ſhe may, after a little farther intimacy, (though I am baniſhed the houſe at nights) contrive a midnight viſit for me to my ſpouſe, when all is ſtill and faſt aſleep?

Where can a woman be ſafe, who has once entered the liſts with a contriving and intrepid lover?

'But as to this letter,' methinks thou ſayeſt, 'of Miſs Howe?'

I knew thou wouldſt be uneaſy for me: but did not I tell thee that I had provided for every-thing? That I always took care to keep ſeals entire, and to preſerve covers? Was it not eaſy then, thinkeſt thou, to contrive a ſhorter letter out of a longer; and to copy the very words?

I can tell thee, it was ſo well ordered, that, not being ſuſpected to have been in my hands, it was not eaſy to find me out. Had it been my beloved's hand, there would have been no imitating it, for ſuch a length. Her delicate and even mind is ſeen in the very cut of her letters. Miſs Howe's hand is no bad one; but it is not ſo equal and regular. That little devil's natural impatience hurrying on her fingers, gave, I ſuppoſe, from the beginning, her hand-writing, as well as the reſt of her, it's fits and ſtarts, and thoſe peculiarities, which, like ſtrong muſcular lines in a face, neither the pen, nor the pencil, can miſs.

Haſt thou a mind to ſee what it was I permitted Miſs Howe to write to her lovely friend? Why then read it here, as extracted from hers of Wedneſday laſt, with a few additions of my own. The additions underſcored.

'MY DEAREST FRIEND,

'YOU will perhaps think, that I have 'been too long ſilent. But I had begun 'two letters at different times ſince my 'laſt, and written a great deal each time; 'and with ſpirit enough, I aſſure you; 'incenſed as I was againſt the abomina'ble wretch you are with, particularly 'on reading yours of the laſt of the paſt 'month.

'The FIRST I intended to keep open 'till I could give you ſome account of 'my proceedings with Townſend. It 'was ſome days before I ſaw her: and 'this intervenient ſpace giving me time 'to re-peruſe what I had written, I 'thought it proper to lay that aſide, and 'to write in a ſtyle a little leſs fer'vent; for you would have blamed me, 'I knew, for the freedom of ſome of my 'expreſſions, [execrations if you pleaſe.] 'And when I had gone a good way in 'the SECOND, the change in your pro'ſpects, on his communicating to you 'Miſs Montague's letter, and his better 'behaviour, occaſioning a change in 'your mind, I laid that aſide alſo: and 'in this uncertainty thought I would 'wait to ſee the iſſue of affairs between 'you before I wrote again; believing 'that all would ſoon be decided one way 'or other.

'Here I was forced to break off. I am too 'little my own miſtreſs—My mother is 'always up and down; and watching as 'if I were writing to a fellow. What 'need I [ſhe aſks me] lock myſelf in, if I 'am only reading paſt correſpondencies? 'For that is my pretence, when ſhe 'comes poking in with her face ſharp'ened to an edge, as I may ſay, by cu'rioſity that gives her more pain than 'pleaſure—The Lord forgive me; but 'I believe I ſhall huff her next time ſhe 'comes in.

'Do you forgive me too, my dear. 'My mother ought; becauſe ſhe ſays, 'I am my father's girl; and becauſe I 'am ſure I am hers.

'Upon my life, my dear, I am ſometimes 'of opinion, that this vile man was capable 'of meaning you diſhonour. When I look back 'upon his paſt conduct, I cannot help think'ing ſo: what a villain, if ſo!—But now I 'hope, and verily believe, that he has laid 'aſide ſuch thoughts. My reaſons for both 'opinions I will give you.

'For the firſt; to wit, that he had it once 'in his head to take you at advantage if he 'could. I conſider, that pride, revenge, and 'a delight to tread in unbeaten paths, 'are principal ingredients in the character of this finiſhed libertine. He hates 'all your family, yourſelf excepted— 'Yet is a ſavage in love. His pride, and 'the credit which a few plauſible quali'ties ſprinkled among his odious ones, 'have given him, have ſecured him too 'good a reception from our eye-judg'ing, our undiſtinguiſhing, our ſelf-flat'tering, our too-confiding ſex, to make 'aſſiduity and obſequiouſneſs, and a 'conqueſt of his unruly paſſions, any 'part of his ſtudy.

'He has ſome reaſon for his animoſity 'to all the men, and to one woman, of 'your family. He has always ſhewn 'you, and his whole family too, that he 'prefers his pride to his intereſt. He is 'a declared marriage-hater; a notori-'ous intriguer; full of his inventions, 'and glorying in them. As his vanity 'had made him imagine, that no wo-'man could be proof againſt his love, 'no wonder that he ſtruggled like a lion 'held in toils, againſt a paſſion that he 'thought not returned. Hence, per-'haps, it is not difficult to believe, that 'it became poſſible for ſuch a wretch as 'this to give way to his old prejudices 'againſt marriage; and to that revenge 'which had always been a firſt paſſion 'with him.

'And hence may we account for his de-'lays; his teazing ways; his bringing 'you to bear with his lodging in the ſame 'houſe; his making you paſs to the 'people of it as his wife; his bringing 'you into the company of his libertine 'companions; the attempt of impoſing 'upon you that Miſs Partington for a 'bedfellow, &c.

'My reaſons for the contrary opinion; to 'wit, that he is now reſolved to do you all 'the juſtice in his power to do you; are 'theſe: that he ſees that all his own 'family have warmly engaged them-'ſelves in your cauſe: that the horrid 'wretch loves you; with ſuch a love, 'however, as Herod loved his Mariamne: 'that, on enquiry, I find it to be true, 'that Counſellor Williams (whom Mr. 'Hickman knows to be a man of emi-'nence in his profeſſion) has actually as 'good as finiſhed the ſettlements: that 'two draughts of them have been made; 'one avowedly to be ſent to this very 'Captain Tomlinſon: and I find, that 'a licence has actually been more than 'once endeavoured to be obtained, and 'that difficulties have hitherto been 'made equally to Lovelace's vexation 'and diſappointment. My mother's 'proctor, who is very intimate with the 'proctor applied to by the wretch, has 'come at this information, in confidence; 'and hints, that as Mr. Lovelace is a 'man of high fortunes, theſe difficulties 'will probably be got over.

'I had once reſolved to make ſtrict en-'quiry about Tomlinſon; and ſtill, if you 'will, your uncle's favourite houſekeeper may 'be ſounded, at diſtance.

'I know that the matter is ſo laid, that 'Mrs. Hodges is ſuppoſed to know no-'thing of the treaty ſet on foot by means 'of Captain Tomlinſon. But your un-'cle is an old man; and old men 'imagine themſelves to be under obli-'gation to their paramours, if younger 'than themſelves, and ſeldom keep any-'thing from their knowledge.—Yet me-'thinks, there can be no need; ſince 'Tomlinſon, as you deſcribe him, is ſo 'good a man, and ſo much of a gentle-'man; the end to be anſwered by his 'being an impoſtor ſo much more than 'neceſſary, if Lovelace has villainy in 'his head.—And thus what he commu-'nicated to you of Mr. Hickman's ap-'plication to your uncle, and of Mrs. 'Norton's to your mother; (ſome of 'which particulars I am ſatisfied his vile 'agent Joſeph Leman could not reveal 'to his viler employer) his puſhing on 'the marriage-day, in the name of your 'uncle; which it could not anſwer any 'wicked purpoſe for him to do; and 'what he writes of your uncle's propoſal, 'to have it thought that you were mar-'ried from the time that you had lived 'in one houſe together; and that to be 'made to agree with the time of Mr. 'Hickman's viſit to your uncle; the in-'ſiſting on a truſty perſon's being pre-'ſent at the ceremony, at that uncle's 'nomination—Theſe things make me 'aſſured that he now at laſt means honoura-'bly.

'But if any unexpected delays ſhould hap-'pen on his ſide, acquaint me, my dear, 'with the very ſtreet where Mrs. Sinclair 'lives; and where Mrs. Fretchville's houſe 'is ſituated; (which I cannot find that you 'have ever mentioned in your former letters '—which is a little odd) and I will make 'ſtrict enquiries of them, and of Tomlinſon 'too; and I will (if your heart will let you 'take my advice) ſoon procure you a refuge 'from him with Mrs. Townſend.

'But why do I now, when you ſeem to be 'in ſo good a train, puzzle and perplex you 'with my retroſpections? And yet they may 'be of uſe to you, if any delay happen on 'his part.

'But that I think cannot well be. What 'you have therefore now to do, is, ſo to be-'have to this proud-ſpirited wretch, as may 'baniſh from his mind all remembrance of 'paſt diſobligations, and to receive his 'addreſſes, as thoſe of a betrothed lov-'er. You will incur the cenſure of 'prudery and affectation, if you keep 'him at that diſtance which you have 'hitherto kept him at. His ſudden (and 'as ſuddenly recovered) illneſs has giv-'en him an opportunity to find out that 'you love him. [Alas! my dear, I 'knew

'knew you loved him!] He has seemed 'to change his nature, and is all love 'and gentleness. And no more quarrels 'now, I beseech you.

'I am very angry with him, nevertheless, for the freedoms which he took with 'your person; and I think some guard is 'necessary, as he is certainly an encroacher. 'But indeed all men are so; and you are 'such a charming creature, and have kept 'him at such a distance!—But no more of 'this subject. Only, my dear, be not over-'nice, now you are so near the state. You 'see what difficulties you laid yourself under, 'when Tomlinson's letter called you 'again into the wretch's company.

'If you meet with no impediments, 'no new causes of doubt, your reputa-'tion in the eye of the world is con-'cerned, that you should be his, and, 'as your uncle rightly judges, he thought 'to have been his, before now. And yet, 'let me tell you, I can hardly bear to think, 'that these libertines should be reward-'ed for their villainy with the best of the 'sex, when the worst of it are too good 'for them.

'I shall send this long letter by Col-'lins, who changes his day to oblige 'me. As none of our letters by Wil-'son's conveyance have miscarried, when 'you have been in more apparently dis-'agreeable situations than you are in 'at present, I have no doubt that this will 'go safe.

'Miss Lardner (whom you have seen 'at her cousin Biddulph's) saw you at 'St. James's church on Sunday was 'fortnight. She kept you in her eye 'during the whole time; but could 'not once obtain the notice of yours, 'though she curtseyed to you twice. 'She thought to pay her compliments 'to you when the service was over; 'for she doubted not but you were mar-'ried—and for an odd reason—Because 'you came to church by yourself.—'Every eye, as usual, wherever you are, 'she said, was upon you: and this seem-'ing to give you hurry, and you being 'nearer the door than she, you slid out 'before she could get to you. But she 'ordered her servant to follow you till 'you were housed. This servant saw 'you step into a chair which waited for 'you; and you ordered the man to carry 'you to the place where they took you 'up. She describes the house, as a very 'genteel house, and fit to receive people 'of fashion: and what makes me mention 'this, is, that perhaps you will have a visit 'from her; or message, at least.

'So that you have Mr. Doleman's testi-'mony to the credit of the house and people 'you are with; and he is a man of for-'tune, and some reputation; formerly 'a rake indeed; but married to a wo-'man of family; and having had a palsy 'blow, one would think, a penitent. 'You have also Mr. Mennell's at least 'passive testimony; Mr. Tomlinson's; and 'now, lastly, Miss Lardner's; so that there 'will be the less need for enquiry: but you 'know my busy and inquisitive temper, as 'well as my affection for you, and my con-'cern for your honour. But all doubt will 'soon be lost in certainty.

'Nevertheless I must add, that I would 'have you command me up, if I can be 'of the least service or pleasure to you. 'I value not fame; I value not cen-'sure; nor even life itself, I verily 'think, as I do your honour and your 'friendship—For is not your honour 'my honour? and is not your friend-'ship the pride of my life?

'May Heaven preserve you, my dearest 'creature, in honour and safety, is the 'prayer, the hourly prayer, of your 'ever-faithful and affectionate

'ANNA HOWE.

'THURSDAY MORN. 5.

'I have written all night. Excuse 'indifferent writing. My crow-quils 'are worn to the stumps, and I must get 'a new supply.'

These ladies always write with crow-quils, Jack.

If thou art capable of taking in all my providences, in this letter, thou wilt admire my sagacity and contrivance almost as much as I do myself. Thou seest, that Miss Lardner, Mrs. Sinclair, Tomlinson, Mrs. Fretchville, Mennell, are all mentioned it. My first liberties with her person also. [Modesty, modesty, Belford, I doubt, is more confined to time, place, and occasion, even by the most delicate minds, than those minds would have it believed it to be.] And why all these taken notice of by me from the genuine letter, but for fear some future letter from the vixen should escape my hands, in which she might refer to those names? And if none of them were to have been found in this that is to pass for hers, I might be routed horse and foot, as Lord M. would phrase it in a like case.

Devilish hard (and yet I may thank myself) to be put to all this plague and trouble:—'And for what,' dost thou ask? O Jack, for a triumph of more value to me beforehand than an imperial crown!—Don't ask me the value of it a month hence. But what indeed is an imperial crown itſelf, when a man is uſed to it?

Miſs Howe might well be anxious about the letter ſhe wrote. Her ſweet friend, from what I have let paſs of hers, has reaſon to rejoice in the thought, that it fell not into my hands.

And now muſt all my contrivances be ſet at work, to intercept the expected letter from Miſs Howe; which is, as I ſuppoſe, to direct her to a place of ſafety, and out of my knowledge. Mrs. Townſend is, no doubt, in this caſe, to ſmuggle her off. I hope the villain, as I am ſo frequently called between theſe two girls, will be able to manage this point.

'But what, perhaps,' thou aſkeſt, 'if 'the lady ſhould take it into her head, 'by the connivance of Miſs Rawlins, 'to quit this houſe privately in the 'night?'

I have thought of this, Jack. Does not Will lie in the houſe? And is not the widow Bevis my faſt friend?

LETTER XV.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

SATURDAY, 6 O'CLOCK, JUNE 10.

THE lady gave Will's ſweetheart a letter laſt night to be carried to the poſt-houſe as this morning, directed for Miſs Howe, under cover to Hickman. I dare ſay neither cover nor letter will be ſeen to have been opened. The contents but eight lines—To own —The receipt of her double-dated letter in ſafety; and referring to a longer letter, which ſhe intends to write, when ſhe ſhall have a quieter heart, and leſs trembling fingers. But mentions ſomething to have happened [My detecting her ſhe means] which has given her very great flutters, confuſions and apprehenſions: but which ſhe will wait the iſſue of [Some hopes for me hence, Jack!] before ſhe gives her freſh perturbation or concern on her account.—She tells her how impatient ſhe ſhall be for her next, &c.

Now, Belford, I thought it would be but kind in me to ſave Miſs Howe's concern on theſe alarming hints; ſince the curioſity of ſuch a ſpirit muſt have been prodigiouſly excited by them. Having therefore ſo good a copy to imitate, I wrote; and taking out that of my beloved, put under the ſame cover the following ſhort billet; inſcriptive and concluſive parts of it in her own words.

'HAMPSTEAD, TUESDAY EVENING.

'MY EVER-DEAR MISS HOWE,

'A FEW lines only, till calmer ſpi-
'rits and quieter fingers can be grant'ed me, and till I can get over the ſhock
'which your intelligence has given me
'—To acquaint you—that your kind
'long letter of Wedneſday, and, as I
'may ſay, of Thurſday morning, is 'come ſafe to my hands. On receipt 'of yours by my meſſenger to you, I
'ſent for it from Wilſon's. There,
'thank Heaven! it lay. May that Hea'ven reward you for all your paſt, and
'for all your intended goodneſs to your
'for-ever obliged 'CL. HARLOWE.'

I took great pains in writing this. It cannot, I hope, be ſuſpected. Her hand is ſo very delicate. Yet hers is written leſs beautifully than ſhe uſually writes: and I hope Miſs Howe will allow ſomewhat for hurry of ſpirits, and unſteady fingers.

My conſideration for Miſs Howe's eaſe of mind extended ſtill farther than to the inſtance I have mentioned.

That this billet might be with her as ſoon as poſſible, (and before it could have reached Hickman by the poſt) I diſpatched it away by a ſervant of Mowbray's. Miſs Howe, had there been any failure or delay, might, as thou wilt think, have communicated her anxieties to your fugitive friend; and ſhe to me perhaps in a way I ſhould not have been pleaſed with.

Once more wilt thou wonderingly queſtion—All this pains for a ſingle girl?

Yes, Jack!—But is not this girl a CLARISSA?—And who knows but kind fortune, as a reward for my perſeverance, may toſs me in her charming friend? Leſs likely things have come to paſs, Belford. And to be ſure I ſhall have her, if I reſolve upon it.

LETTER XVI.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

EIGHT O'CLOCK, SAT. MORN. JUNE 10

I Am come back from Mrs. Moore's, whither I went in order to attend my charmer's commands. But no admittance—A very bad night.

Doubtleſs ſhe muſt be as much concerned, that ſhe has carried her reſentments ſo very far, as I have reaſon to be, that I made ſuch a poor uſe of the opportunity I had on Wedneſday night.

But now, Jack, for a brief review of my preſent ſituation; and a ſlight hint or two of my precautions.

I have ſeen the women this morning, and and find them half-right, half-doubting.

Miſs Rawlins's brother tells her, that ſhe lives at Mrs. Moore's.

Mrs. Moore can do nothing without Miſs Rawlins.

People who keep lodgings at publick places expect to get by every-one who comes into their purlieus. Though not permitted to lodge there myſelf, I have engaged all the rooms ſhe has to ſpare, to the very garrets; and that, as I have told thee before, for a month certain, and at her own price, board included; my ſpouſe's and all: but ſhe muſt not at preſent know it. So I hope I have Mrs. Moore faſt by the intereſt.

This, devil-like, is ſuiting temptations to inclinations.

I have always obſerved, and, I believe, I have hinted as much formerly, that all dealers, though but for pins, may be taken in by cuſtomers for pins, ſooner than by a direct bribe of ten times the value; eſpecially if pretenders to conſcience: for the office of a bribe would not only give room for ſuſpicion, but would ſtartle and alarm their ſcrupulouſneſs; while a high price paid for what you buy, is but ſubmitting to be cheated in the method the perſon makes a profeſſion to get by. Have I not ſaid that human nature is a rogue?—And do not I know that it is?

To give a higher inſtance, How many proud ſenators in the year 1720, were induced by preſents or ſubſcriptions of South Sea Stock, to contribute to a ſcheme big with national ruin; who yet would have ſpurned the man who ſhould have preſumed to offer them even twice the ſum certain, that they had a chance to gain by the ſtock?—But to return to my review, and to my precautions.

Miſs Rawlins fluctuates, as ſhe hears the lady's ſtory, or as ſhe hears mine. Somewhat of an infidel, I doubt, is this Miſs Rawlins. I have not yet conſidered her foible. The next time I ſee her, I will take particular notice of all the moles and freckles in her mind; and then infer and apply.

The widow Bevis, as I have told thee, is all my own.

My man Will lies in the houſe. My other new fellow attends upon me; and cannot therefore be quite ſtupid.

Already is Will over head and ears in love with one of Mrs. Moore's maids. He was ſtruck with her the moment he ſet his eyes upon her. A raw country wench too. But all women, from the counteſs to the cookmaid, are put into high good-humour with themſelves when a man is taken with them at firſt ſight. Be they ever ſo plain, [No woman can be ugly, Jack!] they'll find twenty good reaſons, beſides the great one (for God's ſake) by the help of the glaſs without (and perhaps in ſpite of it) and conceit within, to juſtify the honeſt fellow's caption.

The rogue has ſaved 150l. in my ſervice—More by fifty than I bid him ſave. No doubt, he thinks he might have done ſo; though I believe not worth a groat. The beſt of maſters I—Paſſionate, indeed; but ſoon appeaſed.

The wench is extremely kind to him already. The other maid is alſo very civil to him. He has a huſband for her in his eye. She cannot but ſay, that Mr. Andrew, my other ſervant [The girl is for fixing the perſon] is a very well ſpoken civil young man.

'We common folks have our joys, 'and pleaſe your honour,' ſays honeſt Joſeph Leman, 'like as our betters 'have.' And true ſays honeſt Joſeph.—Did I prefer eaſe to difficulty, I ſhould envy theſe low-born ſinners ſome of their joys.

But if Will had not made amorous pretenſions to the wenches, we all know, that ſervants, united in one common compare-note cauſe, are intimate the moment they ſee one another—Great genealogiſts too; they know immediately the whole kin and kin's kin of each other, though diſperſed over the three kingdoms, as well as the genealogies and kin's kin of thoſe whom they ſerve.

But my precautions end not here.

O Jack, with ſuch an invention, what occaſion had I to carry my beloved to Mrs. Sinclair's?

My ſpouſe may have further occaſion for the meſſengers whom ſhe diſpatched, one to Miſs Howe's, the other to Wilſon's. With one of theſe Will is already well acquainted, as thou haſt heard—To mingle liquor is to mingle ſouls with theſe fellows—With the other meſſenger he will ſoon be acquainted, if he be not already.

The captain's ſervant has his uſes and inſtructions aſſigned him. I have hinted at ſome of them already. He alſo ſerves a moſt humane and conſiderate maſter. I love to make every-body reſpected to my power.

The poſt, general and penny, will be ſtrictly watched likewiſe.

Miſs Howe's Collins is remembered to be deſcribed. Miſs Howe's and Hickman's liveries alſo.

James Harlowe and Singleton are warned warned againſt. I am to be acquainted with any enquiry that ſhall happen to be made after my ſpouſe, whether by her married or maiden name, before ſhe ſhall be told of it—And this that I may have it in my power to prevent miſchief.

I have ordered Mowbray and Tourville (and Belton, if his health permit) to take their quarters at Hampſtead for a week, with their fellows to attend them. I ſpare thee for the preſent, becauſe of thy private concerns. But hold thyſelf in cheerful readineſs however, as a mark of thy allegiance.

As to my ſpouſe herſelf, has ſhe not reaſon to be pleaſed with me for having permitted her to receive Miſs Howe's letter from Wilſon's? A plain caſe, either that I am no deep plotter, or that I have no further views than to make my peace with her for an offence ſo ſlight and ſo accidental.

Miſs Howe ſays, though prefaced with an alas! that her charming friend loves me: ſhe muſt therefore yearn after this reconciliation—Proſpects ſo fair—If ſhe uſed me with leſs rigour and more politeneſs; if ſhe ſhewed me any compaſſion; ſeemed inclinable to ſpare me, and to make the moſt favourable conſtructions; I cannot but ſay, that it would be impoſſible not to ſhew her ſome. But to be inſulted and defied by a rebel in one's power, what prince can bear that?

But I return to the ſcene of action. I muſt keep the women ſteady. I had no opportunity to talk to my worthy Mrs. Bevis in private.

Tomlinſon, a dog, not come yet!

LETTER XVII.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

FROM MY APARTMENTS AT MRS. MOORE'S.

MISS Rawlins at her brother's; Mrs. Moore engaged in houſehold matters; widow Bevis dreſſing; I have nothing to do but write. This curſed Tomlinſon not yet arrived!—Nothing to be done without him.

I think he ſhall complain in pretty high language of the treatment he met with yeſterday. What are our affairs to him? He can have no view but to ſerve us. Cruel to ſend back to town, un-audienced, unſeen, a man of his buſineſs and importance. He never ſtirs a foot, but ſomething of conſequence depends upon his movements. A confounded thing to trifle thus humourſomely with ſuch a gentleman's moments!—Theſe women think, that all the buſineſs of the world muſt ſtand ſtill for their figaries: [A good female word, Jack!] The greateſt triflers in the creation, to fancy themſelves the moſt important beings in it—Marry come up! as I have heard Goody Sorlings ſay to her ſervants, when ſhe has rated at them, with mingled anger and diſdain.

After all, methinks I want theſe toſtications [Thou ſeeſt how women, and women's words, fill my mind] to be over, happily over, that I may ſit down quietly, and reflect upon the dangers I have paſſed through, and the troubles I have undergone. I have a reflecting mind, as thou knoweſt; but the very word reflecting implies all got over.

What briars and thorns does the wretch ruſh into (a ſcratched face and tattered garments the unavoidable conſequence) who will needs be for ſtriking out a new path through overgrown underwood; quitting that beaten out for him by thoſe who have travelled the ſame road before him!

A VISIT from the widow Bevis, in my own apartment. She tells me, that my ſpouſe had thoughts laſt night, after I was gone to my lodgings, of removing from Mrs. Moore's.

I almoſt wiſh ſhe had attempted to do ſo.

Miſs Rawlins, it ſeems, who was applied to upon it, diſſuaded her from it.

Mrs. Moore alſo, though ſhe did not own that Will lay in the houſe, (or rather ſat up in it, courting) ſet before her the difficulties, which, in her opinion, ſhe would have to get clear of, without my knowledge; aſſuring her that ſhe could be no-where more ſafe than with her, till ſhe had fixed whither to go. And the lady herſelf recollected, that if ſhe went, ſhe might miſs the expected letter from her dear friend Miſs Howe; which, as ſhe owned, was to direct her future ſteps.

She muſt alſo ſurely have ſome curioſity to know what her uncle's friend had to ſay to her from her uncle, contemptuouſly as ſhe yeſterday treated a man of his importance. Nor could ſhe, I ſhould think, be abſolutely determined to put herſelf out of the way of receiving the viſits of two of the principal ladies of my family, and to break entirely with me in the face of them all.—Beſides, whither could ſhe have gone?—Moreover, Miſs Howe's letter coming (after her elopement) ſo ſafely to her hands, hands, muſt ſurely put her into a more confiding temper with me, and with every-one elſe, though ſhe would not immediately own it.

But theſe good folks have ſo little charity!—Are ſuch ſevere cenſurers!—Yet who is abſolutely perfect?—It were to be wiſhed, however, that they would be ſo modeſt as to doubt themſelves ſometimes: then would they allow for others, as others (excellent as they imagine themſelves to be) muſt for them.

SATURDAY, ONE O'CLOCK.

TOMLINSON at laſt is come. Forced to ride five miles about, (though I ſhall impute his delay to great and important buſineſs) to avoid the ſight of two or three impertinent rafcals, who, little thinking whoſe affairs he was employed in, wanted to obtrude themſelves upon him. I think I will make this fellow eaſy, if he behave to my liking in this affair.

I ſent up, the moment he came.

She deſired to be excuſed receiving his viſit till four this afternoon.

Intolerable!—No conſideration!—None at all in this ſex, when their curſed humours are in the way!—Pay-day, pay-hour, rather, will come!—O that it were to be the next!

The captain is in a pet. Who can blame him? Even the women think a man of his conſequence, and generouſly coming to ſerve us, hardly uſed. Would to Heaven ſhe had attempted to get off laſt night! The women not my enemies, who knows but the huſband's exerted authority might have met with ſuch connivance, as might have concluded either in carrying her back to her former lodgings, or in conſummation at Mrs. Moore's, in ſpite of exclamations, fits, and the reſt of the female obſecrations?

My beloved has not appeared to any-body this day, except to Mrs Moore. Is, it ſeems, extremely low: unfit for the intereſting converſation that is to be held in the afternoon. Longs to hear from her dear friend Miſs Howe—Yet cannot expect a letter for a day or two. Has a bad opinion of all mankind.—No wonder!—Excellent creature as ſhe is! with ſuch a father, ſuch uncles, ſuch a brother, as ſhe has!

How does ſhe look?

Better than could be expected from yeſterday's fatigue, and laſt night's ill reſt.

Theſe tender doves know not, till put to it, what they can bear; eſpecially when engaged in love-affairs; and their attention wholly engroſſed. But the fair love buſy ſcenes. Still-life is their averſion. A woman will create a ſtorm, rather than be without one. So that they can preſide in the whirlwind, and direct it, they are happy.—But my beloved's misfortune is, that ſhe muſt live in tumults; yet neither raiſe them herſelf, nor be able to controul them.

LETTER XVIII.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

SAT. NIGHT, JUNE 10.

WHAT will be the iſſue of all my plots and contrivances, devil take me if I am able to divine. But I will not, as Lord M. would ſay, foreſtall my own market.

At four, the appointed hour, I ſent up, to deſire admittance in the captain's name and my own.

She would wait upon the captain preſently: [Not upon me!] and in the parlour, if it were not engaged.

The dining-room being mine, perhaps that was the reaſon of her naming the parlour—Mighty nice again, if ſo!—'No good ſign for me,' thought I, 'this 'ſtiff punctilio.'

In the parlour, with me and the captain, were Mrs. Moore, Miſs Rawlins, and Mrs. Bevis.

The women ſaid, they would withdraw, when the lady came down.

Lovel. 'Not except ſhe chuſes you 'ſhould, ladies.—People who are ſo 'much above-board as I am, need not 'make ſecrets of any of their affairs. 'Beſides, you three ladies are now ac-'quainted with all our concerns.'

Capt. 'I have ſome things to ſay to 'your lady, that perhaps ſhe would not 'herſelf chuſe that any-body ſhould 'hear; not even you, Mr. Lovelace, as 'you and her family are not upon ſuch 'a good foot of underſtanding as were 'to be wiſhed.'

Lovel. 'Well, well, captain, I muſt 'ſubmit. Give us a ſign to withdraw; 'and we will withdraw.'

It was better that the excluſion of the women ſhould come from him, than from me.

Capt. 'I will bow, and wave my hand, 'thus—when I wiſh to be alone with 'the lady. Her uncle doats upon her. 'I hope, Mr. Lovelace, you will not 'make a reconciliation more difficult, 'for the earneſtneſs which my dear 'friend ſhews to bring it to bear: but 'indeed I muſt tell you, as I told you more 'than

'made plain before, that I am afraid you 'have made lighter of the occasion of 'this misunderstanding to me, than it 'ought to have been made.'

Lovel. 'I hope, Captain Tomlinson, 'you do not question my veracity!'

Capt. 'I beg your pardon, Mr. Love-'lace—But those things which we men 'may think lightly of, may not be light 'to a woman of delicacy.—And then, if 'you have bound yourself by a vow, you 'ought—'

Miss Rawlins bridling, her lips closed, (but her mouth stretched to a smile of approbation, the longer for not buttoning) tacitly shewed herself pleased with the captain for his delicacy.

Mrs. Moore could speak—'Very true,' however, was all she said, with a motion of her head that expressed the bow-approbatory.

'For my part,' said the jolly widow, staring with eyes as big as eggs, 'I know 'what I know—But man and wife are 'man and wife; or they are not man and 'wife.—I have no notion of standing 'upon such niceties.'

'But here she comes!' cried one, hearing her chamber-door open—'Here 'she comes!' another, hearing it shut after her—And down dropt the angel among us.

We all stood up, bowing and curtseying; and could not help it. For she entered with such an air as commanded all our reverence. Yet the captain looked plaguy grave.

Cl. 'Pray keep your seats, ladies—'Pray do not go.' [For they made offers to withdraw; yet Miss Rawlins would have burst, had she been suffered to retire.] 'Before this time you have 'heard all my story, I make no doubt—'Pray keep your seats—At least all Mr. 'Lovelace's.'

'A very saucy and whimsical begin-'ning,' thought I.

'Captain Tomlinson, your servant,' addressing herself to him with inimitable dignity. 'I hope you did not take 'amiss my declining your visit yesterday. 'I was really incapable of talking upon 'any subject that required attention.'

Capt. 'I am glad I see you better now, 'Madam. I hope I do.'

Cl. 'Indeed I am not well. I would 'not have excused myself from attend-'ing you some hours ago, but in hopes 'I should have been better. I beg your 'pardon, Sir, for the trouble I have 'given you; and shall the rather expect 'it, as this day will, I hope, conclude it 'all.'

'Thus set! thus determined!' thought I—'Yet to have slept upon it!'—But, as what she said was capable of a good, as well as a bad construction, I would not put an unfavourable one upon it.

Lovel. 'The captain was sorry, my 'dear, he did not offer his attendance 'the moment he arrived yesterday. He 'was afraid that you took it amiss that 'he did not.'

Cl. 'Perhaps I thought that my un-'cle's friend might have wished to see me 'as soon as he came.'—[How we stared!]—'But, Sir,' [to me] 'it might be con-'venient to you to detain him.'

'The devil!' thought I—'So there 'really was resentment, as well as head-'ache, as my good friend Mrs. Bevis 'observed, in her refusing to see the 'honest gentleman.'

Capt. 'You would detain me, Mr. 'Lovelace—I was for paying my respects 'to the lady the moment I came.'

Cl. 'Well, Sir,' [interrupting him] 'to 'wave this; for I would not be thought 'captious—If you have not suffered in-'convenience, in being obliged to come 'again, I shall be easy.'

Capt. [Half-disconcerted] 'A little in-'convenience, I can't say but I have 'suffered. I have, indeed, too many 'affairs upon my hands. But the desire 'I have to serve you and Mr. Lovelace, 'as well as to oblige my dear friend your 'uncle Harlowe, make great inconve-'niences but small ones.'

Cl. 'You are very obliging, Sir.—'Here is a great alteration since you 'parted with us last.'

Capt. 'A great one indeed, Madam! 'I was very much surprized at it, on 'Thursday evening, when Mr. Love-'lace conducted me to your lodgings, 'where we hoped to find you.'

Cl. 'Have you any-thing to say to me, 'Sir, from my uncle himself, that re-'quires my private ear?—Don't go, la-'dies,' [for the women stood up, and 'offered to withdraw]—'If Mr. Love-'lace stays, I am sure you may.'

I frowned. I bit my lip. I looked 'at the women, and shook my head.

Capt. 'I have nothing to offer, but 'what Mr. Lovelace is a party to, and 'may hear, except one private word 'or two, which may be postponed to the 'last.'

Cl. 'Pray, ladies, keep your seats.—'Things are altered, Sir, since I saw you. 'You can mention nothing that relates 'to me now, to which that gentleman can 'be a party.'

Capt. 'You surprize me, Madam! I

'am

'am sorry to hear this!—Sorry for your 'uncle's sake!—Sorry for your sake!—'Sorry for Mr. Lovelace's sake!—And 'yet I am sure he must have given 'greater occasion than he has mentioned 'to me, or——'

Lovel. 'Indeed, captain—Indeed, la-'dies—I have told you great part of my 'story!—And what I told you of my of-'fence was the truth:—What I conceal-'ed of my story was only what I appre-'hended would, if known, cause this 'dear creature to be thought more cen-'sorious than charitable.'

Cl. 'Well, well, Sir, say what you 'please. Make me as black as you 'please. Make yourself as white as you 'can. I am not now in your power: 'that consideration will comfort me for 'all.'

Capt. 'God forbid that I should offer 'to plead in behalf of a crime, that a 'woman of virtue and honour cannot 'forgive! But surely, surely, Madam, 'this is going too far.'

Cl. 'Do not blame me, Captain Tom-'linson. I have a good opinion of you, 'as my uncle's friend. But if you are 'Mr. Lovelace's friend, that is another 'thing; for my interests and Mr. Love-'lace's must now be for ever separated.'

Capt. 'One word with you, Madam, 'if you please,'—offering to retire.

Cl. 'You may say all that you please 'to say before these gentlewomen. Mr. 'Lovelace may have secrets. I have 'none. You seem to think me faulty: 'I should be glad that all the world 'knew my heart. Let my enemies sit 'in judgment upon my actions; fairly 'scanned I fear not the result. Let 'them even ask me my most secret 'thoughts, and, whether they make for 'me, or against me, I will reveal them.'

Capt. 'Noble lady! who can say as 'you say!'

The women held up their hands and eyes; each as if she had said, 'Not I.'

'No disorder here!' said Miss Rawlins: but (judging by her own heart) a confounded deal of improbability, I believe she thought.

'Finely said, to be sure,' said the widow Bevis, shrugging her shoulders.

Mrs. Moore sighed.

'Jack Belford,' thought I, 'knows all 'mine: and in this I am more ingenu-'ous than any of the three, and a fit 'match for this paragon.'

Cl. 'How Mr. Lovelace has found me 'out here, I cannot tell. But such mean 'devices, such artful, such worse than 'Waltham disguises put on, to obtrude 'himself into my company; such bold, 'such shocking untruths—'

Capt. 'The favour of but one word, 'Madam, in private.'

Cl. 'In order to support a right which 'he has not over me!—O Sir! O Cap-'tain Tomlinson!—I think, I have rea-'son to say, that the man (there he 'stands!) is capable of any vileness!'

The women looked upon one another, and upon me, by turns, to see how I bore it. I had such dartings in my head at the instant, that I thought I should have gone distracted. My brain seemed on fire. What would I have given to have had her alone with me!—I traversed the room; my clenched fist to my fore-head. 'O that I had any-body here,' thought I, 'that Hercules-like, when 'flaming in the tortures of Dejanira's 'poisoned shirt, I could tear in pieces!'

Capt. 'Dear lady! see you not how 'the poor gentleman—Lord, how have 'I imposed upon your uncle, at this 'rate! How happy, did I tell him, I saw 'you! How happy I was sure you would 'be in each other!'

Cl. 'Sir! you don't know how many 'premeditated offences I had forgiven 'when I saw you last, before I could ap-'pear to you, what I hoped then I might 'for the future be!—But you may tell 'my uncle, if you please, that I cannot 'hope for his mediation. Tell him, 'that my guilt, in giving this man an 'opportunity to spirit me away from my 'tried, my experienced, my natural friends, '(harshly as they treated me) stares me 'every day more and more in the face; 'and still the more, as my fate seems to 'be drawing to a crisis, according to 'the malediction of my offended father!'

And then she burst into tears, which even affected that dog, who, brought to abet me, was himself all Belford over.

The women, so used to cry without grief, as they are to laugh without reason, by mere force of example, [Confound their promptitudes!] must needs pull out their handkerchiefs. The less wonder, however, as I myself, between confusion, surprize, and concern, could hardly stand it.

What's a tender heart good for?—Who can be happy that has a feeling heart?—And yet thou'lt say, that he who has it not, must be a tyger, and no man.

Capt. 'Let me beg the favour of one 'word with you, Madam, in private; 'and that on my own account.'

The women hereupon offered to retime. She insisted, that if they went, I should not stay.

Capt. 'Sir,' bowing to me, 'shall I 'beg—'

'I hope,' thought I, 'that I may trust 'this solemn dog, instructed as he is. 'She does not doubt him. I'll stay out 'no longer than to give her time to spend 'her first fire.'

I then passively withdrew, with the women—But with such a bow to my goddess, that it won for me every heart but that I wanted most to win; for the haughty maid bent not her knee in return.

The conversation between the captain and the lady, when we were retired, was to the following effect: they both talked loud enough for me to hear them: the lady from anger, the captain with design; and thou mayest be sure there was no listener but myself. What I was imperfect in was supplied afterwards; for I had my vellum-leaved book to note all down. If she had known this, perhaps she would have been more sparing of her invectives—and but perhaps neither.

He told her, that as her brother was absolutely resolved to see her; and as he himself, in compliance with her uncle's expedient, had reported her marriage; and as that report had reached the ears of Lord M. Lady Betty, and the rest of my relations; and as he had been obliged, in consequence of his first report, to vouch it; and as her brother might find out where she was, and apply to the women here, for a confirmation or refutation of the marriage; he had thought himself obliged to countenance the report before the women: that this had embarrassed him not a little, as he would not for the world that she should have cause to think him capable of prevarication, contrivance, or double-dealing: and that this made him desirous of a private conversation with her.

It was true, she said, she had given her consent to such an expedient, believing it was her uncle's; and little thinking, that it would lead to so many errors. Yet she might have known, that one error is frequently the parent of many. Mr. Lovelace had made her sensible of the truth of that observation, on more occasions than one; and it was an observation that he, the captain, had made in some of the letters that was shewn her yesterday.

He hoped, that she had no mistrust of him! that she had no doubt of his honour. 'If, Madam, you suspect me—'If you think me capable—What a 'man—The Lord be merciful to me!—'What a man must you think me!'

'I hope, Sir, there cannot be a man 'in the world who could deserve to be 'suspected in such a case as this. I do 'not suspect you. If it were possible 'there could be one such man, I am sure, 'Captain Tomlinson, a father of children, a man in years, of sense, and experience, cannot be that man.'

He told me, that just then, he thought he felt a sudden flash from her eye, an eye-beam as he called it, dart through his shivering reins; and he could not help trembling.

The dog's conscience, Jack!—Nothing else!—I have felt half a dozen such flashes, such eye-beams, in as many different conversations with this soul-piercing beauty.

Her uncle, she must own, was not accustomed to think of such expedients: but she had reconciled this to herself, as the case was unhappily uncommon; and by the regard he had for her honour.

This set the puppy's heart at ease, and gave him more courage.

She asked him, if he thought Lady Betty and Miss Montague intended her a visit?

He had no doubt but they did.

'And does he imagine,' said she, 'that 'I could be brought to countenance to 'them the report you have given out?'

[I had hoped to bring her to this, Jack, or she had not seen their letters. But I had told the captain, that I believed I must give up this expectation.]

No. He believed, that I had not such a thought. He was pretty sure, that I intended, when I saw them, to tell them (as in confidence) the naked truth.

He then told her, that her uncle had already made some steps towards a general reconciliation. 'The moment, 'Madam, that he knows you are really 'married, he will enter into conference 'with your father upon it; having actually expressed to your mother, his desire to be reconciled to you.'

'And what, Sir, said my mother? 'What said my dear mother?'

With great emotion she asked this question; holding out her sweet face, as the captain described her, with the most earnest attention, as if she would shorten the way which his words were to have to her heart.

'Your mother, Madam, burst into 'tears upon it: and your uncle was so 'penetrated by her tenderness, that he 'could

'could not proceed with the subject.
'But he intends to enter upon it with 'her in form, as soon as he hears that
'the ceremony is over.'

By the tone of her voice she wept.
'The dear creature,' thought I, 'begins
'to relent!'—And I grudged the dog his eloquence. I could hardly bear the thought, that any man breathing should have the power which I had lost, of persuading this high-souled woman, though in my own favour. And, wouldst thou think it? this reflection gave me more uneasiness at the moment, than I felt from her reproaches, violent as they were; or than I had pleasure in her supposed relenting. For there is beauty in every-thing she says and does: beauty in her passion: beauty in her tears!—
Had the captain been a young fellow, and of rank and fortune, his throat would have been in danger; and I should have thought very hardly of her.

'O Captain Tomlinson,' said she,
'you know not what I have suffered by
'this man's strange ways! He had, as 'I was not ashamed to tell him yesterday,
'a plain path before him. He at first be'trayed me into his power: but when I 'was in it—' There she stopt. Then resuming—'O Sir, you know not what
'a strange man he has been!—An un-
'polite, a rough-manner'd man!—In 'disgrace of his birth, and education,
'and knowledge, an unpolite man!—
'And so acting, as if his worldly and 'personal advantages set him above
'those graces which distinguish a gen'tleman.'

'The first woman that ever said, or
'that ever thought so of me, that's my 'comfort!' thought I.—But this (spoken to her uncle's friend behind my back) helps to heap up thy already too-full measure, dearest!—It is down in my vellum-book.

Cl. 'When I look back on his whole
'behaviour to a poor young creature,
'(for I am but a very young creature!)
'I cannot acquit him either of great
'folly, or of deep design.—And, last 'Wednesday—' There she stopt; and I suppose turned away her face.

I wonder she was not ashamed to hint at what she thought so shameful; and that to a man, and alone with him.

Capt. 'Far be it from me, Madam,
'to offer to enter too closely into so ten-
'der a subject. Mr. Lovelace owns,
'that you have reason to be displeased
'with him. But he so solemnly clears
'himself to me, of premeditated offence—'

Cl. 'He cannot clear himself, Cap'tain Tomlinson. The people of the 'house must be very vile, as well as he:
'I am convinced, that there was a
'wicked confederacy.—But no more
'upon such a subject.'

Capt. 'Only one word more, Madam!
'—He tells me, that you promised to 'pardon him. He tells me—'

'He knew,' interrupted she, 'that 'he deserved not pardon, or he had not 'extorted that promise from me. Nor 'had I given it to him, but to shield my'self from the vilest outrage.'

Capt. 'I could wish, Madam, inex-
'cusable as his behaviour has been, since
'he has something to plead in the reli-
'ance he made upon your promise; that,
'for the sake of appearances to the world,
'and to avoid the mischiefs that may 'follow if you absolutely break with 'him, you could prevail upon your na'turally generous mind to lay an obliga-
'tion upon him by your forgiveness.'

She was silent.

Capt. 'Your father and mother, Ma-
'dam, deplore a daughter lost to them,
'whom your generosity to Mr. Love-
'lace may restore: do not put it to the 'possible chance, that they may have 'cause to deplore a double loss; the los'ing of a son, as well as a daughter, who,
'by his own violence, which your mild
'perhaps prevent, may be for ever lost
'to them, and to the whole family.'

She paused. She wept. She owned, that she felt the force of this argument.

'I will be the making this fellow,' thought I.

Capt. 'Permit me, Madam, to tell 'you, that I do not think it would be 'difficult to prevail upon your uncle,
'if you insist upon it, to come up pri'vately to town, and to give you with 'his own hand to Mr. Lovelace—Ex'cept indeed your present misunder-
'standing were to come to his ears.—
'Besides, Madam, your brother, it is 'likely, may at this very time be in 'town; and he is resolved to find you
'out.'

Cl. 'Why, Sir, should I be so much
'afraid of my brother? My brother has 'injured me, not I him. Will my brother
'offer to me, what Mr. Lovelace has 'offered!—Wicked, ingrateful man!
'to insult a friendless, unprotected crea'ture, made friendless by himself!—I 'cannot, cannot think of him in the 'light I once thought of him. What,
'Sir, to put myself into the power of a 'wretch, who has acted by me with so

'much vile [illegible] who shall 'pity, who shall excuse me, if I do, 'were I to suffer ever so much from him? '—No, Sir. Let Mr. Lovelace leave 'me. Let my brother find me. I am 'not such a poor creature, as to be 'afraid to face the brother who has in'jured me.'

Capt. 'Were you and your brother 'to meet only to confer together, to ex'postulate, to clear up difficulties, it 'were another thing. But what, Ma'dam, can you think will be the issue 'of an interview, (Mr. Solmes with him) 'when he finds you unmarried, and re'solved never to have Mr. Lovelace; 'supposing Mr. Lovelace were not to in'terfere; which cannot be imagined?'

Cl. 'Well, Sir, I can only say I am a 'very unhappy creature!—I must resign 'to the will of Providence, and be pati'ent under evils, which that will not per'mit me to shun. But I have taken my 'measures. Mr. Lovelace can never 'make me happy, nor I him. I wait here 'only for a letter from Miss Howe. 'That must determine me—'

'Determine you as to Mr. Lovelace, 'Madam?' interrupted the captain.

Cl. 'I am already determined as to 'him.'

Capt. 'If it be not in his favour, I 'have done. I cannot use stronger ar'guments than I have used, and it would 'be impertinent to repeat them. If you 'cannot forgive his offence, I am sure 'it must have been much greater than 'he has owned to me. If you are abso'lutely determined, be pleased to let me 'know what I shall say to your uncle? 'You were pleased to tell me, that this 'day would put an end to what you called 'my trouble. I should not have thought 'it any, could I have been an humble 'means of reconciling persons of worth 'and honour to each other.'

Here I entered with a solemn air.

Lovel. 'Captain Tomlinson, I have 'heard a part of what has passed between 'you and this unforgiving (however 'otherwise excellent) lady. I am cut 'to the heart to find the dear creature 'so determined. I could not have be'lieved it possible, with such prospects, 'that I had so little share in her esteem. 'Nevertheless I must do myself justice 'with regard to the offence I was so un'unhappy as to give, since I find you 'are ready to think it much greater than 'it really was.'

Cl. 'I hear not, Sir, your recapitu'lations. I am, and ought to be, the 'sole judge of insults offered to my per'son. I enter not into discussion with 'you, nor hear you on the shocking 'subject.' And was going.

I put myself between her and the door —'You may hear all I have to say, Ma'dam. My fault is not of such a nature, 'but that you may. I will be a just ac'cuser of myself; and will not wound 'your ears.'

I then protested that the fire was a real fire. [So it was] I disclaimed [less truly indeed] premeditation. I owned that I was hurried on by the violence of a youthful passion, and by a sudden impulse, which few other persons, in the like situation, would have been able to check: that I withdrew, at her command and entreaty, on the promise of pardon, without having offered the least indecency, or any freedom, that would not have been forgiven by persons of delicacy, surprized in an attitude so charming—Her terror on the alarm of fire, calling for a soothing behaviour, and personal tenderness, she being ready to fall into fits: my hoped-for happy day so near, that I might be presumed to be looked upon as a betrothed lover—And that this excuse might be pleaded even for the women of the house, that they, thinking us actually married, might suppose themselves to be the less concerned to interfere on so tender an occasion—There, Jack, was a bold insinuation on behalf of the women!

High indignation filled her disdainful eye, eye-beam after eye-beam flashing at me. Every feature of her sweet face had soul in it. Yet she spoke not. Perhaps, Jack, she had a thought, that this plea for the women accounted for my contrivance to have her pass to them as married, when I first carried her thither.

Capt. 'Indeed, Sir, I must say that 'you did not well to add to the appre'hensions of a lady so much terrified 'before.'

The dear creature offered to go by me. I set my back against the door, and beseught her to stay a few moments. 'I had not said thus much, my dearest 'creature, but for your sake, as well as 'for my own, that Captain Tomlinson 'should not think I had been viler than 'I was. Nor will I say one word more 'on the subject, after I have appealed 'to your own heart, whether it was not 'necessary, that I should say so much; 'and to the captain, whether otherwise 'he would not have gone away with a 'much worse opinion of me, if he had 'judged of my offence by the violence of 'your resentment.'

Capt.

Capt. 'Indeed I should. I own I should. 'And I am very glad, Mr. Lovelace, 'that you are able to defend yourself 'thus far.'

Cl. 'That cause must be well tried, 'where the offender takes his seat upon 'the same bench with the judge.—I sub'mit not mine to men—Not, give me 'leave to say, to you, Captain Tomlin'son, though I am willing to have a 'good opinion of you. Had not the man 'been assured that he had influenced 'you in his favour, he would not have 'brought you up to Hampstead.'

Capt. 'That I am influenced, as you 'call it, Madam, is for the sake of your 'uncle, and for your own sake, more '(I will say to Mr. Lovelace's face) than 'for his. What can I have in view, 'but peace and reconciliation? I have, 'from the first, blamed, and I now, 'again, blame Mr. Lovelace, for add'ing distress to distress, and terror to 'terror—the lady, as you acknowledge, 'Sir,' [looking valiantly] ready before to 'fall into fits.'

Lovel. 'Let me own to you, Captain 'Tomlinson, that I have been a very 'faulty, a very foolish man; and, if this 'dear creature ever honoured me with 'her love, an ingrateful one. But I have 'had too much reason to doubt it. And 'this is now a flagrant proof that she 'never had the value for me which my 'proud heart wished for; that, with 'such prospects before us; a day so near; 'settlements approved and drawn; her 'uncle meditating a general reconcilia'tion, which, for her sake, not my own, 'I was desirous to give into; she can, for 'an offence so really slight, on an occa'sion so truly accidental, renounce me 'for ever; and, with me, all hopes of 'that reconciliation in the way her uncle 'had put it in, and she had acquiesced 'with; and risque all consequences, fa'tal ones as they may too possibly be.—'By my soul, Captain Tomlinson, the 'dear creature must have hated me all 'the time she was intending to honour 'me with her hand. And now she must 'resolve to abandon me, as far as I 'know, with a preference in her heart 'of the most odious of men—in favour 'of that Solmes, who, as you tell me, ac'companies her brother: and with what 'hopes, with what view, accompanies 'him!—How can I bear to think of 'this?'

Cl. 'It is fit, Sir, that you should 'judge of my regard for you, by your 'own consciousness of demerit. Yet you 'know, or you would not have dared 'to behave to me as sometimes you did, 'that you had more of it than you de'served.'

She walked from us; and then re turning, 'Captain Tomlinson,' said she, 'I will own to you, that I was not 'capable of resolving to give my hand, 'and—nothing but my hand. Have I not 'given a flagrant proof of this to the 'once most indulgent of parents? which 'has brought me into a distress, which 'this man has heightened, when he 'ought, in gratitude and honour, to 'have endeavoured to render it sup'portable. I had even a bias, Sir, in 'his favour, I scruple not to own it. 'Long, (much too long!) bore I with 'his unaccountable ways, attributing 'his errors to unmeaning gaiety, and to a 'want of knowing what true delicacy, and 'true generosity, required from a heart 'susceptible of grateful impressions to 'one involved by his means in unhappy 'circumstances. It is now wickedness in 'him (a wickedness which discredits all 'his professions) to say, that his last cruel 'and ungrateful insult was not a premeditated one—But what need I say more 'of this insult, when it was of such a 'nature, that it has changed that bias 'in his favour, and made me chuse to 'forego all the inviting prospects he 'talks of, and to run all hazards, to 'free myself from his power?'

'O my dearest creature! how happy 'for us both, had I been able to discover 'that bias, as you condescend to call it, 'through such reserves as man never 'encountered with!'

'He did discover it, Captain Tom'linson. He brought me, more than once, 'to own it; the more needlessly bringing 'me to own it, as I dare say his own 'vanity give him no cause to doubt it; and 'as I had apparently no other motive in 'not being forward to own it, than my 'too justly-founded apprehensions of 'his want of generosity. In a word, Cap'tain Tomlinson, (and now, that I am 'determined upon my measures, I the 'less scruple to say it) I should have de'spised myself, had I found myself ca'pable of affectation or tyranny to the 'man I intended to marry. I have al'ways blamed the dearest friend I have 'in the world for a fault of this nature. 'In a word—'

Lovel. 'And had my angel really and 'indeed the favour for me she is pleased 'to own!—Dearest creature, forgive 'me. Restore me to your good opinion. 'Surely I have not sinned beyond for'giveness. You say, that I extorted

'from

'from you the promiſe you made me. 'But I could not have preſumed to 'make that promiſe the condition of my 'obedience, had I not thought there 'was room to expect forgiveneſs. Permit, 'I beſeech you, the proſpects to take 'place, that were opening ſo agreeably 'before us. I will go to town, and bring 'the licence. All difficulties to the ob'taining of it are ſurmounted. Captain 'Tomlinſon ſhall be witneſs to the deeds. 'He will be preſent at the ceremony on 'the part of your uncle. Indeed he 'gave me hope, that your uncle him'ſelf—'

Capt. 'I did, Mr. Lovelace: and I 'will tell you my grounds for the hope 'I gave. I promiſed to my dear friend '—(Your uncle, Madam) that he ſhould 'give out, that he would take a turn 'with me to my little farm-houſe, as I 'call it, near Northampton, for a week 'or ſo.—Poor gentleman! he has of late 'been very little abroad! Too viſibly in'deed declining!—Change of air, it 'might be given out, was good for him. '—But I ſee, Madam, that this is too 'tender a ſubject.'

The dear creature wept. She knew how to apply as meant the captain's hint to the occaſion of her uncle's declining ſtate of health.

Capt. 'We might indeed, I told him, 'ſet out in that road, but turn ſhort to 'town in my chariot; and he might ſee 'the ceremony performed with his own 'eyes, and be the deſired father, as well 'as the beloved uncle.'

She turned from us, and wiped her eyes.

Capt. 'And, really, there ſeem now 'to be but two objections to this, as Mr. 'Harlowe diſcouraged not the propoſal '—The one, the unhappy miſunder'ſtanding between you; which I would 'not by any means he ſhould know; 'ſince then he might be apt to give 'weight to Mr. James Harlowe's unjuſt 'ſurmiſes.—The other, that it would 'neceſſarily occaſion ſome delay to the 'ceremony; which certainly may be 'performed in a day or two—If—'

And then he reverently bowed to my goddeſs.—Charming fellow!—But often did I curſe my ſtars, for making me ſo much obliged to his adroitneſs.

She was going to ſpeak; but, not liking the turn of her countenance, (although, as I thought, it's ſeverity and indignation ſeemed a little abated) I ſaid, and had like to have blown myſelf up by it—'One expedient I have juſt 'thought of.'

Cl. 'None of your expedients, Mr. 'Lovelace!—I abhor your expedients, 'your inventions—I have had too many 'of them.'

Lovel. 'See, Captain Tomlinſon!—'See, Sir!—O how we expoſe ourſelves 'to you!—Little did you think, I dare 'ſay, that we have lived in ſuch a con'tinued miſunderſtanding together!—'But you will make the beſt of it all. 'We may yet be happy. O that I could 'have been aſſured, that this dear crea'ture loved me with the hundredth part 'of the love I have for her!—Our diffi'dences have been mutual. I preſume 'to ſay, that ſhe has too much punctilio. 'I am afraid, that I have too little. 'Hence our difficulties. But I have a 'heart, Captain Tomlinſon, a heart that 'bids me hope for her love, becauſe it 'is reſolved to deſerve it as much as 'man can deſerve it.

Capt. 'I am indeed ſurprized at what 'I have ſeen and heard.—I defend not 'Mr. Lovelace, Madam, in the offence 'he has given you—As a father of 'daughters myſelf, I cannot defend him; 'though his fault ſeems to be lighter 'than I had apprehended—But in my 'conſcience, Madam, I think you carry 'your reſentment too high.'

Cl. 'Too high, Sir!—Too high, to 'the man that might have been happy 'if he would!—Too high, to the man 'that has held my ſoul in ſuſpence an hun'dred times, ſince (by artifice and de'ceit) he obtained a power over me!—'Say, Lovelace, thyſelf ſay, Art thou 'not the very Lovelace, who by inſult'ing me, haſt wronged thine own hopes? '—The wretch that appeared in vile 'diſguiſes, perſonating an old lame 'creature, ſeeking for lodgings for thy 'ſick wife?—Telling the gentlewomen 'here, ſtories all of thine own inven'tion; and aſſerting to them an huſ'band's right over me, which thou haſt 'not?—And is it' [Turning to the cap'tain] 'to be expected, that I ſhould 'give credit to the proteſtations of ſuch 'a man?'

Lovel. 'Treat me, deareſt creature, as 'you pleaſe, I will bear it: and yet 'your ſcorn and your violence have fix'ed daggers in my heart—But was it 'poſſible, without thoſe diſguiſes, to 'come at your ſpeech?—And could I 'loſe you, if ſtudy, if invention, would 'put it in my power to arreſt your anger, 'and give me hope to engage you to 'confirm to me the promiſed pardon? The 'addreſs I made to you before the wo'men, as if the marriage-ceremony had

'paſſed,

'paſſed, was in conſequence of what 'your uncle had adviſed, and what you 'had acquieſced with; and the rather made, 'as your brother, and Singleton, and 'Solmes, were reſolved to find out 'whether what was reported of your 'marriage were true or not, that they 'might take their meaſures accordingly; and in hopes to prevent that miſchief, which I have been but too ſtudious to prevent, ſince this tameneſs 'has but invited inſolence from your 'brother and his confederates.'

Cl. 'O thou ſtrange wretch, how thou 'talkeſt!—But, Captain Tomlinſon, 'give me leave to ſay, that, were I inclined to enter farther upon this ſubject, I would appeal to Miſs Rawlins's 'judgment. (Whom elſe have I to appeal to?) She ſeems to be a perſon of 'prudence and honour; but not to any 'man's judgment, whether I carry my 'reſentment beyond fit bounds, when I 'reſolve—'

Capt. 'Forgive, Madam, the interruption—But I think there can be no 'reaſon for this. You ought, as you 'ſaid, to be the ſole judge of indignities 'offered you. The gentlewomen here 'are ſtrangers to you. You will perhaps ſtay but a little while among 'them. If you lay the ſtate of your caſe 'before any of them, and your brother 'come to enquire of them, your uncle's 'intended mediation will be diſcovered; 'and rendered abortive—I ſhall appear 'in a light that I never appeared in, 'in my life—for theſe women may not 'think themſelves obliged to keep the 'ſecret.'

Charming fellow!

Cl. 'O what difficulties has one fatal 'ſtep involved me in!—But there is no 'neceſſity for ſuch an appeal to anybody. I am reſolved on my meaſures.'

Capt. 'Abſolutely reſolved, Madam?'

Cl. 'I am.'

Capt. 'What ſhall I ſay to your uncle 'Harlowe, Madam?—Poor gentleman! 'how will he be ſurprized!—You ſee, 'Mr. Lovelace—You ſee, Sir—' Turning to me, with a flouriſhing hand—'But you may thank yourſelf—' And admirably ſtalked he from us.

'True, by my ſoul,' thought I. I traverſed the room, and bit my unperſuaſive lips, now upper, now under, for vexation.

He made a profound reverence to her—And went to the window, where lay his hat and whip; and, taking them up, opened the door. 'Child,' ſaid he, to ſomebody he ſaw, 'pray, order 'my ſervant to bring my horſe to the 'door.'

Lovel. 'You won't go, Sir—I hope 'you won't!—I am the unhappieſt man 'in the world!—You won't go—Yet 'alas!—But you won't go, Sir?—There 'may be yet hopes that Lady Betty may 'have ſome weight.'

Capt. 'Dear Mr. Lovelace! and may 'not my worthy friend, an affectionate 'uncle, hope for ſome influence upon his 'daughter-niece?—But I beg pardon—'A letter will always find me diſpoſed 'to ſerve the lady, and that as well for 'her ſake, as for the ſake of my dear 'friend.'

She had thrown herſelf into a chair; her eyes caſt down: ſhe was motionleſs, as in a profound ſtudy.

The captain bowed to her again: but met with no return to his bow. 'Mr. 'Lovelace,' ſaid he, (with an air of equality and independence) 'I am your's.'

Still the dear unaccountable ſat as immoveable as a ſtatue; ſtirring neither hand, foot, head, nor eye—I never before ſaw any one in ſo profound a reverie, in ſo waking a dream.

He paſſed by her to go out at the door ſhe ſat near, though the paſſage by the other door was his direct way; and bowed again. She moved not. 'I will 'not diſturb the lady in her meditations, 'Sir.—Adieu, Mr. Lovelace—No further, I beſeech you.'

She ſtarted, ſighing—'Are you going, 'Sir?'

Capt. 'I am, Madam. I could have 'been glad to do you ſervice; but I ſee 'it is not in my power.'

She ſtood up, holding out one hand, with inimitable dignity and ſweetneſs '—I am ſorry you are going, Sir!—I 'can't help it—I have no friend to adviſe with—Mr. Lovelace has the art (or 'good fortune, perhaps I ſhould call it) 'to make himſelf many.—Well, Sir—'—if you will go, I can't help it.'

Capt. 'I will not go, Madam;' his eyes twinkling. [Again ſeized with a fit of humanity!] 'I will not go, if my 'longer ſtay can do you either ſervice or 'pleaſure.—What, Sir,' [Turning to me] 'what, Mr. Lovelace, was your 'expedient?—Perhaps ſomething may 'be offered, Madam—'

She ſighed, and was ſilent.

'REVENGE,' invoked I to myſelf, 'keep 'thy throne in my heart.—If the power 'LOVE once more drive thee from it, thou 'wilt never regain poſſeſſion!'

Lovel. 'What I had thought of, when 'I had intended to propoſe,' [And I ſighed] lighed] 'was this, That the dear creature, if she will not forgive me, as she promised, will suspend the displeasure she has conceived against me, till Lady Betty arrives.—That lady may be the mediatrix between us. This dear creature may put herself into her protection, and accompany her down to her seat in Oxfordshire. It is one of her ladyship's purposes to prevail on her supposed new niece to go down with her. It may pass to every-one but to Lady Betty, and to you, Captain Tomlinson, and to your friend Mr. Harlowe, (as he desires) that we have been some time married: and her being with my relations, will amount to a proof to James Harlowe, that we are; and our nuptials may be privately, and at this beloved creature's pleasure, solemnized; and your report, captain, authenticated.'

Capt. 'Upon my honour, Madam,' clapping his hand upon his breast, 'a charming expedient!—This will answer every end.'

She mused—She was greatly perplexed—At last, 'God direct me!' said she: 'I know not what to do—A young unfriended creature. Whom have I to advise with!—Let me retire, if I can retire.'

She withdrew with slow and trembling feet, and went up to her chamber.

'For Heaven's sake,' said the penetrated varlet, [his hands lifted up] 'for 'Heaven's sake, take compassion upon this admirable woman!—I cannot proceed—I cannot proceed—she deserves 'all things.'

'Softly!—damn the fellow!—The 'women are coming in.'

He sobbed up his grief—turned about—hemmed up a more manly accent—'Wipe thy cursed eyes.'—He did. The sunshine took place on one cheek, and spread slowly to the other, and the fellow had his whole face again.

The women all three came in, led by that ever-curious Miss Rawlins. I told them, that the lady was gone up to consider of every-thing: that we had hopes of her. And such a representation we made of all that had passed, as brought either tacit or declared blame upon the fair-perverse for hardness of heart and over-delicacy.

The widow Bevis, in particular, put out one lip, tossed up her head, wrinkled her forehead, and made such motions with her now lifted-up, now cast-down eyes, as shewed, that she thought there was a great deal of perverseness and affectation in the lady. Now-and-then she changed her censuring looks to looks of pity of me—But, (she said) She loved not to aggravate!—'A poor business, 'God help's!' shrugging up her shoulders, 'to make such a rout about!' And then her eyes laughed heartily—Indulgence was a good thing! Love was a good thing!—But too much was too much!

Miss Rawlins, however, declared, after she had called the widow Bevis, with a prudish simper, a comical gentlewoman! that there must be something in our story, which she could not fathom; and went from us into a corner, and sat down, seemingly vexed that she could not.

LETTER XIX.

MR. LOVELACE. IN CONTINUATION.

THE lady staid longer above than we wished; and I hoping that (ladylike) she only waited for an invitation to return to us, desired the widow Bevis, in the captain's name, (who wanted to go to town) to request the favour of her company.

I cared not to send up either Miss Rawlins or Mrs. Moore on the errand, lest my beloved should be in a communicative disposition; especially as she had hinted at an appeal to Miss Rawlins; who, besides, has such an unbounded curiosity.

Mrs. Bevis presently returned with an answer, (winking and pinking at me) that the lady would follow her down. Miss Rawlins could not but offer to retire, as the others did. Her eyes, however, intimated that she had rather stay. But they not being answered as she seemed to wish, she went with the rest, but with slower feet; and had hardly left the parlour, when the lady entered it by the other door; a melancholy dignity in her person and air.

She sat down. 'Pray, Mr. Tomlin-'son, be seated.'

He took his chair over-against her. I stood behind hers, that I might give him agreed-upon signals, should there be occasion for them.

As thus—A wink of the left-eye was to signify, 'Push that point, captain.'

A wink of the right, and a nod, was to indicate approbation of what he had said.

My fore-finger held up, and biting my lip, 'Get off of that, as fast as pos-'sible.'

A right-forward nod, and a frown—'Swear to it, captain.'

My whole spread hand, 'To take care

not

not to say too much on that particular subject.

A frowning brow, and a positive nod, was to bid him rise in temper.

And these motions I could make, even these with my hand, without holding up my arm, or moving my wrist, had the women been there: as, when the motions were agreed upon, I knew not but they would.

She hemmed—I was going to speak, to spare her supposed confusion: but this lady never wants presence of mind, when presence of mind is necessary either to her honour, or to that conscious dignity which distinguishes her from all the women I ever knew.

'I have been considering,' said she, 'as well as I was able, of every thing 'that has passed; and of all that has 'been said; and of my unhappy situation. I mean no ill—I wish no ill—to 'any creature living, Mr. Tomlinson. 'I have always delighted to draw favourable rather than unfavourable conclusions; sometimes, as it has proved, 'for very bad hearts. Censoriousness, 'whatever faults I have, is not naturally 'my fault—But, circumstanced as I am; 'treated as I have been, unworthily 'treated, by a man who is full of contrivances, and glories in them—'

Lovel. 'My dearest life!—But I will 'not interrupt you.'

Cl. 'Thus treated, it becomes me to 'doubt—It concerns my honour to 'doubt, to fear, to apprehend—Your intervention, Sir, is so seasonable, so 'kind, for this man—My uncle's expedient, the first of the kind he ever, I 'believe, thought of! a plain, honest, 'good-minded man, as he is, not affecting such expedients—Your report 'in conformity to it—The consequences 'of that report—The alarm taken by 'my brother—His rash resolution upon 'it—The alarm taken by Lady Betty, 'and the rest of Mr. Lovelace's relations—The sudden letters written to him 'upon it, which, with yours, he shewed me '—All ceremony, among persons born observers of ceremony, and entitled to value themselves upon their distinction, dispensed with—All these things have 'happened so quick, and some of them 'so seasonable—'

Lovel. 'Lady Betty, you see, Madam, in her letter, dispenses with punctilio, avowedly in compliment to you. 'Charlotte, in hers, professes to do the 'same for the same reason. Good Heaven! that the respect intended you by 'my relations, who, in every other case,

'are really punctilious, should be thus 'construed! They were glad, Madam, 'to have an opportunity to compliment 'you at my expence. Every one of my 'family takes delight in rallying me. 'But their joy on the supposed occasion—'

Cl. 'Do I doubt, Sir, that you have 'not something to say, for any-thing you 'think fit to do? I am speaking to Captain 'Tomlinson, Sir. I will you would be 'pleased to withdraw—At least to come 'from behind my chair.'

And she looked at the captain, observing, no doubt, that his eyes seemed to take lessons from mine.

A fair match, by Jupiter!

The captain was disconcerted. The dog had not had such a blush upon his face for ten years before. I bit my lip for vexation: walked about the room; but, nevertheless, took my post again; and blinked with my eyes to the captain, as a caution to him to take more care of his: and then scouling with my brows, and giving the nod-positive, I as good as said, 'Resent that, captain.'

Capt. 'I hope, Madam, you have 'no suspicion, that I am capable—'

Cl. 'Be not displeased with me, Captain Tomlinson. I have told you, that 'I am not of a suspicious temper. Excuse me for the sake of my sincerity. 'There is not, I will be bold to say, a 'sincerer heart in the world, than her's 'before you.'

She took out her handkerchief, and put it to her eyes.

I was going, at that instant, after her example, to vouch for the honesty of my heart; but my conscience Mennelled upon me; and would not suffer the meditated vow to pass my lips.—'A devilish thing,' thought I, 'for a man to be so little himself, when he has the most occasion for 'himself!'

The villain Tomlinson looked at me with a rueful face, as if he begged leave to cry for company. It might have been as well, if he had cried. A feeling heart, or the tokens of it given by a sensible eye, are very reputable things, when kept in countenance by the occasion.

And here let me fairly own to thee, that twenty times in this trying conversation I said to myself, that could I have thought, that I should have had all this trouble, and incurred all this guilt, I would have been honest at first. But, why, Jack, is this dear creature so lovely, yet so invincible?—Ever heard'st thou, before, that the sweets of May blossomed in December?

Capt. 'Be pleased—be pleased, Madam—if you have doubts of my honour—'

A whining varlet! He should have been quite angry—For what gave I him the nod-positive? He should have stalked again to the window, as for his whip and hat.

Cl. 'I am only making such observations as my youth, my inexperience, and my present unhappy circumstances, suggest to me—A worthy heart (such, 'I hope, is Captain Tomlinson's) need 'not fear an examination — need not 'fear being looked into — Whatever 'doubts that man, who has been the 'cause of my errors, and, as my severe 'father imprecated, the punisher of the 'errors he has caused, might have had of 'me, or of my honour, I would have 'forgiven him for them, if he had fairly 'proposed them to me: for some doubts 'perhaps such a man might have of the 'future conduct of a creature whom he 'could induce to correspond with him 'against parental prohibition, and against 'the lights which her own judgment threw 'in upon her: and if he had propounded 'them to me like a man and a gentleman, 'I would have been glad of the opportunity given me to clear my intentions, 'and to have shewn myself entitled to 'his good opinion—And I hope you, 'Sir—'

Capt. 'I am ready to hear all your 'doubts, Madam, and to clear them up.'

Cl. 'I will only put it, Sir, to your 'conscience and honour—'

The dog sat uneasy: he shuffled with his feet: her eye was upon him: he was therefore, after the rebuff he had met with, afraid to look at me for my motions; and now turned his eyes towards me, then from me, as if he would unlook his own looks.

Cl. 'That all is true, that you have 'written, and that you have told me?'

I gave him a right-forward nod, and a frown—as much as to say, 'Swear to 'it, captain.' But the varlet did not round it off as I would have had him. However, he averred that it was.

He had hoped, he said, that the circumstances with which his commission was attended, and what he had communicated to her, which he could not know but from his dear friend her uncle, might have shielded him even from the shadow of suspicion—'But I am contented,' said he, stammering, 'to be thought—to be 'thought—what—what you please to 'think me—till—till you are satisfied—'

A whore's-bird!

Cl. 'The circumstances you refer to, 'I must own, ought to shield you, Sir, 'from suspicion—But the man before 'you is a man that would make an angel suspected, should that angel plead 'for him.'

I came forward—Traversed the room—Was indeed in a bloody passion—'I 'have no patience, Madam!'—And again I bit my unpersuasive lip.

Cl. 'No man ought to be impatient 'at imputations he is not ashamed to deserve. An innocent man will not be 'outrageous upon such imputations. 'A guilty man ought not.' [Most excellently would this charming creature cap sentences with Lord M.!] 'But I am 'not now trying you, Sir,' [to me] 'on 'the foot of your merits. I am only sorry, that I am constrained to put questions to this worthier gentleman,' [Worthier gentleman, Jack!] 'which perhaps 'I ought not to put, so far as they regard himself.—And I hope, Captain 'Tomlinson, that you, who know not 'Mr. Lovelace so well, as, to my unhappiness, I do, and who have children of your own, will excuse a poor 'young creature, who is deprived of all 'worldly protection, and who has been 'insulted and endangered by the most 'designing man in the world, and perhaps 'by a confederacy of his creatures.'

There she stopt; and stood up, and looked at me; fear, nevertheless, apparently mingled with her anger. And so it ought. I was glad, however, of this poor sign of love—No one fears whom they value not.

'Women's tongues were licensed,' I was going to say—But my conscience would not let me call her a woman; nor use to her so vulgar a phrase. I could only rave by my motions; lift up my eyes, spread my hands, rub my face, pull my wig, and look like a fool. Indeed, I had a great mind to run mad. Had I been alone with her, I would; and she should have taken consequences.

The captain interposed in my behalf; gently, however, and as a man not quite sure that he was himself acquitted. Some of the pleas we had both insisted on, he again enforced—And, speaking low—'Poor gentleman!' said he, 'who can 'but pity him!—Indeed, Madam, it is 'easy to see, with all his failings, the 'power you have over him!'

Cl. 'I have no pleasure, Sir, in distressing any one—Not even him, who 'has so much distressed me.—But, Sir, 'when I THINK, and when I see him 'before me, I cannot command my temper!

'per!—Indeed, indeed, Captain Tomlinſon, Mr. Lovelace has not acted by me either as a grateful, or a generous 'man; nor even as a prudent one!—He 'knows not, as I told him yeſterday, 'the value of the heart he has inſulted!'

There the angel ſtopt; her handkerchief at her eyes.

O Belford, Belford! that ſhe ſhould ſo greatly excel, as to make me, at times, appear as a villain in my own eyes!

I beſought her pardon. I promiſed, that it ſhould be the ſtudy of my whole life to deſerve it. My faults, I ſaid, whatever they had been, were rather faults in her apprehenſion, than in fact. I beſought her to give way to the expedient I had hit upon—I repeated it. The captain enforced it, for her uncle's ſake. I once more, for the ſake of the general reconciliation; for the ſake of all my family; for the ſake of preventing further miſchief.

She wept. She ſeemed ſtaggered in her reſolution—She turned from me. I mentioned the letter of Lord M. I beſought her to reſign to Lady Betty's mediation all our differences if ſhe would not forgive me before ſhe ſaw her.

She turned towards me—She was going to ſpeak; but her heart was full—And again ſhe turned away her face—Then, half-turning it to me, her handkerchief at her eyes—'And do you really 'and indeed expect Lady Betty and Miſs 'Montague?—And do you—' Again ſhe ſtopt.

I anſwered in a ſolemn manner.

She turned from me her whole face, and pauſed, and ſeemed to conſider. But, in a paſſionate accent, again turning towards me, [O how difficult, Jack, for a Harlowe ſpirit to forgive!]—'Let 'her ladyſhip come, if ſhe pleaſes,' ſaid ſhe—'I cannot, cannot wiſh to ſee her '—And if I did ſee her, and ſhe were 'to plead for you, I cannot wiſh to hear 'her!—The more I think, the leſs I can 'forgive an attempt, that I am convinced was intended to deſtroy me.' [A plaguy ſtrong word for the occaſion, ſuppoſing ſhe was right!] 'What has my 'conduct been, that an inſult of ſuch a 'nature ſhould be offered to me, as it 'would be a weakneſs in me to forgive? 'I am ſunk in my own eyes!—And how 'can I receive a viſit that muſt depreſs 'me more?'

The captain urged her in my favour with greater earneſtneſs than before. We both even clamoured, as I may ſay, for mercy and forgiveneſs. [Didſt thou never hear the good folks talk of taking Heaven by ſtorm?]—Contrition repeatedly avowed—A total reformation promiſed—The happy expedient again urged.

Cl. 'I have taken my meaſures. I 'have gone too far to recede, or to wiſh 'to recede. My mind is prepared for 'adverſity. That I have not deſerved 'the evils I have met with, is my conſolation.—I have written to Miſs Howe 'what my intentions are. My heart is 'not with you—It is againſt you, Mr. 'Lovelace. I had not written to you as 'I did in the letter I left behind me, had 'I not reſolved, whatever became of me, 'to renounce you for ever.'

I was full of hope now. Severe as her expreſſions were, I ſaw ſhe was afraid that I ſhould think of what ſhe had written. And, indeed, her letter is violence itſelf. Angry people, Jack, ſhould never write while their paſſion holds.

Lovel. 'The ſeverity you have ſhewn 'me, Madam, whether by pen or by 'ſpeech, ſhall never have place in my 'remembrance, but for your honour. In 'the light you have taken things, all is 'deſerved, and but the natural reſult 'of virtuous reſentment; and I adore 'you, even for the pangs you have given 'me.'

She was ſilent. She had employment enough with her handkerchief at her eyes.

Lovel. 'You lament ſometimes, that 'you have no friends of your own ſex to 'conſult with. Miſs Rawlins, I muſt 'confeſs, is too inquiſitive to be confided in.' [I liked not, thou mayeſt think, her appeal to Miſs Rawlins.] 'She may 'mean well. But I never in my life knew 'a perſon who was fond of prying into 'the ſecrets of others, that was fit to be 'truſted. The curioſity of ſuch is governed by pride, which is not gratified but by whiſpering about a ſecret 'till it becomes publick, in order to 'ſhew either their conſequence, or their 'ſagacity. It is ſo in every caſe. What 'matter woman, who is covetous of power, 'or of wealth, is covetous of either, for 'the ſake of making a right uſe of it!—'But in the ladies of my family you may 'confide. It is their ambition to think 'of you, as one of themſelves. Renew 'but your conſent to paſs to the world, 'for the ſake of your uncle's expedient, 'and for the prevention of miſchief, as 'a lady ſome time married. Lady Betty 'may be acquainted with the naked 'truth; and you may (as ſhe hopes you 'will) accompany her to her ſeat; and, 'if it muſt be ſo, conſider me as in a ſtate '...ofpenitence or probation, to be accepted or rejected, as I may appear to 'deſerve.'

The captain again clapt his hands on his breaſt, and delared upon his honour, that this was a propoſal, that were the caſe that of his own daughter, and ſhe were not reſolved upon immediate marriage, (which yet he thought by far the more elegible choice) he ſhould be very much concerned, were ſhe to refuſe it.

Cl. 'Were I with Mr. Lovelace's relations, and to paſs as his wife to the 'world, I could not have any choice. 'And how could he be then in a ſtate of 'probation?—O, Mr. Tomlinſon, you 'are too much his friend to ſee into his 'drift.'

Capt. 'His friend, Madam, as I ſaid 'before, as I am yours and your uncle's, 'for the ſake of a general reconciliation, 'which muſt begin with a better under'ſtanding between yourſelves.'

Lovel. 'Only, my deareſt life, reſolve 'to attend the arrival and viſit of Lady 'Betty: and permit her to arbitrate 'between us.'

Capt. 'There can be no harm in that, 'Madam. You can ſuffer no inconve'nience from that. If Mr. Lovelace's 'offence be ſuch, that a woman of La'dy Betty's character judges it to be 'unpardonable, why then—'

Cl. [Interrupting; and to me] 'If I 'am not invaded by you, Sir—If I am '(as I ought to be) my own miſtreſs, I 'think to ſtay here in this honeſt houſe' [And then had I an eye-beam, as the captain calls it, flaſhed at me] 'till I 'receive a letter from Miſs Howe. 'That, I hope, will be in a day or two. 'If in that time the ladies come whom 'you expect, and if they are deſirous to 'ſee the creature whom you have made 'unhappy, I ſhall know whether I can 'or cannot receive their viſit.'

She turned ſhort to the door, and retiring went up ſtairs to her chamber.

'O Sir,' ſaid the captain, as ſoon as ſhe was gone, 'what an angel of a wo'man is this! I have been, and I am, a 'very wicked man. But if any-thing 'ſhould happen amiſs to this admirable 'lady, through my means, I ſhall have 'more cauſe for ſelf-reproach, than for 'all the bad actions of my life put toge'ther.'

And his eyes gliſtened.

'Nothing can happen amiſs, thou 'ſorrowful dog!—What can happen 'amiſs?—Are we to form our opinion 'of things by the romantick notions of 'a girl, who ſuppoſes that to be the 'greateſt which is the ſlighteſt of evils? 'Have I not told thee our whole ſtory? 'Has ſhe not broken her promiſe? Did 'I not generouſly ſpare her, when in 'my power? I was decent, though I 'had her at ſuch advantage. Greater 'liberties have I taken with girls of 'character at a common romping bout, 'and all has been laughed off, and hand'kerchief and headcloths adjuſted, and 'petticoats ſhaken to rights, in my pre'ſence. Never man, in the like cir'cumſtances, and reſolved as I was re'ſolved, goaded on as I was goaded on, 'as well by her own ſex as by the im'pulſes of a violent paſſion, was ever 'ſo decent. Yet what mercy does ſhe 'ſhew me?

Now, Jack, this pitiful dog was ſuch another unfortunate one as thyſelf—His arguments ſerving to confirm me in the very purpoſe he brought them to prevail upon me to give up. Had he left me to myſelf, to the tenderneſs of my own nature, moved as I was when the lady withdrew; and had he ſat down, and made odious faces, and ſaid nothing; it is very poſſible, that I ſhould have taken the chair over-againſt him which ſhe had quitted; and have cried and blubbered with him for half an hour together. But the varlet to argue with me!—To pretend to convince a man, who knows in his heart that he is doing a wrong thing! He muſt needs think, that this would put me upon trying what I could ſay for myſelf; and when the excited compunction can be carried from the heart to the lips, it muſt evaporate in words.

Thou perhaps, in this place, wouldſt have urged the ſame plea that he urged. What I anſwered to him therefore may do for thee, and ſpare thee the trouble of writing, and me of reading, a good deal of nonſenſe.

Capt. 'You were pleaſed to tell me, 'Sir, that you only propoſed to try her 'virtue; and that you believed you 'ſhould actually marry her.'

Lovel. 'So I ſhall, and cannot help 'it. I have no doubt but I ſhall. And 'as to trying her, is ſhe not now in the 'height of her trial? Have I not reaſon 'to think that ſhe is coming about? Is 'ſhe not now yielding up her reſent'ment for an attempt which ſhe thinks 'ſhe ought not to forgive?—And if ſhe 'do, may ſhe not forgive the laſt at'tempt?—Can ſhe, in a word, reſent 'that more than ſhe does this?—Women 'often, for their own ſakes, will keep 'the laſt ſecret; but will oſtentatiouſly din

'din the ears of gods and men with their 'clamours upon a ſucceſsleſs offer. It 'was my folly, my weakneſs, that I gave 'her not more cauſe for this her unſpar-'ing violence!'

Capt. 'O Sir, you will never be able 'to ſubdue this lady without force.'

Lovel. 'Well then, puppy, muſt I not 'endeavour to find a proper time and 'place—'

Capt. 'Forgive me, Sir! But can you 'think of force to ſuch a fine creature?'

Lovel. 'Force, indeed, I abhor the 'thought of; and for what thinkeſt thou, 'have I taken all the pains I have taken, 'and engaged ſo many perſons in my 'cauſe, but to avoid the neceſſity of vi-'olent compulſion? But yet, imagineſt 'thou that I expect direct conſent from 'ſuch a lover of forms as this lady is 'known to be! Let me tell thee, M'Do-'nald, that thy maſter Belford has urg-'ed on thy ſide of the queſtion all that 'thou canſt urge. Muſt I have every 'ſorry fellow's conſcience to pacify, as 'well as my own?—By my ſoul, Pa-'trick, ſhe has a friend here' [clapping my hand on my breaſt] 'that pleads for 'her with greater and more irreſiſtible 'eloquence, than all the men in the 'world can plead for her. And had ſhe 'not eſcaped me?—And yet how have I 'anſwered the firſt deſign of trying her, 'and in her the virtue of the moſt vir-'tuous of the ſex?—Perſeverance, man? 'Perſeverance—What wouldſt thou 'have me decline a trial that may make 'for the honour of a ſex we all ſo dearly 'love?'

'Then, Sir, you have no thoughts—'no thoughts—' [looking ſtill more for-'rowfully] 'of marrying this wonder-'ful lady?'

'Yes, yes, Patrick, but I have. But 'let me, firſt, to gratify my pride, bring 'down hers. Let me ſee, that ſhe loves 'me well enough to forgive me for my 'own ſake. Has ſhe not heretofore la-'mented, that ſhe ſtaid not in her fa-'ther's houſe, though the conſequence 'muſt have been, if ſhe had, that ſhe 'muſt have been the wife of the odious 'Solmes? If now ſhe be brought to 'conſent to be mine, ſeeſt thou not 'that the reconciliation with her deteſted 'relations is the inducement, as it always 'was, and not love of me?—Neither her 'virtue nor her love can be eſtabliſhed 'but upon full trial; the laſt trial—But 'if her reſiſtance and reſentment be 'ſuch as hitherto I have reaſon to ex-'pect they will be, and if I find in that 'reſentment leſs of hatred of me, than of the fact, then ſhall ſhe be mine in her 'own way. Then, hateful as is the 'life of ſhackles to me, will I marry her.'

'Well, Sir, I can only ſay, that I am 'dough in your hands, to be moulded 'into what ſhape you pleaſe. But if, as 'I ſaid before—'

'None of thy ſaids before, Patrick. 'I remember all thou ſaidſt—And I 'know all thou canſt further ſay—Thou 'art only, Pontius Pilate like, waſhing 'thine own hands (don't I know thee?) 'that thou mayſt have ſomething to 'ſilence thy conſcience with by loading 'me. But we have gone too far to re-'cede. Are not all our engines in rea-'dineſs?—Dry up thy ſorrowful eyes. 'Let unconcern and heart's eaſe once 'more take poſſeſſion of thy ſolemn 'features. Thou haſt hitherto per-'formed extremely well. Shame not 'thy paſt by thy future behaviour; and 'a rich reward awaits thee. It thou art 'dough, be dough;' and I ſlap'd him on the ſhoulder—'Reſume but thy former 'ſhape—And I'll be anſwerable for the 'event.'

He bowed aſſent and compliance: went to the glaſs; and began to untwiſt and unſadden his features: pull'd his wig right, as if that, as well as his head and heart, had been diſcompoſed by his compunction; and once more be-came old Lucifer's and mine.

But didſt thou think, Jack, that there was ſo much—What-ſhall-I-call-it?—In this Tomlinſon? Didſt thou imagine, that ſuch a fellow as that had bowels? That nature ſo long dead and buried in him, as to all human effects, ſhould thus revive and exert itſelf?—Yet why do I aſk this queſtion of thee, who, to my equal ſurprize, haſt ſhewn, on the ſame occaſion, the like compaſſionate ſenſibilities?

As to Tomlinſon, it looks as if po-verty had made him the wicked fellow he is; as plenty and wantonneſs have made us what we are. Neceſſity, after all, is the teſt of principle. But what is there in this dull word, or thing, called HONESTY, that even I, who cannot in my preſent views be ſerved by it, cannot help thinking even the accidental ema-nations of it amiable in Tomlinſon, though demonſtrated in a female caſe; and judging better of him for being capa-ble of ſuch?

LETTER XX.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

THIS debate between the captain and me was hardly over, when the three three women, led by Miss Rawlins, entered, hoping no intrusion—But very desirous, the maiden said, to know if we were likely to accommodate.

'O yes, I hope so. You know ladies, that your sex must in these cases, preserve their forms. They must be courted to comply with their own happiness. A lucky expedient we have hit upon. The uncle has his doubts of our marriage. He cannot believe, nor will any body, that it is possible that a man so much in love—the lady so desirable—'

They all took the hint—It was a very extraordinary case, the two widows allowed. Women, Jack, [as I believe I have observed elsewhere] have a high opinion of what they can do for us.—Miss Rawlins desired me, if I pleased, to let them know the expedient; and looked as if there was no need to proceed in the rest of my speech.

I begged, that they would not let the lady know I had told them what this expedient was; and they should hear it.

They promised.

It was this: that to oblige and satisfy Mr. Harlowe, the ceremony was to be again performed. He was to be privately present, and to give his niece to me with his own hands—And she was retired to consider of it.

Thou seest, Jack, that I have provided an excuse, to save my veracity to the women here, in case I should incline to marriage, and she would chuse to have Miss Rawlins's assistance at the ceremony. Nor doubted I to bring my fair-one to save my credit on this occasion, if I could get her to consent to be mine.

'A charming expedient!' cried the widow. They were all three ready to clap their hands for joy upon it. Women love to be married twice at least, Jack; though not indeed to the same man. And all blessed the reconciliatory scheme, and the proposer of it; and, supposing it came from the captain, they looked at him with pleasure, while his face shined with the applause implied. He should think himself very happy, if he could bring about a general reconciliation; and he flourished with his head like my man Will, on his victory over old Grimes; bridling by turns, like Miss Rawlins in the height of a prudish fit.

But now it was time for the captain to think of returning to town, having a great deal of business to dispatch before morning: nor was he certain that he should again be able to attend us at Hampstead before he went home.

And yet, as every-thing was drawing towards a crisis, I did not intend that he should leave Hampstead this night.

A message to the above effect was carried up, at my desire, by Mrs. Moore; with the captain's compliments, and to know if she had any commands for him to her uncle?

But I hinted to the women, that it would be proper for them to withdraw, if the lady did come down; lest she should not care to be so free before them on a proposal so particular, as she would be to us, who had offered it to her consideration.

Mrs. Moore brought down word, that the lady was following her. They all three withdrew; and she entered at one door, as they went out at the other.

The captain accosted her, repeating the contents of the message sent up; and desired she would give him her commands in relation to the report he was to make to her uncle Harlowe.

'I know not what to say, Sir, nor 'what I would have you to say, to my 'uncle—Perhaps you may have business 'in town—Perhaps you need not see my 'uncle, till I have heard from Miss 'Howe; till after lady Betty—I don't 'know what to say.'

I implored the return of that value, which she had so generously acknowledged once to have had for me. I presumed, I said, to flatter myself that Lady Betty, in her own person, and in the name of all my family, would be able, on my promised reformation and contrition, to prevail in my favour, especially as our prospects in other respects with regard to the general reconciliation wished for were so happy. 'But let 'me owe to your own generosity, my 'dearest creature,' said I, 'rather than 'to the mediation of any person on earth, 'the forgiveness I am an humble suitor 'for. How much more agreeable to 'yourself, O best beloved of my soul, 'must it be, as well as obliging to me, that 'your first personal knowledge of my 'relations, and theirs of you, (for they 'will not be denied attending you) 'should not be begun in recriminations, 'in appeals! As Lady Betty will be 'here soon, it will not perhaps be pos-'sible for you to receive her visit with 'a brow absolutely serene. But dearest, 'dearest creature, I beseech you, let 'the misunderstanding pass as a slight 'one—As a misunderstanding cleared 'up. Appeals give pride and superi-

'ority to the perſons appealed to, and 'are apt to leſſen the appellant, not only 'in their eye, but in her own. Exalt 'not into judges thoſe who are prepar-'ed to take leſſons and inſtructions from 'you. The individuals of my family 'are as proud as I am ſaid to be. But 'they will cheerfully reſign to your ſu-'periority—You will be the firſt woman 'of the family in every-one's eyes.'

This might have done with any other woman in the world but this; and yet ſhe is the only woman in the world of whom it may with truth be ſaid. But thus, angrily, did ſhe diſclaim the compliment.

'Yes, indeed!'—[And there ſhe ſtopt a moment, her ſweet boſom heaving with a noble diſdain]—'Cheated out of 'myſelf from the very firſt!—A fugi-'tive from my own family! Renounced 'by my relations! Inſulted by you!—'—Laying humble claim to the pro-'tection of yours!—Is not this the light 'in which I muſt appear not only to 'the ladies of your family, but to all 'the world?—Think you, Sir, that in 'theſe circumſtances, or even had I 'been in the happieſt, that I could be af-'fected by this plea of undeſerved ſu-'periority?—You are a ſtranger to the 'mind of Clariſſa Harlowe, if you think 'her capable of ſo poor and ſo undue a 'pride!'

She went from us to the further end of the room.

The captain was again affected—'Excellent creature!' I called her; and, reverently approaching her, urged further the plea I had laſt made.

'It is but lately,' ſaid I, 'that the 'opinions of my relations have been 'more than indifferent to me, whether 'good or bad; and it is for your ſake, 'more than my own, that I now wiſh to 'ſtand well with my whole family. 'The principal motive of Lady Betty's 'coming up, is to purchaſe preſents for 'the whole family to make on the hap-'py occaſion.

'This conſideration,' turning to the captain, 'with ſo noble-minded a dear 'creature, I know, can have no weight; 'only as it will ſhew their value and re-'ſpect. But what a damp would their 'worthy hearts receive, were they to 'find their admired new niece as they 'now think her, not only not their niece, 'but capable of renouncing me for ever! 'They love me. They all love me. I 'have been guilty of careleſſneſs and le-'vity to them, indeed; but of careleſſ-'neſs and levity only; and that owing 'to a pride that has ſet me above mean-'neſs, though it has not done every-'thing for me.

'My whole family will be guarantees 'for my good behaviour to this dear 'creature, their niece, their daughter, 'their couſin, their friend, their choſen 'companion and directreſs, all in one '—Upon my ſoul, captain, we may, we 'muſt be happy.

'But, deareſt, deareſt creature, let 'me on my knees,' [And down I dropt, her face all the time turned half from me, as ſhe ſtood at the window, her handkerchief often at her eyes] 'on my 'knees, let me plead your promiſed for-'giveneſs; and let us not appear to 'them, on their viſit, thus unhappy 'with each other. Lady Betty, the next 'hour that ſhe ſees you, will write her 'opinion of you, and of the likelihood 'of our future happineſs, to Lady Sarah 'her ſiſter, a weak-ſpirited woman, 'who now hopes to ſupply to herſelf, 'in my bride, the loſt daughter ſhe ſtill 'mourns for!'

The captain then joined in, and re-urged her uncle's hopes and expectations, and his reſolution effectually to ſet about the general reconciliation; the miſchief that might be prevented; and the certainty that there was, that her uncle might be prevailed upon to give her to me with his own hand, if ſhe made it her choice to wait for his coming up. But, for his own part, he humbly adviſed, and fervently preſſed her to make the very next day, or Monday at fartheſt, my happy day.

'Permit me, deareſt lady,' ſaid he, 'and I could kneel to you myſelf.' [Bending his knee] 'though I have no 'intereſt in my earneſtneſs, but the 'pleaſure I ſhould have to be able to 'ſerve you all; to beſeech you to give 'me an opportunity to aſſure your un-'cle, that I myſelf ſaw with my own 'eyes the happy knot tied!—All miſun-'derſtandings, all doubts, all diffidences, 'will then be at an end.'

'And what, Madam,' rejoined I, ſtill kneeling, 'can there be in your new 'meaſures, be they what they will, that 'can ſo happily, ſo reputably, I will pre-'ſume to ſay, for all round, obviate the 'preſent difficulties?'

'Miſs Howe herſelf, if ſhe love you, 'and if ſhe love your fame, Madam,' urged the captain, his knee ſtill bent, 'muſt congratulate you on ſuch a happy 'concluſion.'

Then turning her face, ſhe ſaw the captain half-kneeling—'O, Sir! O,

'Captain

'Captain Tomlinson!—Why this undue condescension?' extending her hand to his elbow, to raise him. 'I cannot bear this!'—Then casting her eye on me, 'Rise, Mr. Lovelace—Kneel not to the poor creature whom you have insulted!—How cruel the occasion for it!—And how mean the submission!'

'Not mean to such an angel!—Nor can I rise, but to be forgiven!'

The captain then re-urged once more the day—He was amazed, he said, if she ever valued me—

'O, Captain Tomlinson,' interrupted she, 'how much are you the friend of this man!—If I had never valued him, he never would have had it in his power to insult me; nor could I, if I had never regarded him, have taken to heart as I do the insult (execrable as it was) so undeservedly, so ungratefully given—But let him retire—For a moment let him retire.'

I was more than half afraid to trust the captain by himself with her. He gave me a sign that I might depend upon him. And then I took out of my pocket his letter to me, and Lady Betty's, and Miss Montague's, and Lord M.'s letters; (which last she had not then seen) and giving them to him, 'Procure for me, in the first place, Mr. Tomlinson, a re-perusal of these three letters; and of this from Lord M.—And I beseech you, my dearest life, give them due consideration: and let me on my return find the happy effects of that consideration.'

I then withdrew; with slow feet, however, and a misgiving heart.

The captain insisted upon this re-perusal previously to what she had to say to him, as he tells me. She complied, but with some difficulty; as if she was afraid of being softened in my favour.

She lamented her unhappy situation; destitute of friends, and not knowing whither to go, or what to do. She asked questions, sifting questions, about her uncle, about her family, and after what he knew of Mr. Hickman's fruitless application in her favour.

He was well prepared in this particular; for I had shewn him the letters and extracts of letters of Miss Howe, which I had so happily come at. Might she be assured, she asked him, that her brother, with Singleton, and Solmes, were actually in quest of her?

He averred that they were.

She asked, If he thought I had hopes of prevailing on her to go back to town?

He was sure I had not.

Was he really of opinion, that Lady Betty would pay her a visit?

He had no doubt of it.

'But, Sir; but, Captain Tomlinson'—[Impatiently turning from him, and again to him] 'I know not what to do—But were I your daughter, Sir—Were you my own father—Alas! Sir, I have neither father nor mother!'

He turned from her, and wiped his eyes.

'O Sir! you have humanity!' [She wept too.] 'There are some men in the world, thank Heaven, that can be moved. O, Sir, I have met with hard-hearted men—in my own family too—or I could not have been so unhappy as I am—But I make everybody unhappy!'

His eyes no doubt ran over.

'Dearest Madam! Heavenly lady!—Who can—who can—' hesitated and blubbered the dog, as he owned. And indeed I heard some part of what passed, though they both talked lower than I wished; for, from the nature of their conversation, there was no room for altitudes.

THEM, and BOTH, and THEY!—How it goes against me to include this angel of a creature, and any man on earth but myself, in one word!

Capt. 'Who can forbear being affected?—But, Madam, you can be no other man's.'

Cl. 'Nor would I be. But he is so sunk with me!—To fire the house!—An artifice so vile!—contrived for the worst of purposes!—Would you have a daughter of yours—But what would I say?—Yet you see, that I have nobody in whom I can confide!—Mr. Lovelace is a vindictive man!—He could not love the creature whom he could insult as he has insulted me!'

She paused. And then resuming—'In short, I never, never can forgive him, nor he me.—Do you think, Sir, I would have gone so far as I have gone, if I had intended ever to draw with him in one yoke?—I left behind me such a letter—'

'You know, Madam, he has acknowledged the justice of your resentment.'

'O Sir, he can acknowledge, and he can retract, fifty times a day—But do not think I am trifling with myself and you, and want to be persuaded to forgive him, and to be his. There is not a creature of my sex, who would have been more explicit, and more frank, than I would have been, from the moment I intended to be his, had I had a heart like

'like my own to deal with. I was always 'above reſerve, Sir, I will preſume to 'ſay, where I had no cauſe of doubt, 'Mr. Lovelace's conduct has made me 'appear, perhaps, over-nice, when my 'heart wanted to be encouraged and 'aſſured; and when, if it had been ſo, 'my whole behaviour would have been 'governed by it.'

She ſtopt; her handkerchief at her eyes.

I enquired after the minuteſt part of her behaviour, as well as after her words. I love, thou knoweſt, to trace human nature, and more particularly female nature, through it's moſt ſecret receſſes.

The pitiful fellow was loſt in ſilent admiration of her. And thus the noble creature proceeded.

'It is the fate in unequal unions, that 'tolerable creatures, through them, 'frequently incur cenſure, when more 'happily yoked, they might be entitled 'to praiſe. And ſhall I not ſhun a uni-'on with a man, that might lead into 'errors a creature who flatters herſelf 'that ſhe is bleſt with an inclination to 'be good; and who wiſhes to make 'every-one happy with whom ſhe has 'any connection, even to her very ſer-'vants?'

She pauſed, taking a turn about the room—the fellow, devil fetch him, a mummy all the time: then proceeded.

'Formerly, indeed, I hoped to be an 'humble means of reforming him. But, 'when I have no ſuch hope, is it right '[You are a ſerious man, Sir] to make 'a venture that ſhall endanger my own 'morals?'

Still ſilent was the varlet. If my advocate had nothing to ſay for me, what hope of carrying my cauſe?

'And now, Sir, what is the reſult of 'all?—It is this—That you will en-'deavour, if you have that influence 'over him which a man of your ſenſe 'and experience ought to have, to pre-'vail upon him, and that for his own 'ſake, as well as for mine, to leave me 'free to purſue my own deſtiny. And 'of this you may aſſure him, that I ne-'ver will be any other man's.'

'Impoſſible, Madam! I know that 'Mr. Lovelace would not hear me with 'patience on ſuch a topick. And I do 'aſſure you, that I have ſome ſpirit, and 'ſhould not care to take an indignity 'from him, or from any man living.'

She pauſed—Then reſuming—'And 'think you, Sir, that my uncle will refuſe 'to receive a letter from me?' [How averſe, 'Jack, to concede a tittle in my favour!]

'I know, Madam, as matters are cir-'cumſtanced, that he would not an-'ſwer it. If you pleaſe, I will carry 'one down from you.'

'And will he not purſue his intra-'tions in my favour, nor be himſelf re-'conciled to me, except I am married?'

'From what your brother gives out, 'and affects to believe, on Mr. Love-'lace's living with you in the ſame—'

'No more, Sir—I am an unhappy 'creature!'

He then re-urged, that it would be in her power inſtantly, or on the morrow, to put an end to all her difficulties.

'How can that be?' ſaid ſhe: 'the 'licence ſtill to be obtained? The ſet-'tlements ſtill to be ſigned? Miſs 'Howe's anſwer to my laſt unreceived?— 'And ſhall I, Sir, be in ſuch a HURRY, 'as if I thought my honour in danger if I 'delayed? Yet marry the man from whom 'only it can be endangered!—Unhappy, 'thrice unhappy, Clariſſa Harlowe!— 'In how many difficulties has one raſh 'ſtep involved thee!'—And ſhe turned from him, and wept.

The varlet, by way of comfort, wept too: yet her tears, as he might have obſerved, were tears that indicated rather a yielding than a perverſe temper.

There is a ſort of ſtone, thou knoweſt, ſo ſoft in the quarry, that it may in a manner be cut with a knife; but if the opportunity be not taken, and it is expoſed to the air for any time, it will become as hard as marble, and then with difficulty it yields to the chiſſel. So this lady, not taken at the moment, after a turn or two croſs the room, gained more reſolution; and then ſhe declared, as ſhe had done once before, that ſhe would wait the iſſue of Miſs Howe's anſwer to the letter ſhe had ſent her from hence, and take her meaſures accordingly—leaving it to him, mean time, to make what report he thought fit, to her uncle—the kindeſt that truth could bear, ſhe doubted not from Captain Tomlinſon: and ſhe ſhould be glad of a few lines from him, to hear what that was.

She wiſhed him a good journey. She complained of her head; and was about to withdraw: but I ſtept round to the door next the ſtairs, as if I had but juſt come in from the garden, (which, as I entered, I called a very pretty one) and took her reluctant hand, as ſhe was going out. 'My deareſt life, you are not 'going?—What hopes, captain?—Have 'you not ſome hopes to give me of 'pardon and reconciliation?'

She ſaid, She would not be detained.

But I would not let her go, till she had promised to return, when the captain had reported to me what her resolution was.

And when he had, I sent up, and claimed her promise; and she came down again, and repeated, (as what she was determined upon) that she would wait for Miss Howe's answer to the letter she had written to her, and take her measures according to it's contents.

I expostulated with her upon it, in the most submissive and earnest manner. She made it necessary for me to repeat many of the pleas I had before urged: the captain seconded me with equal earnestness. At last, each fell down on our knees before her.

She was distressed. I was afraid at one time she would have fainted. Yet neither of us would rise without some concessions. I pleaded my own sake; the captain, his dear friend her uncle's; and both repleaded, the prevention of future mischief; and the peace and happiness of the two families.

She owned herself unequal to the conflict. She sighed. She sobbed. She wept. She wrung her hands.

I was perfectly eloquent in my vows and protestations. Her tearful eyes were cast down upon me; a glow upon each charming cheek; a visible anguish in every lovely feature—At last, her trembling knees seeming to fail her, she dropt into the next chair; her charming face, as if seeking for a hiding place, (which a mother's bosom would have best supplied) sinking upon her own shoulder.

I forgot at the instant all my vows of revenge. I threw myself at her feet as she sat; and, snatching her hand, pressed it with my lips. I besought Heaven to forgive my past offences, and prosper my future hopes, as I designed honourably and justly by the charmer of my heart, if once she would restore me to her favour. And I thought I felt drops of scalding water [Could they be tears?] trickle down upon my cheeks; while my cheeks, glowing like fire, seemed to scorch up the unwelcome strangers.

I then arose, not doubting of an implied pardon in this silent distress. I raised the captain. I whispered him—'By my soul, man, I am in earnest.—'Now talk of reconciliation, of her uncle, of the licence, of settlement.'—And raising my voice, 'If now at last, 'Captain Tomlinson, my angel will give 'me leave to call so great a blessing mine, 'it will be impossible that you should say 'too much to her uncle in praise of my 'gratitude, my affection, and fidelity to 'his charming niece; and he may begin 'as soon as he pleases, his kind schemes 'for effecting the desirable reconciliation!—Nor shall he prescribe any 'terms to me that I will not comply 'with.'

The captain blessed me with his eyes and hands—'Thank God!' whispered he. We approached the lady together.

Capt. 'What hinders, dearest Madam, what now hinders, but that 'Lady Betty Lawrance, when she comes, 'may be acquainted with the truth of 'every-thing? And that then she may 'assist privately at your nuptials?—I will 'stay till they are celebrated; and then 'shall go down with the happy tidings 'to my dear Mr. Harlowe. And all will '—all must—soon be happy.'

'I must have an answer from Miss 'Howe,' replied the still trembling fair-one. 'I cannot change my new measures, but with her advice. I will forfeit all my hopes of happiness in this 'world, rather than forfeit her good 'opinion, and that she should think me 'giddy, unsteady, or precipitate. All 'I shall further say on the present subject is this, That, when I have her answer to what I have written, I will write 'to her the whole state of the matter, as 'I shall then be enabled to do.'

Lovel. 'Then must I despair for ever '—O Captain Tomlinson, Miss Howe 'hates me!—Miss Howe——'

Capt. 'Not so, perhaps—When Miss 'Howe knows your concern for having 'offended, she will never advise, that, 'with such prospects of general reconciliation, the hopes of so many considerable persons in both families should 'be frustrated. Some little time, as this 'excellent lady has foreseen and hinted, 'will necessarily be taken up in actually 'procuring the licence, and in perusing 'and signing the settlements. In that 'time Miss Howe's answer may be received; and Lady Betty may arrive; 'and she, no doubt, will have weight 'to dissipate the lady's doubts, and to 'accelerate the day. It shall be my part, 'mean time, to make Mr. Harlowe easy. 'All I fear from delay is, from Mr. 'James Harlowe's quarter; and therefore all must be conducted with prudence and privacy—as your uncle, 'Madam, has proposed.'

She was silent—I rejoiced in her silence. 'The dear creature,' thought I, 'has actually forgiven me in her heart! '—But why will she not lay me under 'obligation to her, by the generosity of 'an

'an explicit declaration?—And yet, as 'that would not accelerate any-thing, 'while the licence is not in my hands, 'she is the leſs to be blamed (if I do 'her juſtice) for taking more time to 'deſcend.'

I propoſed, as on the morrow night, to go to town; and doubted not to bring the licence up with me on Monday morning. Would ſhe be pleaſed to aſſure me, that ſhe would not depart from Mrs. Moore's?

She ſhould ſtay at Mrs. Moore's till ſhe had an anſwer from Miſs Howe.

I told her, that I hoped I might have her tacit conſent at leaſt to the obtaining of the licence.

I ſaw by the turn of her countenance that I ſhould not have aſked this queſtion. She was ſo far from tacitly conſenting, that ſhe declared to the contrary.

As I never intended, I ſaid, to aſk her to enter again into a houſe, with the people of which ſhe was ſo much offended, would ſhe be pleaſed to give orders for her cloaths to be brought up hither? Or ſhould Dorcas attend her for any of her commands on that head?

She deſired not ever more to ſee anybody belonging to that houſe. She might perhaps get Mrs. Moore or Mrs. Bevis to go thither for her, and take her keys with them.

I doubted not, I ſaid, that Lady Betty would arrive by that time. I hoped ſhe had no objection to my bringing that lady and my couſin Montague up with me?

She was ſilent.

'To be ſure, Mr. Lovelace,' ſaid the captain, 'the lady can have no objecti-'on to this.'

She was ſtill ſilent. So ſilence in this caſe was aſſent.

Would ſhe be pleaſed to write to Miſs Howe?

'Sir! Sir!' peeviſhly interrupting—'No more queſtions—No preſcribing to 'me—You will do as you think fit. So 'will I, as I pleaſe. I own no obligation to you.—Captain Tomlinſon, 'your ſervant. Recommend me to my 'uncle Harlowe's favour.' And was going.

I took her reluctant hand, and beſought her only to promiſe to meet me early in the morning.

'To what purpoſe meet you? Have 'you more to ſay, than has been ſaid? '—I have had enough of vows and proteſtations, Mr. Lovelace. To what 'purpoſe ſhould I meet you to-morrow 'morning?'

I repeated my requeſt, and that in the moſt fervent manner, naming ſix in the morning.

'You know, that I am always ſtir-'ring before that hour, at this ſeaſon 'of the year,' was the half-expreſſed conſent.

She then again recommended herſelf to her uncle's favour; and withdrew.

And thus, Belford, has ſhe mended her markets, as Lord M. would ſay, and I worſted mine. Miſs Howe's next letter is now the hinge on which the fate of both muſt turn. I ſhall be abſolutely ruined and undone, if I cannot intercept it.

LETTER XXI.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

SAT. MIDNIGHT.

'NO reſt,' ſays a text that I once heard preached upon, 'to the wicked.'—And I cannot cloſe my eyes, (yet only wanted to compound for half an hour in an elbow-chair)—So muſt ſcribble on.

I parted with the captain, after another ſtrong debate with him in relation to what is to be the fate of this lady. As the fellow has an excellent head, and would have made an eminent figure in any ſtation of life, had not his early days been tainted with a deep crime, and he detected in it; and as he had the right ſide of the argument; I had a good deal of difficulty with him; and at laſt brought myſelf to promiſe, that if I could prevail upon her generouſly to forgive me, and to reinſtate me in her favour, I would make it my whole endeavour to get off of my contrivances, as happily as I could, (only that Lady Betty and Charlotte muſt come;) and then, ſubſtituting him for her uncle's proxy, take ſhame to myſelf, and marry.

But, if I ſhould, Jack, (with the ſtrongeſt antipathy to the ſtate that ever man had) what a figure ſhall I make in rakiſh annals? And can I have taken all this pains for nothing? Or for a wife only, that, however excellent, [and any woman, do I think, I could make good, becauſe I could make any woman fear as well as love me] might have been obtained without the plague I have been at, and much more reputably than with it? And haſt thou not ſeen, that this haughty woman [Forgive me that I call her haughty! and a woman! Yet is ſhe not haughty?] knows not how to forgive with graciouſneſs? Indeed has not at all forgiven me? But holds my ſoul in a ſuſpence which has been ſo grievous to her evil.

At this ſilent moment, I think, that if I were to purſue my former ſcheme, and reſolve to try whether I cannot make a greater fault ſerve as a ſponge to wipe out the leſs; and then be forgiven for that; I can juſtify myſelf to myſelf; and that, as the fair invincible would ſay, is all in all.

As it is my intention, in all my reflections, to avoid repeating, at leaſt dwelling upon, what I have before written to thee, though the ſtate of the caſe may not have varied; ſo I would have thee to re-conſider the old reaſonings, (particularly thoſe contained in my anſwer to thy laſt expoſtulatory nonſenſe;) and add the new as they fall from my pen; and then I ſhall think myſelf invincible;—at leaſt, as arguing rake to rake.

I take the gaining of this lady to be eſſential to my happineſs: and is it not natural for all men to aim at obtaining whatever they think will make them happy, be the object more or leſs conſiderable in the eyes of others?

As to the manner of endeavouring to obtain her, by falſification of oaths, vows, and the like—Do not the poets of two thouſand years and upwards tell us, that Jupiter laughs at the perjuries of lovers? And let me add to what I have heretofore mentioned on that head, a queſtion or two.

Do not the mothers, the aunts, the grandmothers, the governeſſes of the pretty innocents, always, from their very cradles to riper years, preach to them the deceitfulneſs of men?—That they are not to regard their oaths, vows, promiſes?—What a parcel of fibbers would all theſe reverend matrons be, if there were not now-and-then a pretty credulous rogue taken in for a juſtification of their preachments, and to ſerve as a beacon lighted up for the benefit of the reſt?

Do we not then ſee, that an honeſt prowling fellow is a neceſſary evil on many accounts? Do we not ſee that it is highly requiſite that a ſweet girl ſhould be now-and then drawn aſide by him?—And the more eminent the girl, in the graces of perſon mind, and fortune, is not the example likely to be the more efficacious?

If theſe poſtulata be granted me, who, I pray, can equal my charmer in all theſe? Who therefore ſo fit for an example to the reſt of the ſex?—At worſt, I am entirely within my worthy friend Mandeville's aſſertion, That private vice are publick benefits.

Well, then, if this ſweet creature muſt fall, as it is called, for the benefit of all the pretty fools of the ſex, ſhe muſt; and there's an end of the matter. And what would there have been in it of uncommon or rare, had I not been ſo long about it?—And ſo I diſmiſs all further argumentation and debate upon the queſtion: and I impoſe upon thee, when thou writeſt to me, an eternal ſilence on this head.

Wafered on, as an after-written introduction to the paragraphs which follow, marked with turned commas [thus, ']

LORD, Jack, what ſhall I do now!—How one evil brings on another!—Dreadful news to tell thee!—While I was meditating a ſimple robbery, here have I (in my own defence indeed) been guilty of murder!—A bloody murder!—So I believe it will prove.—At her laſt gaſp!—Poor impertinent oppoſer! Eternally reſiſting!—Eternally contradicting! There ſhe lies, weltering in her blood! her death's wound have I given her!—But ſhe was a thief, an impoſtor, as well as a tormentor. She had ſtolen my pen.—While I was ſullenly meditating, doubting, as to my future meaſures, ſhe ſtole it; and thus ſhe wrote with it, in a hand exactly like my own; and would have faced me down, that it was really my own hand-writing.

'But let me reflect, before it be too 'late. On the manifold perfections of 'this ever-admirable creature let me 'reflect. The hand yet is only held up. 'The blow is not ſtruck. Miſs Howe's 'next letter may blow thee up. In po'licy thou ſhouldeſt be now at leaſt honeſt. 'Thou canſt not live without her. Thou 'wouldeſt rather marry her than loſe her 'abſolutely.' Thou mayeſt undoubtedly 'prevail upon her, inflexible as ſhe 'ſeems to be, for marriage. But if now 'ſhe find thee a villain, thou mayeſt 'never more engage her attention, and 'ſhe perhaps will refuſe and abhor thee.

'Yet already have I not gone too far? 'Like a repentant thief, afraid of his 'gang, and obliged to go on, in fear of 'hanging till he comes to be hanged, I 'am afraid of the gang of my curſed con'trivances.

'As I hope to live, I am ſorry (at 'the preſent writing) that I have been 'ſuch a fooliſh plotter, as to put it, as I 'fear I have done, out of my own power 'to be honeſt. I hate compulſion in all 'forms; and cannot bear, even to be 'compelled

'compelled to be the wretch my choice
'has made me!—So now, Belford, as
'thou haſt ſaid, I am a machine at laſt,
'and no free agent.

'Upon my ſoul, Jack, it is a very 'fooliſh thing for a man of ſpirit to have 'brought himſelf to ſuch a height of 'iniquity, that he muſt proceed, and 'cannot help himſelf; and yet to be 'next to certain, that this very victory
'will undo him.

'Why was ſuch a woman as this 'thrown into my way, whoſe very fall
'will be her glory, and perhaps not only
'my ſhame, but my deſtruction?

'What a happineſs muſt that man
'know, who moves regularly to ſome
'laudable end, and has nothing to re'proach himſelf with in his progreſs to
'it! When, by honeſt means, he at'tains this end, how great and unmixed
'muſt be his enjoyments! What a hap'py man, in this particular caſe, had I
'been, had it been given me to be only
'what I wiſhed to appear to be!'

Thus far had my conſcience written with my pen; and ſee what a recreant ſhe had made of me!—I ſeized her by the throat—'There!—There!' ſaid I, 'thou vile impertinent!—Take that, 'and that!—How often have I given 'thee warning!—And now, I hope, 'thou intruding varleteſs, have I done 'thy buſineſs!

'Puleing, and low-voiced, rearing
'up thy deteſted head, in vain implore
'thou my mercy, who, in thy day haſt
'ſhewed me ſo little!—Take that, for 'a riſing blow!—And now will thy pain,
'and my pain from thee, ſoon be over.—
'Lie there!—Welter on!—Had I not 'given thee thy death's wound, thou
'wouldeſt have robbed me of all my
'joys. Thou couldeſt not have mended
'me, 'tis plain. Thou couldeſt only
'have thrown me into deſpair. Didſt
'thou not ſee, that I had gone too far
'to recede?—Welter on, once more I
'bid thee!—Gaſp on!—That thy laſt
'gaſp ſurely!—How hard dieſt thou!'

'ADIEU!—Unhappy man!—A-
'DIEU!'

''Tis kind in thee, however, to bid
'me adieu!'

'Adieu, adieu, adieu, to thee, O
'thou inflexible, and, till now, uncon-
'querable boſom-intruder!—Adieu to 'thee for ever!'

LETTER XXII.

MR. LOVELACE, TO J. BELFORD, ESQ.

SUNDAY MORN. (JUNE 11.) 4 O'CLOCK.

A Few words to the verbal information thou ſenteſt me laſt night concerning thy poor old man; and then I riſe from my ſeat, ſhake myſelf, refreſh, new-dreſs, and ſo to my charmer, whom, notwithſtanding her reſerves, I hope to prevail upon to walk out with me on the Heath, this warm and fine morning.

The birds muſt have awakened her before now. They are in full ſong. She always gloried in accuſtoming herſelf to behold the ſun-riſe; one of God's natural wonders, as once ſhe called it.

Her window ſalutes the eaſt. The valleys muſt be gilded by his rays, by the time I am with her; for already have they made the up-lands ſmile, and the face of nature cheerful.

How unſuitable wilt thou find this gay preface to a ſubject ſo gloomy, as that I am now turning to!

I am glad to hear thy tedious expectations are at laſt anſwered.

Thy ſervant tells me, that thou art plaguily grieved at the old fellow's departure.

I can't ſay, but thou mayeſt look as if thou wert; harraſſed as thou haſt been for a number of days and nights with a cloſe attendance upon a dying man, beholding his drawing-on hour—Pretending, for decency's ſake, to whine over his excruciating pangs—To be in the way to anſwer a thouſand impertinent enquiries after the health of a man thou wiſhedſt to die—To pray by him—for ſo once thou wroteſt to me!—To read by him—To be forced to join in conſultation with a crew of ſolemn and parading doctors, and their officious zanies the apothecaries, joined with the butcherly tribe of ſcarificators; all combined to carry on the phyſical farce, and to cut out thongs both from his fleſh and his eſtate—To have the ſuper-added apprehenſion of dividing thy intereſt in what he ſhall leave with a crew of eager-hoping, never-to-be-ſatisfied relations, legatees, and the devil knows who, of private gratifiers of paſſions laudable and illaudable—In theſe circumſtances I wonder not that thou lookeſt before ſervants (as little grieved at heart as thyſelf, and who are gaping after legacies, as thou after heirſhip) as if thou indeed wert grieved; and as if the moſt wry-fac'd woe had befallen thee.

Then, as I have often thought, the reflection that muſt naturally ariſe from ſuch mortifying objects, as the death of one with whom we have been familiar, muſt afford, when we are obliged to attend it in it's ſlow approaches, and in it's face-twiſting pangs, that it will one day be our own caſe, goes a great way to credit the appearance of grief.

And

'And this it is that, ſeriouſly reflected upon, may temporarily give a fine air of ſincerity to the wailings of lively widows, heart-exulting heirs, and reſiduary legatees of all denominations; ſince, by keeping down the inward joy, thoſe intereſting reflections muſt ſadden the aſpect, and add an appearance of real concern to the aſſumed fables.

'Well, but, now thou art come to the reward of all thy watchings, anxieties, and cloſe attendances, tell me what it is; tell me if it compenſate thy trouble, and anſwer thy hope?

'As to myſelf, thou ſeeſt, by the gravity of my ſtyle, how the ſubject has helped to mortify me. But the neceſſity I am under of committing either ſpeedy matrimony, or a rape, has ſaddened over my gayer proſpects, and, more than the caſe itſelf, contributed to make me ſympathize with thy preſent joyful-ſorrow.

Adieu, Jack. I muſt be ſoon out of my pain; and my Clariſſa ſhall be ſoon out of hers—For ſo does the arduouſneſs of the caſe require.

LETTER XXIII.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

SUNDAY MORNING.

I Have had the honour of my charmer's company for two complete hours. We met before ſix in Mrs. Moore's garden. A walk on the Heath refuſed me.

The ſedateneſs of her aſpect, and her kind compliance in this meeting, gave me hopes. And all that either the captain or I had urged yeſterday to obtain a full and free pardon, that re-urged I; and I told her, beſides, that Captain Tomlinſon was gone down with hopes to prevail upon her uncle Harlowe to come up in perſon, in order to preſent to me the greateſt bleſſing that man ever received.

But the utmoſt I could obtain was, that ſhe would take no reſolution in my favour till ſhe received Miſs Howe's next letter.

'I will not repeat the arguments I uſed: but I will give thee the ſubſtance of what ſhe ſaid in anſwer to them.

She had conſidered of every thing, ſhe told me. My whole conduct was before her. The houſe I carried her to muſt be a vile houſe. The people early ſhewed what they were capable of, in the earneſt attempt made to faſten Miſs Partington upon her; as ſhe doubted not, with my approbation—['Surely,' thought I, 'ſhe has not received a duplicate of Miſs Howe's letter of detection!'] They heard her cries. My inſult was undoubtedly premeditated. By my whole recollected behaviour to her, previous to it, it muſt be ſo. I had the vileſt of views, no queſtion. And my treatment of her put it out of all doubt.

Soul all over, Belford! ſhe ſeems ſenſible of liberties that my paſſion made me inſenſible of having taken, or ſhe could not ſo deeply reſent.

She beſought me to give over all thoughts of her. Sometimes, ſhe ſaid, ſhe thought herſelf cruelly treated by her neareſt and deareſt relations: at ſuch times, a ſpirit of repining and even of reſentment took place; and the reconciliation, at other times ſo deſirable, was not then ſo much the favourite wiſh of her heart, as was the ſcheme ſhe had formerly planned—of taking her good Norton for her directreſs and guide, and living upon her own eſtate in the manner her grandfather had intended ſhe ſhould live.

This ſcheme ſhe doubted not that her couſin Morden, who was one of her truſtees for that eſtate, would enable her (and that, as ſhe hoped, without litigation) to purſue. 'And if he can, and 'does, what Sir, let me aſk you,' ſaid ſhe, 'have I ſeen in your conduct, that 'ſhould make me prefer to it an union of 'intereſts, where there is ſuch a diſunion in minds?'

So thou ſeeſt, Jack, there is reaſon, as well as reſentment, in the preference ſhe makes againſt me!—Thou ſeeſt, that ſhe preſumes to think that ſhe can be happy without me; and that ſhe muſt be unhappy with me!

I had beſought her, in the concluſion of my re-urged arguments, to write to Miſs Howe before Miſs Howe's anſwer could come, in order to lay before her the preſent ſtate of things; and if ſhe would pay a deference to her judgment, to let her have an opportunity to give it on the full knowledge of the caſe—

'So I would, Mr. Lovelace,' was the anſwer, 'if I were in doubt myſelf, 'which I would prefer; marriage, or 'the ſcheme I have mentioned. You 'cannot think, Sir, but the latter muſt 'be my choice. I wiſh to part with you 'with temper—Don't put me upon re-'peating—'

'Part with me, Madam!' interrupted I—'I cannot bear thoſe words!—But 'let me beſeech you, however, to write 'to Miſs Howe. I hope, if Miſs Howe 'is not my enemy—'

'She is not the enemy to your perſon, 'Sir;—

'Sir;—as you would be convinced, if 'you saw her laſt letter to me. But were 'ſhe not an enemy to your actions, ſhe 'would not be my friend, nor the friend 'of virtue. Why will you provoke from 'me, Mr. Lovelace, the harſhneſs of 'expreſſion, which, however deſerved 'by you, I am unwilling juſt now to 'uſe; having ſuffered enough in the 'two paſt days from my own vehe-'mence?'

I bit my lip for vexation. I was ſilent.

'Miſs Howe,' proceeded ſhe, 'knows 'the full ſtate of matters already, Sir. 'The anſwer I expect from her reſpects 'myſelf, not you. Her heart is too warm 'in the cauſe of friendſhip, to leave me 'in ſuſpence one moment longer than is 'neceſſary, as to what I want to know. 'Nor does her anſwer abſolutely de-'pend upon herſelf. She muſt ſee a per-'ſon firſt; and that perſon perhaps ſee 'others.'

The curſed ſmuggler-woman, Jack! —Miſs Howe's Townſend, I doubt not! —Plot, contrivance, intrigue, ſtratagem!—Underground moles theſe wo-men—'But let the earth cover me! let 'me be a mole too,' thought I, 'if they 'carry their point!—And if this lady 'eſcape me now!'

She frankly owned, that ſhe had once thought of embarking out of all our ways for ſome one of our American colonies: but now that ſhe had been compelled to ſee me, (which had been her greateſt dread, and which ſhe would have given her life to avoid) ſhe thought ſhe might be happieſt in the reſumption of her for-mer favourite ſcheme, if Miſs Howe could find her a reputable and private aſylum, till her couſin Morden could come. But if he came not ſoon, and if ſhe had a difficulty to get a place of re-fuge; whether from her brother or from any-body-elſe, [meaning me, I ſuppoſe] ſhe might yet perhaps go abroad: for, to ſay the truth, ſhe could not think of returning to her father's houſe; ſince her brother's rage, her ſiſter's upbraid-ings, her father's anger, her mother's ſtill more-affecting ſorrowings, and her own conſciouſneſs under them all, would be inſupportable to her.

O Jack! I am ſick to death, I pine, I die, for Miſs Howe's next letter! I would bind, gag, ſtrip, rob, and do any-thing but murder, to intercept it.

But, determined as ſhe ſeems to be, it was evident to me, nevertheleſs, that ſhe had ſtill ſome tenderneſs for me.

She often wept as ſhe talked, and much oftener ſighed. She looked at me twice with an eye of undoubted gentleneſs, and three times with an eye tending to com-paſſion and ſoftneſs: but it's benign rays were as often ſnatched back, as I may ſay, and her face averted as if her ſweet eyes were not to be truſted, and could not ſtand againſt my eager eyes; ſeeking, as they did, for a loſt heart in hers, and endeavouring to penetrate to her very ſoul.

More than once I took her hand. She ſtruggled not much againſt the freedom. I preſſed it once with my lips. She was not very angry. A frown indeed; but a frown that had more diſtreſs in it than indignation.

How came the dear ſoul (cloathed as it is with ſuch a ſilken veſture) by all it's ſteadineſs?—Was it neceſſary, that the active gloom of ſuch a tyrant of a father, ſhould commix with ſuch a paſſive ſweetneſs of a will-leſs mother, to pro-duce a conſtancy, an equanimity, a ſtead-neſs, in the daughter, which never wo-man before could boaſt of?—If ſo, ſhe is more obliged to that deſpotick father than I could have imagined a creature to be, who gave diſtinction to every-one related to her beyond what the crown itſelf can confer.

I hoped, I ſaid, that ſhe would ad-mit of the intended viſit, which I had ſo often mentioned, of the two ladies.

She was here. She had ſeen me. She could not help herſelf at preſent. She ever had the higheſt regard for the la-dies of my family, becauſe of their worthy characters. There ſhe turned away her ſweet face, and vanquiſhed an half-riſen ſigh.

I kneeled to her then. It was upon a verdant cuſhion; for we were upon the graſs-walk. I caught her hand. I beſought her with an earneſtneſs that called up, as I could feel, my heart to my eyes, to make me, by her forgive-neſs and example, more worthy of them, and of her own kind and generous wiſhes. 'By my ſoul, Madam,' ſaid I, 'you ſtab me with your goodneſs, your 'undeſerved goodneſs! and I cannot 'bear it!'

'Why, why,' thought I, as I did ſeveral times in this converſation, 'will 'ſhe not generouſly forgive me? Why 'will ſhe make it neceſſary for me to 'bring Lady Betty and my couſin to my 'aſſiſtance? Can the fortreſs expect the 'ſame advantageous capitulation, which 'yields not to the ſummons of a reſiſt-

'leſs

'lish conqueror, as if it gave not the 'trouble of bringing up, and raising 'it's heavy artillery againſt it?'

'What ſenſibilities,' ſaid the divine creature, withdrawing her hand, 'muſt 'thou have ſuppreſſed!—What a dread-'ful, what a judicial hardneſs of heart 'muſt thine be; who canſt be capable 'of ſuch emotions as ſometimes have 'flowed from thy lips; yet canſt have 'ſo far overcome them all, as to be 'able to act as thou haſt acted, and that 'from ſettled purpoſe and premeditati-'on; and this, as it is ſaid, through-'out the whole of thy life, from infancy 'to this time!'

I told her, that I had hoped, from the generous concern ſhe had expreſſed for me, when I was ſo ſuddenly and dangerouſly taken ill—[The ipecacuanha experiment, Jack!]

She interrupted me—'Well have you 'rewarded me for the concern you ſpeak 'of!—However, I will frankly own, 'now that I am determined to think no 'more of you, that you might (unſatis-'fied as I nevertheleſs was with you) 'have made an intereſt—'

She pauſed. I beſought her to proceed.

'Do you ſuppoſe, Sir,' and turned away her ſweet face as we walked, 'do 'you ſuppoſe, that I had not thought 'of laying down a plan to govern my-'ſelf by, when I found myſelf ſo un-'happily over-reached and cheated, as 'I may ſay, out of myſelf?—When I 'found, that I could not be, and do, 'what I wiſhed to be, and to do, do you 'imagine, that I had not caſt about, 'what was the next proper courſe to take? '—And do you believe, that this next 'courſe has not coſt me ſome pain, to be 'obliged to—'

There again ſhe ſtopt.

'But let us break off diſcourſe,' reſumed ſhe. 'The ſubject grows too—' She ſighed—'Let us break off diſcourſe 'I will go in—I will prepare for 'church—' ['The devil!' thought I.] 'Well as I can appear in theſe every-'day worn cloaths'—looking upon herſelf—'I will go to church.'

She then turned from me to go into the houſe.

'Bleſs me, my beloved creature, bleſs 'me with the continuance of this affect-'ing converſation—Remorſe has ſeized 'my heart!—I have been exceſſively 'wrong—Give me further cauſe to curſe 'my heedleſs folly, by the continuance 'of this calm, but ſoul-penetrating 'converſation.'

'No, no, Mr. Lovelace. I have ſaid 'too much. Impatience begins to break 'in upon me. If you can excuſe me to 'the ladies, it will be better for my 'mind's ſake, and for your credit's ſake, 'that I do not ſee them. Call me to 'them over-nice, petulant, prudiſh; what 'you pleaſe call me to them. Nobody 'but Miſs Howe, to whom, next to the 'Almighty, and my own mother, I wiſh 'to ſtand acquitted of wilful error, ſhall 'know the whole of what has paſſed. 'Be happy, as you may!—Deſerve to be 'happy, and happy you will be, in your 'own reflection at leaſt, were you to be 'ever ſo unhappy in other reſpects. For 'myſelf, if I ſhall be enabled, on due 'reflection, to look back upon my own 'conduct, without the great reproach 'of having wilfully, and againſt the light 'of my own judgment, erred, I ſhall be 'more happy, than if I had all that the 'world accounts deſirable.'

The noble creature proceeded; for I could not ſpeak.

'This ſelf-acquittal, when ſpirits are 'lent me to diſpel the darkneſs which at 'preſent too often over-clouds my mind, 'will, I hope, make me ſuperior to all 'the calamities that can befal me.'

Her whole perſon was informed by her ſentiments. She ſeemed to be taller than before. How the god within her exalted her, not only above me, but above herſelf!

'Divine creature!' (as I thought her) I called her. I acknowledged the ſuperiority of her mind; and was proceeding —But ſhe interrupted me—'All human 'excellence,' ſaid ſhe, 'is comparative 'only. My mind, I believe, is indeed 'ſuperior to yours, debaſed as yours is 'by evil habits: but I had not known it 'to be ſo, if you had not taken pains 'to convince me of the inferiority of 'yours.'

How great, how ſublimely great, this creature!—By my ſoul, I cannot forgive her for her virtues! There is no bearing the conſciouſneſs of the infinite inferiority ſhe charged me with.—But why will ſhe break from me, when good reſolutions are taking place?—The red-hot iron ſhe refuſes to ſtrike—O why will ſhe ſuffer the yielding wax to harden?

We had gone but a few paces towards the houſe, when we were met by the impertinent women, with notice, that breakfaſt was ready. I could only, with uplifted hands, beſeech her to give me hope of a renewed converſation after breakfaſt.

No;

No; she would go to church.

And into the house she went, and up stairs directly. Nor would she oblige me with her company at the tea-table.

I offered by Mrs. Moore to quit both the table and the parlour, rather than she should exclude herself, or deprive the two widows of the favour of her company.

That was not all the matter, she told Mrs. Moore. She had been struggling to keep down her temper. It had cost her some pains to do it. She was desirous to compose herself, in hopes to receive benefit by the divine worship she was going to join in.

Mrs. Moore hoped for her presence at dinner.

She had rather be excused. Yet, if she could obtain the frame of mind she hoped for, she might not be averse to shew, that she had got above those sensibilities, which gave consideration to a man who deserved not to be to her what he had been.

This said, no doubt, to let Mrs. Moore know, that the garden-conversation had not been a reconciling one.

Mrs. Moore seemed to wonder, that we were not upon a better foot of understanding, after so long a conference; and the more, as she believed, that the lady had given in to the proposal for the repetition of the ceremony, which I had told them was insisted upon by her uncle Harlowe. But I accounted for this, by telling both widows, that she was resolved to keep on the reserve, till she heard from Captain Tomlinson, whether her uncle would be present in person at the solemnity, or would name that worthy gentleman for his proxy.

Again I enjoined strict secrecy, as to this particular; which was promised by the widows, as well for themselves, as for Miss Rawlins; of whose taciturnity they gave me such an account, as shewed me, that she was secret-keeper-general to all the women of fashion at Hampstead.

The Lord, Jack! What a world of mischief, at this rate must Miss Rawlins know?—What a Pandora's box must her bosom be?—Yet, had I nothing that was more worthy of my attention to regard, I would engage to open it, and make my uses of the discovery.

And now, Belford, thou perceivest, that all my reliance is upon the mediation of Lady Betty and Miss Montague, and upon the hope of intercepting Miss Howe's next letter.

LETTER XXIV.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

THE fair inexorable is actually gone to church with Mrs Moore and Mrs Bevis. But Will closely attends her motions; and I am in the way to receive any occasional intelligence from him.

She did not chuse [A mighty word with the sex! as if they were always to have their own wills!] that I should wait upon her. I did not much press it, that she might not apprehend, that I thought I had reason to doubt her voluntary return.

I once had it in my head to have found the widow Bevis other employment. And I believe she would have been as well pleased with my company as to go to church; for she seemed irresolute when I told her, that two out of a family were enough to go to church for one day. But having her things on, (as the women call every-thing) and her aunt Moore expecting her company, she thought it best to go—'Lest it should look oddly, you 'know,' whispered she, to one who was above regarding how it looked.

So here am I in my dining-room; and have nothing to do but to write, till they return.

And what will be my subject, thinkest thou!—Why, the old beaten one, to be sure; self-debate—through temporary remorse: for the blow being not struck, her guardian-angel is redoubling his efforts to save her.

If it be not that, [And yet what power should her guardian-angel have over me?] I don't know what it is, that gives a check to my revenge, whenever I meditate treason against so sovereign a virtue. Conscience is dead and gone, as I told thee; so it cannot be that. A young conscience growing up, like the phœnix, from the ashes of the old one, it cannot be surely. But if it were, it would be hard, if I could not over-lay a young conscience.

Well, then, it must be LOVE, I fancy. LOVE itself, inspiring love of an object so adorable—Some little attention possibly paid likewise to thy whining arguments in her favour.

Let LOVE then be allowed to be the moving principle; and the rather, as LOVE naturally makes the lover loth to disoblige the object of it's flame; and knowing, that an offence of the meditated kind will be a mortal offence to her, cannot bear that I ſhould think of giving it.

Let LOVE and me talk together a little on this ſubject—Be it a young conſcience, or love, or thyſelf, Jack, thou ſeeſt that I am for giving every whiffler audience. But this muſt be the laſt debate on this ſubject; for is not her fate in a manner at it's criſis? And muſt not my next ſtep be an irretrievable one, tend it which way it will?

AND now the debate is over.

A thouſand charming things (for LOVE is gentler than CONSCIENCE) has this little urchin ſuggeſted in her favour.

He pretended to know both our hearts: and he would have it, that though my love was a prodigious ſtrong and potent love; and though it has the merit of many months faithful ſervice to plead, and has had infinite difficulties to ſtruggle with; yet that it is not THE RIGHT SORT OF LOVE.

Right ſort of love!—A puppy!—'But, 'with due regard to your deityſhip,' ſaid I, 'what merits has ſhe with YOU, 'that you ſhould be of her party! Is hers, 'I pray you, a right ſort of love? Is it 'love at all? She don't pretend that it is. 'She owns not your ſovereignty. What 'a d—l moves you, to plead thus earneſtly for a rebel, who deſpiſes your 'power?'

And then he came, with his if's and and's—And it would have been, and ſtill, as he believed, would be, love, and a love of the exalted kind, if I would encourage it by the right ſort of love he talked of: and, in juſtification of his opinion, pleaded her own confeſſions, as well thoſe of yeſterday, as of this morning: and even went ſo far back as to my ipecacuanha-illneſs.

I never talked ſo familiarly with his godſhip before: thou mayeſt think therefore that this dialect ſounded oddly in my ears. And then he told me, how often I had thrown cold water upon the moſt charming flame that ever warmed a lady's boſom, while but young and riſing.

I required a definition of this right ſort of love. He tried at it: but made a ſorry hand of it. Nor could I, for the ſoul of me, be convinced, that what he meant to extol, was LOVE.

Upon the whole, we had a notable controverſy upon this ſubject, in which he inſiſted upon the unprecedented merit of the lady. Nevertheleſs I got the better of him; for he was ſtruck abſolutely dumb, when (waving her preſent perverſeneſs, which yet was a ſufficient anſwer to all his pleas) I aſſerted, and offered to prove it, by a thouſand inſtances impromptu, that love was not governed by merit, nor could be under the dominion of prudence, or any other reaſoning power: and if the lady were capable of love, it was of ſuch a ſort of love, as he had nothing to do with, and which never before reigned in a female heart.

I aſked him, What he thought of her flight from me, at a time when I was more than half overcome by the right ſort of love he talked of?—And then I ſhewed him the letter ſhe wrote, and left behind her for me, with an intention, no doubt, abſolutely to break my heart, or to provoke me to hang, drown, or ſhoot myſelf; to ſay nothing of a multitude of declarations from her, defying his power, and imputing all that looked like love in her behaviour to me, to the perſecution and rejection of her friends; which made her think of me but as a laſt reſort.

LOVE then gave her up. The letter, he ſaid, deſerved neither pardon nor excuſe. He did not think he had been pleading for ſuch a declared rebel. And as to the reſt, he ſhould be a betrayer of the rights of his own ſovereignty, if what I had alledged were true, and he were ſtill to plead for her.

I ſwore to the truth of all. And truly I ſwore: which perhaps I do not always do.

And now what thinkeſt thou muſt become of the lady, whom LOVE itſelf gives up, and CONSCIENCE cannot plead for?

LETTER XXV.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

SUNDAY AFTERNOON.

O Belford! what a hair's-breadth eſcape have I had!—Such a one, that I tremble between terror and joy, at the thoughts of what might have happened, and did not.

What a perverſe girl is this, to contend with her fate; yet has reaſon to think, that her very ſtars fight againſt her! I am the luckieſt of men!—But my breath almoſt fails me, when I reflect upon what a ſlender thread my deſtiny hung.

But not to keep thee in ſuſpence; I have, within this half-hour, obtained poſſeſſion of the expected letter from Miſs Howe—And by ſuch an accident!

But

But here, with the former, I diſpatch this; thy meſſenger waiting.

LETTER XXVI.

MR. LOVELACE. IN CONTINUATION.

THUS it was—My charmer accompanied Mrs. Moore again to church this afternoon. I had been very earneſt, in the firſt place, to obtain her company at dinner: but in vain. According to what ſhe had ſaid to Mrs. Moore, I was too conſiderable to her, to be allowed that favour. In the next place, I beſought her to favour me, after dinner, with another garden-walk. But ſhe would again go to church. And what reaſon have I to rejoice that ſhe did!

My worthy friend Mrs. Bevis thought one ſermon a day, well obſerved, enough; ſo ſtaid at home to bear me company.

The lady and Mrs. Moore had not been gone a quarter of an hour, when a young country-fellow on horſeback came to the door, and enquired for Mrs. Harriot Lucas. The widow and I (undetermined how we were to entertain each other) were in the parlour next the door; and hearing the fellow's enquiry, 'O 'my dear Mrs. Bevis,' ſaid I, 'I am 'undone—undone for ever—if you do 'not help me out!—Since here, in all 'probability, is a meſſenger from that 'implacable Miſs Howe with a letter; 'which, if delivered to Mrs. Lovelace, 'may undo all we have been doing.'

'What,' ſaid ſhe, 'would you have 'me do?'

'Call the maid in this moment, that I 'may give her her leſſon; and, if it be 'as I imagined, I'll tell you what you 'ſhall do.'

Wid. 'Margaret!—Margaret!—'come in this minute.'

Lovel. 'What anſwer, Mrs. Marga'ret, did you give the man, upon his 'aſking for Mrs. Harriot Lucas?

Peggy. 'I only aſked, What was his 'buſineſs, and who he came from?—'(For, Sir, your honour's ſervant had 'told me how things ſtood:)—And I 'came at your call, Madam, before he 'anſwered me.'

Lovel. 'Well, child, if ever you wiſh 'to be happy in wedlock yourſelf, and 'would have people diſappointed, who 'want to make miſchief between you 'and your huſband, get out of him his 'meſſage, or letter if he has one, and 'bring it to me, and ſay nothing to Mrs. 'Lovelace, when ſhe comes in; and here 'is a guinea for you.'

Peggy. 'I will do all I can to ſerve 'your honour's worſhip for nothing.' [Nevertheleſs, with a ready hand, taking the guinea:] 'for Mr. William tells 'me what a good gentleman you be.'

Away went Peggy to the fellow at the door.

Peggy. 'What is your buſineſs, friend, 'with Mrs. Harry Lucas?'

Fellow. 'I muſt ſpeak to her her own 'ſelf.'

Lovel. 'My deareſt widow, do you 'perſonate Mrs. Lovelace—For Hea'ven's ſake do you perſonate Mrs. Love'lace!'

Wid. 'I perſonate Mrs. Lovelace, 'Sir! how can I do that?—She is fair '—I am brown. She is ſlender—I am 'plump.'

Lovel. 'No matter, no matter—The 'fellow may be a new-come ſervant: he 'is not in livery, I ſee. He may not 'know her perſon. You can but be 'bloated and in a dropſy.'

Wid. 'Dropſical people look not ſo 'freſh and ruddy as I do.'

Lovel. 'True—But the clown may 'not know that. 'Tis but for a preſent 'deception.'

'Peggy, Peggy,' called I, in a female tone, ſoftly at the door. 'Madam,' anſwered Peggy; and came up to me to the parlour-door.

Lovel. 'Tell him the lady is ill; and 'has lain down upon the couch. And 'get his buſineſs from him, whatever 'you do.'

Away went Peggy.

Lovel. 'Now, my dear widow, lie 'along on the ſettee, and put your hand'kerchief over your face, that, if he will 'ſpeak to you himſelf, he may not ſee 'your eyes and your hair.—So—That's 'right—I'll ſtep into the cloſet by you.'

I did ſo.

Peggy. [returning.] 'He won't de'liver his buſineſs to me. He will ſpeak 'to Mrs. Harriot Lucas her own ſelf.'

Lovel. [holding the door in my hand.] 'Tell him, that this is Mrs. Harriot 'Lucas; and let him come in. Whiſ'per him, (if he doubts) that ſhe is 'bloated, dropſical, and not the woman 'ſhe was.'

Away went Margery.

Lovel. 'And now, my dear widow, 'let me ſee what a charming Mrs. 'Lovelace you'll make!—Aſk, if he 'comes from Miſs Howe.—Aſk, if he 'lives with her.—Aſk how ſhe does.—'Call her at every word, your dear Miſs 'Howe.—Offer him money.—Take this 'half-guinea for him—Complain of 'your head, to have a pretence to hold

'it down; and cover your forehead and 'eyes with your hand, where your hand-'kerchief hides not your face.—That's 'right—And diſmiſs the raſcal—[Here 'he comes]—as ſoon as you can.'

In came the fellow, bowing and ſcraping, his hat poked out before him with both his hands.

Fellow. 'I am ſorry, Madam, an't 'pleaſe you, to find you be'nt well.'

Widow. 'What is your buſineſs with 'me, friend?'

Fellow. 'You are Mrs. Harriot Lucas, 'I ſuppoſe, Madam?'

Widow. 'Yes. Do you come from 'Miſs Howe?'

Fellow. 'I do, Madam.'

Widow. 'Doſt thou know my right 'name, friend?'

Fellow. 'I can give a ſhrewd gueſs. 'But that's none of my buſineſs.'

Widow. 'What is thy buſineſs? I 'hope Miſs Howe is well?'

Fellow. 'Yes, Madam; pure well, I 'thank God. I wiſh you were ſo too.'

Widow. 'I am too full of grief to be 'well.'

Fellow. 'So belike I have hard ſay.'

Widow. 'My head aches ſo dread-'fully, I cannot hold it up. I muſt beg 'of you to let me know your bu neſs.'

Fellow. 'Nay, and that be all, my bu-'ſineſs is ſoon known. It is but to give 'this letter to your own partiklar hands '—Here it is.'

Widow. [taking it.] 'From my dear 'friend Miſs Howe?—Ah, my head!'

Fellow. 'Yes, Madam: but I am ſorry 'you are ſo bad.'

Widow. 'Do you live with Miſs 'Howe?'

Fellow. 'No, Madam: I am one of 'her tenant's ſons. Her lady-mother 'muſt not know as how I came of this 'errand. But the letter, I ſuppoſe, will 'tell you all.'

Widow. 'How ſhall I ſatisfy you for 'this kind trouble?'

Fellow. 'Na how at all. What I do 'is for love of Miſs Howe. She will 'ſatisfy me more than enough. But, 'may hap, you can ſend no anſwer, you 'are ſo ill.'

Widow. 'Was you ordered to wait for 'an anſwer?'

Fellow. 'No—I cannot ſay that I was. 'But I was bidden to obſerve how you 'looked, and how you was; and if you 'did write a line or ſo, to take care of it, 'and give it only to our young landlady, 'in ſecret.'

Widow. 'You ſee I look ſtrangely. 'Not ſo well as I uſed to do.'

Fellow. 'Nay, I don't know that I 'ever ſaw you but once before; and 'that was at a ſtyle where I met you and 'my young landlady; but knew better 'than to ſtare a gentlewoman in the face; 'eſpecially at a ſtyle.'

Widow. 'Will you eat, or drink, 'friend?'

Fellow. 'A cup of ſmall ale, I don't 'care if I do.'

Widow. 'Margaret, take the young 'man down, and treat him with what 'the houſe affords.'

Fellow. 'Your ſervant, Madam. But 'I ſtaid to eat as I come along, juſt up-'on the heath yonder; or elſe to ſay 'the truth, I had been here ſoo er.—['Thank my ſtars,' thought I, 'thou didſt.'] —'A piece of powdered beef was upon 'the table, at the ſign of the Caſtle, 'where I ſtopt to enquire for this houſe: 'and ſo, thoff I only intended to wet 'my whiſtle, I could not help eating. 'So ſhall only taſte of your ale; for the 'beef was wounderly corned.'

'Prating dog!—Pox on thee!'—thought I.

He withdrew, bowing and ſcraping.

'Margaret,' whiſpered I, in a female voice, [whipping out of the cloſet, and holding the parlour-door in my hand] 'get him out of the houſe as faſt as you 'can, leſt they come from church, and 'catch him here.'

Peggy. 'Never fear, Sir.'

The fellow went down, and, it ſeems, drank a large draught of ale; and Margaret finding him very talkative, told him, She begged his pardon; but ſhe had a ſweetheart juſt come from ſea, whom ſhe was forced to hide in the pantry; ſo was ſure he would excuſe her from ſtaying with him.

Aye, aye, to be ſure, the clown ſaid: for if he could not make ſport, he would ſpoil none. But he whiſpered her, that one Squire Lovelace was a damnation rogue, if the truth might be told.

'For what?' ſaid Margaret. And could have given him, ſhe told the widow, (who related to me all this) a good dowſe of the chaps.

'For kiſſing all the women he came 'near.'

At the ſame time the dog wrapped himſelf round Margery, and gave her a ſmack, that, ſhe told Mrs. Bevis afterwards, ſhe might have heard into the parlour.

Such, Jack, is human nature: thus does it operate in all degrees; and ſo does the clown, as well as his betters, practiſe what he cenſures; and cenſure what what he practiſes! Yet this ſly dog knew not but the wench had a ſweetheart locked up in the pantry: If the truth were known, ſome of the ruddy-face dairy wenches might perhaps call him a damnation rogue, as juſtly as their betters of the ſame ſex might Squire Lovelace.

The fellow told the maid, that, by what he diſcovered of the young lady's face, it looked very roſy to what he took it to be; and he thought her a good deal fatter, as ſhe lay, and not ſo tall.

All women are born to intrigue, Jack; and practiſe it more or leſs, as fathers, guardians, governeſſes, from dear experience can tell; and in love-affairs are naturally expert, and quicker in their wits by half than men. This ready, though raw wench, gave an inſtance of this, and improved on the dropſical hint I had given her. The lady's ſeeming plumpneſs was owing to dropſical diſorder, and to the round poſture ſhe lay in—'Very likely, truly.' Her appearing to him to be ſhorter, he might have obſerved was owing to her drawing her feet up from pain, and becauſe the couch was too ſhort, ſhe ſuppoſed—Adſo, he did not think of that. Her roſy colour was owing to grief and head-ache—'Aye, that might very well be.'— But he was highly pleaſed that he had given the letter into Mrs. Harriot's own hand, as he ſhould tell Miſs Howe.

He deſired once more to ſee the lady at his going away, and would not be denied. The widow therefore ſat up, with her handkerchief over her face, leaning her hand againſt the wainſcot.

He aſked, if ſhe had any partiklar meſſage?

No: ſhe was ſo ill ſhe could not write; which was a great grief to her.

Should he call next day? For he was going to London, now he was ſo near; and ſhould ſtay at a couſin's that night, who lived in a ſtreet called Fetter Lane.

No: ſhe would write as ſoon as able, and ſend by the poſt.

Well, then, if ſhe had nothing to ſend by him, may-hap he might ſtay in town a day or two; for he had never ſeen the Lions in the Tower, nor Bedlam, nor the Tombs; and he would make a holiday or two, as he had leave to do, if ſhe had no buſineſs or meſſage that required his poſting down next day.

She had not.

She offered him the half-guinea I had given her for him; but he refuſed it, with great profeſſions of diſintereſtedneſs, and love, as he called it, to Miſs Howe; to ſerve whom, he would ride to the world's-end, or even to Jericho.

And ſo the ſhocking raſcal went away: and glad at my heart was I when he was gone: for I feared nothing ſo much, as that he would have ſtaid till they came from church.

Thus, Jack, got I my heart's-eaſe, the letter of Miſs Howe, and through ſuch a train of accidents, as makes me ſay, that the lady's ſtars fight againſt her. But yet I muſt attribute a good deal to my own precaution, in having taken right meaſures: for had I not ſecured the widow by my ſtories, and the maid by my ſervant, all would have ſignified nothing. And ſo heartily were they ſecured, the one by a ſingle guinea, the other by half a dozen warm kiſſes, and the averſion they both had to ſuch wicked creatures as delighted in making miſchief between man and wife, that they promiſed, that neither Mrs. Moore, Miſs Rawlins, Mrs. Lovelace, nor anybody living, till a week at leaſt were paſt, and till I gave leave, ſhould know any-thing of the matter.

The widow rejoiced that I had got the miſchief-maker's letter. I excuſed myſelf to her, and inſtantly withdrew with it; and after I had read it, fell to my ſhort-hand, to acquaint thee with my good luck: and they not returning ſo ſoon as church was done, (ſtepping, as it proved, in to Miſs Rawlins's, and tarrying there a-while, to bring that buſy girl with them to drink tea) I wrote thus far to thee, that thou mighteſt, when thou cameſt to this place, rejoice with me upon the occaſion.

They are all three juſt come in.

I haſten to them.

LETTER XXVII.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

I Have begun another letter to thee, in continuation of my narrative: but I believe I ſhall ſend thee this before I ſhall finiſh that. By the incloſed thou wilt ſee, that neither of the correſpondents deſerve mercy from me: and I am reſolved to make the ending with one, the beginning with the other.

If thou ſayeſt, That the provocations I have given to one of them, will juſtify her freedoms; I anſwer, 'So they will, 'to any other perſon but myſelf.' But he that is capable of giving theſe provocations, and has the power to puniſh thoſe who abuſe him for giving them, will ſhew his reſentment; and the more remorſe-resentfully, perhaps, as he has deserved the freedoms.

If thou sayest, 'It is, however, wrong 'to do so;' I reply, that it is, nevertheless, human nature.—And wouldst thou not have me to be a man, Jack?

Here read the letter, if thou wilt. But thou art not my friend, if thou offerest to plead for either of the saucy creatures, after thou hast read it.

'TO MISS HARRIOT LUCAS, AT MRS. 'MOORE'S AT HAMPSTEAD.

'AFTER the discoveries I had made 'of the villainous machinations of the 'most abandoned of men, particularized 'in the long letter of Wednesday last, 'you will believe, my dearest friend, 'that my surprize upon perusing yours 'of Thursday evening from Hampstead 'was not so great as my indignation. 'Had the villain attempted to fire a city 'instead of an house, I should not have 'wondered at it. All that I am amazed at, is, that he (whose boast, as I 'am told, it is, that no woman shall keep 'him out of her bedchamber, when he has 'made a resolution to be in it) did not discover his foot before. And it is as 'strange to me, that having got you at 'such a shocking advantage, and in such 'a horrid house, you could at the time, 'escape dishonour, and afterwards get 'from such a set of infernals.

'I gave you, in my long letter of 'Wednesday and Thursday last, reasons 'why you ought to mistrust that specious Tomlinson. The man, my dear, 'must be a solemn villain. May lightning from Heaven blast the wretch who has 'set him and the rest of his REMORSELESS 'GANG, at work, to endeavour to destroy 'the most consummate virtue!—Heaven be praised! you have escaped from all 'their snares, and now are out of danger. '—So I will not trouble you at present 'with the particulars that I have further collected relating to this abominable imposture.

'For the same reason, I forbear to 'communicate to you some new stories of 'the abhorred wretch himself which have 'come to my ears. One in particular, 'of so shocking a nature!—Indeed, my 'dear, the man's a devil.

'The whole story of Mrs. Fretchville, 'and her house, I have no doubt to pronounce, likewise, an absolute fiction. '—Fellow!—How my soul spurns the villain!

'Your thoughts of going abroad, 'and your reasons for so doing, most 'sensibly affect me. But be comforted, 'my dear! I hope you will not be under 'a necessity of quitting your native 'country. Were I sure that that must 'be the cruel case, I would abandon all 'my own better prospects, and soon be 'with you. And I would accompany 'you whithersoever you went, and share 'fortunes with you: for it is impossible 'that I should be happy, if I knew that 'you were exposed not only to the 'perils of the sea, but to the attempts 'of other vile men; your personal 'graces attracting every eye, and exposing you to those hourly dangers, 'which others, less distinguished by the 'gifts of nature, might avoid.—All 'that I know, that beauty (so greatly 'coveted, and so greatly admired) is 'good for.

'O, my dear, were I ever to marry, 'and to be the mother of a CLARISSA, '[Clarissa must be the name, if promisingly lovely] how often would my 'heart ache for the dear creature, as 'she grew up, when I reflected, that 'a prudence and discretion unexampled 'in woman, had not, in you, been a sufficient protection to that beauty, which 'had drawn after it as many admirers 'as beholders!—How little should I 'regret the attacks of that cruel distemper, as it is called, which frequently 'makes the greatest ravages in the finest 'faces!

SAT. AFTERNOON.

'I HAVE just parted with Mrs. Townsend. I thought you had once seen 'her with me: but she says, she never 'had the honour to be personally known 'to you. She has a manlike spirit. She 'knows the world. And her two brothers being in town, she is sure she 'can engage them in so good a cause, and '(if there should be occasion) both their 'ships crews, in your service.

'Give your consent, my dear; and 'the horrid villain shall be repaid with 'broken bones, at least, for all his vileness!

'The misfortune is, Mrs. Townsend 'cannot be with you till Thursday next, 'or Wednesday at soonest: are you sure 'you can be safe where you are, till 'then? I think you are too near 'London; and perhaps you had better 'be in it. If you remove, let me, the 'very moment, know whither.

'How my heart is torn, to think of 'the necessity so dear a creature is 'driven to, of hiding herself? Devilish 'fellow! He must have been sportive

'and

'and wanton in his inventions—Yet that 'cruel, that ſavage ſportiveneſs has ſaved 'you from the ſudden violence to which 'he has had recourſe in the violation of 'others, of names and families not con-'temptible. For ſuch the villain always 'gloried to ſpread his ſnares.

'The vileneſs of this ſpecious monſter 'has done more, than any other conſi-'deration could do, to bring Mr. Hick-'man into credit with me. Mr. Hick-'man alone knows (for me) of your 'flight, and the reaſon of it. Had I 'not given him the reaſon, he might 'have thought ſtill worſe of the vile at-'tempt. I communicated it to him by 'ſhewing him your letter from Hamp-'ſtead. When he had read it, [And 'he trembled and reddened, as he read] he 'threw himſelf at my feet, and beſought 'me to permit him to attend you, and 'to give you the protection of his houſe. 'The good-natured man had tears in 'his eyes, and was repeatedly earneſt 'on this ſubject; propoſing to take his 'chariot-and-four, or a ſet, and in per-'ſon, in the face of all the world, give 'himſelf the glory of protecting ſuch an 'oppreſſed innocent.

'I could not but be pleaſed with him. 'And I let him know that I was. I 'hardly expected ſo much ſpirit from 'him. But a man's paſſiveneſs to a be-'loved object of our ſex may not, per-'haps, argue want of courage on pro-'per occaſions.

'I thought I ought, in return, to 'have ſome conſideration for his ſafety, 'as ſuch an open ſtep would draw upon 'him the vengeance of the moſt villain-'ous enterprizer in the world, who has 'always a gang of fellows, ſuch as him-'ſelf, at his call, ready to ſupport one 'another in the vileſt outrages. But 'yet, as Mr. Hickman might have 'ſtrengthened his hands by legal re-'courſes, I ſhould not have ſtood upon 'it, had I not known your delicacy, '[ſince ſuch a ſtep muſt have made a 'great noiſe, and given occaſion for 'ſcandal, as if ſome advantage had 'been gained over you] and were there 'not the greateſt probability, that all 'might be more ſilently, and more ef-'fectually, managed by Mrs. Town-'ſend's means.

'Mrs. Townſend will in perſon at-'tend you—She hopes, on Wedneſday '—Her brothers and ſome of their peo-'ple will ſcatteringly, and as if they 'knew nothing of you, [ſo we have con-'trived] ſee you ſafe not only to Lon-'don, but to her houſe at Deptford.

'She has a kinſwoman, who will obey 'your commands there, if ſhe herſelf 'be obliged to leave you. And there 'you may ſtay till the wretch's fury on 'loſing you, and his ſearch, are over.

'He will very ſoon, 'tis likely, enter 'upon ſome new villainy, which may en-'groſs him: and it may be given out, 'that you are gone to lay claim to the 'protection of your couſin Morden at 'Florence.

'Poſſibly, if he can be made to be-'lieve it, he will go over, in hopes to 'find you there.

'After a while, I can procure you a 'lodging in one of our neighbouring 'villages; where I may have the hap-'pineſs to be your daily viſitor. And 'if this Hickman be not filly and apiſh, 'and if my mother do not do unaccount-'able things, I may the ſooner think of 'marrying, that I may, without con-'troul, receive and entertain the dar-'ling of my heart.

'Many, very many, happy days do I 'hope we ſhall yet ſee together: and as 'this is my hope, I expect that it will be 'your conſolation.

'As to your eſtate, ſince you are re-'ſolved not to litigate for it, we will be 'patient, either till Colonel Morden 'arrives, or till ſhame compels ſome 'people to be juſt.

'Upon the whole, I cannot but think 'your proſpects now much happier, than 'they could have been, had you been 'actually married to ſuch a man as this. 'I muſt therefore congratulate you up-'on your eſcape, not only from an hor-'rid libertine, but from ſo vile a huſband, 'as he muſt have made to any woman; 'but more eſpecially to a perſon of 'your virtue and delicacy.

'You hate him, heartily hate him, I 'hope, my dear—I am ſure you do. It 'would be ſtrange, if ſo much purity of 'life and manners were not to abhor 'what is ſo repugnant to itſelf.

'In your letter before me, you men-'tion one written to me for a ſecond. I 'have not received any ſuch. De-'pend upon it therefore, that he muſt 'have it. And if he has, it is a won-'der, that he did not likewiſe get my 'long one of the 7th. Heaven be praiſ-'ed that he did not; and that it came 'ſafe to your hands!

'I ſend this by a young fellow, whoſe 'father is one of our tenants, with com-'mand to deliver it to no other hands but 'yours. He is to return directly, if you 'give him any letter. If not, he will 'proceed to London upon his own plea-

'[illegible] is a ſimple fellow; but very [illegible]. So you may ſay any-thing to [illegible]. If you write not by him. I deſire a line or two, as ſoon as poſſible.

'My mother knows nothing of his going to you: nor yet of your abandoning the latter. Forgive me! But he is not entitled to good-manners.

'I ſhall long to hear how you and Mrs. Townſend order matters. I wiſh ſhe cou'd have been with you ſooner. But I have loſt no time in engaging her, as you will ſuppoſe. I refer to her, what I have further to ſay and adviſe. So ſhall conclude with my prayers, that Heaven will direct and protect my deareſt creature, and make your future days happy! ANNA HOWE.'

And now, Jack, I will ſuppoſe, that thou haſt read this curſed letter. Allow me to make a few obſervations upon ſome of it's contents.

It is ſtrange to Miſs Howe, that having got her friend at ſuch a ſhocking advantage, &c.] And it is ſtrange to me, too. If ever I have ſuch another opportunity given to me, the cauſe of both our wonder, I believe, will ceaſe.

So thou ſeeſt Tomlinſon is further detected. No ſuch perſon as Mrs. Fretchville. May lightning from Heaven—O Lord, O Lord, O Lord!—What an horrid vixen is this!—My gang, my remorſeleſs gang, too, is brought in—And thou wilt plead for theſe girls again; wilt thou?—Heaven be praiſed, ſhe ſays, that her friend is out of danger—Miſs Howe ſhould be ſure of that: and that ſhe herſelf is ſafe.—But for this termagant, (as I often ſaid) I muſt ſurely have made a better hand of it.

New ſtories of me, Jack!—What can they be?—I have not found, that my generoſity to my Roſebud ever did me due credit with this pair of friends. Very hard, Belford, that credits cannot be ſet againſt debits, and a balance ſtruck in a rake's favour, as well as in that of every common man!—But he, from whom no good is expected, is not allowed the merit of the good he does.

I ought to have been a little more attentive to character, than I have been. For, notwithſtanding that the meaſures of right and wrong are ſaid to be ſo manifeſt, let me tell thee, that character baffles and runs away with all mankind. Let a man or woman once eſtabliſh themſelves in the world's opinion, and all that either of them do will be ſanctified. Nay, in the very courts of juſtice, does not character acquit or condemn as often as facts, and ſometimes even in ſpite of facts?—Yet, [impolitick that I have been, and am!] to be ſo careleſs of mine!—And now, I doubt, it is irretrievable.—But to leave moralizing.

Thou, Jack, knoweſt almoſt all my enterprizes worth remembering. Can this particular ſtory, which this girl hints at, be that of Lucy Villars?—Or can ſhe have heard of my intrigue with the pretty gypſey, who met me in Norwood, and of the trap I caught her cruel huſband in, [A fellow, as gloomy and tyrannical as old Harlowe] when he purſued a wife, who would not have deſerved ill of him, if he had deſerved well of her?—But he was not quite drowned. The man is alive at this day: and Miſs Howe mentions the ſtory as a very ſhocking one. Beſides, both theſe are a twelvemonth old, or more.

But evil fame and ſcandal are always new. When the offender has forgot a vile fact, it is often told to one and to another, who, having never heard of it before, trumpet it about as a novelty to others. But well ſaid the honeſt corregidor at Madrid, [A ſaying with which I enriched Lord M.'s collection]—'Good actions are remembered but for a day, bad ones for many years after the life of the guilty.'—Such is the reliſh that the world has for ſcandal. In other words, ſuch is the deſire which every-one has to exculpate himſelf by blackening his neighbour. You and I, Belford, have been very kind to the world, in furniſhing it with opportunities to gratify it's devil.

Miſs Howe will abandon her own better proſpects, and ſhare fortunes with her, were ſhe to go abroad.]—Charming romancer!—I muſt ſet about this girl, Jack. I have always had hopes of a woman whoſe paſſions carry her into ſuch altitudes!—Had I attacked Miſs Howe firſt, her paſſions (inflamed and guided, as I could have managed them) would have brought her to my lure in a fortnight.

But thinkeſt thou [and yet I think thou doſt] that there is any-thing in theſe high flights among the ſex? Verily, Jack, theſe vehement friendſhips are nothing but chaff and ſtubble, liable to be blown away by the very wind that raiſes them. Apes! mere apes of us! they think the word friendſhip has a pretty ſound with it; and it is much talked of; a faſhionable word: and ſo, truly, a ſingle woman, who thinks ſhe has a ſoul, and knows that ſhe wants ſomething would be thought to have found a fellow-ſoul for it in her own ſex. But I repeat, that the the word is a mere word, the thing a mere name with them; a cork-bottomed ſhuttle-cock, which they are fond of ſtriking to and fro, to make one another glow in the froſty weather of a ſingle ſtate; but which, when a man comes in between the pretended inſeparables, is given up, like their muſick, and other maidenly amuſements; which, nevertheleſs, may be neceſſary to keep the pretty rogues out of active miſchief. They then, in ſhort, having caught the fiſh, lay aſide the net.

Thou haſt a mind, perhaps, to make an exception for theſe two ladies. With all my heart. My Clariſſa has, if woman has, a ſoul capable of friendſhip. Her flame is bright and ſteady. But Miſs Howe's, were it not kept up by her mother's oppoſition, is too vehement to endure. How often have I known oppoſition not only cement friendſhip, but create love? I doubt not but poor Hickman would fare the better with this vixen, if her mother were as heartily againſt him, as ſhe is for him.

Thus much indeed, as to theſe two ladies, I will grant thee; that the active ſpirit of the one, and the meek diſpoſition of the other, may make their friendſhip more durable than it would otherwiſe be; for this is certain, that in every friendſhip, whether male or female, there muſt be a man and a woman ſpirit (that is to ſay, one of them, a forbearing one) to make it permanent.

But this I pronounce, as a truth, which all experience confirms; that friendſhip between women never holds to the ſacrifice of capital gratifications, or to the endangering of life, limb, or eſtate, as it often does in our nobler ſex.

Well, but next comes an indictment againſt poor Beauty!—What has beauty done, that Miſs Howe ſhould be offended at it?—Miſs Howe, Jack, is a charming girl. She has no reaſon to quarrel with beauty!—Didſt ever ſee her?—Too much fire and ſpirit in her eye indeed, for a girl!—But that's no fault with a man, that can lower that fire and ſpirit at pleaſure; and I know I am the man that can.

A ſweet auburn beauty is Miſs Howe. A firſt beauty among beauties when her ſweeter friend [with ſuch an aſſemblage of ſerene gracefulneſs, of natural elegance, of native ſweetneſs, yet conſcious, though not arrogant, dignity, every feature glowing with intelligence] is not in company.

The difference between the two, when together, I have ſometimes delighted to read, in the addreſſes of a ſtranger entering into the preſence of both, while ſtanding ſide by ſide. There never was an inſtance on ſuch an occaſion where the ſtranger paid not his firſt devoirs to my Clariſſa.

A reſpectful ſolemn awe ſat upon every feature of the addreſſer's face. His eyes ſeemed to aſk leave to approach her; and lower than common, whether man or woman, was the bow or curtſey. And although this awe was immediately diminiſhed by her condeſcending ſweetneſs, yet went it not ſo entirely off, but that you might ſee the reverence remain, as if the perſon ſaw more of the goddeſs than of the woman in her.

But the moment the ſame ſtranger turns to Miſs Howe, (though proud and ſaucy, and erect and bridling, ſhe) you will obſerve by the turn of his countenance, and the air of his addreſs, a kind of equality aſſumed. He appears to have diſcovered the woman in her, charming as that woman is. He ſmiles. He ſeems to expect repartee and ſmartneſs, and is never diſappointed. But then viſibly he prepares himſelf to give as well as take. He dares, after he has been a while in her company, to diſpute a point with her—Every point yielded up to the other, though no aſſuming or dogmatical air compels it.

In ſhort, with Miſs Howe, a bold man ſees (No doubt but Sir George Colmar did) that he and ſhe may either very ſoon be familiar together, [I mean with innocence] or he may ſo far incur her diſpleaſure, as to be forbid her preſence for ever.

For my own part, when I was firſt introduced to this lady, which was by my goddeſs when ſhe herſelf was a viſitor at Mrs. Howe's; I had not been half an hour with her, but I even hungered and thirſted after a romping-bout with the lively rogue; and in the ſecond or third viſit, was more deterred by the delicacy of her friend, than by what I apprehended from her own. 'This 'charming creature's preſence,' thought I, 'awes us both.' And I wiſhed her abſence, though any other woman were preſent, that I might try the difference in Miſs Howe's behaviour before her friend's face, or behind her back.

Delicate women make delicate women, as well as decent men. With all Miſs Howe's fire and ſpirit, it was eaſy to ſee, by her very eye, that ſhe watched for leſſons, and feared reproof, from the penetrating eye of her milder diſpoſitioned friend: and yet it was as eaſy to obſerve, the sprightliness and sweet manners of the other, that the sex which Miss Howe found in of hers, was more owing to her own generous apprehension that she fell short of her excellences, than to Miss Harlowe's consciousness of excellence over her. I have often, since I came at Miss Howe's letters, revolved this just and fine praise contained in one of them.

'Every one saw, that the preference 'they gave you to themselves, exalted you 'not into any visible triumph over them; 'for you had always something to say, 'on every point you carried, that raised 'the yielding heart, and left every one 'pleased and satisfied with themselves, 'though they carried not off the palm.'

As I propose, in a more advanced life, to endeavour to atone for my youthful freedoms with individuals of the sex, by giving cautions and instructions to the whole, I have made a memorandum to enlarge upon this doctrine;—to wit, That it is full as necessary to direct daughters in the choice of their female companions, as it is to guard them against the designs of men.

I say not this, however, to the disparagement of Miss Howe. She has from pride, what her friend has from principle. [The Lord help the sex, if they had not pride!]—But yet I am confident, that Miss Howe is indebted to the conversation and correspondence of Miss Harlowe for her highest improvements. But, both these ladies out of the question, I make no scruple to aver, [And I, Jack, should know something of the matter] that there have been more girls ruined, at least prepared for ruin, by their own sex, (taking in servants, as well as companions) than directly by the attempts and delusions of men.

But it is time enough, when I am old and joyless, to enlarge upon this topick.

As to the comparison between the two ladies, I will expatiate more on that subject (for I like it) when I have had them both. Which this letter of the vixen girl's, I hope thou wilt allow, warrants me to try for.

I return to the consideration of a few more of it's contents, to justify my vengeances so nearly now in view.

As to Mrs. Townsend; her manlike spirit; her two brothers; and their ships crews—I say nothing but this to the insolent threatening—Let 'em come!—But as to her fordid menace—To repay the horrid villain, as she calls me, for all my vileness, by BROKEN BONES! —Broken bones, Belford!—Who can bear this portterly threatening!—Broken bones, Jack!—Damn the little vulgar—Give me a name for her—But I banish all furious resentment. If I get these two girls into my power, Heaven forbid that I should be a second Phalaris, who turned his bull upon the artist! No bones of theirs will I break—They shall come off with me upon much lighter terms!

But these fellows are smugglers, it seems. And am not I a smuggler too? —I am; and have not the least doubt, but I shall have secured my goods before Thursday, or Wednesday either.

But did I want a plot, what a charming new one does this letter of Miss Howe strike me out? I am almost sorry, that I have fixed upon one.—For here, how easy would it be for me, to assemble a crew of swabbers, and to create a Mrs. Townsend (whose person, thou seest, my beloved knows not) to come on Tuesday, at Miss Howe's repeated solicitations, in order to carry my beloved to a warehouse of my own providing?

This, however, is my triumphant hope, that at the very time, that these ragamuffins will be at Hampstead, (looking for us) my dear Miss Harlowe and I, [So the fates, I imagine, have ordained] shall be fast asleep in each other's arms in town.—Lie still, villain, till the time comes.—My heart, Jack! my heart!—It is always thumping away on the remotest prospects of this nature.

But it seems, that the vileness of this specious monster [meaning me, Jack!] has brought Hickman into credit with her. So I have done some good! But to whom, I cannot tell: for this poor fellow, should I permit him to have this termagant, will be punished, as many times we all are, by the enjoyment of his own wishes—Nor can she be happy, as I take it, with him, were he to govern himself by her will, and have none of his own; since never was there a directing wife, who knew where to stop: power makes such a one wanton—She despises the man she can govern. Like Alexander, who wept, that he had no more worlds to conquer, she will be looking out for new exercises for her power, till she grow uneasy to herself, a discredit to her husband, and a plague to all about her.

But this honest fellow, it seems, with tears in his eyes, and with humble prostration, besought the vixen to permit him to set out in his chariot-and four, in order to give himself the glory of protecting such an oppressed innocent, in the face of the whole world. Nay, he reddened, it seems; and trembled too! as he read the fair complainant's letter.—How valiant is all this!

—Women

—Women love brave men; and no wonder, that his tears, his trembling, and his proſtration, gave him high reputation with the meek Miſs Howe.

But doſt think, Jack, that I in the like caſe, (and equally affected with the diſtreſs) ſhould have acted thus?—Doſt think, that I ſhould not firſt have reſcued the lady, and then, if needful, have aſked excuſe for it, the lady in my hand?—Wouldſt not thou have done thus, as well as I?

But 'tis beſt as it is. Honeſt Hickman may now ſleep in a whole ſkin. And yet that is more perhaps than he would have done, (the lady's deliverance unattempted) had I come at this requeſted permiſſion of his any other way, than by a letter, that it muſt not be known I have intercepted.

Miſs Howe thinks I may be diverted from purſuing my charmer, by ſome new-ſtarted villainy. Villainy is a word that ſhe is extremely fond of. But I can tell her, that it is impoſſible I ſhould, till the end of this villainy be obtained. Difficulty is a ſtimulus with ſuch a ſpirit as mine. I thought Miſs Howe knew me better. Were ſhe to offer herſelf, perſon for perſon, in the romancing zeal of her friendſhip, to ſave her friend, it ſhould not do, while the dear creature is on this ſide the moon.

She thanks Heaven, that her friend has received her letter of the 7th. We are all glad of it. She ought to thank me too. But I will not at preſent claim her thanks.

But when ſhe rejoices, that the letter went ſafe, does ſhe not, in effect, call out for vengeance, and expect it!—All in good time, Miſs Howe.

I will cloſe at this time with deſiring thee to make a liſt of the virulent terms with which the incloſed letter abounds: and then, if thou ſuppoſeſt, that I have made ſuch another, and have added to it all the flowers of the ſame blow, in the former letters of the ſame ſaucy creature, and thoſe in that of Miſs Harlowe which ſhe left for me on her elopement, thou wilt certainly think, that I have provocations ſufficient to juſtify me in all I ſhall do to either.

Return the incloſed the moment thou haſt peruſed it.

LETTER XXVIII.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

SUNDAY NIGHT—MONDAY MORNING.

I Went down with revenge in my heart, the contents of Miſs Howe's letter almoſt engroſſing me, the interview that Miſs Harlowe and Mrs. Moore (accompanied by Miſs Rawlins) gave me but in my countenance all the gentle, the placid, the ſerene, that the glaſs could teach; and in my behaviour all the polite, that ſuch an unpolite creature, as ſhe has often told me I am, could put on.

Miſs Rawlins was ſent for home almoſt as ſoon as ſhe came in, to entertain an unexpected viſitor; to her great regret, as well as to the diſappointment of my fair-one, as I could perceive from the looks of both: for they had agreed, it ſeems, if I went to town, as I ſaid I intended to do, to take a walk upon the Heath, at leaſt in Mrs. Moore's garden; and who knows, what might have been the iſſue, had the ſpirit of curioſity in the one met with the ſpirit of communication in the other?

Miſs Rawlins promiſed to return, if poſſible: but ſent to excuſe herſelf: her viſitor intending to ſtay with her all night.

I rejoiced in my heart, at her meſſage; and, after much ſupplication, obtained the favour of my beloved's company for another walk in the garden, having, as I told her, abundance of things to ſay, to propoſe, and to be informed of, in order ultimately to govern myſelf in my future ſteps.

She had vouchſafed, I ſhould have told thee, with eyes turned from me, and in an half-aſide attitude, to ſip two diſhes of tea in my company.—Dear ſoul! —How angry muſt ſhe the moſt polite! for I never ſaw Miſs Harlowe behave ſo awkwardly. I imagined ſhe knew not how to be awkward.

When we were in the garden, I poured my whole ſoul into her attentive ear; and beſought her returning favour.

She told me, that ſhe had formed her ſcheme for her future life: that, vile as the treatment was which ſhe had received from me, that was not all the reaſon ſhe had for rejecting my ſuit: but that, on the matureſt deliberation, ſhe was convinced, that ſhe could neither be happy with me, nor make me happy; and ſhe enjoined me, for both our ſakes, to think no more of her.

The captain, I told her, was rid down poſt in a manner, to forward my wiſhes with her uncle.—Lady Betty and Miſs Montague were undoubtedly arrived in town by this time. I would ſet out early in the morning to attend them. They adored her. They longed to ſee her. They would ſee her.—They would not be denied her company into Oxford-sister. Whither could she better go, to be free from her brother's insults?—Whither to be absolutely made unapprehensive of any body else?—Might I have any hopes of her returning favour, if Miss Howe could be prevailed upon to intercede for me?

If Miss Howe prevailed upon to intercede for me? repeated she, with a scornful smile, but a very pretty one. And there she stopt.

I repeated the concern it would be to me to be under a necessity of mentioning the misunderstanding to Lady Betty and my cousin, as a misunderstanding still to be made up; and as if I were of very little consequence to a dear creature who was of so much to me; urging, that these circumstances would extremely lower me not only in my own opinion, but in that of my relations.

But still she referred to Miss Howe's next letter; and all the concession I could bring her to in this whole conference, was, that she would wait the arrival and visit of the two ladies, if they came in a day or two, or before she received the expected letter from Miss Howe.

'Thank Heaven for this!' thought I. 'And now may I go to town with hopes 'of my return to find thee, dearest, 'where I shall leave thee.'

But yet, as she may find reasons to change her mind in my absence, I shall not entirely trust to this. My fellow, therefore, who is in the house, and who, by Mrs. Bevis's kind intelligence, will know every step she can take, shall have Andrew and a horse ready, to give me immediate notice of her motions; and moreover, go whither she will, he shall be one of her retinue, though unknown to herself, if possible.

This was all I could make of the fair inexorable. Should I be glad of it, or sorry for it?

Glad, I believe: and yet my pride is confoundedly abated to think, that I had so little hold in the affections of this daughter of the Harlowes.

Don't tell me, that virtue and principle are her guides on this occasion?—'Tis pride, a greater pride than my own, that governs her. Love, she has none, thou seest; nor ever had; at least not in a superior degree. Love that deserves the name, never was under the dominion of Prudence, or of any reasoning power. She cannot bear to be thought a woman, I warrant! And if, in the last attempt, I find her not one, what will she be the worse for the trial?—No one is to blame for suffering an evil he cannot shun or avoid.

Were a general to be overpowered, and robbed by a highwayman, would he be less fit for the command of an army on that account?—If indeed the general, pretending great valour, and having boasted, that he never would be robbed, were to make but faint resistance when he was brought to the test, and to yield his purse when he was master of his own sword, then indeed will the highwayman who robs him be thought the braver man.

But from these last conferences am I furnished with one argument in defence of my favourite purpose, which I never yet pleaded.

O Jack! what a difficulty must a man be allowed to have, to conquer a predominant passion, be it what it will, when the gratifying of it is in his power, however wrong he knows it to be to resolve to gratify it! Reflect upon this; and then wilt thou be able to account for, if not to excuse, a projected crime, which has habit to plead for it, in a breast as stormy as uncontroulable!

This that follows is my new argument——

Should she fail in the trial; should I succeed; and should she refuse to go on with me; and even resolve not to marry me, (of which I can have no notion;) and should she disdain to be obliged to me for the handsome provision I should be proud to make for her, even to the half of my estate; yet cannot she be altogether unhappy—Is she not entitled to an independent fortune? Will not Colonel Morden, as her trustee, put her in possession of it? And did she not in our former conference point out the way of life, that she always preferred to the married life—to wit, To take her good Norton for her directress and guide, and to live upon her own estate in the manner her grandfather desired she should live?

It is moreover to be considered that she cannot, according to her own notions, recover above one-half of her fame, were we now to intermarry; so much does she think she has suffered by her going off with me. And will she not be always repining and mourning for the loss of the other half?—And if she must live a life of such uneasiness and regret for half, may she not as well repine and mourn for the whole?

Nor, let me tell thee, will her own scheme of penitence, in this case, be half so perfect, if she do not fall, as if she does; for what a foolish penitent will she make, make, who has nothing to repent of!—She piques herſelf, thou knoweſt, and makes it matter of reproach to me, that ſhe went not off with me by her own conſent; but was tricked out of herſelf.

Nor upbraid thou me upon the meditated breach of vows ſo repeatedly made. She will not, thou ſeeſt, permit me to fulfil them. And if ſhe would, this I have to ſay, that at the time I made the moſt ſolemn of them, I was fully determined to keep them. But what prince thinks himſelf obliged any longer to obſerve the articles of treaties the moſt ſacredly ſworn-to, than ſuits with his intereſt or inclination; although the conſequence of the infraction muſt be, as he knows, the deſtruction of thouſands?

Is not this then the reſult of all, that Miſs Clariſſa Harlowe, if it be not her own fault, may be as virtuous after ſhe has loſt her honour, as it is called, as ſhe was before? She may be a more eminent example to her ſex; and if ſhe yield (a little yield) in the trial, may be a completer penitent. Nor can ſhe, but by her own wilfulneſs, be reduced to low fortunes.

And thus may her old nurſe and ſhe; an old coachman; and a pair of old coach-horſes; and two or three old maid-ſervants, and perhaps a very old footman or two, (for every-thing will be old and penitential about her) live very comfortably together; reading old ſermons, and old prayer books; and relieving old men, and old women; and giving old leſſons, and old warnings, upon new ſubjects, as well as old ones, to the young ladies of her neighbourhood; and ſo paſs on to a good old age, doing a great deal of good both by precept and example in her generation.

And is a woman who can live thus prettily without controul; who ever did prefer, and who ſtill prefers, the ſingle to the married life; and who will be enabled to do every-thing, that the plan ſhe had formed will direct her to do; to be ſaid to be ruined, undone, and ſuch ſort of ſtuff?—I have no patience with the pretty fools, who uſe thoſe ſtrong words, to deſcribe a tranſitory evil; an evil which a mere church-form makes none?

At this rate of romancing, how many flouriſhing ruins doſt thou, as well as I, know? Let us but look about us, and we ſhall ſee ſome of the haughtieſt and moſt cenſorious ſpirits among our acquaintance of that ſex, now paſſing for chaſte wives, of whom ſtrange ſtories might be told; and others, whoſe huſbands hearts have been made to ache for their gaieties both before and after marriage, and yet know not half ſo much of them, as ſome of us honeſt fellows could tell them.

But, having thus ſatisfied myſelf in relation to the worſt that can happen to this charming creature; and that it will be her own fault, if ſhe be unhappy; I have not at all reflected upon what is likely to be my own lot.

This has always been my notion, though Miſs Howe grudges us rakes the beſt of the ſex, and ſays, that the worſt is too good for us; that the wife of a libertine ought to be pure, ſpotleſs, uncontaminated. To what purpoſe has ſuch a one lived a free life, but to know the world, and to make his advantages of it?—And, to be very ſerious, it would be a misfortune to the publick for two perſons, heads of a family, to be both bad; ſince, between two ſuch, a race of varlets might be propagated, (Lovelaces and Belfords, if thou wilt) who might do great miſchief in the world.

Thou ſeeſt at bottom, that I am not an abandoned fellow; and that there is a mixture of gravity in me. This, as I grow older, may increaſe; and when my active capacity begins to abate, I may ſit down with the Preacher, and reſolve all my paſt life into vanity and veſation of ſpirit.

This is certain, that I ſhall never find a woman ſo well ſuited to my taſte, as Miſs Clariſſa Harlowe. I only wiſh that I may have ſuch a lady as her to comfort and adorn my ſetting-ſun. I have often thought it very unhappy for us both, that ſo excellent a creature ſprang up a little too late for my ſetting out, and a little too early in my progreſs, before I can think of returning. And yet, as I have picked up the ſweet traveller in my way, I cannot help wiſhing, that ſhe would bear me company in the reſt of my journey, although ſhe were to ſtep out of her own path to oblige me. And then, perhaps, we could put up in the evening at the ſame inn; and be very happy in each other's converſation; recounting the difficulties and dangers we had paſſed in our way to it.

I imagine, that thou wilt be apt to ſuſpect, that ſome paſſages in this letter were written in town. Why, Jack, I cannot but ſay, that the Weſtminſter air is a little groſſer than that at Hampſtead; and the converſation of Mrs. Sinclair, and the nymphs, leſs innocent than Mrs. Moore's and Miſs Rawlins's. And I think in my heart, that I can ſay and write those things at one place, which I cannot at the other; nor indeed any-where else.

I came to town about seven this morning.—All necessary directions and precautions remembered to be given.

I besought the favour of an audience before I set out. I was desirous to see which of her lovely faces she was pleased to put on, after another night had passed. But she was resolved, I found, to leave our quarrel open. She would not give me an opportunity so much as to entreat her again to close it, before the arrival of Lady Betty and my cousin.

I had notice from my proctor, by a few lines brought by a man and horse, just before I set out, that all difficulties had been for two days past surmounted; and that I might have the licence for fetching.

I sent up the letter to my beloved, by Mrs. Bevis, with a repeated request for admittance to her presence upon it: but neither did this stand me in stead. I supposed she thought it would be allowing of the consequences that were naturally to be expected to follow the obtaining of this instrument, if she had consented to see me on the contents of this letter, having refused me that honour before I sent it up to her.—No surprising her.—No advantage to be taken of her inattention to the nicest circumstances.

And now, Belford, I set out upon business.

LETTER XXIX.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

MONDAY, JUNE 12.

DIDST ever see a licence, Jack? 'Edmund, by divine permission, 'Lord Bishop of London, To our well-beloved in Christ, Robert Lovelace.' [Your servant, my good lord! What have I done to merit so much goodness, who never saw your lordship in my life?] 'of 'the parish of St. Martin's, in the Fields, 'bachelor, and Clarissa Harlowe, of the 'same parish, spinster, sendeth greeting.—'WHEREAS ye are, as is alledged, deter'mined to enter into the holy state of matri'mony,' [This is only alledged, thou observest] 'by and with the consent of, &c. 'Sc. &c. and are very desirous of obtain'ing your marriage to be solemnized in the 'face of the church: We are willing that 'such your honest desires' [Honest desires, Jack!] 'may more speedily have their due 'effect: and therefore, that ye may be able 'to procure such marriage to be freely and 'lawfully solemnized in the parish-church of 'St. Martin in the Fields, or St. Giles's in 'the Fields in the county of Middlesex, by 'the rector, vicar, or curate thereof, at any 'time of the year,' [At ANY time of the year, Jack!] 'without publication of bans: 'provided, that by reason of any precontract,' [I verily think that I have had three or four precontracts in my time; but the good girls have not claimed upon them of a long while] 'consanguinity, affinity, 'or any other lawful cause whatsoever, there 'be no lawful impediments in this behalf; and 'that there be not at this time any action, 'suit, plaint, quarrel, or demand, moved or 'depending before any judge ecclesiastical or 'temporal, for or concerning any marriage 'contracted by or with either of you; and 'that the said marriage be openly solemnized 'in the church above-mentioned, between 'the hours of eight and twelve in the fore'noon; and without prejudice to the mini'ster of the place where the said woman is a 'parishioner: We do hereby, for good causes,' [It cost me—Let me see, Jack—What did it cost me?] 'give and grant our li'cence, or faculty, as well to you the parties 'contracting, as to the rector, vicar, or 'curate of the said church, where the said 'marriage is intended to be solemnized, to 'solemnize the same, in manner and form 'above-specified, according to the rites and 'ceremonies prescribed in the book of Common'Prayer in that behalf published by autho'rity of parliament. Provided always, that 'if hereafter any fraud shall appear to have 'been committed, at the time of granting this 'licence, either by false suggestions, or con'cealment of the truth,' [Now this, Belford, is a little hard upon us: for I cannot say, that every-one of our suggestions is literally true—So, in good conscience, I ought not to marry under this licence] 'the licence shall be void to all in'tents and purposes, as if the same had not 'been granted. And in that case, we do in'hibit all ministers whatsoever, if any-thing 'of the premises shall come to their knowledge, 'from proceeding to the celebration of the 'said marriage, without first consulting us, 'or our vicar-general. Given, &c.'

Then follow the register's name, and a large pendent seal, with these words round it—'SEAL OF THE VICAR-GENE'RAL AND OFFICIAL PRINCIPAL OF 'THE DIOCESE OF LONDON.'

A good whimsical instrument, take it all together!—But what, thinkest thou, are the arms to this matrimonial harbinger?—Why, in the first place, Two crossed Swords; to shew that marriage is a state of offence as well as defence; Three Lions, to denote that those who enter enter into the state, ought to have a triple proportion of courage. And [Couldst thou have imagined that these priestly fellows, in so solemn a case, would cut their jokes upon poor souls who came to have their honest desires put in a way to be gratified;] there are three crooked horns, smartly top-knotted with ribbands; which being the ladies wear, seem to indicate that they may very probably adorn, as well as bestow, the Bull's feather.

To describe it according to Heraldry art, if I am not mistaken—Gules, two Swords, saltire-wise, Or; second coat, a chevron sable between three bugle-horns, OR, [So it ought to be:] on a chief of the second, three Lions rampant of the first.—But the devil take them for their hieroglyphicks, should I say, if I were determined in good earnest to marry!

And determined to marry I would be, were it not for this consideration: That once married, and I am married for life.

That's the plague of it!—Could a man do as the birds do, change every Valentine's Day, [A natural appointment! for birds have not the sense, forsooth, to fetter themselves, as we wise-acre men take great and solemn pains to do] there would be nothing at all in it. And what a glorious time would the lawyers have, on the one hand, with their Noverint Universi's, and suits commenceable on restitution of goods and chattles; and the parsons on the other, with their indulgences [renewable annually, as other licences] to the honest desires of their clients!

Then, were a stated mulct, according to rank or fortune, to be paid on every change, towards the exigences of the state, [But none on renewals with the old loves, for the sake of encouraging constancy, especially among the minores] the change would be made sufficiently difficult, and the whole publick would be the better for it; while those children, which the parents could not agree about maintaining, might be considered as the children of the publick, and provided for like the children of the ancient Spartans; who were (as ours would in this case be) a nation of heroes. How, Jack, could I have improved upon Lycurgus's institutions, had I been a lawgiver!

Did I never shew thee a scheme, which I drew up on such a notion as this?—In which I demonstrated the conveniences, and obviated the inconveniences, of changing the present mode to this—I believe I never did.

I remember I proved, to a demonstration, that such a change would be a means of annihilating, absolutely annihilating, four or five very atrocious and capital sins.—Rapes, vulgarly so called; adultery, and fornication; nor would polygamy be panted after. Frequently would it prevent murders and duellings: hardly any such thing as jealousy (the cause of shocking violences) would be heard of: and hypocrisy between man and wife be banished the bosoms of each. Nor, probably, would the reproach of barrenness rest, as now it too often does, where it is least deserved.—Nor would there possibly be such a person as a bargen woman.

Moreover, what a multitude of domestick quarrels would be avoided, were such a scheme carried into execution? Since both sexes would bear with each other, in the view that they could help themselves in a few months.

And then what a charming subject for conversation would be the gallant and generous last partings between man and wife! Each, perhaps a new mate in eye, and rejoicing secretly in the manumission, could afford to be complaisantly sorrowful in appearance. 'He presented her with this jewel,' it will be said by the reporter, for example-sake—'She 'him with that.—How he wept!—How 'she sobbed!—How they looked after 'one another!'—Yet, that's the jest of it, neither of them wishing to stand another twelvemonth's trial.

And if giddy fellows, or giddy girls, misbehave in a first marriage, whether from novice-ship, having expected to find more in the matter than can be found; or from perverseness on her part, or positiveness on his, each being mistaken in the other, [A mighty difference, Jack, in the same person, an innocent, or a visitor;] what a fine opportunity will each have, by this scheme, of recovering a lost character, and of setting all right in the next adventure!

And, O Jack! with what joy, with what rapture, would the changelings (or changeables, if thou like that word better) number the weeks, the days, the hours, as the annual obligation approached to it's desirable period!

As for the spleen or vapours, no such malady would be known or heard of. The physical tribe would, indeed, be the sufferers, and the only sufferers; since fresh health and fresh spirits, the consequences of sweet blood and sweet humours, [illegible] (the mind and body continually pleasing each other) would perpetuate love in; and the joys of expectation (the highest of all our joys, would be quickened and keep all alive.

[illegible] that the old body of man might suffer, the [illegible], I thought, might turn gallant, as there would be a great demand for pattens. Besides, as they would be partakers in the general benefit, they must be sorry fellows indeed, if they preferred themselves to the publick.

Every-one would be married a dozen times, at least. Both men and women would be careful of their characters, and polite in their behaviour, as well as delicate in their persons, and elegant in their dress. [A great matter each of these, let me tell them, to keep passion alive] either to induce a renewal with the old love, or to recommend themselves to a new. While the news-papers would be crouded with paragraphs; all the world their readers; as all the word would be concerned in his and hers together.

'Yesterday,' for instance, 'entered 'into the holy state of matrimony,' [We should all speak reverently of matrimony then] 'the Right Honourable Robert 'Earl Lovelace,' [I shall be an earl by that time] 'with her Grace the Dutchess 'Dowager of Fifty-manors; his lord-'ship's one-and-thirtieth wife.'—I shall then be commented, perhaps, to take up, as it is called, with a widow. But she must not have had more than one husband neither. Thou knowest, that I am nice in these particulars.

I know, Jack, that thou, for thy part, will approve of my scheme.

As Lord M. and I, between us, have three or four boroughs at command, I think I will get into parliament, in order to bring in a bill for this good purpose.

Neither will the houses of parliament, nor the houses of convocation, have reason to object to it. And all the courts, whether spiritual or sensual, civil or uncivil, will find their account in it, when passed into a law.

By my soul, Jack, I should be apprehensive of a general insurrection, and that incited by the women, were such a bill to be thrown out.—For here is the excellency of the scheme: the women will have equal reason with the men to be pleased with it.

Don't think, that old prerogative Harlowe, for example, must not, if such a law were in being, have pulled in his horns!—So excellent a wife as he has, would never else have renewed with such a gloomy tyrant: who, as well as all other married tyrants, must have been upon good behaviour from year to year.

A tyrannical wife, if such a law were to pass, would be a phœnix.

The churches would be the only market-places for the fair-sex; and a domestick excellence the capital recommendation.

Nor would there be an old maid in Great Britain, and all it's territories. For what an odd soul must she be, who could not have her twelvemonth's trial?

In short, a total alteration for the better, in the morals and way of life in both sexes, must, in a very few years, be the consequence of such a salutary law.

Who would have expected such a one from me! I wish the devil owe me not a spite for it.

Then would not the distinction be very pretty, Jack, as in flowers?—Such a gentleman, or such a Lady, is an ANNUAL—Such a one a PERENNIAL.

One difficulty, however, as I remember, occured to me, upon the probability that a wife might be enceinte, as the lawyers call it. But thus I obviated it.

That no man should be allowed to marry another woman without his then wife's consent, till she were brought-to-bed, and he had defrayed all incident charges; and till it was agreed upon between them, whether the child should be his, hers, or the publick's. The women, in this case, to have what I call the coercive option: for I would not have it in the man's power to be a dog, neither.

And, indeed, I gave the turn of the scale in every part of my scheme in the womens favour: for dearly do I love the sweet rogues.

How infinitely more preferable this my scheme to the polygamy one of the old Patriarchs, who had wives and concubines without number!—I believe David and Solomon had their hundreds at a time. Had they not, Jack?

Let me add, that annual parliaments, and annual marriages, are the projects next my heart. How could I expatiate upon the benefits that would arise from both!

LETTER XXX.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

WELL, but now my plots thicken; and my employment of writing to thee on this subject will soon come to a conclua conclusion. For now, having got the licence; and Mrs. Townsend with her cars being to come to Hampstead next Wednesday or Thursday; and another letter possibly or message from Miss Howe, to enquire how Miss Harlowe does, upon the rustick's report of her ill health, and to express her wonder that she has not heard from her in answer to her's on her escape—I must soon blow up the lady, or be blown up myself. And so I am preparing, with Lady Betty and my cousin Montague, to wait upon my beloved with a coach-and-four, or a sett; for Lady Betty will not stir out with a pair, for the world; though but for two or three miles. And this is a well-known part of her character.

'But as to the arms and crest upon 'the coach and trappings?'

Dost thou not know, that a Blunt's must supply her, while her own is new-lining and repairing? An opportunity she is willing to take now she is in town. Nothing of this kind can be done to her mind in the country. Liveries nearly Lady Betty's.

Thou hast seen Lady Betty Lawrance several times—Hast thou not, Belford?

'No, never in my life.'

But thou hast; and lain with her too; or fame does thee more credit than thou deservest—Why, Jack, knowest thou not Lady Betty's other name?

'Other name!—Has she two?'

She has. And what thinkest thou of Lady Bab Wallis?

'O the devil!'

Now thou hast it. Lady Barbara, thou knowest, lifted up in circumstances, and by pride, never appears or produces herself, but on occasions special—To pass to men of quality or price, for a dutchess, or countess, at least. She has always been admired for a grandeur in her air, that few women of quality can come up to: and never was supposed to be other than what she passed for; though often and often a paramour for lords.

And who, thinkest thou, is my cousin Montague?

'Nay, how should I know?'

How, indeed! Why, my little Johanetta Golding; a lively, yet modest-looking girl, is my cousin Montague.

There, Belford, is an aunt!—There's a cousin!—Both have wit at will. Both are accustomed to ape quality. Both are genteely descended. Mistresses of themselves; and well educated—Yet past pity.—True Spartan dames; ashamed of nothing but detection.—Always, therefore, upon their guard against discovery in their own conceit, when assuming top parts, the very quality they ape.

And how dost think I dress them out?—I'll tell thee.

Lady Betty in a rich gold tissue, adorned with jewels of high price.

My cousin Montague in a pale pink, standing on end with silver flowers of her own working. Charlotte, as well as my beloved, is admirable at her needle. Not quite so richly jewelled-out as Lady Betty; but ear-rings and solitaire very valuable, and infinitely becoming.

Johanetta, thou knowest, has a good complexion, a fine neck, and ears remarkably fine—so has Charlotte. She is nearly of Charlotte's stature too.

Laces both, the richest that could be procured.

Thou canst not imagine what a sum the loan of the jewels cost me; though but for three days.

This sweet girl will half ruin me. But seest thou not by this time, that her reign is short?—It must be so. And Mrs. Sinclair has already prepared everything for her reception once more.

HERE come the ladies—attended by Susan Morrison, a tenant-farmer's daughter, as Lady Betty's woman; with her hands before her, and thoroughly instructed.

How dress advantages women!—especially those, who have naturally a genteel air and turn, and have had education.

Hadst thou seen how they paraded it—'Cousin,' and 'Cousin,' and 'Nephew,' at every word; Lady Betty bridling and looking haughtily-condescending: Charlotte gallanting her fan, and swimming over the floor without touching it.

'How I long to see my niece-elect! cries one—For they are told, that we are not married; and are pleased, that I have not put the slight upon them, that they had apprehended from me.

'How I long to see my dear cousin, 'that is to be!' the other.

'Your la'ship,' and 'Your la'ship,' and an awkward curtsey at every address, prim Susan Morrison.

'Top your parts, ye villains!—You 'know how nicely I distinguish. There 'will be no passion in this case to blind 'the judgment, and to help on medi-'tated delusion, as when you engage 'with titled sinners. My charmer is as 'cool and as distinguishing, though not 'quite 'quite so learned in her own sex, as I 'am. Your commonly-assumed dignity won't do for me now. Airs of superiority, as if born to rank.—But no over-do!—Doubting nothing. Let not your faces arraign your hearts.

'Easy and unaffected!—Your very dresses will give you pride enough.

'A little graver, Lady Betty.—More significance, less bridling in your dignity.

'That's the air!—Charmingly hit—Again—You have it.

'Devil take you!—Less arrogance. You are got into airs of young quality. Be less sensible of your new condition. People born to dignity command respect without needing to require it.

'Now for your part, cousin Charlotte!

'Pretty well. But a little too frolicky that air—Yet have I prepared my beloved to expect in you both, great vivacity and quality-freedom.

'Curse those eyes!—Those glancings will never do. A down-cast bashful turn, if you can command it—Look upon me. Suppose me now to be my beloved.

'Devil take that leer. Too significantly arch!—Once I knew you the girl I would now have you to be.

'Sprightly, but not confident, cousin Charlotte!—Be sure forget not to look down, or aside, when looked at. When eyes meet eyes, be yours the retreating ones. Your face will bear examination.

'O Lord! O Lord! that so young a creature can so soon forget the innocent appearance she first charmed by; and which I thought born with you all!—Five years to ruin what twenty had been building up! How natural the latter lesson! How difficult to regain the former!

'A stranger, as I hope to be saved, to the principal arts of your sex!—Once more, what a-devil has your heart to do in your eyes?

'Have I not told you, that my beloved is a great observer of the eyes? She once quoted upon me a text, which shewed me how she came by her knowledge—Dorcas's were found guilty of treason the first moment she saw her.

'Once more, suppose me to be my charmer.—Now you are to encounter my examining eye, and my doubting heart.

'That's my dear!

'Study that air in the pier-glass!

'Charming!—Perfectly right!

'Your honours, now, devils!

'Pretty well, cousin Charlotte, for a 'young country lady!—Till form yields 'to familiarity, you may curtsey low. You 'must not be supposed to have forgot 'your boarding-school airs.

'But too low, too low, Lady Betty, 'for your years and your quality. The 'common fault of your sex will be your 'danger: aiming to be young too long! '—The devil's in you all, when you 'judge of yourselves by your wishes, 'and by your vanity!—Fifty, in that 'case, is never more than fifteen.

'Graceful ease, conscious dignity, 'like that of my charmer, O how hard 'to hit!

'Both together now.

'Charming!—That's the air, Lady 'Betty!—That's the cue, cousin Charlotte, suited to the character of each! '—But, once more, be sure to have a 'guard upon your eyes.'

'Never fear, nephew!'

'Never fear, cousin.'

A dram of Barbadoes each.

And now we are gone.

LETTER XXXI.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

AT MRS. SINCLAIR'S, MONDAY AFTERNOON.

ALL is right, as heart can wish!—In spite of all objection—In spite of a reluctance next to fainting—In spite of all foresight, vigilance, suspicion—once more is the charmer of my soul in her old lodgings!

Now throbs away every pulse! Now thump, thump, thumps my bounding heart for something!

But I have not time for the particulars of our management.

My beloved is now directing some of her cloaths to be packed up—Never more to enter this house!—Nor ever more will she, I dare say, when once again out of it!

Yet not so much as a condition of forgiveness!—The Harlowe-spirited fair-one will not deserve my mercy!—She will wait for Miss Howe's next letter; and then, if she find a difficulty in her new schemes—[Thank her for nothing]—will—Will what?—Why even then will take time to consider, whether I am to be forgiven, or for ever rejected. An indifference that revives in my heart the remembrance of a thousand of the like nature.—And yet Lady Betty and Miss Montague [A man would be tempted to think, Jack, that they wish her to provoke my my vengeance] declare, that I ought to be satisfied with such a proud suspension.

They are entirely attached to her. Whatever she says, is, must be, gospel! They are guarantees for her return to Hampstead this night. They are to go back with her. A supper bespoken by Lady Betty at Mrs. Moore's. All the vacant apartments there, by my permission, (for I had engaged them for a month certain) to be filled with them and their attendants, for a week at least, or till they can prevail upon the dear perverse, as they hope they shall, to restore me to her favour, and to accompany Lady Betty to Oxfordshire.

The dear creature has thus far condescended—That she will write to Miss Howe, and acquaint her with the present situation of things.

If she write, I shall see what she writes. But I believe she will have other employment soon.

Lady Betty is sure, she tells her, that she shall prevail upon her to forgive me; though she dares say, that I deserve not forgiveness. Lady Betty is too delicate to enquire strictly into the nature of my offence. But it must be an offence against herself, against Miss Montague, against the virtuous of the whole sex, or it could not be so highly resented. Yet she will not leave her till she forgive me, and till she see our nuptials privately celebrated. Mean time, as she approves of her uncle's expedient, she will address her as already my wife before strangers.

Stedman her solicitor may attend her for orders, in relation to her Chancery-affair, at Hampstead. Not one hour they can be favoured with, will they lose from the company and conversation of so dear, so charming a new relation.

Hard then if she had not obliged them with her company, in their coach-and-four, to and from their cousin Leeson's, who longed (as they themselves had done) to see a lady so justly celebrated.

How will Lord M. be raptured when he sees her, and can salute her as his niece!

How will Lady Sarah bless herself! —She will now think her loss of the dear daughter she mourns for, happily supplied!

Miss Montague dwells upon every word that falls from her lips. She perfectly adores her new cousin: for her cousin she must be. And her cousin will she call her! She answers for equal admiration in her sister Patty.

'Aye,' cry I, (whispering loud enough for her to hear) 'how will my cousin 'Patty's dove's eyes glisten and run over, 'on the very first interview?—So gra-'cious, so noble, so unaffected a dear 'creature!'

'What a happy family,' chorus we all, 'will ours be!'

These and such like congratulatory admirations every hour repeated: her modesty hurt by the extatick praises:—her graces are too natural to herself for her to be proud of them:—but she must be content to be punished for excellences that cast a shade upon the most excellent!

In short, we are here, as at Hampstead, all joy and rapture: all of us except my beloved; in whose sweet face [her almost fainting reluctance to re-enter these doors not overcome] reigns a kind of anxious serenity!—But how will even that be changed in a few hours!

Methinks I begin to pity the half-apprehensive beauty!—But, avaunt, thou unseasonably intruding pity! Thou hast more than once already well-nigh undone me!—And, adieu, Reflection! Be gone, Consideration! and Commiseration! I dismis ye all, for at least a week to come!—Be remembered her beaten word! Her flight, when my fond soul was meditating mercy to her! Be remembered her treatment of me in her letter on her escape to Hampstead!—Her Hampstead virulence!—What is it she ought not to expect from an unchained Beelzebub, and a plotting villain?

Be her preference of the single life to me also remembered!—That she despises me!—That she even refuses to be my WIFE!—A proud Lovelace to be denied a wife!—To be more proudly rejected by a daughter of the Harlowes! The ladies of my own family [She thinks them the ladies of my family] supplicating in vain for her returning favour to their despised kinsman, and taking laws from her still prouder punctilio!

Be the execrations of her vixen friend likewise remembered, poured out upon me from her representations, and thereby made her own execrations!

Be remembered still more particularly, the Townsend plot, set on foot between them, and now, in a day or two, ready to break out! and the forbidding threatnings thrown out against me by that little fury!

Is not this the crisis for which I have been long waiting? Shall Tomlinſon, ſhall theſe women be engaged; ſhall ſo many engines be ſet at work, at an immenſe expence, with infinite contrivance; and all to no purpoſe?

Is not this the hour of her trial—And in her, of the trial of the virtue of her whole ſex, ſo long premeditated, ſo long threatened?—Whether her froſt be froſt indeed?—Whether her virtue be principle?—Whether, if once ſubdued, ſhe will not be always ſubdued? And will ſhe not want the very crown of her glory, the proof of her till now all ſurpaſſing excellence, if I ſtop ſhort of the ultimate trial?

Now is the end of purpoſes long overawed, often ſuſpended, at hand. And need I to throw the ſins of her curſed family into the too weighty ſcale?

Abhorred be force!—Be the thoughts of force! There is no triumph over the will in force! This I know I have ſaid. But would I not have avoided it, if I could?—Have I not tried every other method? And have I any other reſource left me? Can ſhe reſent the laſt outrage more than ſhe has reſented a fainter effort?—And if her reſentments run ever ſo high, cannot I repair by matrimony?—She will not refuſe me, I know, Jack; the haughty beauty will not refuſe me, when her pride of being corporally inviolate is brought down; when ſhe can tell no tales, but when (be her reſiſtance what it will) even her own ſex will ſuſpect a yielding in reſiſtance; and when that modeſty, which may fill her boſom with reſentment, will lock up her ſpeech.

But how know I, that I have not made my own difficulties?—Is ſhe not a woman?—What redreſs lies for a perpetrated evil?—Muſt ſhe not live?—Her piety will ſecure her life.—And will not time be my friend?—What, in a word, will be her behaviour afterwards?—She cannot fly me!—She muſt forgive me—And, as I have often ſaid, once forgiven, will be for ever forgiven.

Why then ſhould this enervating pity unſteel my fooliſh heart?

It ſhall not. All theſe things will I remember; and think of nothing elſe, in order to keep up a reſolution, which the women about me will have it I ſhall be ſtill unable to hold.

I'll teach the dear charming creature to emulate me in contrivance;—I'll teach her to weave webs and plots againſt her conqueror!—I'll ſhew her, that in her ſmuggling ſchemes ſhe is but a ſpider compared to me, and that ſhe has all this time been ſpinning only a cobweb!

WHAT ſhall we do now! We are immerſed in the depth of grief and apprehenſion! How ill do women bear diſappointment!—Set upon going to Hampſtead, and upon quitting for ever a houſe ſhe re-entered with infinite reluctance; what things ſhe intended to take with her, ready packed up; herſelf on tiptoe to be gone: and I prepared to attend her thither; ſhe begins to be afraid that ſhe ſhall not go this night; and in grief and deſpair has flung herſelf into her old apartment; locked herſelf in; and through the key-hole Dorcas ſees her on her knees—praying I ſuppoſe for a ſafe deliverance.

And from what?—And wherefore theſe agonizing apprehenſions?

Why, here, this unkind Lady Betty, with the dear creature's knowledge, though to her concern, and this mad-headed couſin Montague without it, while ſhe was employed in directing her package, have hurried away in the coach to their own lodgings; [Only, indeed, to put up ſome night-cloaths, and ſo-forth, in order to attend their ſweet couſin to Hampſtead] and, no leſs to my ſurprize than hers, are not yet returned.

I have ſent to know the meaning of it.

In a great hurry of ſpirits, ſhe would have had me to go myſelf. Hardly any pacifying her! The girl, God bleſs her! is wild with her own idle apprehenſions!—What is ſhe afraid of?

I curſe them both for their delay—My tardy villain, how he ſtays!—'Devil fetch them! Let them ſend their 'coach, and we'll go without them.' In her hearing I bid the fellow tell them ſo.—Perhaps he ſtays to bring the coach, if any-thing happens to hinder the ladies from attending my beloved this night.

DEVIL take them, again ſay I!—They promiſed too they would not ſtay, becauſe it was but two nights ago, that a chariot was robbed at the foot of Hampſtead Hill; which alarmed my fair-one when told of it!

Oh! here's Lady Betty's ſervant, with a billet.

'TO ROBERT LOVELACE, ESQ.

MONDAY NIGHT.

'EXCUSE us, dear nephew, I be-'ſeech you, to my deareſt kinſwoman. 'One night cannot break ſquares. For 'here Miſs Montague has been taken 'violently ill with three fainting fits, 'one after another. The hurry of her

'joy

'joy, I believe, to find your dear lady 'so much ſurpaſs all expectation, [Ne-'ver did family-love, you know, reign ſo 'ſtrong as among us] and the too eager 'deſire ſhe had to attend her, have occa-'ſioned it! For ſhe has weak ſpirits, 'poor girl! well as ſhe looks.

'If ſhe be better, we will certainly go 'with you to-morrow morning, after 'we have breakfaſted with her, at your 'lodgings. But, whether ſhe be, or 'not, I will do myſelf the pleaſure to 'attend your lady to Hampſtead; and 'will be with you for that purpoſe about 'nine in the morning. With due com-'pliments to your moſt worthy beloved, 'I am yours affectionately,

'ELIZAB. LAWRANCE.'

Faith and troth, Jack, I know not what to do with myſelf: for here, juſt now having ſent in the above note by Dorcas, out came my beloved with it in her hand: in a fit of phrenzy!—True, by my ſoul!

She had indeed complained of her head all the evening!

Dorcas ran to me, out of breath, to tell me, that her lady was coming in ſome ſtrange way: but ſhe followed her ſo quick, that the frighted wench had had not time to ſay in what way.

It ſeems, when ſhe read the billet—'Now, indeed,' ſaid ſhe, 'I am a loſt 'creature! O the poor Clariſſa Har-'lowe!'

She tore off her head-cloaths: enquired where I was: and in ſhe came, her ſhining treſſes flowing about her neck; her ruffles torn, and hanging in tatters, about her ſnowy hands; with her arms ſpread out; her eyes wildly turned, as if ſtarting from their orbits—Down ſunk ſhe at my feet, as ſoon as ſhe approached me; her charming boſom heaving to her uplifted face; and claſping her arms about my knees, 'Dear Lovelace,' ſaid ſhe, 'if ever—if 'ever—if ever—' And, unable to ſpeak another word, quitting her claſping hold, down proſtrate on the floor ſunk ſhe, neither in a fit nor out of one.

I was quite aſtoniſhed—All my purpoſes ſuſpended for a few moments, I knew neither what to ſay, nor what to do. But recollecting myſelf, 'Am I 'again,' thought I, 'in a way to be 'overcome, and made a fool of!—If I 'now recede, I am gone for ever.'

I raiſed her, but down ſhe ſunk, as if quite diſjointed; her limbs failing her—yet not in a fit neither. I never heard of or ſaw ſuch a dear unaccountable: almoſt lifeleſs, and ſpeechleſs too for a few moments—What muſt her apprehenſions be at that moment? And for what?—An high-notioned dear fool!—'Pretty ignorance!' thought I.

Never having met with ſo ſincere, ſo unqueſtionable a repugnance, I was ſtaggered—I was confounded—Yet how ſhould I know that it would be ſo till I tried?—And how, having proceeded thus far, could I ſtop, were I not to have had the women to goad me on, and to make light of circumſtances, which they pretended to be better judges of than I?

I lifted her, however, into a chair; and in words of diſordered paſſion, told her, All her fears were needleſs: wondered at them: begged of her to be pacified: beſought her reliance on my faith and honour: and revowed all my old vows, and poured forth new ones.

At laſt, with an heart-breaking ſob, 'I ſee, I ſee, Mr. Lovelace,' in broken ſentences ſhe ſpoke—'I ſee, I ſee—that 'at laſt—at laſt—I am ruined!—Ruined, 'if your pity—Let me implore your 'pity!'—And down on her boſom, like a half-broken-ſtalked lily top-heavy with the overcharging dews of the morning, ſunk her head, with a ſigh that went to my heart.

All I could think of to re-aſſure her, when a little recovered, I ſaid.

Why did I not ſend for their coach, as I had intimated? It might return in the morning for the ladies.

'I had actually done ſo,' I told her, on ſeeing her ſtrange uneaſineſs. 'But 'it was then going to fetch a doctor for 'Miſs Montague, leſt his chariot ſhould 'not be ſo ready.'

'Ah! Lovelace!' ſaid ſhe, with a doubting face; anguiſh in her imploring eye.

Lady Betty would think it very ſtrange, I told her, if ſhe were to know it was ſo diſagreeable to her to ſtay one night for her company in the houſe where ſhe had paſſed ſo many.

She called me names upon this—She had called me names before.—I was patient.

Let her go to Lady Betty's lodgings, then; directly go; if the perſon I called Lady Betty was really Lady Betty.

'If, my dear! Good Heaven! What 'a villain does that IF ſhew you believe 'me to be.'

'I cannot help it—I beſeech you once 'more, to let me go to Mrs. Leeſon's, 'if that IF ought not to be ſaid.'

Then

Then assuming a more resolute spirit —'I will go! I will enquire my way! I will go by myself!'—And would have rushed by me.

I folded my arms about her to detain her; pleading the bad way I heard poor Charlotte was in; and what a farther concern her impatience, if she went, would give to poor Charlotte.

She would believe nothing I said, unless I would instantly order a coach, (since she was not to have Lady Betty's, nor was permitted to go to Mrs. Leeson's) and let her go in it to Hampstead, late as it was, and all alone; so much the better: for in the house of people of whom Lady Betty, upon enquiry, had heard a bad character; [Dropt foolishly this, by my prating new relation, in order to do credit to herself, by depreciating others] every-thing, and every face, looking with so much meaning vileness, as well as my own, ['Thou art still too sen-'sible,' thought I, 'my charmer!'] she was resolved not to stay another night.

Dreading what might happen as to her intellects, and being very apprehensive, that she might possibly go through a great deal before morning, (though more violent she could not well be with the worst she dreaded) I humoured her, and ordered Will to endeavour to get a coach directly, to carry us to Hampstead; I cared not at what price.

Robbers, with whom I would have terrified her, she feared not—I was all her fear, I found; and this house her terror: for I saw plainly, that she now believed, that Lady Betty and Miss Montague were both impostors.

But her mistrust is a little of the latest to do her service!

And, O Jack, the rage of love, the rage of revenge is upon me! By turns they tear me!—The progress already made—The womens instigations—The power I shall have to try her to the utmost, and still to marry her, if she be not to be brought to cohabitation—Let me perish, Belford, if she escape me now!

WILL is not yet come back. Near eleven.

WILL is this moment returned.—No coach is to be got, either for love or money.

Once more, she urges—'To Mrs. 'Leeson's let me go, Lovelace! Good 'Lovelace, let me go to Mrs. Leeson's? 'What is Miss Montague's illness to 'my terror?—For the Almighty's sake, 'Mr. Lovelace!'—her hands clasped.

'O, my angel! What a wildness is 'this!—Do you know, do you see, my 'dearest life, what appearance your 'causeless apprehensions have given 'you?—Do you know it is past eleven 'o'clock!'

'Twelve, one, two, three, four—'any hour—I care not—if you mean 'me honourably, let me go out of this 'hated house!'

Thou'lt observe, Belford, that though this was written afterwards, yet (as in other places) I write it as it was spoken and happened, as if I had retired to put down every sentence as spoken. I know thou likest this lively present tense manner, as it is one of my peculiars.

Just as she had repeated the last words, 'if you mean me honourably, let me go out 'of this hated house,' in came Mrs. Sinclair, in a great ferment—'And what, 'pray, Madam, has this house done to 'you?—Mr. Lovelace, you have known 'me some time; and if I have not the 'niceness of this lady, I hope I do not 'deserve to be treated thus?'

She set her huge arms akembo: 'Hoh!' 'Madam, let me tell you, I am amazed 'at your freedoms with my character! '—And, Mr Lovelace,' [Holding up, and violently shaking her head] 'if 'you are a gentleman, and a man of 'honour—'

Having never before seen any-thing but obsequiousness in this woman, little as she liked her, she was frightened at her masculine air, and fierce look—'God help me!' cried she—'What will 'become of me now!' Then turning her head hither and thither, in a wild kind of amaze, 'Whom have I for a 'protector! What will become of me 'now!'

'I will be your protector, my dearest 'love!—But indeed you are uncharitably severe upon poor Mrs. Sinclair! 'Indeed you are!—She is a gentlewo-'man born, and the relict of a man of 'honour; and though left in such cir-'cumstances as to oblige her to let lodg-'ings, yet would she scorn to be guilty 'of a wilful baseness.'

'I hope so—It may be so—I may be 'mistaken—But—But there is no crime, 'I presume, no treason, to say I don't 'like her house.'

The old dragon straddled up to her, with her arms kemboed again—Her eye-brows erect, like the bristles of a hog's back, and scouling over her shortened

ened noſe, more than half-hid her ferret eyes. Her mouth was diſtorted. She pouted out her blubber-lips as if to bellows up wind and ſputter into her horſe-noſtrils; and her chin was curdled, and more than uſually prominent with paſſion.

With two Hoh, Madams, ſhe accoſted the frighted fair-one; who, terrified, caught hold of my ſleeve.

I feared ſhe would fall into fits; and, with a look of indignation, told Mrs. Sinclair, that theſe apartments were mine; and I could not imagine what ſhe meant, either by liſtening to what paſſed between me and my ſpouſe, or to come in uninvited; and ſtill more I wondered at her giving herſelf theſe ſtrange liberties.

I may be to blame, Jack, for ſuffering this wretch to give herſelf theſe airs; but her coming in was without my orders.

The old beldam throwing herſelf into a chair, fell a blubbering and exclaiming. And the pacifying of her, and endeavouring to reconcile the lady to her, took up till near one o'clock.

And thus, between terror and the late hour, and what followed, ſhe was diverted from the thoughts of getting out of the houſe to Mrs. Leeſon's or anywhere elſe.

LETTER XXXII.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

TUESDAY MORN. JUNE 13.

AND now, Belford, I can go no farther. The affair is over. Clariſſa lives. And I am your humble ſervant, R. LOVELACE.

The whole of this black tranſaction is given by the injured lady to Miſs Howe, to her ſubſequent letters, dated Thurſday, July 6. See Vol. VI. Letters XLIV. XLV. XLVI.

LETTER XXXIII.

MR. BELFORD, TO ROBERT LOVELACE, ESQ.

WATFORD. WEDN. JUNE 14.

O Thou ſavage-hearted monſter! What work haſt thou made in one guilty hour, for a whole age of repentance.

I am inexpreſſibly concerned at the fate of this matchleſs lady! She could not have fallen into the hands of any other man breathing, and ſuffered as ſhe has done with thee.

I had written a great part of another long letter, to try to ſoften thy ſtony heart in her favour; for I thought it but too likely, that thou ſhouldſt ſucceed in getting her back to the accurſed woman's. But I find it would have been too late, had I finiſhed it, and ſent it away. Yet cannot I forbear writing, to urge thee to make the only amends thou now canſt make her, by a proper uſe of the licence thou haſt obtained.

Poor, poor lady! It is a pain to me, that I ever ſaw her. Such an adorer of virtue to be ſacrificed to the vileſt of her ſex; and thou their implement in the devil's hands, for a purpoſe ſo baſe, ſo ungenerous, ſo inhumane!—Pride thyſelf, O crueleſt of men! in this reflection; and that thy triumph over a woman, who for thy ſake was abandoned of every friend ſhe had in the world, was effected, not by advantages taken of her weakneſs and credulity; but by the blackeſt artifice; after a long courſe of ſtudied deceits had been tried to no purpoſe.

I can tell thee, it is well either for thee or for me, that I am not the brother of the lady. Had I been her brother, her violation muſt have been followed by the blood of one of us.

Excuſe me, Lovelace; and let not the lady fare the worſe for my concern for her. And yet I have but one other motive to aſk thy excuſe; and that is, becauſe I owe to thy own communicative pen the knowledge I have of thy barbarous villainy, ſince thou mighteſt, if thou wouldſt, have paſſed it upon me for a common ſeduction.

CLARISSA LIVES, thou ſayeſt. That ſhe does is my wonder: and theſe words ſhew, that thou thyſelf (though thou couldſt, nevertheleſs, proceed) hardly expectedſt ſhe would have ſurvived the outrage. What muſt have been the poor lady's diſtreſs, (watchful as ſhe had been over her honour) when dreadful certainty took place of cruel apprehenſion!—And yet a man may gueſs what it muſt have been, by that which thou painteſt, when ſhe ſuſpected herſelf tricked, deſerted, and betrayed, by the pretended ladies.

That thou couldſt behold her phrenzy on this occaſion, and her half-ſpeechleſs, half-fainting proſtration at thy feet, and yet retain thy evil purpoſes, will hardly be thought credible, even by thoſe who know thee, if they have ſeen her.

Poor,

Poor, poor lady! With such noble qualities as would have adorned the most exalted married life, to fall into the hands of the only man in the world, who could have treated her as thou hast treated her!—And to let loose the old dragon, as thou properly calleſt her, upon the before-affrighted innocent, what a barbarity was that! What a poor piece of barbarity! in order to obtain by terror, what thou deſpaireds to gain by love, though ſupported by ſtratagems the moſt inſidious!

O, LOVELACE! LOVELACE! had I doubted it before, I ſhould now be convinced, that there muſt be a WORLD AFTER THIS, to do juſtice to injured merit, and to puniſh barbarous perfidy! Could the divine SOCRATES, and the divine CLARISSA, otherwiſe have ſuffered?

But let me, if poſſible, for one moment, try to forget this villainous outrage on the moſt excellent of women.

I have buſineſs here, which will hold me yet a few days; and then perhaps I ſhall quit this houſe for ever.

I have had a ſolemn and tedious time of it. I ſhould never have known, that I had half the reſpect I really find I had for the old gentleman, had I not ſo cloſely, at his earneſt deſire, attended him, and been a witneſs of the tortures he underwent.

This melancholy occaſion may poſſibly have contributed to humanize me: but ſurely I never could have been ſo remorſeleſs a caitiff as thou haſt been, to a woman of half this lady's excellence.

But pr'ythee, dear Lovelace, if thou'rt a man, and not a devil, reſolve, out of hand, to repair thy ſin of ingratitude, by conferring upon thyſelf the higheſt honour thou canſt receive, in making her lawfully thine.

But if thou canſt not prevail upon thyſelf to do her this juſtice, I think I ſhould not ſcruple a tilt with thee [An everlaſting rupture at leaſt muſt follow] if thou ſacrificeſt her to the accurſed women.

Thou art deſirous to know what advantage I reap by my uncle's demiſe. I do not certainly know; for I have not been ſo greedily ſolicitous on this ſubject, as ſome of the kindred have been, who ought to have ſhewn more decency, as I have told them, and ſuffered the corpſe to have been cold before they had begun their hungry enquiries. But, by what I gathered from the poor man's talk to me, who oftener than I wiſhed touched upon the ſubject, I deem it will be upwards of 5000l. in caſh, and in the funds, after all legacies paid, beſides the real eſtate, which is a clear 1000l. a year.

I wiſh from my heart, thou wert a money-lover! Were the eſtate to be of double the value, thou ſhouldſt have it every ſhilling; only upon one condition —[for my circumſtances before were as eaſy as I wiſh them to be while I am ſingle]—That thou wouldſt permit me the honour of being this fatherleſs lady's father, as it is called, at the altar.

Think of this! my dear Lovelace: be honeſt: and let me preſent thee with the brighteſt jewel that man ever poſſeſſed; and then, body and ſoul, wilt thou bind to thee for ever, thy BELFORD.

LETTER XXXIV.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

THURSDAY, JUNE 15.

'LET me alone, you great dog, you! '—Let me alone!'—have I heard a leſſer boy, his coward arms held over his head and face, ſay to a bigger, who was pommeling him, for having run away with his apple, his orange, or his ginger-bread.

So ſay I to thee, on occaſion of thy ſeverity to thy poor friend, who, as thou owneſt, has furniſhed thee (ungenerous as thou art!) with the weapons thou brandiſheſt ſo fearfully againſt him — And to what purpoſe, when the miſchief is done?—when, of conſequence, the affair is irretrievable?—and when a CLARISSA could not move me?

Well, but, after all, I muſt own, that there is ſomething very ſingular in this lady's caſe: and, at times, I cannot help regretting, that I ever attempted her; ſince not one power either of body or ſoul could be moved in my favour; and ſince, to uſe the expreſſion of the philoſopher, on a much graver occaſion, There is no difference to be found between the ſkull of King Philip, and that of another man.

But people's extravagant notions of things alter not facts, Belford: and, when all's done, Miſs Clariſſa Harlowe has but run the fate of a thouſand others of her ſex—Only that they did not ſet ſuch a romantick value upon what they call their honour; that's all.

And yet I will allow thee this—That if a perſon ſets a high value upon anything, be it ever ſuch a trifle in itſelf, or in the eye of others, the robbing of that perſon of it is not a trifle to him.

Take

Take the matter in this light, I own I have done wrong, great wrong, to this admirable creature.

But have I not known twenty and twenty of the sex, who have seemed to carry their notions of virtue high; yet, when brought to the test, have abated of their severity? And how should we be convinced that any of them are proof, till they are tried?

A thousand times have I said, that I never yet met with such a woman as this. If I had, I hardly ever should have attempted Miss Clarissa Harlowe. Hitherto she is an angel: and was not that the point which at setting out I proposed to try? And was not cohabitation ever my darling view? And am I not now, at last, in the high-road to it? —It is true, that I have nothing to boast of as to her will. The very contrary. But now are we come to the test, whether she cannot be brought to make the best of an irreparable evil—If she exclaim, [She has reason to exclaim, and I will sit down with patience by the hour together to hear her exclamations, till she is tired of them] she will then descend to expostulation perhaps—Expostulation will give me hope—Expostulation will shew, that she hates me not. And if she hate me not, she will forgive me: and if she now forgive; then will all be over; and she will be mine upon my own terms: and it shall then be the whole study of my future life to make her happy.

So, Belford, thou seest, that I have journeyed on this stage, [indeed, through infinite mazes, and as infinite remorses] with one determined point in view, from the first.—To thy urgent supplication then, that I will do her grateful justice by marriage, let me answer in Matt Prior's two lines on his hoped-for auditorship; as put into the mouths of his St. John and Harley—

'—Let that be done, which Matt doth say
"Yea," quoth the earl—"but not to"day."

Thou seest, Jack, that I make no resolutions, however, against doing her, one time or other, the wished-for justice, even were I to succeed in my principal view, cohabitation. And of this I do assure thee, that, if I ever marry, it must, it shall be Miss Clarissa Harlowe. —Nor is her honour at all impaired with me, by what she has so far suffered: but the contrary. She must only take care, that, if she be at last brought to forgive me, she shew me, that her Lovelace is the only man on earth, whom she could have forgiven on the like occasion.

But, ah, Jack! what, in the mean time, shall I do with this admirable creature? At present—[I am loth to say it—But, at present] she is quite stupified.

I had rather, methinks, she should have retained all her active powers, though I had suffered by her nails and her teeth, than that she should be sunk into such a state of abstraction—insensibility, (shall I call it?) as she has been in ever since Tuesday morning. Yet, as she begins a little to revive, and now-and-then to call names, and to exclaim, I dread almost to engage with the anguish of a spirit that owes it's extraordinary agitations to meekness that has no example either in ancient or modern story. For, after all, what is there in her case, that should stupify such a glowing, such a blooming charmer!—Excess of grief, excess of terror, has made a person's hair stand on end, and even (as we have read) changed the colour of it. But that it should so stupify, as to make a person, at times, insensible to those imaginary wrongs, which would raise others from stupefaction, is very surprising.

But I will leave this subject, lest it should make me too grave.

I was yesterday at Hampstead, and discharged all obligations there, with no small applause. I told them, that the lady was now as happy as myself: and that is no great untruth; for I am not altogether so, when I allow myself to think.

Mrs. Townsend, with her tart, had not been then there. I told them what I would have them to say to her, if she came.

Well, but, after all, [How many after-all's have I?] I could be very grave, were I to give way to it.—The devil take me for a fool!—What's the matter with me, I wonder!—I must breathe a fresher air for a few days.

But what shall I do with this admirable creature the while?—Hang me, if I know!—For, if I stir, the venomous spider of this habitation will want to set upon the charming fly, whose silken wings are already so entangled in my enormous web, that she cannot move hand or foot: for so much has grief stupified her, that she is at present so destitute of will, as she always seemed to be of desire. I must not, therefore, think of leaving her yet for two days together.

LETTER XXXV.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

I Have just now had a ſpecimen of what the reſentment of this dear creature will be when quite recovered: an affecting one!—For, entering her apartment after Dorcas; and endeavouring to ſoothe and pacify her diſordered mind; in the midſt of my blandiſhments, ſhe held up to Heaven, in a ſpeechleſs agony, the innocent licence, (which ſhe has in her own power;) as the poor diſtreſſed Catalans held up their Engliſh treaty, on an occaſion that keeps the worſt of my actions in countenance.

She ſeemed about to call down vengeance upon me; when, happily, the leaden god, in pity to her trembling Lovelace, waved over her half-drowned eyes his ſomniferous wand, and laid aſleep the fair exclaimer, before ſhe could go through with her intended imprecation.

Thou wilt gueſs, by what I have written, that ſome little art has been made uſe of: but it was with a generous deſign, (if thou'lt allow me the word on ſuch an occaſion) in order to leſſen the too quick ſenſe ſhe was likely to have of what ſhe was to ſuffer. A contrivance I never had occaſion for before, and had not thought of now, if Mrs. Sinclair had not propoſed it to me: to whom I left the management of it: and I have done nothing but curſe her ever ſince, leſt the quantity ſhould have for ever damped her charming intellects.

Hence my concern—For I think the poor lady ought not to have been ſo treated. Poor lady, did I ſay?—What have I to do with thy creeping ſtile?—But have not I the worſt of it; ſince her inſenſibility has made me but a thief to my own joys?

I did not intend to tell thee of this little innocent trick; for ſuch I deſigned it to be; but that I hate diſingenuouſneſs: to thee, eſpecially: and as I cannot help writing in a more ſerious vein than uſual, thou wouldſt, perhaps, had I not hinted the true cauſe, have imagined that I was ſorry for the fact itſelf: and this would have given thee a good deal of trouble in ſcribbling dull perſuaſives to repair by matrimony; and me in reading thy crude nonſenſe. Beſides, one day or other, thou mighteſt, had I not confeſſed it, have heard of it in an aggravated manner; and I know thou haſt ſuch an high opinion of this lady's virtue, that thou wouldſt be diſappointed, if thou hadſt reaſon to think, that ſhe was ſubdued by her own conſent, or any the leaſt yielding in her will. And ſo is ſhe beholden to me in ſome meaſure, that, at the expence of my honour, ſhe may ſo juſtly form a plea, which will entirely ſalve hers.

And now is the whole ſecret out.

Thou wilt ſay I am a horrid fellow!—As the lady does, that I am the unchained Beelzebub, and a plotting villain: and as this is what you both ſaid beforehand, and nothing worſe can be ſaid, I deſire, if thou wouldſt not have me quite ſerious with thee, and that I ſhould think thou meaneſt more by thy tilting hint, than I am willing to believe thou doſt, that thou wilt forbear thy invectives: for is not the thing done?—Can it be helped?—And muſt I not now try to make the beſt of it?—And the rather do I enjoin thee this, and inviolable ſecrecy; becauſe I begin to think, that my puniſhment will be greater than the fault, were it to be only from my own reflection.

LETTER XXXVI.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

FRIDAY, JUNE 16.

I Am ſorry to hear of thy miſfortune; but hope thou wilt not long lie by it. Thy ſervant tells me, what narrow eſcape thou hadſt with thy neck. I wiſh it may not be ominous: but I think thou ſeemeſt not to be in ſo enterprizing a way as formerly; and yet, merry or ſad, thou ſeeſt a rake's neck is always in danger, if not from the hangman, from his own horſe. But 'tis a vicious toad, it ſeems; and I think thou ſhouldſt never venture upon his back again; for 'tis a plaguy thing for rider and horſe both to be vicious.

The fellow tells me, thou deſireſt me to continue to write to thee in order to divert thy chagrin on thy forced confinement: but how can I think it in my power to divert, when my ſubject is not pleaſing to myſelf?

Cæſar never knew what it was to be hipped, I will call it, till he came to be what Pompey was; that is to ſay, till he arrived at the height of his ambition: nor did thy Lovelace know what it was to be gloomy, till he had completed his wiſhes upon the moſt charming creature in the world.

And yet why ſay I completed? when the will, the conſent, is wanting—And I have ſtill views before me of obtaining that!

Yet I could almoſt join with thee in the wiſh, which thou ſendeſt me up by thy ſervant, unfriendly as it is, that I had had thy misfortune before Monday night laſt: for here the poor lady has run into a contrary extreme to that I told thee of in my laſt: for now is ſhe as much too lively, as before ſhe was too ſtupid; and 'bating that ſhe has pretty frequent lucid intervals, would be deemed raving mad, and I ſhould be obliged to confine her.

I am moſt confoundedly diſturbed about it: for I begin to fear that her intellects are irreparably hurt.

Who the devil could have expected ſuch ſtrange effects from a cauſe ſo common, and ſo ſlight?

But theſe high-ſouled and high-ſenſed girls, who had ſet up for ſhining lights and examples to the reſt of the ſex, are with ſuch difficulty brought down to the common ſtandard, that a wiſe man, who prefers his peace of mind to his glory in ſubduing one of that exalted claſs, would have nothing to ſay to them.

I do all in my power to quiet her ſpirits, when I force myſelf into her preſence.

I go on, begging pardon one minute; and vowing truth and honour another.

I would at firſt have perſuaded her, and offered to call witneſſes to the truth of it, that we were actually married. Though the licence was in her hands, I thought the aſſertion might go down in her diſorder; and charming conſequences I hoped would follow. But this would not do.

I therefore gave up that hope: and now I declare to her, that it is my reſolution to marry her, the moment her uncle Harlowe informs me, that he will grace the ceremony with his preſence.

But ſhe believes nothing I ſay; nor (whether in her ſenſes or not) bears me with patience in her ſight.

I pity her with all my ſoul; and I curſe myſelf, when ſhe is in her wailing fits, and when I apprehend, that intellects, ſo charming, are for ever damped. But more I curſe theſe women, who put me upon ſuch an expedient! Lord! Lord! what a hand have I made of it!—And all for what?

Laſt night, for the firſt time ſince Monday laſt, ſhe got to her pen and ink: but ſhe purſues her writing with ſuch eagerneſs and hurry, as ſhew too evidently her diſcompoſure.

I hope, however, that this employment will help to calm her ſpirits.

Just now Dorcas tells me, that what ſhe writes ſhe tears, and throws the paper in fragments under the table, either as not knowing what ſhe does, or diſliking it: then gets up, wrings her hands, weeps, and ſhifts her ſeat all round the room: then returns to her table, ſits down, and writes again.

One odd letter, as I may call it, Dorcas has this moment given me from her—'Carry this,' ſaid ſhe, 'to the vileſt of men.' Dorcas, a toad, brought it, without any farther direction, to me. I ſat down, intending (though 'tis pretty long) to give thee a copy of it: but, for my life, I cannot; 'tis ſo extravagant. And the original is too much an original to let it go out of my hands.

But ſome of the ſcraps and fragments, as either torn through, or flung aſide, I will copy for the novelty of the thing, and to ſhew thee how her mind works now ſhe is in this whimſical way. Yet I know I am ſtill furniſhing thee with new weapon againſt myſelf. But ſpare thy comments. My own reflections render them needleſs. Dorcas thinks her lady will aſk for them: ſo wiſhes to have them to lay again under her table.

By the firſt thou'lt gueſs, that I have told her, that Miſs Howe is very ill, and can't write; that ſhe may account the better for not having received the letter deſigned for her.

PAPER I.

(TORN IN TWO PIECES.)

'MY DEAREST MISS HOWE!

'O WHAT dreadful, dreadful things 'have I to tell you! But yet I cannot 'tell you neither. But ſay, are you 'really ill, as a vile, vile creature in'forms me you are?

'But he never yet told me truth, and 'I hope has not in this: and yet, if it 'were not true, ſurely I ſhould have 'heard from you before now!—But 'what have I to do to upbraid?—You 'may well be tired of me!—And if you 'are, I can forgive you; for I am tired 'of myſelf: and all my own relations 'were tired of me long before you were.

'How good you have always been to 'me, mine own dear Anna Howe!—'But how I ramble!

'I ſat down to ſay a great deal—My 'heart was full—I did not know what to 'ſay firſt—And thought, and grief, and 'confuſion, and (O my poor head!) I 'cannot tell what—And thought and 'grief, and confuſion, came crowding

'so thick upon me; one would be first, 'another would be first, all would be 'first! so I can write nothing at all. 'Only that, whatever they have done 'to me, I cannot tell; but I am no longer 'what I was in any one thing—In any 'one thing did I say? Yes, but I am; 'for I am still, and I ever will be, your 'true——'

Plague on it! I can write no more of this eloquent nonsense myself; which rather shews a raised, than a quenched imagination: but Dorcas shall transcribe the others in separate papers, as written by the whimsical charmer: and some time hence, when all is over, and I can better bear to read them, I may ask thee for a sight of them. Preserve them therefore; for we often look back with pleasure even upon the heaviest griefs, when the cause of them is removed.

PAPER II.

(SCRATCHED THROUGH, AND THROWN UNDER THE TABLE).

—'AND can you, my dear honoured 'papa, resolve for ever to reprobate 'your poor child?—But I am sure you 'would not, if you knew what she has 'suffered since her unhappy—And will 'nobody plead for your poor suffering 'girl?—No one good body?—Why, 'then, dearest Sir, let it be an act of 'your own innate goodness, which I 'have so much experienced and so 'much abused. I don't presume to 'think you should receive me—No, in-'deed—My name is—I don't know 'what my name is!—I never dare to 'wish to come into your family again!—'But your heavy curse, my papa—Yes, 'I will call you papa, and help yourself 'as you can—for you are my own dear 'papa, whether you will or not—And 'though I am an unworthy child—yet 'I am your child—'

PAPER III.

'A LADY took a great fancy to a 'young lion, or a bear, I forget which '—But a bear, or a tyger, I believe, it 'was. It was made her a present of, 'when a whelp. She fed it with her 'own hand: she nursed up the wicked 'cub with great tenderness; and would 'play with it without fear or apprehen-'sion of danger: and it was obedient 'to all her commands: and it's tame-'ness, as she used to boast, encreased 'with it's growth; so that, like a lap-'dog, it would follow her all over the 'house. But mind what followed: at 'last, some-how, neglecting to satisfy 'it's hungry maw, or having otherwise 'disobliged it on some occasion, it re-'sumed it's nature; and on a sudden fell 'upon her, and tore her in pieces.—'And who was most to blame, I pray? 'The brute, or the lady? The lady, 'surely!—For what she did, was out of 'nature, out of character, at least: what 'it did, was in it's own nature.'

PAPER IV.

'HOW art thou now humbled in the 'dust, thou proud Clarissa Harlowe! 'Thou that never steppedst out of thy 'father's house but to be admired! Who 'wert won't to turn thine eye, sparkling 'with healthful life, and self-assurance, 'to different objects at once as thou pas-'sedst, as if (for so thy penetrating sister 'used to say) to plume thyself upon the 'expected applauses of all that beheld 'thee! Thou that usedst to go to rest 'satisfied with the adulations paid thee 'in the past day, and couldst put off eve-'ry thing but thy vanity!'

PAPER V.

'REJOICE not now, my Bella, my 'sister, my friend; but pity the hum-'bled creature, whose foolish heart you 'used to say you beheld through the thin 'veil of humility which covered it.

'It must have been so! My fall had 'not else been permitted—

'You penetrated my proud heart with 'the jealousy of an elder sister's search-'ing eye.

'You knew me better than I knew 'myself.

'Hence your upbraidings and your 'chidings when I began to totter.

'But forgive now those vain triumphs 'of my heart.

'I thought, poor proud wretch that 'I was, that what you said was owing 'to your envy.

'I thought I could acquit my inten-'tion of any such vanity.

'I was too secure in the knowledge I 'thought I had of my own heart.

'My supposed advantages became a 'snare to me.

'And what now is the end of all?'

PAPER

PAPER VI.

'WHAT now is become of the proſpects of a happy life, which once I thought opening before me?—Who now ſhall aſſiſt in the ſolemn preparations? Who now ſhall provide the nuptial ornaments, which ſoften and divert the apprehenſions of the fearful virgin? No court now to be paid to my ſmiles! No encouraging compliments to inſpire thee with hope of laying a mind not unworthy of thee under obligation! No elevation now for conſcious merit, and applauded purity, to look down from on a proſtrate adorer, and an admiring world, and up to pleaſed and rejoicing parents and relations!'

PAPER VII.

'THOU pernicious caterpillar that preyeſt upon the fair leaf of virgin fame, and poiſoneſt thoſe leaves which thou canſt not devour!

'Thou fell blight, thou eaſtern blaſt, thou overſpreading mildew that deſtroyeſt the early promiſes of the ſhining year! that mockeſt the laborious toil, and bloſſeſt the joyful hopes of the painful huſbandman!

'Thou fretting moth, that corrupteſt the faireſt garment!

'Thou eating canker-worm, that preyeſt upon the opening bud, and turneſt the damaſk roſe into livid yellowneſs!

'If, as religion teaches us, God will judge us, in a great meaſure, by our benevolent or evil actions to one another—O wretch! bethink thee, in time bethink thee, how great muſt be thy condemnation!'

PAPER VIII.

'AT firſt, I ſaw ſomething in your air and perſon that diſpleaſed me not. Your birth and fortunes were no ſmall advantages to you.—Your acted not ignobly by my paſſionate brother.—Every-body ſaid you were brave: every-body ſaid you were generous: A brave man, I thought, could not be a baſe man: a generous man, could not, I believed, be ungenerous, where he acknowledged obligation. Thus prepoſſeſſed, all the reſt that my ſoul loved and wiſhed for in your reformation, I hoped!—I knew not, but by report, any flagrant inſtances of your vileneſs: You ſeemed frank, as well as generous: frankneſs and generoſity ever attracted me: whoever kept up thoſe appearances, I judged of their hearts by my own; and whatever qualities I wiſhed to find in them, I was ready to find; and, when found, I believed them to be natives of the ſoil.

'My fortunes, my rank, my character, I thought a further ſecurity. I was in none of thoſe reſpects unworthy of being the niece of Lord M. and of his two noble ſiſters.—Your vows, your imprecations—But, Oh! you have barbarouſly and baſely conſpired againſt that honour, which you ought to have protected: and now you have made me—What is it of vile that you have not made me?

'Yet God knows my heart, I had no culpable inclinations!—I honoured virtue!—I hated vice!—But I knew not, that you were vice itſelf!'

PAPER IX.

'HAD the happineſs of any the pooreſt outcaſt in the world, whom I had never ſeen, never known, never before heard of, lain as much in my power, as my happineſs did in yours, my benevolent heart would have made me fly to the ſuccour of ſuch a poor diſtreſſed —With what pleaſure would I have raiſed the dejected head, and comforted the deſponding heart!—but who now ſhall pity the poor wretch, who has encreaſed, inſtead of diminiſhed, the number of the miſerable!'

PAPER X.

'LEAD me, where my own thoughts themſelves may loſe me;
'Where I may doſe out what I've left of life,
'Forget myſelf, and that day's guilt!
'Cruel remembrance!—how ſhall I appeaſe thee?

'Oh!

'—Oh! you have done an act
'That blots the face and bluſh of modeſty;
'Takes off the roſe
'From the fair forehead of an innocent love,
'And makes a bliſter there!

'Then down I laid my head,
'Down on cold earth, and for a while was dead;
'And my freed ſoul to a ſtrange ſomewhere fled!
"Ah! ſottiſh ſoul!" ſaid I,
'When back to it's cage again I ſaw it fly;
"Fool! to reſume her broken chain;
"And row the galley here again!
"Fool! to that body to return,
"Where it condemn'd and deſtin'd is to mourn!"

'O, my Miſs Howe! if thou haſt friendſhip help me,
'And ſpeak the words of peace to my divided ſoul,
'That wars within me,
'And raiſes ev'ry ſenſe to my confuſion.
'I'm totr'ring on the brink
'Of peace; and thou art all the hold I've left!
'Aſſiſt me——in the pangs of my affliction!

'When honour's loſt, 'tis a relief to die:
'Death's but a ſure retreat from infamy.

'Then farewel, youth,
'And all the joys that dwell
'With youth and life!
'And life itſelf, farewel!

'For life can never be ſincerely bleſt.
'Heav'n puniſhes the bad, and proves the beſt.

"Death only can be dreadful to the bad:
"To innocence 'tis like a bugbear dreſs'd
"To frighten children. Pull but off the maſk,
"And he'll appear a friend."

"I could a tale unfold—
"Would harrow up thy ſoul!"

'By ſwift misfortunes
'How am I purſu'd!
'Which on each other
'Are like waves, renew'd!

After all, Belford, I have juſt ſkimmed over theſe tranſcriptions of Dorcas; and I ſee there are method and good ſenſe in ſome of them, wild as others of them are; and that her memory, which ſerves her ſo well for theſe poetical flights, is far from being impaired. And this gives me hope, that ſhe will ſoon recover her charming intellects—Though I ſhall be the ſufferer by their reſtoration, I make no doubt.

But, in the letter ſhe wrote to me, there are yet greater extravagances; and though I ſaid it was too affecting to give thee a copy of it, yet, after I have let thee ſee the looſe papers incloſed, I think I may throw in a tranſcript of that. Dorcas therefore ſhall here tranſcribe it. I cannot. The reading of it affected me ten times more than the ſevereſt reproaches of a regular mind could do.

'TO MR. LOVELACE.

'I NEVER intended to write another 'line to you. I would not ſee you, if I 'could help it—O that I never had!

'But tell me of a truth, Is Miſs Howe 'really and truly ill?—Very ill?—And 'is not her illneſs poiſon? And don't 'you know who gave it her?

'What you, or Mrs. Sinclair, or ſome-'body, (I cannot tell who) have done to 'my poor head, you beſt know: but I 'ſhall never be what I was. My head 'is gone. I have wept away all my brain, 'I believe; for I can weep no more. 'Indeed I have had my full ſhare; ſo it 'is no matter.

'But, good now, Lovelace, don't ſet 'Mrs. Sinclair upon me again. I never 'did her any harm. She ſo affrights 'me, when I ſee her!—Ever ſince—

'When

'When was it? I cannot tell. You can, 'I suppose. She may be a good woman, 'as far as I know. She was the wife 'of a man of honour — Very likely '—Though forced to lett lodgings for 'her livelihood. Poor gentlewoman! 'Let her know I pity her: but don't 'let her come near me again — Pray 'don't!

'Yet she may be a very good wo-'man—

'What would I say!—I forget what I 'was going to say.

'O Lovelace, you are Satan himself; 'or he helps you out in every-thing; 'and that's as bad!

'But have you really and truly sold 'yourself to him? And for how long? 'What duration is your reign to have?

'Poor man! The contract will be out; 'and then what will be your fate!

'O Lovelace! if you could be sorry 'for yourself, I would be sorry too— 'But when all my doors are fast, and 'nothing but the key-hole open, and 'the key of late put into that, to be 'where you are, in a manner, without 'opening any of them—O wretched, 'wretched Clarissa Harlowe!

'For I never will be Lovelace—let 'my uncle take it as he pleases.

'Well, but now I remember what I 'was going to say—It is for your good— 'not mine—For nothing can do me good 'now!—O thou villainous man! thou 'hated Lovelace!

'But Mrs. Sinclair may be a good 'woman—If you love me—But that you 'don't—But don't let her bluster up 'with her worse than mannish airs to 'me again! O she is a frightful woman! 'If she be a woman! She needed not to 'put on that fearful mask to scare me out 'of my poor wits. But don't tell her 'what I say—I have no hatred to her— 'It is only fright, and foolish fear, that's 'all.—She may not be a bad woman— 'But neither are all men, any more than 'all women, alike--God forbid they should 'be like you!

'Alas! you have killed my head 'among you—I don't say who did it!— 'God forgive you all!—But had it not 'been better to have put me out of all 'your ways at once? You might safely 'have done it! For nobody would re-'quire me at your hands—No, not a soul '—Except, indeed, Miss Howe would 'have said, when she should see you, "What, Lovelace, have you done with "Clarissa Harlowe?"—And then you 'could have given any slight gay an-'swer—"Sent her beyond sea;" or, "She has run away from me, as she did "from her parents." And this would 'have been easily credited; for you 'know, Lovelace, she that could run 'away from them, might very well run 'away from you.

'But this is nothing to what I wanted 'to say. Now I have it—

'I have lost it again—This foolish 'wench comes teazing me—"For what "purpose should I eat? For what end "should I wish to live?—I tell thee, "Dorcas, I will neither eat nor drink. "I cannot be worse than I am.

"I will do as you'd have me—Good "Dorcas, look not upon me so fiercely "—But thou canst not look so bad as I "have seen somebody look."

'Mr. Lovelace, now that I remember 'what I took pen in hand to say, [illegible] 'hurry off my thoughts, lest I [illegible] 'again—Here I am sensible—An[illegible] 'am hardly sensible neither—But I know 'my head is not as it should be, for all 'that—Therefore let me propose one 'thing to you: it is for your good—not 'mine: and this is it:

'I must needs be both a trouble and 'an expence to you. And here my un-'cle Harlowe, when he knows how I am, 'will never wish any man to have me: 'no, not even you, who have been the 'occasion of it—Barbarous and ungrate-'ful!—A less complicated villainy cost 'a Tarquin—But I forget what I would 'say again—

'Then this is it—I never shall be my-'self again: I have been a very wicked 'creature—a vain, proud, poor crea-'ture—full of secret pride—which I car-'ried off under an humble guise, and 'deceived every-body—My sister says 'so—And now I am punished—So let 'me be carried out of this house, and 'out of your sight; and let me be put 'into that Bedlam privately, which once 'I saw: but it was a sad sight to me 'then! Little as I thought what I should 'come to myself!—That is all I would 'say: this is all I have to wish for—Then 'I shall be out of all your ways; and I 'shall be taken care of; and bread and 'water, without your tormentings, will 'be dainties; and my straw-bed the 'easiest I have lain in—for—I cannot 'tell how long!

'My cloaths will sell for what will 'keep me there, perhaps as long as I 'shall live. But, Lovelace, dear Love-'lace I will call you; for you have cost 'me enough, I'm sure!—don't let me 'be made a shew of, for my family's sake; 'nay, for your own sake, don't do that —For when I know all I have ſuffered, which yet I do not, and no matter if I never do—I may be apt to rave againſt you, by name, and tell of all your baſeneſs to a poor humbled creature, that once was as proud as any-body—But of what I can't tell—Except of mine own folly and vanity—But let that paſs—ſince I am puniſhed enough for it—

—For

'So, ſuppoſe, inſtead of Bedlam, it were a private mad-houſe, where nobody comes!—That will be better a great deal.

'But another thing, Lovelace: don't let them uſe me cruelly when I am there—You have uſed me cruelly enough, you know!—Don't let them uſe me cruelly; for I will be very tractable; and do as any-body would have me to do—Except what you would have me do—for that I never will.—Another thing, Lovelace: don't let this good woman; I was going to ſay vile woman; but don't tell her that—becauſe ſhe won't let you ſend me to this happy refuge perhaps, if ſhe were to know it—

'Another thing, Lovelace: and let me have pen, and ink, and paper, allowed me—It will be all my amuſement—But they need not ſend to any-body I ſhall write to what I write, becauſe it will but trouble them: and ſomebody may do you a miſchief, may-be—I wiſh not that any-body do any-body a miſchief upon my account.

'You tell me, that Lady Betty Lawrance, and your couſin Montague, were here to take leave of me; but that I was aſleep, and could not be waked. So you told me at firſt, I was married, you know; and that you were my huſband—Ah! Lovelace! look to what you ſay.—But let not them, (for they will ſport with my miſery) let not that Lady Betty, let not that Miſs Montague, whatever the real ones may do; nor Mrs. Sinclair neither, nor any of her lodgers, nor her nieces, come to ſee me in my place—Real ones, I ſay; for, Lovelace, I ſhall find out all your villainies in time—Indeed I ſhall—So put me there as ſoon as you can—It is for your good—Then all will paſs for ravings that I can ſay, as, I doubt not, many poor creatures exclamations do paſs, though there may be too much truth in them for all that—And you know I began to be mad at Hampſtead—So you ſaid.—Ah! villainous man! what have you not to anſwer for!

'A LITTLE interval ſeems to be lent me. I had begun to look over what I have written. It is not fit for any one to ſee, ſo far as I have been able to re-peruſe it: but my head will not hold, I doubt, to go through it all. If therefore I have not already mentioned my earneſt deſire, let me tell you, it is this: that I be ſent out of this abominable houſe without delay, and lockrd up in ſome private mad-houſe about this town; for ſuch it ſeems there are; never more to be ſeen, or to be produced to any-body, except in your own vindication, if you ſhould be charged with the murder of my perſon; a much lighter crime, than that of my honour, which the greateſt villain on earth has robbed me of. And deny me not this my laſt requeſt, I beſeech you; and one other, and that is never to let me ſee you more! This ſurely may be granted to the miſerably abuſed,

'CLARISSA HARLOWE.'

I WILL not bear thy heavy preachments, Belford, upon this affecting letter. So, not a word of that ſort! The paper, thou'lt ſee, is bliſtered with the tears even of the hardened tranſcriber: which has made her ink run here-and-there.

Mrs. Sinclair is a true heroine, and, I think, ſhames us all. And ſhe is a woman too! Thou'lt ſay, 'The beſt 'things corrupted become the worſt.' But this is certain, that whatever the ſex ſet their hearts upon, they make thorough work of it. And hence it is, that a miſchief which would end in ſimple robbery among men-rogues, becomes murder, if a woman be in it.

I know thou wilt blame me for having had recourſe to art. But do not phyſicians preſcribe opiates in acute caſes, where the violence of the diſorder would be apt to throw the patient into a fever or delirium? I aver, that my motive for this expedient was mercy; nor could it be any-thing elſe. For a rape, thou knoweſt, to us rakes, is far from being an undeſirable thing. Nothing but the law ſtands in our way, upon that account; and the opinion of what a modeſt woman will ſuffer rather than become a viva voce accuſer, leſſens much an honeſt fellow's apprehenſions on that ſcore. Then, if theſe ſomnivolencies [I hate the word opiates on this occaſion] have turned her head, that is an effect they frequently have upon ſome conſtitutions; and and in this caſe was rather the fault of the doſe than the deſign of the giver.

But is not wine itſelf an opiate in degree?—How many women have been taken advantage of by wine, and other ſtill more intoxicating viands?—Let me tell thee, Jack, that the experience of many of the paſſive ſex, and the conſciences of many more of the active, appealed to, will teſtify that thy Lovelace is not the worſt of villains. Nor would I have thee put me upon clearing myſelf by compariſons.

If ſhe eſcape a ſettled delirium when my plots unravel, I think it is all I ought to be concerned about. What therefore I deſire of thee, is, that, if two conſtructions may be made of my actions, thou wilt afford me the moſt favourable. For this, not only friendſhip, but my own ingenuouſneſs, which has furniſhed thee with the knowledge of the facts againſt which thou art ſo ready to inveigh, require of thee.

WILL is juſt returned from an errand to Hampſtead; and acquaints me, that Mrs. Townſend was yeſterday at Mrs. Moore's, accompanied by three or four rough fellows; a greater number (as ſuppoſed) at a diſtance. She was ſtrangely ſurprized at the news that my ſpouſe and I are entirely reconciled; and that two fine ladies, my relations, came to viſit her, and went to town with her: where ſhe is very happy with me. She was ſure we were not married, ſhe ſaid, unleſs it was while we were at Hampſtead: and they were ſure the ceremony was not performed there. But that the lady is happy and eaſy, is unqueſtionable: and a fling was thrown out by Mrs. Moore and Mrs. Bevis at miſchief makers, as they knew Mrs. Townſend to be acquainted with Miſs Howe.

Now, ſince my fair-one can neither receive, nor ſend away letters, I am pretty eaſy as to this Mrs. Townſend and her employer. And I fancy Miſs Howe will be puzzled to know what to think of the matter, and afraid of ſending by Wilſon's conveyance; and perhaps ſuppoſe that her friend ſlights her; or has changed her mind in my favour, and is aſhamed to own it; as ſhe has not had an anſwer to what ſhe wrote; and will believe that the ruſtick delivered her laſt letter into her own hand.

Mean time I have a little project come into my head, of a new kind; juſt for amuſement-ſake, that's all: variety has irreſiſtible charms. I cannot live without intrigue. My charmer has no paſſions; that is to ſay, none of the paſſions that I want her to have. She engages all my reverence. I am at preſent more inclined to regret what I have done, than to proceed to new offences: and ſhall regret it till I ſee how ſhe takes it when recovered.

Shall I tell thee my project? 'Tis not a high one.—'Tis this—To get hither Mrs. Moore, Miſs Rawlins, and my widow Bevis; for they are deſirous to make a viſit to my ſpouſe, now we are ſo happy together. And, if I can order it right, Belton, Mowbray, Tourville, and I, will ſhew them a little more of the ways of this wicked town, than they at preſent know. Why ſhould they be acquainted with a man of my character, and not be the better and wiſer for it?—I would have every body rail againſt rakes with judgment and knowledge, if they will rail. Two of theſe women gave me a great deal of trouble: and the third, I am confident, will forgive a merry evening.

Thou wilt be curious to know, what the perſons of theſe women are, to whom I intend ſo much diſtinction. I think I have not heretofore mentioned any-thing characteriſtick of their perſons.

Mrs. Moore is a widow of about thirty-eight; a little mortified by misfortunes; but thoſe are often the merrieſt folks, when warmed. She has good features ſtill; and is what they call much of a gentlewoman, and very neat in her perſon and dreſs. She has given over, I believe, all thoughts of our ſex: but when the dying embers are raked up about the half-conſumed ſtump, there will be fuel enough left, I dare ſay, to blaze out, and give a comfortable warmth to a half-ſtarved by-ſtander.

Mrs. Bevis is comely; that is to ſay, plump; a lover of mirth, and one whom no grief ever dwelt with, I dare ſay, for a week together; about twenty-five years of age: Mowbray will have very little difficulty with her, I believe; for one cannot do every-thing one's ſelf. And yet ſometimes women of this free caſt, when it comes to the point, anſwer not the promiſes their cheerful forwardneſs gives a man who has a view upon them.

Miſs Rawlins is an agreeable young lady enough; but not beautiful. She has ſenſe, and would be thought to know the world, as it is called; but, for her knowledge, is more indebted to theory than experience. A mere whip-ſyllabub knowledge this, Jack, that always fails the perſon who truſts to it, when it ſhould hold to do her service. For such young ladies have so much dependence upon their own understanding and wariness, are so much above the cautions that the less opiniomtive may be benefited by, that their presumption is generally their overthrow, when attempted by a man of experience, who knows how to flatter their vanity, and to magnify their wisdom, in order to take advantage of their folly. But, for Miss Rawlins, if I can add experience to her theory, what an accomplished person will she be!—And how much will she be obliged to me; and not only she, but all those who may be the better for the precepts she thinks herself already so well qualified to give! Dearly, Jack, do I love to engage with these precept-givers, and example setters.

Now, Belford, although there is nothing striking in any of these characters; yet may we, at a pinch, make a good frolicky half-day with them, if, after we have softened their wax at table by encouraging viands, we can set our women and them into dancing: dancing, which all women love, and all men should therefore promote, for both their sakes.

And thus, when Tourville sings, Belton fiddles, Mowbray makes rough love, and I smooth; and thou, Jack, wilt be by that time well enough to join in the chorus; the devil's in't, if we don't mould them into what shape we please—our own women, by their laughing freedoms, encouraging them to break through all their customary reserves: for women to women, thou knowest, are great darers and incentives: not one of them loving to be outdone or outdared, when their hearts are thoroughly warmed.

I know, at first, the difficulty will be the accidental absence of my dear Mrs. Lovelace, to whom principally they will design their visit: but if we can exhilarate them, they won't then wish to see her; and I can form twenty accidents and excuses, from one hour to another, for her absence, till each shall have a subject to take up all her thoughts.

I am really sick at heart for a frolick, and have no doubt but this will be an agreeable one. These women already think me a wild fellow; nor do they like me the less for it, as I can perceive; and I shall take care, that they shall be treated with so much freedom before one another's faces, that in policy they shall keep each other's counsel. And won't this be doing a kind thing by them? since it will knit an indissoluble band of union and friendship between three women who are neighbours, and at present have only common obligations to one another: for thou wantest not to be told, that secrets of love, and secrets of this nature, are generally the strongest cement of female friendships.

But, after all, if my beloved should be happily restored to her intellects, we may have scenes arise between us, that will be sufficiently busy to employ all the faculties of thy friend, without looking out for new occasions. Already, as I have often observed, has she been the means of saving scores of her sex, yet without her own knowledge.

SATURDAY NIGHT.

By Dorcas's account of her lady's behaviour, the dear creature seems to be recovering. I shall give the earliest notice of this to the worthy Captain Tomlinson, that he may apprize uncle John of it. I must be properly enabled, from that quarter, to pacify her, or at least, to rebate her first violence.

LETTER XXXVII.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

SUNDAY AFTERNOON, 6 O'CLOCK, (JUNE 18.)

I Went out early this morning, and returned not till just now; when I was informed, that my beloved, in my absence, had taken it into her head to attempt to get away.

She tripped down, with a parcel tied up in a handkerchief, her hood on; and was actually in the entry, when Mrs. Sinclair saw her.

'Pray, Madam,' whipping between her and the street-door, 'be pleased to 'let me know whither you are going?'

'Who has a right to controul me?' was the word.

'I have, Madam, by order of your 'spouse: and,'—kemboing her arms, as she owned—'I desire you will be pleased 'to walk up again.'

She would have spoken; but could not: and, bursting into tears, turned back, and went up to her chamber: and Dorcas was taken to task for suffering her to be in the passage before she was seen.

This shews, as we hoped last night, that she was recovering her charming intellects.

Dorcas says, she was visible to her but once before, the whole day; and then seemed very solemn and sedate.

I will endeavour to see her. It must be in her own chamber, I suppose; for she she will hardly meet me in the dining-room. What advantage will the confidence of our sex give me over the modesty of hers, if she be recovered!—I, the most confident of men: she, the most delicate of women. Sweet soul! methinks I have her before me—Her face averted—Speech lost in sighs—Abashed—Conscious—What a triumphant aspect will this give me, when I gaze in her downcast countenance!

THIS moment Dorcas tells me, she believes she is coming to find me out. She asked her after me: and Dorcas left her, drying her red-swoln eyes at her glass; [No design of moving me by tears!] sighing too sensibly for my courage. But to what purpose have I gone thus far, if I pursue not my principal end? Niceness must be a little abated. She knows the worst. That she cannot fly me; that she must see me; and that I can look her into a sweet confusion; are circumstances greatly in my favour. What can she do, but rave and exclaim? I am used to raving and exclaiming—But, if recovered, I shall see how she behaves upon this our first sensible interview after what she has suffered.

Here she comes.

LETTER XXXVIII.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

SUNDAY NIGHT.

NEVER blame me for giving way to have art used with this admirable creature. All the princes of the air, or beneath it, joining with me, could never have subdued her while she had her senses.

I will not anticipate—Only to tell thee, that I am too much awakened by her to think of sleep, were I to go to-bed; and so shall have nothing to do, but to write an account of our odd conversation, while it is so strong upon my mind that I can think of nothing else.

She was dressed in a white damask night-gown, with less negligence than for some days past. I was sitting with my pen in my fingers; and stood up when I first saw her, with great complaisance, as if the day were still her own. And so indeed it is.

She entered with such dignity in her manner, as struck me with great awe, and prepared me for the poor figure I made in the subsequent conversation. A poor figure indeed!—But I will do her justice.

She came up with quick steps, pretty close to me; a white handkerchief in her hand; her eyes neither fierce nor wild, but very earnest; and a fixed sedateness in her whole aspect, which seemed to be the effect of deep contemplation: and thus she accosted me, with an air and motion that I never saw equalled.

'You see before you, Sir, the wretch, 'whose preference of you to all your 'sex, you have rewarded—as it indeed 'deserved to be rewarded. My father's 'dreadful curse has already operated 'upon me in the very letter of it, as to 'this life; and it seems to me too evident, that it will not be your fault, 'that it is not entirely compleated in the 'loss of my soul, as well as of my honour '—Which you, villainous man! have 'robbed me of, with a baseness so unnatural—so inhuman—that, it seems, you, 'even you, had not the heart to attempt 'it, till my senses were made the previous sacrifice.'

Here I made an hesitating effort to speak, laying down my pen: but she proceeded: —'Hear me out, guilty 'wretch!—abandoned man!—Man did 'I say?—Yet what name else can I!—'since the mortal worryings of the fiercest beast would have been more natural, and infinitely more welcome, than 'what you have acted by me; and that 'with a premeditation and contrivance 'worthy only of that single heart, which 'now, base as well as ungrateful as thou 'art, seems to quake within thee.—And 'well mayest thou quake—well mayest 'thou tremble and falter, and hesitate, 'as thou dost—when thou reflectest upon 'what I have suffered for thy sake, and 'upon the returns thou hast made me!'

By my soul, Belford, my whole frame was shaken: for not only her looks, and her action, but her voice, so solemn, was inexpressibly affecting: and then my cursed guilt, and her innocence, and merit, and rank, and superiority of talents, all stared me at that instant in the face so formidably, that my present account, to which the unexpectedly called me, seemed, as I then thought, to resemble that general one, to which we are told we shall be summoned, when our conscience shall be our accuser.

But she had had time to collect all the powers of her eloquence. The whole day probably in her intellects. And then I was the more disappointed, as I had thought I could have gazed the dear creature into confusion—But it is plain, that the sense she has of her wrongs sets this matchless woman above all lesser, all weaker considerations.

'My dear—My love—I—I—I never—No never—' Lips trembling, limbs quaking, voice inward, hesitating, broken—Never, surely, did miscreant look so like a miscreant!—While thus she proceeded, waving her snowy hand, with all the graces of moving oratory.

'I have no pride in the confusion visible in thy whole person. I have been all the day praying for a composure, if I could not escape from this vile house, that should once more enable me to look up to my destroyer with the consciousness of an innocent sufferer. Thou seest me, since my wrongs are beyond the power of words to express, thou seest me, calm enough to wish, that thou mayest continue harrassed by the workings of thy own conscience, till effectual repentance take hold of thee, that so thou mayest not forfeit all title to that mercy which thou hast not shewn to the poor creature now before thee, who had so well deserved to meet with a faithful friend, where she met with the worst of enemies.

'But tell me—(for no doubt thou hast some scheme to pursue)—Tell me, since I am a prisoner, as I find, in the vilest of houses, and have not a friend to protect or save me, what thou intendest shall become of the remnant of a life not worth the keeping!—Tell me, if yet there are more evils reserved for me; and whether thou hast entered into a compact with the grand Deceiver, in the person of his horrid agent in this house; and if the ruin of my soul, that my father's curse may be fulfilled, is to complete the triumphs of so vile a confederacy?—Answer me!—Say, if thou hast courage to speak out to her whom thou hast ruined, tell me what further I am to suffer from thy barbarity?'

She stopped here; and, sighing, turned her sweet face from me, drying up with her handkerchief those tears which she endeavoured to restrain; and, when she could not, to conceal from my sight.

As I told thee, I had prepared myself for high passions, raving, flying, tearing, execration: these transient violences, the workings of sudden grief, and shame, and vengeance, would have set us upon a par with each other, and quitted scores. These have I been accustomed to; and, as nothing violent is lasting, with these I could have wished to encounter. But such a majestick composure—Seeking me—whom, yet it is plain, by her attempt to get away, she would have avoided seeing—No Lucretia-like vengeance upon herself in her thought—Yet swallowed up, her whole mind swallowed up, as I may say, by a grief so heavy, as, in her own words, to be beyond the power of speech to express—and to be able, discomposed as she was, to the very morning, to put such a home-question to me, as if she had penetrated my future view—How could I avoid looking like a fool, and answering, as before, in broken sentences, and confusion?

'What—What-a—What has been 'done—I—I—I—cannot but say—Must 'own—Must confess—Hem—Hem—Is 'not right—Is not what should have 'been—But a—But—But—I am truly '—truly—sorry for it—Upon my soul I 'am—And—And—will do all—do 'every-thing—Do what—What-ever is 'incumbent upon me—all that you—'that you—that you shall require, to 'make you amends!'

O Belford! Belford! Whose the triumph now!—HERS, or MINE?

'Amends!—O thou truly despicable 'wretch!'—Then lifting up her eyes—'Good Heaven! Who shall pity the 'creature who could fall by so base a 'mind!—Yet'—and then she looked indignantly upon me—'Yet, I hate thee 'not (base and low-souled as thou art!) 'half so much as I hate myself, that I 'saw thee not sooner in thy proper colours!—That I hoped either morality, 'gratitude, or humanity, from a libertine, who, to be a libertine, must have 'got over and defied all moral sanctions.'

She then called upon her cousin Morden's name, as if he had warned her against a man of free principles; and walked towards the window; her handkerchief at her eyes: but, turning short towards me, with an air of mingled scorn and majesty—[What, at the moment, would I have given never to have injured her!]—'What amends hast thou to propose!—What amends can such a one 'as thou make to a person of spirit, or 'common-sense, for the evils thou hast 'so inhumanly made me suffer?'

'As soon, Madam—As soon—as—'As soon as your uncle—or—not waiting—'

'Thou wouldst tell me, I suppose—I 'know what thou wouldst tell me—But 'thinkest thou, that marriage will satisfy 'for a guilt like thine?—Destitute as thou 'hast made me both of friends and fortune, I too much despise the wretch, 'who could rob himself of his wife's virtue, 'to endure the thoughts of thee, in the 'light

'light thou seemest to hope I will ac'cept thee in!'

I hesitated an interruption: but my meaning died away upon my trembling lips. I could only pronounce the word marriage—And thus she proceeded:

'Let me therefore know, whether I 'am to be controuled in the future dis'posal of myself? Whether, in a coun'try of liberty, as this, where the sove-
'reign of it must not be guilty of your 'wickedness, and where you neither 'durst have attempted it, had I one 'friend or relation to look upon me; 'I am to be kept here a prisoner, to 'sustain fresh injuries? Whether, in a 'word, you intend to hinder me from 'going whither my destiny shall lead 'me?'

After a pause—for I was still silent—

'Can you not answer me this plain 'question?—I quit all claim, all expec-
'tation, upon you—What right have 'you to detain me here?'

I could not speak. What could I say to such a question?

'O wretch!' wringing her uplifted hands, 'had I not been robbed of my 'senses, and that in the basest manner—
'You best know how—Had I been able 'to account for myself, and your pro'ceedings, or to have known but how 'the days passed; a whole week should 'not have gone over my head, as I find 'it has done, before I had told you, 'what I now tell you—That the man who 'has been the villain to me you have been, 'shall never make me his wife.—I will 'write to my uncle, to lay aside his kind 'intentions in my favour—All my 'prospects are shut in—I give myself up 'for a lost creature as to this world—
'Hinder me not from entering upon a 'life of severe penitence, for corres'ponding, after prohibition, with a 'wretch who has too well justified all 'their warnings and inveteracy; and 'for throwing myself into the power of 'your vile artifices. Let me try to se'cure the only hope I have left. This is 'all the amends I ask of you. I repeat, 'therefore, am I now at liberty to dispose 'of myself as I please?'

Now comes the fool, the miscreant, again, hesitating his broken answer—
'My dearest love, I am confounded—
'quite confounded—at the thought of 'what—of what has been done; and at 'the thought of—to whom. I see—I see '—there is no withstanding your elo-
'quence!—Such irresistible proofs of 'the love of virtue for it's own sake—did 'I never hear of, nor meet with, in all 'my reading. And if you can forgive a 'repentant villain, who thus on his 'knees implores your forgiveness,'—[Then down I dropt, absolutely in earnest in all I said]—'I vow by all 'that's sacred and just, (and may a thun'derbolt strike me dead at your feet, if 'I am not sincere!) that I will by mar'riage, before to-morrow noon, with'out waiting for your uncle, or any'body, do you all the justice I now can 'do you. And you shall ever after con-
'troul and direct me as you please, till 'you have made me more worthy of 'your angelick purity, than now I am: 'nor will I presume so much as to touch 'your garment, till I have the honour 'to call so great a blessing lawfully 'mine.'

'O thou guileful betrayer! There is 'a just God, whom thou invokest—
'Yet the thunder-bolt descends not; 'and thou livest to imprecate and de-
'ceive!'

'My dearest life!'—rising; for I hoped she was relenting.

'Hadst thou not sinned beyond the 'possibility of forgiveness,' interrupted she; 'and this had been the first time 'that thus thou solemnly promisest and 'invokest the vengeance thou hast as 'often defied; the desperateness of my 'condition might have induced me to 'think of taking a wretched chance with 'a man so profligate. But, after what 'I have suffered by thee, it would be cri'minal in me to wish to bind my soul in 'covenant to a man so nearly allied to 'perdition.'

'Good God!—how uncharitable!—
'I offer not to defend—Would to Hea-
'ven that I could recal—So nearly allied 'to perdition, Madam!—So profligate a 'man, Madam!'

'O how short is expression of thy 'crimes, and of my sufferings!—Such 'premeditation in thy baseness!—To 'prostitute the characters of persons of 'honour of thy own family—And all to 'delude a poor creature, whom thou 'oughtest—But why talk I to thee?—Be 'thy crimes upon thy head!—Once more 'I ask thee, Am I, or am I not, at my 'own liberty now?'

I offered to speak in defence of the women, declaring that they really were the very persons—

'Presume not,' interrupted she, 'bad 'as thou art, to say one word in thine 'own vindication on this head. I have 'been contemplating their behaviour, 'their conversation, their over-ready 'acquiescences to my declarations in thy

'disfavour,

[illegible] sins, yet affectedly reserved light manners: and now, that the sad event has opened my eyes, and I have compared facts and passages together, in the little interval that has been lent me, I wonder I could not distinguish the behaviour of the unnatural-like jilt whom thou broughtest to betray me, from the worthy lady whom thou hast the honour to call thy cousin: and that I could not detect the superficial creature, whom thou passedst upon me for the the virtuous Miss Montague.'

'Amazing uncharitableness in a lady so good herself!—That the high spirits those ladies were in to see you, should subject them to such censures!—I do most solemnly vow, Madam—'

'That they were,' interrupting me, 'verily and indeed, Lady Betty Lawrance, and thy cousin Montague!—O wretch! I see by thy solemn averment,'—[I had not yet averred it]—what credit ought to be given to all the rest. Had I no other proof—'

Interrupting her, I besought her patient ear. I had found myself, I told her, almost cruelly despised and hated. I had no hope of gaining her love, or her confidence. The letter she had left behind her, on her removal to Hampstead, sufficiently convinced me, that she was entirely under Miss Howe's influence, and waited but the return of a letter from her to enter upon measures that would deprive me of her for ever: Miss Howe had ever been my enemy: more so then, no doubt, from the contents of the letter she had written to her on her first coming to Hampstead: that I feared not to stand the event of such a letter; and was glad of an opportunity, by Lady Betty's and my cousin's means, (though they knew not my motive) to get her back to town; for, at the time, [illegible] the outrage which my despair, and her want of confidence in me, put me so vilely upon—

I would have proceeded; and particularly would have said something of Captain Tomlinson and her uncle; but she would not hear me further. And indeed it was with visible indignation, and not without several angry interruptions, that she heard me say so much.

Would I dare, she asked me, to offer as a palliation of my baseness? The two women, she was convinced, were [illegible]. She knew not but Captain Tomlinson, and Mr. Mennell, were so too. But, whether they were so or not, [illegible]. And she insisted upon being at her own disposal for the remainder of her short life—For indeed she abhorred me in every light; and more particularly in that, in which I offered myself to her acceptance.

And, saying this, she flung from me; leaving me absolutely shocked and confounded at her part of a conversation, which she began with such uncommon, however severe, composure, and concluded with so much sincere and unaffected indignation.

And now, Jack, I must address one serious paragraph particularly to thee.

I have not yet touched upon cohabitation—Her uncle's mediation she does not absolutely discredit, as I had the pleasure to find by one hint in this conversation—Yet she suspects my future views, and has doubt about Mennell and Tomlinson.

I do say, If she come fairly at her lights, at her clues, or what shall I call them? her penetration is wonderful.

But if she do not come at them fairly, then is her incredulity, then is her antipathy to me, evidently accounted for.

I will speak out—Thou couldst not, surely, play me booty, Jack?—Surely thou couldst not let thy weak pity for her lead thee to an unpardonable breach of trust to thy friend, who has been so unreserved in his communications to thee?

I cannot believe thee capable of such a baseness. Satisfy me, however, upon this head. I must make a cursed figure in her eyes, vowing and protesting, as I shall not scruple occasionally to vow and protest, if all the time she has had unquestionable informations of my perfidy. I know thou as little feareſt me, as I do thee, in any point of manhood; and wilt scorn to deny it, if thou hast done it, when thus home-pressed.

And here I have a good mind to stop, and write no farther, till I have thy answer.

And so I will.

MONDAY MORN. PAST THREE.

LETTER XXXIX.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

MONDAY MORN. 5 O'CLOCK, (JUNE 19).

I Must write on. Nothing else can divert me: and I think thou canst not have been a dog to me.

I would fain have closed my eyes: but sleep flies me. Well says Horace, as translated by Cowley—

'The

'The halcyon fleet will never build his nest
'In any stormy breast.
'Tis not enough, that he does find
'Clouds and darkness in the mind:
'Darkness but half his work will do.
'Tis not enough; he must find quiet too.'

Now indeed I do from my heart wish, that I had never known this lady. But who would have thought there had been such a woman in the world? Of all the sex I have hitherto known, or heard, or read of, it was once subdued and always subdued. The first struggle was generally the last; or at least, the subsequent struggles were so much fainter and fainter, that a man would rather have them, than be without them. But how know I yet—

It is now near six—The sun for two hours past has been illuminating everything about me; for that impartial orb shines upon mother Sinclair's house, as well as upon any other: but nothing within me can it illuminate.

At day-dawn I looked through the key-hole of my beloved's door. She had declared she would not put off her cloaths any more in this house. There I beheld her in a sweet slumber, which I hope will prove refreshing to her disturned senses; sitting in her elbow-chair, her apron over her head; her head supported by one sweet hand, the other hand hanging down upon her side, in a sleepy lifelessness: half of one pretty foot only visible.

'See the difference in our cases!' thought I: 'she, the charming injured,
'can sweetly sleep, while the varlet-in-'jurer cannot close his eyes; and has 'been trying to no purpose the whole
'night to divert his melancholy, and to
'fly from himself!'

As every vice generally brings on it's own punishment, even in this life; if any-thing were to tempt me to doubt of future punishment, it would be, that there can hardly be a greater than that which I at this instant experience in my own remorse.

I hope it will go off.—If not, well will the dear creature be avenged; for I shall be the most miserable of men.

SIX O'CLOCK.

Just now Dorcas tells me, that her lady is preparing openly, and without disguise, to be gone. Very probable. The humour she flew away from me in last night, has given me expectation of such an enterprize.

Now, Jack, to be thus hated, and despised!—And by Miss Clarissa Harlowe forgiveness—

But she has sent me a message by Dorcas, that she will meet me in the morning-room; and desires [cold enough!] that the wench might be present at the conversation that will pass between us. This message gives me hope.

SEVEN O'CLOCK.

Confounded art, cunning, villainy!—By my soul, she had like to have slipt through my fingers!—She meant nothing by her message; but to get Dorcas out of her way, and a clear coast. Is a fancied distress sufficient to justify this lady for dispensing with her principles? Does she not shew me, that she can wilfully deceive as well as I?

Had she been in the fore-house, and no passage to go through to get at the street-door, she had certainly been gone. But her haste betrayed her: for Sally Martin happening to be in the fore-parlour, and hearing a swifter motion than usual, and a rustling of silks, as if from somebody in a hurry, looked out, and seeing who it was, stept between her and the door, and set her back against it.

'You must not go, Madam. Indeed
'you must not.'

'By what right?—And how dare you?'—And such-like imperious airs the dear creature gave herself.—While Sally called out for her aunt; and half a dozen voices joined instantly in the cry for me to hasten down—to hasten down—in a moment.

I was gravely instructing Dorcas above-stairs, and wondering what would be the subject of the conversation to which the wench was to be a witness, when these outcries reached my ears. And down I flew.—And there was the charming creature, the sweet dissembler, panting for breath, her back against the partition, a parcel in her hand, [Women make no excursions without their parcels] Sally, Polly, (but Polly obligingly pleaded for her) the mother, Miss Bell, and Peter, (the footman of the house) about her; all, however, keeping their distance; the mother and Sally between her and the door.—In her rage the dear soul repeating, 'I will 'go—Nobody has a right—I will go!—
'If you kill me, women, I won't go up
'again!'

As soon as she saw me, she stept a pace or two towards me! 'Mr. Lovelace, I 'will go!' said she—'Do you authorize 'these

'these women—What right have they, 'or you either to ſtop me?'

'Is this, my dear, preparative to the 'converſation you led me to expect in 'the dining-room? And do you think 'I can part with you thus?—Do you 'think I will?'

'And am I, Sir, to be thus beſet? 'Surrounded thus?—What have theſe 'women to do with me?'

I deſired them to leave us, all but Dorcas, who was down as ſoon as I. I then thought it right to aſſume an air of reſolution, having found my tameneſs ſo greatly triumphed over. 'And 'now, my dear,' ſaid I, (urging her reluctant feet) 'be pleaſed to walk into 'the fore-parlour. Here, ſince you 'will not go up ſtairs; here we may hold 'our parley; and Dorcas be witneſs to it. '—And now, Madam,' ſeating her, and ſticking my hands in my ſides, 'your 'pleaſure!'

'Inſolent villain!' ſaid the furious lady. And, riſing, ran to the window and threw up the ſaſh. [She knew not, I ſuppoſe, that there were iron rails before the windows.] And, when ſhe found ſhe could not get out into the ſtreet, claſping her up-lifting hands together, having dropt her parcel—'For 'the love of God, good honeſt man!—'For the love of God, miſtreſs—' [to two paſſers-by] 'a poor, a poor crea-'ture' ſaid ſhe, 'ruined!'

I claſped her in my arms, people beginning to gather about the window: and then ſhe cried out 'Murder! Help! 'help!'—And carried her up to the dining-room, in ſpite of her little plotting heart, (as I may now call it) although ſhe violently ſtruggled, catching hold of the bannifters here and there, as ſhe could. I would have ſeated her there; but ſhe ſunk down half-motionleſs, pale as aſhes. And a violent burſt of tears happily relieved her.

Dorcas wept over her. The wench was actually moved for her!

Violent hyſtericks ſucceeded. I left her to Mabell, Dorcas, and Polly; the latter the moſt ſupportable to her of the ſiſterhood.

This attempt, ſo reſolutely made, alarmed me not a little.

Mrs. Sinclair, and her nymphs, are much more concerned; becauſe of the reputation of their houſe, as they call it, having received ſome inſults, (broken windows threatened) to make them produce the young creature who cried out.

While the mobbiſh inquiſitors were in the height of their office, the women came running up to me, to know what they ſhould do; a conſtable being actually fetched.

'Get the conſtable into the parlour,' ſaid I, 'with three or four of the for-'wardeſt of the mob, and produce one 'of the nymphs, onion-eyed, in a mo-'ment, with diſordered head-dreſs and 'handkerchief, and let her own herſelf 'the perſon: the occaſion, a female ſkir-'miſh; but ſatisfied with the juſtice done 'her. Then give a dram or two to each 'fellow, and all will be well.'

ELEVEN O'CLOCK.

ALL done, as I adviſed; and all is well.

Mrs. Sinclair wiſhes ſhe never had ſeen the face of ſo ſkittiſh a lady; and ſhe and Sally are extremely preſſing with me, to leave the perverſe beauty to their breaking, as they call it, for four or five days. But I curſed them into ſilence; only ordering double precaution for the future.

Polly, though ſhe conſoled the dear perverſe one all ſhe could, when with her, inſiſts upon it to me, that nothing but terror will procure me tolerable uſage.

Dorcas was challenged by the women upon her tears. She owned them real. Said, ſhe was aſhamed of herſelf; but could not help it. So ſincere, ſo unyielding a grief, in ſo ſweet a lady!

The women laughed at her: but I bid her make no apologies for her tears, nor mind their laughing. I was glad to ſee them ſo ready. Good uſe might be made of ſuch ſtrangers. In ſhort I would have her indulge them often, and try if it were not poſſible to gain her lady's confidence by her concern for her.

She ſaid, that her lady did take kind notice of them to her; and was glad to ſee ſuch tokens of humanity in her.

'Well then,' ſaid I, 'your part, whe-'ther any-thing come of it or not, 'is 'to be tender-hearted. It can do no 'harm, if no good. But take care you 'are not too ſuddenly, or too officiouſly 'compaſſionate.'

So Dorcas will be a humane good ſort of creature, I believe, very quickly with her lady. And as it becomes women to be ſo, and as my beloved is willing to think highly of her own ſex; it will the more readily paſs with her.

I thought to have had one trial (having gone ſo far) for cohabitation. But what hope can there be of ſucceeding?—She is invincible!—Againſt all my notions, againſt all my conceptions, (thinking of her as a woman, and in the very bloom of her charms) she is absolutely invincible. My whole view at the preſent, is to do her legal juſtice, if I can but once more get her out of her altitudes.

The conſent of ſuch a woman muſt make her ever new, ever charming. But aſtoniſhing! Can the want of a church-ceremony make ſuch a difference!

She owes me her conſent; for hitherto I have nothing to boaſt of. All, of my ſide, has been deep remorſe, anguiſh of mind, and love encreaſed, rather than abated.

How her proud rejection ſtings me! —And yet I hope ſtill to get her to liſten to my ſtories of the family-reconciliation, and of her uncle and Captain Tomlinſon—And as ſhe has given me a pretence to detain her againſt her will, ſhe muſt ſee me whether in temper or not —She cannot help it. And if love will not do, terror, as the women adviſe, muſt be tried.

A nice part, after all, has my beloved to act. If ſhe forgive me eaſily, I reſume perhaps my projects:—if ſhe carry her rejection into violence, that violence may make me deſperate, and occaſion freſh violence. She ought, ſince ſhe thinks ſhe has found the women out, to conſider where ſhe is.

I am confoundedly out of conceit with myſelf. If I give up my contrivances, my joy in ſtratagem, and plot, and invention, I ſhall be but a common man: ſuch another dull heavy creature as thyſelf. Yet what does even my ſucceſs in my machinations bring me, but regret, diſgrace, repentance? But I am overmatched, egregiouſly overmatched, by this woman. What to do with her, or without her, I know not.

LETTER XL.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

I Have this moment intelligence from Simon Parſons, one of Lord M.'s ſtewards, that his lordſhip is very ill. Simon, who is my obſequious ſervant, in virtue of my preſumptive heirſhip, gives me a hint in this letter, that my preſence at M. Hall will not be amiſs. So, I muſt accelerate, whatever be the courſe I ſhall be allowed or compelled to take.

No bad proſpects for this charming creature, if the old peer would be ſo kind as to ſurrender; and many a ſummons has this gout given him. A good 8000*l*. a year, and perhaps the title reverſionary, or a ſtill higher, would help me up with her.

Proudly as this lady pretends to be above all pride, grandeur will have its charms with her; for grandeur always makes a man's face ſhine in a woman's eye. I have a pretty good, becauſe a clear eſtate, as it is: but what a noble variety of miſchief will 8000*l*. a year enable a man to do!

Perhaps thou'lt ſay, I do already all that comes into my head: but that's a miſtake—Not one half, I will aſſure thee. And even good folks, as I have heard, love to have the power of doing miſchief, whether they make uſe of it or not. The late Queen Anne, who was a very good woman, was always fond of prerogative. And her miniſters, in her name, in more inſtances than one, made a miniſterial uſe of this foible.

But now, at laſt, I am to be admitted to the preſence of my angry fair-one: after three denials, nevertheleſs; and a peremptory from me, by Dorcas, that I muſt ſee her in her chamber, if I cannot ſee her in the dining-room.

Dorcas, however, tells me, that ſhe ſays, if ſhe were at her own liberty, ſhe would never ſee me more; and that ſhe had been aſking after the characters and conditions of the neighbours. I ſuppoſe, now ſhe has found her voice, to call out for help from them, if there were any to hear her.

She will have it now, it ſeems, that I had the wickedneſs from the very beginning, to contrive for her ruin, a houſe ſo convenient for dreadful miſchief.

Dorcas begs of her to be pacified.—Entreats her to ſee me with patience.—Tells her I am one of the moſt determined of men, as ſhe has heard ſay. That gentleneſs may do with me; but that nothing elſe will, ſhe believes. And what, as her ladyſhip (as ſhe always ſtiles her) is married, if I had broken my oath, or intended to break it!

She hinted plain enough to the honeſt wench, that ſhe was not married.—But Dorcas would not underſtand her.

This ſhews, that ſhe is reſolved to keep no meaſures. And now is to be a trial of ſkill, whether ſhe ſhall or not.

Dorcas has hinted to her my lord's illneſs, as a piece of intelligence that dropt in converſation from me.

But here I ſtop. My beloved, purſuant to my peremptory meſſage, is juſt gone up into the dining-room.

LETTER XLI.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

MONDAY AFTERNOON.

PITY me, Jack, for pity's sake; since all if thou doſt not, nobody elſe will: and yet never was there a man of my genius and lively temper that wanted it more. We are apt to attribute to the devil every-thing that happens to us, which we would not have happen: but here, being (as perhaps thou'lt ſay) the devil myſelf, my plagues ariſe from an angel. I ſuppoſe all mankind is to be plagued by it's contrary.

She began with me like a true woman [She in the fault, I to be blamed] the moment I entered the dining-room: —not the leaſt apology, nor the leaſt excuſe, for the uproar ſhe had made, and the trouble ſhe had given me.

'I come,' ſaid ſhe, 'into thy deteſted 'preſence, becauſe I cannot help it. 'But why am I to be impriſoned here? '—Although to no purpoſe, I cannot 'help—'

'Deareſt Madam,' interrupted I, 'give not way to ſo much violence. 'You muſt know that your detention is 'entirely owing to the deſire I have to 'make you all the amends that is in my 'power to make you. And this, as well 'for your ſake as my own.—Surely there 'is ſtill one way left to repair the wrongs 'you have ſuffered.'

'Canſt thou blot out the paſt week! 'Several weeks paſt, I ſhould ſay; ever 'ſince I have been with thee? Canſt thou 'call back time?—If thou canſt—'

'Surely, Madam,' again interrupting, 'if I may be permitted to call you 'legally mine, I might have but an-'ticip——'

'Wretch that thou art! Say not ano-'ther word upon the ſubject. When 'thou vowedſt, when thou promiſedſt 'at Hampſtead, I had begun to think 'that I muſt be thine. If I had con-'ſented, at the requeſt of thoſe I thought 'thy relations, this would have been a 'principal inducement, that I could 'then have brought thee, what was 'moſt wanted, an unſullied honour in 'dowry, to a wretch deſtitute of all ho-'nour; and could have met the gra-'tulations of a family to which thy life 'has been one continued diſgrace, with 'a ſatisfaction of deſerving their gra-'tulations. But thinkeſt thou, that I 'will give a harlot-niece to thy honour-'able uncle, and to thy real aunts; and 'a couſin to thy couſins from a brothel? 'For ſuch, in my opinion, is this de-'teſted houſe!'—Then, lifting up her claſped hands, 'Great and good God 'of Heaven,' ſaid ſhe, 'give me pati-'ence to ſupport myſelf under the 'weight of thoſe afflictions, which Thou, 'for wiſe and good ends, though at pre-'ſent impenetrable by me, haſt per-'mitted!'

Then, turning towards me, who knew neither what to ſay to her, nor for myſelf, 'I renounce thee for ever, Love-'lace!—Abhorred of my ſoul! for 'ever I renounce thee!—Seek thy for-'tunes whereſoever thou wilt!—Only 'now, that thou haſt already ruined 'me—'

'Ruined you, Madam!—The world 'need not—' I knew not what to ſay.

'Ruined me in my own eyes; and 'that is the ſame to me, as if all the 'world knew it—Hinder me not from 'going whither my myſterious deſtiny 'ſhall lead me.

'Why heſitate you, Sir? What right 'have you to ſtop me, as you lately did; 'and to bring me up by force, my hands 'and arms bruiſed with your violence? 'What right have you to detain me 'here?'

'I am cut to the heart, Madam, with 'invectives ſo violent. I am but too 'ſenſible of the wrong I have done you, 'or I could not bear your reproaches. 'The man who perpetrates a villainy, 'and reſolves to go on with it, ſhews 'not the compunction I ſhew. Yet, if 'you think yourſelf in my power, I 'would caution you, Madam, not to 'make me deſperate. For you ſhall be 'mine, or my life ſhall be the forfeit! 'Nor is life worth having without you!'

'Be thine! I be thine!'—ſaid the paſſionate beauty. O how lovely in her violence!

'Yes, Madam, be mine!—I repeat, 'you ſhall be mine!—My very crime is 'your glory. My love, my admiration 'of you is encreaſed by what has paſſ-'ed: and ſo it ought. I am willing, 'Madam, to court your returning fa-'vour: but let me tell you, were the 'houſe beſet by a thouſand armed men, 'reſolved to take you from me, they 'ſhould not effect their purpoſe, while 'I had life.'

'I never, never will be yours,' ſaid ſhe, claſping her hands together, and lifting up her eyes!—'I never will be 'yours!'

'We may yet ſee many happy years, 'Madam. All your friends may be re-'conciled to you. The treaty for that

'purpoſe

'purpose is in greater forwardness than 'you imagine. You know better than to 'think the worse of yourself for suffering 'what you could not help. Enjoin but the 'terms I can make my peace with you 'upon, and I will instantly comply.'

'Never, never,' repeated she, 'will I 'be yours!'

'Only forgive me, my dearest life, 'this one time!—A virtue so invincible! 'what further view can I have against 'you?—Have I attempted any further 'outrage?—If you will be mine, your 'injuries will be injuries done to myself. 'You have too well guessed at the unnatural arts that have been used.—But 'can a greater testimony be given of 'your virtue?—And now I have only 'to hope, that although I cannot make 'you complete amends, yet you will permit me to make you all the amends 'that can possibly be made.

'Hear me out, I beseech you, Madam;' for she was going to speak with an aspect unpacifiedly angry, 'the God, 'whom you serve, requires but repentance and amendment. Imitate Him, 'my dearest love, and bless me with the 'means of reforming a course of life, 'that begins to be hateful to me. That 'was once your favourite point. Resume it, dearest creature: in charity to a 'soul, as well as body, which once, as 'I flattered myself, was more than indifferent to you, resume it. And let to-'morrow's sun witness to our espousals.'

'I cannot judge thee,' said she; 'but 'the GOD to whom thou so boldly re-'ferrest, can; and assure thyself He will. 'But, if compunction has really taken 'hold of thee; if indeed thou art touched 'for thy ungrateful baseness, and mean-'est any-thing by pleading the holy ex-'ample thou recommendest to my imi-'tation; in this thy pretended repentant 'moment, let me sift thee thoroughly; 'and by thy answer I shall judge of the 'sincerity of thy pretended declara-'tions.

'Tell me then, Is there any reality 'in the treaty thou hast pretended to be 'on foot between my uncle and Captain 'Tomlinson, and thyself?—Say, and 'hesitate not, is there any truth in that 'story?—But, remember, if there be not, 'and thou avowest that there is, what 'further condemnation attends thy aver-'ment, if it be as solemn as I require it 'to be!'

This was a cursed thrust! What could I say?—'Surely this merciless lady is 'resolved to damn me,' thought I, 'and yet accuses me of a design against 'her soul!'—But was I not obliged to proceed as I had begun?

In short, I solemnly averred, that there was!—How one crime, as the good folks say, brings on another!

I added, That the captain had been in town, and would have waited on her, had she not been indisposed: that he went down much afflicted, as well on her account, as on that of her uncle; though I had not acquainted him either with the nature of her disorder, or the ever-to-be-regretted occasion of it; having told him, that it was a violent fever: that he had twice since, by her uncle's desire, sent up to enquire after her health: and that I had already dispatched a man and horse with a letter, to acquaint him (and her uncle through him) with her recovery; making it my earnest request, that he would renew his application to her uncle for the favour of his presence at the private celebration of our nuptials; and that I expected an answer, if not this night, at to-morrow.

'Let me ask thee next,' said she, '(Thou knowest the opinion I have of 'the women thou brought'st to me at 'Hampstead; and who have seduced me 'hither to my ruin; let me ask thee) if, 'really and truly, they were Lady Betty 'Lawrance and thy cousin Montague? '—What sayest thou—Hesitate not—'What sayest thou to this question?'

'Astonishing, my dear, that you should 'suspect them!—But, knowing your 'strange opinion of them, what can I 'say to be believed?'

'And is this the answer thou returnest 'me? Dost thou thus evade my question? 'But let me know, for I am trying thy 'sincerity now, and shall judge of thy 'new professions by thy answer to this 'question; let me know, I repeat, whether those women be really Lady Betty 'Lawrance and thy cousin Montague?'

'Let me, my dearest love, be enabled 'to-morrow to call you lawfully mine, 'and we will set out the next day, if 'you please, to Berkshire, to my Lord 'M.'s, where they both are at this 'time; and you shall convince yourself 'by your own eyes, and by your own 'ears; which you will believe sooner 'than all I can say or swear.'

'Now, Belford, I had really some apprehension of treachery from thee; which made me so miserably evade; for else, I could as safely have sworn to the truth of this, as to that of the former: but she pressing me still for a categorical answer, I ventured plump; and swore [Here she sobs, finely!] that they were really and truly Lady Betty Lawrance and my cousin Montague.

'She lifted up her hands and eyes—'What can I think!—What can I think!'

'You think me a devil, Madam; a very devil! or you could not, after you have put these questions to me, seem to doubt the truth of answers so solemnly sworn to.'

'And if I do think thee so, have I not cause? Is there another man in the world (I hope for the sake of human nature, there is not) who could act by any poor friendless creature as thou hast acted by me, whom thou hast made friendless—And who, before I knew thee, had for a friend every-one who knew me?'

'I told you, Madam, before, that Lady Betty and my cousin were actually here, in order to take leave of you, before they set out for Berkshire: but the effects of my ungrateful crime (shall, with shame and remorse, I own it to be) were the reason you could not see them. Nor could I be fond, that they should see you: since they never would have forgiven me, had they known what had passed — And what reason had I to expect your silence on the subject, had you been recovered?'

'It signifies nothing now, that the cause of their appearance has been answered in my ruin, who or what they are: but if thou hast averred thus solemnly to two falshoods, what a wretch do I see before me!'

I thought she had now reason to be satisfied; and I begged her to allow me to talk to her of to-morrow, as of the happiest day of my life. 'We have the licence, Madam—And you must excuse me, that I cannot let you go hence till I have tried every way I can try, to obtain your forgiveness.'

'And am I then' [With a kind of frantick wildness] 'to be detained a prisoner in this horrid house; am I, Sir?—Take care! Take care!' holding up her hand, menacing, 'how you make me desperate! If I fall, though by my own hand, inquisition will be made for my blood: and be not out in thy plot, Lovelace, if it should be so —Make sure work, I charge thee? dig a hole deep enough to cram in and conceal this unhappy body: for, depend upon it, that some of those, who will not stir to protect me living, will move Heaven and earth to avenge me dead!'

A horrid dear creature!—By my soul, she made me shudder! She had need indeed to talk of her unhappiness in falling into the hands of the only man in the world, who could have used her, as I have used her—She is the only woman in the world, who could have shocked and disturbed me, as she has done.—So we are upon a foot in that respect. And I think I have the worst of it by much: since very little has been my joy; very much my trouble: and her punishment, as she calls it, is over. But when mine will, or what it may be, who can tell?

Here, only recapitulating, (think, then, how I must be affected at the time) I was forced to leave off, and sing a song to myself. I aimed at a lively air; but I croaked rather than sung. And fell into the old dismal Thirtieth of January strain: I hemmed up for a sprightlier note; but it would not do: and at last I ended, like a malefactor, in a dead psalm melody.

Heigh-ho!—I gape like an unfledged kite in it's nest, wanting to swallow a chicken, bobbed at it's mouth by it's marauding dam!

'What a devil ails me!—I can neither think nor write!

'Lie down, pen, for a moment!'

LETTER XLII.

MR LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

THERE is certainly a good deal in the observation, that it costs a man ten times more pains to be wicked, than it would cost him to be good. What a confounded number of contrivances have I had recourse to, in order to carry my point with this charming creature; and, after all, how have I puzzled myself by it; and yet am near tumbling into the pit which it was the end of all my plots to shun! What a happy man had I been with such an excellence, could I have brought my mind to marry when I first prevailed upon her to quit her father's house! But then, as I have often reflected, how had I known, that a but blossoming beauty, who could carry on a private correspondence, and run such risques with a notorious wild fellow, was not prompted by inclination, which one day might give such a free liver as myself, as much pain to reflect upon, as, at the time, it gave me pleasure? Thou remembereſt the host's tale in Arioſto. And thy experience, as well as mine, can furnish out twenty Fiametta's in proof of the imbecillity of the sex.

But to proceed with my narrative.

The dear creature resumed the topick her heart was so firmly fixed upon; and insisted upon quitting the odious house, and that in very high terms.

I urged her to meet me the next day at the altar in either of the two churches mentioned in the licence. And I besought her, whatever were her resolution, to let me debate this matter calmly with her.

If, she said, I would have her give what I desired the least moment's consideration, I must not hinder her from being her own mistress. To what purpose did I ask her consent, if she had not a power over either her own person or actions?

'Will you give me your honour, Madam, if I consent to your quitting a 'house so disagreeable to you?—'

'My honour, Sir!' said the dear creature—'Alas!'—And turned weeping from me with inimitable grace—As if she had said—'Alas!—You have robbed me of my honour!'

I hoped then, that her angry passions were subsiding; but I was mistaken: for, urging her warmly for the day; and that for the sake of our mutual honour, and the honour of both our families; in this high-flown and high-souled strain she answered me.

'And canst thou, Lovelace, be so mean '—as to wish to make a wife of the creature thou hast insulted, dishonoured, 'and abused, as thou hast me? Was it 'necessary to humble me down to the 'low level of thy baseness, before I 'could be a wife meet for thee? Thou 'hadst a father, who was a man of honour: a mother, who deserved a better son. Thou hast an uncle, who is 'no dishonour to the peerage of a kingdom, whose peers are more respectable 'than the nobility of any other country. 'Thou hast other relations also, who may 'be thy boast, thou canst not be theirs— 'And canst thou not imagine, that thou 'hearest them calling upon thee; the 'dead from their monuments; the living from their laudable pride; not to 'dishonour thy ancient and splendid 'house, by entering into wedlock with 'a creature whom thou hast levelled 'with the dirt of the street, and classed 'with the vilest of her sex?'

I extolled her greatness of soul, and her virtue. I execrated myself for my guilt: and told her, how grateful to the manes of my ancestors, as well as to the wishes of the living, the honour I supplicated for would be.

But still she insisted upon being a free agent; of seeing herself in other lodgings before she would give what I urged the least consideration. Nor would she promise me favour even then, or to permit my visits. How then, as I asked her, could I comply, without resolving to lose her for ever?

She put her hand to her forehead often as she talked; and at last, pleading disorder in her head, retired; neither of us satisfied with the other. But she ten times more dissatisfied with me, than I with her.

Dorcas seems to be coming into favour with her.

'What now!—What now!'

MONDAY NIGHT.

How determined is this lady!—Again had she like to have escaped us!—What a fixed resentment!—She only, I find, assumed a little calm, in order to quiet suspicion. She was got down, and actually had unbolted the street-door, before I could get to her; alarmed as I was by Mrs. Sinclair's cook-maid, who was the only one that saw her fly through the passage: yet lightning was not quicker than I.

Again brought I her back to the dining-room, with infinite reluctance on her part. And before her face, ordered a servant to be placed constantly at the bottom of the stairs for the future.

She seemed even choaked with grief and disappointment.

Dorcas was exceedingly assiduous about her; and confidently gave it as her own opinion, that her dear lady should be permitted to go to another lodging, since this was so disagreeable to her: were she to be killed for saying so, she would say it. And was good Dorcas for this afterwards.

But for some time the dear creature was all passion and violence.

'I see, I see,' said she, when I had brought her up, 'what I am to expect 'from your new professions, O vilest of 'men!'

'Have I offered to you, my beloved 'creature, any thing that can justify 'this impatience after a more hopeful 'calm?'

She wrung her hands. She disordered her head-dress. She tore her ruffles. She was in a perfect phrenzy.

I dreaded her returning malady: but entreaty rather exasperating, I affected an angry air.—I bid her expect the worst she had to fear—And was menacing on, in hopes to intimidate her, when, dropping down at my feet—

''Twill be a mercy,' said she, 'the 'highest

'kindest act of mercy you can do, to 'kill me outright upon this spot—This 'happy spot, as I will, in my last mo'ments, call it!'—Then, baring, with still more frantick violence, part of her enchanting neck—'Here, here,' said the soul-harrowing beauty, 'let thy 'pointed mercy enter! And I will thank 'thee, and forgive thee for all the dread'ful past!—With my latest gasp will I 'forgive and thank thee!—Or help me 'to the means, and I will myself put out 'of thy way so miserable a wretch! And 'bless thee for those means!'

'Why all this extravagant passion? 'Why all these exclamations? Have I 'offered any new injury to you, my dear'est life? What a phrenzy is this! Am 'I not ready to make you all the repa'ration that I can make you? Had I not 'reason to hope—'

'No, no, no, no—' half a dozen times, as fast as she could speak.

'Had I not reason to hope, that you 'were meditating upon the means of 'making me happy, and yourself not 'miserable, rather than upon a flight 'so causeless and so precipitate?'

'No, no, no, no,' as before, shaking her head with wild impatience, as resolved not to attend to what I said.

'My resolutions are so honourable, 'if you will permit them to take effect, 'that I need not be solicitous whither 'you go, if you will but permit my visits, 'and receive my vows.—And God is 'my witness, that I bring you not back 'from the door, with any view to your 'dishonour; but the contrary: and this 'moment I will send for a minister to 'put an end to all your doubts and fears.'

'Say this, and say a thousand times 'more, and bind every word with a so'lemn appeal to that God whom thou 'art accustomed to invoke to the truth 'of the vilest falsehoods, and all will still 'be short of what thou hast vowed and 'promised to me. And, were not my 'heart to abhor thee, and to rise against 'thee, for thy perjuries, as it does, I 'would not, I tell thee once more, I 'would not, bind my soul in covenant 'with such a man, for a thousand 'worlds!'

'Compose yourself, however, Ma'dam; for your own sake, compose your'self. Permit me to raise you up; ab'horred as I am of your soul!

'Nay, if I must not touch you'— for she wildly slapt my hands; but with such a sweet passionate air, her bosom heaving and throbbing as she looked up to me, that although I was most sincerely enraged, I could with transport have prest'ed her to mine.

'If I must not touch you, I will not. '—But depend upon it,'—[and I assum'ed the sternest air I could assume, to try what that would do—'depend upon 'it, Madam, that this is not the way to 'avoid the evils you dread. Let me do 'what I will, I cannot be used worse—'Dorcas, be gone!'

She arose, Dorcas being about to withdraw; and wildly caught hold of her arm:—'O Dorcas! If thou art of mine 'own sex, leave me not, I charge thee!' —Then quitting Dorcas, down she threw herself upon her knees, in the furthermost corner of the room, clasping a chair with her face laid upon the bottom of it!—'O where can I be safe?—'Where—where can I be safe, from this 'man of violence?'

This gave Dorcas an opportunity to confirm herself in her lady's confidence: the wench threw herself at my feet, while I seemed in violent wrath; and, embracing my knees, 'Kill me, Sir—kill 'me, if you please!—I must throw my'self in your way, to save my lady. I 'beg your pardon, Sir—But you must 'be set on!—God forgive the mischief-'makers!—But your own heart, if left 'to itself, would not permit these things! '—Spare, however, Sir!—spare my la'dy, I beseech you!'—bustling on her knees about me, as if I were intending to approach her lady, had I not been restrained by her.

This, humoured by me—'Be gone, 'devil!—Officious devil, be gone!'—startled the dear creature; who, snatching up hastily her head from the chair, and as hastily popping it down again in terror, hit her nose, I suppose, against the edge of the chair; and it gushed out with blood, running in a stream down her bosom; she herself too much affrighted to heed it!

Never was mortal man in such terror and agitation as I; for I instantly concluded, that she had stabbed herself with some concealed instrument.

I ran to her in a wild agony—For Dorcas was frighted out of all her mock interposition.

'What have you done!—O what have 'you done!—Look up to me, my dearest 'life!—Sweet injured innocence, look 'up to me!—What have you done!—'Long will I not survive you!'—And I was upon the point of drawing my sword to dispatch myself, when I discovered—[What an unmanly blockhead does this charming creature make me at her pleasure!]

fame!]—that all I apprehended was but a bloody nose, which, as far as I know, (for it could not be stopped in a quarter of an hour) may have saved her head and her intellects.

But I see by this scene, that the sweet creature is but a pretty coward at bottom; and that I can terrify her out of her virulence against me, whenever I put on sternness and anger. But then, as a qualifier to the advantage this gives me over her, I find myself to be a coward too, which I had not before suspected, since I was capable of being so easily terrified by the apprehensions of her offering violence to herself.

LETTER XLIII.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

BUT with all this dear creature's resentment against me, I cannot, for my heart, think but she will get all over, and consent to enter the pale with me. Were she even to die to-morrow, and to know she should, would not a woman of her sense, of her punctilio, and in her situation, and of so proud a family, rather die married, than otherwise?—No doubt but she would; although she were to hate the man ever so heartily. If so, there is now but one man in the world whom she can have—And that is me.

Now I talk [Familiar writing is but talking, Jack] thus glibly of entering the pale, thou wilt be ready to question me, I know, as to my intentions on this head.

As much of my heart, as I know of it myself, will I tell thee.—When I am from her, I cannot still help hesitating about marriage; and I even frequently resolve against it, and determine to press my favourite scheme for cohabitation. But when I am with her, I am ready to say, to swear, and to do, whatever I think will be most acceptable to her: and were a parson at hand, I should plunge at once, no doubt of it, into the state.

I have frequently thought, in common cases, that it is happy for many giddy fellows, [There are giddy fellows, as well as giddy girls, Jack; and perhaps those are as often drawn in, as those] that ceremony and parade are necessary to the irrevocable solemnity; and that there is generally time for a man to recollect himself in the space between the heated over-night, and the cooler next morning; or I know not who could escape the sweet gypsies, whose fascinating powers are so much aided by our own raised imaginations.

'A wife at any time,' I used to say, I had ever confidence and vanity enough to think, that no woman breathing could deny her hand, when I held out mine. I am confoundedly mortified to find, that this lady is able to hold me at bay, and to refuse all my honest vows.

What force [Allow me a serious reflection, Jack: it will be put down! What force] have evil habits upon the human mind! when we enter upon a devious course, we think we shall have it in our power when we will to return to the right path. But it is not so, I plainly see: for, who can acknowledge with more justice this dear creature's merits, and his own errors, than I? Whose regret, at times, can be deeper than mine, for the injuries I have done her? Whose resolutions to repair those injuries stronger?—Yet how transitory is my penitence!—How am I hurried away—Canst thou tell by what?—O devil of youth, and devil of intrigue, how do you mislead me!—How often do we end in occasions for the deepest remorse, what we begin in wantonness!

At the present writing, however, the turn of the scale is in behalf of matrimony—For I despair of carrying with her my favourite point.

The lady tells Dorcas, that her heart is broken; and that she shall live but a little while. I think nothing of that, if we marry. In the first place, she knows not what a mind unapprehensive will do for her, in a state to which all the sex look forward with high satisfaction. How often have the whole sacred conclave been thus deceived in their choice of a pope; not considering, that the new dignity is of itself sufficient to give new life! A few months heart's ease will give my charmer a quite different notion of things: and I dare say, as I have heretofore said, 'Once married, 'and I am married for life.'

I will allow, that her pride, in one sense, has suffered abasement: but her triumph is the greater in every other. And while I can think that all her trials are but additions to her honour, and that I have laid the foundations of her glory in my own shame, can I be called cruel, if I am not affected with her grief as some men would be?

And for what should her heart be broken? Her will is unviolated—At present, however, her will is unviolated. The destroying of good habits, and the introducing of bad, to the corrupting of the all whole heart, is the violation. That her will is not to be corrupted, that her mind is not to be debased, she has hitherto unquestionably proved. And if she give cause for further trials, and hold fast her integrity; what ideas will she have to dwell upon, that will be able to corrupt her morals? What vestigia, what remembrances, but such as will inspire abhorrence of the attempter?

What nonsense then to suppose, that such a mere notional violation as she has suffered, should be able to cut asunder the strings of life?

Her religion, married, or not married, will set her above making such a trifling accident, such an involuntary suffering, fatal to her.

Such considerations as these, they are, that support me against all apprehension of bugbear consequences: and I would have them have weight with thee; who art such a doughty advocate for her. And yet I allow thee this; that she really makes too much of it: takes it too much to heart. To be sure she ought to have forgot it by this time, except the charming, charming consequence happen, that still I am in hopes will happen, were I to proceed no further. And, if she apprehend this herself, then has the dear ever-nice soul some reason for taking it so much to heart: and yet would not, I think, refuse to legitimate.

O Jack! had I an imperial diadem, I swear to thee, that I would give it up, even to my enemy, to have one charming boy by this lady. And should she escape me, and no such effect follow, my revenge on her family, and, in such a case, on herself, would be incomplete, and I should reproach myself as long as I lived.

Were I to be sure, that this foundation is laid, [And why may I not hope it is?] I should not doubt to have her still (should she withstand her day of grace) on my own conditions: nor should I, if it were so, question that revived affection in her, which a woman seldom fails to have for the father of her first child, whether born in wedlock, or not.

And pr'ythee, Jack, see in this my ardent hope, a distinction in my favour from other rakes; who, almost to a man, follow their inclinations without troubling themselves about consequences. In imitation, as one would think, of the strutting villain of a bird, which from feathered lady to feathered lady pursues his imperial pleasures, leaving it to his sleek paramours to hatch the genial product in holes and corners of their own finding out.

THE HISTORY OF CLARISSA HARLOWE.

VOLUME THE SIXTH.

LETTER I.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

TUESDAY MORN. JUNE 20.

WELL, Jack, now are we upon another foot together. This dear creature will not let me be good. She is now authorizing all my plots by her own example.

Thou muſt be partial in the higheſt degree, if now thou blameſt me for reſuming my former ſchemes, ſince in that caſe I ſhall but follow her clue. No forced conſtruction of her actions do I make on this occaſion, in order to juſtify a bad cauſe or a worſe intention. A ſlight pretence, indeed, ſerved the wolf, when he had a mind to quarrel with the lamb; but this is not now my caſe.

For here, [Wouldſt thou have thought it?] taking advantage of Dorcas's compaſſionate temper, and of ſome warm expreſſions, which the tender-hearted wench let fall againſt the cruelty of men; and wiſhing to have it in her power to ſerve her; has ſhe given her the following note, ſigned by her maiden-name: for ſhe has thought fit, in poſitive and plain words, to own to the pitying Dorcas, that ſhe is not married.

'MONDAY, JUNE 19. ....

I The underwritten do hereby promiſe, that,
'on my coming into poſſeſſion of my own
'eſtate, I will provide for Dorcas Martin-
'dale in a gentlewoman-like manner, in my
'own houſe: or, if I do not ſoon obtain that
'poſſeſſion, or ſhould firſt die, I do hereby
'bind myſelf, my executors, and adminiſtra-
'tors, to pay to her, or her order, during
'the term of her natural life, the ſum of five 'pounds on each of the four uſual quarterly
'days in the year; that is to ſay, twenty
'pounds by the year; on condition that ſhe
'faithfully aſſiſt me in my eſcape from an ille-
'gal confinement, under which I now labour.
'The firſt quarterly payment to commence
'and be payable at the end of three months
'immediately following the day of my deliver-
'ance. And I do alſo promiſe to give her,
'as a teſtimony of my honour in the caſe, a
'diamond-ring, which I have ſhewed her.
'Witneſs my hand, this nineteenth day of 'June, in the year above-written.

'CLARISSA HARLOWE.'

Now, Jack, what terms wouldſt thou have me to keep with ſuch a ſweet corruptreſs?—Seeſt thou not how ſhe hates me?—Seeſt thou not, that ſhe is reſolved never to forgive me?—Seeſt thou not, however, that ſhe muſt diſgrace herſelf in the eye of the world, if ſhe actually ſhould eſcape?—That ſhe muſt be ſubjected to infinite diſtreſs and hazard? For whom has ſhe to receive and protect her? Yet to determine to riſque all theſe evils! And furthermore to ſtoop to artifice, to be guilty of the reigning vice of the times, of bribery and corruption! O Jack, Jack! ſay not, write not, another word in her favour!

Thou haſt blamed me for bringing her to this houſe: but had I carried her to any other in England, where there would have been one ſervant or inmate capable either of compaſſion or corruption, what muſt have been the conſequence?

But ſeeſt thou not, however, that, in this flimſy contrivance, the dear implacable, like a drowning man, catches at a ſtraw to ſave herſelf!—A ſtraw shall be found to be the refuge she has

LETTER II.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD ESQ.

TUESDAY MORN. 10 O'CLOCK.

VERY ill—Exceeding ill—as Dorcas tells me, in order to avoid seeing me.—And yet the dear soul may be so in her mind. But is not that equivocation? Some one passion predominating, in every human breast, breaks through principle, and controuls us all. Mine is love and revenge taking turns. Hers is hatred—But this is my consolation, that hatred appeased, is love begun; or love renewed, I may rather say, if love ever had footing here.

But reflections apart, thou seest, Jack, that her plot is beginning to work. To-morrow it is to break out.

I have been abroad, to set on foot a plot of circumvention. All fair now, Belford!

I insisted upon visiting my indisposed fair-one. Dorcas made officious excuses for her. I cursed the wench in her hearing for her impertinence; and stamped, and made a clutter; which was improved into an apprehension to the lady that I would have flung her faithful confidante from the top of the stairs to the bottom.

'He is a violent wretch!—But, Dorcas,' [Dear Dorcas, now it is] 'thou 'shalt have a friend in me to the last 'day of my life.'

And what now, Jack, dost think the name of her good angel is!—Why Dorcas Martindale, Christian and Super, (no more Wykes) as in the promissory note in my former—And the dear creature has bound her to her by the most solemn obligations, besides the tie of interest.

'Whither, Madam, do you design 'to go when you get out of this house?'

'I will throw myself into the first open 'house I can find; and beg protection 'till I can get a coach, or a lodging in 'some honest family.'

'What will you do for cloaths, Ma'dam? I doubt you'll not be able to take 'any away with you, but what you'll 'have on.'

'O, no matter for cloaths, if I can 'but get out of this house.'

'What will you do for money, Ma'dam? I have heard his honour express 'his concern, that he could not prevail 'upon you to be obliged to him, though 'he apprehended that you must be short 'of money.'

'O, I have rings, and other valu'ables. Indeed I have but four gui'neas, and two of them I found lately 'wrapt up in a bit of lace, designed for 'a charitable use: but now, alas! cha'rity begins at home!—But I have one 'dear friend left, if she be living, as I 'hope in God she is! to whom I can be 'obliged, if I want. O Dorcas! I must 'ere now have heard from her if I had 'had fair play.'

'Well, Madam, yours is a hard lot. 'I pity you at my heart!'

'Thank you, Dorcas!—I am un'happy, that I did not think before, that 'I might have confided in thy pity, and 'in thy sex!'

'I pitied you, Madam, often and 'often: but you were always, as I 'thought, diffident of me. And then 'I doubted not but you were married; 'and I thought his honour was unkindly 'used by you. So that I thought it my 'duty to wish well to his honour, rather 'than to what I thought to be your 'humours, Madam. Would to Hea'ven, that I had known before that 'you were not married!—Such a lady! 'Such a fortune! To be so sadly be'trayed!'

'Ah, Dorcas! I was basely drawn 'in! My youth—My ignorance of the 'world—And I have some things to 'reproach myself with, when I look 'back.'

'Lord, Madam, what deceitful crea'tures are these men!—Neither oaths, 'nor vows—I am sure—I am sure!' [and then with her apron she gave her eyes half a dozen hearty rubs] 'I may 'curse the time that I came into this 'house!'

Here was accounting for her bold eyes! And was it not better for Dorcas to give up a house which her lady could not think worse of than she did, in order to gain the reputation of sincerity, than by offering to vindicate it, to make her proffered services suspected?

'Poor Dorcas!—Bless me! how lit'tle do we, who have lived all our time 'in the country, know of this wicked 'town!'

'Had I been able to write,' cried the veteran wench, 'I should certainly have 'given some other near relations I have 'in Wales a little inkling of matters; 'and they would have saved me from '——from——from——'

Her sobs were enough. The apprehensions

hensions of women on such subjects are ever aforehand with speech.

And then, sobbing on, she lifted her apron to her face again. She shewed me how.

'Poor Dorcas!'—Again wiping her own charming eyes.

All love, all compassion, is this dear creature to every-one in affliction, but me.

'And would not an aunt protect her 'kinswoman?—Abominable wretch!'

'I can't—I can't—I can't say, my 'aunt was privy to it. She gave me 'good advice. She knew not for a great 'while that I was—that I was—that I 'was—ugh!—ugh!—ugh!—'

'No more, no more, good Dorcas—'What a world do we live in!—What a 'house am I in!—But come, don't 'weep:' (though she herself could not forbear) 'my being betrayed into it, 'though to my own ruin, may be a 'happy event for thee: and if I live, it 'shall.'

'I thank you, my good lady,' blubbering. 'I am sorry, very sorry, you 'have had so hard a lot. But it may 'be the saving of my soul, if I can get to 'your ladyship's house. Had I but known 'that your ladyship was not married, I 'would have eat my own flesh, before, 'before, before——'

Dorcas sobbed and wept. The lady sighed and wept also.

But now, Jack, for a serious reflection upon the premises.

How will the good folks account for it, that Satan has such faithful instruments, and that the bond of wickedness is a stronger bond than the ties of virtue; as if it were the nature of the human mind to be villainous? For here, had Dorcas been good, and been tempted as she was tempted to any-thing evil, I make no doubt but she would have yielded to the temptation.

And cannot our fraternity in an hundred instances give proof of the like predominance of vice over virtue? And that we have risqued more to serve and promote the interests of the former, than ever a good man did to serve a good man or a good cause? For have we not been prodigal of life and fortune? Have we not defied the civil magistrate upon occasion? And have we not attempted rescues, and dared all things, only to extricate a pounded profligate?

Whence, Jack, can this be?

O! I have it, I believe. The vicious are as bad as they can be; and do the devil's work without holding; while he is continually spreading nets for the others; and, like a skilful angler, suiting his baits to the fish he angles for.

Nor let even honest people, so called, blame poor Dorcas for her fidelity in a bad cause. For does not the general, who implicitly serves an ambitious prince in his unjust designs upon his neighbours, or upon his own oppressed subjects; and even the lawyer, who, for the sake of a paltry fee, undertakes to whiten a black cause, and to defend it against one he knows to be good; do the very same thing as Dorcas? And are they not both every whit as culpable? Yet the one shall be dubbed a hero, the other called an admirable fellow, and be contended for by every client, and his double-tongued abilities shall carry him through all the high preferments of the law with reputation and applause.

Well, but what shall be done, since the lady is so much determined on removing!—Is there no way to oblige her, and yet to make the very act subservient to my own views? I fancy such a way may be found out.

I will study for it—

Suppose I suffer her to make an escape? Her heart is in it. If she effect it, the triumph she will have over me upon it will be a counterbalance for all she has suffered.

I will oblige her if I can.

LETTER III.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

TIRED with a succession of fatiguing days, and sleepless nights, and with contemplating the precarious situation I stand in with my beloved, I fell into a profound reverie; which brought on sleep; and that produced a dream; a fortunate dream; which, as I imagine, will afford my working mind the means to effect the obliging double purpose my heart is now once more set upon.

What, as I have often contemplated, is the enjoyment of the finest women in the world, to the contrivance, the bustle, the surprizes, and at last the happy conclusion of a well laid plot!—The charming roundabouts, to come the nearest way home;—the doubts; the apprehensions; the heart-achings; the meditated triumphs—These are the joys that make the blessing dear. For all the rest, what is it?—What but to find an angel in imagination dwindled down to a woman in fact! ——But to my dream.

Methought it was about nine on Wednesday morning, that a chariot with a dowager's arms upon the doors, and in it a grave matronly lady [not unlike mother H. in the face; but in her heart, O how unlike!] ſtopped at a grocer's ſhop, about ten doors on the other ſide of the way, in order to buy ſome groceries: and methought Dorcas, having been out to ſee if the coaſt were clear, for her lady's flight, and if a coach were to be got near the place, eſpied this chariot with the dowager's arms, and this matronly lady: and what, methought, did Dorcas, that ſubtle traitreſs, do, but whip up to the old matronly lady, and lifting up her voice, ſay, 'Good, my lady, permit me one 'word with your ladyſhip!'

'What thou haſt to ſay to me, ſay on,' quoth the old lady; the grocer retiring, and ſtanding aloof, to give Dorcas leave to ſpeak; who, methought, in words like theſe, accoſted the lady:

'You ſeem, Madam, to be a very 'good lady; and here in this neighbour-'hood, at a houſe of no high repute, is 'an innocent lady of rank and fortune, 'beautiful as a May morning, and 'youthful as a roſe-bud, and full as 'ſweet and lovely; who has been trick-'ed thither by a wicked gentleman, 'practiſed in the ways of the town; and 'this very night will ſhe be ruined, if 'ſhe get not out of his hands. Now, O 'lady! if you will extend your compaſ-'ſionate goodneſs to this fair young 'lady, in whom, the moment you be-'hold her, you will ſee cauſe to believe 'all I ſay; and let her but have a place 'in your chariot, and remain in your 'protection for one day only, till ſhe 'can ſend a man and horſe to her rich 'and powerful friends; you may ſave 'from ruin a lady, who has no equal 'for virtue as well as beauty.'

Methought the old lady, moved with Dorcas's ſtory, anſwered and ſaid, 'Haſten, O damſel, who in a happy 'moment art come to put it in my power 'to ſerve the innocent and the virtuous, 'which it has always been my delight 'to do: haſten to this young lady, and 'bid her hie hither to me with all ſpeed; 'and tell her that my chariot ſhall be 'her aſylum: and if I find all that thou 'ſayeſt true, my houſe ſhall be her ſanc-'tuary, and I will protect her from all 'her oppreſſors.'

Hereupon, methought, this traitreſs Dorcas hied back to the lady, and made report of what ſhe had done. And methought, the lady highly approved of Dorcas's proceeding, and bleſſed her for her good thought.

And I liſted up mine eyes, and behold the lady iſſued out of the houſe, and without looking back, ran to the chariot with the dowager's coat upon it; and was received by the matronly lady with open arms, and 'Welcome, welcome, 'welcome, fair young lady, who ſo 'well anſwer the deſcription of the faith-'ful damſel: and I will carry you in-'ſtanty to my houſe, where you ſhall 'meet with all the good uſage your 'heart can wiſh for, till you can ap-'prize your rich and powerful friends 'of your paſt dangers, and preſent eſ-'cape.'

'Thank you, thank you, thank you, 'thank you, worthy, thrice worthy lady, 'who afford ſo kindly your protection 'to a moſt unhappy young creature, 'who has been baſely ſeduced and be-'trayed, and brought to the very brink 'of deſtruction.'

Methought then, the matronly lady, who had, by the time the young lady came to her, bought and paid for the goods ſhe wanted, ordered her coach-man to drive home with all ſpeed; who ſtopped not till he had arrived in a cer-tain ſtreet, not far from Lincoln's Inn Fields, where the matronly lady lived in a ſumptuous dwelling, replete with damſels who wrought curiouſly in muſ-lins, cambricks, and fine linen, and in every good work that induſtrious dam-ſels love to be employed about, except the loom and the ſpinning-wheel.

And methought, all the way the young lady and the old lady rode, and after they came in, till dinner was ready, the young lady filled up the time with the diſmal account of her wrongs and her ſufferings, the like of which was never heard by mortal ear; and this in ſo moving a manner, that the good old lady did nothing but weep, and ſigh, and ſob, and inveigh againſt the arts of wicked men, and againſt that abomin-able Squire Lovelace, who was a plotting villain, methought ſhe ſaid; and, more than that, an unchained Beelzebub.

Methought I was in a dreadful agony, when I found the lady had eſcaped; and in my wrath had like to have ſlain Dor-cas, and our mother, and every one I met. But, by ſome quick tranſition, and ſtrange metamorphoſis, which dreams do not uſually account for, methought, all of a ſudden, this matronly lady was turned turned into the famous mother H. herſelf; and, being an old acquaintance of mother Sinclair, was prevailed upon to aſſiſt in my plot upon the young lady.

Then, methought, followed a ſtrange ſcene; for, mother H. longing to hear more of the young lady's ſtory, and night being come, beſought her to accept of a place in her own bed, in order to have all the talk to themſelves. For, methought, two young nieces of hers had broken in upon them in the middle of the diſmal tale.

Accordingly going early to bed, and the ſad ſtory being reſumed, with as great earneſtneſs on one ſide, as attention on the other, before the young lady had gone far in it, mother H. methought was taken with a fit of the colick; and her tortures encreaſing, was obliged to riſe to get a cordial ſhe uſed to find ſpecifie in this diſorder, to which ſhe was unhappily ſubject.

Having thus riſen, and ſtept to her cloſet, methought ſhe let fall the wax taper in her return; and then, [O metamorphoſis ſtill ſtranger than the former! What unaccountable things are dreams!] coming to bed again in the dark, the young lady, to her infinite aſtoniſhment, grief, and ſurprize, found mother H. turned into a young perſon of the other ſex: and although Lovelace was the abhorred of her ſoul, yet, fearing it was ſome other perſon, it was matter of ſome conſolation to her, when ſhe found it was no other than himſelf, and that ſhe had been ſtill the bedfellow of but one and the ſame man.

A ſtrange promiſcuous huddle of adventures followed, ſcenes perpetually ſhifting; now nothing heard from the lady, but ſighs, groans, exclamations, faintings, dyings—From the gentleman, but vows, promiſes, proteſtations, diſclaimers of purpoſes purſued; and all the gentle and ungentle preſſures of the lover's warfare.

Then, as quick as thought, (for dreams, thou knoweſt, confine not themſelves to the rules of the drama) enſued recoveries, lyings-in, chriſtenings, the ſmiling boy, amply, even in her own opinion, rewarding the ſuffering mother.

Then the grandfather's eſtate yielded up, poſſeſſion taken of it: living very happily upon it: her beloved Norton her companion; Miſs Howe her viſitor; and (admirable! thrice admirable!) enabled to compare notes with her; a charming girl, by the ſame father, to her friend's charming boy; who, as they grow up, in order to conſolidate their mammas friendſhips, (for neither have dreams regard to conſanguinity) were to marry; change names by act of parliament, to enjoy my eſtate—And I know not what of the like incongruous ſtuff.

I awoke, as thou mayeſt believe, in great diſorder, and rejoiced to find my charmer in the next room, and Dorcas honeſt.

Now thou wilt ſay this was a very odd dream. And yet, (for I am a ſtrange dreamer) it is not altogether improbable that ſomething like it may happen; as the pretty ſimpleton has the weakneſs to confide in Dorcas, whom till now ſhe diſliked.

But I forgot to tell thee one part of my dream; and that was, that the next morning, the lady gave way to ſuch tranſports of grief and reſentment, that ſhe was with difficulty diverted from making an attempt upon her own life. But however at laſt was prevailed upon to reſolve to live, and to make the beſt of the matter: a letter, methought, from Captain Tomlinſon helping to pacify her, written to apprize me, that her uncle Harlowe would certainly be at Kentiſh Town on Wedneſday night June 28, the following day, (the 29th) being his birth-day; and be doubly deſirous, on that account, that our nuptials ſhould be then privately ſolemnized in his preſence.

'But is Thurſday the 29th her uncle's 'anniverſary?'—methinks thou aſkeſt.—It is; or elſe the day of celebration ſhould have been earlier ſtill. Three weeks ago I heard her ſay it was; and I have down the birth-day of every one of her family, and the wedding-day of her father and mother. The minuteſt circumſtances are often of great ſervice, in matters of the laſt importance.

And what ſayeſt thou now to my dream?

Who ſays, that ſleeping and waking, I have not fine helps from ſome body, ſome ſpirit rather, as thou'lt be apt to ſay? But no wonder that a Beelzebub has his devilkins to attend his call.

I can have no manner of doubt of ſucceeding in mother H.'s part of the ſcheme; for will the lady (who reſolves to throw herſelf into the firſt houſe ſhe can enter, or to beſpeak the protection of the firſt perſon ſhe meets; and who thinks there can be no danger out of this houſe, equal to what ſhe apprehends from the in it) ſcruple to accept of the chariot of a dowager, accidentally offering? And the lady's protection engaged by her faithful Dorcas, so highly bribed to promote her escape!—And then Mrs. H. has the air and appearance of a venerable matron, and is not such a forbidding devil as Mrs. Sinclair.

The pretty simpleton knows nothing in the world; nor that people who have money, never want assistants in their views, be they what they will. How else could the princes of the earth be so implicitly served as they are, change they hands ever so often, and be their purposes ever so wicked?

If I can but get her to go on with me till Wednesday next week, we shall be settled together pretty quietly by that time. And indeed if she has any gratitude, and has in her the least of her sex's foibles, she must think I deserve her favour, by the pains she has cost me. For dearly do they all love that men should take pains about them and for them.

And here, for the present, I will lay down my pen, and congratulate myself upon my happy invention (since her obstinacy put me once more upon exercising it)—But with this resolution, I think, that, if the present contrivance fail me, I will exert all the faculties of my mind, all my talents, to procure for myself a legal right to her favour, and that in defiance of all my antipathies to the married state; and of the suggestions of the great devil out of the house, and of his secret agents in it—Since, if now she is not to be prevailed upon, or drawn in, it will be in vain to attempt her further.

LETTER IV.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

TUESDAY NIGHT, JUNE 20.

NO admittance yet to my charmer! She is very ill—in a violent fever, Dorcas thinks. Yet will have no advice.

Dorcas tells her how much I am concerned at it.

But again let me ask, Does this lady do right to make herself ill, when she is not ill? For my own part, libertine as people think me, when I had occasion to be sick, I took a dose of ipecacuanha, that I might not be guilty of a falsehood; and most heartily sick was I; as she, who then pitied me, full well knew. But here to pretend to be very ill, only to get an opportunity to run away, in order to avoid forgiving a man who has offended her, how unchristian!—If good folks allow themselves in these breaches of a known duty, and in these presumptuous contrivances to deceive, who, Belford, shall blame us?

I have a strange notion, that the matronly lady will be certainly at the grocer's shop at the hour of nine to-morrow morning: for Dorcas heard me tell Mrs. Sinclair, that I should go out at eight precisely; and then she is to try for a coach: and if the dowager's chariot should happen to be there, how lucky will it be for my charmer! How strangely will my dream be made out!

I HAVE just received a letter from Captain Tomlinson. Is it not wonderful? For that was part of my dream.

I shall always have a prodigious regard to dreams henceforward. I know not but I may write a book upon that subject; for my own experience will furnish out a great part of it. Glanville of witches, Baxter's History of Spirits and Apparitions, and the Royal Pedant's Demonology, will be nothing at all to Lovelace's Reveries.

The letter is just what I dreamed it to be. I am only concerned that uncle John's anniversary did not happen three or four days sooner; for should any new misfortune befal my charmer, she may not be able to support her spirits so long as till Thursday in the next week. Yet it will give me the more time for new expedients, should my present contrivance fail; which I cannot however suppose.

'TO ROBERT LOVELACE, ESQ.

'MONDAY, JUNE 19.

'DEAR SIR,

'I CAN now return you joy, for the 'joy you have given me, as well as my 'dear friend Mr. Harlowe, in the news 'of his beloved niece's happy recovery; 'for he is determined to comply with 'her wishes and yours, and to give her to 'you with his own hand.

'As the ceremony has been necessarily delayed by reason of her illness, and 'as Mr. Harlowe's birth-day is on 'Thursday the 29th of this instant June, 'when he enters into the seventy-fourth 'year of his age; and as time may be 'wanted to complete the dear lady's 'recovery; he is very desirous that the 'marriage shall be solemnized upon it; 'that he may afterwards have double 'joy on that day to the end of his life.

'For this purpose he intends to set 'out privately, so as to be at Kentish-

'Town

'Town on Wednesday se'nnight in the 'evening.

'All the family used, he says, to meet 'to celebrate it with him; but as they 'are at present in too unhappy a situa'tion for that, he will give out, that, 'not being able to bear the day at home, 'he has resolved to be absent for two or 'three days.

'He will set out on horseback, at'tended only with one trusty servant, for 'the greater privacy. He will be at the 'most creditable-looking publick house 'there, expecting you both next morn'ing, if he hear nothing from me to 'prevent him. And he will go to town 'with you after the ceremony is per'formed, in the coach he supposes you 'will come in.

'He is very desirous, that I should be 'present on the occasion. But this I 'have promised him, at his request, that 'I will be up before the day in order to 'see the settlements executed, and every'thing properly prepared.

'He is very glad you have the licence ready.

'He speaks very kindly of you, Mr. 'Lovelace; and says, that, if any of 'the family stand out after he has seen 'the ceremony performed, he will se'parate from them, and unite himself 'to his dear niece and her interests.

'I owned to you, when in town last, 'that I took slight notice to my dear 'friend of the misunderstanding between 'you and his niece; and that I did this, 'for fear the lady should have shewn any 'little discontent in his presence, had I 'been able to prevail upon him to go 'up in person, as then was doubtful. 'But I hope nothing of that discontent 'remains now.

'My absence, when your messenger 'came, must excuse me for not writing 'by him.

'Be pleased to make my most respect'ful compliments acceptable to the ad'mirable lady, and believe me to be 'your most faithful and obedient servant,

'ANTONY TOMLINSON.'

This letter I sealed, and broke open. It was brought, thou mayest suppose, by a particular messenger; the seal such a one as the writer need not be ashamed of. I took care to enquire after the captain's health, in my beloved's hearing; and it is now ready to be produced as a paciher, according as she shall take on, or resent, if the two metamorphoses happen pursuant to my wonderful dream; as having great faith in dreams, I dare say they will.—I think it will not be amiss, in changing my cloathes, to send this letter of the worthy captain up to my beloved's way.

LETTER V.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

WED. NOON, JUNE 21.

WHAT shall I say now?—I, who but a few hours ago had such faith in dreams, and had proposed out of hand to begin my treatise of Dreams sleeping and Dreams waking, and was pleasing myself with the dialogues between the old matronly lady, and the young lady; and with the two metamorphoses, (absolutely assured that every-thing would happen as my dream chalked it out;) shall never more depend upon those flying follies, those illusions of a fancy depraved, and run mad.

Thus confoundedly have matters happened.

I went out at eight o'clock in high good humour with myself, in order to give the sought-for opportunity to the plotting-mistress and corrupted maid; only ordering Will to keep a good look-out for fear his lady should mistrust my plot, or mistake a hackney-coach for the dowager lady's chariot. But first I sent to know how she did; and received for answer, 'Very ill:—had a very 'bad night:' which latter was but too probable: since this I know, that people who have plots in their heads as seldom have as deserve good ones.

I desired a physician should be called in; but was refused.

I took a walk in St. James's Park, congratulating myself all the way on my rare inventions: then, impatient, I took a coach, with one of the windows quite up, the other almost up, playing at bopeep at every chariot I saw pass in my way to Lincoln's Inn Fields: and when arrived there, I sent the coachman to desire any one of mother H.'s family to come to me to the coach-side, not doubting but I should have intelligence of my fair fugitive there; it being then half an hour after ten.

A servant came, who gave me to understand, that the matronly lady was just returned by herself in the chariot.

Frighted out of my wits, I alighted, and heard from the mother's own mouth, that Dorcas had engaged her to protect the lady; but came to tell her afterwards, that she had changed her mind, and would not quit the house.

Quite

Miss Howe, thus furnished, not knowing what might have happened, hereupon ordered the coachman to hasten away to our mother's, observing here in an instant, the first word I asked, was, If the lady were safe?

Mrs. Howe gives here a very circumstantial relation of all that passed between the lady and Dorcas. But as he could only learn at last the motives for refusing to go off, before Dorcas told her, that she had engaged for her the protection of the downstairs lady, it is thought proper to omit his relation, and to supply it by some memoranda of the lady's. But it is first necessary to account for the occasion on which these memoranda were made.

The reader may remember, that in the letter written to Miss Howe, on her escape to Hampstead, she promises to give her the particulars of her flight at leisure.

She had indeed thoughts of continuing her account of every thing that had passed between her and Mr. Lovelace, since her last narrative letter. But the uncertainty she was in from that time, with the execrable treatment she met with on her being detected back again; followed by a week's delirium; had hitherto hindered her from effectuating her intention. But, nevertheless, having it still in her view to perform her promise as soon as she had opportunity, she made minutes of every-thing as it passed, in order to help her memory:—which, as she observes in one place, she could less trust to since her late disorders than before.

In these minutes, or book of memoranda, she observes, That having apprehensions, that Dorcas might be a traitress, she would have got away while she was gone out to see for a coach; and actually slid down-stairs with that intent. But that, seeing Mrs. Sinclair in the entry, [whom Dorcas had planted there while she went out] she speeded up again, unseen.

She then went up to the dining-room, and found the letter of Captain Tomlinson: on which she observes in her memorandum-book as follows:

'How am I puzzled now!—He might 'leave this letter on purpose: none of 'the other papers left with it being of 'any consequence. What is the alternative!—To stay, and be the wife of 'the vilest of men—How my heart re'fits that!—To attempt to get off, and 'fail, ruin inevitable! Dorcas may be'tray me!—I doubt she is still his imple'ment!—At his going out, he whisper'ed her, as I saw, unobserved—In a 'very familiar manner too—Never 'fear, Sir,' with a curtsey.

'In her agreeing to contrive at my e'cape, she provided not for her own 'safety, if I got away: yet had reason, 'in that case, to expect his vengeance. 'And wants not forethought:—To have 'taken her with me, was to be in the 'power of her intelligence, if a faithless 'creature.—Let me, however, though 'I part not with my caution, keep my 'charity!—Can there be any woman 'so vile to a woman!—O yes! Mrs. 'Sinclair: her aunt.—The Lord deli'ver me!—But, alas! I have put my'self out of the course of his protection 'by the natural means—And am alrea'dy ruined! A father's curse likewise 'against me! Having made vain all my 'friends cautions and solicitudes, I must 'not hope for miracles in my favour!

'If I do escape, what may become of 'me, a poor, helpless, deserted creature! '—Helpless from sex!—From circum'stances!—Exposed to every danger!—'Lord protect me!

'His vile man not gone with him!—'Lurking hereabouts, no doubt, to 'watch my steps!—I will not go away 'by the chariot, however.

'That this chariot should come so 'opportunely! So like his many oppor'tunelies!—That Dorcas should have 'the sudden thought!—Should have the 'courage with the thought, to address a 'lady in behalf of an absolute stranger 'to that lady! That the lady should so 'readily consent!—Yet the transaction 'between them to take up so much time, 'their distance in degree considered: for, 'arduous as the case was, and precious 'as the time, Dorcas was gone above 'half an hour!—Yet the chariot was 'said to be ready at a grocer's not many 'doors off!

'Indeed some elderly ladies are talka'tive: and there are, no doubt, some 'good people in the world.

'But that it should chance to be a 'widow lady, who could do what she 'pleased!—That Dorcas should know 'her to be so by the Lozenge!—Per'sons in her station not usually so know'ing, I believe, in heraldry.

'Yet some may! for servants are fond 'of deriving collateral honours and dis'tinctions, as I may call them, from the 'quality, or people of rank, whom they 'serve. But this sly servant not gone 'with him!—Then this letter of Tom'linson!—

'Although I am resolved never to

'have

'have this wretch, yet, may I not throw 'myself into my uncle's protection at Kentish 'Town or Highgate, if I cannot escape be-'fore; and so get clear of him? May not 'the evil I know, be less than what I 'may fall into, if I can avoid further 'villainy? Further villainy he has not 'yet threatened; freely and justly as I 'have treated him!—I will not go, I 'think. At least, unless I can send this 'fellow out of the way.

'The fellow a villain! The wench, 'I doubt, a vile wench. At last con-'cerned for her own safety. Plays off 'and on about a coach.

'All my hopes of getting off, at pre-'sent, over!—Unhappy creature! to 'what further evils art thou reserved! 'O how my heart rises, at the necessity 'I must still be under to see and converse 'with so very vile a man!'

LETTER VI.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

WEDNESDAY AFTERNOON.

DISAPPOINTED in her meditated escape; obliged, against her will, to meet me in the dining-room; and perhaps apprehensive of being upbraided for her art in feigning herself ill; I expected that the dear perverse would begin with me with spirit and indignation. But I was in hopes, from the gentleness of her natural disposition—from the consideration which I expected from her on her situation—from the contents of the letter of Captain Tomlinson, which Dorcas told me she had seen—and from the time she had had to cool and reflect since she last admitted me to her presence, that she would not have carried it so strongly through as she did.

As I entered the dining-room, I congratulated her and myself upon her sudden recovery. And would have taken her hand, with an air of respectful tenderness: but she was resolved to begin where she left off.

She turned from me, drawing in her hand, with a repulsing and indignant aspect—'I meet you once more,' said she, 'because I cannot help it. What have 'you to say to me? Why am I to be 'thus detained against my will?'

With the utmost solemnity of speech and behaviour, I urged the ceremony. I saw I had nothing else for it. I had a letter in my pocket, I said, [feeling for it, although I had not taken it from the table where I left it in the same room] the contents of which, if [illegible] would make us both happy. [illegible] loth to shew it to her before, [illegible] I hoped to prevail upon her to be mine sooner than the day mentioned in it.

I felt for it in all my pockets, watching her eye mean time, which I saw glance towards the table where it lay.

I was uneasy that I could not find it.—At last, directed again by her sly eye, I spied it on the table at the further end of the room.

With joy I fetched it. 'Be pleased 'to read that letter, Madam;' with an air of satisfied-assurance.

She took it, and cast her eye over it, in such a careless way, as made it evident, that she had read it before: and then unthankfully tossed it into the window-seat before her.

I urged her to bless me to-morrow, or Friday morning: at least, that she would not render vain her uncle's journey, and kind endeavours to bring about a reconciliation among us all.

'Among us all,' repeated she, with an air equally disdainful and incredulous. 'O Lovelace, thou art surely nearly al-'lied to the grand Deceiver, in thy en-'deavour to suit temptations to incli-'nations!—But what honour, what 'faith, what veracity, were it possible 'that I could enter into parley with 'thee on this subject, (which it is not) 'may I expect from such a man as thou 'hast shewn thyself to be?'

I was touched to the quick. 'A lady 'of your perfect character, Madam, 'who has feigned herself sick, on pur-'pose to avoid seeing the man who adore-'ed her, should not—'

'I know what thou wouldst say,' interrupted she—'Twenty and twenty base 'things, that my soul would have been 'above being guilty of, and which I 'have despised myself for, have I been 'brought into by the infection of thy 'company, and by the necessity thou 'hast laid me under, of appearing mean. 'But I thank God, destitute as I am, 'that I am not, however, sunk so low, 'as to wish to be thine.'

'I, Madam, as the injurer, ought to 'have patience. It is for the injured to 'reproach. But your uncle is not in a 'plot against you, it is to be hoped. 'There are circumstances in the letter 'you have cast your eyes over—'

Again she interrupted me—'Why, 'once more I ask you, am I detained in 'this house?—Do not I see myself sur-'rounded by wretches, who, though they 'wear the habit of my sex, may yet, as for as I know, lie in wait for my perdition?'

She would be very loth, I said, that Mrs. Sinclair and her nieces should be called up to vindicate themselves, and their house.

'Would but they kill me, let them come, and welcome. I will bless the hand that will strike the blow!—Indeed I will.'

'Tis idle, very idle, to talk of dying. Mere young-lady talk, when controuled by those they hate. But let me beseech you, dearest creature—

'Beseech me nothing. Let me not be detained thus against my will!—Unhappy creature, that I am!' said she, in a kind of phrenzy, wringing her hands at the same time, and turning from me, her eyes lifted up—'Thy curse, O my cruel father, seems to be now in the height of its operation!—My weakened mind is full of forebodings, that I am in the way of being a lost creature as to both worlds!—Blessed, blessed God,' said she, falling on her knees, 'save me, O save me, from myself, and from this man!'

I sunk down on my knees by her, excessively affected—'O that I could recal yesterday!—Forgive me, my dearest creature, forgive what is past, as it cannot now but by one way be retrieved. Forgive me only on this condition—That my future faith and honour—'

She interrupted me, rising—'If you mean to beg of me never to seek to avenge myself by law, or by an appeal to my relations, to my cousin Morden in particular, when he comes to England—'

'D—n the law,' rising also, [She started] 'and all those to whom you talk of appealing!—I defy both the one and the other—All I beg is YOUR forgiveness; and that you will, on my unfeigned contrition, re-establish me in your favour.'

'O no, no, no!' lifting up her clasped hands, 'I never, never will—never, never can forgive you!—And it is a punishment worse than death to me, that I am obliged to meet you, or to see you!'

'This is the last time, my dearest life, that you will ever see me in this posture, on this occasion:' and again I kneeled to her. 'Let me hope, that you will be mine next Thursday, your uncle's birth-day, if not before.—Would to Heaven I had never been a villain! Your indignation is not, cannot be greater than my remorse!—And I took hold of her gown, for she was going from me.

'Be remorse thy portion!—For thine own sake, be remorse thy portion!—I never, never will forgive thee!—I never, never will be thine!—Let me retire!—Why kneelest thou to the wretch whom thou hast so vilely humbled?'

'Say but, dearest creature, you will consider—Say but you will take time to reflect upon what the honour of both our families requires of you. I will not rise—I will not permit you to withdraw'—[still holding her gown]—'till you tell me you will consider.—Take this letter. Weigh well your situation, and mine. Say you will withdraw to consider; and then I will not presume to withold you.'

'Compulsion shall do nothing with me. Though a slave, a prisoner, in circumstance, I am no slave in my will!—Nothing will I promise thee—Witheld, compelled—Nothing will I promise thee!'

'Noble creature! But not implacable, I hope!—Promise me but to return in an hour!'

'Nothing will I promise thee!'

'Say but you will see me again this evening!'

'O that I could say—that it were in my power to say—I never will see thee more!—Would to Heaven I never were to see thee more!'

'Passionate beauty!'—still holding her.

'I speak, though with vehemence, the deliberate wish of my heart.—O that I could avoid looking down upon thee, mean groveler, and abject as insulting—Let me withdraw!—My soul is in tumults!—Let me withdraw!'

I quitted my hold to clasp my hands together—'Withdraw, O sovereign of my fate!—Withdraw, if you will withdraw!—My destiny is in your power!—It depends upon your breath!—Your scorn but augments my love!—Your resentment is but too well founded!—But, dearest creature, return, return, with a resolution to bless with pardon and peace your faithful adorer!'

She flew from me. The angel, as soon as she found her wings, flew from me. I, the reptile kneeler, the despicable slave, no more the proud victor, arose; and, retiring, tried to comfort myself, that circumstanced as she is, destitute of friends and fortune; her uncle, moreover, morrower, who is to reconcile all ſo ſoon, (as, I thank my ſtars, ſhe ſtill believes) expected.

O that ſhe would forgive me!—Would ſhe but generouſly forgive me, and receive my vows at the altar, at the inſtant of her forgiving me, that I might not have time to relapſe into my old prejudices!—By my ſoul, Belford, this dear girl gives the lie to all our rakiſh maxims. There muſt be ſomething more than a name in virtue!—I now ſee that there is!—Once ſubdued, always ſubdued—'Tis an egregious faith'ood!—But, oh, Jack! ſhe never was ſubdued. What have I obtained, but an increaſe of ſhame and confuſion!—While her glory has been eſtabliſhed by her ſufferings!

This one merit is, however, left me, that I have laid all her ſex under obligation to me, by putting this noble creature to trials, which, ſo glorioufly ſupported, have done honour to them all.

However—But no more will I add—What a force have evil habits—I will take an airing, and try to fly from myſelf—Do not thou upbraid me on my weak fits—On my contradictory purpoſes—On my irreſolution—And all will be well.

LETTER VII.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

WEDNESDAY NIGHT.

A Man is juſt now arrived from M. Hall, who tells me, that my lord is in a very dangerous way. The gout in his ſtomach to an extreme degree, occaſioned by drinking a great quantity of lemonade.

A man of 8000l. a year to prefer his appetite to his health!—He deſerves to die!—But we have all of us our inordinate paſſions to gratify: and they generally bring their puniſhment along with them.—So witneſſes the nephew, as well as the uncle.

The fellow was ſent upon other buſineſs; but ſtretched his orders a little, to make his court to a ſucceſſor.

I am glad I was not at M. Hall at the time my lord took the grateful doſe. [It was certainly grateful to him at the time.] There are people in the world, who would have had the wickedneſs to ſay, that I had perſuaded him to drink it.

The man ſays, that his lordſhip was ſo bad when he came away, that the family began to talk of ſending for me, in poſt-haſte. As I know the old peer has a good deal of caſh by him, of which he ſeldom keeps account, it behoves me to go down as ſoon as I can. But what ſhall I do with this dear creature the while? To-morrow over, I ſhall, perhaps, be able to anſwer my own queſtion. I am afraid ſhe will make me deſperate.

For here have I ſent to implore her company, and am denied with ſcorn.

I HAVE been ſo happy as to receive, this moment, a third letter from my dear correſpondent Miſs Howe. A little ſevere devil!—It would have broken the heart of my beloved, had it fallen into her hands. I will incloſe a copy of it. Read it here.

'TUESDAY, JUNE 20.

'MY DEAREST MISS HARLOWE,

'AGAIN I venture to write to you, '(almoſt againſt inclination;) and that 'by your former conveyance, little as I 'like it.

'I know not how it is with you. It 'may be bad; and then it would be 'hard to upbraid you, for a ſilence you 'may not be able to help. But if not, 'what ſhall I ſay ſevere enough, that 'you have not anſwered either of my 'laſt letters? The firſt of which [and I 'think it imported you too much to be 'ſilent upon it] you owned the receipt 'of. The other, which was delivered 'into your own hands, was ſo preſſing 'for the favour of a line from you, that 'I am amazed I could not be obliged. '—And ſtill more, that I have not heard 'from you ſince.

'The fellow made ſo ſtrange a ſtory 'of the condition he ſaw you in, and of 'your ſpeech to him, that I know not 'what to conclude from it: only, that 'he is a ſimple, blundering, and yet conceited fellow, who, aiming at deſcription, and the ruſtick wonderful, gives 'an air of bumpkinly romance to all he 'tells. That this is his character, you 'will believe, when you are informed, 'that he deſcribed you in grief exceſſive, yet ſo improved in your perſon 'and features, and ſo roſy, that was his 'word, in your face, and ſo flush-coloured, and ſo plump in your arms, 'that one would conclude you were labouring under the operation of ſome 'malignant poiſon; and ſo much the 'rather, as he was introduced to you, 'when you were upon a couch, from 'which you offered not to riſe, or ſit up.

'Upon my word, Miſs Harlowe, I am

'greatly diſtreſſed upon your account; 'for I muſt be ſo free as to ſay, that, in 'your ready return with your deceiver, 'you have not at all anſwered my ex-'pectations, nor acted up to your own 'character; for Mrs. Townſend tells 'me, from the women at Hampſtead, 'how cheerfully you put yourſelf into 'his hands again: yet, at the time, it 'was impoſſible you ſhould be married!

'Lord, my dear, what pity it is that 'you took ſo much pains to get from the 'man!—But you know beſt!—Some-'times I think it could not be you to 'whom the ruſtick delivered my letter. 'But it muſt too: yet it is ſtrange I 'could not have one line by him—Not 'one!—And yet ſo ſoon well enough to 'go with the wretch back again!

'I am not ſure, that the letter I am 'now writing will come to your hands: 'ſo ſhall not ſay half that I have upon 'my mind to ſay. But if you think it 'worth your while to write to me, pray 'let me know, what fine ladies, his re-'lations, thoſe were, who viſited you at 'Hampſtead, and carried you back again 'ſo joyfully, to a place that I had ſo 'fully warned you—But I will ſay no 'more: at leaſt till I know more: for I 'can do nothing but wonder and ſtand 'amazed.

'Notwithſtanding all the man's baſe-'neſs, 'tis plain there was more than 'a lurking love—Good Heaven!—But 'I have done!—Yet I know not how to 'have done, neither! Yet I muſt—I 'will.

'Only account to me, my dear, for 'what I cannot at all account for: and 'inform me, whether you are really 'married, or not.—And then I ſhall 'know whether there muſt or muſt not, 'be a period ſhorter that that of one 'of our lives, to a friendſhip which has 'hitherto been the pride and boaſt of

'your ANNA HOWE.'

Dorcas tells me, that ſhe has juſt now had a ſearching converſation, as ſhe calls it, with her lady. She is willing, ſhe tells the wench, ſtill to place her confi-dence in her. Dorcas hopes ſhe has re-aſſured her; but wiſhes me not to de-pend upon it. Yet Captain Tomlinſon's letter muſt aſſuredly weigh with her. I ſent it juſt now by Dorcas, deſiring her to re-peruſe it. And it was not re-turned me, as I feared it would be. And that's a good ſign, I think.

I ſay, I think, and I think, for this charming creature, entangled as I am in my own invention, puzzles me ten thou-ſand times more than I her.

LETTER VIII.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

TUESDAY NOON, JUNE 22.

LET me periſh, if I know what to make either of myſelf or of this ſur-prizing creature—Now calm, now tem-peſtuous—But I know thou loveſt not anticipation any more than I.

At my repeated requeſts, ſhe met me at ſix this morning. She was ready dreſſed; for ſhe has not had her cloaths off ever ſince ſhe declared, that they never more ſhould be off in this houſe. And charmingly ſhe looked, with all the diſadvantages of a three hours vi-olent head-ache, (for Dorcas told me that ſhe had been really ill) no reſt, and eyes red, and ſwelled with weeping. Strange to me, that thoſe charming foun-tains have not been long ago exhauſted! But ſhe is a woman. And I believe anatomiſts allow, that women have more watery heads than men.

'Well, my deareſt creature, I hope 'you have now thoroughly conſidered 'of the contents of Captain Tomlin-'ſon's letter. But as we are thus early 'met, let me beſeech you to make this 'my happy day.'

She looked not favourably upon me. A cloud hung upon her brow at her en-trance: but as ſhe was going to anſwer me, a ſtill greater ſolemnity took poſ-ſeſſion of her charming features.

Your air, and your countenance, my 'beloved creature, are not propitious to 'me. Let me beg of you, before you 'ſpeak, to forbear all further recrimi-'nations: for already I have ſuch a 'ſenſe of my vileneſs to you, that I 'know not how to bear the reproaches 'of my own mind.'

'I have been endeavouring,' ſaid ſhe, 'ſince I am not permitted to avoid you, to 'obtain a compoſure which I never more 'expected to ſee you in. How long I 'may enjoy it, I cannot tell. But I 'hope I ſhall be enabled to ſpeak to you 'without that vehemence which I ex-'preſſed yeſterday, and could not help 'it.'

'After a pauſe, (for I was all atten-'tion) thus ſhe proceeded:

'It is eaſy for me, Mr. Lovelace, to 'ſee that further violences are intended 'me, if I comply not with your purpoſes, 'whatever they are. I will ſuppoſe

'them

'them to be what you so solemnly pro'fess they are. But I have told you as 'solemnly, my mind, that I never will,
'that I never can, be yours; nor if so,
'any man's upon earth. All venge'ance, nevertheless, for the wrongs you
'have done me, I disclaim. I want but 'to slide into some obscure corner, to 'hide myself from you, and from every'one, who once loved me. The desire
'lately so near my heart, of a recon-
'ciliation with my friends, is much abat-
'ed. They shall not receive me now,
'if they would. Sunk in my own eyes,
'I now think myself unworthy of their 'favour. In the anguish of my soul,
'therefore, I conjure you, Lovelace,' [tears in her eyes] 'to leave me to my 'fate. In doing so, you will give me
'a pleasure, the highest I now can 'know.'

'Whither, my dearest life——'

'No matter whither. I will leave to 'Providence, when I am out of this 'house, the direction of my future steps.
'I am sensible enough of my destitute
'condition. I know that I have not 'now a friend in the world. Even Miss
'Howe has given me up—or you are—
'But I would fain keep my temper!—
'By your means I have lost them all—
'And you have been a barbarous ene-
'my to to me. You know you have.'

She paused.

I could not speak.

'The evils I have suffered,' proceeded she, [turning from me] 'however
'irreparable, are but temporary evils.
'Leave me to my hopes of being enabled 'to obtain the Divine forgiveness, for
'the offence I have been drawn in to 'give to my parents, and to virtue; that
'so I may avoid the evils that are more
'than temporary. This is now all I have 'to wish for. And what is it that I de'mand, that I have not a right to, and 'from which it is an illegal violence to
'withold me?'

It was impossible for me, I told her plainly, to comply. I besought her to give me her hand as this very day. I could not live without her. I communicated to her my lord's illness, as a reason why I wished not to stay for her uncle's anniversary. I besought her to bless me with her consent; and after the ceremony was passed, to accompany me down to Berks. 'And thus, my dearest 'life,' said I, 'will you be freed from a 'house, to which you have conceived so 'great an antipathy.'

This, thou wilt own, was a princely offer. And I was resolved to be as good as my word. I thought I had killed, my conscience, as I told thee, Belford, some time ago. But conscience, I find, though it may be temporarily stifled, cannot die; and when it dare not speak aloud, will whisper. And at this instant, I thought I felt the revived varletess (on but a slight retrograde motion) writhing round my pericardium like a serpent; and in the action of a dying one (collecting all it's force into it's head) fix it's plaguy fangs into my heart.

She hesitated, and looked down as if irresolute. And this set my heart up at my mouth. And believe me, I had instantly popt in upon me, in imagination, an old spectacled parson, with a white suplice thrown over a black habit, [A fit emblem of the halcyon office, which, under a benign appearance, often introduces a life of storms and tempests] whining and snuffling through his nose the irrevocable ceremony.

'I hope, now, my dear life,' said I, snatching her hand, and pressing it to my lips, 'that your silence bodes me 'good. Let me, my beloved creature, 'have but your tacit consent; and this 'moment I will step out and engage a 'minister.' And then I promised how much my whole future life should be devoted to her commands, and that I would make her the best and tendrest of husbands.

At last, turning to me, 'I have told 'you my mind, Mr. Lovelace, said she. 'Think you, that I could thus solemn-'ly—' Here she stopt—'I am too much 'in your power,' proceeded she; 'your 'prisoner, rather than a person free to 'chuse for myself, or to say what I will 'do or be—But, as a testimony that you 'mean me well, let me instantly quit 'this house; and I will then give you 'such an answer in writing, as best be-'fits my unhappy circumstances.'

'And imaginest thou, fairest,' thought I, 'that this will go down with a Love-'lace? Thou oughtest to have known 'that free-livers, like ministers of state, 'never part with a power put into their 'hands, without an equivalent of twice 'the value.'

I pleaded, that if we joined hands this morning, (if not, to-morrow; if not, on Thursday, her uncle's birth-day, and in his presence) and afterwards, as I had proposed, set out for Berks; we should, of course, quit this house; and, on our return to town, should have in readiness the house I was in treaty for.

She answered me not, but with tears and sighs; fond of believing what I hoped, I imputed

I imputed her silence to the modesty of her sex. 'The dear creature,' (thought I) 'solemnly as she began with me, is 'ruminating, in a sweet suspence, how 'to put into fit words the gentle pur-'poses of her condescending heart.' But, looking in her averted face with a soothing gentleness, I plainly perceived, that it was resentment, and not bashfulness, that was struggling in her bosom.

At last, she broke silence—'I have 'no patience,' said she, 'to find myself 'a slave, a prisoner, in a vile house—'Tell me, Sir, in so many words tell 'me, whether it be, or be not, your in-'tention to permit me to quit it?—To 'permit me the freedom which is my 'birthright as an English subject?'

'Will not the consequence of your 'departure hence be that I shall lose you 'for ever, Madam?—And can I bear 'the thoughts of that?'

She flung from me—'My soul dis-'dains to hold parley with thee,' were her violent words—But I threw myself at her feet, and took hold of her reluctant hand, and began to imprecate, to vow, to promise—But thus the passionate beauty, interrupting me, went on—

'I am sick of thee, MAN!—One con-'tinued string of vows, oaths, and pro-'testations, varied only by time and 'place, fills thy mouth!—Why detain-'est thou me? My heart rises against 'thee, O thou cruel implement of my bro-'ther's causeless vengeance—All I beg of 'thee, is, that thou wilt remit me the 'future part of my father's dreadful 'curse! The temporary part, base and 'ungrateful as thou art! thou hast com-'pleated!'

I was speechless!—Well I might!—Her brother's implement!—James Har-lowe's implement!—Zounds, Jack! what words were these!

I let go her struggling hand. She took two or three turns cross the room, her whole haughty soul in her air. Then approaching me, but in silence, turning from me, and again to me, in a milder voice—'I see thy confusion, Lovelace. 'Or is it thy remorse?—I have but one 'request to make thee—The request so 'often repeated—That thou wilt this 'moment permit me to quit this house. 'Adieu, then, let me say, for ever adieu! 'And mayest thou enjoy that happiness 'in this world, which thou hast robbed 'me of; as thou hast of every friend I 'have in it!'

And saying this, away she flung, leaving me in a confusion so great, that I knew not what to think, say, or do.

But Dorcas soon rouzed me—'Do 'you know, Sir,' running in hastily, 'that my lady is gone down stairs?'

'No, sure!'—And down I flew, and found her once more at the street-door, contending with Polly Horton to get out.

She rushed by me into the fore-parlour, and flew to the window, and attempted once more to throw up the 'sash—'Good people! Good people!' cried she.

I caught her in my arms, and lifted her from the window. But being afraid of hurting the charming creature, (charming in her very rage) she slid through my arms on the floor.—'Let 'me die here! Let me die here!' were her words; remaining jointless and immoveable, till Sally and Mrs. Sinclair hurried in.

She was visibly terrified at the sight of the old wretch; while I (sincerely affected) appealed, 'Bear witness, Mrs. 'Sinclair!—Bear witness, Miss Mar-'tin!—Miss Horton!—Every-one bear 'witness—that I offer not violence to 'this beloved creature!'

She then found her feet—'O house,' [loking towards the windows, and all round her, 'O house] contrived on pur-'pose for my ruin!' said she—'But let 'not that woman come into my presence '—Nor that Miss Horton neither, who 'would not have dared to controul me, 'had she not been a base one!'

'Hoh, Sir!—Hoh, Madam!' vociferated the old dragon, her arms kemboed, and flourishing with one foot to the extent of her petticoats—'What 'ado's here about nothing!—I never 'knew such work in my life, between a 'chicken of a gentleman, and a tyger of 'a lady!'

She was visibly affrighted: and upstairs she hastened. A bad woman is certainly, Jack, more terrible to her own sex, than even a bad man.

I followed her up. She rushed by her own apartment into the dining-room: no terror can make her forget her punctilio.

To recite what passed there of invective, exclamations, threatenings, even of her own life, on one side; of expostulations, supplications, and sometimes menaces, on the other; would be too affecting; and, after my particularity in like scenes, these things may as well be imagined as expressed.

I will therefore only mention, that, at length, I extorted a concession from her. She had reason to think it would have have been worſe for her on the ſpot, if ſhe had not made it. It was, That ſhe would endeavour to make herſelf eaſy, till ſhe ſaw what next Thurſday, her uncle's birth-day, would produce. But O that it were not a ſin, ſhe paſſionately exclaimed on making this poor conceſſion, to put an end to her own life, rather than yield to give me but that aſſurance!

This, however, ſhews me, that ſhe is aware, that the reluctantly-given aſſurance may be fairly conſtrued into a matrimonial expectation on my ſide. And if ſhe will now, even now, look forward, I think, from my heart, that I will put on her livery, and wear it for life.

What a ſituation am I in, with all my curſed inventions! I am puzzled, confounded, and aſhamed of myſelf, upon the whole. To take ſuch pains to be a villain!—But (for the fiftieth time) let me aſk thee, who would have thought, that there had been ſuch a woman in the world?—Nevertheleſs, ſhe had beſt take care, that ſhe carries not her obſtinacy much farther. She knows not what revenge for ſlighted love will make me do.

The buſy ſcenes I have juſt paſſed through, have given emotions to my heart, which will not be quieted one while. My heart, I ſee (on re-peruſing what I have written) has communicated it's tremors to my fingers; and in ſome places the characters are ſo indiſtinct and unformed, that thou'lt hardly be able to make them out. But if one half of them only is intelligible, that will be enough to expoſe me to thy contempt, for the wretched hand I have made of my plots and contrivances—But ſurely, Jack, I have gained ſome ground by this promiſe.

And now, one word to the aſſurances thou ſendeſt me, that thou haſt not betrayed my ſecrets in relation to this charming creature. Thou mighteſt have ſpared them, Belford. My ſuſpicions held no longer than while I wrote about them. For well I knew, when I allowed myſelf time to think, that thou hadſt no principles, no virtue, to be miſled by. A great deal of ſtrong envy, and a little of weak pity, I knew to be thy motives. Thou couldſt not provoke my anger, and my compaſſion thou ever hadſt; and art now more eſpecially entitled to it; becauſe thou art a pitiful fellow.

All thy new expoſtulations in my beloved's behalf, I will anſwer when I ſee thee.

LETTER IX.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

THURSDAY NIGHT.

CONFOUNDEDLY out of humour with this perverſe woman!—Nor wilt thou blame me, if thou art my friend. She regards the conceſſion ſhe made, as a conceſſion extorted from her: and we are but juſt where we were before ſhe made it.

With great difficulty I prevailed upon her to favour me with her company for one half-hour this evening. The neceſſity I was under to go down to M. Hall, was the ſubject I wanted to talk upon.

I told her, that as ſhe had been ſo good as to promiſe, that ſhe would endeavour to make herſelf eaſy till ſhe ſaw the Thurſday in next week over, I hoped that ſhe would not ſcruple to oblige me with her word, that I ſhould find her here at my return from M. Hall.

Indeed ſhe would make me no ſuch promiſe. 'Nothing of this houſe was 'mentioned to me,' ſaid ſhe: 'you 'know it was not. And do you think 'that I would have given my conſent to 'my impriſonment in it?'

I was plaguily nettled, and diſappointed too. 'If I go not down to M. 'Hall, Madam, you'll have no ſcruple 'to ſtay here, I ſuppoſe, till Thurſday 'is over?'

'If I cannot help myſelf, I muſt—'But I inſiſt upon being permitted to go 'out of this houſe, whether you leave it 'or not.'

'Well, Madam, then I will comply 'with your commands. And I go out 'this very evening in queſt of lodgings 'that you ſhall have no objections to.'

'I will have no lodgings of your pro-'viding, Sir—I will go to Mrs. Moore's, 'at Hampſtead.'

'Mrs. Moore's, Madam?—I have no 'objection to Mrs. Moore's—But will 'you give me your promiſe, to admit 'me there to your preſence?'

'As I do here—When I cannot help 'it.'

'Very well, Madam—Will you be 'ſo good as to let me know, what you 'intend by your promiſe to make your-'ſelf eaſy?'

'To endeavour, Sir, to make myſelf 'eaſy—were the words——'

'Till you ſaw what next Thurſday would 'produce?'

'Aſk me no queſtions that may en-

'ſnare

'there me. I am too ſincere for the 'company I am in.'

'Let me aſk you, Madam, what 'meant you, when you ſaid, that, were 'it not a ſin, you would die before you 'gave me that aſſurance?'

She was indignantly ſilent.

'You thought, Madam, you had 'given me room to hope your pardon 'by it?'

'When I think I ought to anſwer you 'with patience, I will ſpeak.'

'Do you think yourſelf in my power, 'Madam?'

'If I were not—' And there ſhe ſtopt.

'Deareſt creature, ſpeak out—I be-'ſeech you, deareſt creature, ſpeak 'out.'

She was ſilent; her charming face all in a glow.

'Have you, Madam, any reliance 'upon my honour?'

Still ſilent.

'You hate me, Madam! You deſpiſe 'me more than you do the moſt odious 'of God's creatures!'

'You ought to deſpiſe me, if I did 'not.'

'You ſay, Madam, you are in a bad 'houſe. You have no reliance upon my 'honour—You believe you cannot avoid 'me——'

She aroſe. 'I beſeech you, let me 'withdraw.'

I ſnatched her hand, riſing, and preſſ-ed it firſt to my lips, and then to my heart, in wild diſorder. She might have felt the bounding miſchief ready to burſt it's bars—'You ſhall go—To your own 'apartment, if you pleaſe—But, by the 'great God of Heaven, I will accom-'pany you thither!'

She trembled—'Pray, pray, Mr. 'Lovelace, don't terrify me ſo!'

'Be ſeated, Madam! I beſeech you, 'be ſeated!'

'I will ſit down.'

'Do then.'—All my ſoul in my eyes, and my heart's blood throbbing at my fingers ends.

'I will—I will—You hurt me—Pray, 'Mr. Lovelace, don't—don't frighten 'me ſo.' And down ſhe ſat, trembling; my hand ſtill graſping her's.

I hung over her throbbing boſom, and putting my other arm round her waiſt—'And you ſay, you hate me, 'Madam—And you ſay you deſpiſe me '—And you ſay, you promiſe me noth-'ing——'

'Yes, yes, I did promiſe you—Let 'me not be held down thus—You ſee 'I ſat down when you bid me—Why' [ſtruggling] 'need you hold me down 'thus?—I did promiſe to endeavour to be 'eaſy till Thurſday was over! But you 'won't let me!—How can I be eaſy!—'Pray, let me not be thus terrified.'

'And what, Madam, meant you by 'your promiſe? Did you mean any-'thing in my favour?—You deſigned 'that I ſhould, at that time, think you 'did. Did you mean any-thing in my 'favour, Madam?—Did you intend, 'that I ſhould think you did?'

'Let go my hand, Sir—Take away 'your arm from about me'—[ſtruggling, 'yet trembling] 'Why do you gaze upon 'me ſo?'

'Anſwer me, Madam—Did you mean 'any-thing in my favour by your pro-'miſe?'

'Let me not be thus conſtrained to 'anſwer.'

Then pauſing, and gaining more ſpi-rit, 'Let me go,' ſaid ſhe: 'I am but 'a woman—but a weak woman—But 'my life is in my own power, though my 'perſon is not—I will not be thus con-'ſtrained.'

'You ſhall not, Madam,' quitting her hand, bowing; but my heart at my mouth, and hoping farther provocation.

She aroſe, and was hurrying away.

'I purſue you not, Madam—I will 'try your generoſity.—Stop—Return '—This moment ſtop, return, if Ma-'dam, you would not make me deſpe-'rate.'

She ſtopt at the door; burſt into tears—'O Lovelace!—How, how, have I 'deſerved——'

'Be pleaſed, deareſt angel, to return.'

She came back—But with declared re-luctance; and imputing her compliance to terror.

Terror, Jack, as I have heretofore found out, though I have ſo little be-nefited by the diſcovery, muſt be my reſort, if ſhe make it neceſſary—No-thing elſe will do with the inflexible charmer.

She ſeated herſelf over-againſt me; extremely diſcompoſed—But indigna-tion had a viſible predominance in her features.

I was going towards her, with a coun-tenance intendedly changed to love and ſoftneſs: 'Sweeteſt, deareſt angel,' were my words, in the tendereſt accent:—but, riſing up, ſhe inſiſted upon my be-ing ſeated at a diſtance from her.

I obeyed—and begged her hand over the table, to my extended hand; to ſee, as I said, if in any thing she would oblige me—But nothing gentle, soft, or affectionate, would do. She refused me her hand!—Was she wife, Jack, to confirm to me, that nothing but terror would do?

'Let me only know, Madam, if your 'promise to endeavour to wait with patience the event of next Thursday, 'meant me favour?'

'Do you expect any voluntary favour 'from one to whom you give not a free 'choice?'

'Do you intend, Madam, to honour 'me with your hand, in your uncle's 'presence, or do you not?'

'My heart and my hand shall never 'be separated. Why, think you, did 'I stand in opposition to the will of my 'best, my natural friends?'

'I know what you mean, Madam—'Am I then as hateful to you as the vile 'Solmes?'

'Ask me not such a question, Mr. 'Lovelace.'

'I must be answered. Am I as hateful 'to you as the vile Solmes?'

'Why do you call Mr. Solmes vile?'

'Don't you think him so, Madam?'

'Why should I? Did Mr. Solmes 'ever do vilely by me?'

'Dearest creature! don't distract me 'by hateful comparisons! And perhaps 'by a more hateful preference.'

'Don't you, Sir, put questions to me, 'that you know I will answer truly, 'though my answer were ever so much 'to enrage you.'

'My heart, Madam, my soul is all 'yours at present. But you must give 'me hope, that your promise, in your 'own construction, binds you, no new 'cause to the contrary, to be mine on 'Thursday. How else can I leave you?'

'Let me go to Hampstead; and trust 'to my favour.'

'May I trust to it?—Say, only, may I 'trust to it?'

'How will you trust to it, if you ex-'tort an answer to this question?'

'Say only, dearest creature, say only, 'may I trust to your favour, if you go to 'Hampstead?'

'How dare you, Sir, if I must speak 'out, expect a promise of favour from 'me?—What a mean creature must you 'think me, after the ungrateful base-'ness to me, were I to give you such a 'promise?'

Then standing up, 'Thou hast made 'me, O vilest of men!' [her hands clasped, and a face crimsoned over with indignation] 'an inmate of the vilest of 'houses—Nevertheless, while I am in it, 'I shall have a heart incapable of any-'thing but abhorrence of that and of 'thee!'

And round her looked the angel, and upon me, with fear in her sweet aspect of the consequence of her free declaration—But what a devil must I have been, I who love bravery in a man, had I not been more struck with admiration of her fortitude at the instant, than stimulated by revenge?

'Noblest of creatures!—And do you 'think I can leave you, and my interest 'in such an excellence, precarious? 'No promise!—No hope!—If you make 'me not desperate, may lightning blast 'me, if I do you not all the justice 'tis 'in my power to do you!'

'If you have any intention to oblige 'me, leave me at my own liberty, and 'let me not be detained in this abomi-'nable house. To be constrained as I 'have been constrained! To be slept 'by your vile agents! To be brought 'up by force, and be bruised in my 'own defence against such illegal vio-'lence!—I dare to die, Lovelace—And 'she who fears not death, is not to be 'intimidated into a meanness unworthy 'of her heart and principles!'

'Wonderful creature! But why, 'Madam, did you lead me to hope for 'something favourable for next Thurs-'day?—Once more, make me not des-'perate—With all your magnanimity, 'glorious creature!' [I was more than half frantick, Belford] 'You may, you 'may—But do not, do not make me 'brutally threaten you—Do not, do not 'make me desperate!'

My aspect, I believe, threatened still more than my words. I was rising—She arose—'Mr. Lovelace, be pacified—'You are even more dreadful than the 'Lovelace I have long dreaded—Let 'me retire—I ask your leave to retire—'You really frighten me—Yet I give 'you no hope—From my heart I 'ab——'

'Say not, Madam, you abhor me. 'You must, for your own sake, conceal 'your hatred—At least not avow it.' I seized her hand.

'Let me retire—Let me retire,' said she—in a manner out of breath.'

'I will only say, Madam, that I re-'fer myself to your generosity. My heart 'is not to be trusted at this instant. As 'a mark of my submission to your will, 'you shall, if you please, withdraw—But 'I will not go to M. Hall—Live or die 'my Lord M. I will not go to M. Hall '—But

—but will attend the effect of your [illegible]. Remember, Madam, you have promised to endeavour to make yourself easy, till you see the event of next Thursday—Next Thursday, remember, your uncle comes up, to see us married —That's the event—You think ill of your Lovelace—Do not, Madam, suffer your own morals to be degraded by the infection, as you called it, of his example.'

Away flew the charmer with this half-permission—And no doubt thought that she had an escape—nor without reason.

I knew not for half an hour what to do with myself. Vexed at the heart, nevertheless, (now she was from me, and when I reflected upon her hatred of me, and her defiances) that I suffered myself to be so over-awed, checked, restrained——

And now I have written thus far, (and of course recollected the whole of our conversation) I am more and more incensed against myself.

But I will go down to these women—perhaps suffer myself to be laughed at by them.

Devil fetch them, they pretend to know their own sex. Sally was a woman well educated—Polly also—Both have read—Both have sense—Of parentage not mean—Once modest both—Still they say had been modest, but for me—Not entirely indelicate now; though too little nice for my personal intimacy, loth as they both are to have me to think so—The old one, too, a woman of family, though thus (from bad inclination as well as at first from low circumstances) miserably sunk:—and hence they all pretend to remember what once they were; and vouch for the inclinations and hypocrisy of the whole sex, and wish for nothing so ardently, as that I will leave the perverse lady to their management, while I am gone to Berkshire: undertaking absolutely for her humility and passiveness on my return; and continually boasting of the many perverse creatures whom they have obliged to draw in their traces.

I AM just come from these forceresses.

I was forced to take the mother down; for she began with her 'Hoh, Sir!' with me; and to catechize and upbraid me, with as much insolence as if I owed her money.

I made her fly the pit at last. Strange wishes wished we against each other, at her quitting it——'What were they?'—I'll tell thee——She wished me married, and to be jealous of my wife; and my heir-apparent the child of another man. I was even with her with a vengeance. And yet thou wilt think that could not well be.—'As how?'—As how, Jack!—Why, I wished her conscience come to life!—And I know by the gripes mine gives me every half-hour, that she would then have a cursed time of it.

Sally and Polly gave themselves high airs too. Their first favours were thrown at me: [Women to boast of those favours which they were as willing to impart, first forms all the difficulty with them! as I to receive!] I was upbraided with ingratitude, dastardice and all my difficulties with my angel charged upon myself, for want of following my blows; and for leaving the proud lady mistress of her own will, and nothing to reproach herself with. And all agreed, that the arts used against her on a certain occasion, had too high an operation for them or me to judge what her will would have been in the arduous trial. And then they blamed one another: as I cursed them all.

They concluded, that I should certainly marry, and be a lost man. And Sally on this occasion, with an affected and malicious laugh, snapt her fingers at me, and pointing two of each hand forkedly at me, bid me remember the lines I once shewed her, of my favourite Jack Dryden, as she always familiarly calls that celebrated poet—

'We women to new joys unseen may move:
'There are no prints left in the paths of love.
'All goods besides by publick marks are 'known:
'But those men most desire to keep, have 'none.'

This infernal implement had the confidence further to hint, that when a wife, some other man would not find half the difficulty with my angel, that I had found. Confidence indeed!—But yet, I must say, that this dear creature is the only woman in the world of whom I should not be jealous. And yet, if a man gives himself up to the company of these devils, they never let him rest, till he either suspects or hate his wife.

But a word or two of other matters, if possible.

Methinks I long to know how causes go at M. Hall. I have another private intimation, that the old peer is in the greatest danger.

I must go down. Yet what to do with this this lady the mean while!—These curſed women are full of cruelty and enterprize. She will never be eaſy with them in my abſence. They will have provocation and pretence therefore. But woe be to them, if——

Yet what will vengeance do, after an inſult committed? The two nymphs will have jealous rage to goad them on—And what will withold a jealous and already-ruined woman?

To ſet her go elſewhere; that cannot be done. I am ſtill reſolved to be honeſt, if ſhe'll give me hope: if yet ſhe'll let me be honeſt.—But I'll ſee how ſhe'll be, after the contention ſhe will certainly have between her reſentment, and the terror ſhe had reaſon for from our laſt converſation—So let this ſubject reſt till the morning. And to the old peer once more.

I ſhall have a good deal of trouble, I reckon, though no ſordid man, to be decent on the expected occaſion. Then how to act (I who am no hypocrite) in the days of condolement! What farces have I to go through; and to be a principal actor in them! I'll try to think of my own latter end; a grey beard, and a graceleſs heir; in order to make me ſerious.

Thou, Belford, knoweſt a good deal of this ſort of grimace; and canſt help a gay heart to a little of the diſmal. But then every feature of thy face is cut out for it. My heart may be touched, perhaps, ſooner than thine; for, believe me or not, I have a very tender one. But then, no man looking in my face, be the occaſion for grief ever ſo great, will believe that heart to be deeply diſtreſſed.

All is placid, eaſy, ſerene, in my countenance. Sorrow cannot ſit half an hour together upon it. Nay, I believe, that Lord M.'s recovery, ſhould it happen, would not affect me above a quarter of an hour. Only the new ſcenery, (and the pleaſure of aping an Heraclitus to the family, while I am a Democritus among my private friends) or I want nothing that the old peer can leave me. Wherefore then ſhould grief ſadden and diſtort ſuch blythe, ſuch jocund, features as mine?

But as for thine, were there murder committed in the ſtreet, and thou wert but paſſing by, the murderer even in ſight, the purſuers would quit him, and lay hold of thee: and thy very looks would hang, as well as apprehend thee.

But one word to buſineſs, Jack. Whom doſt thou with for thy blacks?—Wert thou well uſed?—I ſhall want a new parcel of them. For I intend to make every ſoul of the family mourn—Gratis, if not in.

LETTER X.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

JUNE 23. FRIDAY MORNING.

I Went out early this morning, on a deſign that I know not yet whether I ſhall or ſhall not purſue; and on my return found Simon Parſons, my lord's Berkſhire bailiff, (juſt before arrived) waiting for me with a meſſage in form, ſent by all the family, to preſs me to go down, and that at my lord's particular deſire; who wants to ſee me before he dies.

Simon has brought my lord's chariot-and-ſix [Perhaps my own by this time] to carry me down. I have ordered it to be in readineſs by four to-morrow morning. The cattle ſhall ſmoke for the delay; and by the reſt they'll have in the interim, will be better able to bear it.

I am ſtill reſolved upon matrimony, if my fair perverſe will accept of me. But, if ſhe will not—why then I muſt give an uninterrupted hearing, not to my conſcience, but to theſe women below.

Dorcas had acquainted her lady with Simon's arrival and errand. My beloved had deſired to ſee him. But my coming in prevented his attendance on her, juſt as Dorcas was inſtructing him what queſtions he ſhould not anſwer to, that might be aſked of him.

I am to be admitted to her preſence immediately, at my repeated requeſt. Surely the acquiſition in view will help me to make up all with her. She is juſt gone up to the dining-room.

NOTHING will do, Jack!—I can procure no favour from her, though ſhe has obtained from me the point which ſhe had ſet her heart upon.

I will give thee a brief account of what paſſed between us.

I firſt propoſed inſtant marriage; and this in the moſt fervent manner: but was denied as fervently.

Would ſhe be pleaſed to aſſure me, that ſhe would ſtay here only till Tueſday morning? I would but juſt go down and ſee how my lord was—To know whether he had any thing particular to ſay, or enjoin me, while yet he was ſenſible, as he was very earneſt to ſee me—

'Perhaps I might be up on Sunday—Shocking to something!—I beſeech you, Madam, ſhew me ſome little conſideration.'

'Why, Mr. Lovelace, muſt I be determined by your motions?—Think you, that I will voluntarily give a ſanction to the impriſonment of my perſon? Of what importance to me ought to be your ſtay or your return?'

'Give a ſanction to the impriſonment of your perſon! Do you think, Madam, that I fear the law?'

I might have ſpared this fooliſh queſtion of defiance: but my pride would not let me. I thought ſhe threatened me, Jack.

'I don't think you fear the law, Sir. You are too brave to have any regard either to moral or divine ſanctions.'

'Tis well, Madam. But aſk me any-thing I can do to oblige you; and I will oblige you, though in nothing will you oblige me.'

'Then I aſk you, then I requeſt of you, to let me go to Hampſtead.'

I pauſed—and at laſt—'By my ſoul you ſhall—This very moment I will wait upon you, and ſee you fixed there, if you'll promiſe me your hand on Thurſday in the preſence of your uncle.'

'I want not you to ſee me fixed. I will promiſe nothing.'

'Take care, Madam, that you don't let me ſee, that I can have no reliance upon your future favour.'

'I have been uſed to be threatened by you, Sir—But I will accept of your company to Hampſtead—I will be ready to go in a quarter of an hour—My cloaths may be ſent after me.'

'You know the condition, Madam—Next Thurſday.'

'You dare not truſt——'

'My infinite demerits tell me, that I ought not—Nevertheleſs I will confide in your generoſity—To-morrow morning, (no new cauſe ariſing to give reaſon to the contrary) as early as you pleaſe you may go to Hampſtead.'

This ſeemed to oblige her. But yet ſhe looked with a face of doubt.

I will go down to the women, Belford. And having no better judges at hand, will hear what they ſay upon my critical ſituation with this proud beauty, who has ſo inſolently rejected a Lovelace kneeling at her feet, though making an earneſt tender of himſelf for a huſband, in ſpite of all his prejudices to the love of ſhackles.

LETTER XI.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

JUST come from the women.

Have I gone ſo far, and am I afraid to go farther?—Have I not already, as it is evident by her behaviour, ſinned beyond forgiveneſs?—A woman's tears uſed to be to me but as water ſprinkled on a glowing fire, which gives it a fiercer and brighter blaze: what defence has this lady, but her tears and her eloquence? She was before taken at no weak advantage. She was inſenſible in her moments of trial. Had ſhe been ſenſible, ſhe muſt have been ſenſible. So they ſay. The methods taken with her have augmented her glory and her pride. She has now a tale to tell, that ſhe may tell with honour to herſelf. No accomplice-inclination. She can look me into confuſion, without being conſcious of ſo much as a thought, which ſhe need to be aſhamed of.

This, Jack, is the ſubſtance of the women's reaſoning with me.

To which let me add, that the dear creature now ſees the neceſſity I am in to leave her. Detecting me is in her head. My contrivances are of ſuch a nature, that I muſt appear to be the moſt odious of men, if I am detected on this ſide matrimony. And yet I have promiſed, as thou ſeeſt, that ſhe ſhall ſet out to Hampſtead as ſoon as ſhe pleaſes in the morning, and that without condition on her ſide.

Doſt thou aſk, What I meant by this promiſe?

No new cauſe ariſing, was the proviſo on my ſide, thou'lt remember. But there will be a new cauſe.

Suppoſe Dorcas ſhould drop the promiſſory-note given her by her lady? Servants, eſpecially thoſe who cannot read or write, are the moſt careleſs people in the world of written papers. Suppoſe I take it up?—at a time, too, that I was determined that the dear creature ſhould be her own miſtreſs?—Will not this detection be a new cauſe?—A cauſe that will carry with it againſt her the appearance of ingratitude!

That ſhe deſigned it a ſecret to me, argues a fear of detection, and indirectly a ſenſe of guilt. I wanted a pretence. Can I have a better?—If I am in a violent paſſion upon the detection, is not paſſion an univerſally allowed extenuator of violence? Is not every man and woman obliged to excuſe that fault in another, which at times they find attended with ſuch ſuch ungovernable effects in themſelves?

The mother and ſiſterhood, ſuppoſe, brought to ſit in judgment upon the vile corrupted—The leaſt benefit that muſt accrue from the accidental diſcovery, if not a pretence for perpetration, [which, however, may be the caſe] an excuſe for renewing my orders for her detention till my return from M. Hall; [the fault her own] and for keeping a ſtricter watch over her than before; with direction to ſend me any letters that may be written by her or to her.—And when I return, the devil's in it if I find not a way to make her chuſe lodgings for herſelf (ſince theſe are ſo hateful to her) that ſhall anſwer all my purpoſes; and yet I no more appear to direct her choice, than I did before in theſe.

Thou wilt curſe me, when thou comeſt to this place. I know thou wilt. But thinkeſt thou, that, after ſuch a ſeries of contrivance, I will loſe this inimitable woman for want of a little more? A rake's a rake, Jack!—And what rake is withheld by principle from the perpetration of any evil his heart is ſet upon, and in which he thinks he can ſucceed?—Beſides, am I not in earneſt as to marriage?—Will not the generality of the world acquit me, if I do marry? And what is that injury which a church-rite will not at any time repair? Is not the cataſtrophe of every ſtory that ends in wedlock, accounted happy, be the difficulties in the progreſs to it ever ſo great?

But here, how am I engroſſed by this lady, while poor Lord M. as Simon tells me, lies groaning in the moſt dreadful agonies!—What muſt he ſuffer!—Heaven relieve him!—I have a too compaſſionate heart. And ſo would the dear creature have found, could I have thought that the worſt of her ſufferings is equal to the lighteſt of his. I mean as to fact; for as to that part of hers, which ariſes from extreme ſenſibility, I know nothing of that; and cannot therefore be anſwerable for it.

LETTER XII.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

JUST come from my charmer. She will not ſuffer me to ſay half the obliging, the tender things, which my honeſt heart is ready to overflow with. A confounded ſituation that, when a man finds himſelf in humour to be eloquent, and pathetick at the ſame time, yet cannot engage the miſtreſs of his fate to lend an ear to his fine ſpeeches.

I can account now, how it comes about, that lovers, when their miſtreſſes are cruel, run into ſolitude, and diſorder their minds to ſtocks and ſtones: for am I not forced to make my complaints to thee?

She claimed the performance of my promiſe, the moment ſhe ſaw me, of permitting her [haughtily ſhe ſpoke the word] to go to Hampſtead, as ſoon as I was gone to Berks.

Moſt cheerfully I renewed it.

She deſired me to give orders in her hearing.

I ſent for Dorcas and Will. They came.—'Do you both take notice—'[But, perhaps, Sir, I may take you 'with me]—that your lady is to be obey-'ed in all her commands. She purpoſes 'to return to Hampſtead as ſoon as I am 'gone—My dear, will you not have a 'ſervant to attend you?'

'I ſhall want no ſervant there.'

'Will you take Dorcas?'

'If I ſhould want Dorcas, I can ſend 'for her.'

Dorcas could not but ſay, She ſhould be very proud—

'Well, well, that may be at my re-'turn, if your lady permit—Shall I, my 'dear, call up Mrs. Sinclair, and give 'her orders, to the ſame effect, in your 'hearing?'

'I deſire not to ſee Mrs. Sinclair; nor 'any that belong to her.'

'As you pleaſe, Madam.'

And then (the ſervants being withdrawn) I urged her again for the allowance, that ſhe would meet me at the altar on Thurſday next. But to no purpoſe—May ſhe not thank herſelf for all that may follow?

One favour, however, I would not be denied—to be admitted to paſs the evening with her.

All ſweetneſs and obſequiouſneſs will I be on this occaſion. My whole ſoul ſhall be poured out to move her to forgive me. If ſhe will not, and if the promiſſory-note ſhould fall in my way, my revenge will doubtleſs take total poſſeſſion of me.

All the houſe in my intereſt, and every-one in it not only engaging to intimidate and aſſiſt, as occaſion ſhall offer, but ſtaking all their experience upon my ſucceſs, if it be not my own fault, what muſt be the conſequence?

This, Jack, however, ſhall be her laſt trial; and if ſhe behave as nobly in and after this ſecond attempt, [All her friends about her] as ſhe has done after the firſt, ſhe will come out an angel upon full proof, in ſpite of man, woman, and devil:

pil, then shall there be an end of all her machinations. I will then renounce that vanquished devil, and reform. And if any vile machination start up, presuming to mislead me, I will sooner stab it in my heart, as it rises, than give way to it.

A few hours will now decide all. But whatever be the event, I shall be too busy to write again, till I get to M. Hall.

Mean time I am in strange agitations. I must suppress them, if possible, before I venture into her presence—My heart bounces my bosom from the table. I will lay down my pen, and wholly resign to it's impulses.

LETTER XIII.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

FRIDAY NIGHT, OR RATHER SAT. MORN. 1 O'CLOCK.

I Thought I should not have had either time or inclination to write another line before I got to M. Hall. But have the first—must find the last—since I can neither sleep, nor do any-thing but write, if I can do that. I am most confoundedly out of humour. The reason let it follow—if it will follow—No preparation for it, from me.

I tried by gentleness and love to soften—What?—Marble. A heart incapable either of love or gentleness. Her past injuries for ever in her head. Ready to receive a favour; the permission to go to Hampstead; but neither to deserve it, nor return any. So my scheme of the gentle kind was soon given over.

I then wanted to provoke her: like a coward boy, who waits for the first blow before he can persuade himself to fight. I half-challenged her to challenge or defy me: she seemed aware of her danger; and would not directly brave my resentment: but kept such a middle course, that I neither could find a pretence to offend, nor reason to hope: yet she believed my tale that her uncle would come to Kentish Town, and seemed not to apprehend, that Tomlinson was an impostor.

She was very uneasy, upon the whole, in my company; wanted often to break from me; yet so held me to my promise of permitting her to go to Hampstead, that I knew not how to get off it; although it was impossible, in my precarious situation with her, to think of performing it.

In this situation; the women ready to assist; and, if I proceeded not, as ready to ridicule me; what had I left me, but to pursue the concerted scheme, and to seek a pretence to quarrel with her, in order to revoke my promised permission, and to convince her that I would not be upbraided as the most brutal of ravishers for nothing?

I had agreed with the women, that if I could not find a pretence in her presence to begin my operations, the note should lie in my way, and I was to pick it up, soon after her retiring from me. But I began to doubt at near ten o'clock, (so earnest was she to leave me, suspecting my over-warm behaviour to her, and eager grasping of her hand two or three times, with eye-strings, as I felt, on the strain, while her eyes shewed uneasiness and apprehension) that if she actually retired for the night, it might be a chance, whether it would be easy to come at her again. Loth, therefore, to run such a risque, I stept out a little after ten, with intent to alter the preconcerted disposition a little; saying I would attend her again instantly. But as I returned I met her at the door, intending to withdraw for the night. I could not persuade her to go back: nor had I presence of mind (so full of complaisance as I was to her just before) to stay her by force: so she slid through my hands into her own apartment. I had nothing to do, therefore, but to let my former concert take place.

I should have premised (but care not for order of time, connexion, or any-thing else) that, between eight and nine in the evening, another servant of Lord M. on horseback came, to desire me to carry down with me Dr. S. the old peer having been once (in extremis, as they judge he is now) relieved and reprieved by him. I sent and engaged the doctor to accompany me down; and am to call upon him by four this morning: or the devil should have both my lord and the doctor, if I'd stir till I got all made up.

Poke thy damned nose forward into the event, if thou wilt—Curse me if thou shalt have it till it's proper time and place. And too soon then.

She had hardly got into her chamber, but I found a little paper, as I was going into mine, which I took up; and opening it, (for it was carefully pinned in another paper) what should it be, but a promissory-note, given as a bribe, with a further promise of a diamond-ring, to induce Dorcas to favour her mistress's escape?

How my temper changed in a moment!—Ring, ring, ring, ring, I, my bell, bell, with a violence enough to break the string, and as if the house were on fire.

Every devil frighted into active life: the whole house in an uproar: up runs Will.—'Sir—Sir—Sir!'—Eyes goggling, mouth distended—'Bid the damn'd 'toad Dorcas come hither,' (as I stood at the stair-head) in a horrible rage, and out of breath, cried I.

In sight came the trembling devil—but standing aloof, from the report made her by Will of the passion I was in, as well as from what she heard.

Flash came out my sword immediately; for I had it ready on—'Cursed, con-'founded, villainous, bribery and cor-'ruption!'

Up runs she to her lady's door, screaming out for safety and protection.

'Good your honour,' interposed Will, 'for God's sake!—O Lord! O Lord!'—receiving a good cuff.

'Take that, varlet, for saving the 'ungrateful wretch from my vengeance!'

'Wretch!' I intended to say; but if it were some other word of like ending, passion must be my excuse.

Up ran two or three of the sisterhood—'What's the matter!—What's the 'matter!'.

'The matter!' (for still my beloved opened not the door; on the contrary, drew another bolt) 'This abominable 'Dorcas!—Call her aunt up!—Let her 'see what a traitress she has placed about 'me!—And let her bring the toad to 'answer for herself—has taken a bribe, 'a provision for life, to betray her trust; 'by that means to perpetuate a quarrel 'between a man and his wife, and frus-'trate for ever all hopes of reconciliati-'on between us!'

Let me perish, Belford, if I have patience to proceed with the farce!

If I must resume, I must.

Up came the aunt puffing and blowing—As she hoped for mercy, she was not privy to it! She never knew such a plotting perverse lady in her life!—Well might servants be at the pass they were, when such ladies as Mrs. Lovelace made no conscience of corrupting them. For her part, she desired no mercy for the wretch: no niece of hers, if she were not faithful to the trust!—But what was the proof?

She was shewn the paper.

'But too evident!—Cursed, cursed 'toad, devil, jade!' passed from each mouth:—And the vileness of the corrupted, and the unworthiness of the corruptress, were inveighed against.

Up we all went, pushing the lady's door into the dining-room, to proceed to trial.

Stamp, stamp, stamp up, each on her heel-; rave, rave, rave, every tongue.

'Bring up the creature before us all 'this instant!'

'And would she have got out of the 'house, say you?'

These the noises, and the speeches, as we clattered by the door of the fair briberess.

Up was brought Dorcas (whimpering) between two, both bawling out—'You must go—You shall go—'Tis fit 'you should answer for yourself—You 'are a discredit to all worthy servants,'—as they pulled and pushed her up-stairs.—She whining—'I cannot see his 'honour—I cannot look so good and 'so generous a gentleman in the face—'O how shall I bear my aunt's rav-'ings?'

'Come up, and be d—n'd—Bring 'her forward,' her imperial judge.—'What a plague, it is the detection, not 'the crime, that confounds you. You 'could be quiet enough for days toge-'ther, as I see by the date, under the 'villainy. Tell me, ungrateful devil, 'tell me, who made the first advances?'

'Aye, disgrace to my family and 'blood,' cried the old one—'Tell his 'honour—Tell the truth!—Who made 'the first advances?'

'Aye, cursed creature,' cried Sally, 'who made the first advances?'

'I have betrayed one trust already! '—O let me not betray another!—My 'lady is a good lady!—O let not her 'suffer!'

'Tell all you know—Tell the whole 'truth, Dorcas,' cried Polly Horton—'His honour loves his lady too well, to 'make her suffer much; little as she re-'quites his love!'

'Every-body sees that,' cried Sally—'Too well, indeed, for his honour, I 'was going to say.'

'Till now, I thought she deserved 'my love—But to bribe a servant thus, 'who she supposed had orders to watch 'her steps, for fear of another elope-'ment! and to impute that precaution 'to me as a crime!—Yet I must love her '—Ladies, forgive my weakness!'

Curse upon my grimaces!—If I have patience to repeat them!—But thou shalt have it all—Thou canst not despise me more than I despise myself!

'But suppose, Sir,' said Sally, 'you 'have my lady and the wench face to 'face!

'fuse! You see she cares not to confess.'

'O my carelessness!' cried Dorcas—'Don't let my poor lady suffer!—Indeed, if you all knew what I know, 'you would say her ladyship has been 'cruelly treated.'

'See, see, see, see!'—repeatedly, every one at once—'Only sorry for the detection, as your honour said—Not for 'the fault.'

'Curfed creature!' and 'Deviliſh 'creature!' from every mouth.

'Your lady won't—She dare not—'come out to ſave you,' cried Sally; 'though it is more his honour's mercy, 'than your deſert, if he does not cut 'your vile throat this inſtant.'

'Say,' repeated Polly, 'was it your 'lady, that made the firſt advances, or 'was it you, you creature?'

'If the lady had ſo much honour,' bawled the mother, 'excuſe me, So—'Excuſe me, Sir,'—[Confound the old wretch! ſhe had like to have ſaid Son!]—'If the lady had ſo much honour, as 'we have ſuppoſed, ſhe will appear to 'vindicate a poor ſervant, miſled, as 'ſhe has been, by ſuch large promiſes! '—But I hope, Sir, you will do them 'juſt juſtice: I hope you will!—Good 'lack!—Good lack!'—clapping her hands together—'To grant her every-'thing ſhe could aſk—To indulge her 'in her unworthy hatred to my poor 'innocent houſe!—To let her go to 'Hampſtead, though your honour told 'us, you could get no condeſcention 'from her; no, not the leaſt—O Sir—'O Sir—I hope—I hope—If your lady 'will not come out—I hope you will 'find a way to hear this cauſe in her pre-'ſence. I value not my doors on ſuch 'an occaſion as this. Juſtice I ever 'loved. I deſire you will come at the 'bottom of it in clearance to me. I'll 'be ſworn I had no privity in this black 'corruption.'

Juſt then, we heard the lady's door unbar, unlock, unbolt.

'Now, Sir!'

'Now, Mr. Lovelace!'

'Now, Sir!' from every encouraging mouth.

But, O Jack! Jack! Jack! I can write no more!

If you muſt have it all, you muſt!

Now, Belford, ſee us all ſitting in judgment, reſolved to puniſh the fair delinquent—I, and the mother, the hitherto dreaded mother, the nieces Sally, Polly, the traitreſs Dorcas and Mabell, a guard, as it were, over Dorcas, that ſhe might not run away, and hide herſelf—All pre-determined, and of neceſſity pre-determined, from the journey I was going to take, and my precarious ſituation with her—And hear her unbolt, unlock, unbar, the door; then as it proved afterwards, put the key into the lock on the outſide, lock the door, and put it in her pocket—Will I knew, below, who would give me notice, if, while we were all above, ſhe ſhould miſtake her way, and go down-ſtairs, inſtead of coming into the dining-room: the ſtreet-doors alſo doubly ſecured, and every ſhutter to the windows round the houſe faſtened, that no noiſe or ſcreeming ſhould be heard—[Such was the brutal preparation]—And then hear her ſtep towards us, and inſtantly ſee her enter among us, confiding in her own innocence; and with a majeſty in her perſon and manner, that is natural to her; but which then ſhone out in all it's glory!—Every tongue ſilent—every eye awed—every heart quaking—mine, in a particular manner ſunk, throbleſs, and twice below its uſual region, to once at my throat.—A ſhameful recreant!—She ſilent too, looking round her, firſt on me; then on the mother, as no longer fearing her; then on Sally, Polly, and the culprit Dorcas!—Such the glorious power of innocence exerted at that awful moment!

She would have ſpoken, but could not, looking down my guilt into confuſion. A mouſe might have been heard paſſing over the floor: her own light feet and ruſtling ſilks could not have prevented it; for ſhe ſeemed to tread air, and to be all ſoul. She paſſed backwards and forwards, now towards me, now towards the door ſeveral times, before ſpeech could get the better of indignation; and at laſt, after twice or thrice hemming to recover her articulate voice—'O thou contemptible and abandoned 'Lovelace, thinkeſt thou that I ſee not 'through this poor villainous plot of 'thine, and of theſe thy wicked accom-'plices?'

'Thou woman,' [looking at the mother] 'once my terror!—always my diſ-'like!—but now my deteſtation!—'ſhouldſt once more (for thine perhaps 'was the preparation) have provided 'for me intoxicating potions, to rob 'me of my ſenſes.

'And then, thou, wretch,' [turning to me] 'mighteſt more ſecurely have de-'pended upon ſuch a low contrivance as 'this!

'And ye, vile women, who perhaps

Mr. S.

'tance—' O my beloved creature, how 'you terrify me!'—holding out my arms and kneeling on one knee—' Not a ſtep, 'not a ſtep farther except to receive 'my death at that injured hand which 'is thus held up againſt a life far dearer 'to me than my own!—I am a villain! '—the blackeſt of villains!—Say you 'will ſheath your knife in the injurer's, 'not the injured's heart, and then will 'I indeed approach you, but not elſe.'

The mother twanged her damned noſe; and Sally and Polly pulled out their handkerchiefs, and turned from us. They never in their lives, they told me afterwards, beheld ſuch a ſcene.

Innocence ſo triumphant!—Villainy ſo debaſed!—they muſt mean.

Unaware, to myſelf, I had moved onward to my angel—' And doſt thou, 'doſt thou, ſtill diſclaiming, ſtill advancing—Doſt thou, doſt thou, ſtill inſidiouſly move towards me?' [And her hand was extended] ' I dare—I dare—'but raſhly neither—My heart from 'principle abhors the act, which thou 'makeſt neceſſary!—God, in thy mercy!' [Lifting up her eyes and hands] ' God, 'in thy mercy——!'

I threw myſelf to the further end of the room. An ejaculation, a ſilent ejaculation, employing her thoughts that moment; Polly ſays the whites of her lovely eyes were only viſible: and, in the inſtant that ſhe extended her hand, aſſuredly to ſtrike the fatal blow, [How the very recital terrifies me!] ſhe caſt her eye towards me, and ſaw me at the utmoſt diſtance the room would allow, and heard my broken voice—My voice was utterly broken; nor knew I what I ſaid, or whether to the purpoſe or not—And her charming cheeks, that were all in a glow before, turned pale, as if terrified at her own purpoſe; and lifting up her eyes—' Thank God!—Thank God!' ſaid the angel—' Delivered for the preſent; for the preſent delivered—from 'myſelf!—Keep, Sir, keep that diſ-'tance;' [Looking down towards me, who was proſtrate on the floor, my heart pierced, as with an hundred daggers;] ' that diſtance has ſaved a life; 'to what reſerved, the Almighty only 'knows.'

' To be happy, Madam; and to make 'happy!—And O let me but hope for 'your favour for to-morrow—I will 'put off my journey till then—And may 'God—'

' Swear not, Sir!'—With an awful and piercing aſpect—' You have too—'too often ſworn!—God's eye is upon 'us!—His more immediate eye;' and looked wildly.—But the women looked up to the cieling, as if afraid of God's eye, and trembled. And well they might; and I too, who ſo very lately had each of us the devil in our hearts.

' If not to-morrow, Madam, ſay but 'next Thurſday, your uncle's birth-'day; ſay but next Thurſday!'

' This I ſay, of this you may aſſure 'yourſelf, I never, never will be yours. '—And let me hope that I may be en-'titled to the performance of your pro-'miſe, to be permittted to leave this 'innocent houſe, as one called it, (but 'long have my ears been accuſtomed 'to ſuch inverſions of words) as ſoon as 'the day breaks.'

' Did my perdition depend upon it, 'that you cannot, Madam, but upon 'terms. And I hope you will not ter-'rify me—' ſtill dreading the accurſed knife.

' Nothing leſs than an attempt upon 'my honour ſhall make me deſperate. 'I have no view but to defend my ho-'nour: with ſuch a view only I en-'tered into treaty with your infamous 'agent below. The reſolution you 'have ſeen, I truſt, God will give me 'again, upon the ſame occaſion. But 'for a leſs, I wiſh not for it.—Only 'take notice, women, that I am no wife 'of this man: baſely as he has uſed me, 'I am not his wife. He has no autho-'rity over me. If he go away by-and-'by, and you act by his authority to 'detain me, look to it.'

Then, taking one of the lights, ſhe turned from us; and away ſhe went, unmoleſted.—Not a ſoul was able to moleſt her.

Mabell ſaw her, tremblingly, and in a hurry, take the key of her chamber-door out of her pocket, and unlock it; and as ſoon as ſhe entered, heard her double-lock, bar, and bolt it.

By her taking out her key, when ſhe came out of her chamber to us, ſhe no doubt ſuſpected my deſign: which was, to have carried her in my arms thither, if ſhe made ſuch force neceſſary, after I had intimidated her; and to have been her companion for that night.

She was to have had ſeveral bed-chamber-women to aſſiſt to undreſs her upon occaſion: but from the moment ſhe entered the dining-room with ſo much intrepidity, it was abſolutely impoſſible to think of proſecuting my villainous deſigns againſt her.

THUS, this, Belford, was the hand I made made of a contrivance from which I expected so much!—And now I am ten times worse off than before.

Thou never sawest people in thy life look so like fools upon one another, as the mother, her partners, and I, did, for a few minutes. And at last, the two devilish nymphs broke out into insulting ridicule upon me; while the old wretch was concerned for her house, the reputation of her house. I cursed them all together: and retiring to my chamber, locked myself in.

And now it is time to set out: all I have gained, detection, disgrace, fresh guilt by repeated perjuries, and to be despised by her I doat upon; and what is still worse to a proud heart, by myself.

Success, success in projects, is everything. What an admirable contriver did I think myself till now! Even for this scheme among the rest! But how pitifully foolish does it now appear to me!—Scratch out, erase, never to be read, every part of my preceding letters, where I have boastingly mentioned it. And never presume to rally me upon the cursed subject: for I cannot bear it.

But for the lady, by my soul, I love her. I admire her more than ever! I must have her. I will have her still—With honour or without, as I have often vowed. My cursed fright at her accidental bloody nose, so lately, put her upon improving upon me thus. Had she threatened ME, I should soon have been master of one arm, and in both! But for so sincere a virtue to threaten herself, and not to offer to intimidate any other, and with so much presence of mind, as to distinguish, in the very passionate intention, the necessity of the act, in defence of her honour, and so fairly to disavow lesser occasions: shewed such a deliberation, such a choice, such a principle; and then keeping me so watchfully at a distance, that I could not seize her hand, so soon as she could have given the fatal blow; how impossible not to be subdued by so true and so discreet a magnanimity!

But she is not gone. She shall not go. I will press her with letters for the Thursday. She shall yet be mine, legally mine. For as to cohabitation, there is now no such thing to be thought of.

The captain shall give her away, as proxy for her uncle. My lord will die. My fortune will help my will, and set me above every-thing and every-body.

But here is the curse—She despises me, Jack!—What man, as I have heretofore said, can bear to be despised—especially by his wife!—O Lord! O Lord! What a hand, what a cursed hand have I made of this plot!—And here ends

The history of the Lady and the Penknife!—The devil take the penknife!—It goes against me to say,

'God bless the lady!'

LETTER XIV.

MR. LOVELACE, TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

SUPERSCRIBED TO MRS. LOVELACE.

M. HALL, SAT. NIGHT, JUNE 24.

MY DEAREST LIFE.

IF you do not impute to love, and to terror raised by love, the poor figure I made before you last night, you will not do me justice. I thought I would try to the very last moment, if, by complying with you in every-thing, I could prevail upon you to promise to be mine on Thursday next, since you refused me an earlier day. Could I have been so happy, you had not been hindered going to Hampstead, or wherever else you pleased. But when I could not prevail upon you to give me this assurance, what room had I (my demerit so great) to suppose that your going thither would not be to lose you for ever?

I will own to you, Madam, that yesterday afternoon I picked up the paper dropt by Dorcas; who has confessed that she would have assisted you in getting away, if she had had an opportunity so to do; and undoubtedly dropt it by accident. And could I have prevailed upon you as to Thursday next I would have made no use of it; secure as I should then have been in your word given, to be mine. But when I found you inflexible, I was resolved to try, if by resenting Dorcas's treachery, I could not make your pardon of me the condition of mine to her: and if not, to make a handle of it to revoke my consent to your going away from Mrs. Sinclair's; since the consequence of that must have been so fatal to me.

So far, indeed, was my proceeding low and artful: and when I was challenged with it, as such, in so high and noble a manner, I could not avoid taking shame to myself upon it.

But you must permit me, Madam, to hope, that you will not punish me too heavily for so poor a contrivance, since no dishonour was meant you; and since, in the moment of it's execution you had as great an instance of my incapacity to defend a wrong, a low measure, and, at the same time, in your power over me, as mortal man could give—In a word, since you must have seen, that I was absolutely under the controul both of Conscience and of Love.

I will not offer to defend myself, for wishing you to remain where you are, till either you give me your word to meet me at the altar on Thursday; or till I have the honour of attending you, preparative to the solemnity which will make that day the happiest of my life.

I am but too sensible, that this kind of treatment may appear to you with the face of an arbitrary and illegal imposition: but as the consequences, not only to ourselves, but to both our families, may be fatal, if you cannot be moved in my favour; let me beseech you to forgive this act of compulsion, on the score of the necessity you your dear self have laid me under to be guilty of it; and to permit the solemnity of next Thursday to include an act of oblivion of all past offences.

The orders I have given to the people of the house are: That you shall be obeyed in every particular that is consistent with my expectations of finding you there on my return to town on Wednesday next: that Mrs. Sinclair and her nieces, having incurred your just displeasure, shall not, without your orders, come into your presence: that neither shall Dorcas, till she has fully cleared her conduct to your satisfaction, be permitted to attend you: but Mabell, in her place; of whom you seemed some time ago to express some liking. Will I have left behind me to attend your commands. If he be either negligent or impertinent, your dismission shall be a dismission of him from my service for ever. But, as to letters which may be sent you, or any which you may have to send, I must humbly intreat, that none such pass from or to you, for the few days that I shall be absent. But I do assure you, Madam, that the seals of both sorts shall be sacred: and the letters, if such be sent, shall be given into your hands the moment the ceremony is performed, or before, if you require it.

Mean time I will enquire, and send you word, how Miss Howe does; and to what, if I can be informed, her long silence is owing.

Dr. Perkins I found here, attending my lord, when I arrived with Dr. S. He acquaints me that your father, mother, uncles, and the still less worthy persons of your family, are well; and intend to be all at your uncle Harlowe's next week; I presume, with intent to keep his anniversary. This can make no alteration, but a happy one, as to persons, on Thursday; because Mr. Tomlinson assured me, that if any-thing fell out to hinder your uncle's coming up in person, (which however, he did not expect) he would be satisfied if his friend the captain were proxy for him. I shall send a man and horse to-morrow to the captain, to be at a greater certainty.

I send this by a special messenger, who will wait your pleasure in relation to the impatiently-wished-for Thursday; which I humbly hope will be signified by a line.

My lord, though hardly sensible, and unmindful of every-thing but of your felicity, desires his most affectionate compliments to you. He has in readiness to present to you a very valuable set of jewels, which he hopes will be acceptable, whether he lives to see you adorn them or not.

Lady Sarah and Lady Betty have also their tokens of respect ready to court your acceptance: but may Heaven incline you to give the opportunity of receiving their personal compliments, and those of my cousins Montague, before the next week be out!

His lordship is exceeding ill. Dr. S. has no hopes of him. The only consolation I can have for the death of a relation who loves me so well, if he do die, must arise from the additional power it will put into my hands of shewing how much I am, my dearest life, your affectionate and faithful LOVELACE.

LETTER XV.

MR. LOVELACE, TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

SUPERSCRIBED, TO MRS. LOVELACE.

M. HALL, SUNDAY NIGHT, JUNE 25.

MY DEAREST LOVE,

I Cannot find words to express how much I am mortified at the return of my messenger without a line from you.

Thursday is so near, that I will send messenger after messenger every four hours, till I have a favourable answer; the one to meet the other, till it's eve arrives, to know if I may venture to appear in your presence with the hope of having my wishes answered on that day.

Your love, Madam, I neither expect, nor ask for; nor will, till my future ture behaviour gives you cauſe to think I deſerve it. All I at preſent preſume to wiſh, is, to have it in my power to do you all the juſtice I can now do you: and to your generoſity will I leave it, to reward me, as I ſhall merit, with your affection.

At preſent, revolving my poor behaviour of Friday night before you, I think I ſhould ſooner chuſe to go to my laſt audit, unprepared for it as I am, than to appear in your preſence, unleſs you give me ſome hope, that I ſhall be received as your elected huſband, rather than (however deſerved) as a deteſted criminal.

Let me therefore propoſe an expedient, in order to ſpare my own confuſion; and to ſpare you the neceſſity for that ſoul-harrowing recrimination, which I cannot ſtand, and which muſt be diſagreeable to yourſelf—To name the church, and I will have every-thing in readineſs; ſo that our next interview will be, in a manner, at the very altar; and then you will have the kind huſband to forgive for the faults of the ungrateful lover. If your reſentment be ſtill too high to write more, let it only be in your own dear hand, theſe words, 'St. Martin's church, Thurſday,'—or theſe, 'St. Giles's church, Thurſday;' nor will I inſiſt upon any inſcription or ſubſcription, or ſo much as the initials of your name. This ſhall be all the favour I will expect, till the dear hand itſelf is given to mine, in preſence of that Being whom I invoke as a witneſs of the inviolable faith and honour of your adoring

LOVELACE.

LETTER XVI.

MR. LOVELACE, TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

SUPERSCRIBED, TO MRS. LOVELACE.

M. HALL, MONDAY, JUNE 26.

ONCE more, my deareſt love, do I conjure you to ſend me the four requeſted words. There is no time to be loſt. And I would not have next Thurſday go over, without being entitled to call you mine, for the world; and that as well for your ſake as my own. Hitherto all that has paſſed is between you and me only; but, after Thurſday, if my wiſhes are unanſwered, the whole will be before the world.

My lord is extremely ill, and endures not to have me out of his ſight for one half-hour. But this ſhall not have the leaſt weight with me, if you be pleaſed to hold out the olive-branch to me in the four requeſted words.

I have the following intelligence from Captain Tomlinſon.

All your family are at your uncle Harlowe's. Your uncle finds he cannot go up; and names Captain Tomlinſon for his proxy. He propoſes to keep all your family with him, till the captain aſſures him, that the ceremony is over.

Already he has begun, with hope of ſucceſs, to try to reconcile your mother to you.

My Lord M. but juſt now has told me, how happy he ſhould think himſelf to have an opportunity before he dies, to ſalute you as his niece. I have put him in hopes, that he ſhall ſee you; and have told him, that I will go to town on Wedneſday, in order to prevail upon you to accompany me down on Thurſday or Friday. I have ordered a ſett to be in readineſs to carry me up; and, were not my lord ſo very ill, my couſin Montague tells me, ſhe would offer her attendance on you. If you pleaſe, therefore, we can ſet out for this place the moment the ſolemnity is performed.

Do not, deareſt creature, diſſipate all theſe promiſing appearances, and, by refuſing to ſave your own and your family's reputation in the eye of the world, uſe yourſelf worſe than the ungrateful-eſt wretch on earth has uſed you. For if we are married, all the diſgrace you imagine you have ſuffered while a ſingle lady, will be my own; and only known to ourſelves.

Once more then, conſider well the ſituation we are both in; and remember, my deareſt life, that Thurſday will be ſoon here; and that you have no time to loſe.

In a letter ſent by the meſſenger whom I diſpatch with this, I have deſired, that my friend, Mr. Belford, who is your very great admirer, and who knows all the ſecrets of my heart, will wait upon you, to know what I am to depend upon, as to the choſen day.

Surely, my dear, you never could, at any time, ſuffer half ſo much from cruel ſuſpence, as I do.

If I have not an anſwer to this, either from your own goodneſs, or through Mr. Belford's interceſſion, it will be too late for me to ſet out: and Captain Tomlinſon will be diſappointed, who goes to town on purpoſe to attend your pleaſure.

One motive for the gentle reſtraint I have preſumed to lay you under, is, to prevent the miſchiefs that might enſue

(as probably to the more innocent, as to the leſs) were you to write to any-body while your paſſions were ſo much raiſed and inflamed againſt me. Having apprized you of my direction to the woman in town on this head, I wonder you ſhould have endeavoured to ſend a letter to Miſs Howe, although in a cover directed to that young lady's ſervant; as you muſt think it would be likely to fall into my hands.

The juſt ſenſe of what I have deſerved the contents ſhould be, leaves me no room to doubt what they are. Nevertheleſs, I return it you incloſed, with the ſeal, as you will ſee, unbroken.

Relieve, I beſeech you, deareſt Madam, by the four requeſted words, or by Mr. Belford, the anxiety of your ever-affectionate and obliged LOVELACE.

Remember, there will not, there cannot be time for further writing, and for coming up by Thurſday, your uncle's birth-day.

LETTER XVII.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

MONDAY, JUNE 26.

THOU wilt ſee the ſituation I am in with Miſs Harlowe by the incloſed copies of three letters; to two of which I am ſo much ſcorned as not to have one word given me in anſwer; and of the third (now ſent by the meſſenger who brings thee this) I am afraid as little notice will be taken—And if ſo, her day of grace is abſolutely over.

One would imagine (ſo long uſed to conſtraint too as ſhe has been) that ſhe might have been ſatisfied with the triumph ſhe had over us all on Friday night: a triumph that to this hour has ſunk my pride and my vanity ſo much, that I almoſt hate the words, plot, contrivance, ſcheme; and ſhall miſtruſt myſelf in future, for every one that riſes to my inventive head.

But ſeeſt thou not, that I am under a neceſſity to continue her at Sinclair's, and to prohibit all her correſpondences?

Now, Belford, as I really, in my preſent mood, think of nothing leſs than marrying her, if ſhe let not Thurſday ſlip; I would have thee attend her, in purſuance of the intimation I have given her in my letter of this date; and vow for me, ſwear for me, bind thy ſoul to her for my honour, and uſe what arguments thy friendly heart can ſuggeſt, in order to procure me an anſwer from her; which, as thou wilt ſee, ſhe may give in four words only. And then I purpoſe to leave Lord M. (dangerouſly ill as he is) and meet her at her appointed church, in order to ſolemnize: if ſhe will ſign but Cl. H. to thy writing the four words, that ſhall do; for I would not come up to be made a fool of in the face of all my family and friends.

If ſhe ſhould let the day go off;—I ſhall be deſperate. I am entangled in my own devices, and cannot bear that ſhe ſhould detect me.

O that I had been honeſt!—What a devil are all my plots come to! What do they end in but one grand plot upon myſelf, and a title to eternal infamy and diſgrace! But, depending on thy friendly offices, I will ſay no more of this.—Let her ſend me but one line!—But one line!—To treat me as unworthy of her notice; yet be altogether in my power—I cannot—I will not bear that.

My lord, as I ſaid, is extremely ill. The doctors give him over. He gives himſelf over. Thoſe who would not have him die, are afraid he will die. But as to myſelf, I am doubtful: for theſe long and violent ſtruggles between the conſtitution and the diſeaſe (though the latter has three phyſicians and an apothecary to help it forward, and all three, as to their preſcriptions, of different opinions too) indicate a plaguy tough habit, and favour more of recovery than death: and the more ſo, as he has no ſharp or acute mental organs to whet out his bodily ones, and to raiſe his fever above the ſymptomatick helpful one.

Thou wilt ſee in the incloſed what pains I am at to diſpatch meſſengers; who are conſtantly on the road to meet each other, and one of them to link in the chain with a fourth, whoſe ſtation is in London, and five miles onward, or till met. But, in truth, I have ſome other matters for them to perform at the ſame time, with my lord's banker and his lawyer; which will enable me, if his lordſhip is ſo good as to die this bout, to be an overmatch for ſome of my other relations. I don't mean Charlotte and Patty; for they are noble girls; but others, who have been ſcratching and clawing under-ground like ſo many moles in my abſence; and whoſe workings I have diſcovered ſince I have been down, by the little heaps of dirt they have thrown up.

A ſpeedy account of thy commiſſion, dear Jack! The letter travels all night.

LETTER XVIII.

MR. BELFORD, TO ROBERT LOVELACE, ESQ.

LONDON, JUNE 27. TUESDAY.

YOU muſt excuſe me, Lovelace, from engaging in the office you would have me undertake, till I can be better aſſured you really intend honourably at laſt to this much-injured lady.

I believe you know your friend Belford too well, to think he would be eaſy with you, or with any man alive, who ſhould ſeek to make him promiſe for him what he never intended to perform. And let me tell thee, that I have not much confidence in the honour of a man, who by imitation of hands (I will only call it) has ſhewn ſo little regard to the honour of his own relations.

Only that thou haſt ſuch jeſuitical qualifyings, or I ſhould think thee at leaſt touched with remorſe, and brought within view of being aſhamed of thy curſed inventions by the ill ſucceſs of thy laſt: which I heartily congratulate thee upon.

O the divine lady!—But I will not aggravate!

Nevertheleſs, when thou writeſt, that, in thy preſent mood, thou thinkeſt of marrying, and yet canſt ſo eaſily change thy mood: when I know thy heart is againſt the ſtate:—that the four words thou courteſt from the lady are as much to thy purpoſe, as if ſhe wrote forty; ſince it will ſhew ſhe can forgive the higheſt injury that can be offered to woman: and when I recollect how eaſily thou canſt find excuſes to poſtpone, thou muſt be more explicit a good deal, as to thy real intentions, and future honour than thou art: for I cannot truſt to a temporary remorſe; which is brought on by diſappointment too, and not by principle; and the like of which thou haſt ſo often got over.

If thou canſt convince me time enough for the day, that thou meaneſt to do honourably by her, in her own ſenſe of the word; or, if not time enough, wilt fix ſome other day, (which thou oughteſt to leave to her option, and not bind her down for the Thurſday; and the rather, as thy pretence for ſo doing is founded on an abſolute fiction) I will then moſt cheerfully undertake thy cauſe; by perſon, if ſhe will admit me to her preſence; if ſhe will not, by pen. But, in this caſe, thou muſt allow me to be guarantee for thy faith. And, if ſo, as much as I value thee, and reſpect thy ſkill in all the qualifications of a gentleman, thou mayeſt depend upon it, that I will act up to the character of a guarantee, with more honour than the princes of our day uſually do——to their ſhame be it ſpoken.

Mean time, let me tell thee, that my heart bleeds for the wrongs this angelick lady has received: and if thou doſt not marry her, if ſhe will have thee; and, when married, make her the beſt and tendereſt of huſbands, I would rather be a dog, a monkey, a bear, a viper, or a toad, than thee.

Command me with honour, and thou ſhalt find none readier to oblige thee, than thy ſincere friend,

JOHN BELFORD.

LETTER XIX.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

M. HALL, JUNE 27. TUESDAY NIGHT, NEAR 12.

YOURS reached me this moment, by an extraordinary puſh in the meſſengers.

What a man of honour, thou, of a ſudden!

And ſo, in the imaginary ſhape of a guarantee, thou threateneſt me!

Had I not been in earneſt as to the lady, I ſhould not have offered to employ thee in the affair. But, let me ſay, that hadſt thou undertaken the taſk, and I had afterwards thought fit to change my mind, I ſhould have contented myſelf to tell thee, that that was my mind when thou engageddſt for me, and to have given thee the reaſons for the change, and then left thee to thy own direction: for never knew I what fear of man was—nor fear of woman neither, till I became acquainted with Miſs Clariſſa Harlowe; nay, what is moſt ſurprizing, till I came to have her in my power.

And ſo thou wilt not wait upon the charmer of my heart, but upon terms and conditions!—Let it alone, and be curs'd; I care not.—But ſo much credit did I give to the value thou expreſſedſt for her, that I thought the office would have been acceptable to thee, as ſerviceable to me: for what was it, but to endeavour to perſuade her to conſent to the reparation of her own honour? For what have I done but diſgraced myſelf, and been a thief to my own joys?—And if there be an union of hearts, and an intention to ſolemnize, what is there wanting but the fooliſh ceremony?—And that I ſtill offer. But if ſhe will keep back her hand; if ſhe will make [illegible], dear life, my heart is wholly [illegible] I love her beyond expression; [illegible] help it. I hope therefore [illegible] will receive this last tender as I wish. I hope she intends not, like a true woman, to plague, and vex, and tease me, now she has found her power. If she will take me to mercy now these tempests are upon me, (though I frown to condition with her for my sincerity) all her faults, as I have heretofore declared, shall be over; and she shall be as happy as I can make her: for, ruminating upon all that has passed between us, from the first hour of our acquaintance till the present, I must pronounce, that she is virtue itself, and, once more I say, has no equal.

[illegible] to what you hint, of leaving to her [illegible] another day, do you consider, [illegible] will be impossible, that my contrivances and stratagems should be much longer concealed? This makes me press [illegible] though so near; and the more, as I have made so much ado about her [illegible] anniversary. If she send me the [illegible] word, I will spare no fatigue to be [illegible] time, if not for the canonical hour at church, for some other hour of the [illegible] her own apartment, or any other: for money will do every thing: and [illegible] have never spared in this affair. LETTER XX.

MR. LOVELACE, TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

SUPERSCRIBED, TO MRS. LOVELACE.

M. HALL, WEDN. MORN. ONE O'CLOCK, JUNE 28.

NOT one line, my dearest life, not one word, in answer to three letters I have written! The time is now so short, that this must be the last letter that can reach you on this side of the important hour that might make us legally one.

My friend Mr. Belford is apprehensive, that he cannot wait upon you in time, by reason of some urgent affairs of his own.

I the less regret the disappointment, because I have procured a more acceptable person, as I hope, to attend you; Captain Tomlinson I mean: to whom I had applied for this purpose, before I had Mr. Belford's answer.

I was the more solicitous to obtain this favour from him, because of the office he is to take upon him, as I humbly presume to hope, to-morrow. That office obliged him to be in town as this day: and I acquainted him with my unhappy situation with you; and desired, that he would shew me, on this occasion, that I had as much of his favour and friendship, as your uncle had; since the whole treaty must be broken off, if he could not prevail upon you in my behalf.

He will dispatch the messenger directly; whom I propose to meet in person at Slough; either to proceed onward to London with a joyful heart, or to return back to M. Hall, with a broken one.

I ought not (but cannot help it) to anticipate the pleasure Mr. Tomlinson proposes to himself, in acquainting you with the likelihood there is of your mother's seconding your uncle's views. For, it seems, he has privately communicated to her his laudable intentions: and her resolution depends, as well as his, upon what to-morrow will produce.

Disappoint not then, I beseech you, for an hundred persons sakes, as well as for mine, that uncle, and that mother, whose displeasure I have heard you so often deplore.

You may think it impossible for me to reach London by the canonical hour. If it should, the ceremony may be performed in your own apartment, at any time in the day, or at night: so that Captain Tomlinson may have it to aver to your uncle, that it was performed on his anniversary.

Tell but the captain, that you forbid me not to attend you: and that shall be sufficient for bringing to you, on the wings of love, your ever-grateful and affectionate

LOVELACE.

LETTER XXI.

TO MR. PATRICK M'DONALD, AT HIS LODGINGS, AT MR. BROWN'S, PERUKE-MAKER, IN ST. MARTIN'S LANE, WESTMINSTER.

M. HALL, WEDN. MORN. 20 O'CLOCK.

DEAR M'DONALD,

THE bearer of this has a letter to carry to the lady. I have been at the trouble of writing a copy of it; which I incloſe, that you may not miſtake your cue.

You will judge of my reaſons for ante-dating the incloſed ſealed one, directed to you by the name of Tomlinſon; which you are to ſhew the lady, as in confidence. You will open it of courſe.

I doubt not your dexterity and management, dear M'Donald; nor your zeal; eſpecially as the hope of cohabitation muſt now be given up. Impoſſible to be carried is that ſcheme. I might break her heart, but not incline her will. —Am in earneſt, therefore, to marry her, if ſhe let not the day ſlip.

Improve upon the hint of her mother. That muſt touch her. But John Harlowe, remember, has privately engaged that lady—Privately, I ſay; elſe (not to mention the reaſon for her uncle Harlowe's former expedient) you know, ſhe might find means to get a letter away to the one or the other, to know the truth; or to Miſs Howe, to engage her to enquire into it: and if ſhe ſhould, the word privately will account for the uncle's and mother's denying it.

However, fail not, as from me, to charge our mother and her nymphs to redouble their vigilance both as to her perſon and letters. All's upon a criſis now. But ſhe muſt not be treated ill neither.

Thurſday over, I ſhall know what to reſolve upon.

If neceſſary, you muſt aſſume authority. The devil's in't, if ſuch a girl as this ſhall awe a man of your years and experience. You are not in love with her as I am. Fly out, if ſhe doubt your honour. Spirits naturally ſoft may be beat out of their play, and borne down (though ever ſo much raiſed) by higher anger. All women are cowards at bottom! only violent where they may. I have often ſtormed a girl out of her miſtruſt, and made her yield (before ſhe knew where ſhe was) to the point indignantly miſtruſted; and that to make up with me, though I was the aggreſſor.

If this matter ſucceed as I'd have it, (or if not, and do not fail by your fault) I will take you off the neceſſity of purſuing your curſed ſmuggling; which otherwiſe may one day end fatally for you.

We are none of us perfect, M'Donald. This ſweet lady makes me ſerious ſometimes in ſpite of my heart. But as private vices are leſs blameable than publick; and as I think ſmuggling (as it is called) a national evil; I have no doubt to pronounce you a much worſe man than myſelf, and as ſuch ſhall take pleaſure in reforming you.

I ſend you incloſed ten guineas, as a ſmall earneſt of further favours. Hitherto you have been a very clever fellow.

As to cloaths for Thurſday, Monmouth Street will afford a ready ſupply. Cloaths quite new would make your condition ſuſpected. But you may defer that care, till you ſee if ſhe can be prevailed upon. Your riding-dreſs will do for the firſt viſit. Nor let your boots be over-clean. I have always told you the conſequence of attending to the minutiæ, where art (or impoſture, as the ill-mannered would call it) is deſigned —Your linen rumpled and ſoily, when you wait upon her—Eaſy terms theſe—Juſt come to town—Remember (as formerly) to loll, to throw out your legs, to ſtroke and graſp down your ruffles, as if of ſignificance enough to be careleſs. What though the preſence of a fine lady would require a different behaviour, are you not of years to diſpenſe with politeneſs? You can have no deſign upon her, you know. You are a father yourſelf of daughters as old as ſhe. Evermore is parade and obſequiouſneſs ſuſpectable: it muſt ſhew either a fooliſh head, or a knaviſh heart. Aſſume airs of conſequence therefore; and you will be treated as a man of conſequence. I have often more than half-ruined myſelf by my complaiſance; and, being afraid of controul, have brought controul upon myſelf.

I think I have no more to ſay at preſent. I intend to be at Slough, or on the way to it, as by mine to the lady. Adieu, honeſt M'Donald. R. L.

LETTER XXII.

TO CAPTAIN ANTONY TOMLINSON.

[INCLOSED IN THE PRECEDING; TO BE SHEWN TO THE LADY AS IN CONFIDENCE.]

M. HALL, TUESDAY MORN. JUNE 27.

DEAR CAPTAIN TOMLINSON,

AN unhappy miſunderſtanding having ariſen between the deareſt lady in the world and me, (the particulars of which he perhaps may give you, but I will not, because I might be thought partial to myself;) and she refusing to answer my most pressing and respectful letters; I am at a most perplexing uncertainty whether she will meet us or not next Thursday, to solemnize.

My lord is so extremely ill, that if I thought she would not oblige me, I would defer going up to town for two or three days. He cares not to have me out of his sight: yet is impatient to salute my beloved as his niece before he dies. This I have promised to give him an opportunity to do; intending, if the dear creature will make me happy, to set out with her for this place directly from church.

With regret I speak it of the charmer of my soul; that irreconcileableness is her family-fault—The less excusable indeed in her, as she herself suffers by it in so high a degree from her own relations.

Now, Sir, as you intended to be in town some time before Thursday, if it be not too great an inconvenience to you, I could be glad you would go up as soon as possible, for my sake: and this I the more boldly request, as I presume that a man who has so many great affairs of his own in hand as you have, would be glad to be at a certainty himself as to the day.

You, Sir, can so pathetically and justly set before her the unhappy consequences that will follow if the day be postponed, as well with regard to her uncle's disappointment, as to the part you have assured me her mother is willing to take in the wished-for reconciliation, that I have great hopes she will suffer herself to be prevailed upon. And a man and horse shall be in waiting to take your dispatches, and bring them to me.

But if you cannot prevail in my favour, you will be pleased to satisfy your friend Mr. John Harlowe, that it is not my fault that he is not obliged. I am, dear Sir, your extremely obliged and faithful servant, R. LOVELACE.

LETTER XXIII.

TO ROBERT LOVELACE, ESQ.

WEDN. JUNE 28, NEAR 12 O'CLOCK.

HONOURED SIR,

I Received yours, as your servant desired me to acquaint you, by ten this morning. Horse and man were in a foam.

I instantly equipped myself, as if come off from a journey, and posted away to the lady, intending to plead great affairs that I came not before, in order to favour your ante-date; and likewise to be in a hurry, to have a pretence to hurry her ladyship, and to take no denial for her giving a satisfactory return to your messenger: but, upon my entering Mrs. Sinclair's house, I found all in the greatest consternation.

You must not, Sir, be surprized. It is a trouble to me to be the relater of the bad news: but so it is—The lady is gone off. She was missed but half an hour before I came.

Her waiting-maid is run away, or hitherto is not to be found; so that they conclude it is by her connivance.

They had sent, before I came, to my honoured masters Mr. Belton, Mr. Mowbray, and Mr. Belford. Mr. Tourville is out of town.

High words are passing between Madam Sinclair, and Madam Horton, and Madam Martin; as also with Dorcas. And your servant William threatens to hang or drown himself.

They have sent to know if they can hear of Mabell, the waiting-maid, at her mother's, who it seems lives in Chick Lane, West Smithfield; and to an uncle of hers also, who keeps an ale-house at Cow-Cross, hard by, and with whom she lived last.

Your messenger, having just changed his horse, is come back: so I will not detain him longer than to add, that I am, with great concern for this misfortune, and thanks for your seasonable favour and kind intentions towards me, [I am sure this was not my fault] honoured Sir, your most obliged humble servant,

PATRICK M'DONALD.

LETTER XXIV.

MR. MOWBRAY, TO ROBERT LOVELACE, ESQ.

WEDNESDAY, 12 O'CLOCK.

DEAR LOVELACE,

I Have plaguy news to acquaint thee with. Miss Harlowe is gone off!—Quite gone, by my soul!—I have not time for particulars, your servant being gone off. But iff I had, we are not yet come to the bottom of the matter. The ladies here are all blubbering like devills, accusing one another most confoundedly: whilst Belton and I damn them all together in thy name.

If thou shouldest hear that thy fellow Will is taken dead out of some horse-pond, and Dorcas cut down from her bed's bed's teaſter from dangling in her own gatters, be not ſurprized. Here's the devill to pay. Nobody ſerene but Jack Belford, who is taking minutes of examinations, accuſations, and confeſſions, with the ſignificant air of a Middleſex juſtice; and intends to write at large all particulars, I ſuppoſe.

I heartily condole with thee: ſo does Belton. But it may turn out for the beſt: for ſhe is gone away with thy marks, I underſtand. A fooliſh little devill! Where will ſhe mend herſelf? For nobody will look upon her. And they tell me that thou wouldſt certainly have married her, had ſhe ſtaid. But I know thee better.

Dear Bobby, adieu. If Lord M. will die now, to comfort thee for this loſs, what a ſeaſonable exit would he make!—Let's have a letter from thee. Pr'ythee do. Thou canſt write devill-like to Belford, who ſhews us nothing at all. Thine heartily,

RD. MOWBRAY.

LETTER XXV.

MR. BELFORD, TO ROBERT LOVELACE, ESQ.

THURSDAY, JUNE 29.

THOU haſt heard from M'Donald and Mowbray the news. Bad or good, I know not which thou'it deem it. I only wiſh I could have given thee joy upon the ſame account, before the unhappy lady was ſeduced from Hampſtead: for then of what an ungrateful villainy hadſt thou been ſpared the perpetration, which now thou haſt to anſwer for!

I came to town purely to ſerve thee with her, expecting that thy next would ſatisfy me that I might endeavour it without diſhonour. And at firſt when I found her gone, I half pitied thee; for now wilt thou be inevitably blown up: and in what an execrable light wilt thou appear to all the world!—Poor Lovelace! Caught in thy own ſnares! Thy puniſhment is but beginning!

But to my narrative; for I ſuppoſe thou expecteſt all particulars from me, ſince Mowbray his informed thee that I have been collecting them.

The noble exertion of ſpirit ſhe had made on Friday night, had, it ſeems, greatly diſordered her; inſomuch that ſhe was not viſible till Saturday evening; when Mabell ſaw her; and ſhe ſeemed to be very ill: but on Sunday morning, having dreſſed herſelf, as if deſigning to go to church, ſhe ordered Mabell to get her a coach to the door.

The wench told her, She was to obey her in every-thing but the calling of a coach or chair, or in relation to letters.

She ſent for Will, and gave him the ſame command.

He pleaded his maſter's orders to the contrary, and deſired to be excuſed.

Upon this, down ſhe went herſelf, and would have gone out without obſervation: but finding the ſtreet-door double-locked, and the key not in the lock, ſhe ſtept into the ſtreet-parlour, and would have thrown up the ſaſh to call out to the people paſſing by, as they doubted not: but that, ſince her laſt attempt of the ſame nature, had been faſtened down.

Hereupon ſhe reſolutely ſtept into Mrs. Sinclair's parlour in the back-houſe; where were the old devil and her two partners; and demanded the key of the ſtreet-door, or to have it opened for her.

They were all ſurprized; but deſired to be excuſed, and pleaded your orders.

She aſſerted, that you had no authority over her; and never ſhould have any: that their preſent refuſal was their own act and deed: ſhe ſaw the intent of their back-houſe, and the reaſon of putting her there: ſhe pleaded her condition and fortune; and ſaid, they had no way to avoid utter ruin, but by opening their doors to her, or by murdering her, and burying her in their garden or cellar, too deep for detection: that already what had been done to her was puniſhable by death: and bid them at their peril detain her.

What a noble, what a right ſpirit has this charming creature, in caſes that will juſtify an exertion of ſpirit!

They anſwered that Mr. Lovelace could prove his marriage, and would indemnify them. And they all would have vindicated their behaviour on Friday night, and the reputation of their houſe: but refuſing to hear them on that topick, ſhe flung from them, threatening.

She then went up half a dozen ſtairs in her way to her own apartment: but, as if ſhe had bethought herſelf, down ſhe ſtept again, and proceeded towards the ſtreet-parlour; ſaying, as ſhe paſſed by the infamous Dorcas, 'I'll make 'myſelf protectors, though the windows 'ſuffer:' but that wench, of her own head, on the lady's going out of that parlour to Mrs. Sinclair's, had locked the door, and taken out the key: ſo that finding herself disappointed, she burst into tears, and went sobbing and menacing up-stairs again.

She made no other attempt till the effectual one. Your letters and messages, they suppose, coming so fast upon one another, (though she would not answer one of them) gave her some amusement, and an assurance to them, that she would at last forgive you; and that then all would end as you wished.

The women, in pursuance of your orders, offered not to obtrude themselves upon her; and Dorcas also kept out of her sight all the rest of Sunday; also on Monday and Tuesday. But by the lady's condescension (even to familiarity) to Mabell, they imagined, that she must be working in her mind all that time to get away: they therefore redoubled their cautions to the wench; who told them so faithfully all that passed between her lady and her, that they had no doubt of her fidelity to her wicked trust.

'Tis probable she might have been contriving something all the time; but saw no room for perfecting any scheme: the contrivance by which she effected her escape seems to me not to have been fallen upon till the very day; since it depended partly upon the weather, as it proved. But it is evident she hoped something from Mabell's simplicity, or gratitude, or compassion, by cultivating all the time her civility to her.

Polly waited on her early on Wednesday morning; and met with a better reception than she had reason to expect. She complained, however, with warmth, of her confinement. Polly said, There would be an happy end to it (if it were a confinement) next day, she presumed. She absolutely declared to the contrary, in the way Polly meant it; and said, That Mr. Lovelace, on his return, [Which looked as if she intended to wait for it] should have reason to repent the orders he had given, as they all should their observance of them: let him send twenty letters, she would not answer one, be the consequence what it would; nor give him hope of the least favour, while she was in that house. She had given Mrs. Sinclair and themselves fair warning, she said; no orders of another ought to make them detain a free person: but having made an open attempt to go, and been detained by them, she was the calmer, she told Polly; let them look to the consequence.

But yet she spoke this with temper; and Polly gave it as her opinion, (with apprehension for their own safety) that having so good a handle to punish them all, she would not go away if she might. 'And what,' inferred Polly, 'is the indemnity of a man who has committed 'the vilest of rapes on a person of condition; and must himself, if prosecuted 'for it, either fly, or be hanged?'

Sinclair, [so I will still call her] upon this representation of Polly, foretaw, she said, the ruin of her poor house in the issue of this strange business; and the infamous Sally and Dorcas bore their parts in the apprehension: and this put them upon thinking it advisable for the future, that the street-door should generally in the day-time be only left upon a bolt-latch, as they called it, which any-body might open on the inside; and that the key should be kept in the door; that their numerous comers and goers, as they called their guests, should be able to give evidence, that she might have gone out if she would: not forgetting, however, to renew their orders to Will, to Dorcas, to Mabell, and the rest, to redouble their vigilance on this occasion, to prevent her escape:—none of them doubting, at the same time, that her love of a man so considerable in their eyes, and the prospect of what was to happen as she had reason to believe on Thursday, her uncle's birth-day, would (though perhaps not till the last hour, for her pride sake, was their word) engage her to change her temper.

They believe, that she discovered the key to be left in the door; for she was down more than once to walk in the little garden, and seemed to cast her eye each time to the street-door.

About eight yesterday morning, an hour after Polly had left her, she told Mabell, She was sure she should not live long; and having a good many suits of apparel, which after her death would be of no use to any-body she valued, she would give her a brown lustring gown, which, with some alterations, to make it more suitable to her degree, would a great while serve her for a Sunday wear; for that she (Mabell) was the only person in that house of whom she could think without terror or antipathy.

Mabell expressing her gratitude upon the occasion, the lady said, She had nothing to employ herself about; and if she could get a workwoman directly, she would look over her things then, and give her what she intended for her.

Her mistress's mantua-maker, the maid replied, lived but a little way off; and she she doubted not that she could procure her, or one of her journey-women, to alter the gown out of hand.

'I will give you also,' said she, 'a 'quilted-coat, which will require but 'little alteration, if any; for you are 'much about my stature: but the gown 'I will give directions about, because 'the sleeves and the robings and facings 'must be altered for your wear, being, 'I believe, above your station: and try,' said she, 'if you can get the work-'woman, and we'll advise about it. If 'she cannot come now, let her come in 'the afternoon; but I had rather now, 'because it will amuse me to give you a 'lift.'

Then stepping to the window, 'It 'rains,' said she: [And so it had done all the morning] 'slip on the hood and 'short cloak I have seen you wear, and 'come to me when you are ready to go 'out, because you shall bring me in 'something that I want.'

Mabell equipped herself accordingly, and received her commands to buy her some trifles, and then left her; but, in her way out, stept into the back-parlour, where Dorcas was with Mrs. Sinclair, telling her where she was going, and on what account, bidding Dorcas look out till she came back. So faithful was the wench to the trust reposed in her, and so little had the lady's generosity wrought upon her.

Mrs. Sinclair commended her; Dorcas envied her, and took her cue: and Mabell soon returned with the mantua-maker's journeywoman; (she was resolved, she said, she would not come without her) and then Dorcas went off guard.

The lady looked out the gown and petticoat, and before the workwoman caused Mabell to try it on; and, that it might fit the better, made the willing wench pull off her upper-petticoat, and put on that she gave her. Then she bid them go into Mr. Lovelace's apartment, and contrive about it before the pier-glass there, and stay till she came to them, to give them her opinion.

Mabell would have taken her own cloaths, and hood, and short cloak with her; but her lady said, 'No matter; 'you may put them on again here, 'when we have considered about the al-'terations: there's no occasion to litter 'the other room.'

They went; and instantly, as it is supposed, she slipt on Mabell's gown and petticoat over her own, which was white damask, and put on the wench's hood, short cloak, and ordinary apron, and down she went.

Hearing somebody tripping along the passage, both Will and Dorcas whipt to the inner-hall door, and saw her; but, taking her for Mabell, 'Are you going 'far, Mabell?' cried Will.

Without turning her face, or answering, she held out her hand, pointing to the stairs; which they construed as a caution for them to look out in her absence; and supposing she would not be long gone, as she had not in form repeated her caution to them, up went Will, tarrying at the stairs-head in expectation of the supposed Mabell's return.

Mabell and the workwoman waited a good while, amusing themselves not disagreeably, the one with contriving in the way of her business, the other delighting herself with her fine gown and coat: but at last, wondering the lady did not come in to them, Mabell tiptoed it to her door, and tapping, and not being answered, stept into the chamber.

Will, at that instant, from his station at the stairs-head, seeing Mabell in her lady's cloaths; for he had been told of the present, [Gifts to servants fly from servant to servant in a minute] was very much surprized, having, as he thought, just seen her go out in her own; and stepping up, met her at the door. 'How the devil can this be?' said he: 'just now you went out in your own 'dress! How came you here in this? 'And how could you pass me unseen?' But nevertheless, kissing her, said, he would now brag he had kissed his lady, or one in her cloaths.

'I am glad, Mr. William,' cried Mabell, 'to see you here so diligently. But 'know you where my lady is?'

'In my master's apartment,' answered Will. 'Is she not? Was she not talk-'ing with you this moment?'

'No, that's Mrs. Dolins's journey-'woman.'

They both stood aghast, as they said; Will again recollecting he had seen Mabell, as he thought, go out in her own cloaths. And while they were debating and wondering, up comes Dorcas with your fourth letter, just then brought for her lady; and seeing Mabell dressed out, (whom she had likewise beheld a little before, as she supposed, in her common cloaths) she joined in the wonder; till Mabell, re-entering the lady's apartment, missed her own cloaths; and then suspecting what had happened, and letting the others into the ground of the suspicion, ſuſpicion, they all agreed, that ſhe had perfidiously eſcaped. And then followed ſuch an uproar of mutual accuſation, and 'You ſhould have done this,' and, 'You ſhould have done that,' as alarmed the whole houſe; every apartment in both houſes giving up it's devil, to the number of fourteen or fifteen, including the mother and her partners.

Will told them his ſtory; and then ran out, as on the like occaſion formerly, to make enquiry whether the lady was ſeen by any of the coachmen, chairmen, or porters, plying in that neighbourhood: while Dorcas cleared herſelf immediately, and that at the poor Mabell's expence, who made a figure as guilty as aukward, having on the ſuſpected price of her treachery; which Dorcas, out of envy, was ready to tear from her back.

Hereupon all the pack opened at the poor wench, while the mother foamed at the mouth, bellowed out her orders for ſeizing the ſuſpected offender; who could neither be heard in her own defence, nor, had ſhe been heard, would have been believed.

That ſuch a perfidious wretch ſhould ever diſgrace her houſe, was the mother's cry; good people might be corrupted; but it was a fine thing if ſuch a houſe as hers could not be faithfully ſerved by curſed creatures, who were hired knowing the buſineſs they were to be employed in, and who had no pretence to principle!—'Damn her!' the wretch proceeded—She had no patience with her! 'Call the cook, and call the ſcullion!'

They were at hand.

'See, that guilty eyeball devil,' was her word, ('her lady's gown upon her 'back) but I'll puniſh her for a warning to all betrayers of their truſt. Put 'on the great gridiron this moment:' [An oath or a curſe at every word] 'make up a roaring fire—The cleaver 'bring me this inſtant—I'll cut her into 'quarters with my own hands; and carbonade and broil the traitreſs for a 'feaſt to all the dogs and cats in the 'neighbourhood, and eat the firſt ſlice 'of the toad myſelf, without ſalt or 'pepper.'

The poor Mabell, frighted out of her wits, expected every moment to be torn in pieces, having half a ſcore open-clawed paws upon her all at once. She promiſed to confeſs all. But that all, when ſhe had obtained a hearing, was nothing; for nothing had ſhe to confeſs.

Sally hereupon, with a curſe of mercy, ordered her to retire; undertaking that ſhe and Polly would examine her themſelves, that they might be able to write all particulars to his honour; and then, if ſhe could not clear herſelf, or, if guilty, give ſome account of the lady, (who had been ſo wicked as to give them all this trouble) ſo as they might get her again, then the cleaver and gridiron might go to work with all their heart.

The wench, glad of this reprieve, went up ſtairs; and while Sally was laying out the law, and prating away in her uſual dictatorial manner, whipt on another gown, and ſliding down ſtairs, eſcaped to her relations. And this flight, which was certainly more owing to terror than guilt, was, in the true Old Bailey conſtruction, made a confirmation of the latter.

Theſe are the particulars of Miſs Harlowe's flight. Thou'lt hardily think me too minute.—How I long to triumph over thy impatience and fury on the occaſion!

Let me beſeech thee, my dear Lovelace, in thy next letter, to rave moſt gloriouſly!—I ſhall be grievouſly diſappointed, if thou doſt not.

Where, Lovelace, can the poor lady be gone? And who can deſcribe the diſtreſs ſhe muſt be in?

By thy former letters, it may be ſuppoſed, that ſhe can have very little money: nor, by the ſuddeneſs of her flight, more cloaths than thoſe ſhe has on. And thou knoweſt who once ſaid, 'Her pa'rents will not receive her: her uncles 'will not entertain her: her Norton is 'in their direction, and cannot: Miſs 'Howe dare not: ſhe has not one friend 'or intimate in town; entirely a ſtran'ger to it.' And, let me add, has been deſpoiled of her honour by the man for whom ſhe made all theſe ſacrifices: and who ſtood bound to her by a thouſand oaths and vows, to be her huſband, her protector, and friend!

How ſtrong muſt be her reſentment of the barbarous treatment ſhe has received! How worthy of herſelf, that it has made her hate the man ſhe once loved! And rather than marry him, chuſe to expoſe her diſgrace to the whole world; to forego the reconciliation with her friends which her heart was ſo ſet upon; and to hazard a thouſand evils to which her youth and her ſex may too probably expoſe an indigent and friendleſs beauty!

Remembereſt thou not that home-puſh upon thee, in one of the papers written in her delirium; of which however it favours not?

I will

I will assure thee, that I have very often since most seriously reflected upon it; and as thy intended second outrage convinces me, that it made no impression upon thee then, and perhaps thou hast never thought of it since, I will transcribe the sentence.

'If, as religion teaches us, God will 'judge us, in a great measure, by our 'benevolent or evil actions to one ano-'ther—O wretch, bethink thee, in time 'bethink thee, how great must be thy 'condemnation!'

And is this amiable doctrine the sum of religion? Upon my faith, I believe it is. For, to indulge a serious thought, since we are not atheists, except in practice, Does God, the BEING of beings, want any-thing of us for HIMSELF! And does he not enjoin us works of mercy to one another, as the means to obtain His mercy? A sublime principle, and worthy of the SUPREME SUPERINTENDANT and FATHER of all things!—But if we are to be judged by this noble principle what, indeed, must be thy condemnation on the score of this lady only! And what mine, and what all our confraternity's, on the score of other women: though we are none of us half so bad as thou art, as well for want of inclination, I hope, as of opportunity!

I must add, that, as well for thy own sake, as for the lady's, I wish ye were yet to be married to each other. It is the only medium that can be hit upon, to salve the honour of both. All that's past may yet be concealed from the world, and from her relations; and thou mayest make amends for all her sufferings, if thou resolvest to be a tender and kind husband to her.

And if this really be thy intention, I will accept, with pleasure, of a commission from thee, that shall tend to promote so good an end, whenever she can be found; that is to say, if she will admit to her presence a man who professes friendship to thee. Nor can I give a greater demonstration, that I am thy sincere friend, J. BELFORD.

P. S. Mabell's cloaths were thrown into the passage this morning: nobody knows by whom.

LETTER XXVI.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

FRIDAY, JUNE 30.

I Am ruined, undone, blown up, destroyed, and worse than annihilated, that's certain!—But was not the news shocking enough, dost thou think, without thy throwing into the too weighty scale reproaches, which thou could'st have had no opportunity to make but for my own voluntary communications? at a time too, when, as it falls out, I have another very sensible disappointment to struggle with?

I imagine, if there be a such a thing as future punishment, it must be none of the smallest mortifications, that a new devil shall be punished by a worse old one. And, 'Take that!' And Take that!' to the screaming sufferer, laying on with a cat-o'-nine tails, with a star of burning brass at the end of each: And, 'for 'what! For what!'—'Why, if the truth 'might be fairly told, for not being so 'bad a devil as myself!'

Thou art, surely, casuist good enough to know (what I have insisted upon heretofore) that the sin of seducing a credulous and easy girl, is as great as that of bringing to your lure an incredulous and watchful one.

However ungenerous an appearance what I am going to say may have from my pen, let me tell thee, that if such a woman as Miss Harlowe chose to enter into the matrimonial state [I am resolved to disappoint thee in thy meditated triumph over my rage and despair!] and, according to the old patriarchal system, to go on contributing to get sons and daughters, with no other view, than to bring them up piously, and to be good and useful members of the commonwealth, what a devil had she to do, to let her fancy run a gadding after a rake? One whom she knew to be a rake?

Oh but truly she hoped to have the merit of reclaiming him. She had formed pretty notions how charming it would look to have a penitent of her own making dangling at her side to church, through an applauding neighbourhood: and, as their family increased, marching with her thither, at the head of their boys and girls, processionally as it were, boasting of the fruits of their honest desires, as my good lord bishop has it in his licence. And then what a comely sight, all kneeling down together in one pew, according to eldership, as we have seen in effigie, a whole family upon some old monument, where the honest chevalier in armour is represented kneeling, with uplift hands, and half a dozen jolter-headed crop-eared boys behind him, ranged gradatim, or step-fashion, according to age or size, all in the same posture—Facing his pious dame, [illegible] with a ruff about her neck, and [illegible] girls all kneeling [illegible] a altar between them, and [illegible] upon it: over their heads [illegible] darting from gilded [illegible] surrounding an atchievement—quite in Cæsar Salus—or Quis—[illegible] if they have happened to live the usual married life of brawl and contradiction.

It is certainly as much my misfortune to have fallen in with Miss Clarissa Harlowe, were I to have valued my reputation or ease, as it is that of Miss Harlowe to have been acquainted with me. And, after all, what have I done more than prosecute the maxims, by which thou and I, and every rake, are governed, and which, before I knew this lady, we have pursued from pretty girl to pretty girl, as fast as we had set one down, taking another up;—just as the fellows do with their flying-coaches and flying-horses at a country fair—— With a Who rides next! Who rides next!'

But here, in the present case, to carry on the volant metaphor, (for I must either be merry or mad) here is a pretty little Miss just come out of her hanging sleeve-coat, brought to buy a pretty little fairing; for the world, Jack, is but a great fair, thou knowest; and, to give thee serious reflection for serious, all it's joys but tinselled hobby-horses, gilt gingerbread, squeaking trumpets, painted drums, and so-forth.

Now behold this pretty little Miss skimming from booth to booth, in a very pretty manner. One pretty little fellow called Wyerley, perhaps; another jiggeting rascal called Biron, a third limpering varlet of the name of Symmes, and a more hideous villain than any of the rest, with a long bag under his arm, and parchment settlements tagged to his heels, ycleped Solmes; pursue her from raree-show to raree-show, shouldering upon one another at every turning, stopping when she stops, and set a spinning again when she moves. And thus dangled after, but still in the eye of her watchful guardians, traverses the pretty little Miss through the whole fair, equally delighted and delighting: till at last, taken with the invitation of the laced-hat owner, and seeing several pretty little bib-wearers stuck together in the flying-coaches, cutting safely the yielding air, in the one go-up the other go-down-picture-of-the-world vehicle, and all with as little fear as wit, is tempted to ride next.

In then suppose the silly pops, when none of her friends are near her: and if, after two or three ups and downs, her pretty little head turns giddy, and she throws herself out of the coach when at it's elevation, and so dashes out her pretty little brains, who can help it?—And would you hang the poor fellow, whose professed trade it was, to set the pretty little creatures a flying?

'Tis true, this pretty little Miss, being a very pretty little Miss, being a very much-admired little Miss, being a very good little Miss, who always minded her book, and had passed through her sampler-doctrine with high applause; had even stitched out, in gaudy propriety of colours, an Abraham offering up Isaac, a Samson and the Philistines, and flowers, and knots, and trees, and the sun, and the moon, and the seven stars, all hung up in frames with glasses before them, for the admiration of her future grand children: who likewise was entitled to a very pretty little estate; who was descended from a pretty little family upwards of one hundred years gentility; which lived in a very pretty manner, respected a very little on their own accounts, a great deal on hers:—

For such a pretty little Miss as this to come to so great a misfortune, must be a very sad thing: but, tell me, would not the losing of any ordinary child, of any other less considerable family, of less shining or amiable qualities, have been as great and heavy a loss to that family, as the losing this pretty little Miss could be to hers?

To descend to a very low instance, and that only as to personality; hast thou any doubt, that thy strong-muscled bony face was as much admired by thy mother, as if it had been the face of a Lovelace, or any other handsome fellow? And had thy picture been drawn, would she have forgiven the painter, had he not expressed so exactly thy lineaments, as that every-one should have discerned the likeness? The handsome likeness is all that is wished for. Ugliness made familiar to us, with the partiality natural to fond parents, will be beauty all the world over.—Do thou apply.

But, alas! Jack, all this is but a copy of my countenance, drawn to evade thy malice!—Though it answer thy unfriendly purpose to own it, I cannot forbear to own it, that I am flung to the very soul with this unhappy—Accident, must I call it!—Have I nobody, whose throat, thrust, either for carelessness or treachery, I ought to cut, in order to pacify my vengeance?

When I reflect upon my last iniquitous intention, the first outrage so nobly resented, as well as, so far as she was able, so nobly resisted, I cannot but conclude that I was under the power of fascination from these accursed Circes; who pretending to know their own sex, would have it, that there is in every woman a yielding, or a weak-resisting moment to be met with: and that yet, and yet, and yet, I had not tried enough: but that, if neither love nor terror should enable me to hit that lucky moment, when, by help of their cursed arts, she was once overcome, she would be for ever overcome:—appealing to all my experience, to all my knowledge of the sex, for a justification of their assertion.

My appeal to experience, I own was but too favourable to their argument: for dost thou think, I could have held my purpose against such an angel as this, had I ever before met with a woman so much in earnest to defend her honour against the unwearied artifices and perseverance of the man she loved: Why then were there not more examples of a virtue so immoveable? Or, why was this singular one to fall to my lot? Except indeed to double my guilt; and at the same time to convince all that should hear her story, that there are angels as well as devils in the flesh?

So much for confession; and for the sake of humouring my conscience; with a view likewise to disarm thy malice by acknowledgment: since no one shall say worse of me, than I will of myself on this occasion.

One thing I will nevertheless add, to shew the sincerity of my contrition—'Tis this, that if thou canst by any means find her out within these three days, or any time before she has discovered the stories relating to Captain Tomlinson and her uncle to be what they are; and if thou canst prevail upon her to consent, I will actually, in thy presence and his (he to represent her uncle) marry her.

I am still in hopes it may be so—She cannot be long concealed—I have already set all engines to work to find her out! and if I do, what indifferent persons [and no one of her friends, as thou observest, will look upon her] will care to embroil themselves with a man of my figure, fortune, and resolution?—Shew her this part, then, or any other part, of this letter, at thy own discretion, if thou shalt find her; for otherwise methinks that I would be glad there this affair, which is bad enough in itself, should go off without untoward consequences to any body else; and as it runs in my mind, I dream not only, that sooner or later, it will cost a few drops of blood after it; except that and I can make it up between ourselves. And this may be another reason why she should not carry her resentment too far—Not that such an affair would give me much concern neither, were I to chuse any man or men; for I heartily hate all her family but herself; and ever shall.

Let me add, that the lady's plot to escape appears to me no extraordinary one. There was much more luck than probability that it should do: since, to make it succeed, it was necessary that Dorcas and Will, and Sinclair and her nymphs should be all deceived, or off their guard. It belongs to me, when I see them, to give them my hearty thanks that they were; and that their selfish care to provide for their own future security, should induce them, to leave their outward door upon their holt-latch, and be curs'd to them.

Mabell deserves a pitch-suit and a bonfire, rather than the lustring; and as her cloaths are returned, let the lady's be put to her others, to be sent to her when it can be told whither—But not till I give the word neither; for we must get the dear fugitive back again, if possible.

I suppose that my stupid villain, who knew not such a goddess-shaped lady with a mien so noble, from the ash-pool and bent shouldered Mabell, has been at Hampstead to see after her. And yet I hardly think she would go thither. He ought to go through every street where bills for lodgings are up, to enquire after a new-comer. The houses of such as deal in womens matters, and tea, coffee, and such like, are those to be enquired at for her. If some tidings be not quickly heard of her, I would not have either Dorcas, Will, or Mabell, appear in my sight, whatever their superiors think fit to do.

This, though written in character, is a very long letter, considering it is not a narrative one, or a journal of proceedings, like most of my former; for such will unavoidably and naturally, as I may say, run into length. But I have so used myself to write a great deal of late, that I know not how to help it.

[illegible] to it's length, in order [illegible] to a hint I gave at [illegible] of it; which was, that I [illegible] disappointment, beſides [illegible] Miſs Harlowe's eſcape, to be-[illegible]

[illegible] what doſt think it is? Why, the [illegible] peer, out of his tough conſtitution, [illegible] that malady would have helped him on] has made ſhift by fire and brimſtone, and the devil knows what, to force the gout to quit the counter-ſcarp of his ſtomach, juſt as it had collected all it's ſtrength, in order to ſtorm the citadel of his heart. In ſhort, they have, by the mere force of ſtink-pots, hand-grenades, and pop-guns, driven the low-working pioneer quite out of the trunk into the extremities; and there it lies nibbling and gnawing upon his great toe; when I had hoped a fair end both of the diſtemper and the diſtempered.

But I, who could write to thee of laudanum, and the wet cloth, formerly, yet let 5000*l.* a year ſlip through my fingers, when I had entered upon it more than in imagination, [for I had begun to aſk the ſtewards queſtions, and to hear them talk of fines and renewals and ſuch ſort of ſtuff] deſerve to be mortified.

Thou canſt not imagine, how differently the ſervants, and even my couſins, look upon me, ſince yeſterday, to what they did before. Neither the one nor the other bow or curtſey half ſo low.—Nor am I a quarter ſo often his honour, and your honour, as I was within theſe few hours, with the former: and as to the latter—It is 'Couſin Bobby,' again, with the uſual familiarity, inſtead of 'Sir,' and 'Sir,' and, 'If you pleaſe, 'Mr. Lovelace.' And now they have the inſolence to congratulate me on the recovery of the beſt of uncles; while I am forced to ſeem as much delighted as they, when, would it do me good, I could ſit down and cry my eyes out.

I had beſpoke my mourning in imagination, after the example of a certain foreign miniſter, who, before the death, or even laſt illneſs of Charles II. as honeſt White Kennet tells us, had half exhauſted Blackwell Hall of it's ſables —An indication, as the hiſtorian would inſinuate, that the monarch was to be poiſoned, and the ambaſſador in the ſecret—And yet, fool that I was, I could not take the hint—What the devil does a man read hiſtory for, if he cannot profit by the examples he finds in it?

But thus, Jack, is an obſervation of the old peer's verified, That one misfortune ſeldom comes alone: and ſo concludes, thy doubly mortified

LOVELACE.

LETTER XXVII.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE TO MISS HOWE.

WEDN. NIGHT, JUNE 28.

O MY DEAREST MISS HOWE!

ONCE more have I eſcaped—But, alas! I, my beſt ſelf, have not eſcaped!—Oh! your poor Clariſſa Harlowe! You alſo will hate me, I fear!—Yet you won't, when you know all!

But no more of myſelf!—My loſt ſelf. You that can riſe in a morning to be bleſt, and to bleſs; and go to reſt delighted with your own reflections, and in your unbroken, unſtarting ſlumbers, converſing with ſaints and angels, the former only more pure than yourſelf, as they have ſhaken off the incumbrance of body; you ſhall be my ſubject, as you have long, long, been my only pleaſure. And let me, at awful diſtance, revere my beloved Anna Howe, and in her reflect upon what her Clariſſa Harlowe once was!

FORGIVE, O forgive, my rambling. My peace is deſtroyed. My intellects are touched. And what flighty nonſenſe muſt you read, if you now will vouchſafe to correſpond with me as formerly!

O my beſt, my deareſt, my only friend! What a tale have I to unfold!—But ſtill upon ſelf, this vile, this hated ſelf!—I will ſhake it off, if poſſible; and why ſhould I not, ſince I think, except one wretch, I hate nothing ſo much? Self, then, be baniſhed from ſelf one moment, (for I doubt it will for no longer) to enquire after a dearer object, my beloved Anna Howe!—Whoſe mind, all robed in ſpotleſs white, charms and irradiates—But what would I ſay?—

AND now, my deareſt friend, after this rhapſody, which, on re-peruſal, I would not let go, but to ſhew you what a diſtracted mind dictates to my trembling pen! How do you! You have been very ill, it ſeems. That you are recovered, my dear, let me hear. That your mother is well, pray let me hear, and hear quickly. This comfort ſurely is owing to me; for if life is no worſe than chequer-work, I muſt now have a little white to come, having ſeen nothing but black, all unchequered diſmal black, for a great, great while.

AND

And what is all this wild incoherence for? It is only to beg to know how you have been, and how you now do, by a line directed for Mrs. Rachel Clark, at Mr. Smith's, a glove-ſhop, in King Street, Covent Garden; which (although my abode is ſecret to every-body elſe) will reach the hands of—your unhappy—but that's not enough—your miſerable

CLARISSA HARLOWE.

LETTER XXVIII.

MRS. HOWE, TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

(SUPERSCRIBED, AS DIRECTED IN THE PRECEDING.)

FRIDAY, JUNE 30.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE,

YOU will wonder to receive a letter from me. I am ſorry for the great diſtreſs you ſeem to be in—Such a hopeful young lady as you were!—But ſee what comes of diſobedience to parents!

For my part, although I pity you, yet I much more pity your poor father and mother. Such education as they gave you!—ſuch improvements as you made!—and ſuch delight as they took in you!—And all come to this!

But pray, Miſs, don't make my Nancy guilty of your fault; which is that of diſobedience. I have charged her over and over not to correſpond with one who has made ſuch a giddy ſtep. It is not to her reputation, I am ſure. You know that I ſo charged her; yet you go on correſponding together, to my very great vexation! for ſhe has been very perverſe upon it, more than once. Evil communication, Miſs—You know the reſt.

Here, people cannot be unhappy by themſelves, but they muſt involve their friends and acquaintance, whoſe diſcretion has kept them clear of their errors, into near as much unhappineſs as if they had run into the like of their own heads! Thus my poor daughter is always in tears and grief. And ſhe has poſtponed her own felicity, truly, becauſe you are unhappy.

If people, who ſeek their own ruin, could be the only ſufferers by their headſtrong doings, it were ſomething: but, O Miſs, Miſs! what have you to anſwer for, who have made as many grieved hearts as have known you!—The whole ſex is indeed wounded by you: for, who but Miſs Clariſſa Harlowe was propoſed by every father and mother for a pattern for their daughters?

I write a long letter, I ſhould have poſed to ſay but a few words—and have to forbid you writing to my Nancy—and this as well becauſe of the faſe hop you have made, as becauſe it will grieve her poor heart, and do you no good. If you love her, therefore, write not to her—your ſad letter came into my hands, Nancy being abroad: and I ſhall not ſhew it her: for there would be no comfort for her, if ſhe ſaw it, nor for me, whoſe delight ſhe is—As you once was to your parents.

But you ſeem to be ſenſible enough of your errors now.—So are all giddy girls, when it is too late: and what a creſt-fallen figure then do the conſequences of their ſelf-willed obſtinacy and headſtrongedneſs compel them to make!

I may ſay too much: only as I think it proper to bear that teſtimony againſt your raſhneſs which it behoves every careful parent to bear: and none more than your compaſſionating well-wiſhing,

ANNABELLA HOWE.

I ſend this by a ſpecial meſſenger, who has buſineſs only ſo far as Barnet, becauſe you ſhall have no need to write again; knowing how you love writing: and knowing likewiſe, that misfortune makes people plaintive.

LETTER XXIX.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MRS. HOWE.

SATURDAY, JULY 1.

PERMIT me, Madam, to trouble you with a few lines, were it only to thank you for your reproofs; which have, nevertheleſs, drawn freſh ſtreams of blood from a bleeding heart.

My ſtory is a diſmal ſtory. It has circumſtances in it that would engage pity, and poſſibly a judgment not altogether unfavourable, were thoſe circumſtances known. But it is my buſineſs, and ſhall be all my buſineſs, to repent of my failings, and not endeavour to extenuate them.

Nor will I ſeek to diſtreſs your worthy mind. If I cannot ſuffer alone, I will make as few parties as I can in my ſufferings. And, indeed, I took up my pen with this reſolution when I wrote the letter which has fallen into your hands. It was only to know, and that for a very particular reaſon, as well as for affection unbounded, if my dear Miſs Howe from whom I had not heard of a long time, were ill; as I had been told ſhe was; and if ſo, how ſhe now doing. But my injuries being recent, and my distresses having been exceeding great, you will crowd into my letter. When distressed, the human mind is apt to turn itself to every-one in whom it imagined or wished an interest, for pity and consolation—Or, to express myself better, and more concisely, in your own words; Misfortune makes people plaintive: and to whom, if not to a friend, can the afflicted complain?

Miss Howe being abroad when my letter came, I flatter myself that she is recovered. But it would be some satisfaction to me to be informed if she has been ill. Another line from your hand would be too great a favour: but, if you will be pleased to direct any servant to answer yes, or no, to that question, I will not be further troublesome.

Nevertheless, I must declare, that my Miss Howe's friendship was all the comfort I had, or expected to have in this world; and a line from her would have been a cordial to my fainting heart. Judge then, dearest Madam, how reluctantly I must obey your prohibition—But yet I will endeavour to obey it; although I should have hoped, as well from the tenor of all that has passed between Miss Howe and me, as from her established virtue, that she could not be tainted by evil communication, had one or two letters been permitted. This, however, I ask not for, since I think I have nothing to do, but to beg of God (who, I hope, has not yet withdrawn his grace from me, although he is pleased to let loose his justice upon my faults) to give me a truly broken spirit, if it be not already broken enough, and then to take to his mercy the unhappy

CLARISSA HARLOWE.

Two favours, good Madam, I have to beg of you—The first—that you will not let any of my relations know that you have heard from me. The other—that no living creature be apprized where I am to be heard of, or directed to. This is a point that concerns me, more than I can express.—In short, my preservation from further evils may depend upon it.

LETTER XXX.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO HANNAH BURTON.

THURSDAY, JUNE 29.

MY GOOD HANNAH,

STRANGE things have happened to me, since you were dismissed my service, (so sorely against my will) and your pert fellow-servant set over me.—But that must be all forgotten now.

How do you, my Hannah? Are you recovered of your illness? If you are, do you chuse to come and be with me? Or can you conveniently?

I am a very unhappy creature, and, being among all strangers, should be glad to have you with me, of whose fidelity and love I have had so many acceptable instances.

Living or dying, I will endeavour to make it worth your while, my Hannah.

If you are recovered, as I hope, and if you have a good place, it may be they would bear with your absence, and suffer somebody in your room for a month or so: and, by that time, I hope to be provided for, and you may then return to your place.

Don't let any of my friends know of this my desire; whether you can come or not.

I am at Mr. Smith's, a hosier's and glove shop, in King Street, Covent Garden.

You must direct to me by the name of Rachel Clark.

Do, my good Hannah, come if you can to your poor young mistress, who always valued you, and always will, whether you come or not.

I send this to your mother at St. Alban's, not knowing where to direct to you. Return me a line, that I may know what to depend upon: and I shall see you have not forgotten the pretty hand you were taught, in happy days, by your true friend,

CLARISSA HARLOWE.

LETTER XXXI.

HANNAH BURTON. IN ANSWER.

MONDAY, JULY 3.

HONORED MADDAM,

I Have not forgot to write, and never will forget any-thing you, my dear young lady, was so good as to larn me. I am very sorrowful for your misfortens, my dearest young lady; so sorrowfull, I do not know what to do. Gladd at harte would I be to be able to come to you. But indeed I have not been able to stir out of my rome here at my mother's, ever since I was forsed to leave my plase with a roomatise, which has made me quite and clene helpless. I will pray for you night and day, my dearest, my kindest, my goodest young lady, who have been so badly used; and I am very sorry I cannot come to do you love and farvice; ſarvice; which will ever be in the harte of mee to do, if it was in my power: who am your moſt dutifull ſarvant to command,

HANNAH BURTON.

LETTER XXXII.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MRS. JUDITH NORTON.

THURSDAY, JUNE 29.

MY DEAR MRS. NORTON,

I Addreſs myſelf to you after a very long ſilence, (which, however, was not owing either to want of love or duty) principally to deſire you to ſatisfy me in two or three points, which it behoves me to know.

My father, and all the family, I am informed, are to be at my uncle Harlowe's this day, as uſual. Pray acquaint me, if they have been there? And if they were cheerful on the anniverſary occaſion? And alſo, if you have heard of any journey, or intended journey, of my brother, in company with Captain Singleton and Mr. Solmes?

Strange things have happened to me, my dear, worthy, and maternal friend—Very ſtrange things!—Mr. Lovelace has proved a very barbarous and ungrateful man to me. But, God be praiſed, I have eſcaped from him. Being among abſolute ſtrangers, (though I think worthy folks) I have written to Hannah Burton to come and be with me. If the good creature fall in your way, pray encourage her to come to me. I always intended to have her, ſhe knows: but hoped to be in happier circumſtances.

Say nothing to any of my friends that you have heard from me.

Pray—Do you think my father would be prevailed upon, if I were to ſupplicate him by letter, to take off the heavy curſe he laid upon me at my going from Harlowe Place? I can expect no other favour from him: but that being literally fulfilled as to my proſpects in this life, I hope it will be thought to have operated far enough; and my heart is ſo weak!—It is very weak!—But for my father's own ſake—What ſhould I ſay!—Indeed I hardly know how I ought to expreſs myſelf on this ſad ſubject!—But it will give eaſe to my mind to be releaſed from it.

I am afraid my poor, as I uſed to call the good creatures to whoſe neceſſities I was wont to adminiſter by your faithful hands, have miſſed me of late. But now, alas! I am poor myſelf. It is not the leaſt aggravation of my fault, nor of my regrets, that with ſuch inclinations as God had given me, I have [illegible] out of my power to do the good I [illegible] pleaſed myſelf to think I was born to [illegible]. It is a ſad thing, my deareſt Mrs. Norton, to render uſeleſs to ourſelves and the world, by our own raſhneſs, the faculties which Providence has entruſted to us, for the ſervice of both.

But theſe reflections are now too late; and perhaps I ought to have kept them to myſelf. Let me, however, hope, that you love me ſtill. Pray let me hope that you do. And then, notwithſtanding my misfortunes, which have made me ſeem ungrateful to the kind and truly-maternal pains you have taken with me from my cradle, I ſhall have the happineſs to think that there is one worthy perſon, who hates not the unfortunate.

CLARISSA HARLOWE.

Pray remember me to my ſoſter-brother. I hope he continues dutiful and good to you.

Be pleaſed to direct, 'For Rachel Clark, at Mr. Smith's, in King Street, Covent Garden.' But keep the direction an abſolute ſecret.

LETTER XXXIII.

MRS. NORTON. IN ANSWER.

SATURDAY, JULY 1.

YOUR letter, my deareſt young lady, cuts me to the heart! Why will you not let me know all your diſtreſſes?—Yet you have ſaid enough!

My ſon is very good to me. A few hours ago he was taken with a feverish diſorder. But I hope it will go off happily, if his ardour for buſineſs will give him the receſs from it which his good maſter is willing to allow him. He preſents his duty to you, and ſhed tears at hearing your ſad letter read.

You have been miſinformed as to your family's being at your uncle Harlowe's. They did not intend to be there. Nor was the day kept at all. Indeed, they have not ſtirred out, but to church, (and that but three times) ever ſince the day you went away.—Unhappy day for them, and for all who know you!—To me, I am ſure, moſt particularly ſo!—My heart now bleeds more and more for you.

I have not heard a ſyllable of ſuch a journey as you mentioned of your brother, Captain Singleton, and Mr. Solmes. There has been ſome talk indeed of your brother's ſetting out for his northern eſtates: but I have not heard of it lately.

I am

upon afraid no letter will be received from you. It grieves me to tell you so, my dearest young lady. No evil can have happened to you, which they do not expect to hear of; so great is their antipathy to the wicked man, and so bad is his character.

I cannot but think hardly of their unforgiveness: but there is no judging for others by one's self. Nevertheless I will add, that, if you had had as gentle spirits to deal with as your own, or, I will be bold to say, as mine, these evils had never happened either to them, or to you. I knew your virtue, and your hope of virtue, from your very cradle; and I doubted not but that, with God's grace, would always be your guard. But you could never be driven; nor was there occasion to drive you—So generous, so noble, so discreet—But how does my love of your amiable qualities encrease my affliction; as these recollections must do yours!

You are escaped, my dearest Miss—Happily, I hope—That is to say, with your honour—Else, how great must be your distress!—Yet from your letter I dread the worst.

I am very seldom at Harlowe Place. The house is not the house it used to be, since you went from it. Then they are so relentless! And, as I cannot say harsh things of the beloved child of my heart, as well as bosom, they do not take it amiss that I stay away.

Your Hannah left her place ill some time ago; and, as she is still at her mother's at St. Alban's, I am afraid she continues ill. If so, as you are among strangers, and I cannot encourage you at present to come into these parts, I shall think it my duty to attend you (let it be taken as it will) as soon as my Tommy's indisposition will permit; which I hope will be soon.

I have a little money by me. You say you are poor yourself.—How grievous are those words from one entitled and accustomed to affluence!—Will you be so good to command it, my beloved young lady?—It is most of it your own bounty to me. And I should take a pride to restore it to it's original owner.

Your poor bless you, and pray for you continually. I have so managed your half benevolence, and they have been so healthy, and have had such constant employ, that it has held out; and will hold out, till the happier times return which I continually pray for.

Let me beg of you, my dearest young lady, to take to yourself all those aids, which good persons, like you, draw from RELIGION, in support of their calamities. Let your sufferings be what they will, I am sure you have been innocent in your intention. So do not despond. None are made to suffer above what they can, and therefore ought to bear.

We know not the methods of Providence, nor what wise ends it may have to serve in it's seemingly severe dispensations to it's poor creatures.

Few persons have greater reason to say this than myself. And since we are apt in calamities to draw more comfort from example than precept, you will permit me to remind you of my own lot: for who has had greater share of afflictions than myself?

To say nothing of the loss of an excellent mother, at a time of life when motherly care is most wanted; the death of a dear father, who was an ornament to his cloth, (and who had qualified me to be his scribe and amanuensis) just as he came within view of a preferment which would have made his family easy, threw me friendless into the wide world, threw me upon a very careless, and, which was much worse, a very unkind husband. Poor man!—But he was spared long enough, thank God, in a tedious illness, to repent of his neglected opportunities and his light principles; which I have always thought of with pleasure, although I was left the more destitute for his chargeable illness, and ready to be brought to bed, when he died, of my Tommy.

But this very circumstance, which I thought the unhappiest that I could have been left in, (so short-sighted is human prudence!) became the happy means of recommending me to your mother, who, in regard to my character, and in compassion to my very destitute circumstances, permitted me, as I made a conscience of not parting with my poor boy, to nurse both you and him, born within a few days of each other. And I have never since wanted any of the humble blessings which God has made me contented with.

Nor have I known what a very great grief was, from the day of my poor husband's death, till the day that your parents told me how much they were determined that you should have Mr. Solmes; when I was apprized not only of your aversion to him, but how unworthy he was of you: for then I began to dread the consequences of forcing so generous a spirit; and, till then, I never feared Mr. Lovelace, attracting ing as was his perſon, and ſpecious his manners and addreſs. For I was ſure you would never have him, if he gave you not good reaſon to be convinced of his reformation: nor till your friends were as well ſatisfied in it as yourſelf. But that unhappy miſunderſtanding between your brother and Mr. Lovelace, and their joining ſo violently to force you upon Mr. Solmes, did all that miſchief, which has coſt you and them ſo dear, and poor me all my peace! O what has not this ungrateful, this double-guilty man to anſwer for!

Nevertheleſs, you know not what God has in ſtore for you yet!—But if you are to be puniſhed all your days here, for example ſake, in a caſe of ſuch importance, for your one falſe ſtep, be pleaſed to conſider, that this life is but a ſtate of probation; and if you have your purification in it, you will be the more happy. Nor doubt I, that you will have the higher reward hereafter for ſubmitting to the will of Providence here with patience and reſignation.

You ſee, my deareſt Miſs Clary, that I make no ſcruple to call the ſtep you took a falſe one. In you it was leſs excuſable than it would have been in any other young lady; not only becauſe of your ſuperior talents, but becauſe of the oppoſition between your character and his: ſo that if you had been provoked to quit your father's houſe, it needed not to have been with him. Nor needed I, indeed, but as an inſtance of my impartial love, to have written this to you.

After this, it will have an unkind, and perhaps at this time an unſeaſonable appearance, to expreſs my concern, that you have not before favoured me with a line. Yet if you can account to yourſelf for your ſilence, I dare ſay, I ought to be ſatisfied; for I am ſure you love me: as I both love and honour you, and ever will, and the more for your misfortunes.

One conſolation, methinks, I have, even when I am ſorrowing for your calamities; and that is, that I know not any young perſon ſo qualified to ſhine the brighter for the trials ſhe may be exerciſed with: and yet it is a conſolation that ends in adding to my regrets for your afflictions, becauſe you are bleſſed with a mind ſo well able to bear proſperity, and to make every-body round you the better for it!—Woe unto him!—O this wretched, wretched man!—But I will forbear till I know more.

Ruminating on every-thing your melancholy letter ſuggeſts, I ask apprehending from the gentleneſs of your mind, the amiableneſs of your perſon, and your youth, the further miſfortunes and inconveniences to which you may poſſibly be ſubjected, I cannot conclude without aſking for your leave to attend you, and that in a very earneſt manner.—And I beg of you not to deny me, on any conſideration relating to myſelf, or even to the indiſpoſition of my other beloved child; if I can be either of uſe or comfort to you. Were it, my deareſt young lady, but for two or three days, permit me to attend you, although my ſon's illneſs ſhould encreaſe, and compel me to come down again at the end of thoſe two or three days.—I repeat my requeſt likewiſe, that you will command from me the little ſum remaining in my hands of your bounty to your poor, as well as that diſpenſed to your ever-affectionate and faithful ſervant,

JUDITH NORTON.

LETTER XXXIV.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO LADY BETTY LAWRANCE.

THURSDAY, JUNE 29.

MADAM,

I Hope you'll excuſe the freedom of this addreſs, from one who has not the honour to be perſonally known to you, although you muſt have heard much of Clariſſa Harlowe. It is only to beg the favour of a line from your ladyſhip's hand, (by the next poſt, if convenient) in anſwer to the following queſtions.

1. Whether you wrote a letter, dated, as I have a memorandum, Wedn. June 7, congratulating your nephew Lovelace on his ſuppoſed nuptials, as reported to you by Mr. Spurrier, your ladyſhip's ſteward, as from one Captain Tomlinſon:—and in it reproaching Mr. Lovelace, as guilty of ſlight, &c. in not having acquainted your ladyſhip and the family with his marriage?
2. Whether your ladyſhip wrote to Miſs Montague to meet you at Reading, in order to attend you to your couſin Leeſon's in Albemarle Street; on your being obliged to be in town on your old Chancery-affair, I remember are the words? and whether you ſpoke your nephew's attendance there on Sunday night the 11th?
3. Whether your ladyſhip and Miſs Montague did come to town at that time; and whether you went to Hamp-ſtead,

[illegible] on Monday, in a hired coach and four, your own being repairing; and took from thence to town the young creature whom you visited there?

Your ladyship will probably guess, that the questions are not asked for reasons favourable to your nephew Lovelace. But be the answer what it will, it can do him no hurt, nor me any good: only that I think I owe it to my former hopes, (however deceived in them) and even to charity, that a person, of whom I was once willing to think better, should not prove so egregiously abandoned, as to be wanting, in every instance, to that veracity which is indispensable in the character of a gentleman.

Be pleased, Madam, to direct to me, (keeping the direction a secret for the present) 'To be left at the Bell Savage 'on Ludgate Hill, till called for.' I am your ladyship's most humble servant,

CLARISSA HARLOWE.

LETTER XXXV.

LADY BETTY LAWRANCE, TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

SATURDAY, JULY 1.

DEAR MADAM,

I Find that all is not as it should be between you and my nephew Lovelace. It will very much afflict me, and all his friends, if he has been guilty of any designed baseness to a lady of your character and merit.

We have been long in expectation of an opportunity to congratulate you and ourselves upon an event most earnestly wished for by us all; since all our hopes of him are built upon the power you have over him: for if ever man adored a woman, he is that man, and you, Madam, are that woman.

Miss Montague, in her last letter to me, in answer to one of mine, enquiring if she knew from him whether he could call you his, or was likely soon to have that honour, has these words: 'I know not what to make of my cousin 'Lovelace, as to the point your ladyship is so earnest about. He sometimes 'says, He is actually married to Miss 'Clarissa Harlowe: at other times, that 'it is her own fault if he be not.—He 'speaks of her, not only with love, but 'with reverence: yet owns, that there 'is a misunderstanding between them; 'but confesses that she is wholly faultless. An angel, and not a woman, he 'says she is: and that no man living 'can be worthy of her.'

This is what my niece Montague writes.

God grant, my dearest young lady, that he may not have so heinously offended you, that you cannot forgive him! If you are not already married, and refuse to be his, I shall lose all hopes that he ever will marry, or be the man I wish him to be. So will Lord M. So will Lady Sarah Sadleir.

I will now answer your questions: but indeed I hardly know what to write, for fear of widening still more the unhappy difference between you. But yet such a young lady must command every thing from me. This then is my answer.

I wrote not any letter to him on or about the 7th of June.

Neither I nor my steward know such a man as Captain Tomlinson.

I wrote not to my niece to meet me at Reading, nor to accompany me to my cousin Leeson's in town.

My Chancery-affair, though, like most Chancery-affairs, it be of long standing, is nevertheless now in so good a way, that it cannot give me occasion to go to town.

Nor have I been in town these six months: nor at Hampstead for several years.

Neither shall I have any temptation to go to town, except to pay my congratulatory compliments to Mrs. Lovelace. On which occasion I should go with the greatest pleasure; and should hope for the favour of your accompanying me to Glenham Hall, for a month at least.

Be what will the reason of your enquiry, let me entreat you, my dear young lady, for Lord M.'s sake; for my sake; for this giddy man's sake, soul as well as body; and for all our family's sakes; not to suffer this answer to widen differences so far as to make you refuse him, if he already has not the honour of calling you his; as I am apprehensive he has not, by your signing by your family-name.

And here let me offer to you my mediation to compose the difference between you, be it what it will. Your cause, my dear young lady, cannot be put into the hands of any-body living more devoted to your service, than into those of your sincere admirer, and humble servant,

ELIZ. LAWRANCE.

LETTER XXXVI.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MRS. HODGES.

ENDFIELD, JUNE 29.

MRS. HODGES,

I Am under a kind of neceſſity to write to you, having no one among my relations to whom I dare write, or hope a line from if I did. It is but to anſwer a queſtion. It is this:

Whether you know ſuch a man as Captain Tomlinſon? And if you do, whether he be very intimate with my uncle Harlowe?

I will deſcribe his perſon, leſt, poſſibly, he ſhould go by another name among you; although I know not why he ſhould.

He is a thin, talliſh man, a little pock-fretten; of a fallowiſh complexion. Fifty years of age or more. Of a good aſpect when he looks up. He ſeems to be a ſerions man, and one who knows the world. He ſtoops a little in the ſhoulders. Is of Berkſhire. His wife of Oxfordſhire; and has ſeveral children. He removed lately into your parts from Northamptonſhire.

I muſt deſire you, Mrs. Hodges, that you will not let my uncle, nor any of my relations, know that I write to you.

You uſed to ſay, that you would be glad to have it in your power to ſerve me. That, indeed, was in my proſperity. But I dare ſay, you will not refuſe me in a particular that will oblige me, without hurting yourſelf.

I underſtand, that my father, mother, and ſiſter, and, I preſume, my brother, and my uncle Antony, are to be at my uncle Harlowe's this day. God preſerve them all, and may they rejoice in many happy birth-days! You will write ſix words to me concerning their healths.

Direct, for a particular reaſon, 'To 'Mrs. Dorothy Salcomb, to be left, till 'called for, at the Four Swans Inn, 'Biſhopſgate Street.'

You know my hand-writing well enough, were not the contents of the letter ſufficient to excuſe my name, or any other ſubſcription, than that of

Your Friend.

LETTER XXXVII.

MRS. HODGES. IN ANSWER.

SAT. JULY 2.

MADDAM,

I Return you an anſer, as you wiſh me to doe. Maſter is acquented with no ſitch man. I am ſhure no ſitch ever came to our hooſe. And maſter ſees very little outs. His has no heart to ſtut out. For why? Your unkyndness makes um not care to ſee one another. Maſter's birth day never was kept ſo before; for not a ſole heere; and nothing but ſkeing and ſorrowin from maſter to think how it uſed to bee.

I axed maſter, if ſoe bee he knowed ſitch a man as one Captain Tomlinſon? But ſayed not whiſtur I axed. He ſed, No, not he.

Shure this is no trix nor forgary being againſt maſter by won Tomlinſon—Won knows not what company you may have been forſed to keep, ſen you went away, you knoe Maddam. Excuſe me, Maddam; but London is a peſtilent plaſe; and that Squire Lovelefs is a devil, (for all he is ſitch a like gentleman to look to) as I hev herd every boddy ſay; and think as how you have found by thiſs.

I truſte, Maddam, you wulde not let maſter cum to harme, if you knowed it, by any body who may pretend to be acquented with him: but for fere, I querid with myſelf if I ſhulde not tell him. But I was willin to ſhow you, that I wulde pleſſure you in advarſity, if advarſity bee youre lott, as well as proſprity: for I am none of thoſe that woulde doe otherwiſs. Soe no more from your humble ſarvant, to wiſh you well,

SARAH HODGES.

LETTER XXXVIII.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO LADY BETTY LAWRANCE.

MONDAY, JULY 3.

MADAM,

I Cannot excuſe myſelf from giving your ladyſhip this one trouble more; to thank you, as I moſt heartily do, for your kind letter.

I muſt own to you, Madam, that the honour of being related to ladies as eminent for their virtues as for their deſcent, was at firſt no ſmall inducement with me to lend an ear to Mr. Lovelace's addreſs. And the rather, as I was determined, had it come to effect, to do every-thing in my power to deſerve your favourable opinion.

I had another motive, which I knew would of itſelf give me merit with your whole family; a preſumptuous one (a puniſhably preſumptuous one, as it has proved) in the hope that I might be an humble means in the hand of Providence to reclaim a man, who had, as I thought, good mind enough at bottom to be re-claimed, or at least gratitude enough to acknowledge the intended obligation, whether the generous hope were to succeed or not.

But I have been most egregiously mistaken in Mr. Lovelace; the only man, I perſuade myſelf, pretending to be a gentleman, in whom I could have been ſo much miſtaken: for while I was endeavouring to ſave a drowning wretch, I have been, not accidentally, but premeditatedly, and of ſet purpoſe, drawn in after him. And he has had the glory to add to the liſt of thoſe he has ruined, a name, that, I will be bold to ſay, would not have diſparaged his own. And this, Madam, by means that would ſhock humanity to be made acquainted with.

My whole end is ſerved by your ladyſhip's anſwer to the queſtions I took the liberty to put to you in writing. Nor have I a wiſh to make the unhappy man more odious to you, than is neceſſary to excuſe myſelf for abſolutely declining your offered mediation.

When your ladyſhip ſhall be informed of the following particulars;

That after he had compulſatorily, as I may ſay, tricked me into the act of going off with him, he could carry me to one of the vileſt houſes, as it has proved, in London:

That he could be guilty of a wicked attempt, in reſentment of which I found means to eſcape from him to Hampſtead:

That, after he had found me out there, (I know not how) he could procure two women, dreſſed out richly, to perſonate your ladyſhip and Miſs Montague; who under pretence of engaging me to make a viſit in town to your couſin Leeſon, (promiſing to return with me that evening to Hampſtead) betrayed me back again to the vile houſe: where, again made a priſoner, I was firſt robbed of my ſenſes; and then of my honour. Why ſhould I ſeek to conceal that diſgrace from others, which I cannot hide from myſelf?

When your ladyſhip ſhall know, That, in the ſhocking progreſs to this ruin, wilful falſhoods, repeated forgeries, (particularly of one letter from your ladyſhip, another from Miſs Montague, and a third from Lord M.) and numberleſs perjuries, were not the leaſt of his crimes: you will judge, that I can have no principles that will make me worthy of an alliance with ladies of yours and your noble ſiſter's character, if I could not from my ſoul declare, that ſuch an alliance can never now take place.

I will not offer to clear myſelf entirely of blame: but, as to him, I have no fault to accuſe myſelf of: my crime was, the correſponding with him at firſt, when prohibited ſo to do by thoſe who had a right to my obedience; made ſtill more inexcuſable, by giving him a clandeſtine meeting, which put me into the power of his arts. And for this, I am content to be puniſhed: thankful, that at laſt I have eſcaped from him; and have it in my power to reject ſo wicked a man for my huſband: and glad, if I may be a warning, ſince I cannot be an example: which once (very vain, and very conceited as I was) I propoſed to myſelf to be.

All the ill I wiſh him is, that he may reform; and that I may be the laſt victim to his baſeneſs. Perhaps this deſirable wiſh may be obtained, when he ſhall ſee how his wickedneſs, his unmerited wickedneſs! to a poor creature, made friendleſs by his cruel arts, will end.

I conclude with my humble thanks to your ladyſhip, for your favourable opinion of me; and with the aſſurance, that I will be, while life is lent me, your ladyſhip's grateful and obliged ſervant,

CLARISSA HARLOWE.

LETTER XXIX.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MRS. NORTON.

SUNDAY EVENING, JULY 2.

HOW kindly, my beloved Mrs. Norton, do you ſoothe the anguiſh of a bleeding heart! Surely you are mine own mother; and by ſome unaccountable miſtake, I muſt have been laid to a family, that having newly found out, or at leaſt ſuſpected, the impoſture, caſt me from their hearts, with the indignation that ſuch a diſcovery will warrant.

O that I had been indeed your own child, born to partake of your humble fortunes, an heireſs only to that content in which you are ſo happy! Then ſhould I have had a truly gentle ſpirit to have guided my ductile heart, which force and ungenerous uſage ſit ſo ill upon: and nothing of what has happened would have been.

But let me take heed, that I enlarge not, by impatience, the breach already made in my duty by my raſhneſs! ſince, had I not erred, my mother, at leaſt, could could never have been thought hard-hearted and unforgiving. Am I not then answerable, not only for my own faults, but for the conſequences of them; which tend to depreciate and bring diſgrace upon a maternal character never before called in queſtion?

It is kind however in you, to endeavour to extenuate the fault of one ſo greatly ſenſible of it: and could it be wiped off entirely, it would render me more worthy, of the pains you have taken in my education: for it muſt add to your grief, as it does to my confuſion, that after ſuch promiſing beginnings, I ſhould have ſo behaved, as to be a diſgrace inſtead of a credit to you and my other friends.

But that I may not make you think me more guilty than I am, give me leave briefly to aſſure you, that when my ſtory is known, I ſhall be entitled to more compaſſion than blame, even on the ſcore of going away with Mr. Lovelace.

As to all that happened afterwards, let me only ſay, that although I muſt call myſelf a loſt creature as to this world, yet I have this conſolation left me, that I have not ſuffered either for want of circumſpection, or through credulity or weakneſs. Not one moment was I off my guard, or unmindful of your early precepts. But (having been enabled to baffle many baſe contrivances) I was at laſt ruined by arts the moſt inhuman. But had I not been rejected by every friend, this low-hearted man had not dared, nor would have had opportunity, to treat me as he has treated me.

More I cannot, at this time, nor need I, ſay: and this I deſire you to keep to yourſelf, leſt reſentments ſhould be taken up when I am gone, that may ſpread the evil which I hope will end with me.

I have been miſinformed, you ſay, as to my principal relations being at my uncle Harlowe's. The day, you ſay, was not kept. Nor have my brother and Mr. Solmes—Aſtoniſhing!—What complicated wickedneſs has this wretched man to anſwer for!—Were I to tell you, you would hardly believe there could have been ſuch a heart in man.

But one day you may know the whole ſtory!—At preſent I have neither inclination nor words—O my burſting heart!—Yet a happy, a wiſhed relief!—Were you preſent my tears would ſupply the reſt!

I resume my pen!

And ſo you fear no letter will be received from me. But don't grieve! tell me ſo! I expect every thing bad. And ſuch is my diſtreſs, that had you not bid me hope for mercy from the Throne of Mercy, I ſhould have been afraid that my father's dreadful curſe would be compleated with regard to both worlds.

For here, an additional misfortune! In a fit of phrenſical heedleſſneſs, I ſent a letter to my beloved Miſs Howe, without recollecting her private address; and it has fallen into her angry mother's hands: and ſo that dear friend perhaps has a-new incurred diſpleaſure on my account. And here too, your worthy ſon is ill; and my poor Hannah, you think, cannot come to me—O my dear Mrs. Norton, will you, can you cenſure thoſe whoſe reſentments againſt me Heaven ſeems to approve of? And will you acquit her whom that condemns?

Yet you bid me not deſpond.—I will not, if I can help it. And, indeed, moſt ſeaſonable conſolation has your kind letter afforded me.—Yet to God Almighty do I appeal, to avenge my wrongs, and vindicate my inno——

But huſhed be my ſtormy paſſions!—Have I not but this moment ſaid, that your letter gave me conſolation?—May thoſe be forgiven, who hinder my father from forgiving me!—And this, as to them, ſhall be the harſheſt that ſhall drop from my pen.

But although your ſon ſhould recover, I charge you, my dear Mrs. Norton, that you do not think of coming to me. I don't know ſtill, but your mediation with my mother (although at preſent your interpoſition would be ſo little attended to) may be of uſe to procure me the revocation of that moſt dreadful part of my father's curſe, which only remains to be fulfilled. The voice of nature muſt at laſt be heard in my favour, ſurely. It will only plead at firſt to my friends in the ſtill, conſcious plaintiveneſs of a young and unhardened beggar. But it will grow more clamorous when I have the courage to be ſo, and ſhall demand, perhaps the paternal protection from further ruin; and that forgiveneſs, which thoſe will be little entitled to expect, for their own faults, who ſhall interpoſe to have it refuſed to me, for an accidental, not a premeditated error: and which, but for them, I had never fallen into.

But again, impatiency, founded per-hap-on ſelf-partiality, that ſtrange miſleader! prevails.

Let me briefly ſay, that it is neceſſary to my preſent and my future hopes, that you keep well with my family. And moreover, ſhould you come, I may be traced out by that means by the moſt abandoned of men. Say not then, that you think you ought to come up to me, let it be taken as it will:—for my ſake let me repeat (were my foſter-brother recovered, as I hope he is) you muſt not come. Nor can I want your advice, while I can write, and you can anſwer me. And write I will, as often as I ſtand in need of your counſel.

Then the people I am now with ſeem to be both honeſt and humane: and there is in the ſame houſe a widow-lodger, of low fortunes, but of great merit:—almoſt ſuch another ſerious and good woman, as the dear one, to whom I am now writing; who has, as ſhe ſays, given over all other thoughts of the world but ſuch as ſhould aſſiſt her to leave it happily.—How ſuitable to my own views!—There ſeems to be a comfortable providence in this at leaſt—So that at preſent there is nothing of exigence; nothing that can require, or even excuſe your coming, when ſo many better ends may be anſwered by your ſtaying where you are. A time may come, when I ſhall want your laſt and beſt aſſiſtance: and then, my dear Mrs. Norton—And then, I will ſpeak it, and embrace it with all my whole heart—And then, will it not be denied me by any-body.

You are very obliging in your offer of money. But although I was forced to leave my cloaths behind me, yet I took ſeveral things of value with me, which will keep me from preſent want. You'll ſay, I have made a miſerable hand of it—So indeed I have—and, to look backwards, in a very little while too.

But what ſhall I do, if my father cannot be prevailed upon to recal his malediction? O my dear Mrs. Norton, what a weight muſt a father's curſe have upon a heart ſo apprehenſive as mine!—Did I think I ſhould ever have a father's curſe to deprecate? And yet, only that the temporary part of it is ſo terribly fulfilled, or I ſhould be as earneſt for it's recal, for my father's ſake, as for my own!

You muſt not be angry with me, that I wrote not to you before. You are very right and very kind, to ſay, you are ſure I love you. Indeed I do. And what a generoſity [ſo like yourſelf!] is there in your praiſe, to attribute to me more than I merit, in order to raiſe an emulation in me to deſerve your praiſes!—You tell me what you expect from me in the calamities I am called upon to bear. May I behave anſwerably!

I can a little account to myſelf for my ſilence to you, my kind, my dear maternal friend! How equally ſweetly and politely do you expreſs yourſelf on this occaſion! I was very deſirous, for your ſake, as well as for my own, that you ſhould have it to ſay, that we did not correſpond: had they thought we did, every word you could have dropt in my favour, would have been rejected; and my mother would have been forbid to ſee you, or pay any regard to what you ſhould ſay.

Then I had ſometimes better and ſometimes worſe proſpects before me. My worſt would only have troubled you to know: my better made me frequently hope, that, by the next poſt, or the next, and ſo on for weeks, I ſhould have the beſt news to impart to you, that then could happen: cold as the wretch had made my heart to that beſt.—For how could I think to write to you, with a confeſſion, that I was not married, yet lived in the houſe (or could I help it) with ſuch a man?—Who likewiſe had given it out to ſeveral, that we were actually married, although with reſtrictions that depended on the reconciliation with my friends? And to diſguiſe the truth, or be guilty of a falſhood either direct or equivocal, that was what you had never taught me.

But I might have written to you for advice, in my precarious ſituation, perhaps you will think. But, indeed, my dear Mrs. Norton, I was not loſt for want of advice. And this will appear clear to you from what I have already hinted, were I to explain myſelf no further:—For what need had the cruel ſpoiler to have recourſe to unprecedented arts—I will ſpeak out plainer ſtill (but you muſt not at preſent report it)—to ſtupefying potions, and to the moſt brutal and outrageous force—had I been wanting in my duty?

A few words more upon this grievous ſubject.

When I reflect upon all that has happened to me, it is apparent, that this generally-ſuppoſed thoughtleſs ſeducer has acted by me upon a regular and preconcerted plan of villainy.

In order to ſet all his vile plots in motion, motion, nothing was wanting, from the first, but to prevail upon me, either by force or fraud, to throw myself into his power: and when this was effected, nothing less than the intervention of the paternal authority (which I had not deserved to be exerted in my behalf) could have saved me from the effect of his deep machinations. Opposition from any other quarter would but too probably have precipitated his barbarous and ungrateful violence: and had you yourself been with me, I have reason now to think, that some how or other you would have suffered in endeavouring to save me: for never was there, as now I see, a plan of wickedness more steadily and uniformly pursued than his has been, against an unhappy creature who merited better of him: but the Almighty has thought fit, according to the general course of his Providence, to make the fault bring on it's own punishment: but surely not in consequence of my father's dreadful imprecation, That I might be punished here, [O my mamma Norton, pray with me, if so, that here it stop!] by the very wretch in whom I had placed my wicked confidence!

I am sorry, for your sake, to leave off so heavily. Yet the rest must be brief.

Let me desire you to be secret in what I have communicated to you; at least till you have my consent to divulge it.

God preserve to you your more faultless child!

I will hope for His mercy, although I should not obtain that of an earthly person.

And I repeat my prohibition:—You must not think of coming up to your ever-dutiful CL. HARLOWE.

The obliging person, who left yours for me this day, promised to call to-morrow, to see if I should have any-thing to return. I would not lose so good an opportunity.

LETTER XL.

MRS. NORTON, TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

MONDAY NIGHT, JULY 3.

O The barbarous villainy of this detestable man!

And is there a man in the world, who could offer violence to so sweet a creature?

And are you sure you are now out of his reach?

You command me to keep secret the particulars of the vile treatment you have met with; or else, upon an unexpected visit which Miss Harlowe favoured me with, soon after I had received your melancholy letter, I should have been tempted to own I had heard from you, and to have communicated to her such parts of your two letters as would have demonstrated your penitence, and your earnestness to obtain the revocation of your father's malediction; as well as his protection from outrages that may still be offered to you. But then your sister would probably have expected a sight of the letters, and even to have been permitted to take them with her to the family.

Yet they must one day be acquainted with the sad story—And it is impossible but they must pity you, and forgive you, when they know your early penitence, and your unprecedented sufferings: and that you have fallen by the brutal force of a barbarous ravisher, and not by the vile arts of a seducing lover.

The wicked man gives it out at Lord M.'s, as Miss Harlowe tells me, that he is actually married to you—Yet she believes it not; nor had I the heart to let her know the truth.

She put it close to me, Whether I had not corresponded with you from the time of your going away? I could safely tell her (as I did) that I had not: but I said, that I was well informed, that you took extremely to heart your father's imprecation; and that if she would excuse me, I would say, it would be a kind and sisterly part, if she would use her interest to get you discharged from it.

Among other severe things, she told me, that my partial fondness for you made me very little consider the honour of the rest of the family: but, if I had not heard this from you, she supposed I was set on by Miss Howe.

She expressed herself with a good deal of bitterness against that young lady: who, it seems, every-where, and to every-body, (for you must think, that your story is the subject of all conversations) rails against your family; treating them, as your sister says, with contempt, and even with ridicule.

I am sorry such angry freedoms are taken, for two reasons; first, because such liberties never do any good. I have heard you own, that Miss Howe has a satirical vein; but I should hope, that a young lady of her sense, and right cast of mind, must know that the end of satire is not to exasperate, but amend; and should never be personal.

If

If it be, as my good father used to say, [illegible] make an impartial person ſuſpect [illegible] the ſatyriſt has a natural ſpleen to [illegible], which may be as great a fault in him, as any of thoſe which he pretends to cenſure and expoſe in others.

Perhaps a hint of this from you will not be thrown away.

My laſtmoſt reaſon is, That theſe freedoms, from ſo warm a friend to you as Miſs Howe is known to be, are moſt likely to be charged to your account.

My reſentments are ſo ſtrong againſt this villeſt of men, that I dare not touch upon the ſhocking particulars which your mention of his baſeneſs. What defence, indeed, could there be againſt ſo determined a wretch, after you was in his power? I will only repeat my earneſt ſupplication to you, that, black as appearances are, you will not deſpair. Your calamities are exceeding great; but then you have talents proportioned to your trials. This every-body allows.

Suppoſe the worſt, and that your family will not be moved in your favour, your couſin Morden will ſoon arrive, as Miſs Harlowe told me. If he ſhould even be got over to their ſide, he will, however, ſee juſtice done you; and then may you live an exemplary life, making hundreds happy, and teaching young ladies to ſhun the ſnares in which you have been ſo dreadfully entangled.

As to the man you have loſt, is an union with ſuch a perjured heart as his with ſuch an admirable one as yours, to be wiſhed for? A baſe, low-hearted wretch, as you juſtly call him, with all his pride of anceſtry; and more an enemy to himſelf with regard to his preſent and future happineſs, than to you, in the barbarous and ungrateful wrongs he has done you: I need not, I am ſure, exhort you to deſpiſe ſuch a man as this; ſince not to be able to do ſo, would be a reflection upon a ſex to which you have always been an honour.

Your moral character is untainted: the very nature of your ſufferings, as you well obſerve, demonſtrates that. Cheer up, therefore, your dear heart, and do not deſpair; for is it not GOD who governs the world, and permits ſome things, and directs others, as He pleaſes? And will He not reward temporary ſufferings, innocently incurred, and piouſly ſupported, with eternal felicity?—And what, my dear, is this poor needle's-point of NOW to a boundleſs ETERNITY?

My heart, however, labours under a double affliction: for my poor boy is very, very bad—A violent fever—Nor can it be brought to intermit—Pray for him, my deareſt Miſs—For his recovery, if God ſee fit.—I hope God will ſee fit.—If not—(how can I bear to ſuppoſe that!)—pray for me, that He will give me that patience and reſignation which I have been wiſhing to you. I am, my deareſt young lady, your ever-affectionate JUDITH NORTON.

LETTER XLI.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MRS. JUDITH NORTON.

THURSDAY, JULY 6.

I Ought not, eſpecially at this time, to add to your afflictions—But yet I cannot help communicating to you (who now are my only ſoothing friend) a new trouble that has befallen me.

I had but one friend in the world, beſides you; and ſhe is utterly diſpleaſed with me: it is grievous, but for one moment, to lie under a beloved perſon's cenſure; and this through imputations that affect one's honour and prudence. There are points ſo delicate, you know, my dear Mrs. Norton, that it is a degree of diſhonour to have a vindication of one's ſelf from them appear to be neceſſary. In the preſent caſe, my misfortune is, that I know not how to account, but by gueſs, (ſo ſubtle have been the workings of the dark ſpirit I have been unhappily entangled by) for ſome of the facts that I am called upon to explain.

Miſs Howe, in ſhort, ſuppoſes ſhe has found a flaw in my character. I have juſt now received her ſevere letter—But I ſhall anſwer it, perhaps, in better temper, if I firſt conſider yours: for indeed my patience is almoſt at an end. And yet I ought to conſider, That faithful are the wounds of a friend. But ſo many things at once!—O my dear Mrs. Norton, how ſhall ſo young a ſcholar in the ſchool of affliction be able to bear ſuch heavy and ſuch various evils!

But to leave this ſubject for a while, and turn to your letter.

I am very ſorry Miſs Howe is ſo lively in her reſentments on my account. I have always blamed her very freely for her liberties of this ſort with my friends. I once had a good deal of influence over her kind heart, and ſhe made all I ſaid a law to her. But people in calamity have little weight in any thing, or with any-body. Proſperity and independence are charming things on this account, that they give force to the counſels of a friendly heart! while it is thought inſo-lence in the miſerable to adviſe, or ſo much as to remonſtrate.

Yet is Miſs Howe an invaluable perſon: and is it to be expected that ſhe ſhould preſerve the ſame regard for my judgment that ſhe had before I forfeited all title to diſcretion? With what face can I take upon me to reproach a want of prudence in her? But if I can be ſo happy as to re-eſtabliſh myſelf in her ever-valued opinion, I ſhall endeavour to enforce upon her your juſt obſervations on this head.

You need not, you ſay, exhort me to deſpiſe ſuch a man as him, by whom I have ſuffered—Indeed you need not: for I would chuſe the cruelleſt death rather than to be his. And yet, my dear Mrs. Norton, I will own to you, that once I could have loved him.—Ungrateful man!—had he permitted me to love him, I once could have loved him. Yet he never deſerved my love. And was not this a fault?—But now, if I can but keep out of his hands, and obtain a laſt forgiveneſs, and that as well for the ſake of my dear friends future reflections, as for my own preſent comfort, it is all I wiſh for.

Reconciliation with my friends I do not expect; nor pardon from them; at leaſt, till in extremity, and as a Viaticum.

O my beloved Mrs. Norton, you cannot imagine what I have ſuffered!—But indeed my heart is broken!—I am ſure I ſhall not live to take poſſeſſion of that independence, which you think would enable me to atone in ſome meaſure for my paſt conduct.

While this is my opinion, you may believe, I ſhall not be eaſy, till I can obtain a laſt forgiveneſs.

I wiſh to be left to take my own courſe, in endeavouring to procure this grace. Yet know I not, at preſent, what that courſe ſhall be.

I will write. But to whom is my doubt. Calamity has not yet given me the aſſurance to addreſs myſelf to my FATHER. My UNCLES (well as they once loved me) are hard-hearted. They never had their maſculine paſſions humanized by the tender name of FATHER. Of my BROTHER I have no hope. I have then but my MOTHER, and my SISTER, to whom I can apply.—'And may I not, 'my deareſt mamma, be permitted to 'lift up my trembling eye to your all-'cheering, and your once more than in-'dulgent, your fond eye, in hopes of 'ſeaſonable mercy to the poor ſick heart 'that yet beats with life drawn from 'your own dearer heart!—Expreſſion 'when pardon only, and not reſtoration, 'is implored!'

Yet were I able to engage my mother's pity, would it not be a means to make her ſtill more unhappy, than I have already made her, by the oppoſition ſhe would meet with, were ſhe to try to give force to that pity?

To my SISTER then, I think, I will apply—Yet how hard-hearted has my ſiſter been!—But I will not aſk for protection; and yet I am in hourly dread, that I ſhall want protection.—All I will aſk for at preſent, (preparative to the laſt forgiveneſs I will implore) ſhall be only to be freed from the heavy curſe that ſeems to have operated as far as it can operate, as to this life—And ſurely it was paſſion, and not intention, that carried it ſo very far as to the other!

But why do I thus add to your diſtreſſes?—Is it not, my dear Mrs. Norton, that I have ſo much feeling for my own calamity, that I have none for yours: ſince yours is indeed an addition to my own. But you have one conſolation, (a very great one) which I have not—That your afflictions, whether reſpecting your more or your leſs deſerving child, riſe not from any fault of your own.

But what can I do for you more than pray?—Aſſure yourſelf, that in every ſupplication I put up for myſelf, I will, with equal fervour, remember both you and your ſon. For I am, and ever will be your truly ſympathizing and dutiful

CLARISSA HARLOWE.

LETTER XLII.

MISS HOWE, TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

SUPERSCRIBED, FOR MRS. RACHEL CLARK, &c.

WEDNESDAY, JULY 5.

MY DEAR CLARISSA,

I Have at laſt heard from you from a quarter I little expected.

From my mother.

She had for ſome time ſeen me uneaſy and grieving; and juſtly ſuppoſed it was about you: and this morning dropt a hint, which made me conjecture that ſhe muſt have heard ſomething of you more than I knew. And when ſhe found that this added to my uneaſineſs, ſhe owned ſhe had a letter in her hands of yours, dated the 29th of June, directed for me.

You may gueſs, that this occaſioned a little warmth, that could not be wiſhed for by either.

[It

[It is surprising, my dear, mighty surprising! that, knowing the prohibition I lay under of corresponding with you, you could send a letter for me to our own house: since it must be easy to one that it would fall into my mother's hands, as you find it did.]

In short, she resented that I should disobey her: I was as much concerned that she should open and withold from me my letters: and at last she was pleased to compromise the matter with me, by giving up the letter, and permitting me to write to you once or twice; she to see the contents of what I wrote. For, besides the value she has for you, she could not but have a great curiosity to know the occasion of so sad a situation as your melancholy letter shews you to be in.

[But I shall get her to be satisfied with hearing me read what I write; putting in between hooks, thus, [ ] what I intend not to read to her.]

Need I to remind you, Miss Clarissa Harlowe, of three letters I wrote to you, to none of which I had any answer; except to the first, and that a few lines only, promising a letter at large, though you were well enough, the day after you received my second, to go joyfully back again with him to the vile house?—But more of these by-and-by. I must hasten to take notice of your letter of Wednesday last week; which you could contrive should fall into my mother's hands.

Let me tell you, that that letter has almost broken my heart. Good God! what have you brought yourself to, Miss Clarissa Harlowe?—Could I have believed, that after you had escaped from the miscreant, (with such mighty pains and earnestness escaped) and after such an attempt as he had made, you would have been prevailed upon not only to forgive him, but (without being married too) to return with him to that horrid house!—A house I had given you such an account of!—Surprizing!—What an intoxicating thing is this love?—I always feared, that you, even you, were not proof against it's inconsistent effects.

You your best self have not escaped!—Indeed I see not how you could expect to escape.

What a tale have you to unfold!—You need not unfold it, my dear: I would not have engaged to prognosticate all that has happened, had you but told me that you would once more have put yourself into his power, after you had taken such pains to get out of it.

Your peace is destroyed!—I wonder not at it: since now you must reproach yourself for a credulity so ill placed.

Your intellect is touched!—I am sure my heart bleeds for you: but, excuse me, my dear, I doubt your intellect was touched before you left Hampstead: or you would never have let him find you out there; or, when he did, suffer him to prevail upon you to return to the horrid brothel.

I tell you, I sent you three letters: the first of which, dated the 7th and 8th of June, (for it was written at twice) came safe to your hands, as you sent me word by a few lines dated the 9th: had it not, I should have doubted my own safety; since in it I gave you such an account of the abominable house, and threw such cautions in your way in relation to that Tomlinson, as the more surprized me that you could think of going back to it again, after you had escaped from it, and from Lovelace—O, my dear—But nothing now will I ever wonder at!

The second, dated June 10, was given into your own hand at Hampstead, on Sunday the 11th, as you was lying upon a couch, in a strange way, according to my messenger's account of you, bloated, and flush-coloured; I don't know how.

The third was dated the 20th of June. Having not heard one word from you since the promising billet of the 9th, I own I did not spare you in it. I ventured it by the usual conveyance, by that Wilson's, having no other: so cannot be sure you received it. Indeed I rather think you might not; because in yours, which fell into my mother's hands, you make no mention of it: and if you had had it, I believe it would have touched you too much to have been passed by unnoticed.

You have heard, that I have been ill, you say. I had a cold indeed; but it was so slight a one, that it confined me not an hour. But I doubt not, that strange things you have heard, and been told, to induce you to take the step you took. And, till you did take that step, (the going back with this villain, I mean) I knew not a more pitiable case than yours: since every-body must have excused you before, who knew how you were used at home, and was acquainted with your prudence and vigilance. But, alas! my dear, we see that the wisest people are not to be depended upon, when Love, like an ignis fatuus, holds up it's misleading lights before their eyes.

My mother tells me, she sent you an answer, desiring you not to write to me, because it would grieve me. To be sure

I am

I am grieved; exceedingly grieved; and, disappointed too, you must permit me to say. For I had always thought that there never was such a woman, at your years, in the world.

But I remember once an argument you held, on occasion of a censure passed in company upon an excellent preacher, who was not a very excellent liver: preaching and practising, you said, required quite different talents: which, when united in the same person, made the man a saint; as wit and judgment going together constituted a genius.

You made it out, I remember, very prettily: but you never made it out, excuse me, my dear, more convincingly, than by that part of your late conduct, which I complain of.

My love for you, and my concern for your honour, may possibly have made me a little of the severest: if you think so, place it to it's proper account; to that love, and to that concern: which will but do justice to your afflicted and faithful A. H.

P. S. My mother would not be satisfied without reading my letter herself; and that before I had fixed all my proposed hooks. She knows, by this means, and has excused, our former correspondence.

She indeed suspected it before: and so she very well might; knowing me, and knowing my love of you.

She has so much real concern for your misfortunes, that, thinking it will be a consolation to you, and that it will oblige me, she consents that you shall write to me the particulars at large of your sad story: but it is on condition that I shew her all that has passed between us, relating to yourself and the vilest of men. I have the more cheerfully complied, as the communication cannot be to your disadvantage.

You may therefore write freely, and direct to our own house.

My mother promises to shew me the copy of her letter to you, and your reply to it; which letter she has but just told me of. She already apologizes for the severity of hers: and thinks the sight of your reply will affect me too much. But having her promise, I will not dispense with it.

I doubt hers is severe enough. So I fear you will think mine: but you have taught me never to spare the fault for the friend's sake; and that a great error ought rather to be more inexcusable in the person we value, than in one we are indifferent to; because it is a reflection upon our choice of that person, and tends to a breach of the love of mind; and to expose us to the world for our partiality. To the love of mind, I repeat; since it is impossible but the errors of the dearest friend must weaken our inward opinion of that friend; and thereby lay a foundation for future distance, and perhaps disgust.

God grant, that you may be able to clear your conduct after you had escaped from Hampstead; as all before that time was noble, generous, and prudent: the man a devil and you a saint!——Yet I hope you can; and therefore expect it from you.

I send by a particular hand. He will call for your answer at your own appointment.

I am afraid this horrid wretch will trace out, by the post-offices, where you are, if not careful.

To have money, and will, and head, to be a villain, is too much for the rest of the world, when they meet in one man.

LETTER XLIII.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

THURSDAY, JULY 6.

FEW young persons have been able to give more convincing proofs than myself, how little true happiness lies in the enjoyment of our own wishes.

To produce one instance only of the truth of this observation; what would I have given for weeks past, for the favour of a letter from my dear Miss Howe, in whose friendship I placed all my remaining comfort! Little did I think, that the next letter she would honour me with, should be in such a style, as should make me look more than once at the subscription, that I might be sure (the name not being written at length) that it was not signed by another A. H. 'For surely,' thought I, 'this is 'my sister Arabella's style: surely Miss 'Howe (blame me as she pleases in other 'points) could never repeat so sharply 'upon her friend, words written in the 'bitterness of spirit, and in the disorder 'of head; nor remind her, with asperity, and with mingled strokes of wit, 'of an argument held in the gaiety of an 'heart elated with prosperous fortunes, '(as mine then was) and very little ap-

[illegible] of the fame turn that ar-
[illegible] one day take against her[illegible] what have I, [alas! in my for[illegible] character forfeited; my [illegible] I know it, I care
[illegible] [while I know it, I care
[illegible] deftitute of friends,
[illegible] even of hope; what have I to do
[illegible] but [illegible] of repining and expoſ-
[illegible] tulation to a dear friend, becauſe ſhe
[illegible] not more kind than a ſiſter!

You have till now, my dear, treated me with great indulgence. If it was with greater than I had deſerved, I may be to blame to have built upon it, on the confideration that I deſerve it now as well as ever. But I find, by the riſing bitterneſs which will mingle with the gall in my ink, that I am not yet ſubmiſſive enough to my condition—I lay down my pen for one moment.

Pardon me, my Miſs Howe. I have compoſed myſelf: and will endeavour to give a particular anſwer to your letter; although it will take me up too much time to think of ſending it by your meſſenger to-morrow: he can put off his journey, he ſays, till Saturday. I will endeavour to have the whole narrative ready for you by Saturday.

But how to defend myſelf in every-thing that has happened, I cannot tell: ſince in ſome part of the time, in which my conduct appears to have been cenſurable, I was not myſelf; and to this hour know not all the methods taken to deprave and ruin me.

You tell me, that in your firſt letter you gave me ſuch an account of the vile houſe I was in, and ſuch cautions about that Tomlinſon, as made you wonder how I could think of going back.

Alas, my dear! I was tricked, moſt vilely tricked back, as you ſhall hear in it's place.

Without knowing the houſe was ſo very vile a houſe from your intended information, I diſliked the people too much, ever voluntarily to have returned to it. But had you really written ſuch cautions about Tomlinſon, and the houſe, as you ſeem to have purpoſed to do, they muſt, had they come in time, have been of infinite ſervice to me. But not one word of either, whatever was your intention, did you mention to me, in that firſt of the three letters you ſo warmly TELL ME you did ſend me. I will incloſe it to-morrow.

But your account of your meſſenger's delivering to me your ſecond letter, and the deſcription he gives of me, as lying upon a couch, in a ſtrange way, bloated, and fluſh-coloured; you don't know how, ſtrangely puzzled and confounded me.

Lord have mercy upon the poor Clariſſa Harlowe! What can this mean?—Who was the meſſenger you ſent? Was he one of Lovelace's creatures too?—Could nobody come near me but that man's confederates, either ſetting out ſo, or made ſo? I know not what to make of any one ſyllable of this! Indeed I don't.

Let me ſee. You ſay, this was before I went from Hampſtead? My intellects had not then been touched!—Nor had I ever been ſurprized by wine: [Strange if I had!] how then could I be found in ſuch a ſtrange way, bloated, and flush-coloured; you don't know how!—Yet what a vile, what a hateful figure has your meſſenger repreſented me to have made!

But indeed I know nothing of ANY meſſenger from you.

Believing myſelf ſecure at Hampſtead, I ſtaid longer there than I would have done, in hopes of the letter promiſed me in your ſhort one of the 9th, brought me by my own meſſenger, in which you undertake to ſend for and engage Mrs. Townſend in my favour.

I wondered I heard not from you: and was told you were ſick; and, at another time, that your mother and you had had words on my account, and that you had refuſed to admit Mr. Hickman's viſits upon it: ſo that I ſuppoſed at one time, that you were not able to write; at another, that your mother's prohibition had it's due force with you. But now I have no doubt, that the wicked man muſt have intercepted your letter; and I wiſh he found not means to corrupt your meſſenger to tell you ſo ſtrange a ſtory.

It was on Sunday June 11, you ſay, that the man gave it me. I was at church twice that day with Mrs. Moore. Mr. Lovelace was at her houſe the while, where he boarded, and wanted to have lodged; but I would not permit that, though I could not help the other. In one of theſe ſpaces it muſt be that he had time to work upon the man. You'll eaſily, my dear, find that out, by enquiring the time of his arrival at Mrs. Moore's, and other circumſtances of the ſtrange way he pretended to ſee me in, on a couch, and the reſt.

Had any-body ſeen me afterwards, when I was betrayed back to the vile houſe, ſtruggling under the operation of wicked potions, and ſobbed ruins of my intellects, (for this, as you ſhall hear, hope, that my dreadful ends might then, perhaps, have appeared affected, and fear-inspired, and I know not how assisted. But were you to see your poor Clarissa now, for even to have been her at Hampstead before she suffered the vilest of all outrages) you would not think her fleering, or fast-coloured: indeed you would not.

In a word, it could not be my messenger saw; nor (if any-body) who it was can I divine.

I will now, as briefly as the subject will permit, enter into the darker part of my sad story: and yet I must be somewhat circumstantial, that you may not think me capable of reserve or palliation. The latter I am not conscious that I need. I should be utterly inexcusable, were I guilty of the former to you. And yet, if you knew how my heart sinks under the thoughts of a recollection so painful, you would pity me.

As I shall not be able, perhaps, to conclude what I have to write in even two or three letters, I will begin a new one with my story; and send the whole of it together, although written at different periods, as I am able.

Allow me a little pause, my dear, at this place, and to subscribe myself your ever-affectionate and obliged,

CLARISSA HARLOWE.

LETTER XLIV.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

[RETURNED TO THE VOL. V.]

THURSDAY NIGHT.

HE had found me out at Hampstead: strangely found me out; for I am still at a loss to know by what means.

I was loth, in my billet of the 9th, to tell you so, for fear of giving you apprehensions for me; and besides, I hoped then to have a shorter and happier issue to account to you for, through your assistance, than I met with.

She then gives a narrative of all that passed at Hampstead between herself, Mr. Lovelace, Captain Tomlinson, and the women there, to the same effect with that so amply given by Mr. Lovelace.

Mr Lovelace, finding all he could say, and all Captain Tomlinson could urge, ineffectual, to prevail upon me to forgive an outrage so flagrantly premeditated, settled all his hopes on a visit which was to be paid me by Lady Betty Lawrance and Miss Montague.

In my interview with them, my prospects all so dark, I knew not whether I might be obliged to have recourse to the last resort: and as their ladyships had the best of characters, (although I had reason to regret that I had not from the first thrown myself upon their protection, (when I had forfeited that of my own friends) I thought I would not shun an interview with them, unless I was too indifferent to their kindness to seek it, as I doubted not, that one end of their visit would be to reconcile me to him.

On Monday the 26th of June these pretended ladies came to Hampstead; and I was presented to them, and they to me, by their kinsman.

They were richly dressed, and stuck out with jewels; the pretended Lady Betty's were particularly very fine.

They came in a coach and four, hired, as was confessed, while their own was repairing in town: a pretence made, I now perceive, that I should not guess at the imposture by the want of the real lady's arms upon it. Lady Betty was attended by her woman, whom she called Morrison; a modest country-looking person.

I had heard, that Lady Betty was a fine woman, and that Miss Montague was a beautiful young lady, genteel, and graceful, and full of vivacity. Such were these impostors; and having never seen either of them, I had not the least suspicion, that they were not the ladies they personated; and being put a little out of countenance by the richness of their dresses, I could not help (fool that I was!) to apologize for my own.

The pretended Lady Betty then told me, that her nephew had acquainted them with the situation of affairs between us. And although she could not but say, that she was very glad that he had not put such a slight upon his lordship and them, as report had given them cause to apprehend, (the reason for which report, however, she much approved of) yet it had been matter of great concern to her, and to her niece Montague, and would to the whole family, to find so great a misunderstanding subsisting between us, as, if not made up, might distance all their hopes.

She could easily tell who was in fault, she said. And gave him a look full of anger and disdain: asking him, How it was possible for him to give an offence of such a nature to so charming a lady, (so she called me) as should occasion a resentment so strong?

He prevailed to be raised into shame and [illegible]

'My dearest niece,' said she, and took my hand, 'shall you niece, as [illegible] from love, as to humour your uncle [illegible] expedient) permit me to [illegible] not as advocate, but a mediatrix for him; and not for his sake, so much as for my own, my Charlotte's, and all our family's. The indignity he has offered to you, may be of too tender a nature to be enquired into. But as he declares, that it was not a premeditated offence; whether, my dear,' [for I was going to rise upon it in my temper] 'it were or not; and as he declares his sorrow for it; (and never did creature express a deeper sorrow for an offence than he) and as it is a reparable one; let us, for this one time, forgive him; and thereby lay an obligation upon this man of errors —Let US, I say, my dear;—for Sir,' [turning to him] 'an offence against such a peerless lady as this, must be an offence against me, against your cousin here, and against all the virtuous of our sex.'

See, my dear, what a creature he had picked out! Could you have thought there was a woman in the world who could thus express herself, and yet be vile? But she had her principal instructions from him, and those written down too, as I have reason to think: for I have recollected since, that I once saw this Lady Betty (who often rose from her seat, and took a turn to the other end of the room with such emotion as if the joy of her heart would not let her sit still) take out a paper from her stays, and look into it, and put it there again. She might oftener, and I not observe it; for I little thought that there could be such impostors in the world.

I could not forbear paying great attention to what she said. I found my tears ready to start; I drew out my handkerchief, and was silent. I had not been so indulgently treated a great while by a person of character and distinction; [such I thought her] and durst not trust to the accent of my voice.

The pretended Miss Montague joined in on this occasion; and drawing her chair close to me, took my other hand, and besought me to forgive her cousin; and consent to rank myself as one of the principals of a family, that had long, very long, coveted the honour of my alliance.

I am ashamed to repeat to you, my dear, how I knew what to think they are, the tender, the obliging, and the respectful things I said to them.

The wretch himself then came forward. He threw himself at my feet. How was I beset!—The women grasping one my right-hand; the other my left; the pretended Miss Montague pressing to her lips more than once the hand she held: the wicked man on his knees, imploring my forgiveness; and setting before me my happy and my unhappy prospects, as I should forgive or not forgive him. All that he thought would affect me in his former pleas, and those of Captain Tomlinson, he repeated. He vowed, he promised, he bespoke the pretended ladies to answer for him; and they engaged their honours in his behalf.

Indeed, my dear, I was distressed, perfectly distressed. I was sorry that I had given way to this visit. For I knew not how, in tenderness to relations (as I thought them) so worthy, to treat so freely as he deserved, a man nearly allied to them: so that my arguments, and my resolutions, were deprived of their greatest force.

I pleaded, however, my application to you. I expected every hour, I told them, an answer from you to a letter I had written, which would decide my future destiny.

They offered to apply to you themselves in person, in their own behalf, as they politely termed it. They besought me to write to you to hasten your answer.

I said, I was sure that you would write the moment that the event of an application to be made to a third person enabled you to write. But as to the success of their request in behalf of their kinsman, that depended not upon the expected answer; for that, I begged their pardon, was out of the question. I wished him well. I wished him happy. But I was convinced, that I neither could make him so, nor he me.

Then! how the wretch promised!—How he vowed!—How he entreated!—And how the women pleaded!—And they engaged themselves, and the honour of their whole family, for his just, his kind, his tender behaviour to me.

In short, my dear, I was so hard set, that I was obliged to come to a more favourable compromise with them, than I had intended. I would wait for your answer to my letter, I said: and if that made doubtful or difficult the change of mea-measures I had resolved upon, and the scheme of life I had formed, I would then consider of the matter; and, if they would permit me, lay all before them, and take their advice upon it, in conjunction with yours, as if the one were my own aunt, and the other were my own cousin.

They shed tears upon this—Of joy they called them:—but since, I believe, to their credit, bad as they are, that they were tears of temporary remorse; for the pretended Miss Montague turned about, and, as I remember, said, There was no standing it.

But Mr. Lovelace was not so easily satisfied. He was fixed upon his villainous measures perhaps; and so might not be sorry to have a pretence against me. He bit his lip—He had been but too much used, he said, to such indifference, such coldness, in the very midst of his happiest prospects—I had on twenty occasions shewn him, to his infinite regret, that any favour I was to confer upon him was to be the result of—There he stopt—And not of my choice.

This had like to have set all back again. I was exceedingly offended. But the pretended ladies interposed. The elder severely took him to task. He ought, she told him, to be satisfied with what I had said. She desired no other condition. 'And what, Sir,' said she, with an air of authority, 'would you 'commit errors, and expect to be re-'warded for them?'

They then engaged me in a more agreeable conversation—The pretended lady declared, that she, Lord M. and Lady Sarah, would directly, and personally interest themselves to bring about a general reconciliation between the two families, and this either in open or private concert with my uncle Harlowe, as should be thought fit. Animosities on one side had been carried a great way, she said; and too little care had been shewn on the other to mollify or heal. My father should see that they could treat him as a brother and a friend; and my brother and sister should be convinced, that there was no room either for the jealousy or envy they had conceived from motives too unworthy to be avowed.

Could I help, my dear, being pleased with them?

Permit me here to break off. The task grows too heavy, at present, for the heart of your

CLARISSA HARLOWE.

LETTER XLV.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

IN CONTINUATION.

I was very ill, and obliged to lay down my pen. I thought I should have fainted. But am better now.—So will proceed.

The pretended ladies, the more they talked, the fonder they seemed to be of me. And the Lady Betty had Mrs. Moore called up; and asked her, If she had accommodations for her niece herself, her woman, and two men-servants for three or four days?

Mr. Lovelace answered for her that she had.

She would not ask her dear niece Lovelace ['Permit me, my dear,' whispered she, 'this charming style before 'strangers!—I will keep your uncle's se-'cret.'] whether she should be welcome or not to be so near her. But for the time she should stay in these parts, she would come up every night—'What say 'you, niece Charlotte?'

The pretended Charlotte answered, she should like to do so of all things.

The Lady Betty called her an obliging girl. She liked the place, she said. Her cousin Leeson would excuse her. The air, and my company, would do her good. She never chose to lie in the smoaky town, if she could help it. 'In 'short, my dear,' said she to me, 'I 'will stay till I have your consent to go 'with me to Glenham Hall. Not one 'moment will I be out of your company 'when I can have it. Stedman, my so-'licitor, as the distance from town is so 'small, may attend me here for in-'structions.—Niece Charlotte, one word 'with you, child.'

They retired to the further end of the room, and talked about their night-dresses.

The Miss Charlotte said, Morrison might be dispatched for them.

'True,' said the other—'But I have 'some letters in my private box, which 'I must have up. And you know, 'Charlotte, that I trust nobody with 'the keys of that.'

Could not Morrison bring up that box?

No. She thought it safest where it was. She had heard of a robbery committed but two days ago at the foot of Hampstead Hill; and she should be ruined if she lost her box.

Well then, it was but going to town to

deceiver; except that several unmanly, whose years, and seriousness, joined with a solidity of sense and judgment that seemed uncommon, gave him, one would have thought, advantages in villainy, the other had not those to plead. I have very hard, that I should fall into the knowledge of two such wretches; when two more such I hope are not to be met with in the world!—Both so determined to carry on the most barbarous and perfidious projects against a poor young creature, who never did or wished harm to either.

Take the following slight account of these womens and of this man's behaviour to each other before me.

Mr. Lovelace carried himself to his pretended aunt with high respect, and paid a great deference to all she said. He permitted her to have all the advantage over him in the repartees and retorts that passed between them. I could, indeed, easily see, that it was permitted; and that he forbore that vivacity, that quickness, which he never spared shewing to the pretended Miss Montague; and which a man of wit seldom knows how to spare shewing, when an opportunity offers to display his wit.

The pretended Miss Montague was still more respectful in her behaviour to her pretended aunt. While the aunt kept up the dignity of the character she had assumed, rallying both of them with the air of a person who depends upon the superiority which years and fortune give over younger persons, who might have a view to be obliged to her, either in her life, or at her death.

The severity of her raillery, however, was turned upon Mr. Lovelace, on occasion of the character of the people who kept the lodgings, which, she said, I had thought myself so well warranted to leave privately.

This startled me. For having then no suspicion of the vile Tomlinson, I concluded, (and your letter of the 7th favoured my conclusion) that if the house were notorious, either he, or Mr. Mennell, would have given me or him some hints of it—Nor, although I liked not the people, did I observe any-thing in them very culpable, till the Wednesday night before, that they offered not to come to my assistance, although within hearing of my distress, (as I am sure they were) and having as much reason as I to be frighted at the fire, had it been real.

I looked with indignation upon Mr. Lovelace, at this hint.

He

He seemed abashed. I have not patience, but to recollect the specious looks of this vile deceiver. But how was it possible, that even that florid countenance of his should enable him to command a blush at his pleasure? For blush he did, more than once; and the blush, on this occasion, was a deep-dyed crimson, unfeigned-for, and natural, as I thought—But he is so much of the actor, that he seems able to enter into any character; and his muscles and features appear entirely under obedience to his wicked will.

The pretended lady went on, saying, She had taken upon herself to enquire after the people, on hearing that I had left the house in disgust; and though she heard not any-thing much amiss, yet she heard enough to make her wonder that he could carry his spouse, a person of so much delicacy, to a house, that, if it had not a bad fame, had not a good one.

You must think, my dear, that I liked the pretended Lady Betty the better for this. I suppose it was designed I should.

He was surprized, he said, that her ladyship should hear a bad character of the people. It was what he had never before heard that they deserved. It was easy, indeed, to see, that they had not very great delicacy, though they were not indelicate. The nature of their livelihood, letting of lodgings, and taking people to board, (and yet he had understood that they were nice in these particulars) led them to aim at being free and obliging; and it was difficult, he said, for persons of cheerful dispositions, so to behave, as to avoid censure: openness of heart and countenance in the sex, [more was the pity) too often subjected good people, whose fortunes did not set them above the world, to uncharitable censure.

He wished, however, that her ladyship would tell what she had heard: although now it signified but little, because he would never ask me to set foot within their doors again: and he begged she would not mince the matter.

Nay, no great matter, she said. But she had been informed, that there were more women-lodgers in the house than men; yet that their visitors were more men than women. And this had been hinted to her (perhaps by ill-willers, she could not answer for that) in such a way, as if somewhat further were meant by it than was spoken.

This, he said, was the true innendo-way of characterizing [illegible] a black and a white side of [illegible] willers and ill-willers may make [illegible] advantage. He had observed, that the front-house was well let, and he believed, more to the use for them to [illegible] other; for he had seen good-[illegible] passing in and out, several genteel, [illegible] dress-looking women; and who, it was very probable, were not so ill-behaved, but they might have visitors and [illegible] tions of both sexes: but they were [illegible] of them any-thing to us, as we to them; we were not once in any of their [illegible] nies: but in the genteelest and most [illegible] tired house of the two, which we had [illegible] a manner to ourselves, with the use of a parlour to the street, to serve us for a servants-hall, or to receive common visitors, or our traders only, whom we admitted not up-stairs.

He always loved to speak as he found. No man in the world had suffered more from calumny than he himself had done.

Women, he owned, ought to be more scrupulous than men needed to be whom they lodged. Nevertheless he wished, that fact, rather than surmise, were to be the foundation of their judgment, especially when they spoke of one another.

He meant no reflection upon her ladyship's informants, or rather informers, (as he might call them) be they who they would: nor did he think himself obliged to defend characters impeached, or not thought well of, by women of virtue and honour. Neither were these people of importance enough to have so much said about them.

The pretended Lady Betty said, All who knew her, would clear her of censoriousness: that it gave her some opinion, she must needs say, of the people, that he had continued there so long with me; that I had rather negative than positive reasons of dislike to them; and that so shrewd a man as he heard Captain Tomlinson was, had not objected to them.

'I think, niece Charlotte,' proceeded she, 'as my nephew has not parted with 'these lodgings, you and I—(for as 'my dear Miss Harlowe dislikes the 'people, I would not ask her for her 'company)—will take a dish of tea with 'my nephew there, before we go out of 'town; and then we shall see what sort 'of people they are. I have heard that 'Mrs. Sinclair is a mighty fashionable 'creature.'

'With all my heart, Madam,' to your

'your delightful company I shall make no 'scruple of appearing whither.'

It was delightful to every word; and on the favourable ground of her title, and of her double tie, I might have guessed that she was not used to either.

'What say you, cousin Lovelace?—'Lady Sarah, though a melancholy woman, is very inquisitive about all your 'affairs. I must acquaint her with every 'particular circumstance when I go 'down.'

With all his heart. He would attend her whenever she pleased. She would see very handsome apartments, and very civil people.

'The deuce is in them,' said she Miss Montague, 'if they appear other to us.'

They then fell into family talk; family happiness on my hoped-for accession into it. They mentioned Lord M.'s and Lady Sarah's great desire to see me: how many friends and admirers, with up-lift hands, I should have!—[O my dear, what a triumph must these creatures, and he, have over the poor divested all the time!]—What a happy man he would be!—They would not, she Lady Betty said, give themselves the mortification but to suppose, that I should not be one of them!

Presents were hinted at. She resolved that I should go with her to Glenham Hall. She would not be refused, although she were to stay a week beyond her time for me.

She longed for the expected letter from you. I must write to hasten it, and to let Miss Howe know how everything stood since I wrote last. That might dispose me absolutely in her favour and in her nephew's; and then she hoped there would be no occasion for me to think of entering upon any new measures.

Indeed, my dear, I did at the time intend, if I heard not from you by morning, to dispatch a man and horse to you, with the particulars of all, that you might, (if you thought proper) at least, put off Mrs. Townshend's coming up to another day. But I was miserably prevented.

She made me promise, that I would write to you upon this subject, whether I heard from you, or not. One of her servants should ride post with my letter, and wait for Miss Howe's answer.

She then launched out in deserved praises of you, my dear. How fond she should be of the honour of your acquaintance.

The pretended Miss Montague joined in with her, as well for herself as for her sister.

Abominably well instructed were they both!

O my dear! What risques may poor giddy girls run, when they throw themselves out of the protection of their natural friends, and into the wide world!

They then talked again of reconciliation and intimacy with every-one of my friends; with my mother particularly; and gave the dear good lady the praises that every-one gives her, who has the happiness to know her.

Ah, my dear Miss Howe! I had almost forgot my resentments against the pretended nephew!—So many agreeable things said, made me think, that, if you should advise it, and if I could bring my mind to forgive the wretch for an outrage so premeditatedly vile, and could forbear despising him for that and his other ungrateful and wicked ways, I might not be unhappy in an alliance with such a family. 'Yet,' thought I at the time, 'with what in-'terminatures does every-thing come to 'me, that has the appearance of good!'—However, as my lucid hopes made me see fewer faults in the behaviour of these pretended ladies, than recollection and abhorrence have helped me since to see, I began to reproach myself, that I had not at first thrown myself into their protection.

'But amidst all these delightful pros-'pects, I must not,' said she Lady Betty, 'forget that I am to go to town.'

She then ordered her coach to be got to the door—'We will all go to town 'together,' said she, 'and return to-'gether. Morrison shall stay here, and 'see every thing as I am used to have 'it, in relation to my apartment, and 'my bed; for I am very particular in 'some respects. My cousin Leeson's 'servants can do all I want to be done 'with regard to my night-dresses, and 'the like. And it will be a little airing 'for you, my dear, and a good oppor-'tunity for Mr. Lovelace to order what 'you want of your apparel to be sent 'from your former lodgings to Mrs. 'Leeson's; and we can bring it up with 'us from thence.'

I had no intention to comply. But as I did not imagine that she would insist upon my going to town with them, I made no answer to that part of her speech.

I must here lay down my tired pen!

Recollection! Heart-affecting recollection! How it pains me!

LETTER

LETTER XLVI.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

IN the midſt of theſe agreeableneſſes, the coach came to the door. The pretended Lady Betty beſought me to give them my company to their couſin Leeſon's. I deſired to be excuſed: yet ſuſpected nothing. She would not be denied. How happy would a viſit ſo condeſcending make her couſin Leeſon!—Her couſin Leeſon was not unworthy of my acquaintance: and would take it for the greateſt favour in the world.

I objected my dreſs. But the objection was not admitted. She beſpoke a ſupper of Mrs. Moore to be ready at nine.

Mr. Lovelace, vile hypocrite, and wicked deceiver! ſeeing, as he ſaid, my diſlike to go, deſired her ladyſhip not to inſiſt upon it, Fondneſs for my company was pleaded. She begged me to oblige her: made a motion to help me to my fan herſelf: and, in ſhort, was ſo very urgent, that my feet complied againſt my ſpeech, and my mind: and being, in a manner, led to the coach by her, and made to ſtep in firſt, ſhe followed me: and her pretended niece, and the wretch, followed her: and away it drove.

Nothing but the height of affectionate complaiſance paſſed all the way: over and over, What a joy would this unexpected viſit give her couſin Leeſon! What a pleaſure muſt it be to ſuch a mind as mine, to be able to give ſo much joy to every-body I came near!

The cruel, the ſavage ſeducer, (as I have ſince recollected) was in rapture all the way; but yet ſuch a ſort of rapture, as he took viſible pains to check.

Hateful villain! How I abhor him!—What miſchief muſt be then in his plotting heart!—What a devoted victim muſt I be in all their eyes!

Though not pleaſed, I was nevertheleſs, juſt then thoughtleſs of danger; they endeavouring thus to lift me up above all apprehenſions of that, and above myſelf too.

But think, my dear, what a dreadful turn all had upon me, when, through ſeveral ſtreets and ways I knew nothing of, the coach ſlackening it's pace, came within ſight of the dreadful houſe of the dreadfulleſt woman in the world; as ſhe proved to me.

'Lord be good unto me!' cried the poor fool, looking out of the coach—'Mr. Lovelace?—Madam!' turning to the pretended Lady Betty.—'Miſs!' turning to the niece, my hands and eyes lifted up—'Lord be good unto 'me!'

'What?—What!—What!—my 'dear——'

He pulled the ſtring—'What need to 'have come this way?' ſaid he.—'But 'ſince we are, I will but aſk a queſ'tion—My deareſt life, why this ap'prehenſion.'

The coachman ſtopped: his ſervant, who, with one of hers, was behind, alighted—'Aſk,' ſaid he, 'if I have 'any letters?—Who knows, my deareſt 'creature,' turning to me, 'but we 'may already have one from the cap'tain?—We will not go out of the 'coach!—Fear nothing—Why ſo ap'prehenſive?—Oh! theſe fine ſpirits!' cried the execrable inſulter.

Dreadfully did my heart then miſgive me: I was ready to faint. 'Why 'this terror, my life? You ſhall not 'ſtir out of the coach—But one queſ'tion, now the fellow has drove us this 'way.'

'Your lady will faint,' cried the execrable Lady Betty, turning to him.—'My deareſt niece! (Niece I will call 'you,' taking my hand) 'we muſt a'light, if you are ſo ill.—Let us alight '—Only for a glaſs of water and hart'horn—Indeed we muſt alight.'

'No, no, no!—I am well—Quite 'well——Won't the man drive on?—I 'am well—quite well—Indeed I am. '—Man, drive on.' putting my head out of the coach—'Man, drive on!'—though my voice was too low to be heard.

The coach ſtopt at the door. How I trembled!

Dorcas came to the door on it's ſtopping.

'My deareſt creature,' ſaid the vile man, gaſping as it were for breath, you 'ſhall not alight—Any letters for me, 'Dorcas?'

'There are two, Sir. And here is a 'gentleman, Mr. Belton, Sir, waits for 'your honour; and has done ſo above 'an hour.'

'I'll juſt ſpeak to him. Open the door '—You ſha'n't ſtep out, my dear—A 'letter perhaps from the captain already! '—You ſha'n't ſtep out, my dear.'

I ſighed, as if my heart would burſt.

'But we muſt ſtep out, nephew—'your lady will faint. Maid, a glaſs of 'hartſhorn and water!—My dear, you 'muſt ſtep out—You will faint, child—

'We

'We must cut your laces.'—[I believe my complexion was all manner of colours by turns]—'Indeed, you must 'step out, my dear.'

He knew, he said, I should be well, the moment the coach drove from the door. I should not alight. By his soul, I should not.

'Lord, Lord, nephew!—Lord, Lord, 'cousin,'—both women in a breath—'what do you make about nothing!—'You perſuade your lady to be afraid of 'alighting.—See you not, that ſhe is 'juſt fainting?'

'Indeed, Madam,' ſaid the vile ſeducer, 'my deareſt love muſt not be 'moved in this point againſt her will. 'I beg it may not be inſiſted upon.'

'Fiddle-faddle, fooliſh man—What 'a pother is here!—I gueſs how it is: 'you are aſhamed to let us ſee what 'ſort of people you carried your lady 'among—But do you go out, and 'ſpeak to your friend, and take your 'letters.'

He ſtept out; but ſhut the coach-door after him, to oblige me.

'The coach may go on, Madam,' ſaid I.

'The coach ſhall go on, my dear 'life,' ſaid he—But he gave not, nor intended to give, orders that it ſhould.

'Let the coach go on!' ſaid I—'Mr. 'Lovelace may come after us.'

'Indeed, my dear, you are ill!—In-'deed you muſt alight—Alight but for 'one quarter of an hour—Alight but 'to give orders yourſelf about your 'things. Whom can you be afraid of 'in my company, and my niece's? Theſe 'people muſt have behaved ſhockingly 'to you! Pleaſe the Lord, I'll enquire 'into it!—I'll ſee what ſort of people 'they are!'

Immediately came the old creature to the door. 'A thouſand pardons, dear 'Madam,' ſtepping to the coach-ſide, 'if 'we have any way offended you—Be 'pleaſed, ladies,' [to the other two] 'to 'alight.'

'Well, my dear,' whiſpered the Lady Betty, 'I now find that an hideous de-'ſcription of a perſon we never ſaw, is 'an advantage to them. I thought the 'woman was a monſter—But, really, ſhe 'ſeems tolerable.'

I was afraid I ſhould have fallen into fits: but ſtill refuſed to go out—'Man! Man!—Man!—' cried I, gaſpingly, my head out of the coach and in, by turns, half a dozen times running, 'drive on! '—Let us go!'

My heart miſgave me beyond the power of my own accounting for it; for ſtill I did not ſuſpect theſe women. But the antipathy I had taken to the vile houſe, and to find myſelf ſo near it, when I expected no ſuch matter, with the ſight of the old creature, all together made me behave like a diſtracted perſon.

The hartſhorn and water was brought. The pretended Lady Betty made me drink it. Heaven knows if there were any thing elſe in it!'

'Beſides,' ſaid ſhe, whiſperingly, 'I 'muſt ſee what ſort of creatures the 'nieces are. Want of delicacy cannot 'be hid from me. You could not, 'ſurely, my dear, have this averſion to 're-enter a houſe, for a few minutes, 'in our company, in which you lodged 'and boarded ſeveral weeks, unleſs 'theſe women could be ſo preſumptu-'ouſly vile, as my nephew ought not to 'know.'

Out ſtept the pretended lady; the ſervant, at her command, having opened the door.

'Deareſt Madam,' ſaid the other to me, 'let me follow you.' [For I was next the door] 'Fear nothing: I will 'not ſtir from your preſence.'

'Come, my dear,' ſaid the pretended lady: 'give me your hand;' holding out hers. 'Oblige me this 'once.'

'I will bleſs your footſteps,' ſaid the old creature, 'if once more you honour 'my houſe with your preſence.'

A crowd by this time was gathered about us; but I was too much affected to mind that.

Again the pretended Miſs Montague urged me, ſtanding up as ready to go out if I would give her room. 'Lord, 'my dear,' ſaid ſhe, 'who can bear 'this crowd?—What will people think?'

The pretended lady again preſſed me, with both her hands held out—'Only, 'my dear, to give orders about your 'things.'

And thus preſſed, and gazed at, (for then I looked about me) the women ſo richly dreſſed, people whiſpering; in an evil moment, out ſtepped I, trembling, forced to lean with both my hands (frighted too much for ceremony) on the pretended Lady Betty's arm—O that I had dropped down dead upon the guilty threſhold!

'We ſhall ſtay but a few minutes, 'my dear!—but a few minutes!' ſaid the ſame ſpecious jilt—out of breath with with her joy, as I have ſince thought, that they had thus triumphed over the unhappy victim!

'Come, Mrs. Sinclair, I think your 'name is, ſhew us the way——' following her, and leading me. 'I am very 'thirſty. You have frighted me, my 'dear, with your ſtrange fears. I muſt 'have tea made, if it can be done in a 'moment.—We have farther to go, 'Mrs. Sinclair, and muſt return to 'Hampſtead this night.'

'It ſhall be ready in a moment,' cried the wretch. 'We have water 'boiling.'

'Haſten, then—Come my dear,' to me, as ſhe led me through the paſſage to the fatal inner-houſe—'Lean upon 'me—how you tremble!—how you fal-'ter in your ſteps!—Deareſt niece Love-'lace,' [The old wretch being in hearing] 'why theſe hurries upon your ſpi-'rits?—We'll be gone in a minute.'

And thus ſhe led the poor ſacrifice into the old wretch's too-well known parlour.

Never was any-body ſo gentle, ſo meek, ſo low-voiced, as the odious woman; drawling out, in a puling accent, all the obliging things ſhe could ſay: awed, I then thought, by the conſcious dignity of a woman of quality, glittering with jewels.

The called-for tea was ready preſently. There was no Mr. Belton, I believe: for the wretch went not to any-body, unleſs it were while we were parleying in the coach. No ſuch perſon, however, appeared at the tea-table.

I was made to drink two diſhes, with milk, complaiſantly urged by the pretended ladies helping me each to one. I was ſtupid to their hands; and, when I took the tea, almoſt choaked with vapours; and could hardly ſwallow.

I thought, tranſiently thought, that the tea, the laſt diſh particularly, had an odd taſte. They, on my palating it, obſerved, that the milk was London-milk; far ſhort in goodneſs of what they were accuſtomed to from their own dairies.

I have no doubt, that my two diſhes, and perhaps my hartſhorn, were prepared for me; in which caſe it was more proper for their purpoſe, that they ſhould help me, than that I ſhould help myſelf. Ill before, I found myſelf ſtill more and more diſordered in my head; a heavy torpid pain encreaſing faſt upon me. But I imputed it to my terror.

Nevertheleſs, at the pretended ladies motion, I went up ſtairs, attended by Dorcas; who affected to weep for joy, that ſhe once more ſaw my bleſſed face; that was the vile creature's word; and immediately I ſet about taking out ſome of my cloaths, ordering what ſhould be put up, and what ſent after me.

While I was thus employed, up came the pretended Lady Betty, in a hurrying way——'My dear, you won't be long 'before you are ready. My nephew is 'very buſy in writing anſwers to his let-'ters: ſo I'll juſt whip away, and change 'my dreſs, and call upon you in an in-'ſtant.'

'O, Madam!—I am ready! I am now 'ready!—You muſt not leave me here.' And down I ſunk, affrighted, into a chair.

'This inſtant, this inſtant, I will re-'turn—Before you can be ready—Be-'fore you can have packed up your 'things—We would not be late—The 'robbers we have heard of may be out—'Don't let us be late.'

And away ſhe hurried before I could ſay another word. Her pretended niece went with her, without taking notice to me of her going.

I had no ſuſpicion yet, that theſe women were not indeed the ladies they perſonated; and I blamed myſelf for my weak fears.—'It cannot be,' thought I, 'that ſuch ladies will abet treachery 'againſt a poor creature they are ſo fond 'of. They muſt undoubtedly be the 'perſons they appear to be—What folly 'to doubt it! The air, the dreſs, the 'dignity, of women of quality. How 'unworthy of them, and of my charity,' concluded I, 'is this ungenerous ſha-'dow of ſuſpicion!'

So, recovering my ſtupified ſpirits, as well as they could be recovered, (for I was heavier and heavier; and wondered to Dorcas, what ailed me: rubbing my eyes, and taking ſome of her ſnuff, pinch after pinch, to very little purpoſe) I purſued my employment: but when that was over, all packed up that I deſigned to be packed up; and I had nothing to do but to think; and found them tarry ſo long; I thought I ſhould have gone diſtracted. I ſhut myſelf into the chamber that had been mine; I kneeled, I prayed; yet knew not what I prayed for: then ran out again: it was almoſt dark night, I ſaid. Where, where was Mr. Lovelace?

He came to me, taking no notice at firſt of my conſternation and wildneſs; [What they had given me made me incoherent and wild] 'All goes well, ſaid he, 'my dear!—A line from Cap-'tain Tomlinſon!'

'All indeed did go well for the villainous project of the moſt cruel and 'moſt villainous of men!'

I demanded his aunt!—I demanded his couſin!—The evening, I ſaid, was cloſing!—My head was very, very bad. I remember, I ſaid—And it grew worſe and worſe.——

Terror, however, as yet kept up my ſpirits; and I inſiſted upon his going himſelf to haſten them.

He called his ſervant. He raved at the ſex for their delay: 'twas well that buſineſs of conſequence ſeldom depended upon ſuch parading, unpunctual trifflers!

His ſervant came.

He ordered him to fly to his couſin Leeſon's, and to let Lady Betty and his couſin know how uneaſy we both were at their delay: adding, of his own accord, 'Deſire them, if they don't come 'inſtantly, to ſend their coach, and we 'will go without them. Tell them, I 'wonder they'll ſerve me ſo!'

I thought this was conſiderately and fairly put. But now indifferent as my head was, I had a little time to conſider the man and his behaviour. He terrified me with his looks, and with his violent emotions, as he gazed upon me. Evident joy-ſuppreſſed emotions, as I have ſince recollected. His ſentences ſhort and pronounced as if his breath were touched. Never ſaw I his abominable eyes look, as then they looked—Triumph in them!—Fierce and wild; and more diſagreeable than the women's at the vile houſe appeared to me when I firſt ſaw them; and at times, ſuch a leering, miſchief-boding caſt!—I would have given the world to have been an hundred miles from him. Yet his behaviour was decent—A decency, however, that I might have ſeen to be ſtruggled for—For he ſnatched my hand two or three times, with a vehemence in his graſp that hurt me; ſpeaking words of tenderneſs through his ſhut teeth, as it ſeemed; and let it go with a beggar-voiced humble accent, like the vile woman's juſt before; half-inward; yet his words and manner carrying the appearance of ſtrong, and almoſt convulſed paſſion! —O my dear! What miſchiefs was he not then meditating!

I complained once or twice of thirſt. My mouth ſeemed parched. At the time, I ſuppoſed, that it was my terror (graſping often as I did for breath) that parched up the roof of my mouth. I called for water: ſome table-beer was brought me: beer, I ſuppoſe, was a better vehicle (if I were not dozed enough before) for their potions. I told the maid, That ſhe knew I ſeldom taſted malt liquor: yet, ſuſpecting nothing of this nature, being extremely thirſty, I drank it, as what came next: and inſtantly, as it were, found myſelf much worſe than before! as if inebriated, I ſhould fancy: I know not how.

His ſervant was gone twice as long as he needed: and juſt before his return, came one of the pretended Lady Betty's, with a letter for Mr. Lovelace.

He ſent it up to me. I read it: and then it was that I thought myſelf a loſt creature; it being to put off her going to Hampſtead that night, on account of violent fits which Miſs Montague was pretended to be ſeized with; for then immediately came into my head his vile attempt upon me in this houſe; the revenge that my flight might too probably inſpire him with on that occaſion, and becauſe of the difficulty I made to forgive him, and to be reconciled to him; his very looks wild and dreadful to me; and the women of the houſe ſuch as I had more reaſon than ever, even from the pretended Lady Betty's hint, to be afraid of. All theſe crouding together in my apprehenſive mind, I fell into a kind of phrenzy.

I have not remembrance how I was, for the time it laſted: but I know, that in my firſt agitations, I pulled off my head-dreſs, and tore my ruffles in twenty tatters, and ran to find him out.

When a little recovered, I inſiſted upon the hint he had given of their coach. But the meſſenger, he ſaid, had told him, that it was ſent to fetch a phyſician, leſt his chariot ſhould be put up, or not ready.

I then inſiſted upon going directly to Lady Betty's lodgings.

Mrs. Leeſon's was now a crouded houſe, he ſaid: and as my earneſtneſs could be owing to nothing but groundleſs apprehenſion, [And O what vows, what proteſtations of his honour, did he then make!] he hoped I would not add to their preſent concern. Charlotte, indeed, was uſed to fits, he ſaid, upon any great ſurprizes, whether of joy or grief; and they would hold her for a week together, if not got off in a few hours.

'You are an obſerver of eyes, my 'dear,' ſaid the villain; perhaps in ſecret inſult: 'ſaw you not in Mrs Montague's now-and-then at Hampſtead, 'ſomething wildiſh? I was afraid for 'her then. Silence and quiet only do 'her good: your concern for her, and 'her love for you, will but augment the 'poor girl's diſorder, if you ſhould go.'

All impatient with grief and apprehenſion, I ſtill declared myſelf reſolved not to ſtay in that houſe till morning. All I had in the world, my rings, my watch, my little money, for a coach; or, if one were not to be got, I would go on foot to Hampſtead that night, though I walked it by myſelf.

A coach was hereupon ſent for, or pretended to be ſent for. Any price, he ſaid, he would give to oblige me, late as it was; and he would attend me with all his ſoul. But no coach was to be got.

Let me cut ſhort the reſt. I grew worſe and worſe in my head; now ſtupid, now raving, now ſenſeleſs. The vileſt of vile women was brought to frighten me. Never was there ſo horrible a creature as ſhe appeared to me.

I remember, I pleaded for mercy. I remember that I ſaid I would be his—Indeed I would be his—to obtain his mercy. But no mercy found I! My ſtrength, my intellects, failed me—And then ſuch ſcenes followed—O my dear, ſuch dreadful ſcenes!—Fits upon fits (faintly indeed and imperfectly remembered) procuring me no compaſſion—But death was withheld from me. That would have been too great a mercy!

THUS was I tricked and deluded back by blacker hearts of my own ſex, than I thought there were in the world; who appeared to me to be perſons of honour: and, when in his power, thus barbarouſly was I treated by this villainous man!

I was ſo ſenſeleſs, that I dare not aver, that the horrid creatures of the houſe were perſonally aiding and abetting: but ſome viſionary remembrances I have of female figures, flitting, as I may ſay, before my ſight; the wretched woman's particularly. But as theſe confuſed ideas might be owing to the terror I had conceived of the worſe than maſculine violence ſhe had been permitted to aſſume to me, for expreſſing my abhorrence of her houſe; and as what I ſuffered from his barbarity wants not that aggravation; I will ſay no more on a ſubject ſo ſhocking as this muſt ever be to my remembrance.

I never ſaw the perſonating wretches afterwards. He perſiſted to the laſt (dreadfully invoking Heaven as a witneſs to the truth of his aſſertion) that they were really and truly the ladies they pretended to be; declaring, that they could not take leave of me, when they left the town, becauſe of the ſtate of ſenſeleſſneſs and phrenzy I was in. For their intoxicating, or rather ſtupefying, potions had almoſt deleterious effects upon my intellects, as I have hinted; inſomuch that, for ſeveral days together, I was under a ſtrange delirium; now moping, now dozing, now weeping, now raving, now ſcribbling, tearing what I ſcribbled, as faſt as I wrote it: moſt miſerable when now-and-then a ray of reaſon brought confuſedly to my remembrance what I had ſuffered.

LETTER XLVII.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

IN CONTINUATION.

THE lady next gives an account,
Of her recovery from her delirium and ſleepy diſorder:
Of her attempt to get away in his abſence:
Of the converſations that followed, at his return, between them:
Of the guilty figure he made:
Of her reſolution not to have him:
Of her ſeveral efforts to eſcape:
Of her treaty with Dorcas to aſſiſt her in it:
Of Dorcas's dropping the promiſſory note, undoubtedly, as ſhe ſays, on purpoſe to betray her:
Of her triumph over all the creatures of the houſe, aſſembled to terrify her; and perhaps to commit freſh outrages upon her:
Of his ſetting out for M. Hall:
Of his repeated letters to induce her to meet him at the altar, on her uncle's anniverſary:
Of her determined ſilence to them all:
Of her ſecond eſcape, effected, as ſhe ſays, contrary to her own expectation; that attempt being at firſt but the intended prelude to a more promiſing one, which ſhe had formed in her mind:

And of other particulars; which being to be found in Mr. Lovelace's letters preceding, and the letter of his friend Belford, are omitted. She then proceeds:

THE very hour that I found myſelf in in a place of safety, I took pen to write to you. When I began, I designed only to write six or eight lines, to enquire after your health: for, having heard nothing from you, I feared indeed, that you had been, and still were, too ill to write. But no sooner did my pen begin to blot the paper, but my sad heart hurried it into length. The apprehensions I had lain under, that I should not be able to get away; the fatigue I had in effecting my escape: the difficulty of procuring a lodging for myself; having disliked the people of two houses, and those of a third disliking me; for you must think I made a frighted appearance—These, together with the recollection of what I had suffered from him, and my farther apprehensions of my insecurity, and my desolate circumstances had so disordered me, that I remember I rambled strangely in that letter.

In short, I thought it, on re-perusal, a half-distracted one: but I then despaired (were I to begin again) of writing better: so I let it go; and can have no excuse for directing it as I did, if the cause of the incoherence in it will not furnish me with a very pitiable one.

The letter I received from your mother was a dreadful blow to me. But nevertheless it had the good effect upon me (labouring, as I did just then, under a violent fit of vapourish despondency, and almost yielding to it) which profuse bleeding and blisterings have in paralytical or apoplectical strokes; reviving my attention, and restoring me to spirits to combat the evils I was surrounded by—Sluicing off, and diverting into a new channel (if I may be allowed another metaphor) the overcharging woes which threatened once more to overwhelm my intellects.

But yet I most sincerely lamented (and still lament) in your mother's words, That I cannot be unhappy by myself: and was grieved, not only for the trouble I had given you before; but for the new one I had brought upon you by my inattention.

She then gives the substance of the letters she wrote to Mrs. Norton, to Lady Betty Lawrance, and to Mrs. Hodges; as also of their answers; whereby she detected all Mr. Lovelace's impostures. She proceeds as follows:

I cannot, however, forbear to wonder how the vile Tomlinson could come at the knowledge of several of the things he told me of, and which contributed to give me confidence in him.

I doubt not, that the stories of Mrs. Fretchville, and her house, would be found as vile impostures as any of the rest, were I to enquire; and had I not enough, and too much, already against the perjured man.

How have I been led on!—What will be the end of such a false and perjured creature! Heaven not less profaned and defied by him, than myself deceived and abused! This, however, against myself I must say, that if what I have suffered be the natural consequence of my first error, I never can forgive myself, although you are so partial in my favour, as to say, that I was not censurable for what passed before my first escape.

And now, honoured Madam, and my dearest Miss Howe, who are to sit in judgment upon my case, permit me to lay down my pen with one request, which, with the greatest earnestness, I make to you both: and that is, that you will neither of you open your lips in relation to the potions and the violences I have hinted at.—Not that I am solicitous, that my disgrace should be hidden from the world, or that it should not be generally known, that the man has proved a villain to me: for this, it seems, every-body but myself expected from his character. But suppose, as his actions by me are really of a capital nature, it were insisted upon, that I should appear to prosecute him and his accomplices in a court of justice, how do you think I could bear that?

But since my character, before the capital enormity, was lost in the eye of the world; and that from the very hour I left my father's house; and since all my own hopes of worldly happiness are entirely over; let me slide quietly into my grave; and let it not be remembered, except by one friendly tear, and no more, drop from your gentle eye, mine own dear Anna Howe, on the happy day that shall shut up all my sorrows, that there was such a creature as

LETTER XLVIII.

MISS HOWE, TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

SUNDAY, JULY 9.

MAY Heaven signalize it's vengeance, in the face of all the world world, upon the moſt abandoned and profligate of men!—And in it's own time, I doubt not but it will.—And we muſt look to a WORLD BEYOND THIS for the reward of your ſufferings!

Another ſhocking detection, my dear!—How have you been deluded!—Very watchful I have thought you; very ſagacious; but, alas! not watchful, not ſagacious enough, for the horrid villain you have had to deal with!

The letter you ſent me incloſed as mine, of the 7th of June, is a villainous forgery. The hand, indeed, is aſtoniſhingly like mine; and the cover, I ſee, is actually my cover: but yet the letter is not ſo exactly imitated, but that (had you had any ſuſpicions about his vileneſs at the time) you, who ſo well know my hand, might have detected it.

In ſhort, this vile forged letter, though a long one, contains but a few extracts from mine. Mine was a very long one. He has omitted every thing, I ſee, in it, that could have ſhewn you what a deteſtable houſe the houſe is; and given you ſuſpicions of the vile Tomlinſon.—You will ſee this, and how he has turned Miſs Lardner's information, and my advices to you, [execrable villain!] to his own horrid ends, by the rough draught of the genuine letter, which I ſhall incloſe.

Apprehenſive for both our ſafeties from the villainy of ſuch a daring and profligate contriver, I muſt call upon you, my dear, to reſolve upon taking legal vengeance of the infernal wretch. And this not only for our own ſakes, but for the ſake of innocents who otherwiſe may yet be deluded and outraged by him.

She then gives the particulars of the report made by the young fellow whom ſhe ſent to Hampſtead with her letter; and who ſuppoſed he had delivered it into her own hand: and then proceeds:

I am aſtoniſhed, that the vile wretch, who could know nothing of the time my meſſenger (whoſe honeſty I can vouch for) would come, could have a creature ready to perſonate you! Strange, that the man ſhould happen to arrive juſt as you were gone to church, (as I find was the fact, on comparing what he ſays with your hint that you were at church twice that day) when he might have gone to Mrs. Moore's two hours before!—But had you told me, my dear, that the villain had found you out, and was about you!—You ſhould have done that—Yet, I blame you upon a judgment founded upon the event only!

I never had any faith in the ſtories that go current among country girls, of ſpectres, familiars, and demons; yet I ſee not any other way to account for this wretch's ſucceſsful villainy, and for his means of working up his ſpecious deluſions, but by ſuppoſing (if he be not the devil himſelf) that he has a familiar conſtantly at his elbow. Sometimes it ſeems to me, that this familiar aſſumes the ſhape of that ſolemn villain Tomlinſon; ſometimes that of the execrable Sinclair, as he calls her: ſometimes it is permitted to take that of Lady Betty Lawrance—But, when it would aſſume the angelick ſhape and mien of my beloved friend, ſee what a bloated figure it made!

'Tis my opinion, my dear, that you will be no longer ſafe where you are, than while the V. is in the country. Words are poor!—or how could I execrate him! I have hardly any doubt, that he has ſold himſelf for a time. O may the time be ſhort!—Or may his infernal prompter no more keep covenant with him, than he does with others!

I incloſe not only the rough draught of my long letter mentioned above; but the heads of that which the young fellow thought he delivered into your own hands at Hampſtead. And when you have peruſed them, I will leave you to judge, how much reaſon I had to be ſurprized, that you wrote me not an anſwer to either of theſe letters; one of which you owned you had received; (though it proved to be his forged one) the other delivered into your own hands, as I was aſſured; and both of them of ſo much concern to your honour; and ſtill how much more ſurprized I muſt be, when I received a letter from Mrs. Townſend, dated June 15, from Hampſtead, importing, That Mr. Lovelace, who had been with you ſeveral days, had, on the Monday before, brought Lady Betty and his couſin, richly dreſſed, and in a coach and four to viſit you: who with your own conſent, had carried you to town with them—to your former lodgings; where you ſtill were: that the Hampſtead women believed you to be married, and reflected upon me as a fomenter of differences between man and wife: that he himſelf was at Hampſtead the day before, viz. Wedneſday the 14th; and boaſted of his happineſs with you; inviting Mrs. Moore, Mrs. Bevis, and Miſs Rawlins, ſion, to go to Lowe to viſit his ſpouſe; which they promiſed to do: that he departed, that you were entirely reconciled to your former lodgings;—and laſt, finally, the women at Hampſtead and Mrs. Townſhend, that he had very handſomely diſcharged theirs.

I own to you, my dear, that I was ſo much ſurprized and diſguſted at theſe appearances againſt a conduct till then unexceptionable, that I was reſolved to make myſelf as eaſy as I could, and wait till you ſhould think fit to write to me. But I could rein-in my impatience but for a few days; and on the 26th of June I wrote a ſharp letter to you; which I find you did not receive.

What a fatality, my dear, has appeared in your caſe, from the very beginning till this hour! Had my mother permitted—

But can I blame her; when you have a father and mother living, who have ſo much to anſwer for?—So much!—as no father and mother, conſidering the child they have driven, perſecuted, expoſed, renounced—ever had to anſwer for!

But again I muſt execrate the abandoned villain—Yet, as I ſaid before, all words are poor, and beneath the occaſion.

But ſee we not, in the horrid perjuries and treachery of this man, what rakes and libertines will do, when they get a young creature into their power! It is probable, that he might have the intolerable preſumption to hope an eaſier conqueſt: but, when your unexampled vigilance and exalted virtue made potions, and rapes, and the utmoſt violences, neceſſary to the attainment of his deteſtable end, we ſee that he never boggled at them. I have no doubt, that the ſame or equal wickedneſs would be often committed by men of his villainous caſt, if the folly and credulity of the poor inconſiderates who throw themſelves into their hands, did not give them an eaſier triumph.

With what comfort muſt thoſe parents reflect upon theſe things, who have happily diſpoſed of their daughters in marriage to a virtuous man! And how happy the young women who find themſelves ſafe in a worthy protection! —If ſuch a perſon as Miſs Clariſſa Harlowe could not eſcape, who can be ſecure?—Since, though every rake is not a LOVELACE, neither is every woman a CLARISSA: and his attempts were but proportioned to your reſiſtance and vigilance.

My mother has commanded me to ſay, you know her thoughts upon the whole of your ſad ſtory. I will do it in another letter; and ſend it to you with this, by a ſpecial meſſenger.

But, for the future, if you approve of it, I will ſend my letters by the uſual hand, (Collins's) to be left at the Saracen's Head on Snow Hill: whither you may ſend yours, (as we both uſed to do, to Wilſon's) except ſuch as we ſhall think fit to tranſmit by the poſt: which I am afraid, after my next, muſt be directed to Mr. Hickman, as before: ſince my mother is for fixing a condition to our correſpondence, which, I doubt, you will not comply with, though I wiſh you would. This condition I ſhall acquaint you with by-and-by.

Mean time, begging excuſe for all the harſh things in my laſt, of which your ſweet meekneſs and ſuperior greatneſs of ſoul have now made me moſt heartily aſhamed, I beſeech you, my deareſt creature, to believe me to be, your truly ſympathizing and unalterable friend,

ANNA HOWE.

LETTER XLIX.

MISS HOWE, TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

MONDAY, JULY 10.

I Now, my deareſt friend, reſume my pen, to obey my mother, in giving you her opinion upon your unhappy ſtory.

She ſtill harps upon the old ſtring, and will have it, that all your calamities are owing to your firſt fatal ſtep; for ſhe believes (what I cannot) that your relations had intended, after one general trial more, to comply with your averſion, if they had found it as rivetted a one, as, let me ſay, it was a folly to ſuppoſe it would not be found to be, after ſo many ridiculouſly repeated experiments.

As to your latter ſufferings from that vileſt of miſcreants, ſhe is unalterably of opinion, that if all be as you have related, (which ſhe doubts not) with regard to the potions, and to the violences you have ſuſtained, you ought, by all means, to ſet on foot a proſecution againſt him, and againſt his deviliſh accomplices.

She aſks, What murderers, what raviſhers, would be brought to juſtice, if modeſty were to be a general plea, and allowable, againſt appearing in a court to proſecute?

She

She ſays, that the good of ſociety requires, that ſuch a beaſt of prey ſhould be hunted out of it: and, if you do not proſecute him, ſhe thinks you will be anſwerable for all the miſchiefs he may do in the courſe of his future villainous life.

'Will it be thought, Nancy,' ſaid ſhe, 'that Miſs Clariſſa Harlowe can 'be in earneſt, when ſhe ſays, ſhe is not 'ſolicitous to have her diſgraces conceal'ed from the world, if ſhe be afraid or 'aſhamed to appear in court, to do juſ'tice to herſelf and her ſex againſt him? 'Will it not rather be ſurmized, that 'ſhe may be apprehenſive, that ſome 'weakneſs, or lurking love, will appear 'upon the trial of the ſtrange cauſe? If,' inferred ſhe, 'ſuch complicated villainy 'as this (where perjury, potions, for'gery, ſubornation, are all combined 'to effect the ruin of an innocent crea'ture, and to diſhonour a family of emi'nence, and where thoſe very crimes, 'as may be ſuppoſed, are proofs of 'her innocence) is to go off with impu'nity, what caſe will deſerve to be 'brought into judgment; or what ma'lefactor ought to be hanged?'

Then ſhe thinks, and ſo do I, that the vile creatures, his accomplices, ought, by all means, to be brought to condign puniſhment, as they muſt and will be, upon bringing him to his trial: and this may be a means to blow up and root out a whole neſt of vipers, and ſave many innocent creatures.

She added, That, if Miſs Clariſſa Harlowe could be ſo indifferent about having this publick juſtice done upon ſuch a wretch for her own ſake, ſhe ought to overcome her ſcruples out of regard to her family, her acquaintance, and her ſex, which are all highly injured and ſcandalized by his villainy to her.

For her own part, ſhe declares, That, were ſhe your mother, ſhe would forgive you upon no other terms: and, upon your compliance with theſe, ſhe herſelf will undertake to reconcile all your family to you.

Theſe, my dear, are my mother's ſentiments upon your ſad ſtory.

I cannot ſay, but there are reaſon and juſtice in them: and it is my opinion, that it would be very right for the law to oblige an injured woman to proſecute, and to make ſeduction on the man's part capital, where his ſtudied baſeneſs, and no fault in her will, appeared.

To this purpoſe the cuſtom in the Iſle of Man is a very good one——

If a ſingle woman there proſecutes a ſingle man for a rape, the ecclieſiaſtical judges impannel a jury; and, if this jury find him guilty, he is returned guilty to the temporal courts: where, if he be convicted, the deemſter, or judge, delivers to the woman a rope, a ſword, and a ring; and ſhe has it in her choice to have him hanged, beheaded, or to marry him.

One of the two former, I think, ſhould always be her option.

I long for the full particulars of your ſtory. You muſt have but too much time upon your hands, for a mind ſo active as yours, if tolerable health and ſpirits be afforded you.

The villainy of the worſt of men, and the virtue of the moſt excellent of women, I expect will be exemplified in it, were it to be written in the ſame connected and particular manner, in which you uſed to write to me.

Try for it, my deareſt friend; and ſince you cannot give the example without the warning, give both, for the ſakes of all thoſe who ſhall hear of your unhappy fate; beginning from yours of June 5, your proſpects then not diſagreeable. I pity you for the taſk; though I cannot willingly exempt you from it.

My mother will have me add, That ſhe muſt inſiſt upon your proſecuting the villain. She repeats, that ſhe makes that a condition on which ſhe permits our future correſpondence. Let me therefore know your thoughts upon it. I aſked her, if ſhe would be willing, that I ſhould appear to ſupport you in court, if you complied?— By all means, ſhe ſaid, if that would induce you to begin with him, and with the horrid women. I think I could attend you, I am ſure I could, were there but a probability of bringing the monſter to his deſerved end.

Once more your thoughts of it, ſuppoſing it were to meet with the approbation of your relations?

But whatever be your determination on this head, it ſhall be my conſtant prayer, That God will give you patience to bear your heavy afflictions, as a perſon ought to do who has not brought them upon herſelf by a faulty will; that He will ſpeak peace and comfort to your wounded mind; and give you many happy years. I am, and ever will be, your affectionate and faithful a view to that, I hope no other voucher will be wanted for the sincerity of the writer, but who will the reader.

I am far from thinking myself out of the reach of this man's further violence. But what can I do? Whither can I fly?—Perhaps my bad state of health (which must grow worse, as recollection of the past evils, and reflections upon them, grow heavier and heavier upon me) may be my protection. Once, indeed, I thought of going abroad; and had I the prospect of many years before me, I would go—But, my dear, the blow is given.—Nor have you reason, now, circumstanced as I am, to be concerned that it is. What a heart must I have, if it be not broken—And indeed, my dear friend, I do so earnestly wish for the last closing scene, and with so much comfort find myself in a declining way, that I even sometimes ungratefully regret that naturally healthy constitution, which used to double upon me all my enjoyments.

As to the earnestly recommended prosecution, I may possibly touch upon it more largely hereafter, if ever I shall have better spirits; for they are at present extremely sunk and low. But, just now, I will only say, that I would sooner suffer every evil (the repetition of the capital one excepted) than appear publickly in a court to do myself justice. And I am heartily grieved, that your mother prescribes such a measure as the condition of our future correspondence: for the countenance of your friendship, my dear, and the desire I had to correspond with you to my life's end, were all my remaining hopes and consolation. Nevertheless, as that friendship is in the power of the heart, not of the hand only, I hope I shall not forfeit that.

O, my dear! what would I give to obtain a revocation of my father's malediction! A reconciliation is not to be hoped for. You, who never loved my father, may think my solicitude on this head a weakness; but the motive for it, sunk as my spirits at times are, is not always weak.

I APPROVE of the method you prescribe for the conveyance of our letters; and have already caused the porter of the inn to be engaged to bring to me yours, the moment that Collins arrives with them. And the servant of the house where I am, will be permitted to carry mine to Collins for you.

I have written a letter to Miss Rawlins of Hampstead; the answer to which, just just now received, has helped her to the knowledge of the vile contrivance, by which this wicked man got your letter of June the 10th. I will give you the contents of both.

To mine to her, I briefly acquainted her with what had befallen me, through the vileneſs of the women who had been paſſed upon me, as the aunt and couſin of the wickedeſt of men; and own, that I never was married to him. I deſire her to make particular enquiry, and to let me know, who it was, at Mrs. Moore's, that, on Sunday afternoon, June 11, while I was at church, received a letter from Miſs Howe, pretending to be me, and lying on a couch:—which letter, had it come to my hands, would have ſaved me from ruin. I excuſe myſelf, (on the ſcore of the delirium, which the horrid uſage I had received threw me into, and from a confinement as barbarous as illegal) that I had not before applied to Mrs. Moore, for an account of what I was indebted to her: which account I now deſired. And, for fear of being tracked by Mr. Lovelace, I directed her to ſuperſcribe her anſwer, 'To Mrs. Mary Atkins; to be left till 'called for, at the Bell Savage Inn, on 'Ludgate Hill.'

In her anſwer, ſhe tells me, That the vile wretch prevailed upon Mrs. Bevis to perſonate me. [A ſudden motion of his, it ſeems, on the appearance of your meſſenger] and perſuaded her to lie along on a couch: a handkerchief over her neck and face; pretending to be ill; the credulous woman drawn in by falſe notions of your ill offices to keep up a variance between a man and his wife—and ſo taking the letter from your meſſenger as me.

Miſs Rawlins takes pains to excuſe Mrs. Bevis's intentions. She expreſſes their aſtoniſhment and concern at what I communicate: but is glad, however, and ſo they are all, that they know in time the vileneſs of the baſe man; the two widows and herſelf having, at his earneſt invitation, deſigned me a viſit at Mrs. Sinclair's; ſuppoſing all to be happy between him and me; as he aſſured them was the caſe. Mr. Lovelace, ſhe informs me, had handſomely ſatisfied Mrs. Moore. And Miſs Rawlins concludes with wiſhing to be favoured with the particulars of ſo extraordinary a ſtory, as theſe particulars may be of uſe, to let her ſee what wicked creatures (women as well as men) there are in the world.

I thank you, my dear, for the [illegible] of your two letters which paſſed [illegible] cepted by this horrid [illegible] great advantage they were of to him, in the proſecution of his villainous deſigns againſt the poor wretch whom he has ſo long made the ſport of his [illegible] ventions.

Let me repeat, that I am quite [illegible] of life, and of my earth, in which [illegible] and ſorrowful ſpirits are ſure to be conſidered as alien; and to be made ſuffe-ferers, by the genuine ſtate and allegiance of that earth.

How unhappy, that thoſe letters [illegible] which could have acquainted me with his horrid views, and armed me againſt them, and againſt the vileneſs of the baſe women, ſhould fall into his hands! Unhappier ſtill, in that my [illegible] eſcape to Hampſtead gave him the opportunity of receiving them!

Nevertheleſs, I cannot but ſtill wonder, how it was poſſible for that Tomlinſon to know what paſſed between Mr. Hickman and my uncle Harlowe: a circumſtance, which gave the vile impoſtor moſt of his credit with me.

How the wicked wretch himſelf could find me out at Hampſtead, muſt alſo remain wholly a myſtery to me. He may glory in his contrivances—He, who has more wickedneſs than wit, may glory in his contrivances!—But, after all, I ſhall, I humbly preſume to hope, be happy, when he, poor wretch, will be—Alas! —who can ſay what!

Adieu, my deareſt friend!—May you be happy!—And then your Clariſſa cannot be wholly miſerable!

LETTER LI.

MISS HOWE, TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

WEDN. NIGHT, JULY 12.

I Write, my deareſt creature, I cannot but write, to expreſs my concern on your dejection. Let me beſeech you, my charming excellence, let me beſeech you, not to give way to it.

Comfort yourſelf, on the contrary, in the triumphs of a virtue unfollied; a will wholly faultleſs. Who could have withſtood the trials that you have ſurmounted?—Your couſin Morden will ſoon come. He will ſee juſtice done you, I make no doubt, as well with regard to what concerns your perſon as your eſtate. And many happy days may you yet ſee; and much good may you ſtill do, if you will not brighten unavoidable accidents with gloomy despondency.

But why, my dear, this pining solicitude, continued after a reconciliation with relations as unworthy as implacable; whose wills are governed by an all-grasping brother, who finds his account in keeping the breach open? On this overconsideration, it is now plain to me, that the whole of men built all his schemes. He saw that you thirsted after it, beyond all reason for hope. The view, the hope, I own, extremely desirable, had your family been Christians; or even had they been Pagans who had had bowels.

I shall send this short letter [I am obliged to make it a short one] by young Rogers, as we call him; the fellow I sent to you to Hampstead; an innocent, though pragmatical rustick. Admit him, I pray you, into your presence, that he may report to me how you look, and how you are.

Mr. Hickman should attend you; but I apprehend, that all his motions, and mine own too, are watched by the execrable wretch: and indeed his are by an agent of mine; for I own, that I am so apprehensive of his plots and revenge, now I know that he has intercepted my vehement letters against him, that he is the subject of my dreams, as well as of my waking fears.

My mother, at my earnest importunity, has just given me leave to write, and to receive your letters—But fastened this condition upon the concession, that yours must be under cover to Mr. Hickman, [This with a view, I suppose, to give him consideration with me;] and upon this further condition, that she is to see all we write.—'When girls 'are set upon a point,' she told one, who told me again, 'it is better for a 'mother, if possible, to make herself of 'their party, than to oppose them; 'since there will be then hopes that she 'will still hold the reins in her own 'hands.'

Pray let me know what the people are with whom you lodge?—Shall I send Mrs. Townsend to direct you to lodgings either more safe or more convenient for you?

Be pleased to write to me by Rogers; who will wait on you for your answer, at your own time.

Adieu, my dearest creature. Comfort yourself, as you would in the like unhappy circumstances comfort your own

ANNA HOWE.

LETTER LII.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

THURSDAY, JUNE 13.

I Am extremely concerned, my dear Miss Howe, for being primarily the occasion of the apprehensions you have of this wicked man's vindictive attempts. What a wide-spreading error is mine!

If I find that he sets on foot any machination against you, or against Mr. Hickman, I do assure you I will consent to prosecute him, although I were sure I should not survive my first appearance at the bar he should be arraigned at.

I own the justice of your mother's arguments on that subject: but must say, that I think there are circumstances in my particular case, which will excuse me, although on a slighter occasion than that you are apprehensive of I should decline to appear against him. I have said, that I may one day enter more particularly into this argument.

Your messenger has now indeed seen me. I talked with him on the cheat put upon him at Hampstead: and am sorry to have reason to say, that had not the poor young man been very simple, and very self-sufficient, he had not been so grossly deluded. Mrs. Bevis has the same plea to make for herself. A good-natured, thoughtless woman; not used to converse with so vile and so specious a deceiver as him, who made his advantage of both these shallow creatures.

I think I cannot be more private, than where I am. I hope I am safe. All the risque I run, is in going out, and returning from morning prayers; which I have two or three times ventured to do; once at Lincoln's Inn Chapel, at eleven; once at St. Dunstan's, Fleet Street, at seven in the morning, in a chair both times; and twice at six in the morning, at the neighbouring church in Covent Garden. The wicked wretches I have escaped from, will not, I hope, come to church to look for me; especially at so early prayers; and I have fixed upon the privatest pew in the latter church to hide myself in; and perhaps I may lay out a little matter in an ordinary gown, by way of disguise; my face half-hid by my mob.—I am very careless, my dear, of my appearance now. Neat and clean, takes up the whole of my attention.

The man's name at whose house I lodge, is Smith—A glove-maker, as well as seller. His wife is the shop-keeper. A dealer also in stockings, ribbands, snuff, and perfumes! A matron-like iron-like woman, plain-hearted, and prudent. The husband an honest, industrious man. And they live in good understanding with each other: a proof with me, that their hearts are right; for where a married couple live together upon ill terms, it is a sign, I think, that each knows something amiss of the other, either with regard to temper or morals, which if the world knew as well as themselves, it would perhaps as little like them, as such people like each other. Happy the marriage, where neither man nor wife has any wilful or premeditated evil in their general conduct to reproach the other with!—For even persons who have bad hearts will have a veneration for those who have good ones.

Two neat rooms, with plain, but clean furniture, on the first floor, are mine; one they call the dining-room.

There is, up another pair of stairs, a very worthy widow-lodger, Mrs. Lovick by name; who, although of low fortunes, is much respected, as Mrs. Smith assures me, by people of condition of her acquaintance, for her piety, prudence, and understanding. With her I propose to be well acquainted.

I thank you, my dear, for your kind, your seasonable advice and consolation. I hope I shall have more grace given me, than to despond, in the religious sense of the word: especially, as I can apply to myself the comfort you give me, that neither my will, nor my inconsiderateness, has contributed to my calamity. But, nevertheless, the irreconcileableness of my relations, whom I love with an unabated reverence; my apprehensions of fresh violences; [This wicked man, I doubt, will not yet let me rest] my being destitute of protection; my youth, my sex, my unacquaintedness with the world, subjecting me to insults; my reflections on the scandal I have given, added to the sense of the indignities I have received from a man, of whom I deserved not ill; all together will undoubtedly bring on the effect, that cannot be undesirable to me.—The slower, however, perhaps from my natural good constitution; and, as I presume to imagine, from principles which I hope will, in due time, and by due reflection, let me above the sense of all worldly disappointments.

At present, my head is much disordered. I have not indeed enjoyed it with any degree of clearness, since the violence done to that, and to my heart too, by the wicked arts of the abandoned creatures I was cast among.

I must have more conflicts. At times I find myself not subdued enough to my condition. I will welcome those conflicts as they come, as penitence owes—But yet my father's malediction—the temporary part so strangely and so literally completed!—I cannot, however, think, when my mind is pacified—but what is the story of Isaac, and Jacob, and Esau, and of Rebekah's choosing the latter of the blessing designed for him, (in favour of Jacob) given us for in the 27th chapter of Genesis? My father used, I remember, to enforce the doctrine deducible from it, on his children, by many arguments. At least, therefore, he must believe there is great weight in the curse he has announced; and shall I not be solicitous to get it revoked, that he may not hereafter be grieved, for my sake, that he did not revoke it?

All I will at present add, are my thanks to your mother for her indulgence to us. Due compliments to Mr. Hickman; and my request, that you will believe me to be, to my last hour, and beyond it, if possible, my beloved friend, and my dearer self, (for what is now my self!) your obliged and affectionate

CLARISSA HARLOWE.

LETTER LIII.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

FRIDAY, JULY 7.

I Have three of thy letters at once before me to answer; in each of which thou complainest of my silence; and in one of them tellest me, that thou canst not live without I scribble to thee every day, or every other day at least.

Why, then, die, Jack, if thou wilt. What heart, thinkest thou, can I have to write, when I have lost the only subject worth writing upon?

Help me again to my angel, to my CLARISSA; and thou shalt have a letter from me, or writing at least, part of a letter, every hour. All that the charmer of my heart shall say, that will I put down: every motion, every air of her beloved person, every look, will I try to describe; and when she is silent, I will endeavour to tell thee her thoughts, either what they are, or what I would have them to be—So that, having her, I shall never want a subject. Having lost her, my whole soul is a blank: the whole creation round me, the elements above, beneath, and every-thing I behold, (for nothing can I enjoy) are a blank without her.

O re-

O Quickly return, thou only charmer of my soul! Return to thy adoring Lovelace! What is the light, what the sky, what the town, what the country, what any thing, without thee? Light and joy, harmony, in my notion, are but parts of thee; and could they be all expressed in one word, that word would be CLARISSA.

O my beloved CLARISSA! Return to these them; once more return to bless thy LOVELACE, who now, by the loss of thee, knows the value of the jewel he has slighted; and rises every morning but to curse the sun, that shines upon every-body but him!'

WELL, but, Jack, 'tis a surprizing thing to me, that the dear fugitive cannot be met with; cannot be heard of. She is so poor a plotter, (for plotting is not her talent) that I am confident, had I been at liberty, I should have found her out before now, although the different emissaries I have employed about town, round the adjacent villages, and in Miss Howe's vicinage, have hitherto failed of success. But my lord continues so weak and low-spirited, that there is no getting from him. I would not disoblige a man whom I think in danger still: for would his gout, now it has got him down, but give him, like a fair boxer, the rising-blow, all would be over with him. And here [Pox of his fondness for me! it happens at a very bad time] he makes me sit hours together entertaining him with my roguelies: [a pretty amusement for a sick man!] and yet, whenever he has the gout, he prays night and morning with his chaplain. But what must his notions of religion be, who, after he has mused and mumbled over his responses, can give a sigh or groan of satisfaction, as if he thought he had made up with Heaven; and return with a new appetite to my stories?—Encouraging them, by shaking his sides with laughing at them, and calling me a sad fellow in such an accent, as shews he takes no small delight in his kinsman.

The old peer has been a sinner in his day, and suffers for it now: a sneaking sinner, sinning, rather than rushing, into vices, for fear of his reputation: or, rather, for fear of detection, and positive proof; for these sort of fellows, Jack, have no real regard for reputation.—Paying for what he never had, and never daring to rise to the joy of an enterprize at first hand, which could bring him within view of a tilting, or of the honour of being considered as the principal man in a court of justice.

To see such an old Trojan as this, just dropping into the grave, which I hoped ere this would have been dug, and filled up with him; crying out with pain, and grunting with weakness; yet in the same moment crack his leathern face into an horrible laugh, and call a young sinner 'Charming varlet,' encoreing him, as formerly he used to do the Italian eunuchs; what a preposterous, what an unnatural adherence to old habits!

My two cousins are generally present when I entertain, as the old peer calls it. Those stories must drag horribly, that have not more hearers and applauders, than relaters.

'Applauders!'

Aye, Belford, applauders, repeat I; for although these girls pretend to blame me sometimes for the facts, they praise my manner, my invention, my intrepidity.—Besides, what other people call blame, that call I praise: I ever did; and so I very early discharged shame, that cold-water damper to an enterprizing spirit.

These are smart girls; they have life and wit; and yesterday, upon Charlotte's raving against me upon a related enterprize, I told her, that I had half in debate several times, whether she were or were not too near of kin to me: and that it was once a moot point with me, whether I could not love her dearly for a month or so: and perhaps it was well for her, that another pretty little puss started up, and diverted me, just as I was entering upon the course.

They all three held up their hands and eyes at once. But I observed, that though the girls exclaimed against me, they were not so angry at this plain speaking, as I have found my beloved upon hints so dark, that I have wondered at her quick apprehension.

I told Charlotte, That, grave as she pretended to be in her smiling resentments on this declaration, I was sure I should not have been put to the expence of above two or three stratagems, (for nobody admired a good invention more than she) could I but have disentangled her conscience from the embarrasses of consanguinity.

She pretended to be highly displeased; so did her sister for her. I told her, that she seemed as much in earnest as if she had thought me so; and dared the trial. Plain words, I said, in these cases, were more shocking to their sex than gradation actions. And I bid Patty not be displeased

displeased at my distinguishing her letter. Once I had a great respect for her likewise.

An Italian air, in my usual careless way, a half-struggled for kiss from me, and a shrug of the shoulder by way of admiration, from each pretty cousin, and 'Sad, sad fellow,' from the old peer, attended with a side-shaking laugh, made us all friends.

There, Jack!—Wilt thou, or wilt thou not, take this for a letter? There's quantity, I am sure.—How have I filled a sheet, (not a short-hand one indeed) without a subject! My fellow shall take this; for he is going to town. And if thou canst think tolerably of such execrable stuff, I will soon send thee another.

LETTER LIV.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

SIX, SAT. MORN. JULY 8.

HAVE I nothing new, nothing diverting, in my whimsical way, thou askest, in one of thy three letters before me, to entertain thee with?—And thou tellest me, that, when I have least to narrate, to speak, in the Scottish phrase, I am most diverting. A pretty compliment, either to thyself, or to me. To both indeed!—A sign that thou hast as frothy a heart as I a head. But canst thou suppose, that this admirable woman is not all, is not every-thing with me? Yet I dread to think of her too; for detection of all my contrivances, I doubt, must come next.

The old peer is also full of Miss Harlowe: and so are my cousins. He hopes I will not be such a dog [There's a specimen of his peer-like dialect] as to think of doing dishonourably by a woman of so much merit, beauty, and fortune; and he says of so good a family. But I tell him, that this is a string he must not touch: that it is a very tender point: in short, is my sore place; and that I am afraid he would handle it too roughly, were I to put myself in the power of so ungentle an operator.

He shakes his crazy head. He thinks all is not as it should be between us; longs to have me present her to him as my wife: and often tells me what great things he will do, additional to his former proposals; and what presents he will make on the birth of the first child. But I hope the whole of his estate will be in my hands before such an event takes place. No harm to my dear Lord M. [says I, were it not, perhaps, the heart would break].

EIGHT o'clock at Midsummer, and these lazy varlettes (in full health) not come down yet to breakfast!—What a confounded indecency in young ladies, to let a rake know that they love their beds so dearly, and, at the same time, adieu to home there!—But I'll punish them—They shall breakfast with their old uncle, and yawn at one another as if for a wager; while I drive my phaeton to Colonel Ambrose's, who yesterday gave me an invitation both to breakfast and dine, on account of two Yorkshire nieces, celebrated toasts, who have been with him this fortnight past; and who, he says, want to see me. So, Jack, all women do not run away from me, thank Heaven!—I wish I could have leave of my heart, since the dear fugitive is so ungrateful, to drive her out of it with another beauty. But who can supplant her? Who can be admitted to a place in it after Miss Clarissa Harlowe?

At my return, if I can find a subject, I will scribble on, to oblige thee.

My phaeton's ready. My cousins send me word they are just coming down: so in spite I'll be gone.

SATURDAY AFTERNOON.

I DID stay to dine with the colonel, and his lady, and nieces; but I could not pass the afternoon with them, for the heart of me. There was enough in the person and faces of the two young ladies to set me upon comparisons. Particular features held my attention for a few moments: but those served but to whet my impatience to find the charmer of my soul; who, for person, for air, for mind, never had any equal. My heart recoiled and shrunk upon comparing minds and conversation. Pert wit, a too studied desire to please; each in high good-humour with herself; an open-mouthed affectation in both, to shew white teeth, as if the principal excellence; and to invite amorous familiarity, by the promise of a sweet breath; at the same time reflecting tacitly upon breaths arrogantly implied to be less pure.

Once I could have borne them.

They seemed to be disappointed that I was so soon able to leave them. Yet have I not at present so much vanity [My Clarissa has cured me of this vanity] as to attribute their disappointment ment so much to particular liking of me, as to their own self-admiration. They looked upon me as a connoisseur in beauty. They would have been proud of engaging my attention, as such: but so affected, so flimsy-witted, mere skin-deep beauties!—They had looked no farther into themselves than what their glasses had enabled them to see: and their glasses were flattering glasses too; for I thought them passive-faced, and spiritless; with eyes, however, upon the hunt for conquests, and bespeaking the attention of others, in order to countenance their own.—I believe I could, with a little pains, have given them life and soul, and to every feature of their faces sparkling information—But my Clarissa!—O Belford, my Clarissa has made me eyeless and senseless to every other beauty!—Do thou find her for me, as a subject worthy of my pen, or this shall be the last from thy LOVELACE.

LETTER LV.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

SUNDAY NIGHT, JULY 9.

NOW, Jack, have I a subject with a vengeance. I am in the very height of my trial for all my sins to my beloved fugitive. For here to-day, at about five o'clock, arrived Lady Sarah Sadlier and Lady Betty Lawrance, each in her chariot-and-six. Dowagers love equipage; and these cannot travel ten miles without a set, and half a dozen horsemen.

My time had hung heavy upon my hands; and so I went to church after dinner. 'Why may not handsome fellows,' thought I, 'like to be looked 'at, as well as handsome wenches?' I fell in, when service was over, with Major Warneton; and so came not home till after six; and was surprized, at entering the court-yard here, to find it littered with equipages and servants. I was sore the owners of them came for no good to me.

Lady Sarah, I soon found, was raised to this visit by Lady Betty; who has health enough to allow her to look out of herself, and out of her own affairs, for business. Yet congratulation to Lord M. on his amendment [Spiteful devils on both accounts!] was the avowed errand. But coming in my absence, I was their principal subject; and they had opportunity to set each other's heart against me.

Simon Parsons hinted this to me, as I passed by the steward's office; for it seems they talked loud; and he was making up some accounts with old Pritchard.

However, I hastened to pay my duty to them. Other people not performing theirs, is no excuse for the neglect of our own, you know.

AND NOW I ENTER UPON MY TRIAL.

WITH horrible grave faces was I received. The two antiques only bowed their tabby heads; making longer faces than ordinary; and all the old lines appearing strong in their furrowed foreheads and fallen cheeks: 'How do 'you, cousin?' and, 'How do you, 'Mr. Lovelace?' looking all round at one another, as who should say, 'Do 'you speak first:' and 'Do you:' for they seemed resolved to lose no time.

I had nothing for it, but an air as manly, as theirs was womanly. 'Your 'servant, Madam,' to Lady Betty—and, 'Your servant, Madam—I am 'glad to see you abroad,' to Lady Sarah.

I took my seat. Lord M. looked horribly glum; his fingers clasped, and turning round and round, under and over, his but just disgouted thumbs; his sallow face, and goggling eyes, cast upon the floor, on the fire-place, on his two sisters, on his two kinswomen, by turns; but not once deigning to look upon me.

Then I began to think of the laudanum, and wet cloth, I told thee of long ago; and to call myself in question for a tenderness of heart that will never do me good.

At last, 'Mr. Lovelace!——Cousin 'Lovelace!——Hem!—Hem!—I am 'sorry, very sorry,' hesitated Lady Sarah, 'that there is no hope of your ever 'taking up——'

'What's the matter now, Madam?'

'The matter now!——Why, Lady 'Betty has two letters from Miss Harlowe, which have told us what's the 'matter——Are all women alike with 'you?'

'Yes;' I could have answered, 'bating the difference which pride makes.

Then they all chorus'd upon me—'Such a character as Miss Harlowe's!' cried one——'A lady of so much ge-'nerosity and good sense!' another—'How charmingly she writes!' the two maiden monkeys looking at her fine hand-writing: her perfections my crimes. 'What can you expect will 'be

'be the end of these things!' cried Lady Sarah.—'Damn'd, damn'd doings!' vociferated the peer, shaking his loose fleshy wabbling chaps, which hung on his shoulders like an old cow's dew lap.

For my part, I hardly knew whether to sing or say, what I had to reply to these all-at-once attacks upon me!—'Fair and softly, ladies,—one at a time, 'I beseech you. I am not to be hunted 'down without being heard, I hope. 'Pray let me see these letters. I beg 'you will let me see them.'

'There they are:—that's the first—'Read it out, if you can.'

I opened a letter from my charmer, dated Thursday, June 29, our wedding-day, that was to be, and written to Lady Betty Lawrance. By the contents, to my great joy, I find the dear creature is alive and well, and in charming spirits. But the direction where to send an answer was so scratched out, that I could not read it: which afflicted me much.

She puts three questions in it to Lady Betty.

1st, About a letter of hers, dated June 7, congratulating me on my nuptials, and which I was so good as to save Lady Betty the trouble of writing——A very civil thing of me, I think!

Again—Whether she and one of her nieces Montague were to go to town, on an old Chancery suit?—And, whether they actually did go to town accordingly, and to Hampstead afterwards? and, whether they brought to town from thence the young creature whom they visited; was the subject of the second and third questions.

A little inquisitive dear rogue! and what did she expect to be the better for these questions?—But curiosity, damn'd curiosity, is the itch of the sex—Yet when didst thou know it turned to their benefit?—For they seldom enquire, but when they fear—And the proverb, as my lord has it, says, It comes with a fear. That is, I suppose, what they fear generally happens, because there is generally occasion for the fear.

Curiosity indeed she avows to be her only motive for these interrogatories: for though she says, her ladyship may suppose the questions are not asked for good to me, yet the answer can do me no harm, nor her good, only to give her to understand, whether I have told her a parcel of damn'd lies; that's the plain English of her enquiry.

'Well, Madam,' said I, with as much philosophy as I could assume; 'and may I ask—Pray, what was your 'ladyship's answer?'

'There's a copy of it,' tossing it to me, very disrespectfully.

This answer was dated July 1. A very kind and complaisant one to the lady, but very so so to her poor kinsman—That people can give up their own flesh and blood with so much ease!—She tells her how proud all our family would be of an alliance with such an excellence. She does me justice in saying how much I adore her, as an angel of a woman; and begs of her for I know not how many sakes, besides my soul's sake, that she will be so good as to have me for an husband; and answers—thou wilt guess how—to the lady's questions.

'Well, Madam, and pray, may I 'be favoured with the lady's other 'letter? I presume it is in reply to 'yours.'

'It is,' said the peer: 'but, Sir, let 'me ask you a few questions, before 'you read it—Give me the letter, Lady 'Betty.'

'There it is, my lord.'

Then on went his spectacles, and his head moved to the lines—'A charming 'pretty hand!—I have often heard, that 'this lady is a genus.'

And so, Jack, repeating my lord's wise comments and questions will let thee into the contents of this merciless letter.

"Monday July 3." [reads my lord]—'Let me see!—That was last Mon-'day; no longer ago! "Monday, July "the third—Madam—I cannot excuse "myself——" um, um, um, um, um, "um,' [humming inarticulately, and skipping]—"I must own to you, Ma-"dam, that the honour of being re-"lated——"

Off went the spectacles—'Now, tell 'me, Sir-r, has not this lady lost all 'the friends she had in the world, for 'your sake?'

'She has very implacable friends, my 'lord: we all know that.'

'But has she not lost them all for your 'sake?—Tell me that.'

'I believe so, my lord.'

'Well then!—I am glad thou art not 'so graceless as to deny that."

On went the spectacles again—"I "must own to you, Madam, that the "honour of being related to ladies as "eminent for their virtue, as for their "descent—" Very pretty, truly,' saith my lord, repeating, "as eminent for their "virtue

'virtue as for their deſcent, was, at firſt, 'no ſmall inducement with me to 'lend an ear to Mr. Lovelace's ad-'dreſs.'

'There is dignity, born dignity, in 'this lady,' cried my lord.

Lady Sarah. 'She would have been a 'grace to our family.'

Lady Betty. 'Indeed ſhe would.'

Lovel. 'To a royal family, I will ven-'ture to ſay.'

Lord M. 'Then what a devil——'

Lovel. 'Pleaſe to read on, my lord. 'It cannot be her letter, if it does not 'make you admire her more and more 'as you read—Couſin Charlotte—cou-'ſin Patty—pray attend—Read on, my 'lord.'

Miſs Charlotte. 'Amazing fortitude!'

Miſs Patty only lifted up her dove's eyes.

Lord M. [Reading] "And the ra-"ther, as I was determined, had it "come to effect, to do every-thing in "my power to deſerve your favourable "opinion."

Then again they chorus'd upon me.

A bleſſed time of it, poor I!—I had nothing for it but impudence!

Lovel. 'Pray read on, my lord—I told 'you how you would all admire her—'Or, ſhall I read?'

Lord M. 'Damn'd aſſurance!' [then reading] "I had another motive, which "I knew would of itſelf give me merit "with your whole family!" [They were all ear] "a preſumptuous one; "a puniſhably preſumptuous one, as "it has proved: in the hope that I "might be an humble means in the "hand of Providence, to reclaim a man "who had, as I thought, good ſenſe "enough at bottom to be reclaimed; "or at leaſt gratitude enough to ac-"knowledge the intended obligation, "whether the generous hope were to "ſucceed or not."—Excellent young 'creature!'

'Excellent young creature!' echoed the ladies, with their handkerchiefs at their eyes, attended with noſe-muſick.

Lovel. 'By my ſoul, Miſs Patty, you 'weep in the wrong place: you ſhall 'never go with me to a tragedy.'

Lady Betty. 'Hardened wretch!'

His lordſhip had pulled off his ſpectacles to wipe them. His eyes were miſty; and he thought the fault in his ſpectacles.

I ſaw they were all cocked and primed —'To be ſure that is a very pretty ſen-'tence,' ſaid I—'That is the excellency 'of this lady, that in every line, as ſhe 'writes on, ſhe improves upon herſelf. '—Pray, my lord, proceed—I know 'her ſtyle; the next ſentence will ſtill 'riſe upon us.'

Lord M. 'Damn'd fellow!' [again ſaddling, and reading] "But I have "been moſt egregiouſly miſtaken in Mr. "Lovelace!"—[Then they all clamoured again] "The only man, I per-"ſuade myſelf——"

Lovel. 'Ladies may perſuade them-'ſelves to any thing: but how can ſhe 'anſwer for what other men would or 'would not have done in the ſame cir-'cumſtances?'

I was forced to ſay any thing to ſtifle their outcries. 'Pox take ye all toge-'ther,' thought I; 'as if I had not 'vexation enough in loſing her!'

Lord M. [Reading] "The only man, "I perſuade myſelf, pretending to be a "gentleman, in whom I could have "been ſo much miſtaken."

They were all beginning again—'Pray, my lord, proceed!—Hear, hear '—Pray, ladies, hear!—Now, my lord, 'be pleaſed to proceed. The ladies 'are ſilent.'

So they were; loſt in admiration of me, hands and eyes uplifted.

Lord M. 'I will, to thy confuſion;' for he had looked over the next ſentence.

What wretches, Belford, what ſpiteful wretches, are poor mortals!—So rejoiced to ſting one another! to ſee each other ſtung!

Lord M. [Reading] "For while I was "endeavouring to ſave a drowning "wretch, I have been, not accidentally, "but premeditatedly, and of ſet pur-"poſe, drawn in after him."—'What 'ſay you to this, Sir-r?'

Lady S. } 'Aye, Sir, what ſay you
Lady B. } 'to this?'

Lovel. 'Say! Why I ſay it is a very 'pretty metaphor, if it would but hold. 'But if you pleaſe, my lord, read on. 'Let me hear what is further ſaid, and 'I will ſpeak to it all together.'

Lord M. 'I will. "And he has had "the glory to add to the liſt of thoſe "he has ruined, a name that I will be "bold to ſay, would not have diſpa-"raged his own."

They all looked at me, as expecting me to ſpeak.

Lovel. 'Be pleaſed to proceed, my 'lord: I will ſpeak to this by-and-by '—How came ſhe to know, I kept a liſt? '—I will ſpeak to this by-and-by.'

Lord M. [Reading on] "And this, "Madam, by means that would ſhock "humanity to be made acquainted "with."

Then

Then again, in a hurry, off went the ſpectacles.

This was a plaguy ſtroke upon me. I thought myſelf an oak in impudence; but, by my troth, this had almoſt felled me.

Lord M. 'What ſay you to this, 'SIR-R!'

Remember, Jack, to read all their Sirs in this dialogue with a double rr, Sir-r! denoting indignation rather than reſpect.

They all looked at me, as if to ſee if I could bluſh.

Lovel. 'Eyes off, my lord!—Eyes off, 'ladies!' [looking baſhfully, I believe] —'What ſay I to this, my lord!— 'Why, I ſay, that this lady has a ſtrong 'manner of expreſſing herſelf!—That's 'all—There are many things that paſs 'among lovers, which a man cannot 'explain himſelf upon before grave 'people.'

Lady Betty. 'Among lovers, Sir-r! 'But, Mr. Lovelace, can you ſay that 'this lady behaved either like a weak, 'or a credulous perſon?—Can you 'ſay——'

Lovel. 'I am ready to do the lady all 'manner of juſtice.—But, pray now, 'ladies, if I am to be thus interro-'gated, let me know the contents of 'the reſt of the letter, that I may be 'prepared for my defence, as you are 'all for my arraignment. For, to be 'required to anſwer piecemeal thus, 'without knowing what is to follow, 'is a curſed entnaring way of proceed-'ing.'

They gave me the letter: I read it through to myſelf:—and by the repetition of what I ſaid, thou wilt gueſs at the remaining contents.

'You ſhall find, ladies—you ſhall find, 'my lord—that I will not ſpare myſelf.' Then holding the letter in my hand, and looking upon it, as a lawyer upon his brief;

'Miſs Harlowe ſays, that when your 'ladyſhip' [turning to Lady Betty] 'ſhall know, that in the progreſs to 'her ruin, wilful falſhoods, repeated 'forgeries, and numberleſs perjuries, 'were not the leaſt of my crimes, you 'will judge that ſhe can have no prin-'ciples that will make her worthy of an 'alliance with ladies of yours, and your 'noble ſiſter's character, if ſhe could not, 'from her ſoul, declare that ſuch an al-'liance can never now take place.

'Surely, ladies, this is paſſion! This 'is not reaſon. If our family would 'not think themſelves diſhonoured by 'my marrying a perſon whom I had ſo 'treated; but, on the contrary, would 'rejoice that I did her this juſtice; and 'if ſhe has come out pure gold from 'the aſſay; and has nothing to reproach 'herſelf with; why ſhould it be an im-'peachment of her principles, to con-'ſent that ſuch an alliance ſhould take 'place?

'She cannot think herſelf the worſe, 'juſtly ſhe cannot, for what was done 'againſt her will.'

Their countenances menaced a general uproar—But I proceeded.

'Your lordſhip re'd to us, That ſhe 'had an hope, a preſumptuous one; nay, 'a puniſhably preſumptuous one, ſhe calls 'it; that ſhe might be a means in 'the hand of Providence, to reclaim 'me; and that this, ſhe knew, if ef-'fected, would give her a merit with 'you all. But from what would ſhe 'reclaim me?—She had heard, you'll 'ſay, (but ſhe had only heard, at the 'time ſhe entertained that hope) that, 'to expreſs myſelf in the womens dia-'lect, I was a very wicked fellow!— 'Well, and what then?—Why, truly, 'the very moment ſhe was convinced, 'by her own experience, that the 'charge againſt me was more than 'hearſay; and that of conſequence, I 'was a fit object for her generous endea-'vours to work upon: ſhe would needs 'give me up. Accordingly, ſhe flies 'out, and declares, that the ceremony 'which would repair all, ſhall never 'take place!—Can this be from any 'other motive than female reſentment?'

This brought them all upon me, as I intended it ſhould: it was as a tub to a whale; and after I had let them play with it a while, I claimed their attention, and, knowing that they always loved to hear me prate, went on.

'The lady, it is plain, thought, that 'the reclaiming of a man from bad ha-'bits was a much eaſier taſk than, in the 'nature of things, it can be.'

'She writes, as your lordſhip has 're'd, That in endeavouring to ſave a 'drowning wretch, ſhe had been, not 'accidentally, but premeditatedly, and 'of ſet purpoſe, drawn in after him. '—But how is this, ladies?—You ſee 'by her own words, that I am ſtill far 'from being out of danger myſelf. Had 'ſhe found me, in a quagmire ſuppoſe, 'and I had got out of it by her means, 'and left her to periſh in it; that would 'have been a crime indeed.—But is not 'the fact quite otherwiſe? Has ſhe not, 'if her allegory prove what ſhe would 'have it prove, got out herſelf, and 'left me floundering ſtill deeper and 'deeper in!—What ſhe ſhould have 'done, had ſhe been in earneſt to ſave 'me, was, to join her hand with mine, 'that ſo we might by our united ſtrength 'help one another out.—I held out my 'hand to her, and beſought her to give 'me hers:—but, no truly! ſhe was de'termined to get out herſelf as faſt as 'ſhe could, let me ſink or ſwim: re'fuſing her aſſiſtance (againſt her own 'principles) becauſe ſhe ſaw I wanted 'it.—You ſee, ladies—you ſee, my lord '—how pretty tinkling words run away 'with ears inclined to be muſical.'

They were all ready to exclaim again: but I went on, proleptically, as a rhetorician would ſay, before their voices could break out into words.

'But my fair accuſer ſays, That I 'have added to the liſt of thoſe I have 'ruined, a name, that would not have 'diſparaged my own. It is true, I 'have been gay and enterprizing. It 'is in my conſtitution to be ſo. I 'know not how I came by ſuch a con'ſtitution: but I was never accuſtomed 'to check or controul; that you all 'know. When a man finds himſelf 'hurried by paſſion into a ſlight of'fence, which however ſlight, will not 'be forgiven, he may be made deſpe'rate: as a thief, who intends a rob'bery, is often by reſiſtance, and for 'ſelf-preſervation, drawn in to commit 'murder.'

I was a ſtrange, a horrid wretch with every-one. But he muſt be a ſilly fellow who has not ſomething to ſay for himſelf, when every cauſe has it's black and it's white ſide.—Weſtminſter Hall, Jack, affords every day as confident defences as mine.

'But what right,' proceeded I, 'has 'this lady to complain of me, when ſhe 'as good as ſays—"Here, Lovelace, "you have acted the part of a villain "by me——You would repair your "fault: but I won't let you, that I "may have the ſatisfaction of expo"ſing you; and the pride of refuſing "you."

But, was that the caſe? Was that the caſe? Would I pretend to ſay, I would now marry the lady, if ſhe would have me?

Lovel. 'You find ſhe renounces Lady 'Betty's mediation——'

Lord M. [Interrupting me] 'Words 'are wind; but deeds are mind: what 'ſignifies your curſed quibbling, Bob? '—Say plainly, if ſhe will have you, 'will you have her? Anſwer me, Yes 'or No; and lead us not a wild gooſe-'chace after your meaning.'

Lovel. 'She knows I would. But 'here, my lord, if ſhe thus goes on to 'expoſe herſelf and me, ſhe will make 'it a diſhonour to us both to marry.'

Charl. 'But how muſt ſhe have been 'treated—'

Lovel. [Interrupting her] 'Why now 'couſin Charlotte,' chucking her under the chin, 'would you have me tell you 'all that has paſſed between the lady and 'me? Would you care, had you a bold 'and enterprizing lover, that procla'mation ſhould be made of every little 'piece of amorous roguery, that he 'offered to you?'

Charlotte reddened. They all began to exclaim. But I proceeded.

'The lady ſays, She has been diſ'honoured (devil take me, if I ſpare 'myſelf!) by means that would ſhock 'humanity to be made acquainted with 'them. She is a very innocent lady, 'and may not be a judge of the means 'ſhe hints at. Over-niceneſs may be 'under-niceneſs; have you not ſuch a 'proverb, my lord?—tantamount to, 'One extreme produces another!——Such 'a lady as this, may poſſibly think 'her caſe more extraordinary than it is. 'This I will take upon me to ſay, that 'if ſhe has met with the only man in 'the world who would have treated her, 'as ſhe ſays I have treated her, I have 'met in her with the only woman in the 'world who would have made ſuch a 'rout about a caſe that is uncommon 'only from the circumſtances that at'tend it.

This brought them all upon me; hands, eyes, voices, all lifted up at once. But my Lord M. who has in his head (the laſt feat of retreating lewdneſs) as much wickedneſs as I have in my heart, was forced (upon the air I ſpoke this with, and Charlotte's and all the reſt reddening) to make a mouth that was big enough to ſwallow up the other half of his face; crying out, to avoid laughing, 'Oh! Oh!' —as if under the power of a gouty twinge.

Hadſt thou ſeen how the two tabbies and the young grimalkins looked at one another, at my lord, and at me, by turns, thou wouldſt have been ready to ſplit thy ugly face juſt in the middle. Thy mouth has already done half the work. And, after all, I found not ſeldom in this converſation, that my humorous undaunted airs forced a ſmile into my ſervice from the prim mouths of the young ladies. They perhaps, had they met with ſuch another intrepid fellow as myſelf, who had firſt gained upon their affections, would not have made ſuch a rout as my beloved has done, about ſuch an affair as that we were aſſembled upon. Young ladies, as I have obſerved on an hundred occaſions, fear not half ſo much for themſelves, as their mothers do for them. But here the girls were forced to put on grave airs, and to ſeem angry, becauſe the antiques made the matter of ſuch high importance. Yet ſo lightly ſat anger and fellow-feeling at their hearts, that they were forced to purſe in their mouths, to ſuppreſs the ſmiles I now-and-then laid out for: while the elders having had roſes (that is to ſay, daughters) of their own, and knowing how fond men are of a trifle, would have been very loth to have had them nipt in the bud, without ſaying to the mother of them, 'By 'your leave, Mrs. Roſebuſh.'

The next article of my indictment was for forgery; and for perſonating of Lady Betty and my couſin Charlotte. Two ſhocking charges thou'lt ſay: and ſo they were!—The peer was outrageous upon the forgery-charge. The ladies vowed never to forgive the perſonating part. Not a peace-maker among them. So we all turned women, and ſcolded.

My lord told me, That he believed in his conſcience there was not a viler fellow upon God's earth than me.—'What ſignifies mincing the matter?' ſaid he—And that it was not the firſt time I had forged his hand.

To this I anſwered, that I ſuppoſed, when the ſtatute of Scandalum Magnatum was framed, there were a good many in the peerage, who knew they deſerved hard names, and that that law therefore was rather made to privilege their qualities, than to whiten their characters.

He called upon me to explain myſelf with a 'Sir r,' ſo pronounced, as to ſhew, that one of the moſt ignominious words in our language was in his head.

People, I ſaid, that were fenced in by their quality, and by their years, ſhould not take freedoms that a man of ſpirit could not put up with, unleſs he were able heartily to deſpiſe the inſulter.

This ſet him in a violent paſſion. He would ſend for Pritchard inſtantly.

'Let Pritchard be called?—He would alter his will; and all he could leave from me, he would.

'Do, do, my lord,' ſaid I: 'I always 'valued my own pleaſure above your 'eſtate. But I'll let Pritchard know, 'that if he draws, he ſhall ſign and 'ſeal.'

Why, what would I do to Pritchard?—Shaking his crazy head at me.

'Only, what he, or any man elſe, 'writes with his pen, to deſpoil me of 'what I think my right, he ſhall ſeal 'with his ears; that's all, my lord.'

Then the two ladies interpoſed.

Lady Sarah told me, That I carried things a great way; and that neither Lord M. nor any of them, deſerved the treatment I gave them.

I ſaid, I could not bear to be uſed ill by my lord, for two reaſons; firſt, becauſe I reſpected his lordſhip above any man living; and next, becauſe it looked as if I were induced by ſelfiſh conſiderations to take that from him, which nobody elſe would offer to me.

'And what,' returned he, 'ſhall be 'my inducement to take what I do at 'your hands?—Hay, Sir?'

'Indeed, couſin Lovelace,' ſaid Lady Betty, with great gravity, 'we do 'not any of us, as Lady Sarah ſays, 'deſerve at your hands the treatment 'you give us: and let me tell you, that 'I don't think my character, and your 'couſin Charlotte's, ought to be pro'ſtituted, in order to ruin an innocent 'lady. She muſt have known early 'the good opinion we all have of her, 'and how much we wiſhed her to be 'your wife. This good opinion of 'ours has been an inducement to her '(You ſee ſhe ſays ſo) to liſten to your 'addreſs. And this, with her friends 'folly, has helped to throw her into 'your power. How you have requited 'her, is too apparent. It becomes the 'character we all bear, to diſclaim your 'actions by her. And let me tell you, 'that to have her abuſed by wicked 'people raiſed up to perſonate us, or 'any of us, makes a double call upon 'us to diſclaim them.'

Lovel. 'Why this is talking ſome'what like. I would have you all diſ'claim my actions. I own I have done 'very vilely by this lady. One ſtep led 'to another. I am curſt with an enter'prizing ſpirit. I hate to be foiled.'

'Foiled!' interrupted Lady Sarah. 'What a ſhame to talk at this rate!—'Did the lady ſet up a contention with 'you? All nobly ſincere, and plain-'hearted,

'Indeed, love? I heard Miss Clarissa 'Harlowe is above all, above diſguiſe; 'neither the coquette, nor the prude! 'Poor lady! She deſerved a better 'fate from the man for whom ſhe took 'this ſtep which ſhe ſo freely blames.'

This above half affected me—Had this diſpute been ſo handled by every-body I had been aſhamed to look up. I began to be baſhful.

Charlotte aſked, If I did not ſtill ſeem inclinable to do the lady juſtice, if ſhe would accept of me? It would be, ſhe dared to ſay, the greateſt felicity the family could know, (She would anſwer for one) that this fine lady were of it.

They all declared to the ſame effect; and Lady Sarah put the matter home to me.

But my Lord Marplot would have it, that I could not be ſerious for ſix minutes together.

I told his lordſhip, that he was miſtaken; light as he thought I made of this ſubject, I never knew any that went ſo near my heart.

Miſs Patty ſaid, She was glad to hear that: indeed ſhe was glad to hear that: and her ſott eyes gliſtened with pleaſure.

Lord M. called her ſweet ſoul, and was ready to cry.

Not from humanity neither, Jack. This peer has no bowels; as thou may-eſt obſerve by his treatment of me. But when people's minds are weakened by a ſenſe of their own infirmities, and when they are drawing on to their latter ends, they will be moved on the ſlighteſt occaſions, whether thoſe offer from within or without them. And this, frequently, the unpenetrating world calls humanity; when all the time, in compaſſionating the miſeries of human nature, they are but pitying themſelves; and were they in ſtrong health and ſpirits, would care as little for any-body elſe as thou or I do.

Here broke they off my trial for this ſitting. Lady Sarah was much fatigued. It was agreed to purſue the ſubject in the morning. They all, however, retired together, and went into private conference.

LETTER LVI.

MR. LOVELACE. IN CONTINUATION.

THE ladies, inſtead of taking up the ſubject where we had laid it down, muſt needs touch upon paſſages in my fair accuſer's letter, which I was in hopes they would have let reſt, as we were in a tolerable way. But, truly, they muſt hear all they could hear, of our ſtory, and what I had to ſay to thoſe paſſages, that they might be better enabled to mediate between us, if I were really and indeed inclined to do her the hoped for juſtice.

Theſe paſſages were, 1ſt, That after I had compulſatorily tricked her into the act of going off with me, I carried her to one of the worſt houſes in London.

2. That I had made a wicked attempt upon her; in reſentment of which, ſhe fled to Hampſtead, privately.

3dly, Came the forgery, and perſonating charges again; and we were upon the point of renewing our quarrel, before we could get to the next charge: which was ſtill worſe.

For that (4thly) was, That having betrayed her back to the vile houſe, I firſt robbed her of her ſenſes, and then her honour; detaining her afterwards a priſoner there.

Were I to tell thee the gloſſes I put upon theſe heavy charges, what would it be, but to repeat many of the extenuating arguments I have uſed in my letters to thee?—Suffice it, therefore, to ſay, that I inſiſted much, by way of palliation, on the lady's extreme niceneſs: on her diffidence in my honour: on Miſs Howe's contriving ſpirit; plots on their parts begetting plots on mine: on the high paſſions of the ſex. I aſſerted, that my whole view, in gently reſtraining her, was to oblige her to forgive me, and to marry me; and this, for the honour of both families. I boaſted of my own good qualities; ſome of which none that knew me, deny; and to which few libertines can lay claim.

They then fell into warm admirations and praiſes of the lady; all of them preparatory as I knew, to the grand queſtion: and thus it was introduced by Lady Sarah.

'We have ſaid as much as I think we 'can ſay, upon theſe letters of the poor 'lady. To dwell upon the miſchiefs that 'may enſue from the abuſe of a perſon 'of her rank, if all the reparation be not 'made that now can be made, would 'perhaps be to little purpoſe. But you 'ſeem, Sir, ſtill to have a juſt opinion 'of her, as well as affection for her. 'Her virtue is not in the leaſt queſtion-'able. She could not reſent as ſhe does, 'had ſhe any-thing to reproach herſelf 'with. She is, by every-body's ac-'count, a fine woman; has a good eſ-'tate in her own right; is of no con-'temptible family; though, I think,

'with

'with regard to her, they have acted as 'imprudently as unworthily. For the 'excellency of her mind, for good oeco- 'nomy, the common speech of her, as 'the worthy Dr. Lewen once told me, 'is, That her prudence would enrich a poor 'man, and her piety reclaim a licentious 'one. I, who have not been abroad 'twice this twelve-month, came hither 'purposely, so did Lady Betty, to see if 'justice may not be done her; and also 'whether we, and my Lord M. (your 'neareſt relations, Sir) have, or have 'not, any influence over you. And, 'for my own part, as your determina- 'tion shall be in this article such shall 'be mine, with regard to the disposition 'of all that is within my power.'

Lady Betty. 'And mine.'

'And mine,' said my lord: and va- liantly he swore to it.

Lovel. 'Far be it from me to think 'slightly of favours you may any of you 'be glad I would deserve! But as far 'be it from me to enter into conditions 'against my own liking, with sordid 'views!—As to future mischiefs, let 'them come. I have not done with the 'Harlowes yet. They were the aggres- 'sors; and I should be glad they would 'let me hear from them, in the way 'they should hear from me, in the like 'case. Perhaps I should not be sorry to 'be found, rather than be obliged to 'seek, on this occasion.'

Miss Charlotte [reddening.] 'Spoke 'like a man of violence, rather than a 'man of reason! I hope you'll allow 'that, cousin.'

Lady Sarah. 'Well, but since what 'is done is done, and cannot be undone, 'let us think of the next best.—Have 'you any objection against marrying 'Miss Harlowe, if she will have you?'

Lovel. 'There can possibly be but 'one: that she is to every-body, no 'doubt, as well as to Lady Betty, pur- 'suing that maxim peculiar to herself, '(and let me tell you, so it ought to be:) 'that what she cannot conceal from her- 'self, she will publish to all the world.'

Miss Patty. 'The lady, to be sure, 'writes this in the bitterness of her 'grief, and in despair.'

Lovel. 'And so when her grief is al- 'layed; when her despairing fit is over '—And this from you, cousin Patty!— 'Sweet girl!—And would you, my dear, 'in the like case,' [whispering her] 'have yielded to entreaty—Would you 'have meant no more by the like ex- 'clamations?'

I had a rap with her fan, and a blush; and from Lord M. a reflection, That I turned into jest every-thing they said.

I asked, if they thought the Harlowes deserved any consideration from me? and whether that family would not in- ult over me, were I to marry their daughter, as if I dared not to do other- wise?

Lady Sarah. 'Once I was angry with 'that family, as we all were. But now 'I pity them; and think, that you have 'but too well justified the worse treat- 'ment they gave you.'

Lord M. 'Their family is of standing: 'All gentlemen of it, and rich, and re- 'putable. Let me tell you, that many 'of our coronets would be glad they 'could derive their descents from no 'worse a stem than theirs.'

Lovel. 'The Harlowes are a narrow- 'souled and implacable family. I hate 'them: and though I revere the lady, 'scorn all relation to them.'

Lady Betty. 'I wish no worse could 'be said of him, who is such a scorner of 'common failings in others.'

Lord M. 'How would my sister Love- 'lace have reproached herself for all her 'indulgent folly to this favourite boy of 'hers, had she lived till now, and been 'present on this occasion!'

Lady Sarah. 'Well, but, begging 'your lordship's pardon, let us see if 'any-thing can be done for this poor 'lady.'

Miss Ch. 'If Mr. Lovelace has no- 'thing to object against the lady's cha- 'racter, (and I presume to think he is 'not ashamed to do her justice, though 'it may make against himself) I cannot 'see but honour and generosity will 'compel from him all that we expect. 'If there be any levities, any weakne- 'sses, to be charged upon the lady, I 'should not open my lips in her favour; 'though in private I would pity her, 'and deplore her hard hap.—And yet, 'even then, there might not want ar- 'guments, from honour and gratitude, 'in so particular a case, to engage you, 'Sir, to make good the vows it is plain 'you have broken.'

Lady Betty. 'My niece Charlotte has 'called upon you so justly, and has put 'the question to you so properly, that I 'cannot but wish you would speak to it 'directly, and without evasion.'

All in a breath then bespoke my se- riousness, and my justice: and in this manner I delivered myself, assuming an air sincerely solemn.

'I am very sensible, that the perfor- 'mance of the task you have put me 'upon,

'[illegible] will know me without excuse: 'for I shall not have recourse either to 'evasion or palliation.

'As my cousin Charlotte has severely 'observed, I am not ashamed to do jus- 'tice to Miss Harlowe's merit.

'I own to you all, and, what is more, 'with high regret—(if not with shame, 'cousin Charlotte)—that I have a great 'deal to answer for in my usage of this 'lady. The sex has not a nobler mind, 'nor a lovelier person of it. And, for 'virtue, I could not have believed (ex- 'cuse me, ladies) that there ever was a 'woman who gave, or could have given, 'such illustrious, such uniform proofs 'of it: for, in her whole conduct, she 'has shewn herself to be equally above 'temptation and art; and, I had almost 'said, human frailty.

'The step she so freely blames her- 'self for taking, was truly what she 'calls compulsatory: for though she was 'provoked to think of going off with 'me, she intended it not, nor was pro- 'vided to do so: neither would she ever 'have had the thought of it, had her re- 'lations left her free, upon her offered 'composition to renounce the man she 'did not hate, in order to avoid the man 'she did.

'It piqued my pride, I own, that I 'could so little depend upon the force 'of those impressions which I had the 'vanity to hope I had made in a heart 'so delicate; and in my worst devices 'against her, I encouraged myself, that 'I abused no confidence; for none had 'she in my honour.

'The evils she has suffered, it would 'have been more than a miracle had she 'avoided. Her watchfulness rendered 'more plots abortive, than those which 'contributed to her fall; and they were 'many and various. And all her greater 'trials and hardships were owing to her 'noble resistance, and just resentment.

'I know,' proceeded I, 'how much 'I condemn myself in the justice I am 'doing to this excellent creature. But 'yet I will do her justice, and cannot help 'it if I would. And I hope this shews, 'that I am not so totally abandoned, as 'I have been thought to be.

'Indeed, with me, she has done more 'honour to her sex in her fall, if it be 'to be called a fall, (in truth it ought 'not) than ever any other could do in 'her standing.

'When, at length, I had given her 'watchful virtue-cause of suspicion, I 'was then indeed obliged to make use 'of power and art to prevent her escap- 'ing from me. She then formed con- 'trivances to elude mine; but all her 'were such as strict truth and punctili- 'ous honour would justify. She could 'not stoop to deceit and falsehood—no, 'not to save herself. More than once 'justly did she tell me, fired by confci- 'ous worthiness, that her soul was my 'soul's superior!—Forgive me, ladies, 'for saying, that till I knew her, I ques- 'tioned a soul in a sex, created, as I 'was willing to suppose, only for tem- 'porary purposes.—It is not to be ima- 'gined into what absurdities men of free 'principles run, in order to justify to 'themselves their free practices; and to 'make a religion to their minds: and 'yet, in this respect, I have not been 'so faulty as some others.

'No wonder that such a noble crea- 'ture as this looked upon every studied 'artifice, as a degree of baseness not to 'be forgiven: no wonder that she could 'so easily become averse to the man, '(though once she beheld him with an 'eye not wholly indifferent) whom she 'thought capable of premeditated guilt. '—Nor, give me leave, on the other 'hand, to say, is it to be wondered at, 'that the man who found it so difficult 'to be forgiven for the slighter offences, 'and who had not the grace to recede 'or repent, (made desperate) should be 'hurried on to the commission of the 'greater.

'In short, ladies—in a word, my lord '—Miss Clarissa Harlowe is an angel; 'if ever there was or could be one in 'human nature: and is, and ever was, 'as pure as an angel in her will: and 'this justice I must do her, although the 'question, I see by every glistening eye, 'is ready to be asked—"What, then, "Lovelace, are you?"

Lord M. 'A devil!—A damned de- 'vil!—I must answer. And may the 'curse of God follow you in all you un- 'dertake, if you do not make her the 'best amends now in your power to 'make her!'

Lovel. 'From you, my lord, I could 'expect no other: but from the ladies 'I hope for less violence from the in- 'genuousness of my confession.'

The ladies, elder and younger, had their handkerchiefs to their eyes, at the just testimony which I bore to the merits of this exalted creature; and which I would make no scruple to bear at the bar of a court of justice, were I to be called to it.

Lady Betty. 'Well, Sir, this is a 'noble character. If you think as you 'speak 'speak, surely you cannot refuse to do 'the lady all the justice now in your 'power to do her.'

They all joined in this demand.

I pleaded, that I was sure she would not have me: that, when she had taken a resolution, she was not to be moved: unpersuadableness was an Harlowe sin: that, and her name, I told them, were all she had of theirs.

All were of opinion, that she might, in her present desolate circumstances, be brought to forgive me. Lady Sarah said, that Lady Betty and she would endeavour to find out the noble sufferer, as they justly called her; and would take her into their protection, and be guarantees of the justice that I would do her; as well after marriage as before.

It was some pleasure to me, to observe the placability of these ladies of my own family, had they, any or either of them, met with a LOVELACE. But 'twould be hard upon us honest fellows, Jack, if all women were CLARISSAS.

Here am I obliged to break off.

LETTER LVII.

MR. LOVELACE. IN CONTINUATION.

IT is much better, Jack, to tell your own story, when it must be known, than to have an adversary tell it for you. Conscious of this, I gave them a particular account how urgent I had been with her to fix upon the Thursday after I left her, (it being her uncle Harlowe's anniversary birth-day, and named to oblige her) for the private celebration; having some days before actually procured a licence, which still remained with her.

That, not being able to prevail upon her to promise any-thing, while under a supposed restraint; I offered to leave her at full liberty, if she would give me the least hope for that day. But neither did this offer avail me.

That this inflexibleness making me desperate; I resolved to add to my former fault, by giving directions, that she should not either go or correspond out of the house, till I returned from M. Hall; well knowing, that if she were at full liberty, I must for ever lose her.

That this constraint had so much incensed her, that although I wrote no less than four different letters, I could not procure a single word in answer; though I pressed her but for four words to signify the day and the church.

I referred to my own cousins to vouch for me the unexceptionableness of [illegible] took to send messengers to [illegible] they knew not the occasion; which [illegible] I told them was this.

I acquainted them, that I [illegible] wrote to you, Jack, and to another gentleman of whom I thought she had a good opinion, to attend her, in order to press for her compliance; holding myself in readiness the last day, at Saint Hill, to meet the messenger they should send, and proceed to London, if his message were favourable: but that, before they could attend her, she had found means to fly away once more: 'And is now,' said I, 'perched perhaps 'somewhere under Lady Betty's window 'at Glenham Hall; and there, like the 'sweet Philomela, a thorn in her breast, 'warbles forth her melancholy com- 'plaints against her barbarous Tereus.'

Lady Betty declared, That she was not with her; nor did she know where she was. She should be, she added, the most welcome guest to her, that she ever received.

In truth I had a suspicion, that she was already in their knowledge, and taken into their protection; for Lady Sarah I imagined incapable of being rouzed to this spirit by a letter only from Miss Harlowe, and that not directed to herself; she being a very indolent and melancholy woman. But her sister, I find, had wrought her up to it: for Lady Betty is as officious and managing a woman as Mrs. Howe; but of a much more generous and noble disposition—She is my aunt, Jack.

I supposed, I said, that her ladyship might have a private direction where to send to her. I spoke as I wished: I would have given the world to have heard that she was inclined to cultivate the interest of any of my family.

Lady Betty answered, that she had no direction but what was in the letter; which she had scratched out, and which, it was probable, was only a temporary one, in order to avoid me: otherwise she would hardly have directed an answer to be left at an inn. And she was of opinion, that to apply to Miss Howe would be the only certain way to succeed in any application for forgiveness, would I enable that young lady to interest herself in procuring it.

Miss Charlotte. 'Permit me to make 'a proposal.—Since we are all of one 'mind in relation to the justice due to 'Miss Harlowe, if Mr. Lovelace will 'oblige himself to marry her, I will 'make Miss Howe a visit, little as I ac- 'quai[illegible]

[illegible] endeavour to [illegible] the re-[illegible]. And if this can be done, I make no question but all may be happily accommodated; for everybody knows the love there is between Miss Harlowe and Miss [illegible].

MARRIAGE, with these women, thou fool, Jack, is an divertisement for all we can do here. A true dramatick retrompete!

This motion was highly approved of; and I gave my honour, as desired, in the fullest manner they could wish.

Lady Sarah. 'Well then, cousin Charlotte, begin your treaty with Miss Howe, out of hand.'

Lady Betty. 'Pray do. And let Miss Harlowe be told, that I am ready to receive her as the most welcome of guests: and I will not have her out of my sight till the knot is tied.'

Lady Sarah. 'Tell her from me, that she shall be my daughter!—Instead of my poor Betsey.'——And shed a tear in remembrance of her lost daughter.

Lord M. 'What say you, Sir, to this?'

Lovel. 'CONVENT, my lord. I speak in the language of your house.'

Lord M. 'We are not to be fooled, nephew. No quibbling. We will have no flirt put upon us.'

Lovel. 'You shall not. And yet, I did not intend to marry, if she exceeded the appointed Thursday. But, I think, (according to her own notions) that I have injured her beyond reparation, although I were to make her the best of husbands; as I am resolved to be, if she will condescend, as I will call it, to have me.—And be this, cousin Charlotte, my part of your commission to say.'

This pleased them all.

Lord M. 'Give me thy hand, Bob! Thou talkest like a man of honour at last. I hope we may depend upon what thou sayest!'

The ladies eyes put the same question to me.

Lovel. 'You may, my lord.—You may, ladies—Absolutely you may.'

Then was the personal character of the lady, as well as her more extraordinary talents and endowments, again expatiated upon: and Miss Patty, who had once seen her launched out more than all the rest in her praise. These were followed by such enquiries as are never forgotten to be made in marriage-treaties, and which generally are the principal motives with the sages of a family, though the last to be mentioned by the parties themselves, and yet even by them, perhaps, the first thought of: that is to say, inquisition into the lady's fortune; into the particulars of the grandfather's estate; and what her father, and her single-souled uncles, will probably do for her, if a reconciliation be effected; as, by their means, they make no doubt but it will, between both families, if it be not my fault. The two venerables [No longer rabbies with me now] hinted at rich presents on their own parts; and my lord declared, that he would make such overtures in my behalf, as should render my marriage with Miss Harlowe the best day's work I ever made; and what, he doubted not, would be as agreeable to that family, as to myself.

Thus, at present, by a single hair, hangs over my head the matrimonial sword. And thus ended my trial. And thus are we all friends; and 'Cousin' and 'Cousin,' and 'Nephew' and 'Nephew,' at every word.

Did ever comedy end more happily, than this long trial?

LETTER LVIII.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

WEDN. JULY 22.

SO, Jack, they think they have gained a mighty point. But, were I to change my mind, were I to repent, I fancy I am safe.—And yet this very moment it rises to my mind, that 'tis hard trifling too; for surely there must be some embers, where there was fire so lately, that may be stirred up to give a blaze to combustibles strewed lightly upon them. Love, like some self-propagating plants, or roots, which have taken strong hold in the earth, when once got deep into the heart, is hardly ever totally extirpated, except by matrimony indeed, which is the grave of love, because it allows of the end of love. Then these ladies, all advocates for herself, with herself, Miss Howe at their head perhaps——Not in favour to me—I don't expect that from Miss Howe—But perhaps in favour to herself: for Miss Howe has reason to apprehend vengeance from me, I ween. Her Hickman will be safe too, as she may think, if I marry her beloved friend: for he has been a busy fellow, and I have long wished to have a slap at him! —The lady's case desperate with her friends too; and likely to be so, while single, and her character exposed to censure.

A husband

A husband is a charming cloak, a fig-leafed apron for a wife: and for a lady to be protected in liberties, in diversions, which her heart pants after—and all her faults, even the most criminal, were she to be detected, to be thrown upon the husband, and the ridicule too; a charming privilege for a wife!

But I shall have one comfort, if I marry, which pleases me not a little. If a man's wife has a dear friend of her sex, a hundred liberties may be taken with that friend which could not be taken, if the single lady (knowing what a title to freedoms marriage has given him with her friend) was not less scrupulous with him than she ought to be, with herself. Then there are broad freedoms (shall I call them?) that may be taken by the husband with his wife, that may not be quite shocking, which, if the wife bears before her friend, will serve for a lesson to that friend; and if that friend bears to be present at them without check or bashfulness, will shew a sagacious fellow that she can bear as much herself, at proper time and place.

Chastity, Jack, like piety, is an uniform thing. If in look, if in speech, a girl give way to undue levity, depend upon it, the devil has got one of his cloven feet in her heart already—So, Hickman, take care of thyself, I advise thee, whether I marry or not.

Thus, Jack, have I at once reconciled myself to all my relations—And if the lady refuses me, thrown the fault upon her. This, I knew, would be in my power to do at any time: and I was the more arrogant to them, in order to heighten the merit of my compliance.

But after all, it would be very whimsical, would it not, if all my plots and contrivances should end in wedlock? What a punishment should this come out to be, upon myself too, that all this while I have been plundering my own treasury?

And then, can there be so much harm done, if it can be so easily repaired by a few magical words; as I, Robert, take thee, Clarissa; and I, Clarissa, take thee Robert, with the rest of the for-better and for-worse legerdemain, which will hocus pocus all the wrongs, the crying wrongs, that I have done to Miss Harlowe, into acts of kindness and benevolence to Mrs. Lovelace?

But, Jack, two things I must insist upon with thee, if this is to be the case—Having put secrets of so high a nature between me and my spouse into thy power, I must, for my own honour, and for the honour of my wife and my illustrious progeny, first oblige thee to give up the letters I have so stupidly trebled to thee; and, in the next place do by thee, as I have heard whispered in France was done by the first husband of a certain monarque; that is to say, cut thy throat, to prevent thy telling of tales.

I have found means to heighten the kind opinion my friends here have begun to have of me, by communicating to them the contents of the four last letters which I wrote to press my chaste spouse to solemnize. My lord has repeated one of his phrases in my favour, that he hopes it will come out, That the devil is not quite so black as he is painted.

Now pr'ythee, dear Jack, seest so many good consequences are to flow from these our nuptials (one of which to thyself; for the sooner thou diest, the less thou wilt have to answer for) and that I now-and-then am apt to believe there may be something in the old fellow's notion, who once told us, That he who kills a man, has all that man's sins to answer for, as well as his own, because he gave him not the time to repent of them, that Heaven designed to allow him; [A fine thing for thee, if thou consentest to be knocked of the head; but a cursed one for the manslayer!] and since there may be room to fear, that Miss Howe will not give us her help; I pr'ythee now exert thyself to find out my Clarissa Harlowe, that I may make a LOVELACE of her. Set all the city bellmen, and the country criers, for ten miles round the metropolis, to work, with their 'O yes's! and if any 'man, woman, or child, can give tale 'or tidings—' Advertise her in all the newspapers; and let her know, That if she will repair to Lady Betty Lawrance, or to Miss Charlotte Montague, she may hear of something greatly to her advantage.

My two cousins Montague are actually to set out to-morrow, to Mrs. Howe's, to engage her vixen daughter's interest with her friend. They will flaunt it away in a chariot and six, for the greater state and significance.

Confounded mortification to be reduced thus low!—My pride hardly knows how to brook it.

Lord M. has engaged the two venerables to stay here, to attend the issue: and I, standing very high at present in their good graces, am to gallant them to Oxford, to Blenheim, and several other places.

LETTER LIX.

MISS HOWE, TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

THURSDAY NIGHT, JULY 13.

COLLINS sets not out to-morrow. Some domeſtick occaſion hinders him. Rogers is but now returned from you, and cannot well be ſpared. Mr. Hickman is gone upon an affair of my mother's, and has taken both his ſervants with him, to do credit to his employer: ſo I am forced to venture this by the poſt, directed by your aſſumed name.

I am to acquaint you, that I have been favoured with a viſit from Miſs Montague and her ſiſter, in Lord M.'s chariot-and-ſix. My lord's gentleman rode here yeſterday, with a requeſt that I would receive a viſit from the two young ladies, on a very particular occaſion; the greater favour if it might be the next day.

As I had ſo little perſonal knowledge of either, I doubted not but it muſt be in relation to the intereſts of my dear friend; and ſo conſulting with my mother, I ſent them an invitation to favour me (becauſe of the diſtance) with their company at dinner; which they kindly accepted.

I hope, my dear, ſince things have been ſo very bad, that their errand to me will be as agreeable to you, as any thing that can now happen. They came in the name of Lord M. and Lady Sarah and Lady Betty his two ſiſters, to deſire my intereſt to engage you to put yourſelf into the protection of Lady Betty; who will not part with you till ſhe ſees all the juſtice done you that now can be done.

Lady Sarah had not ſtirred out for a twelvemonth before; never ſince ſhe loſt her agreeable daughter whom you and I ſaw at Mrs. Benſon's; but was induced to take this journey by Lady Betty, purely to procure your reparation, if poſſible. And their joint ſtrength, united with Lord M.'s, has ſo far ſucceeded, that the wretch has bound himſelf to them, and to theſe young ladies, in the ſolemneſt manner, to wed you in their preſence, if they can prevail upon you to give him your hand.

This conſolation you may take to yourſelf, that all this honourable family have a due (that is, the higheſt) ſenſe of your merit, and greatly admire you. The horrid creature has not ſpared himſelf in doing juſtice to your virtue; and the young ladies give us ſuch an account of his confeſſions, and ſelf-condemnation, that my mother was quite charmed with you; and we all ſouriſhed tears of joy, that there is one of our ſex, [I, that that one is my deareſt friend] who has done ſo much honour to it, as to deſerve the exalted praiſes given you by a wretch ſo ſelf-conceited; though pity for the excellent creature mixed with our joy.

He promiſes by them to make the beſt of huſbands; and my lord, and Lady Sarah, and Lady Betty, are all three to be guarantees that he will be ſo. Noble ſettlements, noble preſents, they talked of: they ſay they left Lord M. and his two ſiſters talking of nothing elſe but of thoſe preſents and ſettlements, how moſt to do you honour, the greater in proportion for the indignities you have ſuffered; and of changing of names by act of parliament, preparative to the intereſt they will all join to make to get the titles to go where the bulk of the eſtate muſt go, at my lord's death, which they apprehend to be nearer than they wiſh. Nor doubt they of a thorough reformation in his morals, from your example and influence over him.

I made a great many objections for you—All, I believe, that you could have made yourſelf, had you been preſent. But I have no doubt to adviſe you, my dear, (and ſo does my mother) inſtantly to put yourſelf into Lady Betty's protection, with a reſolution to take the wretch for your huſband. All his future grandeur [He wants not pride] depends upon his ſincerity to you; and the young ladies vouch for the depth of his concern for the wrongs he has done you.

All his apprehenſion is, in your readineſs to communicate to every-one, as he fears, the evils you have ſuffered; which he thinks will expoſe you both. But had you not revealed them to Lady Betty, you had not had ſo warm a friend; ſince it is owing to two letters you wrote to her, that all this good, as I hope it will prove, was brought about. But I adviſe you to be more ſparing in expoſing what is paſt, whether you have thoughts of accepting him or not: for what, my dear, can that avail now, but to give a handle to vile wretches to triumph over your friends; ſince every-one will not know how much to your honour your very ſufferings have been?

Your melancholy letter brought by Rogers, with his account of your indifferen different health, confirmed to him by the woman of the house, as well as by your looks, and by your faintness while you talked with him, would have given me inexpressible affliction, had I not been cheered by this agreeable visit from the young ladies. I hope you will be equally so on my imparting the subject of it to you.

Indeed, my dear, you must not hesitate. You must oblige them. The alliance is splendid and honourable. Very few will know any-thing of his brutal baseness to you. All must end, in a little while, in a general reconciliation, and you will be able to resume your course of doing the good to every deserving object, which procured you blessings wherever you set your foot.

I am concerned to find, that your father's inhuman curse affects you so much as it does. Yet you are a noble creature, to put it, as you put it—I hope you are indeed more solicitous to get it revoked for their sakes than for your own. It is for them to be penitent, who hurried you into evils you could not well avoid. You are apt to judge by the unhappy event, rather than upon the true merits of your case. Upon my honour, I think you faultless in almost every step you have taken. What has not that vilely insolent and ambitious, yet stupid, brother of yours to answer for?—That spiteful thing your sister too!

But come, since what is past cannot be helped, let us look forward. You have now happy prospects opening to you: a family, already noble, prepared to receive and embrace you with open arms, and joyful heart; and who, by their love to you, will teach another family (who know not what an excellence they have confederated to persecute) how to value you. Your prudence, your piety, will crown all. You will reclaim a wretch, that for an hundred sakes more than for his own, one would wish to be reclaimed.

Like a traveller, who has been put out of his way, by the overflowing of some rapid stream, you have only had the fore-right path you were in overwhelmed. A few miles about, a day or two only lost, as I may say, and you are in a way to recover it; and, by quickening your speed, will get up the lost time. The hurry upon your spirits, mean time, will be all your inconvenience; for it was not your fault you were stopped in your progress.

Think of this, my dear; and improve upon the allegory, as you know how. If you can, without impeding your progress, be the means of allaying the inundation, of bounding the waters within their natural channel, and thereby of recovering the overwhelmed path for the sake of future passengers who travel the same way, what a merit will yours be!

I shall impatiently expect your next letter. The young ladies propose, that you should put yourself, if [illegible], or near it, into the Reading stage coach, which inns somewhere in Fleet Street: and if you give notice of the day, you will be met on the road, and that pretty early in your journey, by some of both sexes; one of whom you won't be sorry to see.

Mr. Hickman shall attend you at Slough; and Lady Betty herself, and one of the Miss Montagues, with proper equipages, will be at Reading to receive you; and carry you directly to the seat of the former: for I have expressly stipulated, that the wretch himself shall not come into your presence till your nuptials are to be solemnized, unless you give leave.

Adieu, my dearest friend. Be happy: and hundreds will then be happy of consequence. Inexpressibly so, I am sure, will then be your ever-affectionate

LETTER LX.

MISS HOWE, TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

SUNDAY NIGHT, JULY 16.

MY DEAREST FRIEND,

WHY should you permit a mind so much devoted to your service, to labour under such an impatience as you must know it would labour under, for want of an answer to a letter of such consequence to you, and therefore to me, as was mine of Thursday night?—Rogers told me on Thursday, you were so ill; your letter sent by him was so melancholy!—Yet you must be ill indeed, if you could not write something to such a letter; were it but a line, to say you would write as soon as you could. Sure you have received it. The master of your nearest post-office will pawn his reputation that it went safe: I gave him particular charge of it.

God send me good news of your health, of your ability to write; and then I will chide you—Indeed I will—as I never yet did chide you.

I suppose your excuse will be, that the subject required consideration—Lord! my dear, so it might; but you have so right [illegible] and the matter in queſtion is ſo dreadful, that you could not [illegible] to determine—Then [illegible] probably, to wait Col[illegible] for your letter as on to-morrow!—Suppoſe—Alas!—(indeed I am [illegible] with you!—ſuppoſe) ſomething [illegible] happen, as it did on Friday, that he ſhould not be able to go to town to-morrow!—How, child, could you forgive me ſo!—I know not how to leave off writing to you!

Dear, honeſt Collins, make haſte:' he will: he will. He ſets out, and travels all night: for I have told him, that the deareſt friend I have in the world has it in her own choice to be happy, and ſo make me ſo; and that the letter he will bring from her, will aſſure it to me.

I have ordered him to go directly (without ſtopping at the Saracen's Head Inn) to you at your lodgings. Matters are now in ſo good a way, that he ſafely may.

Your expected letter is ready written, I hope: if it be not, he will call for it at your hour.

You can't be ſo happy as you deſerve to be: but I doubt not that you will be as happy as you can; that is, that you will chuſe to put yourſelf inſtantly into Lady Betty's protection. If you would not have the wretch for your own ſake; have him you muſt, for mine, for your family's, for your honour's ſake!—Dear, honeſt Collins, make haſte! make haſte! and relieve the impatient heart of my beloved's ever-faithful ever-affectionate,

ANNA HOWE.

LETTER LXI.

MISS HOWE, TO MISS CHARLOTTE MONTAGUE.

TUESDAY MORN. JULY 18.

MADAM,

I Take the liberty to write to you, by this ſpecial meſſenger. In the phrenzy of my ſoul I write to you, to demand of you, and of any of your family who can tell, news of my beloved friend; who, I doubt, has been ſpirited away by the baſe arts of one of the blackeſt—O help me to a name bad enough to call him by! Her piety is proof againſt ſelf-attempts. It muſt, it muſt be he, the only wretch, who could injure ſuch an innocent; and now—who knows what he has done with her!

If I have patience, I will give you the occaſion of this diſtracted vehemence.

I wrote to her the very moment you and your ſiſter left me. But being unable to procure a ſpecial meſſenger, as I intended, was forced to ſend by the poſt. I urged her (You know I promiſed that I would: I urged her) with earneſtneſs, to comply with the deſires of all your family. Having no anſwer, I wrote again on Sunday night; and ſent it by a particular hand, who travelled all night; chiding her for keeping a heart ſo impatient as mine in ſuch cruel ſuſpence, upon a matter of ſo much importance to her; and therefore to me. And very angry I was with her in my mind.

But, judge my aſtoniſhment, my diſtraction, when laſt night, the meſſenger, returning poſt-haſte, brought me word, that ſhe had not been heard of ſince Friday morning! And that a letter lay for her at her lodgings, which came by the poſt; and muſt be mine!

She went out about ſix that morning; only intending, as they believe, to go to morning prayers at Covent-Garden church, juſt by her lodgings, as ſhe had done divers times before—Went on foot!—Left word ſhe ſhould be back in an hour—Very poorly in health!

Lord have mercy upon me! What ſhall I do!—I was a diſtracted creature all laſt night!

O Madam! You know not how I love her!—My own ſoul is not dearer to me than my Clariſſa Harlowe!—Nay, ſhe is my ſoul—For I now have none—Only a miſerable one, however—For ſhe was the joy, the ſtay, the prop of my life. Never woman loved woman as we love one another. It is impoſſible to tell you half her excellences. It was my glory and my pride, that I was capable of ſo fervent a love of ſo pure and matchleſs a creature—But now—Who knows, whether the dear injured has not all her woes, her undeſerved woes, completed in death; or is not reſerved for a worſe fate!—This I leave to your enquiry—For—your—[ſhall I call the man——your?] relation I underſtand is ſtill with you.

Surely, my good ladies, you were well authorized in the propoſals you made in preſence of my mother! Surely he dare not abuſe your confidence, and the confidence of your noble relations! I make no apology for giving you this trouble, nor for deſiring you to favour with a line by this meſſenger your almoſt diſtracted

LETTER LXII.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

M. HALL, SAT. NIGHT, JUNE 15.

ALL undone, undone, by Jupiter!—Zounds, Jack, what shall I do now! A curse upon all my plots and contrivances!—But I have it——In the very heart and soul of me, I have it!

Thou toldest me, that my punishments were but beginning—Canst thou, O fatal prognosticator! canst thou tell me, where they will end?

Thy assistance I bespeak. The moment thou receivest this, I bespeak thy assistance. This messenger rides for life and death—And I hope he'll find you at your town-lodgings; if he meet not with you at Edgware: where, being Sunday, he will call first.

This cursed, cursed woman, on Friday dispatched man and horse with the joyful news, (as she thought it would be to me) in an exulting letter from Sally Martin, that she had found out my angel as on Wednesday last; and on Friday morning, after she had been at prayers at Covent Garden church—praying for my reformation perhaps—got her arrested by two sheriff's officers, as she was returning to her lodgings, who (villains!) put her into a chair they had in readiness, and carried her to one of the cursed fellow's houses.

She has arrested her for 150l. pretendedly due for board and lodging: a sum (besides the low villainy of the proceeding) which the dear soul could not possibly raise: all her cloaths and effects, except what she had on and with her when she went away, being at the old devil's.

And here, for an aggravation, has the dear creature lain already two days; for I must be gallanting my two aunts and my two cousins, and giving Lord M. an airing after his lying-in—Pox upon the whole family of us! And returned not till within this hour: and now returned to my distraction, on receiving the cursed tidings, and the exulting letter.

Hasten, hasten, dear Jack; for the love of God, hasten to the injured charmer! My heart bleeds for her—She deserved not this!—I dare not stir. It will be thought done by my contrivance—And if I am absent from this place, that will confirm the suspicion.

Damnation seize quick this accursed woman!—Yet she thinks she has made no small merit with me. Unhappy, thrice unhappy circumstance!—All a time too, when better prospects were opening for the sweet creature!

Hasten to her!—Clear me of this cursed job. Most sincerely, by all that's sacred, I swear you must!—Did ever I been such a villainous plotter, that the charming sufferer will surely believe it: although the proceeding be so dirtily low.

Set her free the moment you see her; without conditioning. Free!—On your knees, for me, beg her pardon: and assure her, that, wherever she goes, I will not molest her: no, nor come near her without her leave: and be sure allow not any of the damned crew to go near her—Only let her permit you to receive her commands from time to time. You have always been her friend and advocate. What would I now give, had I permitted you to have been a successful one!

Let her have all her cloaths and effects sent her instantly, as a small proof of my sincerity. And force upon the dear creature, who must be moneyless, what sums you can get her to take. Let me know how she has been treated. If roughly, woe be to the guilty!

Take thy watch in thy hand, after thou hast freed her, and damn the whole brood, dragon and serpents, by the hour, till thou'rt tired; and tell them, I bid thee do so for their cursed officiousness.

They had nothing to do when they had found her, but to wait my orders how to proceed.

The great devil fly away with them all, one by one, through the roof of their own cursed house, and dash them to pieces against the tops of chimneys as he flies; and let the lesser devils collect their scattered scraps, and bag them up, in order to put them together again in their allotted place, in the element of fire, with cements of molten lead.

A line! a line! A kingdom for a line! with tolerable news, the first moment thou canst write!—This fellow waits to bring it.

LETTER LXIII.

MISS CHARLOTTE MONTAGUE, TO MISS HOWE.

M. HALL, TUESDAY AFTERNOON.

DEAR MISS HOWE,

YOUR letter has infinitely disturbed us all.

This wretched man has been half distracted ever since Saturday night.

knew not what ailed him, till your letter was brought.

He is unwell, to be ſure, he is however innocent of this new evil.

Indeed he is, he muſt be; as I ſhall more at large acquaint you.

But will not now detain your meſſenger.

Only to ſatisfy your juſt impatience, by telling you, that the dear young lady is ſafe, and, we hope, well.

A horrid miſtake of his general orders has ſubjected her to the terror and diſgrace of an arreſt.

Poor dear Miſs Harlowe!—Her ſufferings have endeared her to us, almoſt as much as her excellences can have endeared her to you.

But ſhe muſt now be quite at liberty.

He has been a diſtracted man, ever ſince the news was brought him; and we knew not what ailed him.

But that I ſaid before.

My Lord M. my Lady Sarah Sadleir, and my Lady Betty Lawrance, will all write to you this very afternoon.

And ſo will the wretch himſelf.

And ſend it by a ſervant of their own, not to detain yours.

I know not what I write.

But you ſhall have all the particulars, juſt, and true, and fair, from, dear Madam, your moſt faithful and obedient ſervant,

CH. MONTAGUE.

LETTER LXIV.

MISS MONTAGUE, TO MISS HOWE.

M. HALL, JULY 18.

DEAR MADAM,

IN purſuance of my promiſe, I will minutely inform you of every-thing we know, relating to this ſhocking tranſaction.

When we returned from you on Thurſday night, and made our report of the kind reception both we and our meſſage met with, in that you had been ſo good as to promiſe to uſe your intereſt with your dear friend; it put us all into ſuch good humour with one another, and with my couſin Lovelace, that we reſolved upon a little tour of two days, the Friday and Saturday, in order to give an airing to my lord, and Lady Sarah; both having been long confined, one by illneſs, the other by melancholy. My lord, Lady Sarah, Lady Betty, and myſelf, were in the coach; and all our talk was of dear Miſs Harlowe, and of our future happineſs with her. Mr. Lovelace and my ſiſter (who is his favourite, as he is hers) were in his phaeton: and whenever we ſpoke, company, that was ſtill the ſubject.

As to him, never man praiſed woman, as he did her: never man gave greater hopes, and made better reſolutions. He is none of thoſe that are governed by intereſt. He is too proud for that. But moſt ſincerely delighted was he in talking of her; and of his hopes of her returning favour. He ſaid, however, more than once, that he feared ſhe would not forgive him; for, from his heart, he muſt ſay, he deſerved not her forgiveneſs: and often and often, that there was not ſuch a woman in the world.

This I mention to ſhew you, Madam, that he could not at this time be privy to ſuch a barbarous and diſgraceful treatment of her.

We returned not till Saturday night, all in as good humour with one another as we went out. We never had ſuch pleaſure in his company before. If he would be good, and as he ought to be, no man would be better beloved by relations than he. But never was there a greater alteration in man when he came home, and received a letter from a meſſenger, who, it ſeems, had been flattering himſelf in hopes of a reward, and had been waiting for his return from the night before. In ſuch a fury!—The man fared but badly. He inſtantly ſhut himſelf up to write, and ordered man and horſe to be ready to ſet out before day-light the next morning, to carry the letter to a friend in London.

He would not ſee us all that night; neither breakfaſt nor dine with us next day. He ought, he ſaid, never to ſee light; and bid my ſiſter, whom he called an innocent, (and who was very deſirous to know the occaſion of all this) ſhun him: ſaying, He was a wretch, and made ſo by his own inventions, and the conſequences of them.

None of us could get out of him what ſo diſturbed him. We ſhould too ſoon hear, he ſaid, to the utter diſſipation of all his hopes, and of all ours.

We could eaſily ſuppoſe, that all was not right with regard to the worthy young lady and him.

He was out each day; and ſaid he wanted to run away from himſelf.

Late on Monday night he received a letter from Mr. Belford, his moſt favoured friend, by his own meſſenger; who came back in a ſtorm, man and horſe. Whatever were the contents, he was not eaſier, but like a madman rather. but ſtill would not let us know the occasion. But to my sister he said, 'Nobody, my dear Patsey, who can 'think but of half the plagues that pursue an intriguing spirit, would ever 'quit the fore-right path.'

He was out, when your messenger came; but soon came in; and bad enough was his reception from us all. And he said, that his own torments were greater than ours, than Miss Harlowe's, or yours, Madam, all put together. He would see your letter. He always carries every-thing before him: and said, when he had read it, that he thanked God, he was not such a villain, as you, with too great an appearance of reason, thought him.

Thus then he owned the matter to be.

He had left general directions to the people of the lodgings the dear lady went from, to find out where she was gone to, if possible, that he might have an opportunity to importune her to be his, before their difference was publick. The wicked people (officious at least, if not wicked) discovered where she was on Wednesday; and, for fear she should remove before they could have his orders, they put her under a gentle restraint, as they call it; and dispatched away a messenger to acquaint him with it; and to take his orders.

This messenger arrived on Friday afternoon; and staid here till we returned on Saturday night:—and when he read the letter he brought—I have told you, Madam, what a fury he was in.

The letter he retired to write, and which he dispatched away so early on Sunday morning, was to conjure his friend Mr. Belford, on receipt of it, to fly to the lady, and set her free; and to order all her things to be sent to her; and to clear him of so black and villainous a fact, as he justly called it.

And by this time he doubts not that all is happily over; and the beloved of his soul (as he calls her at every word) in an easier and happier way than she was before the horrid fact. And now he owns, that the reason why Mr. Belford's letter set him into stronger ravings, was because of his keeping him wilfully (and on purpose to torment him) in suspence; and reflecting very heavily upon him; (for Mr. Belford, he says, was ever the lady's friend and advocate) and only mentioning, that he had waited upon her; referring to his next for further particulars; which Mr. Belford could have told him at the time.

He declares, and we can vouch for him, that he has been, ever since Saturday night, the most miserable of men.

He forbore going up himself, that it might not be imagined he was guilty of so black a contrivance; and that he went up to complete any base views in consequence of it.

Believe us all, dear Miss Howe, under the deepest concern at this unhappy accident; which will, we fear, exasperate the charming sufferer; not too much for the occasion, but too much for our hopes.

O what wretches are these free-living men, who love to tread in intricate paths; and, when once they err, know not how far out of the way their headstrong course may lead them!

My sister joins her thanks with mine to your good mother and self, for the favours you heaped upon us last Thursday. We beseech your continued interest as to the subject of our visit. It shall be all our studies to oblige and recompense the dear lady to the utmost of our power, for what she has suffered from the unhappy man.

We are, dear Madam, your obliged and faithful servants,

CHARLOTTE } MONTAGUE.
MARTHA }

'DEAR MISS HOWE,

'WE join in the above request of 'Miss Charlotte and Miss Patty Mon'tague, for your favour and interest; 'being convinced, that the accident 'was an accident; and no plot or con'trivance of a wretch too full of them. 'We are, Madam, your most obedient 'humble servants,

'M.
'SARAH SADLEIR.
'ELIZ. LAWRANCE.'

'DEAR MISS HOWE,

'AFTER what is written above, by 'names and characters of such unques'tionable honour, I might have been 'excused signing a name almost as hate'ful to myself, as I KNOW it is to 'you. But the above will have it so. 'Since therefore I must write, it shall be 'the truth; which is, that, if I may 'be once more admitted to pay my duty 'to the most deserving and most injur'red of her sex, I will be content to 'do it with a halter about my neck; 'and, attended by a parson on my 'right-hand, and the hangman on my 'left,

'[illegible] hanged, as they will, either
'[illegible] on the gallows. Your
'[illegible] Servant,
'ROBERT LOVELACE.

'SUNDAY, JULY 16.'

LETTER LXV.

MR. BELFORD, TO ROBERT LOVELACE, ESQ.

SUNDAY NIGHT, JULY 16.

WHAT a curſed piece of work haſt thou made of it, with the moſt excellent of women! Thou mayeſt be in earneſt, or in jeſt, as thou wilt; but the poor lady will not be long either thy ſport, or the ſport of fortune!

I will give thee an account of a ſcene that wants but her affecting pen to repreſent it juſtly; and it would wring all the black blood out of thy callous heart.

Thou, only, who art the author of her calamities, ſhouldſt have attended her in her priſon. I am unequal to ſuch a taſk: nor know I any other man but would.

This laſt act, however unintended by thee, yet a conſequence of thy general meditations, and too likely to be thought agreeable to thee, by thoſe who know thy other villanies by her, has finiſhed thy barbarous work. And I adviſe thee to trumpet forth every-where, how much in earneſt thou art to marry her, whether true or not.

Thou mayeſt ſafely do it. She will not live to put thee to the trial; and it will a little palliate for thy enormous uſage of her, and be a means to make mankind, who know not what I know of the matter, herd a little longer with thee, and forbear to hunt thee to thy fellow-ſavages in the Lybian wilds and deſarts.

Your meſſenger found me at Edgware, expecting to dinner with me ſeveral friends, whom I had invited three days before. I ſent apologies to them, as in a caſe of life and death; and poſted to town to the wicked woman's: for how knew I but ſhocking attempts might be made upon her by the curſed wretches: perhaps by your connivance, in order to mortify her into your meaſures!

Little knows the publick what villanies are committed by vile wretches, in theſe abominable houſes, upon innocent creatures drawn into their ſnares.

Finding the lady not there, I poſted away to the officer's, although Sally told me, that ſhe had but juſt come from thence; and that ſhe had refuſed to ſee her, or (as ſhe ſent down word) any-body elſe; being reſolved to have the remainder of that Sunday to herſelf, as it might, perhaps, be the laſt ſhe ſhould ever ſee.

I had the ſame thing told me, when I got thither.

I ſent up to let her know, that I came with a commiſſion to ſet her at liberty. I was afraid of ſending up the name of a man known to be your friend. She abſolutely refuſed to ſee any man, however, for that day, or to anſwer further to any thing ſaid from me.

Having therefore informed myſelf of all that the officer, and his wife, and ſervant, could acquaint me with, as well in relation to the horrid arreſt, as to her behaviour and the women's to her; and her ill-ſtate of health; I went back to Sinclair's, as I will ſtill call her, and heard the three women's ſtory: from all which, I am enabled to give you the following ſhocking particulars: which may ſerve till I can ſee the unhappy lady herſelf to-morrow, if then I gain admittance to her. You will find, that I have been very minute in my enquiries.

Your villain it was that ſet the poor lady, and had the impudence to appear, and abet the ſheriff's officers in the curſed tranſaction. He thought, no doubt, that he was doing the moſt acceptable ſervice to his bleſſed maſter. They had got a chair; the head ready up, as ſoon as ſervice was over. And as ſhe came out of the church, at the door fronting Bedford Street, the officers, ſtepping to her, whiſpered, that they had an action againſt her.

She was terrified, trembled, and turned pale.

'Action!' ſaid ſhe, 'What is that?
'—I have committed no bad action!—
'Lord bleſs me!—Men, what mean
'you?'

'That you are our priſoner, Ma-
'dam?'

'Priſoner, Sirs!—What—How—Why
'What have I done?'

'You muſt go with us. Be pleaſed,
'Madam, to ſtep into this chair.'

'With you!—With men!—Muſt go
'with men!—I am not uſed to go with
'ſtrange men!—Indeed you muſt excuſe
'me!'

'We can't excuſe you: we are ſhe-
'riff's officers. We have a writ againſt
'you. You muſt go with us, and you
'ſhall know at whoſe ſuit.'

'Suit!' ſaid the charming innocent;

'I don't know what you mean. Pray, 'men, don't lay hands upon me;'—(they offering to put her into the chair,) '—I am not used to be thus treated—I 'have done nothing to deserve it.'

She then spied thy villain—'O thou 'wretch!'—said she, 'where is thy vile 'master?—Am I again to be his pri-'soner?—Help, good people!'

A crowd had before begun to gather.

'My master is in the country, Ma-'dam, many miles off. If you please 'to go with these men, they will treat 'you civilly.'

The people were most of them struck with compassion. 'A fine young crea-'ture!'—'A thousand pities!'—cried some. While some few threw out vile and shocking reflections! But a gentleman interposed, and demanded to see the fellows authority.

They shewed it.—'Is your name 'Clarissa Harlowe, Madam?' said he.

'Yes, yes, indeed!'—ready to sink—'my name was Clarissa Harlowe:—'But it is now Wretchedness!—Lord 'be merciful to me, what is to come 'next?'

'You must go with these men, Ma-'dam,' said the gentleman: 'they have 'authority for what they do.'

He pitied her, and retired.

'Indeed you must,' said one chairman.

'Indeed you must,' said the other.

'Can nobody,' joined in another gentleman, 'be applied to, who will 'see that so fine a creature is not ill-'used?'

The villain answered, Orders were given particularly for that. She had rich relations. She need but ask and have. She would only be carried to the officer's house, till matters could be made up. The people she had lodged with, loved her: but she had left her lodgings privately.

'O! had she those tricks already?' cried one or two.

She heard not this—But said—'Well, 'if I must go, I must—I cannot resist—'But I will not be carried to the wo-'man's!—I will rather die at your feet, 'than be carried to the woman's.'

'You won't be carried there, Ma-'dam,' cried thy fellow.

'Only to my house, Madam,' said one of the officers.

'Where is that?'

'In High Holborn, Madam.'

'I know not where High Holborn 'is: but any-where, except to the 'woman's.—But am I to go with men 'only?'

Looking about her, and finding three passages, to wit, that to King Street, Henrietta Street, and the fore-right one, to Bedford Street, crouded, she started—'Any-where, 'Any-where,' said she, 'but to the 'woman's!'—And stepping into the chair, threw herself on the seat, in the utmost distress and confusion—'Carry 'me—carry me out of sight—Cover me '—Cover me up—forever!'—were her words.

Thy villain drew the curtain: she had not power: and they went away with her through a vast crowd of people.

Here I must rest. I can write no more at present. Only, Lovelace, remember, All this was to a Clarissa!

THE unhappy lady fainted away when she was taken out of the chair at the officer's house.

Several people followed the chair to the very house, which is in a wretched court. Sally was there; and satisfied some of the enquirers, that the young gentlewoman would be exceedingly well used: and they soon dispersed.

Dorcas was also there; but came not in her sight. Sally, as a favour, offered to carry her to her former lodgings: but she declared, that they should carry her thither a corpse, if they did.

Very gentle usage the women boast of: so would a vulture, could it speak, with the entrails of it's prey upon it's rapacious talons. Of this you'll judge from what I have to recite.

She asked, What was meant by this usage of her?—'People told me,' said she, 'that I must go with the men:—'that they had authority to take me: 'so I submitted. But now, what is to 'be the end of this disgraceful vio-'lence?'

'The end,' said the vile Sally Martin, 'is, for honest people to come at their 'own.'

'Bless me! have I taken away any-'thing that belongs to those who have 'obtained this power over me?—I hate 'left very valuable things behind me; 'but have taken nothing away that is 'not my own.'

'And who do you think, Miss Har-'lowe;—for I understand,' said the cursed creature, 'you are not mar-'ried;—who do you think is to pay for 'your board and your lodgings?—such 'handsome lodgings?—for so long a 'time as you were at Mrs. Sinclair's?'

'Lord have mercy upon me!—Miss 'Martin!—(I think you are Miss Mar-'tin.)

'cause enough, Miss Harlowe,' (full of gratifying her jealous revenge, by calling her Miss) 'One hundred 'and fifty guineas, or pounds, is no 'trifle for him to lose—And by a young 'creature who would have bilked her 'lodgings!'

'You amaze me, Miss Martin!—'What language do you talk in?—Bilk 'my lodgings!—What is that?'

She stood astonished, and silent for a few moments.

But recovering herself, and turning from her to the window, she wrung her hands, [The cursed Sally shewed me how!] and lifting them up—'Now, 'Lovelace—Now indeed do I think I 'ought to forgive thee!—But who shall 'forgive Clarissa Harlowe!—O my sis-'ter!—O my brother!—Tender mercies 'were your cruelties to this!'

After a pause, her handkerchief drying up her falling tears, she turned to Sally: 'Now have I nothing to do but 'acquiesce—Only let me say, That if 'this aunt of yours, this Mrs. Sinclair, 'or this man, this Mr. Lovelace, come 'near me—or if I am carried to the 'horrid house—(for that I suppose, is 'the design of this new outrage)—God 'be merciful to the poor Clarissa Har-'lowe!—Look to the consequence!—'Look, I charge you, to the conse-'quence!'

The vile wretch told her, It was not designed to carry her any-whither against her will: but, if it were, they should take care not to be frighted again by a penknife.

She cast up her eyes to Heaven, and was silent—And went to the farthest corner of the room, and, sitting down, threw her handkerchief over her face.

Sally asked her several questions; but not answering her, she told her, she would wait upon her by-and-by, when she had found her speech.

She ordered the people to press her to eat and drink. 'She must be fasting—'Nothing but her prayers and tears, 'poor thing!'—were the merciless devil's words, as she owned to me.—Dost think I did not curse her?

She went away; and, after her own dinner, returned.

The unhappy lady, by this devil's account of her, then seemed either mortified into meekness, or to have made a resolution not to be provoked by the insults of this cursed creature.

Sally enquired, in her presence, whether she had eat or drank any-thing: and being told by the woman, that she could not prevail upon her to taste a morsel, or drink a drop, she said, 'This 'is wrong, Miss Harlowe!—Very wrong! '—Your religion, I think, should teach 'you, that starving yourself is self-'murder.'

She answered not.

The wretch owned, she was resolved to make her speak.

She asked, if Mabell should attend her, till it were seen what her friends would do for her, in discharge of the debt:—'Mabell,' said she, 'has not yet 'earned the cloaths you were so good as 'to give her.

'Am I not worthy an answer, Miss 'Harlowe?'

'I would answer you,' (said the sweet sufferer, without any emotion) 'if I 'knew how.'

'I have ordered pen, ink, and paper, 'to be brought you, Miss Harlowe. 'There they are. I know you love 'writing. You may write to whom you 'please. Your friend, Miss Howe, will 'expect to hear from you.'

'I have no friend,' said she. 'I de-'serve none.'

Rowland, for that's the officer's name, told her, She had friends enow to pay the debt, if she would write.

She would trouble nobody—she had no friends—was all they could get from her, while Sally staid: but yet spoken with a patience of spirit, as if she enjoyed her griefs.

The insolent creature went away, ordering them, in the lady's hearing, to be very civil to her, and to let her want for nothing. Now had she, she owned, the triumph of her heart over this haughty beauty, who kept them all at such distance in their own house!

What thinkest thou, Lovelace, of this!—This wretch's triumph was over a Clarissa!

About six in the evening, Rowland's wife pressed her to drink tea. She said, she had rather have a glass of water; for her tongue was ready to cleave to the roof of her mouth.

The woman brought her a glass, and some bread and butter. She tried to taste the latter; but could not swallow it: but eagerly drank the water; lifting up her eyes in thankfulness for that!!!

The divine Clarissa, Lovelace—reduced to rejoice for a cup of cold water!—By whom reduced!

About

About nine o'clock she asked, if anybody were to be her bedfellow.

Their maid, if she pleased; or, as she was so weak and ill, the girl should sit up with her, if she chose she should.

She chose to be alone both night and day, she said. But might she not be trusted with the keys of the room where she was to lie down; for she should not put off her cloaths!

That, they told her, could not be.

She was afraid not, she said.—But indeed she would not get away if she could.

They told me, that they had but one bed, besides that they lay in themselves, (which they would fain have had her accept of) and besides that their maid lay in, in a garret, which they called a hole of a garret: and that that one bed was the prisoner's bed; which they made several apologies to me about. I suppose it is shocking enough.

But the lady would not lie in theirs. Was she not a prisoner? she said—Let her have the prisoners room.

Yet they owned that she started, when she was conducted thither. But recovering herself, 'Very well,' said she—'Why should not all be of a piece?—'Why should not my wretchedness be 'complete?'

She found fault that all the fastenings were on the outside, and none within; and said, She could not trust herself in a room, where others could come in at their pleasure, and she not go out. She had not been used to it!!!

Dear, dear soul!—My tears flow as I write!—Indeed, Lovelace, she had not been used to such treatment.

They assured her, that it was as much their duty to protect her from other persons insults, as from escaping herself.

Then they were people of more honour, she said, than she had been of late used to.

She asked, If they knew Mr. Lovelace?

'No,' was their answer.

'Have you heard of him?'

'No.'

'Well then, you may be good sort of 'folks in your way.'

Pause here a moment, Lovelace!—and reflect—I must.

AGAIN, they asked her, If they should send any word to her lodgings?

'These are my lodgings now—are 'they not?' was all her answer.

She sat up in a chair all night, the back against the door; having, it seems, thrust a broken piece of a pattern through the staples where the lock had been, on the inside.

NEXT morning Sally and Polly both went to visit her.

She had begged of Sally, the day before, that she might not see Mrs. Sinclair, nor Dorcas, nor the broken-mouthed servant, called William.

Polly would have ingratiated herself with her; and pretended to be concerned for her misfortunes. But she took no more notice of her than of the other.

They asked, If she had any commands?—If she had, she only need to mention what they were, and she should be obeyed.

'None at all,' she said.

How did she like the people of the house? Were they civil to her?

Pretty well, considering she had no money to give them.

Would she accept of any money?—They could put it to her account.

She would contract no debts.

Had she any money about her?

She meekly put her hand in her pocket, and pulled out half a guinea, and a little silver. 'Yes, I have a lit-'tle.—But here should be fees paid, I 'believe.—Should there not?—I have 'heard of entrance-money to compound 'for not being stript. But these people 'are very civil people, I fancy; for 'they have not offered to take away my 'cloaths.'

'They have orders to be civil to you.'

'It is very kind.'

'But we two will bail you, Miss, if 'you will go back with us to Mrs. Sin-'clair's.'

'Not for the world!'

'Hers are very handsome apartments.'

'The fitter for those who own them!'

'These are very sad ones.'

'The fitter for me!'

'You may be very happy yet, Miss, 'if you will.'

'I hope I shall.'

'If you refuse to eat or drink, we will 'give bail, and take you with us.'

'Then I will try to eat and drink, 'Any-thing but go with you.'

'Will you not send to your new lodg-'ings?—The people will be frighted?'

'So they will, if I send. So they will, 'if they know where I am.'

'But have you no things to send for 'from thence?'

'There is what will pay for their 'lodgings and trouble: I shall not lef-'sen their security.'

'But

'Miss Hanson!—I prized you, should not 'insult the miserable.'

'Neither should the miserable,' said Sally, 'insult people for their civility.'

'I should be sorry if I did.'

'Mrs. Sinclair shall attend you by-'and-by, to know if you have any com-'mands for her.'

'I have no wish for any liberty, but 'that of refusing to see her, and one 'more person.'

'What we came for, was to know if 'you had any proposals to make for your 'enlargement.'

Then, it seems, the officer put in. 'You have very good friends, Madam; 'I understand. Is it not better that 'you make it up? Charges will run 'high. A hundred and fifty guineas 'are easier paid than two hundred. Let 'these ladies bail you, and go along with 'them; or write to your friends to 'make it up.'

Sally said, 'There is a gentleman 'who saw you taken, and was so much 'moved for you, Miss Harlowe, that he 'would gladly advance the money for 'you, and leave you to pay it when you 'can.'

See, Lovelace, what cursed devils these are! This is the way, we know, that many an innocent heart is thrown upon keeping, and then upon the town. But for these wretches thus to go to work with such an angel as this!—How glad would have been the devilish Sally, to have had the least handle to report to thee a listening ear, or a patient spirit, upon this hint!

'Sir,' said she, with high indignation, to the officer, 'did you not say last 'night, that it was as much your busi-'ness to protect me from the insults of 'others, as from escaping?—Cannot I 'be permitted to see whom I please; 'and to refuse admittance to those I 'like not?'

'Your creditors, Madam, will ex-'pect to see you.'

'Not, if I declare I will not treat 'with them.'

'Then, Madam, you will be sent to 'prison.'

'Prison, friend!—What dost thou 'call thy house!'

'Not a prison, Madam.'

'Why these iron-barred windows, 'then? Why these double locks and 'bolts all on the outside, none on the 'in?'

And down she dropt into her chair, and they could not get another word from her. She threw her handkerchief over her face, as once before, which was soon wet with tears; and grievously, they own, she sobbed.

over

Gentle treatment, Lovelace! Perhaps this, as well as these wretches, will think it so!

Sally then ordered a dinner, and said, they would be soon back again, and see that she eat and drank, as a good Christian should, comporting herself to her condition, and making the best of it.

What has not this charming creature suffered, what has she not gone through, in these last three months, that I know of!—Who would think such a delicately-framed person could have sustained what she has sustained! We sometimes talk of bravery, of courage, of fortitude!—Here they are in perfection!—Such bravoes as thou and I should never have been able to support ourselves under half the persecutions, the disappointments, and contumelies, that she has met with; but, like cowards, should have slid out of the world, basely, by some back-door; that is to say, by a sword, by a pistol, by a halter, or knife;—but here is a fine-principled woman, who, by dint of this noble consideration, as I imagine [What else can support her?]—that she has not deserved the evils she contends with; and that this world is designed but as a transitory state of probation; and that she is travelling to another and better; puts up with all the hardships of the journey; and is not to be driven from her course by the attacks of thieves and robbers, or any other terrors and difficulties; being assured of an ample reward at the end of it.

If thou thinkest this reflection uncharacteristick from a companion and friend of thine, imaginest thou, that I profited nothing by my long attendance on my uncle in his dying state; and from the pious reflections of the good clergyman, who, day by day, at the poor man's own request, visited and prayed by him?—And could I have another such instance as this, to bring all these reflections home to me?

Then who can write of good persons, and of good subjects, and be capable of admiring them, and not be made serious for the time? And hence may we gather what a benefit to the morals of men the keeping of good company must be; while those who keep only bad, must necessarily more and more harden, and be hardened.

'Tis twelve of the clock, Sunday night—I can think of nothing but of this excellent creature, [illegible] fly for a quarter of [illegible] it gone off. And I will [illegible] melancholy subject from [illegible] tion of these wretches. [illegible] dare say, will arise in the [illegible] make, if admitted to [illegible] by thy servant, as to the way I [illegible] to find her in.

After the women had left her, she complained of her head and her heart; and seemed terrified with [illegible] sions of being carried once more to [illegible] clair's.

Refusing any-thing for herself, Mrs. Rowland came up to her, and told her, (as these wretches evidently had ordered her, for fear she should starve herself) that she must and should have tea, and bread and butter: and that, as she had friends who could support her, if she wrote to them, it was a wrong thing, both for herself and them, to starve herself thus.

'If it be for your own safety,' said she, 'that is another thing: let coffee, or chocolate, or what you will, be got; and put down a chicken to my account every day, if you please, and eat it yourselves. I will [illegible] I can. I would do nothing to hinder you. I have friends will pay you liberally when they know I am gone.'

They wondered, they told her, at her strange composure, in such distress.

They were nothing, she told them, to what she had suffered already from the vilest of all men. The disgrace of [illegible] her in the street; multitudes of people about her; shocking imputations wounding her ears; had indeed been very affecting to her. But that was over.—Every-thing soon would!—And she should be still more composed, were it not for the apprehensions of [illegible] one man, and one woman; and being [illegible] ed and forced back to the vilest house in the world.

Then were it not better to give way to the two gentlewomen's offer to [illegible] her?—They could tell her, it was a very kind proffer; and what was not to be met with every day.

She believed so.

The ladies might, possibly, [illegible] with her going back to the house to which she had such an antipathy. Then the compassionate gentlewoman was inclined to make it up with her creditors on her own bond—But [illegible] them she hearkened not, to [illegible] a proposal.

[illegible] they say [illegible]

[illegible] to me,' [illegible] 'that you had nothing [illegible] but to receive a visit from the [illegible] and the money, they be[illegible] would be laid down on your [illegible] or not.'

She was fainting,

'I charge you,' said she, 'as you will answer it one day to my friends, that you bring no gentleman into my company. I charge you don't. If you do, you know not what may be the consequence.'

They apprehended no bad consequence, they said, in doing their duty; and if she knew not her own good, her friends would thank them for taking any innocent steps to serve her, though against her will.

'Don't push me upon extremities, man!—Don't make me desperate, woman!—I have no small difficulty, notwithstanding the forming compositions you just now took notice of, to bear, as I ought to bear, the evils I suffer. But if you bring a man or men to me, be the pretence what it will——'

She [illegible] these, and looked so earnestly, and so wildly, they said, that they did not know but she would do some mischief to herself, if they disobeyed her; and that would be a sad thing in their house, and might be their ruin. They therefore promised, that no man should be brought to her but by her consent.

Mrs. Lovland prevailed on her to drink a dish of tea, and taste some bread and butter, about eleven on Saturday morning: which she probably did, to have an excuse not to dine with the women when they returned.

But she would not quit her prison-room, as she called it, to go into their parlour.

Unbarred windows, and a lightsomer apartment, she said, had too cheerful an appearance for her mind.

A shower falling, as she spoke, 'What,' said she, looking up, 'do the 'elements weep for me?'

At another time, the light of the sun was irksome to her. The sun seemed to shine in to mock her woes.

'Methought,' added she, 'the sun 'darting in and gilding these iron bars, 'placed there, like the two women, 'who came to insult my haggard looks 'by their cruel leave; and my dejected 'heart, by their vassal haughty airs!'

Sally came again to dinner-time, to see how she fared, as she said; and that she did not starve herself: and told her she wanted to have some talk with her, if she gave her leave, she would dine with her.

'I cannot eat.'

'You must try, Miss Harlowe.'

And, dinner being ready just then, she offered her hand, and desired her to walk down.

No; she would not stir out of her prison-room.

'These sullen airs won't do, Miss Harlowe: indeed they won't.'

She was silent.

'You will have harder usage than 'any you have ever yet known, I can 'tell you, if you come not into some 'humour to make matters up.'

She was still silent.

'Come, Miss, walk down to dinner. 'Let me entreat you, do. Miss Horton is below: she was once your favourite.'

She waited for an answer: but received none.

'We came to make some proposals 'to you, for your good; though you 'affronted us so lately. And we would 'not let Mrs. Sinclair come in person, 'because we thought to oblige you.'

'This is indeed obliging.'

'Come, give me your hand, Miss 'Harlowe: you are obliged to me, I can 'tell you that: and let us go down to 'Miss Horton.'

'Excuse me: I will not stir out of 'this room.'

'Would you have me and Miss Hor'ton dine in this filthy bed-room?'

'It is not a bed-room to me. I have 'not been in bed; nor will, while I 'am here.'

'And yet you care not, as I see, to 'leave the house.—And so you won't 'go down, Miss Harlowe?'

'I won't, except I am forced to it.'

'Well, well, let it alone. I sha'n't 'ask Miss Horton to dine in this room, 'I assure you. I will send you up a 'plate.'

And away the little saucy toad fluttered down.

When they had dined, up they came together.

'Well, Miss, you would not eat any'thing, it seems!—Very pretty sullen 'airs, these!—No wonder the honest gen'tleman had such a hand with you.'

She only held up her hands and eyes; the tears trickling down her cheeks.

Insolent devils!—how much more cruel and

'Methinks, Miss,' said Sally, 'you 'are a little shy, to what we have seen 'you. Pity such a nice lady should not 'have changes of apparel! Why won't 'you send to your lodgings for linen, 'at least?'

'I am not nice now.'

'Miss looks well and clean in any-'thing,' said Polly. 'But, dear Ma-'dam, why won't you send to your 'lodgings? Were it but in kindness to 'the people? They must have a concern 'about you. And your Miss Howe 'will wonder what's become of you; 'for, no doubt, you correspond.'

She turned from them, and, to herself, said, 'Too much! Too much!'—She tossed her handkerchief, wet before with her tears, from her, and held her apron to her eyes.

'Don't weep, Miss!' said the vile Polly.

'Yet do,' cried the viler Sally, 'it 'will be a relief. Nothing, as Mr. 'Lovelace once told me, dries sooner 'than tears. For once I too wept 'mightily.'

I could not bear the recital of this with patience. Yet I cursed them not so much as I should have done, had I not had a mind to get from them all the particulars of their gentle treatment: and this for two reasons; the one, that I might stab thee to the heart with the repetition; the other, that I might know upon what terms I am likely to see the unhappy lady to-morrow.

'Well, but, Miss Harlowe,' cried Sally, 'do you think these forlorn airs 'pretty? You are a good christian, 'child. Mrs. Rowland tells me, she 'has got you a Bible-book—O there it 'lies!—I make no doubt, but you have 'doubled down the useful places as ho-'nest Matt. Prior says.'

Then rising, and taking it up—'Ay, 'so you have—The Book of Job! One 'opens naturally here, I see—My 'mamma made me a fine Bible-scholar. '—Ecclesiastes too!—That's Apocry-'pha, as they call it——You see, Miss 'Horton, I know something of the 'book.'

They proposed once more to bail her, and to go home with them. A motion which she received with the same indignation as before.

Sally told her, That she had written in a very favourable manner, in her behalf, to you; and that she every hour expected an answer; and made no doubt, that you would come up [illegible] fenger, and generously pay the debt, and ask her pardon for it.

This disturbed her so much, that [illegible] feared she would have fallen into [illegible] She could not bear your name, she said. She hoped she should never see you more: and were you to intrude yourself, dreadful consequences might follow.

Surely, they said, she would be glad to be released from her confinement.

Indeed she should, now they had begun to alarm her with his name, who was the author of all her woes: and who, she now saw plainly, gave way to this new outrage, in order to bring her to his own infamous terms.

Why then, they asked, would she not write to her friends, to pay Mrs. Sinclair's demand?

Because she hoped she should not long trouble any-body; and because she knew, that the payment of the money, if she should be able to pay it, was not what was aimed at.

Sally owned, that she told her, That truly, she had thought herself as well descended, and as well educated, as herself, though not entitled to such considerable fortunes. And had the impudence to insist upon it to me to be truth.

She had the insolence to add, to the lady, That she had as much reason as she, to expect Mr. Lovelace would marry her; he having contracted to do so before he knew Miss Clarissa Harlowe: and that she had it under his hand and seal too—or else he had not obtained his ends; therefore it was not likely she should be so officious as to do his work against herself, if she thought Mr. Lovelace had designs upon her, like what she presumed to hint at: that, for her part, her only view was, to procure liberty to a young gentlewoman, who made these things grievous to her which would not be made such a rout about by any-body else—and to procure the payment of a just debt to her friend Mrs. Sinclair.

She besought them to leave her. She wanted not these instances, she said, to convince her of the company she was in: and told them, that, to get rid of such visitors, and of the still worse she was apprehensive of, she would write to one friend to raise the money for her; though it would be death for her to do so; because that friend could not do it without her mother, in whose eye it would give a selfish appearance to a friendship that was above all sordid alloy.

They adviſed her to write out of hand.

'But how much muſt I write for? 'What is the ſum? Should I not have 'had a bill delivered me? God knows, 'I took not your lodgings. But he 'that could treat me as he has done, 'could do this!'

'Don't ſpeak againſt Mr. Lovelace, 'Miſs Harlowe. He is a man I greatly 'eſteem.' [Curſed toad!] 'And, 'bat-'ing that he will take his advantage, 'where he can, of us ſilly credulous wo-'men, he is a man of honour.'

She lifted up her hands and eyes, inſtead of ſpeaking: and well ſhe might! For any words ſhe could have uſed, could not have expreſſed the anguiſh ſhe muſt feel, on being comprehended in the US.

She muſt write for one hundred and fifty guineas, at leaſt: two hundred, if ſhe were ſhort of money, might as well be written for.

Mrs. Sinclair, ſhe ſaid, had all her cloaths. Let them be ſold, fairly ſold, and the money go as far as it would go. She had alſo a few other valuables; but no money (none at all) but the poor half-guinea, and the little ſilver they had ſeen. She would give bond to pay all that her apparel, and the other matters ſhe had, would fall ſhort of. She had great effects belonging to her of right. Her bond would, and muſt, be paid, were it for a thouſand pounds. But her cloaths ſhe ſhould never want. She believed, if not too much under-valued, thoſe, and her few valuables, would anſwer every-thing. She wiſhed for no ſurplus but to diſcharge the laſt expences; and forty ſhillings would do as well for thoſe as forty pounds. 'Let 'my ruin,' ſaid ſhe, lifting up her eyes, 'be LARGE! Let it be COMPLETE, in 'this life!—For a compoſition, let it be 'COMPLETE.' And there ſhe ſtopped.

The wretches could not help wiſhing to me for the opportunity of making ſuch a purchaſe for their own wear. How I curſed them! and, in my heart, thee!—'But too probable,' thought I, 'that this vile Sally Martin may hope,' [Though thou art incapable of it] 'that 'her Lovelace,' as ſhe has the aſſurance, behind thy back, to call thee, 'may 'preſent her with ſome of the poor la-'dy's ſpoils!'

'Will not Mrs. Sinclair,' proceeded ſhe, 'think my cloaths a ſecurity, till 'they can be ſold? They are very good 'cloaths. A ſuit or two but juſt put on, 'as it were; never worn. They coſt 'much more than is demanded of me. 'My father loved to ſee me fine—All ſhall 'go. But let me have the particulars 'of her demand. I ſuppoſe I muſt pay 'for my deſtroyer' [That was her well-adapted word] 'and his ſervants, as 'well as for myſelf.—I am content to 'do ſo—Indeed I am content to do ſo. '—I am above wiſhing, that any-body, 'who could thus act, ſhould be ſo much 'as expoſtulated with, as to the juſtice 'and equity of this payment. If I have 'but enough to pay the demand, I ſhall 'be ſatisfied; and will leave the baſe-'neſs of ſuch an action as this, as an ag-'gravation of a guilt which I thought 'could not be aggravated.'

I own, Lovelace, I have malice in this particularity, in order to ſting thee to the heart. And, let me aſk thee, What now thou canſt think of thy barbarity, thy unprecedented barbarity, in having reduced a perſon of her rank, fortune, talents, and virtue, ſo low?

The wretched women, it muſt be owned, act but in their profeſſion; a profeſſion thou haſt been the principal means of reducing theſe two to act in. And they know what thy deſigns have been, and how far proſecuted. It is, in their opinions uſing her gently, that they have forborne to bring to her the woman ſo juſtly odious to her; and that they have not threatened her with the introducing to her ſtrange men: nor yet brought into her company their ſpirit-breakers, and humbling-drones, (fellows not allowed to carry ſtings) to trace and force her back to their deteſted houſe; and, when there, into all their meaſures.

Till I came, they thought thou wouldſt not be diſpleaſed at any-thing ſhe ſuffered, that could help to mortify her into a ſtate of ſhame and diſgrace; and bring her to comply with thy views, when thou ſhouldſt come to releaſe her from theſe wretches, as from a greater evil than cohabiting with thee.

When thou conſidereſt theſe things, thou wilt make no difficulty of believing, that this their own account of their behaviour to this admirable woman has been far ſhort of their inſults: and the leſs, when I tell thee, that, all together, their uſage had ſuch effects upon her, that they left her in violent hyſtericks! ordering an apothecary to be ſent for, if ſhe ſhould continue in them, and be worſe; and particularly, (as they had done from the firſt) that they kept out of her way any edged or pointed inſtrument; eſpecially a penknife; which, which, pretending to mend a pen, they ſaid, ſhe might aſk for.

At twelve, Saturday night, Rowland ſent to tell them, that ſhe was ſo ill, that he knew not what might be the iſſue; and wiſhed her out of his houſe.

And this made them as heartily wiſh to hear from you. For their meſſenger, to their great ſurprize, was not then returned from M. Hall. And they were ſure he muſt have reached that place by Friday night.

Early on Sunday morning, both devils went to ſee how ſhe did. They had ſuch an account of her weakneſs, lowneſs, and anguiſh, that they forbore (out of compaſſion, they ſaid, finding their viſits ſo diſagreeable to her) to ſee her. But their apprehenſion of what might be the iſſue was, no doubt, their principal conſideration: nothing elſe could have ſoftened ſuch flinty boſoms.

They ſent for the apothecary Rowland had had to her, and gave him, and Rowland, and his wife and maid, ſtrict orders, many times repeated, for the utmoſt care to be taken of her—No doubt, with an Old Bailey forecaſt. And they ſent up to let her know what orders they had given: but that, underſtanding ſhe had taken ſomething to compoſe herſelf, they would not diſturb her.

She had ſcrupled, it ſeems, to admit the apothecary's viſit over-night, becauſe he was a MAN. Nor could ſhe be prevailed upon to ſee him, till they pleaded their own ſafety to her.

They went again, from church: [Lord, Bob, theſe creatures go to church!] But ſhe ſent them down word, that ſhe muſt have all the remainder of the day to herſelf.

When I firſt came, and told them of thy execrations for what they had done, and joined my own to them, they were aſtoniſhed. The mother ſaid, ſhe had thought ſhe had known Mr. Lovelace better; and expected thanks, and not curſes.

While I was with them, came back halting and curſing, moſt horribly, their meſſenger; by reaſon of the ill-uſage he had received from you, inſtead of the reward he had been taught to expect from the ſuppoſed good news that he had carried down.—A pretty fellow, art thou not, to abuſe people for the conſequences of thy own faults?

Dorcas, whoſe acquaintance this fellow is, and who recommended him for the journey, had conditioned with him, it ſeems, for a ſhare in the expected bounty from you. Had ſhe been to have had her ſhare made good, I wiſh thou hadſt broken every bone in his ſkin.

Under what ſhocking diſadvantages, and with this addition to them, that I am thy friend and intimate, am I to make a viſit to this unhappy lady to-morrow morning! In thy name, too!—Enough to be refuſed, that I am of a ſex, to which, for thy ſake, ſhe has ſo juſtifiable an averſion: nor, having ſuch a tyrant of a father, and ſuch an implacable brother, has ſhe reaſon to make an exception in favour of any of it on their accounts.

It is three o'clock. I will cloſe here; and take a little reſt: what I have written will be a proper preparative for what ſhall offer by-and-by.

Thy ſervant is not to return without a letter, he tells me; and that thou expecteſt him back in the morning. Thou haſt fellows enough where thou art at thy command. If I find any difficulty in ſeeing the lady, thy meſſenger ſhall poſt away with this.—Let him look to broken bones, and other conſequences, if what he carries anſwer not thy expectation. But, if I am admitted, thou ſhalt have this and the reſult of my audience both together. In the former caſe, thou mayeſt ſend another ſervant to wait the next advices, from

LETTER LXVI.

MR. BELFORD, TO ROBERT LOVELACE, ESQ.

MONDAY, JULY 17.

ABOUT ſix this morning I went to Rowland's. Mrs. Sinclair was to follow me, in order to diſmiſs the action; but not to come in ſight.

Rowland upon enquiry, told me that the lady was extremely ill; and that ſhe had deſired, that no one but his wife or maid ſhould come near her.

I ſaid, 'I muſt ſee her.' I had told him my buſineſs over-night, and I muſt ſee her.

His wife went up: but returned preſently, ſaying, She could not get her to ſpeak to her; yet that her eyelids moved; though ſhe either would not, or could not, open them, to look up at her.

'Oons, woman,' ſaid I, 'the lady 'may be in a fit: the lady may be dy-'ing—Let me go up. Shew me the way.'

A horrid hole of a houſe, in an alley they call a court; ſtairs wretchedly narrow, even to the firſt floor rooms: and into a den they led me, with broken walls, which had been papered, as I saw by a multitude of tacks, and some torn bits held on by the rusty heads.

The floor indeed was clean, but the cieling was smoked with variety of figures, and initials of names, that had been the woeful employment of wretches who had no other way to amuse themselves.

A bed at one corner, with coarse curtains tacked up at the feet to the cieling; because the curtain rings were broken off; but a coverlid upon it with a cleanish look, though plaguily in tatters, and the corners tied up in tassels, that the rents in it might go no farther.

The windows dark and double-barred, the tops boarded up to save mending; and only a little four-paned eyelet hole of a casement to let in air; more, however, coming in at broken panes, than could come in at that.

Four old turkey-worked chairs, bursten-bottomed, the stuffing staring out.

An old, tottering, worm-eaten table, that had more nails bestowed in mending it to make it stand, than the table cost fifty years ago, when new.

On the mantle-piece was an iron shove-up candlestick, with a lighted candle in it, twinkle, twinkle, twinkle, four of them, I suppose, for a penny.

Near that, on the same shelf, was an old looking-glass, cracked through the middle, breaking out into a thousand points; the crack given it, perhaps, in a rage, by some poor creature, to whom it gave the representation of his heart's woes in his face.

The chimney had two half-tiles in it on one side, and one whole one on the other; which shewed it had been in better plight; but now the very mortar had followed the rest of the tiles in every other place, and left the bricks bare.

An old half-barred stove-grate was in the chimney; and in that a large lame-bottle without a neck, filled with baleful yew, as an ever-green, withered southernwood, dead sweet-briar, and sprigs of rue in flower.

To finish the shocking description, in a dark nook stood an old broken-bottomed cane couch, without a squab, or coverlid, sunk at one corner, and unmortised by the failing of one of it's worm-eaten legs, which lay in two pieces under the wretched piece of furniture it could no longer support.

And this, thou horrid Lovelace, was the bed-chamber of the divine Clariffa!!!

I had leisure to cast my eye on these things: for, going up softly, the poor lady turned not about at our entrance; nor, till I spoke, moved her head.

She was kneeling in a corner of the room, near the dismal window, against the table, on an old bolster (as it seemed to be) of the cane couch, half covered with her handkerchief; her back to the door; which was only shut to; [No need of fastenings!] her arms crossed upon the table, the fore-finger of her right-hand in her Bible. She had perhaps been reading in it, and could read no longer. Paper, pens, ink, lay by her book, on the table. Her dress was white damask, exceeding neat; but her stays seemed not tight-laced. I was told afterwards, that her laces had been cut, when she fainted away at her entrance into this cursed place; and she had not been solicitous enough about her dress, to send for others. Her head-dress was a little discomposed; her charming hair, in natural ringlets, as you have heretofore described it, but a little tangled, as if not lately combed, irregularly shading one side of the loveliest neck in the world; as her disordered rumpled handkerchief did the other. Her face [O how altered from what I had seen it! Yet lovely in spite of all her griefs and sufferings!] was reclined, when we entered, upon her crossed arms; but so, as not more than one side of it to be hid.

When I surveyed the room around, and the kneeling lady, sunk with majesty too in her white flowing robes (for she had not on a hoop) spreading the dark, though not dirty, floor, and illuminating that horrid corner; her linen beyond imagination white, considering that she had not been undressed ever since she had been here; I thought my concern would have choaked me. Something rose in my throat, I know not what, which made me for a moment, guggle, as it were, for speech: which, at last, forcing it's way, 'Con—Con—'Confound you both,' said I, to the man and woman, 'is this an apartment 'for such a lady? And could the cursed 'devils of her own sex, who visited this 'suffering angel, see her, and leave 'her, in so dam'd a nook?'

'Sir, we would have had the lady 'to accept of our own bed-chamber; 'but she refused it. We are poor peo-'ple—And we expect nobody will stay 'with us longer than they can help it.'

'You are people chosen purposely, I 'doubt not, by the damned woman who 'has employed you: and if your usage 'of this lady has been but half as bad

BELFORD charging the Keepers of the Lock-up House to treat CLARISSA tenderly.

'as your houſe, you had better never 'to have ſeen the light.'

Up then raiſed the charming ſufferer her lovely face; but with ſuch a ſignificance of woe overſpreading it, that I could not for the ſoul of me, help being viſibly affected.

She waved her hand two or three times towards the door, as if commanding me to withdraw; and diſpleaſed at my intruſion; but did not ſpeak.

'Permit me, Madam—I will not approach one ſtep farther without your 'leave—Permit me, for one moment, 'the favour of your ear!'

'No—No—Go—go, MAN,' with an emphaſis—And would have ſaid more; but, as if ſtruggling in vain for words, ſhe ſeemed to give up ſpeech for loſt, and dropped her head down once more, with a deep ſigh, upon her left-arm; her right, as if ſhe had not the uſe of it, (numbed, I ſuppoſe) ſelf-moved, dropping down on her ſide.

O that thou hadſt been there! and in my place!—But by what I then felt in myſelf, I am convinced, that a capacity of being moved by the diſtreſſes of our fellow creatures, is far from being diſgraceful to a manly heart. With what pleaſure, at that moment, could I have given up my own life, could I but firſt have avenged this charming creature, and cut the throat of her deſtroyer, as ſhe emphatically calls thee, though the friend that I beſt love: and yet, at the ſame time, my heart and my eyes gave way to a ſoftneſs of which (though not ſo hardened a wretch as thou) they were never before ſo ſuſceptible.

'I dare not approach you, deareſt 'lady, without your leave: but on my 'knees I beſeech you to permit me to 'releaſe you from this damned houſe, 'and out of the power of this accurſed 'woman, who was the occaſion of your 'being here!'

She lifted up her ſweet face once more, and beheld me on my knees. Never knew I before what it was to pray ſo heartily.

'Are you not—Are you not Mr. 'Belford, Sir? I think your name is 'Belford.'

'It is, Madam; and I was ever a wor'ſhipper of your virtues, and an advo'cate for you: and I come to releaſe 'you from the hands you are in.'

'And in whoſe to place me?—O 'leave me, leave me!—Let me never 'riſe from this ſpot!—Let me never, 'never more believe in man!'

'This moment, deareſt lady—this 'very moment, if you pleaſe, you may 'depart whitherſoever you think fit. 'You are abſolutely free, and your own 'miſtreſs.'

'I had now as lieve die here in this 'place, as any-where. I will owe no 'obligation to any friend of his in whole 'company you have ſeen me. So, pray, 'Sir, withdraw.'

Then turning to the officer—'Mr. 'Rowland I think your name is? I 'am better reconciled to your houſe 'than I was at firſt. If you can but 'engage that I ſhall have nobody come 'near me but your wife, (No man!) 'and neither of thoſe women who have 'ſported with my calamities; I will 'die with you, and in this very cor'ner. And you ſhall be well ſatisfied 'for the trouble you have had with me '—I have value enough for that—for, 'ſee, I have a diamond-ring;' taking it out of her boſom; 'and I have friends 'will redeem it at a high price, when I 'am gone.'

'But for you, Sir,' looking at me, 'I 'beg you to withdraw. If you mean 'me well, GOD, I hope, will reward 'you for your good meaning; but to 'the friend of my deſtroyer will I not 'owe an obligation.'

'You will owe no obligation to me, 'nor to any-body. You have been 'detained for a debt you do not owe. 'The action is diſmiſſed; and you will 'only be ſo good as to give me your 'hand into the coach, which ſtands as 'near to this houſe as it could draw up. 'And I will either leave you at the 'coach-door, or attend you whitherſo'ever you pleaſe, till I ſee you ſafe 'where you would wiſh to be.'

'Will you then, Sir, compel me to be 'beholden to you?'

'You will inexpreſſibly oblige me, 'Madam, to command me to do you 'either ſervice or pleaſure.'

'Why then, Sir,' [looking at me]—'But why do you mock me in that humble poſture?—Riſe, Sir! I cannot 'ſpeak to you elſe.'

I aroſe.

'Only, Sir, take this ring. I have 'a ſiſter, who will be glad to have it, 'at the price it ſhall be valued at, for 'the former owner's ſake!—Out of the 'money ſhe gives, let this man be paid—'handſomely paid: and I have a few 'valuables more at my lodging, (Dot'cas, or the MAN William, can tell 'where that is;) let them and my 'cloaths at the wicked woman's, where 'you have ſeen me, be ſold for the pay'ment

'ment of my lodging firſt, and next of 'your friend's debts, that I have been 'arreſted for, as far as they will go; 'only reſerving enough to put me into 'the ground, any-where, or any-how, 'no matter.—Tell your friend, I wiſh 'it may be enough to ſatisfy the whole 'demand; but if it be not, he muſt 'make it up himſelf; or, if he thinks fit 'to draw for it on Miſs Howe, ſhe will 'repay it, and with intereſt, if he in-'ſiſt upon it.—And this, Sir, if you 'promiſe to perform, you will do me, 'as you offer, both pleaſure and ſer-'vice: and ſay you will, and take the 'ring and withdraw. If I want to 'ſay any-thing more to you, (You 'ſeem to be an humane man) I will 'let you know—And ſo, Sir, God bleſs 'you.'

I approached her, and was going to ſpeak—

'Don't ſpeak, Sir: here's the ring.' I ſtood off.

'And won't you take it?—Won't 'you do this laſt office for me?—I have 'no other perſon to aſk it of: elſe, be-'lieve me, I would not requeſt it of you. 'But take it, or not,'—laying it upon the table—'you muſt withdraw, Sir: I 'am very ill. I would fain get a little 'reſt, if I could. I find I am going to 'be bad again.'

And offering to riſe, ſhe ſunk down through exceſs of weakneſs and grief, in a fainting fit.

Why, Lovelace, waſt thou not preſent, thyſelf?—Why doſt thou commit ſuch villainies, as even thou art afraid to appear in; and yet putteſt a weaker heart and head upon encountering with them?

The maid coming in juſt then, the woman and ſhe lifted her upon the decrepit couch; and I withdrew with this Rowland; who wept like a child, and ſaid, he never in his life was ſo moved.

Yet ſo hardened a wretch art thou, that I queſtion whether thou wilt ſhed a tear at my relation.

They recovered her by hartſhorn and water. I went down mean while; for the deteſtable woman had been below ſome time. O how did I curſe her!—I never before was ſo fluent in curſes.

She tried to wheedle me; but I renounced her; and, after ſhe had diſmiſſed the action, ſent her away crying, or pretending to cry, becauſe of my behaviour to her.

You will obſerve, that I did not mention one word to the lady about you. I was afraid to do it. For 'twas plain, that ſhe could not bear your name: 'Your friend,' and 'The company you 'have ſeen me in,' were the words neareſt to naming you, ſhe could ſpeak: and yet I wanted to clear your intention of this brutal, this ſordid-looking villainy.

I ſent up again, by Rowland's wife, when I heard that the lady was recovered, beſeeching her to quit that deviliſh place; and the woman aſſured her, that ſhe was at full liberty to do ſo; for that the action was diſmiſſed.

But ſhe cared not to anſwer her: and was ſo weak and low, that it was almoſt as much out of her power as inclination, the woman told me, to ſpeak.

I would have haſtened away for my friend Doctor H. but the houſe is ſuch a den, and the room ſhe was in ſuch a hole, that I was aſhamed to be ſeen in it by a man of his reputation, eſpecially with a woman of ſuch an appearance, and in ſuch uncommon diſtreſs; and I found there was no prevailing on her to quit it for the peoples bed-room, which was neat and lightſome.

The ſtrong room ſhe was in, the wretches told me, ſhould have been in better order, but that it was but the very morning that ſhe was brought in, that an unhappy man had quitted it; for a more eligible priſon, no doubt; ſince there could hardly be a worſe.

Being told, that ſhe deſired not to be diſturbed, and ſeemed inclined to doze, I took this opportunity to go to her lodgings in Covent Garden; to which Dorcas (who firſt diſcovered her there, as Will was the ſetter from church) had before given me a direction.

The man's name is Smith, a dealer in gloves, ſnuff, and ſuch petty merchandize: his wife the ſhopkeeper: he a maker of the gloves they ſell. Honeſt people, it ſeems.

I thought to have got the woman with me to the lady; but ſhe was not within.

I talked with the man, and told him what had befallen the lady; owing, as I ſaid, to a miſtake of orders; and gave her the character ſhe deſerved; and deſired him to ſend his wife the moment ſhe came in, to the lady; directing him whither; not doubting, that her attendance would be very welcome to her; which he promiſed.

He told me, that a letter was left for her there on Saturday; and, about half an hour before I came, another, ſuperſcribed by the ſame hand; the firſt, by the poſt; the other, by a countryman; who, who, having been informed of her abſence, and of all the circumſtances they could tell him of it, poſted away, full of concern, ſaying that the lady he was ſent from would be ready to break her heart at the tidings.

I thought it right to take the two letters back with me; and, diſmiſſing my coach, took a chair, as a more proper vehicle for the lady, if I (the friend of her deſtroyer) could prevail upon her to leave Rowland's.

And here, being obliged to give way to an indiſpenſable avocation, I will make thee taſte a little, in thy turn, of the plague of ſuſpence; and break off, without giving thee the leaſt hint of the iſſue of my further proceedings. I know, that thoſe leaſt bear diſappointment, who love moſt to give it. In twenty inſtances, haſt thou afforded me proof of the truth of this obſervation. And I matter not thy raving.

Another letter, however, ſhall be ready, ſend for it as ſoon as thou wilt. But, were it not, have I not written enough to convince thee, that I am thy ready and obliging friend, J. BELFORD?

LETTER LXVII.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

FRIDAY, JULY 17, ELEVEN AT NIGHT.

CURSE upon thy hard heart, thou vile caitiff! How haſt thou tortured me by thy deſigned abruption! 'Tis impoſſible that Miſs Harlowe ſhould have ever ſuffered as thou haſt made me ſuffer, and as I now ſuffer!

That ſex is made to bear pain. It is a curſe, that the firſt of it entailed upon all her daughters, when ſhe brought the curſe upon us all. And they love thoſe beſt, whether man or child, who give them moſt—But to ſtretch upon thy damned tenter-hooks ſuch a ſpirit as mine—No rack, no torture, can equal my torture!

And muſt I ſtill wait the return of another meſſenger? Confound thee for a malicious devil! I wiſh thou wert a poſt-horſe, and I upon the back of thee! How would I whip and ſpur, and harrow up thy clumſy ſides, till I made thee a ready-roaſted, ready-flayed, meſs of dog's meat; all the hounds in the county howling after thee as I drove thee, to wait my diſmounting, in order to devour thee piece-meal: life ſtill throbbing in each churned mouthful!

Give this fellow the ſequel of thy tormenting ſcribble.

Diſpatch him away with it. Thou haſt promiſed it ſhall be ready. Every cuſhion or chair I ſhall ſit upon, the bed I ſhall lie down upon, (if I go to bed) till he return, will be ſtuffed with bolt-upright awls, bodkins, corking-pins, and packing-needles: already I can fancy, that to pink my body like my mind, I need only to be put into a hogſhead ſtuck full of ſteel-pointed ſpikes, and rolled down a hill three times as high as the Monument.

But I loſe time; yet know not how to employ it till this fellow returns with the ſequel of thy ſoul-harrowing intelligence!

LETTER LXVIII.

MR. BELFORD, TO ROBERT LOVELACE, ESQ.

MONDAY NIGHT, JULY 17.

ON my return to Rowland's, I found that the apothecary was juſt gone up. Mrs. Rowland being above with him, I made the leſs ſcruple to go up too, as it was probable, that to aſk for leave would be to aſk to be denied; hoping alſo, that the letters I had with me would be a good excuſe.

She was ſitting on the ſide of the broken couch, extremely weak and low: and, I obſerved, cared not to ſpeak to the man: and no wonder; for I never ſaw a more ſhocking fellow, of a profeſſion tolerably genteel, nor heard a more illiterate one prate—Phyſician in ordinary to this houſe, and others like it, I ſuppoſe! He put me in mind of Otway's Apothecary in his Caius Marius; as borrowed from the immortal Shakeſpeare.

'Meagre and very rueful were his looks:
'Sharp miſery had worn him to the bones.
'——— Famine in his cheeks:
'Need and oppreſſion ſtaring in his eyes:
'Contempt and beggary hanging on his back:
'The world no friend of his, nor the world's 'law.'

As I am in black, he took me, at my entrance, I believe, to be a doctor; and ſlunk behind me with his hat upon his two thumbs, and looked as if he expected the oracle to open, and give him orders.

The lady looked diſpleaſed, as well at me as at Rowland, who followed me, and at the apothecary. It was not, ſhe ſaid, the leaſt of her preſent misfortunes, [illegible] that she could not be left to her own [illegible] and to her option to see whom she pleased.

I [illegible] her curtsey; and wishing for the [illegible] to withdraw, [which he did,] told her, that I had been at her new lodgings, to order every thing to be got ready for her reception, presuming she would choose to go thither: that I had a chair at the door: that Mr. Smith and his wife [I named their names, that she should not have room for the least fear of Sinclair's] had been full of apprehensions for her safety; that I had brought two letters which were left there for her; the one by the post, the other that very morning.

This took her attention. She held out her charming hand for them; took them, and pressing them to her lips—'From the only friend I have in the world!' said she, kissing them again; and looking at the seals, as if to see whether they had been opened. 'I can't read them,' said she, 'my eyes are too dim; and put them into her bosom.'

I beseeched her to think of quitting that wretched hole.

Whither could she go, she asked, to be safe and uninterrupted for the short remainder of her life; and to avoid being again visited by the creatures who had insulted her before?

I gave her the solemnest assurances, that she should not be invaded in her new lodgings by any-body; and said, that I would particularly engage my honour, that the person who had most offended her, should not come near her, without her own consent.

'Your honour, Sir! Are you not that man's friend?'

'I am not a friend, Madam, to his vile actions to the most excellent of women.'

'Do you flatter me, Sir? Then are you a MAN.—But, oh, Sir, your friend,' holding her face forward with great earnestness, 'your barbarous friend, what has he not to answer for!'

There she stopt: her heart full; and putting her hand over her eyes and forehead, the tears trickled through her fingers: refuting thy barbarity, it seemed, as Cæsar did the stab from his distinguished Brutus!

Though she was so very much disordered, I thought I would not lose this opportunity to assert your innocence of this villainous arrest.

'There is no defending the unhappy man in any of his vile actions by you, Madam; but of this last outrage, by all that's good and sacred, he is innocent!'

'O wretches! what a sex is yours! —Have you all one dialect? Good and sacred!—If, Sir, you can find an oath, or a vow, or an adjuration, that my ears have not been twenty times a day wounded with, then speak it, and I may again believe a MAN.'

I was excessively touched at these words, knowing thy baseness, and the reason she had for them.

'But say you, Sir; for I would not, methinks, have the wretch capable of this sordid baseness!—Say you that he is innocent of this last wickedness? Can you truly say that he is?'

'By the great God of Heaven——!'

'Nay, Sir, if you swear, I must doubt you!—If you yourself think your WORD insufficient, what reliance can I have on your OATH!—O that this my experience had not cost me so dear! But were I to live a thousand years, I would always suspect the veracity of a swearer. Excuse me, Sir; but is it likely, that he who makes so free with his GOD, will scruple anything that may serve his turn with his fellow-creature?'

This was a most affecting reprimand!

'Madam,' said I, 'I have a regard, a regard a gentleman ought to have, to my word: and whenever I forfeit it to you——'

'Nay, Sir, don't be angry with me. It is grievous to me to question a gentleman's veracity. But your friend calls himself a gentleman—You know not what I have suffered by a gentleman!'—And then again she wept.

'I would give you, Madam, demonstration, if your grief and your weakness would permit it, that he has no hand in this barbarous baseness: and that he resents it as it ought to be resented.'

'Well, well, Sir,' [with quickness] 'he will have his account to make up somewhere else; not to me. I should not be sorry to find him able to acquit his intention on this occasion. Let him know, Sir, only one thing, that, when you heard me in the bitterness of my spirit, most vehemently exclaim against the undeserved usage I have met with from him, that even then, in that passionate moment, I was able to say,' [And never did I see such an earnest and affecting exultation of hands and eyes] "Give him, good God! re-

"pentance and amendment; that I may "be the laſt poor creature, who ſhall be "ruined by him!—And, in thine own
"good time, receive to thy mercy the "poor wretch who had none on me!"

By my ſoul, I could not ſpeak.—She had not her Bible before her for nothing.

I was forced to turn my head away, and to take out my handkerchief.

What an angel is this!—Even the gaoler, and his wife and maid, wept.

Again, I wiſh thou hadſt been there, that thou mighteſt have ſunk down at her feet, and begun that moment to reap the effect of her generous wiſhes for thee; undeſerving, as thou art, of any-thing but perdition!

I repreſented to her, that ſhe would be leſs free where ſhe was from viſits ſhe liked not, than at her own lodgings. I told her, that it would probably bring her, in particular, one viſitor, who, otherwiſe, I would engage [but I durſt not ſwear again, after the ſevere reprimand ſhe had juſt given me] ſhould not come near her, without her conſent. And I expreſſed my ſurprize, that ſhe ſhould be unwilling to quit ſuch a place as this; when it was more than probable, that ſome of her friends, when it was known how bad ſhe was, would viſit her.

She ſaid, the place, when ſhe was firſt brought into it, was indeed very ſhocking to her: but that ſhe had found herſelf ſo weak and ill, and her griefs had ſo ſunk her, that ſhe did not expect to have lived till now: that therefore all places had been alike to her; for to die in a priſon, was to die; and equally eligible as to die in a palace: [Palaces, ſhe ſaid, could have no attractions for a dying perſon] but that, ſince ſhe feared ſhe was not ſo ſoon to be releaſed, as ſhe had hoped; ſince ſhe was ſuffered to be ſo little miſtreſs of herſelf here; and ſince ſhe might, by removal, be in the way of her dear friend's letters; ſhe would hope, that ſhe might depend upon the aſſurances I gave her, of being at liberty to return to her laſt lodgings; (otherwiſe ſhe would provide herſelf with new ones, out of my knowledge as well as out of yours) and that I was too much of a gentleman, to be concerned in carrying her back to the houſe ſhe had ſo much reaſon to abhor; and to which ſhe had been once before moſt vilely betrayed, to her ruin.

I aſſured her, in the ſtrongeſt terms, [but ſhore not] that you were reſolved not to moleſt her: and, [illegible] of the ſincerity of my profeſſions [illegible] her to give me [illegible] aſſurance of my friend's [illegible] about ſending all her [illegible] whatever belonged to her, to [illegible] lodgings.

She ſeemed pleaſed; and gave me [illegible] ſtantly out of her pocket her keys; [illegible] ing me, If Mrs. Smith, whom I had named, might not attend me; and [illegible] would give her further directions? To which I cheerfully aſſented; and then ſhe told me, that ſhe would accept of the chair I had offered her.

I withdrew; and took the opportunity to be civil to Rowland and his maid; for ſhe found no fault with their behaviour, for what they were; and the fellow ſeems to be miſerably poor. I ſent alſo for the apothecary, who is as poor as the officer, (and ſtill poorer, I dare ſay, as to the ſkill required in his buſineſs) and ſatisfied him beyond his hopes.

The lady, after I had withdrawn, attempted to read the letters I had brought her. But ſhe could read but a little way in one of them, and had great emotions upon it.

She told the woman ſhe would take a ſpeedy opportunity to acknowledge her civilities and her huſband's, and to ſatisfy the apothecary; who might ſend her his bill to her lodgings.

She gave the maid ſomething; probably the only half-guinea ſhe had: and then with difficulty, her limbs trembling under her, and ſupported by Mrs. Rowland, got down ſtairs.

I offered my arm: ſhe was pleaſed to lean upon it. 'I doubt, Sir,' ſaid ſhe, as ſhe moved, 'I have behaved rudely 'to you: but, if you knew all, you 'would forgive me.'

'I know enough, Madam, to convince 'me, that there is not ſuch purity and 'honour in any woman upon earth; 'nor any one that has been ſo barba-'rouſly treated.'

She looked at me very earneſtly. What ſhe thought I cannot ſay; but, in general, I never ſaw ſo much ſoul in a woman's eyes, as in hers.

I ordered my ſervant (whoſe mourning made him leſs obſervable as ſuch, and who had not been in the lady's eye) to keep the chair in view; and to bring me word, how ſhe did, when ſet down. The fellow had the thought to ſlep into the ſhop, juſt before the chair entered it, under pretence of buying ſnuff; and [illegible] himself to give me an account, that he was received with great joy by the good woman of the house; who told him, she was but just come in; and was preparing to attend her in High Holborn.—'O, Mrs. Smith,' said she, as soon as she saw her, 'did you not think I was run away?—You don't know what I have suffered since I saw you. I have been in a prison!——Arrested for debts I owe not!——But, thank God, I am here!—Will you permit your maid—I have forgot her name already——'

'Catharine, Madam.'

'Will you let Catharine assist me to bed?—I have not had my cloaths off since Thursday night.'

What she further said the fellow heard not, she leaning upon the maid, and going up-stairs.

But dost thou not observe, what a strange, what an uncommon openness of heart reigns in this lady? She had been in a prison, she said, before a stranger in the shop, and before the maid-servant: and so, probably, she would have said, had there been twenty people in the shop.

The disgrace she cannot hide from herself, as she says in her letter to Lady Betty, she is not solicitous to conceal from the world!

But this makes it evident to me, that she is resolved to keep no terms with thee. And yet to be able to put up such a prayer for thee, as she did in her prison; [I will often mention the prison-case, to tease thee!] Does not this shew, that revenge has very little sway in her mind; though she can retain so much proper resentment?

And this is another excellence in this admirable woman's character: for whom, before her, have we met with in the whole sex, or in ours either, that knew how, in practice, to distinguish between REVENGE and RESENTMENT, for base and ungrateful treatment?

'Tis a cursed thing, after all, that such a woman as this should be treated as she has been treated. Hadst thou been a king, and done as thou hast done by such a meritorious innocent, I believe in my heart, it would have been adjudged to be a national sin, and the sword, the pestilence, or famine, must have atoned for it!—But as thou art a private man, thou wilt certainly meet with thy punishment, (besides what thou mayest expect from the justice of thy country, and the vengeance of her friends) as she will her reward, HEREAFTER.

It must be so, if there be really such a thing as future remuneration; as now I am more and more convinced there must:—else, what a hard fate is hers, whose punishment, to all appearance, has so much exceeded her fault? And, as to thine, how can temporary burnings, wert thou by some accident to be consumed in thy bed, expiate for thy abominable vileness to her, in breach of all obligations moral and divine?

I was resolved to lose no time in having every-thing which belonged to the lady, at the cursed woman's, sent her. Accordingly, I took coach to Smith's, and procured the lady, (to whom I sent up my compliments, and enquiries how she bore her removal) ill as she sent me down word she was, to give proper directions to Mrs. Smith: whom I took with me to Sinclair's: and who saw every-thing looked out, and put into the trunks and boxes they were first brought in, and carried away in two coaches.

Had I not been there, Sally and Polly would each of them have taken to herself something of the poor lady's spoils. This they declared: and I had some difficulty to get from Sally a fine Brussels lace head, which she had the confidence to say she would wear for Miss Harlowe's sake. Nor should either I or Mrs. Smith have known she had got it, had she not been in search after the ruffles belonging to it.

My resentment on this occasion, and the conversation which Mrs. Smith and I had, (in which I not only expatiated on the merits of the lady, but expressed my concern for her sufferings; though I left her room to suppose her married, yet without averring it) gave me high credit with the good woman: so that we are perfectly well acquainted already: by which means I shall be enabled to give you accounts from time to time of all that passes; and which I will be very industrious to do, provided I may depend upon the solemn promises I have given the lady, in your name, as well as in my own, that she shall be free from all personal molestation from you. And thus shall I have it in my power to return in kind your writing favours; and preserve my short-hand besides: which, till this correspondence was opened, I had pretty much neglected.

I ordered the abandoned woman to make out your account. They answered,

That

That they would do it with a vengeance. Indeed they breathe nothing but revenge. For now they ſay, you will aſſuredly marry; and your example will be followed by all your friends and companions—As the old one ſays, to the utter ruin of her poor houſe.

LETTER LXIX.

MR. BELFORD, TO ROBERT LOVELACE, ESQ.

TUESDAY MORN. (JULY 18) 6 O'CLOCK.

HAVING ſat up late to finiſh and ſeal in readineſs my letter to the above period, I am diſturbed before I wiſhed to have riſen, by the arrival of thy ſecond fellow, man and horſe in a foam.

While he baits, I will write a few lines, moſt heartily to congratulate thee on thy expected rage and impatience, and on thy recovery of mental feeling.

How much does the idea thou giveſt me of thy deſerved torments, by thy upright awls, bodkins, pins, and packing-needles, by thy rolling hogſhead, with iron-ſpikes, and by thy macerated ſides, delight me!

I will, upon every occaſion that offers, drive more ſpikes into thy hogſhead, and roll thee down-hill, and up, as thou recovereſt to ſenſe, or rather returneſt back to inſenſibleſſneſs. Thou knoweſt therefore the terms on which thou art to enjoy my correſpondence. Am not I, who have all along, and in time, proteſted againſt thy barbarous and ungrateful perfidies to a woman ſo noble, entitled to drive remorſe, if poſſible, into thy hitherto callous heart?

Only let me repeat one thing, which perhaps I mentioned too ſlightly before. That the lady was determined to remove to new lodgings; where neither you nor I ſhould be able to find her, had I not ſolemnly aſſured her, that ſhe might depend upon being free from your viſits.

Theſe aſſurances I thought I might give her, not only becauſe of your promiſe, but becauſe it is neceſſary for you to know where ſhe is, in order to addreſs yourſelf to her by your friends.

Enable me therefore to make good to her this my ſolemn engagement; or adieu to all friendſhip, at leaſt to all correſpondence with thee for ever.

LETTER LXX.

MR. BELFORD, TO ROBERT LOVELACE, ESQ.

TUESDAY, JULY 18. AFTERNOON.

I Renewed my enquiries after the lady's health, in the morning, by my ſervant: and as ſoon as I had dined, I went myſelf.

I had but a poor account of it: yet ſent up my compliments. She returned me thanks for all my good offices; and her excuſes, that they could not be perſonal juſt then, being very low and faint: but if I gave myſelf the trouble of coming about ſix this evening, ſhe ſhould be able, ſhe hoped, to drink a diſh of tea with me, and would then thank me herſelf.

I am very proud of this condeſcenſion; and think it looks not amiſs for you, as I am your avowed friend. Methinks I want fully to remove from her mind all doubts of you in this laſt villainous action: and who knows then, what your noble relations may be able to do for you with her, if you hold your mind? For your ſervant acquainted me with their having actually engaged Miſs Howe in their and your favour, before this curſed affair happened. And I deſire the particulars of all from yourſelf, that I may the better know how to ſerve you.

She has two handſome apartments, a bed-chamber and dining-room, with light cloſets in each. She has already a nurſe; (the people of the houſe having but one maid) a woman whoſe care, diligence, and honeſty, Mrs. Smith highly commends. She has likewiſe the benefit of the voluntary attendance, and love, as it ſeems, of a widow gentlewoman, Mrs. Lovick her name, who lodges over her apartment, and of whom ſhe ſeems very fond, having found ſomething in her, ſhe thinks, reſembling the qualities of her worthy Mrs. Norton.

About ſeven o'clock this morning, it ſeems, the lady was ſo ill, that ſhe yielded to their deſires to have an apothecary ſent for—Not the fellow, thou mayeſt believe, ſhe had had before at Rowland's; but one Mr. Goddard, a man of ſkill and eminence; and of conſcience, too; demonſtrated as well by general character, as by his preſcriptions to this lady: for pronouncing her caſe to be grief, he ordered, for the preſent, only innocent juleps, by way of cordial; and as ſoon as her ſtomach ſhould be able to bear it, light kitchen-diet; telling Mrs.

Lovick, that that, with air, moderate exercise, and cheerful company, would do her more good than all the medicines in his shop.

This has given me, as it seems it has the lady, (who also praises his modest behaviour, paternal looks, and genteel address) a very good opinion of the man; and I design to make myself acquainted with him, and, if he advises to call in a doctor, to wish him, for the fair patient's sake, more than the physician's, (who wants not practice) my worthy friend Dr. H.—whose character is above all exception, as his humanity, I am sure, will distinguish him to the lady.

Mrs. Lovick gratified me with an account of a letter she had written from the lady's mouth to Miss Howe; she being unable to write herself with steadiness.

It was to this effect; in answer, it seems, to her two letters, whatever were the contents of them:

That she had been involved in a dreadful calamity, which she was sure, when known, would exempt her from the effects of her friendly displeasure, for not answering her first; having been put under an arrest—Could she have believed it?—That she was released but the day before: and was now so weak and so low, that she was obliged to get a widow gentlewoman in the same house to account thus for her silence to her [Miss Howe's] two letters of the 13th and 16th: that she would, as soon as able, answer them—Begged of her, mean time, not to be uneasy for her; since (only that this was a calamity which came upon her, when she was far from being well; a load laid upon the shoulders of a poor wretch, ready before to sink under too heavy a burden) it was nothing to the evil she had before suffered: and one felicity seemed likely to issue from it; which was, that she would be at rest in an honest house, with considerate and kind-hearted people; having assurance given her, that she should not be molested by the wretch, whom it would be death for her to see: so that now she [Miss Howe] needed not to send to her by private and expensive conveyances: nor need Collins to take precautions for fear of being dogged to her lodgings; nor need she write by a fictitious name to her, but by her own.

You see I am in a way to oblige you: you see how much she depends upon my engaging for your forbearing to intrude yourself into her company: let not your flaming impatience destroy all; and make me look like a villain to a lady who has reason to suspect every man she sees to be so.—Upon this condition, you may expect all the services that can flow from your sincere well-wisher,

J. BELFORD.

LETTER LXXI.

MR. BELFORD, TO ROBERT LOVELACE, ESQ.

TUESDAY NIGHT. JULY 18.

I Am just come from the lady. I was admitted into the dining-room, where she was sitting in an elbow-chair, in a very weak and low way. She made an effort to stand up, when I entered; but was forced to keep her seat. 'You'll 'excuse me, Mr. Belford: I ought to 'rise, to thank you for all your kind-'ness to me. I was to blame to be so 'loth to leave that sad place; for I am 'in Heaven here, to what I was there: 'and good people about me, too!—I 'have not had good people about me for 'a long, long time before; so that [with 'a half-smile] I had begun to wonder 'whither they were all gone.'

Her nurse and Mrs. Smith, who were present, took occasion to retire: and, when we were alone, 'You seem to be 'a person of humanity, Sir,' said she: 'you hinted, as I was leaving my prison, 'that you were not a stranger to my sad 'story. If you know it truly, you must 'know that I have been most barba-'rously treated; and have not deserved 'it at the man's hands by whom I have 'suffered.'

I told her, I knew enough to be convinced, that she had the merit of a saint, and the purity of an angel: and was proceeding, when she said, 'No flighty 'compliments! No undue attributes, 'Sir!'

I offered to plead for my sincerity; and mentioned the word politeness; and would have distinguished between that and flattery. 'Nothing can be polite,' said she, 'that is not just: whatever I 'may have had; I have now no vanity to 'gratify.'

I declaimed all intention of compliment: all I had said, and what I should say, was, and should be, the effect of sincere veneration. My unhappy friend's account of her had entitled her to that.

I then mentioned your grief, your penitence, your resolutions of making her all the amends that were possible now to be made her: and in the most earnest manner, manner, I asserted your innocence as to the last villainous outrage.

Her answer was to this effect—'It is 'painful to me to think of him. The 'amends you talk of, cannot be made. 'This last violence you speak of, is no- 'thing to what preceded it. That cannot be 'atoned for: nor palliated: this may: 'and I shall not be sorry to be convinc- 'ed, that he cannot be guilty of so very 'low a wickedness.——Yet, after his 'vile forgeries of hands—after his base- 'ness in imposing upon me the most in- 'famous persons as ladies of honour of 'his own family—what are the iniqui- 'ties he is not capable of?'

I would then have given her an account of the trial you stood with your friends: your own previous resolutions of marriage, had she honoured you with the requested four words: all your family's earnestness to have the honour of her alliance: and the application of your two cousins to Miss Howe, by general consent, for that young lady's interest with her: but, having just touched upon these topicks, she cut me short, saying, That was a cause before another tribunal: Miss Howe's letters to her were upon that subject; and she would write her thoughts to her as soon as she was able.

I then attempted more particularly to clear you of having any hand in the vile Sinclair's officious arrest; a point she had the generosity to wish you cleared of: and having mentioned the outrageous letter you had written to me on this occasion, she asked, if I had that letter about me?

I owned I had.

She wished to see it.

This puzzled me horribly: for you must needs think, that most of the free things, which, among us rakes, pass for wit and spirit, must be shocking stuff to the ears and eyes of persons of delicacy of that sex: and then such an air of levity runs through thy most furious letters; such a false bravery, endeavouring to carry off ludicrously the subjects that most affect thee; that those letters are generally the least fit to be seen, which ought to be most to thy credit.

Something like this I observed to her; and would fain have excused myself from shewing it: but she was so earnest, that I undertook to read some parts of it, resolving to omit the most exceptionable.

I know thou'lt curse me for that; but I thought it better to oblige her than to be suspected myself; and so not have it in my power to serve thee with her, when so good a foundation was laid for it; and when she knows as bad of thee as I can tell her.

Thou remembrest the contents, I suppose, of thy furious letter. Her remarks upon the different parts of it, which I read to her, were to the following effect:

Upon the two first lines, 'All undone! 'undone, by Jupiter! Zounds, Jack, what 'shall I do now! A curse upon all my plots 'and contrivances!'—thus she expressed herself:

'O how light, how unaffected with the 'sense of it's own crimes, is the heart 'that could dictate to the pen this liber- 'tine froth!'

The paragraph which mentions the vile arrest, affected her a good deal.

In the next I omitted thy curse upon thy relations, whom thou wert gallanting: and read on the seven subsequent paragraphs, down to thy execrable wife, which was too shocking to read to her. What I read produced the following reflections from her:

'The plots and contrivances which he 'curses, and the exultings of the wicked 'wretches on finding me out, shew me, 'that all his guilt was premeditated: 'nor doubt I, that his dreadful perju- 'ries, and inhuman arts, as he went 'along, were to pass for fine strategems 'for witty sport; and to demonstrate a 'superiority of inventive talents!—O 'my cruel, cruel brother! had it not 'been for thee, I had not been thrown 'upon so pernicious and so despicable a 'plotter!—But proceed, Sir; pray pro- 'ceed.'

At that part—'Canst thou, O fatal pre- 'sognicator! tell me where my punishment 'will end?'—she sighed: and when I came to that sentence—'Praying for my 'reformation, perhaps!'—Is that there? said she, sighing again, 'Wretched 'man!'—And shed a tear for thee.—By my faith, Lovelace, I believe she hates thee not! She has at least a concern, a generous concern, for thy future happiness!—What a noble creature hast thou injured!

She made a very severe reflection upon me, on reading these words—'Go 'your knees, for me, beg her pardon.'—'You had all your lessons, Sir,' said she, 'when you came to redeem me—'You was so condescending as to 'kneel: I thought it was the effect of 'your own humanity, and good-na- 'tured earnestness to serve me—Ex- 'cuse me, Sir, I knew not, that it was

'in consequence of a prescribed lesson.' This concerned me not a little; I could not bear to be thought such a wretched puppet, such a Joseph Leman, such a Tomlinson—I endeavoured therefore, with some warmth, to clear myself of this reflection; and she again asked my excuse: I was avowedly, she said, the friend of a man, whose friendship she had reason to be sorry to say, was no credit to any-body.—And desired me to proceed.

I did; but fared not much better afterwards: for on that passage where you suggest, 'that you always bore her friend and admirer,' this was her unanswerable remark: 'I find, Sir, by this expression, 'that he had always designs against me; 'and that you all along knew that he had: '—Would to Heaven, you had had 'the goodness to have contrived some 'way, that might not have endangered 'your own safety, to give me notice of 'his baseness, since you approved not of 'it!—But you gentlemen, I suppose, 'had rather see an innocent fellow-creature ruined, than be thought capable 'of an action, which, however generous, might be likely to loosen the 'bands of a wicked friendship!'

After this severe, but just reflection, I would have avoided reading the following, although I had unawares begun the sentence—(but she held me to it)—'What would I now give, had I permitted 'you to have been a successful advocate!'—And this was her remark upon it—'So, 'Sir, you see, if you had been the happy 'means of preventing the evils designed 'me, you would have had your friend's 'thanks for it, when he came to his consideration. This satisfaction, I am persuaded, every-one, in the long run, will enjoy, who has the virtue to withstand, or prevent, a wicked purpose. 'I was obliged, I see, to your kind 'wishes.—But it was a point of honour 'with you to keep his secret; the more 'indispensable with you, perhaps, the 'viler the secret. Yet permit me to 'wish, Mr. Belford, that you were capable of relishing the pleasures that 'arise to a benevolent mind from VIRTUOUS friendship!—None other is 'worthy of the sacred name. You seem 'an humane man: I hope, for your own 'sake, you will one day experience the 'difference: and, when you do, think 'of Miss Howe and Clarissa Harlowe, '(I find you know much of my sad 'story) who were the happiest creatures 'on earth in each other's friendship till 'this friend of yours——' And there she stopt, and turned from me.

Where thou callest thyself a villainous plotter; 'To take crime to himself,' said she, 'without shame. O what a hardened wretch is this man!'

On that passage, where thou savest—'Let me know how she has been treated: if 'roughly, woe be to the guilty!'—this was her remark, with an air of indignation: 'What a man is your friend, Sir!—Is 'such a one as he to set himself up to 'punish the guilty!

'All the rough usage I could receive 'from them, was infinitely less——' And there she stopt a moment or two: then proceeding—'And who shall punish 'him? What an assuming wretch!—Nobody but himself is entitled to injure 'the innocent!—He is, I suppose on 'earth, to act the part, which the malignant fiend is supposed to act below '—Dealing out punishments, at his 'pleasure, to every inferior instrument 'of mischief!'

'What,' thought I, 'have I been 'doing! I shall have this savage fellow 'think I have been playing him booty, 'in reading part of his letter to this sagacious lady!'—Yet, if thou art angry, it can only, in reason, be at thyself; for who would think I might not communicate to her some of the least exceptionable parts of a letter (as a proof of thy sincerity in exculpating thyself from a criminal charge) which thou wrotest to thy friend, to convince him of thy innocence? But a bad heart, and a bad cause, are confounded things: and so let us put it to it's proper account.

I passed over thy charge to me, to curse them by the hour; and thy names of dragon and serpents, though so applicable; since, had I read them, thou must have been supposed to know from the first, what creatures they were; vile fellow as thou wert, for bringing so much purity among them! And I closed with thy own concluding paragraph—'A line!—A line!—A kingdom for a line!' '&c.' However, telling her (since she saw that I omitted some sentences) that there were further vehemences in it; but as they were better fitted to shew to me the sincerity of the writer, than for so delicate an ear as hers to hear, I chose to pass them over.

'You have re'd enough,' said she—'He is a wicked, wicked man!—I see he 'intended to have me in his power at 'any rate; and I have no doubt of 'what his purposes were, by what his 'actions

'actions have been. You know his 'vile Tomlinson, I suppose—You know '—But what signifies talking?—Never 'was there such a premeditated false 'heart in man!'—['Nothing can be truer!" thought I.]—'What has he not vowed! '—What has he not invented!—And 'all for what?—Only, to ruin a poor 'young creature, whom he ought to 'have protected; and whom he had 'first deprived of all other protection?'

She arose and turned from me, her handkerchief at her eyes: and, after a pause, came towards me again—'I 'hope,' said she, 'I talk to a man who 'has a better heart: and I thank you, 'Sir, for all your kind, though ineffectual, pleas in my favour formerly, 'whether the motives for them were 'compassion, or principle, or both. 'That they were ineffectual, might 'very probably be owing to your want 'of earnestness; and that, as you might 'think, to my want of merit. I might 'not, in your eye, deserve to be saved! '—I might appear to you a giddy 'creature, who had run away from her 'true and natural friends; and who, 'therefore, ought to take the conse'quence of the lot she had drawn.'

I was afraid, for thy sake, to let her know how very earnest I had been: but assured her that I had been her zealous friend; and that my motives were founded upon a merit, that I believed, was never equalled: that, however indefensible Mr. Lovelace was, he had always done justice to her virtue: that to a full conviction of her untainted honour it was owing, that he so earnestly desired to call so inestimable a jewel his—And was proceeding, when she again cut me short.

'Enough, and too much, of this sub'ject, Sir!—If he will never more let 'me behold his face, that is all I have 'now to ask of him.—Indeed, indeed,' clasping her hands, 'I never will, if I 'can, by any means not criminally des'perate, avoid it.'

What could I say for thee?—There was no room, however, at that time, to touch this string again, for fear of bringing upon myself a prohibition, not only of the subject, but of ever attending her again.

I gave some distant intimations of money-matters. I should have told thee, that, when I read to her that passage, where thou biddest me force what sums upon her I could get her to take—she repeated, 'No, no, no, no!' several times with great quickness; and I durst no more than just intimate it again—and that so darkly, as left her room to seem not to understand me.

Indeed I know not the person, man or woman, I should be so much afraid of disobliging, or incurring a censure from, as from her. She has so much true dignity in her manner, without pride or arrogance, (which, in those who have either, one is tempted to mortify) such a piercing eye, yet softened so sweetly with rays of benignity, that she commands all one's reverence.

Methinks I have a kind of holy love for this angel of a woman; and it is matter of astonishment to me, that thou couldst converse with her a quarter of an hour together, and hold thy devilish purposes.

Guarded as she was by piety, prudence, virtue, dignity, family, fortune, and a purity of heart, that never woman before her boasted, what a real devil must he be, (yet I doubt I shall make thee proud!) who could resolve to break through so many fences!

For my own part, I am more and more sensible, that I ought not to have contented myself with representing against, and expostulating with thee upon, thy base intentions: and indeed I had it in my head more than once, to try to do something for her. But, wretch that I was! I was witheld by notions of false honour, as she justly reproached me, because of thy own voluntary communications to me of thy purposes: and then, as she was brought into such a cursed house, and was so watched by thyself, as well as by thy infernal agents, I thought (knowing my man!) that I should only accelerate the intended mischiefs.—Moreover, finding thee so much over-awed by her virtue, that thou hadst not, at thy first carrying her thither, the courage to attempt her; and that she had, more than once, without knowing thy base views, obliged thee to abandon them, and to resolve to do her justice, and thyself honour; I hardly doubted, that her merit would be triumphant at last.

It is my opinion, (if thou holdest thy purposes to marry) that thou canst not do better, than to procure thy real aunts, and thy real cousins, to pay her a visit, and to be thy advocates: but, if they decline personal visits, letters from them, and from my Lord M. supported by Miss Howe's interest, may, perhaps, effect something in thy favour.

But these are only my hopes, founded on on what I ask for thy sake. The lady, I really think, would chuse death, rather than thee: and the two women are of opinion though they know not half of what she has suffered, that her heart is actually broken.

At taking my leave, I tendered my best services to her, and besought her to permit me frequently to enquire after her health.

She made me no answer, but by bowing her head.

LETTER LXXII.

MR. BELFORD, TO ROBERT LOVELACE, ESQ.

WEDNESDAY, JULY 19.

THIS morning I took chair to Smith's; and, being told that the lady had a very bad night, but was up, I sent for her worthy apothecary; who, on his coming to me, approving of my proposal of calling in Dr. H. I bid the women acquaint her with the designed visit.

It seems, she was at first displeased; yet withdrew her objection: but, after a pause, asked them, What she should do? She had effects of value, some of which she intended, as soon as she could, to turn into money; but, till then, had not a single guinea to give the doctor for his fee.

Mrs. Lovick said, She had five guineas by her: they were at her service.

She would accept of three, she said, if she would take that (pulling a diamond-ring from her finger) till she repaid her; but on no other terms.

Having been told, I was below with Mr. Goddard, she desired to speak one word with me, before she saw the doctor.

She was sitting in an elbow-chair, leaning her head on a pillow; Mrs. Smith and the widow on each side her chair; her nurse, with a phial of hartshorn, behind her; in her own hand, her salts.

Raising her head at my entrance, she enquired, If the doctor knew Mr. Lovelace.

I told her, 'No;' and that I believed you never saw him in your life.

Was the doctor my friend?

He was; and a very worthy and skilful man. I named him for his eminence in his profession: and Mr. Goddard, said, he knew not a better physician.

'I have but one condition to make before I see the gentleman; that he refuse not his fees from me. If I am poor, Sir, I am proud. I will not be under obligation. You may believe, Sir, I will not. I suffer this visit, because I would not appear ungrateful to the few friends I have left, nor obstinate to such of my relations, as may some time hence, for their private satisfaction, enquire after my behaviour in my sick hours. So, Sir, you know the condition. And don't let me be vexed. I am very ill! and cannot debate the matter.'

Seeing her so determined, I told her, If it must be so, it should.

'Then, Sir, the gentleman may come. But I shall not be able to answer many questions.—Nurse, you can tell him, at the window there, what a night I have had, and how I have been for two days past. And Mr. Goddard, if he be here, can let him know what I have taken.—Pray let me be as little questioned, as possible.'

The doctor paid his respects to her, with the gentlemanly address for which he is noted: and she cast up her sweet eyes to him, with that benignity which accompanies her every graceful look.

I would have retired; but she forbid it.

He took her hand, the lily not of so beautiful a white: 'Indeed, Madam, you are very low,' said he: 'but give me leave to say, that you can do more for yourself, than all the faculty can do for you.'

He then withdrew to the window. And, after a short conference with the woman, he turned to me, and to Mr. Goddard, at the other window: 'We can do nothing here,' speaking low, 'but by cordials and nourishment. What friends has the lady? She seems to be a person of condition; and, ill as she is, a very fine woman.—A single lady, I presume?'

I whisperingly told him she was. That there were extraordinary circumstances in her case; as I would have apprized him, had I met with him yesterday: that her friends were very cruel to her; but that she could not hear them named without reproaching herself, though they were much more to blame than she.

'I knew I was right,' said the doctor. 'A love-case, Mr. Goddard!—A love-case, Mr. Belford!—There is one person in the world, who can do her more service than all the faculty.'

Mr. Goddard said, He had apprehended heeded her diſorder was in her mind; and had treated her accordingly: and then told the doctor what he had done: which he approving of, again taking her charming hand, ſaid, 'My good 'young lady, you will require very little of our aſſiſtance. You muſt, in a 'great meaſure, be your own doctreſs. 'Come, dear Madam, [Forgive me the 'familiar tenderneſs; your aſpect commands love, as well as reverence; and 'a father of children, ſome of them 'older than yourſelf, may be excuſed 'for his familiar addreſs] cheer up your 'ſpirits. Reſolve to do all in your pow'er to be well; and you'll ſoon grow 'better.'

'You are very kind, Sir,' ſaid ſhe. 'I will take whatever you direct. My 'ſpirits have been hurried. I ſhall be 'better, I believe, before I am worſe. '—The care of my good friends here,' looking at the women, 'ſhall not meet 'with an ungrateful return.'

The doctor wrote. He would fain have declined his fee. As her malady, he ſaid, was rather to be relieved by the ſoothings of a friend, than by the preſcriptions of a phyſician, he ſhould think himſelf greatly honoured to be admitted rather to adviſe her in the one character, than to preſcribe to her in the other.

She anſwered, That ſhe ſhould be always glad to ſee ſo humane a man: that his viſits would keep her in charity with the ſex: but that, were ſhe to forget that he was her phyſician, ſhe might be apt to abate of the confidence in his ſkill, which might be neceſſary to effect the amendment that was the end of his viſits.

And when he urged her ſtill further, which he did in a very polite manner, and as paſſing by the door two or three times a day, ſhe ſaid, She ſhould always have pleaſure in conſidering him in the kind light he offered himſelf to her; that that might be very generous in one perſon to offer, which would be as ungenerous in another to accept: that indeed ſhe was not at preſent in high circumſtance; and he ſaw by the tender, (which he muſt accept of) that ſhe had greater reſpect to her own convenience, than to his merit, or than to the pleaſure ſhe ſhould take in his viſits.

We all withdrew together; and the doctor and Mr. Goddard having a great curioſity to know ſomething more of her ſtory, at the motion of the latter we went into a neighbouring coffee-houſe, and I gave them, in confidence, a brief relation of it; making all as light for you as I could; and yet you'll ſuppoſe, that, in order to do but common juſtice to the lady's character, heavy muſt be that light.

THREE O'CLOCK, AFTERNOON.

I JUST now called again at Smith's; and am told ſhe is ſomewhat better; which ſhe attributed to the ſoothing of her doctor. She expreſſed herſelf highly pleaſed with both gentlemen; and ſaid, that their behaviour to her was perfectly paternal.

Paternal, poor lady!—Never having been, till very lately, from under her parent's wings, and now abandoned by all her friends, ſhe is for finding out ſomething paternal and maternal in every one, (the latter qualities in Mrs. Lovick and Mrs. Smith) to ſupply to herſelf the father and mother her dutiful heart pants after.

Mrs. Smith told me, that, after we were gone, ſhe gave the keys of her trunks and drawers to her and the widow Lovick, and deſired them to take an inventory of them; which they did, in her preſence.

They alſo informed me, that ſhe had requeſted them to find her a purchaſer for two rich dreſſed ſuits; one never worn, the other not above once or twice.

This ſhocked me exceedingly—Perhaps it may thee a little!!!—Her reaſon for ſo doing, ſhe told them, was, That ſhe ſhould never live to wear them: that her ſiſter, and other relations, were above wearing them: that her mother would not endure in her ſight anything that was hers: that ſhe wanted the money: that ſhe would not be obliged to any-body, when ſhe had effects by her for which ſhe had no occaſion. 'And yet,' ſaid ſhe, 'I expect 'not that they will fetch a price an'ſwerable to their value.'

They were both very much concerned, as they owned; and aſked my advice upon it: and the richneſs of her apparel having given them a ſtill higher notion of her rank than they had before, they ſuppoſed ſhe muſt be of quality: and again wanted to know her ſtory.

I told them, That ſhe was indeed a woman of family and fortune: I ſtill gave them room to ſuppoſe her married: but left it to her to tell them all in her own time and manner: all I would would ſay, was, That ſhe had been very vilely treated; deſerved it not; and was all innocence and purity.

You may ſuppoſe, that they both expreſſed their aſtoniſhment, that there could be a man in the world, who could ill-treat ſo fine a creature.

As to diſpoſing of the two ſuits of apparel, I told Mrs. Smith, that ſhe ſhould pretend, that, upon enquiry, ſhe had found a friend who would purchaſe the richeſt of them; but (that ſhe might not miſtruſt) would ſtand upon a good bargain. And having twenty guineas about me, I left them with her, in part of payment; and bid her pretend to get her to part with it for as little more as ſhe could induce her to take.

I am ſetting out for Edgware with poor Belton—More of whom in my next. I ſhall return to-morrow; and leave this in readineſs for your meſſenger, if he call in my abſence. Adieu.

LETTER LXXIII.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

[IN ANSWER TO LETTER LXXI.]

M. HALL, WEDN. NIGHT, JULY 19.

YOU might well apprehend, that I ſhould think you were playing me booty in communicating my letter to the lady.

You aſk, Who would think you might not read to her the leaſt exceptionable part of a letter written in my own defence?—I'll tell you who—The man, who in the ſame letter that he aſks this queſtion, tells the friend whom he expoſes to her reſentment, That there is ſuch an air of levity runs through his moſt ſerious letters, that thoſe of his are leaſt fit to be ſeen, which ought to be moſt to his credit: and now what thinkeſt thou of thy ſelf-condemned folly? Be, however, I charge thee, more circumſpect for the future, that ſo this clumſy error may ſtand ſingly by itſelf.

'It is painful to her to think of me! 'Libertine froth! So pernicious and ſo 'deſpicable a plotter! A man whoſe 'friendſhip is no credit to any-body! 'Hardened wretch! The devil's coun'terpart! A wicked, wicked man!—But did ſhe, could ſhe, dared ſhe, to ſay or imply all this?—And ſay it to a man whom ſhe praiſes for humanity, and prefers to myſelf for that virtue; when all the humanity he ſhews, and ſhe knows it too, is by my direction—So robs me of the credit of my own works; admirably entitled, all this ſhews her, to thy refinement upon the words reſentment and revenge. But thou wert always aiming and blundering at ſomething thou never couldſt make out.

The praiſe thou giveſt to her ingenuouſneſs, is another of thy peculiars. I think not as thou doſt, of her tell-tale recapitulations and exclamations:—what end can they anſwer?—Only that thou haſt an holy love for her; [The devil fetch thee for thy oddity!] or it is extremely provoking to ſuppoſe one ſees ſuch a charming creature ſtand upright before a libertine, and talk of the ſin againſt her, that cannot be forgiven!—I wiſh at my heart, that theſe chaſte ladies would have a little modeſty in their anger!—It would ſound very ſtrange, if I Robert Lovelace ſhould pretend to have more true delicacy, in a point that requires the utmoſt, than Miſs Clariſſa Harlowe.

I think I will put it into the head of her nurſe Norton, and her Miſs Howe, by ſome one of my agents, to chide the dear novice for her proclamations.

But to be ſerious: let me tell thee, that, ſevere as ſhe is, and ſaucy, in aſking ſo contemptuouſly, 'What a man 'is your friend, Sir, to ſet himſelf to 'puniſh guilty people!' I will never forgive the curſed woman, who could commit this laſt horrid violence on ſo excellent a creature.

The barbarous inſults of the two nymphs, in their viſits to her; the choice of the moſt execrable den that could be found out, in order, no doubt, to induce her to go back to theirs; and the ſtill more execrable attempt, to propoſe to her a man who would pay the debt; a ſnare, I make no queſtion, laid for her deſpairing and reſenting heart by that deviliſh Sally, (thinking her, no doubt, a woman) in order to ruin her with me; and to provoke me, in a fury, to give her up to their remorſeleſs cruelty; are outrages, that, to expreſs myſelf in her ſtyle, I never can, never will, forgive.

But as to thy opinion, and the two women's at Smith's, that her heart is broken; that is the true women's language: I wonder how thou cameſt into it: thou who haſt ſeen and heard of ſo many female deaths and revivals.

I'll tell thee what makes againſt this notion of theirs.

Her time of life, and charming conſtitution: the good ſhe ever delighted to do, and fancied ſhe was born to do; and and which she may still continue to do, to as high a degree as ever; nay, higher, since I am no sordid varlet, thou knowest: her religious turn; a turn that will always teach her to bear inevitable evils with patience: the contemplation upon her last noble triumph over me, and over the whole crew; and upon her succeeding escape from us all: her will unviolated; and the inward pride of having not deserved the treatment she has met with.

How is it possible to imagine, that a woman, who has all these consolations to reflect upon, will die of a broken heart?

On the contrary, I make no doubt, but that, as she recovers from the dejection into which this last scurvy villainy (which none but wretches of her own sex could have been guilty of) has thrown her, returning love will re-enter her time pacified mind: her thoughts will then turn once more on the conjugal pivot: of course she will have livelier notions in her head; and these will make her perform all her circumvolutions with ease and pleasure; though not with so high a degree of either, as if the dear proud rogue could have exalted herself above the rest of her sex, as she turned round.

Thou askest, on reciting the bitter invectives, that the lady made against thy poor friend, (standing before her, I suppose, with thy fingers in thy mouth) What couldst thou say FOR me?

Have I not, in my former letters, suggested an hundred things, which a friend, in earnest to vindicate or excuse a friend, might say, on such an occasion?

But now to current topicks, and the present state of matters here.—It is true, as my servant told thee, that Miss Howe had engaged, before this cursed woman's officiousness, to use her interest with her friend in my behalf: and yet she told my cousins, in the visit they made her, that it was her opinion, that she would never forgive me. I send to thee inclosed copies of all that passed on this occasion between my cousins Montague, Miss Howe, myself, Lady Betty, Lady Sarah, and Lord M.

I long to know what Miss Howe wrote to her friend, in order to induce her to marry the despicable plotter; the man whose friendship is no credit to any-body; the wicked, wicked man. Thou hadst the two letters in thy hand. Had they been in mine, the seal would have yielded to the touch of my warm finger; [Perhaps without the help of the post-office bullet] and the folds, as other plications have done, opened of themselves to oblige my curiosity. A wicked omission, Jack, not to contrive to send them down to me, by man and horse! It might have passed, that the messenger who brought the second letter, took them both back. I could have returned them by another, when copied, as from Miss Howe, and nobody but myself and thee the wiser.

That's a charming girl! Her spirit, her delightful spirit!—Not to be married to it—How I wish to get that lively bird into my cage! How would I make her flutter and fly about!—Till she left a feather upon every wire!

Had I begun there, I am confident, as I have heretofore said, that I should not have had half the difficulty with her, as I have had with her charming friend. For these passionate girls have high pulses, and a clever fellow may make what sport he pleases with their unevennesses—Now too high, now too low, you need only to provoke and appease them by turns; to bear with them, and forbear; to teaze, and ask pardon; and sometimes to give yourself the merit of a sufferer from them; then catching them in the moment of concession, conscious of their ill usage of you, they are all your own.

But these sedate contemplative girls, never out of temper but with reason; when that reason is given them, hardly ever pardon, or afford you another opportunity to offend.

It was in part the apprehension that this would be so with my dear Miss Harlowe, that made me carry her to a place where I believed she would be unable to escape me, although I were not to succeed in my first attempts. Else widow Sorl ngs's would have been as well for me, as widow Sinclair's. For early I saw, that there was no credulity in her to graft upon: no pretending to whine myself into her confidence. She was proof against amorous persuasion. She had reason in her love. Her penetration and good sense made her hate all compliments that had not truth and nature in them. What could I have done with her in any other place? And yet how long, even there, was I kept in awe, in spite of natural incitement, and unnatural instigations, (as I now think them) by the mere force of that native dignity, and obvious purity of mind and manners, which fill every one with reverence, if not with holy love, as thou calleſt it, the moment he ſees her! —Elſe thinkeſt thou not, it was eaſy for me to be a fine gentleman, and a delicate lover, or, at leaſt, a ſpecious and flattering one?

Lady Sarah and Lady Betty, finding the treaty, upon the ſucceſs of which they have ſet their fooliſh hearts, likely to run into length, are about departing to their own ſeats; having taken from me the beſt ſecurity the nature of the caſe will admit of, that is to ſay, my word, to marry the lady, if ſhe will have me.

'And after all,' (methinks thou aſkeſt) 'art thou ſtill reſolved to repair, 'if reparation be put into thy power?'

Why, Jack, I muſt needs own, that my heart has now-and-then ſome retrograde motions, upon thinking ſeriouſly of the irrevocable ceremony. We do not eaſily give up the deſire of our hearts, and what we imagine eſſential to our happineſs, let the expectation or hope of compaſſing it be ever ſo unreaſonable or abſurd in the opinion of others. Recurrings there will be; hankerings, that will, on every but remotely favourable incident, (however before diſcouraged and beaten back by ill ſucceſs) pop up, and abate the ſatisfaction we ſhould otherwiſe take in contrariant overtures.

'Tis ungentlemanly, Jack, man to man, to lye.——But matrimony I do not heartily love—although with a CLARISSA—Yet I am in earneſt to marry her.

But I am often thinking, that if now this dear creature, ſuffering time, and my penitence, my relations prayers, and Miſs Howe's mediation, to ſoften her reſentments, [Her revenge thou haſt prettily diſtinguiſhed away] and to recal repulſed inclination, ſhould conſent to meet me at the altar—How vain will ſhe then make all thy eloquent periods of execration!—How many charming interjections of her own will ſhe ſpoil! And what a couple of old patriarchs ſhall we become, going on in the mill-horſe round; getting ſons and daughters; providing nurſes for them firſt, governors and governeſſes next; teaching them leſſons their father never practiſed, nor which their mother, as her parents will ſay, was much the better for! And at laſt, perhaps, when life ſhall be turned into the dully ſober ſtillneſs, and I become deſirous to forget all my paſt rogueries, what comfortable reflections will it afford, to find them all revived, with equal, or probably greater trouble and expence, in the perſons and manners of ſo many young Lovelaces of the boys; and to have the girls run away with varlets perhaps not half ſo ingenious as myſelf; clumſy fellows, as it might happen, who could not afford the baggages one excuſe for their weakneſs, beſides thoſe diſgraceful ones of ſex and nature! —O Belford! who can bear to think of theſe things!——Who, at my time of life eſpecially, and with ſuch a bias for miſchief!

Of this I am abſolutely convinced, that if a man ever intends to marry, and to enjoy in peace his own reflections; and not be afraid of retribution, or of the conſequences of his own example; he ſhould never be a rake.

This looks like conſcience; don't it, Belford?

But, being in earneſt ſtill, as I have ſaid, all I have to do in my preſent uncertainty, is, to brighten up my faculties, by filing off the ruſt they have contracted by the town ſmoke, a long impriſonment in my cloſe attendance to ſo little purpoſe on my fair perverſe; and to brace up, if I can, the relaxed fibres of my mind, which have been twitched and convulſed like the nerves of ſome tottering paralytick, by means of the tumults ſhe has excited in it; that ſo I may be able to preſent to her a huſband as worthy as I can be of her acceptance; or, if ſhe reject me, be in a capacity to reſume my uſual gaiety of heart, and ſhew others of the miſleading ſex, that I am not diſcouraged by the difficulties I have met with from this ſweet individual of it, from endeavouring to make myſelf as acceptable to them as before.

In this latter caſe, one tour to France and Italy, I dare ſay, will do the buſineſs. Miſs Harlowe will by that time have forgotten all ſhe has ſuffered from her ungrateful Lovelace: though it will be impoſſible that her Lovelace ſhould ever forget a woman, whoſe equal he deſpairs to meet with, were he to travel from one end of the world to the other.

If thou continueſt paying off the heavy debts my long letters, for ſo many weeks together, have made thee groan under, I will endeavour to reſtrain myſelf in the deſires I have (importunate as they are) of going to town, to throw myſelf at the feet of my ſoul's beloved. Policy, and honeſty, both join to ſtrengthen the reſtraint my own promiſe and thy engagement have laid me under on this head. I would not afreſh provoke:

on

on the contrary, would give time for her reſentments to ſubſide, that ſo all that follows may be her own act and deed.

HICKMAN [I have a mortal averſion to that fellow!] has, by a line which I have juſt now received, requeſted an interview with me on Friday at Mr. Dormer's, as at a common friend's. Does the buſineſs he wants to meet upon, require that it ſhould be at a common friend's?—A challenge implied: is it not, Belford?—I ſhall not be civil to him, I doubt. He has been an intermeddler!—Then I envy him on Miſs Howe's account: for if I have a right notion of this Hickman, it is impoſſible that that virago can ever love him.

Every one knows, that the mother (ſaucy as the daughter ſometimes is) crams him down her throat. Her mother is one of the moſt violent-ſpirited women in England. Her late huſband could not ſtand in the matrimonial contention of Who ſhould? but tipt off the perch in it, neither knowing how to yield, nor how to conquer.

A charming encouragement for a man of intrigue, when he has reaſon to believe, that the woman he has a view upon has no love for her huſband! What good principles muſt that wife have, who is kept in againſt temptation by a ſenſe of her duty, and plighted faith, where affection has no hold of her!

Pr'ythee let's know, very particularly, how it fares with poor Belton.—'Tis an honeſt fellow.—Something more than his Thomaſine ſeems to ſtick with him.

Thou haſt not been preaching to him conſcience and reformation: haſt thou?—Thou ſhouldſt not take liberties with him of this ſort, unleſs thou thoughteſt him abſolutely irrecoverable. A man in ill health, and cropſick, cannot play with theſe ſolemn things, as thou canſt, and be neither better nor worſe for them.—Repentance, Jack, I have a notion, ſhould be ſet about while a man is in health and ſpirits. What's a man fit for [Not to begin a new work, ſurely!] when he is not himſelf, nor maſter of his faculties?—Hence, as I apprehend, it is, that a death-bed repentance is ſuppoſed to be ſuch a precarious and ineffectual thing.

As to myſelf, I hope, I have a great deal of time before me; ſince I intend one day to be a reformed man. I have very ſerious reflections now-and-then. Yet am I half afraid of the truth of what my charmer once told me, that a man cannot repent when he will.—Not to hold it, I ſuppoſe ſhe meant! By fits and ſtarts I have repented a thouſand times.

Caſting my eye over the two preceding paragraphs, I fancy there is ſomething like contradiction in them. But I will not reconſider them. The ſubject is a very ſerious one. I don't at preſent quite underſtand it. But now for one more airy.

Tourville, Mowbray, and myſelf, paſs away our time as pleaſantly as poſſibly we can without thee. I wiſh we don't add to Lord M.'s gouty days by the joy we give him.

This is one advantage, as I believe I have elſewhere obſerved, that we male-delinquents in love-matters have of the other ſex:—for while they, poor things! ſit ſighing in holes and corners, or run to woods and groves to bemoan themſelves on their baffled hopes, we can rant and roar, hunt and hawk; and, by new loves, baniſh from our hearts all remembrance of the old ones.

Merrily, however, as we paſs our time, my reflexions upon the injuries done to this noble creature bring a qualm upon my heart very often. But I know ſhe will permit me to make her amends, after ſhe has plagued me heartily; and that's my conſolation.

An honeſt fellow ſtill!—Clap thy wings, and crow, Jack!

LETTER LXXIV.

MISS HOWE, TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

THURSDAY MORN. JULY 20.

WHAT, my deareſt creature, have been your ſufferings!—What muſt have been your anguiſh on ſo diſgraceful an inſult, committed in the open ſtreets, and in the broad day!

No end, I think, of the undeſerved calamities of a dear ſoul, who has been ſo unhappily driven and betrayed into the hands of a vile libertine!—How was I ſhocked at the receiving of your letter written by another hand, and only dictated by you!—You muſt be very ill. Nor is it to be wondered at. But I hope it is rather from hurry, and ſurprize, and lowneſs, which may be overcome, than from a grief given way to, which may be attended with effects I cannot bear to think of.

But whatever you do, my dear, you muſt not deſpond! Indeed you muſt not deſpond!

deſpond! Hitherto you have been in no fault: but deſpair would be all your own: and the worſt fault you can be guilty of.

I cannot bear to look upon another hand inſtead of yours. My dear creature, ſend me a few lines, though ever ſo few, in your own hand, if poſſible.—For they will revive my heart; eſpecially, if they can acquaint me of your amended health.

I expect your anſwer to my letter of the 13th. We all expect it with impatience.

His relations are perſons of ſo much honour—They are ſo very earneſt to rank you among them—The wretch is ſo very penitent: every-one of his family ſays he is—Your own are ſo implacable—Your laſt diſtreſs, though the conſequence of his former villainy, yet neither brought on by his direction, nor with his knowledge; and ſo much reſented by him—That my mother is abſolutely of opinion, that you ſhould be his——Eſpecially if, yielding to my wiſhes, as expreſſed in my letter, and thoſe of all his friends, you would have complied, had it not been for this horrid arreſt.

I will incloſe the copy of the letter I wrote to Miſs Montague laſt Tueſday, on hearing that nobody knew what was become of you; and the anſwer to it under-written and ſigned by Lord M. Lady Sarah Sadleir, and Lady Betty Lawrance, as well as by the young ladies; and alſo by the wretch himſelf.

I own, that I like not the turn of what he has written to me; and before I will further intereſt myſelf in his favour, I have determined to inform myſelf, by a friend, from his own mouth, of his ſincerity, and whether his whole inclination be in his requeſt to me, excluſive of the wiſhes of his relations. Yet my heart riſes againſt him, on the ſuppoſition that there is the ſhadow of a reaſon for ſuch a queſtion, the woman Miſs Clariſſa Harlowe.—But I think, with my mother, that marriage is now the only means left to make your future life tolerably eaſy—happy, there is no ſaying.—His diſgraces, in that caſe, in the eye of the world itſelf, will be more than yours; and to thoſe who know you, glorious will be your triumph.

I am obliged to accompany my mother ſoon to the Iſle of Wight. My aunt Harman is in a declining way, and inſiſts upon ſeeing us both—And Mr. Hickman too, I think.

His ſiſter, of whom we had heard ſo much, with her lord, were brought t'other day to viſit us. She ſtrangely likes me, or ſays ſhe does.

I can't ſay, but that I think ſhe anſwers the excellent character we have heard of her.

It would be death to me to ſet out for the little iſland, and not ſee you firſt: and yet my mother (fond of exerting an authority that ſhe herſelf, by that exertion, often brings into queſtion) inſiſts, that my next viſit to you muſt be a congratulatory one, as Mrs. Lovelace.

When I know what will be the reſult of the queſtions to be put in my name to that wretch, and what is your mind on my letter of the 13th, I ſhall tell you more of mine.

The bearer promiſes to make ſo much diſpatch, as to attend you this very afternoon. May he return with good tidings to your ever-affectionate

ANNA HOWE!

LETTER LXXV.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

THURSDAY AFTERNOON.

YOU pain me, my deareſt Miſs Howe, by the ardour of your noble friendſhip. I will be very brief, becauſe I am not well; yet a good deal better than I was; and becauſe I am preparing an anſwer to yours of the 13th. But, beforehand, I muſt tell you, my dear, I will not have that man.—Don't be angry with me.—But indeed I won't. So let him be aſked no queſtions about me, I beſeech you.

I do not deſpond, my dear. I hope I may ſay, I will not deſpond. Is not my condition greatly mended? I thank Heaven it is!

I am no priſoner now in a vile houſe. I am not now in the power of that man's devices. I am not now obliged to hide myſelf in corners for fear of him. One of his intimate companions is become my warm friend, and engages to keep him from me, and that by his own conſent. I am among honeſt people. I have all my cloaths and effects reſtored to me. The wretch himſelf bears teſtimony to my honour.

Indeed I am very weak and ill: but I have an excellent phyſician, Dr. H. and as worthy an apothecary, Mr. Goddard.—Their treatment of me, my dear, is perfectly paternal!—My mind too, I can find, begins to ſtrengthen: and methinks at times, I find myſelf ſuperior to my calamities.

I ſhall have ſinkings ſometimes. I muſt must expect ſuch. And my father's malediction—But you will chide me for introducing that, now I am enumerating my comforts.

But I charge you, my dear, that you do not ſuffer my calamities to ſit too heavy upon your own mind. If you do, that will be to new-point ſome of thoſe arrows that have been blunted, and loſt their ſharpneſs.

If you would contribute to my happineſs, give way, my dear, to your own; and to the cheerful proſpects before you!

You will think very meanly of your Clariſſa, if you do not believe, that the greateſt pleaſure ſhe can receive in this life, is in your proſperity and welfare. Think not of me, my only friend, but as we were in times paſt: and ſuppoſe me gone a great, great way off!—A long journey!——How often are the deareſt of friends, at their country's call, thus parted—with a certainty for years—with a probability for ever!

Love me ſtill, however. But let it be with a weaning love. I am not what I was, when we were inſeparable lovers, as I may ſay—Our views muſt now be different.—Reſolve, my dear, to make a worthy man happy, becauſe a worthy man muſt make you ſo.—And ſo, my deareſt love, for the preſent adieu!—Adieu, my deareſt love!—But I ſhall ſoon write again, I hope!

LETTER LXXVI.

MR. BELFORD, TO ROBERT LOVELACE, ESQ.

[IN ANSWER TO LETTER LXXIII.]

THURSDAY, JULY 20.

I Re'd that part of your concluſion to poor Belton, where you enquire after him, and mention how merrily you, and the reſt, paſs your time at M. Hall. He fetched a deep ſigh: 'You are all 'very happy!' were his words.—I am ſorry they were his words; for, poor fellow, he is going very faſt. Change of air, he hopes, will mend him, joined to the cheerful company I have left him in. But nothing, I dare ſay, will.

A conſuming malady, and a conſuming miſtreſs, to an indulgent keeper, are dreadful things to ſtruggle with both together: violence muſt be uſed to get rid of the latter; and yet he has not ſpirit left him, to exert himſelf. His houſe is Thomaſine's houſe; not his. He has not been within his doors for a fortnight paſt. Vagabonding about from inn to inn; entering each for a bait only; and ſtaying two or three days without power to remove; and hardly knowing which to go to next. His malady is within him; and he cannot run away from it.

Her boys' (once he thought them his) are ſturdy enough to ſhoulder him in his own houſe as they paſs by him. Siding with the mother, they in a manner expel him; and in his abſence, riot away on the remnant of his broken fortunes. As to their mother (who was once ſo tender, ſo ſubmiſſive, ſo ſtudious to oblige, that we all pronounced him happy, and his courſe of life the eligible) ſhe is now ſo termagant, ſo inſolent, that he cannot contend with her, without infinite prejudice to his health. A broken-ſpirited defenſive, hardly a defenſive, therefore reduced to: and this to a heart, for ſo many years waging offenſive war, (not valuing whom the opponent) what a reduction!—Now comparing himſelf to the ſuperannuated lion in the fable, kicked in the jaws, and laid ſprawling, by the ſpurning heel of an ignoble aſs!

I have undertaken his cauſe. He has given me leave, yet not without reluctance, to put him into poſſeſſion of his own houſe, and to place in it for him his unhappy ſiſter, whom he has hitherto ſlighted, becauſe unhappy. It is hard, he told me, (and wept, poor fellow, when he ſaid it) that he cannot be permitted to die quietly in his own houſe!—The fruits of bleſſed keeping theſe!

Though but lately apprized of her infidelity, it now comes out to have been of ſo long continuance, that he has no room to believe the boys to be his: yet how fond did he uſe to be of them!

To what, Lovelace, ſhall we attribute the tenderneſs which a reputed father frequently ſhews to the children of another man?—What is that, I pray thee, which we call nature, and natural affections? And what has man to boaſt of as to ſagacity and penetration, when he is as eaſily brought to cover and rear, and even to love, and often to prefer, the product of another's guilt with his wife or miſtreſs, as a hen or gooſe the eggs, and even young, of others of their kind?

Nay, let me aſk, if inſtinct, as it is called, in the animal creation, does not enable them to diſtinguiſh their own, much more eaſily than we, with our boaſted reaſon and ſagacity, in this nice particular can do?

If ſome men, who have wives but of doubtful virtue, conſidered this matter duly, I believe their inordinate ardour after after gain would be a good deal cooled, when they could not be certain (though their mates could) for whose children they were elbowing, buſtling, griping, and perhaps cheating, thoſe with whom they have concerns, whether friends, neighbours, or more certain next-of-kin, by the mother's ſide however.

But I will not puſh this notion ſo far as it might be carried; becauſe, if propagated, it might be of unſocial or unnatural conſequence; ſince women of virtue would perhaps be more liable to ſuffer by the miſtruſts and caprices of bad-hearted and fooliſh-headed huſbands than thoſe who can ſcreen themſelves from detection by arts and hypocriſy, to which a woman of virtue cannot have recourſe. And yet, were this notion duly and generally conſidered, it might be attended with no bad effects; as good education, good inclinations, and eſtabliſhed virtue, would be the principally ſought-after qualities; and not money, when a man (not biaſſed by mere perſonal attractions) was looking round him for a partner in his fortunes, and for a mother of his future children, which are to be the heirs of his poſſeſſions, and to enjoy the fruits of his induſtry.

But to return to poor Belton.

If I have occaſion for your aſſiſtance, and that of your compeers, in reinſtating the poor fellow, I will give you notice. Mean time, I have juſt now been told, that Thomaſine declares ſhe will not ſtir; for, it ſeems, ſhe ſuſpects that meaſures will be fallen upon to make her quit. She is Mrs. Belton, ſhe ſays, and will prove her marriage.

If ſhe give herſelf theſe airs in his life-time, what would ſhe attempt to do after his death?

Her boys threaten any-body, who ſhall preſume to inſult their mother. Their father (as they call poor Belton) they ſpeak of as an unnatural one. And their probably true father is for ever there, hoſtilely there, paſſing for her couſin, as uſual: now her protecting couſin.

Hardly ever, I dare ſay, was there a keeper, that did not make a keepereſs; who laviſhed away on her kept-fellow, what ſhe obtained from the extravagant folly of him who kept her.

I will do without you, if I can. The caſe will be only, as I conceive, like that of the ancient Sarmatians, returning, after many years abſence, to their homes, their wives then in poſſeſſion of their ſlaves: ſo that they had to contend not only with thoſe wives, conſcious of their infidelity, and with their ſlaves, but with the children of thoſe ſlaves, grown up to manhood, reſolute to defend their mothers and their long manumitted fathers. But the noble Sarmatians, ſcorning to attack their ſlaves with equal weapons, only provided themſelves with the ſame ſort of whips, with which they uſed formerly to chaſtiſe them. And attacking them with them, the miſcreants fled before them—In memory of which, to this day, the device on the coin of Nov grod in Ruſſia, a city of the ancient Sarmatia, is a man on horſeback, with a whip in his hand.

The poor fellow takes it ill, that you did not preſs him more than you did, to be of your party at M. Hall. It is owing to Mowbray, he is ſure, that he had ſo very ſlight an invitation, from one whoſe invitations uſed to be ſo warm.

Mowbray's ſpeech to him, he ſays, he never will forgive: 'Why, Tom,' ſaid the brutal fellow, with a curſe, 'thou droopeſt like a pip or roup-'cloaking chicken. Thou ſhouldſt grow 'perter, or ſubmit to a ſolitary quaran-'tine, if thou wouldſt not infect the 'whole brood.'

For my own part, only that this poor fellow is in diſtreſs, as well in his affairs, as in his mind, or I ſhould be ſick of you all. Such is the reliſh I have of the converſation, and ſuch my admiration of the deportment and ſentiments, of this divine lady, that I would forego a month, even of thy company, to be admitted into hers but for one hour: and I am highly in conceit with myſelf, greatly as I uſed to value thine, for being able, ſpontaneouſly as I may ſay, to make this preference.

It is, after all, a deviliſh life we have lived. And to conſider how it all ends in a very few years—To ſee to what a ſtate of ill health this poor fellow is ſo ſoon reduced—And then to obſerve how every one of ye run away from the unhappy being, as rats from a falling houſe, is fine comfort to help a man to look back upon companions ill-choſen, and a life miſ-ſpent.

It will be your turns by-and-by, every man of ye, if the juſtice of your country interpoſe not.

Thou art the only rake we have herded with, if thou wilt not except myſelf, who haſt preſerved entire thy health and thy fortunes.

Mowbray indeed is indebted to a robuſt conſtitution, that he has not yet ſuffered

ſuffered in his health; but his eſtate is dwindling away year by year.

Three-fourths of Tourville's very conſiderable fortunes are already diſſipated; and the remaining fourth will probably ſoon go after the other three.

Poor Belton! we ſee how it is with him!—His only felicity is, that he will hardly live to want.

Thou art too proud, and too prudent, ever to be deſtitute; and, to do thee juſtice, haſt a ſpirit to aſſiſt ſuch of thy friends as may be reduced; and wilt, if thou ſhouldeſt then be living. But I think thou muſt, much ſooner than thou imagineſt, be called to thy account—knocked on the head perhaps by the friends of thoſe whom thou haſt injured; for if thou eſcapeſt this fate from the Harlowe family, thou wilt go on tempting danger and vengeance, till thou meeteſt with vengeance; and this, whether thou marrieſt, or not: for the nuptial life will not, I doubt, till age join with it, cure thee of that ſpirit for intrigue, which is continually running away with thee, in ſpite of thy better ſenſe, and tranſitory reſolutions.

Well, then, I will ſuppoſe thee laid down quietly among thy worthier anceſtors.

And now let me look forward to the ends of Tourville and Mowbray. [Belton will be crumbled into duſt before thee perhaps] ſuppoſing thy early exit has ſaved thee from gallows intervention.

Reduced, probably, by riotous waſte, to conſequential want, behold them refuged in ſome obſcure hole or garret; obliged to the careleſs care of ſome dirty old woman, whom nothing but her poverty prevails upon to attend to perform the laſt offices for men, who have made ſuch ſhocking ravage among the young ones.

Then how miſerably will they whine through ſqueaking organs; their big voices turned into puling pity-begging lamentations! Their now-offenſive paws, how helpleſs then!—Their now-erect necks then denying ſupport to their aching heads; thoſe globes of miſchief dropping upon their quaking ſhoulders. Then what wry faces will they make! their hearts, and their heads, reproaching each other!—Diſtended their parched mouths!—Sunk their unmuſcled cheeks!—Dropt their under-jaws!—Each grunting like the ſwine he had reſembled in his life! 'Oh! what a vile wretch have I been! 'Oh! that I had my life to come over 'again!'—Confeſſing to the poor old woman, who cannot ſhrive them! Imaginary ghoſts of deflowered virgins, and polluted matrons, ſitting before their glaſſy eyes! And old Satan, to their apprehenſions, grinning behind a looking-glaſs held up before them, to frighten them with the horror viſible in their own countenances!

For my own part, if I can get ſome good family to credit me with a ſiſter or a daughter, as I have now an encreaſed fortune, which will enable me to propoſe handſome ſettlements, I will deſert ye all; marry, and live a life of reaſon, rather than a life of a brute, for the time to come.

LETTER LXXVII.

MR. BELFORD, TO ROBERT LOVELACE, ESQ.

THURSDAY NIGHT.

I Was forced to take back my twenty guineas. How the women managed it, I can't tell; (I ſuppoſe they too readily found a purchaſer for the rich ſuit) but ſhe miſtruſted, that I was the advancer of the money; and would not let the cloaths go. But Mrs. Lovick has actually ſold, for fifteen guineas, ſome rich lace worth three times the ſum: out of which ſhe repaid her the money ſhe borrowed for fees to the doctor, in an illneſs occaſioned by the barbarity of the moſt ſavage of men. Thou knoweſt his name!

The doctor called on her in the morning it ſeems, and had a ſhort debate with her about fees. She inſiſted, that he ſhould take one every time he came, write or not write; miſtruſting, that he only gave verbal directions to Mrs. Lovick, or the nurſe, to avoid taking any.

He ſaid, that it would have been impoſſible for him, had he not been a phyſician, to forbear enquiries after the health and welfare of ſo excellent a perſon. He had not the thought of paying her a compliment in declining the offered fee: but he knew her caſe could not ſo ſuddenly vary, as to demand his daily viſits. She muſt permit him, therefore, to enquire of the women below after her health; and he muſt not think of coming up, if he were to be pecuniarily rewarded for the ſatisfaction he was ſo deſirous to give himſelf.

It ended in a compromiſe for a fee each other time: which ſhe unwillingly ſubmitted to; telling him, that though ſhe was at preſent deſolate and in diſgrace, yet her circumſtances were of right, high; and no expences could rise so, as to be scrupled, whether she lived or died. But she submitted, she added, to the compromise, in hopes to see him as often as he had opportunity; for she really looked upon him, and Mr. Goddard, from their kind and tender treatment of her, with a regard next to filial.

I hope thou wilt make thyself acquainted with this worthy doctor, when thou comest to town; and give him thy thanks, for putting her into conceit with the sex that thou hast given her so much reason to execrate. Farewel.

LETTER LXXVIII.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

M. HALL, FRIDAY, JULY 21.

JUST returned from an interview with this Hickman: a precise fop of a fellow, as starched as his ruffles.

Thou knowest I love him not, Jack; and whom we love not, we cannot allow a merit to! perhaps not the merit they should be granted. However, I am in earnest, when I say, that he seems to me to be so set, so prim, so affected, so mincing, yet so clouterly in his person, that I dare engage for thy opinion, if thou dost justice to him, and to thyself, that thou never beheldest such another, except in a pier-glass.

I'll tell thee how I played him off.

He came in his own chariot to Dormer's; and we took a turn in the garden, at his request. He was devilish ceremonious, and made a bushel of apologies for the freedom he was going to take: and, after half a hundred hums and haws, told me, that he came—that he came—to wait on me—at the request of dear Miss Howe, on the account—on the account—of Miss Harlowe.

'Well, Sir, speak on,' said I: 'but 'give me leave to say, that if your book 'be as long as your preface, it will take 'up a week to read it.'

This was pretty rough, thou'lt say: but there is nothing like baulking these formalists at first. When they are put out of their road, they are filled with doubts of themselves, and can never get into it again: so that an honest fellow, impertinently attacked, as I was, has all the game in his own hand quite through the conference.

He stroked his chin, and hardly knew what to say. At last, after parenthesis within parenthesis, apologizing for apologies, in imitation, I suppose, of Swift's Digression in praise of Digressions—'I 'presume—I presume, Sir, you were 'privy to the visit made to Miss Howe 'by the young ladies your cousins, in 'the name of Lord M. and Lady Sarah 'Sadleir, and Lady Betty Lawrance.'

'I was, Sir: and Miss Howe had a 'letter afterwards, signed by his lord-'ship and by those ladies, and under-'written by myself. Have you seen it, 'Sir?'

'I can't say but I have. It is the 'principal cause of this visit: for Miss 'Howe thinks your part of it is written 'with such an air of levity—Pardon 'me, Sir—that she knows not whether 'you are in earnest, or not, in your 'address to her for her interest with her 'friend.'

'Will Miss Howe permit me to ex-'plain myself in person to her, Mr. 'Hickman?'

'O Sir, by no means. Miss Howe, 'I am sure, would not give you that 'trouble.'

'I should not think it a trouble. I 'will most readily attend you, Sir, to 'Miss Howe, and satisfy her in all her 'scruples. Come, Sir, I will wait upon 'you now. You have a chariot. Are 'alone. We can talk as we ride.'

He hesitated, wriggled, winced, stroaked his ruffles, set his wig, and pulled his neckcloth, which was long enough for a bib—'I am not going directly back to 'Miss Howe, Sir. It will be as well, if 'you will be so good as to satisfy Miss 'Howe by me.'

'What is it she scruples, Mr. Hick-'man?'

'Why, Sir, Miss Howe observes, 'that in your part of the letter, you 'say—But let me see, Sir—I have a 'copy of what you wrote,' [Pulling it out]—'Will you give me leave, Sir? '—Thus you begin—"Dear Miss "Howe——"

'No offence, I hope, Mr. Hick-'man?'

'None in the least, Sir!—None at 'all, Sir!—Taking aim, as it were, to read.

'Do you use spectacles, Mr. Hick-'man?'

'Spectacles, Sir!'—His whole broad face lifted up at me—'Spectacles!—'What makes you ask me such a ques-'tion?—Such a young man as I use spec-'tacles, Sir!'

'They do in Spain, Mr. Hickman: 'young as well as old, to save their eyes. '—Have you ever read Prior's Alma, 'Mr. Hickman?'

'I have,

'I have, Sir!—Cuſtom is every-thing 'in nations, as well as with individu-'als: I know the meaning of your 'queſtion—But 'tis not the Engliſh cuſ-'tom.'

'Was you ever in Spain, Mr. Hick-'man?'

'No, Sir: I have been in Holland.'

'In Holland, Sir!—Never in France 'or Italy?'—I was reſolved to travel with him into the land of Puzzledom

'No, Sir; I cannot ſay I have, as 'yet.'

'That's a wonder, Sir, when on the 'continent!'

'I went on a particular affair: I was 'obliged to return ſoon.'

'Well, Sir; you was going to read—'Pray be pleaſed to proceed.'

Again he took aim, as if his eyes were older than the reſt of him; and read—'After what is written above, and 'ſigned by names and characters of ſuch un-'queſtionable honour——' 'To be ſure,' (taking off his eyes) 'nobody queſtions 'the honour of Lord M. nor that of the 'good ladies who ſigned the letter.'

'I hope, Mr. Hickman, nobody queſ-'tions mine neither?'

'If you pleaſe, Sir, I will read on—"I might have been excuſed ſigning a name, "almoſt as hateful to myſelf,"—'[You are 'pleaſed to ſay]—'as I KNOW it is to "YOU—"

'Well Mr. Hickman, I muſt inter-'rupt you at this place. In what I wrote 'to Miſs Howe, I diſtinguiſhed the word 'KNOW. I had a reaſon for it. Miſs 'Howe has been very free with my cha-'racter. I have never done her any 'harm. I take it very ill of her. And 'I hope, Sir, you come in her name to 'make excuſes for it.'

'Miſs Howe, Sir, is a very polite 'young lady. She is not accuſtomed to 'treat any man's character unbecom-'ingly.'

'Then I have the more reaſon to take 'it amiſs, Mr. Hickman.'

'Why, Sir, you know the friend-'ſhip—'

'No friendſhip ſhould warrant ſuch 'freedoms as Miſs Howe has taken with 'my character.'

(I believe he began to wiſh he had not come near me. He ſeemed quite diſ-concerted.)

'Have you not heard Miſs Howe treat 'my name with great—'

'Sir, I come not to offend or affront 'you: but you know what a love there 'is between Miſs Howe and Miſs Har-'lowe.—I doubt, Sir, you have not 'treated Miſs Harlowe, as ſo fine a young 'lady deſerved to be treated. And if 'love for her friend has made Miſs Howe 'take freedoms, as you call them, a 'mind not ungenerous, on ſuch an oc-'caſion, will rather be ſorry for having 'given the cauſe, than—'

'I know your conſequence, Sir!—'But I'd rather have this reproof from 'a lady, than from a gentleman. I have 'a great deſire to wait upon Miſs Howe. 'I am perſuaded we ſhould ſoon come 'to a good underſtanding. Generous 'minds are always of kin. I know we 'ſhould agree in every-thing.—Pray, 'Mr. Hickman, be ſo kind as to intro-'duce me to Miſs Howe.'

'Sir—I can ſignify your deſire, if you 'pleaſe, to Miſs Howe.'

'Do ſo.—Be pleaſed to read on, Mr. 'Hickman.'

He did very formally, as if I remem-bered not what I had written; and when he came to the paſſage about the halter, the parſon, and the hangman, reading it—'Why, Sir,' ſays he, 'does not this 'look like a jeſt?—Miſs Howe thinks it 'does. It is not in the lady's power, 'you know, Sir, to doom you to the 'gallows.'

'Then, if it were, Mr. Hickman, you 'think ſhe would?'

'You ſay here to Miſs Howe,' pro-ceeded he, 'that Miſs Harlowe is the 'moſt injured of the ſex. I know, from 'Miſs Howe, that ſhe highly reſents the 'injuries you own: inſomuch that 'Miſs Howe doubts that ſhe ſhall ne-'ver prevail upon her to overlook them: 'and as your family are all deſirous you 'ſhould repair her wrongs, and like-'wiſe deſire Miſs Howe's interpoſition 'with her friend; Miſs Howe fears, 'from this part of your letter, that you 'are too much in jeſt; and that your 'offer to do her juſtice is rather in com-'pliment to your friends entreaties, than 'proceeding from your own inclinati-'ons: and ſhe deſires to know your true 'ſentiments on this occaſion, before ſhe 'interpoſes further.

'Do you think, Mr. Hickman, that, 'if I am capable of deceiving my own 'relations, I have ſo much obligation 'to Miſs Howe, who has always treat-'ed me with great freedom, as to ac-'knowledge to her, what I don't to 'them?'

'Sir, I beg pardon: but Miſs Howe 'thinks, that, as you have written to 'her, ſhe may aſk you, by me, for an 'explanation of what you have written.'

'You ſee, Mr. Hickman, ſomething

'of me,—Do you think I am in jeſt, or 'in earneſt?'

'I ſee, Sir, you are a gay gentleman, 'of fine ſpirits, and all that—All I beg 'in Miſs Howe's name, is, to know if 'you really, and bona fide, join with 'your friends in deſiring her to uſe her 'intereſt to reconcile you to Miſs Har-'lowe?

'I ſhould be extremely glad to be re-'conciled to Miſs Harlowe; and ſhould 'owe great obligations to Miſs Howe, 'if ſhe could bring about ſo happy an 'event.'

'Well, Sir, and you have no objec-'tions to marriage, I preſume, as the 'condition of that reconciliation?'

'I never liked matrimony in my life. 'I muſt be plain with you, Mr. Hick-'man.'

'I am ſorry for it: I think it a very 'happy ſtate.'

'I hope you will find it ſo, Mr. 'Hickman.'

'I doubt not but I ſhall, Sir. And 'I dare ſay, ſo would you, if you were 'to have Miſs Harlowe.'

'If I could be happy in it with any-'body, it would be with Miſs Har-'lowe.'

'I am ſurprized, Sir!—Then, after 'all, you don't think of marrying Miſs 'Harlowe!—After the hard uſage—'

'What hard uſage, Mr. Hickman? I 'don't doubt but a lady of her niceneſs 'has repreſented what would appear 'trifles to any other, in a very ſtrong 'light.'

'If what I have had hinted to me, 'Sir—Excuſe me—has been offered to 'the lady, ſhe has more than trifles to 'complain of.'

'Let me know what you have heard, 'Mr. Hickman? I will very truly an-'ſwer to the accuſations.'

'Sir, you know beſt what you have 'done: you own the lady is the moſt in-'jured, as well as the moſt deſerving, of 'her ſex.'

'I do, Sir; and yet, I would be glad 'to know what you have heard; for on 'that, perhaps, depends my anſwer to 'the queſtions Miſs Howe puts to me by 'you.'

'Why, then, Sir, ſince you aſk it, 'you cannot be diſpleaſed if I anſwer 'you:—In the firſt place, Sir, you will 'acknowledge, I ſuppoſe, that you pro-'miſed Miſs Harlowe marriage, and 'all that?'

'Well, Sir, and I ſuppoſe what you 'have to charge me with is, that I was 'deſirous to have all that, without mar-'riage.'

'Cot-ſo, Sir, I know you are deemed 'to be a man of wit: but may I not aſk, 'if theſe things ſit not too light upon 'you?'

'When a thing is done, and cannot 'be helped, 'tis right to make the beſt 'of it. I wiſh the lady would think ſo 'too.'

'I think, Sir, ladies ſhould not be 'deceived. I think a promiſe to a lady 'ſhould be as binding as to any other 'perſon, at the leaſt.'

'I believe you think ſo, Mr. Hick-'man: and I believe you are a very 'honeſt good ſort of a man.'

'I would always keep my word, Sir, 'whether to man or woman.'

'You ſay well. And far be it from 'me to perſuade you to do otherwiſe. 'But what have you farther heard?'

(Thou wilt think, Jack, I muſt be very deſirous to know in what light my elected ſpouſe had repreſented things to Miſs Howe; and how far Miſs Howe had communicated them to Mr. Hick-man.)

'Sir, this is no part of my preſent 'buſineſs.'

'But, Mr. Hickman, 'tis part of 'mine. I hope you would not expect, 'that I ſhould anſwer your queſtions, at 'the ſame time that you refuſed to an-'ſwer mine. What, pray, have you far-'ther heard?'

'Why, then, Sir, if I muſt ſay, I am 'told, that Miſs Harlowe was carried to 'a very bad houſe.'

'Why, indeed, the people did not 'prove ſo good as they ſhould be.—What 'farther have you heard?'

'I have heard, Sir, that the lady had 'ſtrange advantages taken of her, very 'unfair ones: but what I cannot ſay.'

'And cannot you ſay?—Cannot you 'gueſs?—Then I'll tell you, Sir. Per-'haps ſome liberty was taken with her 'when ſhe was aſleep. Do you think no 'lady ever was taken at ſuch an advan-'tage?—You know, Mr. Hickman, that 'ladies are very ſhy of truſting them-'ſelves with the modeſteſt of our ſex, 'when they are diſpoſed to ſleep; and 'why ſo, if they did not expect that ad-'vantages would be taken of them at 'ſuch times?'

'But, Sir, had not the lady ſome-'thing given her to make her ſleep?'

'Aye, Mr. Hickman, that's the queſ-'tion: I want to know if the lady ſays 'ſhe had?'

'I have

'I have not seen all she has written; 'but by what I have heard, it is a very 'black affair—Excuse me, Sir.'

'I do excuse you, Mr. Hickman: 'but, supposing it were so, do you think 'a lady was never imposed upon by 'wine, or so?—Do you think the most 'cautious woman in the world might 'not be cheated by a stronger liquor for 'a smaller, when she was thirsty, after 'a fatigue in this very warm wea'her? 'And do you think, if she was thus 'thrown into a profound sleep, that she 'is the only lady that ever was taken at 'such advantage?'

'Even as you make it, Mr. Lovelace, 'this matter is not a light one. But I 'fear it is a great deal heavier than as 'you put it.'

'What reasons have you to fear this, 'Sir? What has the lady said? Pray 'let me know. I have reason to be so 'earnest.'

'Why, Sir, Miss Howe herself knows 'not the whole. The lady promises to 'give her all the particulars at a proper 'time, if she lives; but has said enough 'to make it out to be a very bad affair.'

'I am glad Miss Harlowe has not yet 'given all the particulars. And, since 'she has not, you may tell Miss Howe 'from me, that neither she nor any wo'man in the world can be more virtu'ous than Miss Harlowe is to this hour, 'as to her own mind. Tell her, that I 'hope she never will know the particu'lars; but that she has been unworthily 'used: tell her, that though I know 'not what she has said, yet I have such 'an opinion of her veracity, that I would 'blindly subscribe to the truth of every 'tittle of it, though it make me ever so 'black. Tell her, that I have but three 'things to blame her for; one, that she 'won't give me an opportunity of re'pairing her wrongs: the second, that 'she is so ready to acquaint every-body 'with what she has suffered, that it will 'put it out of my power to redress those 'wrongs, with any tolerable reputation 'to either of us. Will this, Mr. Hick'man, answer any part of the intention 'of this visit?'

'Why, Sir, this is talking like a man 'of honour, I own. But you say there 'is a third thing you blame the lady for '—May I ask what that is?'

'I don't know, Sir, whether I ought 'to tell it you, or not. Perhaps you 'won't believe it, if I do. But though 'the lady will tell the truth and nothing 'but the truth; yet, perhaps, she will 'not tell you the whole truth.'

'Pray, Sir—But it mayn't be proper '—Yet you give me great curiosity. 'Sure there is no misconduct in the lady. 'I hope there is not. I am sure, if Miss 'Howe did not believe her to be faultless in every particular, she would not 'interest herself so much in her favour 'as she does, dearly as she loves her.'

'I love Miss Harlowe too well, Mr. 'Hickman, to wish to lessen her in Miss 'Howe's opinion; especially as she is 'abandoned of every other friend. But, 'perhaps, it would hardly be credited, 'if I should tell you.'

'I should be very sorry, Sir, and so 'would Miss Howe, if this poor lady's 'conduct had laid her under obligation 'to you for this reserve.—You have so 'much the appearance of a gentleman, 'as well as are so much distinguished in 'your family and fortunes, that I hope 'you are incapable of loading such a 'young lady as this, in order to lighten 'yourself—Excuse me, Sir.'

'I do, I do, Mr. Hickman. You 'say you came not with any intention to 'affront me. I take freedom, and I 'give it. I should be very loth, I re'peat, to say any thing that may 'weaken Miss Harlowe in the good opi'nion of the only friend she thinks she 'has left.'

'It may not be proper,' said he, 'for 'me to know your third article against 'this unhappy lady: but I never heard 'of any-body, out of her own implaca'ble family, that had the least doubt of 'her honour. Mrs. Howe, indeed, once 'said, after a conference with one of her 'uncles, that she feared all was not 'right on her side.—But else, I never 'heard—'

'Oons, Sir!'—in a fierce tone, and with an erect mien, stopping short upon him, which made him start back—'Tis 'next to blasphemy to question this lady's 'honour! She is more pure than a ves'tal; for vestals have been often warm'ed by their own fires. No age, from 'the first to the present, ever produced, 'nor will the future, to the end of the 'world, I dare aver, ever produce, 'a young blooming lady, tried as she 'has been tried, who has stood all trials, 'as she has done.—Let me tell you, Sir, 'that you never saw, never knew, never 'heard of, such another woman as Miss 'Harlowe.'

'Sir, Sir, I beg your pardon. Far 'be it from me to question the lady. 'You have not heard me say a word, 'that could be so construed. I have the 'utmost honour for her. Miss Howe 'loves her, as she loves her own soul; 'and that she would not do, if she were

'not

'not sure she were as virtuous as her-'self.'

'As herself, Sir!—I have a high opi-'nion of Miss Howe, Sir—But, I dare 'say—'

'What, Sir, dare you say of Miss 'Howe!—I hope, Sir, you will not pre-'sume to say any-thing to the disparage-'ment of Miss Howe.'

'Presume, Mr. Hickman!—That is 'presuming language, let me tell you, Mr. 'Hickman!'

'The occasion for it, Mr. Lovelace, 'if designed, is presuming, if you please. '—I am not a man ready to take of-'fence, Sir—Especially where I am em-'ployed as a mediator. But no man 'breathing shall say disparaging things 'of Miss Howe, in my hearing, with-'out observation.'

'Well said, Mr. Hickman. I dislike 'not your spirit, on such a supposed oc-'casion. But what I was going to say 'is this, that there is not, in my opi-'nion, a woman in the world, who 'ought to compare herself with Miss 'Clarissa Harlowe till she has stood her 'trials, and has behaved under them, 'and after them, as she has done.—You 'see, Sir, I speak against myself. You 'see I do. For, libertine as I am 'thought to be, I never will attempt 'to bring down the measures of right 'and wrong to the standard of my 'actions.'

'Why, Sir, this is very right. It is 'very noble, I will say. But 'tis pity—'Excuse me, Sir—'tis pity, that the 'man who can pronounce so fine a sen-'tence, will not square his actions ac-'cordingly.'

'That, Mr. Hickman, is another 'point. We all err in some things. I 'wish not that Miss Howe should have 'Miss Harlowe's trials: and I rejoice, 'that she is in no danger of any such 'from so good a man.'

(Poor Hickman!—He looked as if he knew not whether I meant a compliment or a reflection!)

'But,' proceeded I, 'since I find that 'I have excited your curiosity, that you 'may not go away with a doubt that 'may be injurious to the most admir-'able of women, I am inclined to hint 'to you what I have in the third place 'to blame her for.'

'Sir, as you please—It may not be 'proper.'

'It cannot be very improper, Mr. 'Hickman—So let me ask you, What 'would Miss Howe think, if her friend 'is the more determined against me, be-'cause she thinks (in revenge to me, I 'verily believe that!) of encouraging 'another lover?'

'How, Sir!—Sure this cannot be the 'case!—I can tell you, Sir, if Miss 'Howe thought this, she would not 'approve of it at all: for, as little as 'you think Miss Howe likes you, Sir, 'and little as she approves of your ac-'tions by her friend, I know she is of 'opinion, that she ought to have no-'body living but you: and should con-'tinue single all her life, if she be not 'yours.'

'Revenge and obstinacy, Mr. Hick-'man, will make women, the best of 'them, do very unaccountable things. 'Rather than not put out both eyes of 'the man they are offended with, they 'will give up one of their own.'

'I don't know what to say to this, 'Sir: but, sure, she cannot encourage 'any other person's address!—So soon 'too—Why, Sir, she is, as we are told, 'so ill, and so weak——'

'Not in resentment weak, I'll assure 'you. I am well acquainted with all 'her movements—And I tell you, be-'lieve it, or not, that she refuses me in 'view of another lover.'

'Can it be?'

''Tis true, by my soul!—Has she 'not hinted this to Miss Howe, do you 'think?'

'No, indeed, Sir. If she had I should 'not have troubled you at this time from 'Miss Howe.'

'Well, then, you see I am right: 'that though she cannot be guilty of a 'falsehood, yet she has not told her friend 'the whole truth.'

'What shall a man say to these 'things!'—(Looking most stupidly per-plexed.)

'Say! Say! Mr. Hickman!—Who 'can account for the workings and ways 'of a passionate and offended woman? 'Endless would be the histories I could 'give you, within my own knowledge, 'of the dreadful effects of women's pas-'sionate resentments, and what that sex 'will do when disappointed.

'There was Miss DORRINGTON, '[Perhaps you know her not] who run 'away with her father's groom, because 'he would not let her have a half-pay 'officer, with whom (her passions all up) 'she fell in love at first sight, as he acci-'dentally passed under her window.

'There was Miss SAVAGE; she mar-'ried her mother's coachman, because 'her mother refused her a journey to 'Wales; in apprehension, that Miss intended

'intended to league herself with a re'mote cousin of unequal fortunes, of 'whom she was not a little fond when 'he was a visiting-guest at their house
'for a week.

'There was the young widow SAN-
'DERSON; who believing herself slight-
'ed by a younger brother of a noble fa'mily, (Sarah Stout like) took it into 'her head to drown herself.

'Miss SALLY ANDERSON [You have 'heard of her, no doubt] being checked
'by her uncle for encouraging an ad'dress beneath her, in spite, threw her'self into the arms of an ugly dog, a
'shoemaker's apprentice, running away
'with him in a pair of shoes he had just 'fitted to her feet, though she never 'saw the fellow before, and hated him
'ever after: and, at last, took lauda-
'num to make her forget for ever her
'own folly.

'But can there be a stronger instance
'in point, than what the unaccountable
'resentments of such a lady as Miss Cla-
'rissa Harlowe afford us? Who at this 'very instant, ill as she is, not only en'courages, but, in a manner, makes
'court to one of the most odious dogs
'that ever was seen? I think Miss
'Howe should not be told this—And yet
'she ought too, in order to dissuade her
'from such a preposterous rashness.'

'O fie! O strange! Miss Howe knows
'nothing of this! To be sure she won't
'look upon her, if this be true!'

''Tis true, very true, Mr. Hickman!
'True as I am here to tell you so!—And 'he is an ugly fellow too; uglier to 'look at than me.'

'Than you, Sir! Why, to be sure,
'you are one of the handsomest men in 'England.'

'Well, but the wretch she so spite-
'fully prefers to me is a mis-shapen,
'meagre varlet; more like a skeleton
'than a man! Then he dresses—you never 'saw a devil so bedizened! Hardly a coat
'to his back, nor a shoe to his foot: a
'bald-pated villain, yet grudges to buy
'a peruke to hide his baldness: for he 'is as covetous as hell, never satisfied,
'yet plaguy rich.'

'Why, Sir, there is some joke in this,
'surely. A man of common parts knows
'not how to take such gentlemen as you.
'But, Sir, if there be any truth in the 'story, what is he? Some Jew, or mis-
'erly citizen, I suppose, that may have 'presumed on the lady's distressful cir'cumstances; and your lively wit points
'him out as it pleases.'

'Why the rascal has estates in every 'county in England, and out of England
'too.'

'Some East India governor, I suppose,
'if there be any-thing in it. The lady
'once had thoughts of going abroad.
'But, I fancy, all this time you are in 'jest, Sir. If not, we must surely have 'heard of him——'

'Heard of him! Ay, Sir, we have all
'heard of him—But none of us care to 'be intimate with him—except this lady
'—and that, as I told you, in spite to
'me—His name, in short, is DEATH!
'—DEATH, Sir,' stamping, and speaking loud, and full in his ear; which made him jump half a yard high.

Thou never beheldest any man so disconcerted. He looked as if the frightful skeleton was before him, and he had not his accounts ready. When a little recovered, he fribbled with his waistcoat buttons, as if he had been telling his beads.

'This, Sir,' proceeded I, 'is her
'wooer!—Nay, she is so forward a girl,
'that she wooes him: but I hope it never
'will be a match.'

He had before behaved, and now looked, with more spirit than I expected from him.

'I came, Sir,' said he, 'as a mediator
'of differences. It behoves me to keep 'my temper. But, Sir,' and turned short upon me, 'as much as I love peace,
'and to promote it, I will not be ill-
'used.'

As I had played so much upon him, it would have been wrong to take him at his more than half-menace: yet, I think,
I owe him a grudge, for his presuming to address Miss Howe.

'You mean no defiance, I presume,
'Mr. Hickman, any more than I do of'fence. On that presumption, I ask your 'excuse. But this is my way. I mean
'no harm. I cannot let sorrow touch
'my heart. I cannot be grave six mi'nutes together, for the blood of me.
'I am a descendent of old Chancellor
'Moore, I believe; and should not for'bear to cut a joke, were I upon the 'scaffold. But you may gather, from 'what I have said, that I prefer Miss
'Harlowe, and that upon the justest
'grounds, to all the women in the world:
'and I wonder, that there should be any 'difficulty to believe, from what I have 'signed, and from what I have promis'ed to my relations, and enabled them
'to promise for me, that I should be glad 'to marry that excellent creature upon
'her own terms. I acknowledge to you,
'Mr. Hickman, that I have basely in'jured

'served her. If she will honour me with 'her hand, I declare, that it is my in'tention to make her the best of hus'bands. But, nevertheless, I must say, 'that, if she goes on appealing her case, 'and exposing us both, as she does, it 'is impossible to think the knot can be 'knit with reputation to either. And al'though, Mr. Hickman, I have deliver'ed my apprehensions under so ludicrous 'a figure, I am afraid, that she will ruin 'her constitution; and, by seeking 'Death when she may shun him, will 'not be able to avoid him when she would 'be glad to do so.'

This cool and honest speech let down his stiffened muscles into complacence. He was my very obedient and faithful humble servant several times over, as I waited on him to his chariot: and I was his almost as often.

And so exit Hickman.

LETTER LXXIX.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

[IN ANSWER TO LETTERS LXXII. LXXVI. LXXVII.]

FRIDAY NIGHT, JULY 21.

I Will throw away a few paragraphs upon the contents of thy last shocking letters just brought me; and send what I shall write by the fellow who carries mine on the interview with Hickman.

Reformation, I see, is coming fast upon thee. Thy uncle's slow death, and thy attendance upon him, through every stage towards it, prepared thee for it. But go thou on in thine own way, as I will in mine. Happiness consists in being pleased with what we do: and if thou canst find delight in being sad, it will be as well for thee, as if thou wert merry, though no other person should join to keep thee in countenance.

I am, nevertheless, exceedingly disturbed at the lady's ill health. It is entirely owing to the cursed arrest. She was absolutely triumphant over me and the whole crew before. Thou believest me guiltless of that: so, I hope, does she.—The rest, as I have often said, is a common case; only a little uncommonly circumstanced; that's all! why, then, all these severe things from her, and from thee?

As to selling her cloaths, and her laces, and so-forth, it has, I own, a shocking sound with it. What an implacable as well as unjust set of wretches are those of her unkindredly kin who have money of hers in their hands, as well as large arrears of her own estate; yet withhold both, avowedly to distress her! But may she not have money of that proud and saucy friend of hers, Miss Howe, more than she wants?—And should not I be overjoyed, thinkest thou, to serve her?——What then is there in the parting with her apparel, but female perverseness?—And I am not sure, whether I ought not to be glad, if she does this out of spite to me.—Some disappointed fair-ones would have hanged, some drowned themselves. My beloved only revenges herself upon her cloaths. Different ways of working has passion in different bosoms, as humours or complexion induce.—Besides, dost think I shall grudge to replace, to three times the value, what she disposes of? So, Jack, there is no great matter in this.

Thou seest how sensible she is of the soothings of the polite doctor: this will enable thee to judge how dreadfully the horrid arrest, and her gloomy father's curse, must have hurt her. I have great hope, if she will but see me, that my behaviour, my contrition, my soothings, may have some happy effects upon her.

But thou art too ready to give me up. Let me seriously tell thee, that all excellence as she is, I think the earnest interposition of my relations; the implored mediation of that little fury Miss Howe; and the commissions thou acteſt under from myself; are such instances of condescension and high value in them, and such contrition in me, that nothing farther can be done.—So here let the matter rest for the present, till she considers better of it.

But now a few words upon poor Belton's case. I own I was at first a little startled at the disloyalty of his Thomasine: her hypocrisy to be for so many years undetected!—I have very lately had some intimations given me of her vileness; and had intended to mention them to thee, when I saw thee. To say the truth, I always suspected her eye: the eye, then knowest, is the casement, at which the heart generally looks out. Many a woman, who will not shew herself at the door, has tipt the sly, the unintelligible wink from the windows.

But Tom had no management at all. A very careless fellow. Would never look into his own affairs. The estate his uncle left him was his ruin: wife or mistress, whoever was, must have had his fortune to sport with.

I have often hinted his weakness of this sort to him; and the danger he was in

ke of becoming the property of designing people! But he hated to take pains. He would ever run away from his accounts; as now, poor fellow! he would be glad to do from himself. Had he not had a woman to fleece him, his coachman or valet, would have been his prime-minister, and done it as effectually.

But yet, for many years, I thought she was true to his bed. At least I thought the boys were his own. For though they are muscular, and big-boned, yet I supposed the healthy mother might have furnished them with legs and shoulders: for she is not of a delicate frame; and then Tom, some years ago, looked up, and spoke more like a man, than he has done of late; squeaking inwardly, poor fellow! for some time past, from contracted quail-pipes, and wheezing from lungs half spit away.

He complains, thou sayest, that we all run away from him. Why, after all, Belford, it is no pleasant thing to see a poor fellow one loves, dying by inches, yet unable to do him good. There are friendships which are only bottle-deep: I should be loth to have it thought, that mine for any of my vassals is such a one. Yet, with gay hearts, which became intimate because they were gay, the reason for their first intimacy ceasing, the friendship will fade: but may not this sort of friendship be more properly distinguished by the word companionship?

But mine, as I said, is deeper than this: I would still be as ready as ever I was in my life, to the utmost of my power, to do him service.

As one instance of this my readiness to extricate him from all his difficulties as to Thomasine, dost thou care to propose to him an expedient, that is just come into my head?

It is this: I would engage Thomasine and her cubs (if Belton be convinced they are neither of them his) in a party of pleasure. She was always complaisant to me. It should be in a boat, hired for the purpose, to sail to Tilbury, to the Isle of Shepey, or pleasuring up the Medway; and 'tis but contriving to turn the boat bottom upward. I can swim like a fish. Another boat shall be ready to take up whom I should direct, for fear of the worst: and then, if Tom has a mind to be decent, one suit of mourning will serve for all three: nay, the hostler-cousin may take his plunge from the steerage: and who knows but they may be thrown up on the beach, Thomasine and he, hand in hand?

"This," thou'lt say, "is an heroic instance of friendship."

Mean time, do thou prevail on him to come down to us: he never was more welcome in his life, than he shall be now: if he will not, let him find me some other service; and I will clap a pair of wings to my shoulders, and he shall see me come flying in at his windows at the word of command.

Mowbray and Tourville each intend to give thee a letter; and I leave to those rough varlets to handle thee as thou deservest, for the shocking picture thou hast drawn of their last ends. Thy own past guilt has stared thee full in the face, one may see by it; and made thee, in consciousness of thy demerits, sketch out these cursed outlines. I am glad thou hast got the old fiend to hold the glass before thy own face so soon. Thou must be in earnest surely, when thou wrotest it, and have severe conviction upon thee: for what a hardened varlet must he be, who could draw such a picture as this, in sport?

As for thy resolution of repenting and marrying; I would have thee consider which thou wilt set about first. If thou wilt follow my advice, thou shalt make short work of it: let matrimony take place of the other; for then thou wilt, very possibly, have repentance come tumbling in fast upon thee, as a consequence, and so have both in one.

LETTER LXXX.

MR. BELFORD, TO ROBERT LOVELACE, ESQ.

FRIDAY NOON, JULY 21.

THIS morning I was admitted, as soon as I sent up my name, into the presence of the divine Lady. Such I may call her; as what I have to relate will fully prove.

She had had a tolerable night, and was much better in spirits; though weak in person; and visibly declining in looks.

Mrs. Lovick and Mrs. Smith were with her; and accused her, in a gentle manner, of having applied herself too assiduously to her pen for her strength, having been up ever since five. She said, she had rested better than she had done for many nights: she had found her spirits free, and her mind tolerably easy: and having, as she had reason to think, but a short time, and much to do in it, she must be a good husband of her hours.

She had been writing, she said, a let-by him. I had dreamt from time to time, she had reason, she said, to think that I knew every-thing that concerned her and her family; and, if so, must be acquainted with the heavy curse her father had laid upon her; which had been dreadfully fulfilled in one part, as to her prospects in this life, and that in a very short time; which gave her great apprehensions of the other part. She had been applying herself to her sister, to obtain a revocation of it. 'I hope 'my father will revoke it,' said she, 'or I shall be very miserable—Yet' [And she gasped as she spoke, with apprehension]—'I am ready to tremble 'at what the answer may be; for my 'sister is hard-hearted.'

I said something reflecting upon her friends, as to what they would deserve to be thought of, if the unmerited impression were not withdrawn——Upon which she took me up, and talked in such a dutiful manner of her parents as must doubly condemn them (if they remain implacable) for their inhuman treatment of such a daughter.

She said, I must not blame her parents: it was her dear Miss Howe's fault to do so. But what an enormity was there in her crime, which could set the best of parents (they had been to her, till she disobliged them) in a bad light, for resenting the rashness of a child from whose education they had reason to expect better fruits! There were some hard circumstances in her case, it was true: but my friend could tell me, that no one person, throughout the whole fatal transaction, had acted out of character, but herself. She submitted therefore to the penalty she had incurred. If they had any fault, it was only, that they would not inform themselves of some circumstances, which would alleviate a little her misdeed; and that supposing her a more guilty creature than she was, they punished her without a hearing.

Lord!—I was going to curse thee, Lovelace! How every instance of excellence, in this all excelling creature, condemns thee; —thou pest! how reason to think thyself of all men the most accursed, if she die!

I then bethought her, while she was capable of such glorious instances of generosity and forgiveness, to extend her goodness to a man, whose heart bled in every vein of it for the injuries he had done her; and who would make it the study of his whole life to repair them.

The women would have withdrawn when the subject became so particular. But she would not permit them to go. She told me, that if after this time, I was for entering with so much earnestness into a subject so very disagreeable to her, my visits must not be repeated. Nor was there occasion, she said, for my friendly offices in your favour; since she had begun to write her whole mind upon that subject to Miss Howe, in answer to letters from her, in which Miss Howe urged the same arguments, in compliment to the wishes of your noble and worthy relations.

'Mean time, you may let him know,' said she, 'that I reject him with my 'whole heart:—yet, that, although I 'say this with such a determination as 'shall leave no room for doubt, I say 'it not however with passion. On the 'contrary, tell him, that I am trying 'to bring my mind into such a frame as 'to be able to pity him; [Poor perjured wretch! what has he not to answer 'for!] and that I shall not think myself 'qualified for the state I am aspiring to, 'if, after a few struggles more, I can-'not forgive him too: and I hope,' clasping her hands together, uplifted as were her eyes, 'my dear earthly father 'will set me the example my Heavenly 'one has already set us all; and, by 'forgiving his fallen daughter, teach 'her to forgive the man, who then, I 'hope, will not have destroyed my 'eternal prospects, as he has my tem-'poral!'

Stop here, thou wretch!—But I need not bid thee!——For I can go no farther.

LETTER LXXXI.

MR. BELFORD. IN CONTINUATION.

YOU will imagine how affecting her noble speech and behaviour were to me, at the time, when the bare recollecting and transcribing them obliged me to drop my pen. The women had tears in their eyes. I was silent for a few moments.—At last, 'Matchless 'excellence! inimitable goodness!' I called her with a voice so accented, that I was half-ashamed of myself, as it was before the women.—But who could stand such [illegible] security of soul, in so young a creature, her loveliness giving grace to all she said?—'Me-'thinks,' said I, [and, really, in a manner involuntarily, bent my knee] 'I have before me an angel indeed. I 'can

'and handle for her protection, and to 'bring your influence to draw me after 'you to the world you are aspiring to! '—Yet—but what shall I say—Only, 'dearest excellence, make me, in some 'small instances, serviceable to you, 'that I may (if I survive you) have the 'glory to think I was able to contribute 'to your satisfaction, while among us.'

Here I stopt. She was silent. I proceeded—'Have you no commission to 'employ me in; deserted as you are by 'all your friends; among strangers, 'though, I doubt not, worthy people? 'Cannot I be serviceable by message, 'by letter-writing, by attending personally, with either message or letter, 'your father, your uncles, your brother, your sister, Miss Howe, Lord 'M. or the ladies his sisters?—Any office to be employed to serve you, absolutely independent of my friend's wishes, 'or of my own wishes to oblige him? 'Think, Madam, if I cannot?'

'I thank you, Sir: very heartily I 'thank you: but in nothing that I can 'at present think of, or at least resolve 'upon, can you do me service. I will 'see what return the letter I have written will bring me.—Till then——'

'My life and my fortune,' interrupted I, 'are devoted to your service. 'Permit me to observe, that here you 'are, without one natural friend; and '(so much do I know of your unhappy 'case) that you must be in a manner 'destitute of the means to make friends '——'

She was going to interrupt me, with a prohibitory kind of earnestness in her manner.

'I beg leave to proceed, Madam: I 'have cast about twenty ways how to 'mention this before, but never dared 'till now. Suffer me, now that I have 'broken the ice, to tender myself as 'your banker only,—I know you will 'not be obliged: you need not. You 'have sufficient of your own, if it were 'in your hands; and from that, whether 'you live or die, will I consent to be 'reimbursed. I do assure you, that the 'unhappy man shall never know either 'my offer, or your acceptance—Only 'permit me this small——'

And down behind her chair I dropt a Bank note of 1000*l.* which I had brought with me, intending some how or other to leave it behind me: nor should thou ever have known it, had she favoured me with the acceptance of it; as I told her.

'You give me great pain, Mr. Bel- 'ford, that you will not favour me with 'your friendship, and permit me to cul- 'tivate the correspondence. I have been 'ing the company. 'I am not sorry to find you capable of 'such. Nothing is perfect in this 'like of human nature, that there should 'be but one such man in the world, as 'he you and I know. But let us pass 'kind offer, whatever it be; if you take 'it not up, you will greatly distress me. 'I have no need of your bounty. I 'have effects enough, which I never 'can want, to supply my present occa- 'sions; and, if needful, can have re- 'course to Miss Howe. I have pro- 'mised that I would—So pray, Sir, urge 'not upon me this favour.—Take it up 'yourself.—If you mean my peace and 'ease of mind, urge not this favour.'—And she spoke with impatience.

'I beg, Madam, but one word——'

'Not one, Sir, till you have taken back 'what you have let fall. I doubt not 'either the honour, or the delicacy of 'your offer; but you must not say one 'word more on this subject. I cannot 'bear it.'

She was stooping, but with pain. I therefore prevented her; and besought her to forgive me for a tender, which, I saw, had been more discomposing to her than I had hoped (from the purity of my intentions) it would be. But I could not bear to think, that such a mind as hers should be distressed: since the want of the conveniences she was used to abound in might affect and disturb her in the divine course she was in.

'You are very kind to me, Sir,' said she, 'and very favourable in your opi- 'nion of me. But I hope, that I cannot 'now be easily put out of my present 'course. My declining health will 'more and more confirm me in it. 'Those who arrested and confined me, 'no doubt, thought they had fallen 'upon the ready method to distress me 'so, as to bring me into all their mea- 'sures. But I presume to hope, that I 'have a mind that cannot be debased, 'in essential instances, by temporal calamities: little do those poor creatures 'know of the force of genuine principles, '(forgive my own impious vaunting, was 'her word) 'who imagine, that a prison, 'or penury, can bring a right-turned 'mind to be guilty of a wilful baseness, 'in order to avoid such petty misfortunes.'

She then turned from me towards the window, with a dignity suitable to her words; and such as she will have to be more of soul than of body, at that instant.

What magnanimity!—No wonder a virtue so ſolidly founded could baffle all thy arts:—and that it forced thee (in order to carry thy accurſed point) to have recourſe to thoſe unnatural ones, which robbed her of her charming ſenſes.

The women were extremely affected, Mrs. Lovick eſpecially; who ſaid whiſperingly to Mrs. Smith, 'We have an 'angel, not a woman, with us, Mrs. 'Smith!'

I repeated my offers to write to any of her friends; and told her, that, having taken the liberty to acquaint Dr. H. with the cruel diſpleaſure of her relations, as what I preſumed lay neareſt her heart, he had propoſed to write himſelf, to acquaint her friends how ill ſhe was, if ſhe would not take it amiſs.

It was kind in the doctor, ſhe ſaid: but begged, that no ſtep of that ſort might be taken without her knowledge or conſent. She would wait to ſee what effects her letter to her ſiſter would have. All ſhe had to hope for, was, that her father would revoke his malediction, previous to the laſt bleſſing ſhe ſhould then implore: for the reſt, her friends would think ſhe could not ſuffer too much; and ſhe was content to ſuffer: for now, nothing could happen that could make her wiſh to live.

Mrs. Smith went down; and, ſoon returning, aſked, if the lady and I would not dine with her that day; for it was her wedding-day. She had engaged Mrs. Lovick, ſhe ſaid; and ſhould have nobody elſe, if we would do her that favour.

The charming creature ſighed, and ſhook her head.—'Wedding-day,' repeated ſhe, 'I wiſh you, Mrs. Smith, 'many happy wedding-days!—But you 'will excuſe me.'

Mr. Smith came up with the ſame requeſt. They both applied to me.

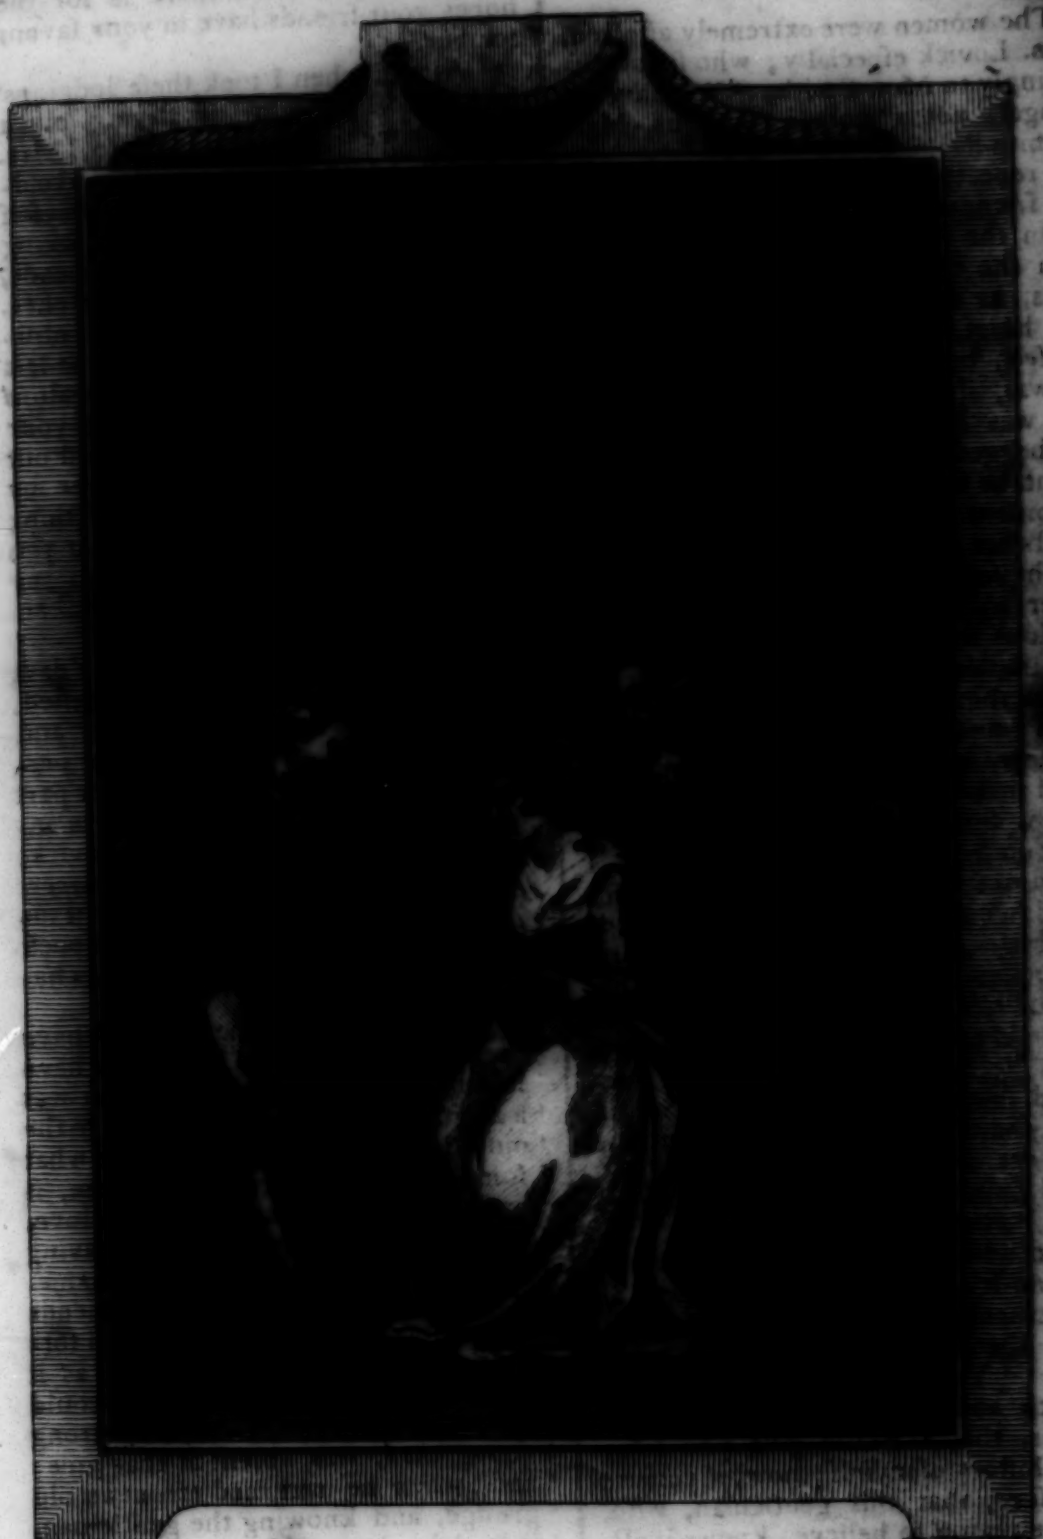
On condition the lady would, I ſhould make no ſcruple; and would ſuſpend an engagement: which I actually had.

She then deſired they would all ſit down. 'You have ſeveral times, Mrs. 'Lovick and Mrs. Smith, hinted your 'wiſhes, that I would give you ſome 'little hiſtory of myſelf: now, if you are 'at leiſure, that this gentleman, who, 'I have reaſon to believe, knows it all, 'is preſent, and can tell you if I give 'it juſtly, or not, I will oblige your 'curioſity.'

They all eagerly, the man Smith too, ſat down; and ſhe began an account of herſelf, which I will endeavour to repeat, as nearly in her own words, as I poſſibly can: for I know you will think it of importance to be apprized of her manner of relating your barbarity to her, as well as what her ſentiments are of it; and what room there is for the hopes your friends have in your favour for her.

'At firſt when I took theſe lodgings' ſaid ſhe, 'I thought of ſtaying but a 'ſhort time in them; and ſo, Mrs. 'Smith, I told you: I therefore avoided giving any other account of myſelf 'than that I was a very unhappy young 'creature, ſeduced from good friends, 'and eſcaped from very vile wretches.

'This account I thought myſelf obliged to give, that you might the leſs 'wonder at ſeeing a young creature 'ruſhing through your ſhop, into your 'back apartment, all trembling and out 'of breath; an ordinary garb over my 'own; craving lodging and protection; 'only giving my bare word, that you 'ſhould be handſomely paid: all my 'effects contained in a pocket-handkerchief.



'My ſudden abſence for three days 'and nights together, when arreſted, 'muſt ſtill further ſurprize you: and 'although this gentleman, who, perhaps, knows more of the darker part 'of my ſtory than I do myſelf, has informed you, (as you, Mrs. Lovick, 'tell me) that I am only an unhappy, 'not a guilty creature; yet I think it incumbent upon me not to ſuffer honeſt 'minds to be in doubt about my character.

'You muſt know, then, that I have 'been in one inſtance (I had like to have 'ſaid but in one inſtance; but that was 'a capital one) an undutiful child to the 'moſt indulgent of parents: for what 'ſome people call cruelty in them, is 'owing but to the exceſs of their love, 'and to their diſappointment, having 'had reaſon to expect better from me.

'I was viſited (at firſt, with my friends 'connivance) by a man of birth and fortune, but of worſe principles, as it 'proved, than I believed any man could 'have. My brother, a very headſtrong 'young man, was abſent at that time; 'and, when he returned (from an old 'grudge, and knowing the gentleman, 'it is plain, better than I knew him) 'entirely diſapproved of his viſits: and, 'having a great ſway in our family, 'brought other gentlemen to addreſs 'me: and at laſt (ſeveral having been 'rejected) he introduced one extremely 'diſagreeable; in every indifferent per-

'ſon's eyes diſagreeable. I could not 'love him. They all joined to compel 'me to have him; a rencounter be-'tween the gentleman my friends were 'ſet againſt, and my brother, having 'confirmed them all his enemies.

'To be ſhort, I was confined, and 'treated ſo very hardly, that, in a raſh 'fit, I appointed to go off with the man 'they hated. A wicked intention, you'll 'ſay! But I was greatly provoked: 'nevertheleſs, I repented, and reſolved 'not to go off with him: yet I did not 'miſtruſt his honour to me neither; nor 'his love; becauſe nobody thought me 'unworthy of the latter, and my for-'tune was not to be deſpiſed. But 'fooliſhly (wickedly and contrivingly, 'as my friends ſtill think, with a de-'ſign, as they imagine, to abandon them) 'giving him a private meeting, I was 'tricked away: poorly enough tricked 'away, I muſt needs ſay; though others 'who had been firſt guilty of ſo raſh a 'ſtep as the meeting of him was, might 'have been ſo deceived and ſurprized 'as well as I.

'After remaining ſome time at a 'farm-houſe in the country and behav-'ing to me all the time with honour, he 'brought me to handſome lodgings in 'town till ſtill better proviſion could be 'made for me. But they proved to be '(as he indeed knew and deſigned) at a 'vile, a very vile creature's; though it 'was long before I found her to be ſo; 'for I knew nothing of the town, or 'it's ways.

'There is no repeating what fol-'lowed: ſuch unprecedented vile arts! '—For I gave him no opportunity to 'take me at any diſreputable advan-'tage.'

And here (half covering her ſweet face, with her handkerchief put to her tearful eyes) ſhe ſtopt.

Haſtily, as if ſhe would fly from the hateful remembrance, ſhe reſumed:—'I made eſcape afterwards from the 'abominable houſe in his abſence, and 'came to yours: and this gentleman 'has almoſt prevailed on me to think, 'that the ungrateful man did not con-'nive at the vile arreſt: which was 'made, no doubt, in order to get me 'once more to thoſe wicked lodgings: 'for nothing do I owe them, except I 'were to pay them,'—[She ſighed, and again wiped her charming eyes—add-ing in a ſofter, lower voice] 'for being 'ruined.'

'Indeed, Madam,' ſaid I, 'guilty, 'abominably guilty, as he is in all the 'reſt, he is innocent of this laſt wicked 'outrage.'

'Well, and ſo I wiſh him to be.—'That evil, heavy as it was, is one of 'the ſlighteſt evils I have ſuffered.—But 'hence you'll obſerve, Mrs. Lovick; '(for you ſeemed this morning curious 'to know if I were not a wife) that I 'never was married—You, Mr. Belford, 'no doubt, knew before, that I am no 'wife: and now I never will be one. 'Yet, I bleſs God, that I am not a 'guilty creature!'

'As to my parentage, I am of no 'mean family: I have in my own right, 'by the intended favour of my grand-'father, a fortune not contemptible: 'independent of my father, if I had 'pleaſed; but I never will pleaſe.

'My father is very rich. I went by 'another name when I came to you 'firſt: but that was to avoid being diſ-'covered to the perfidious man: who 'now engages, by this gentleman, not 'to moleſt me.

'My real name you now know to be 'Harlowe: Clariſſa Harlowe. I am not 'yet twenty years of age.

'I have an excellent mother, as well 'as father; a woman of family, and 'fine ſenſe—Worthy of a better child! '—They both doated upon me.

'I have two good uncles: men of 'great fortunes; jealous of the ho-'nour of their family; which I have 'wounded.

'I was the joy of their hearts; and, 'with theirs and my father's, I had 'three houſes to call my own; for they 'uſed to have me with them by turns, 'and almoſt kindly to quarrel for me: 'ſo that I was two months in the year 'with the one; two months with the 'other; ſix month's at my father's; and 'two at the houſes of others of my dear 'friends, who thought themſelves hap-'py in me; and whenever I was at any-'one's, I was crouded upon with letters 'by all the reſt, who longed for my re-'turn to them.

'In ſhort, I was beloved by every-'body. The poor—I uſed to make 'glad their hearts: I never ſhut my 'hand to any diſtreſs, wherever I was—'But now I am poor myſelf!

'So, Mrs. Smith—ſo, Mrs. Lovick—'I am not married. It is but juſt to 'tell you ſo. And I am now, as I 'ought to be, in a ſtate of humiliation 'and penitence for the raſh ſtep which 'has been followed by ſo much evil. 'God, I hope, will forgive me, as I am 'endeavouring to bring my mind to forgive all the world, even the man who has unfeelingly, and by dreadful surprizes, [Poor wretch! he thought all his wickedness to be wit!] robbed me of this, a young creature, who had all her happiness in her view, and in her sight, even beyond this life; and who was believed to be of rank, and fortune, and expectations, considerable enough to make it the interest of any gentleman in England to be faithful to his vows to her. But I cannot expect that my parents will forgive me: my refuge must be death; the most painful kind of which I would suffer, rather than be the wife of one who could act by me, as the man has acted, upon whose birth, education, and honour, I had so much reason to found better expectations.

'forgive

'I see,' continued she, 'that I, who once was every-one's delight, am now the cause of grief to every-one—You, that are strangers to me, are moved for me!—'Tis kind!—But 'tis time to stop.—Your compassionate hearts, Mrs. Smith and Mrs. Lovick, are too much touched.'—[For the women sobbed, and the man was also affected.]—'It is barbarous in me, with my woes, thus to sadden your wedding-day.' Then turning to Mr. and Mrs. Smith—'May you see many happy ones, honest, good couple!—How agreeable is it to see you both join so kindly to celebrate it, after many years are gone over you!—I once—But no more!—All my prospects of felicity, as to this life, are at an end. My hopes, like opening buds or blossoms in an over-forward spring, have been nipt by a severe frost!—Blighted by an eastern wind!—But I can but once die; and if life be spared me, but till I am discharged from a heavy malediction, which my father in his wrath laid upon me, and which is fulfilled literally in every article relating to this world; that, and a last blessing, are all I have to wish for; and death will be welcomer to me, than rest to the most wearied traveller that ever reached his journey's end.'

And then she sunk her head against the back of her chair, and hiding her face with her handkerchief, endeavoured to conceal her tears from us.

Not a soul of us could speak a word. Thy presence, perhaps, thou hardened wretch, might have made us ashamed of a weakness, which perhaps thou wilt deride me in particular for, when thou readest this!

She retired to her chamber first after, and was forced, it seems, to lie down. We all went down together: and, for an hour and half, dwelt upon her praises; Mrs. Smith and Mrs. Lovick repeatedly expressing their astonishment, that there could be a man in the world, capable of offending, much more of wilfully injuring, such a lady: and repeating, that they had an angel in their house.—I thought they had; and that as assuredly as there is a devil under the roof of good Lord M.

I hate thee heartily!—By my faith I do!—Every hour I hate thee more than the former!

J. BELFORD.

LETTER LXXXII.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

SATURDAY, JULY 22.

WHAT dost hate me for, Belford!—And why more and more!—Have I been guilty of any offence thou knewest not before!—If pathos can move such a heart as thine, can it alter facts!—Did I not always do this incomparable creature as much justice as thou canst do her for the heart of thee, or as she can do herself!—What nonsense then thy hatred, thy augmented hatred, when I still persist to marry her, pursuant to word given to thee, and to faith plighted to all my relations? But hate, if thou wilt, so thou dost but write. Thou canst not hate me so much as I do myself: and yet I know if thou really hatedst me, thou wouldst not venture to tell me so.

Well, but after all, what need of her history to these women? She will certainly repent, some time hence, that she has thus needlessly exposed us both.

Sickness palls every appetite, and makes us hate what we loved: but renewed health changes the scene; disposes us to be pleased with ourselves; and then we are in a way to be pleased with every-one else. Every hope, then, rises upon us: every hour presents itself to us on dancing feet: and what Mr. Addison says of liberty, may, with still greater propriety, be said of health, [For what is liberty itself without health?]

'It makes the gloomy face of nature gay,
'Gives beauty to the sun, and pleasure to the day.'

And I rejoice that she is already so much better, as to hold, with strangers, such a long and interesting conversation.

Strange,

as strange, confoundedly strange; and as perverse (that is to say, as unmanly) as strange, that she should refuse, and sooner chuse to die, [O the obscene word! and yet how free does thy pen make with it to me!] than be mine, who offended her by acting in character, while her parents acted shamefully out of theirs, and when I am now willing to act out of my own to oblige her; yet I not to be forgiven: they to be faultless with her!—And marriage the only medium to repair all breaches, and to salve her own honour!—Surely thou must see the inconsistence of her forgiving unforgiveness, as I may call it! —Yet, heavy varlet as thou art, thou wantest to be drawn up after her! And what a figure dost thou make with thy speeches, stiff as Hickman's ruffles, with thy aspirations and prostrations!—Unused, thy weak head, to bear the sublimities that fall even in common conversation, from the lips of this ever-charming creature!

But the prettiest whim of all was, to drop the Bank note behind her chair, instead of presenting it on thy knees to her hand!—To make such a woman as this doubly stoop—By the acceptance, and to take it from the ground!—What an ungraceful benefit-conferrer art thou! —How awkward, to take into thy head, that the best way of making a present to a lady, was to throw the present behind her chair!

I am very desirous to see what she has written to her sister; what she is about to write to Miss Howe; and what return she will have from the Harlowe-Arabella. Canst thou not form some scheme to come at the copies of these letters, or at the substance of them at least, and of that of her other correspondences? Mrs. Lovick, thou seemest to say, is a pious woman. The lady, having given such a particular history of herself, will acquaint her with everything. And art thou not about to reform!—Won't this consent of minds between thee and the widow [What age is she, Jack? The devil never trumpt up a friendship between a man and a woman, of any thing like years, which did not end in matrimony, or in the ruin of their morals! Won't it?] strike out an intimacy between ye, that may enable thee to gratify me in this particular? A profelyte, I can tell thee, has great influence upon your good people: such a-one is a saint of their own creation; and they will water, and cultivate, and cherish him, as a plant of their own raising; and this from a pride truly spiritual!

One of my loves in Paris was a devote. She took great pains to convert me. I gave way to her kind endeavours for the good of my soul. She thought it a point gained to make me profess some religion. The Catholic has it's conveniences. I permitted her to bring a father to me. My reformation went on swimmingly. The father had hopes of me: he applauded her zeal: so did I. And how dost think it ended?—Not a girl in England, reading thus far, but would guess!—In a word, very happily: for she not only brought me a father, but made me one: and then, being satisfied with each other's conversion, we took different routes: she into Navarre; I, into Italy: both well inclined to propagate the good lessons in which we had so well instructed each other.

But to return. One consolation arises to me, from the pretty regrets which this admirable creature seems to have in indulging reflections on the people's wedding-day.—'Once!'—thou makest her break off with saying.

She once! What?—O Belford! why didst thou not urge her to explain what she once hoped?

What once a woman hopes, in love-matters, she always hopes, while there is room for hope: and are we not both single? Can she be any man's but mine? Will I be any woman's but hers?

I never will!—I never can!—And I tell thee, that I am every day, every hour, more and more in love with her: and, at this instant, have a more vehement passion for her than ever I had in my life!—And that with views absolutely honourable, in her own sense of the word: nor have I varied, so much as in wish, for this week past; firmly fixed, and wrought into my very nature, as the life of honour, or of generous confidence in me, was, in preference to the life of doubt and distrust. That may be a life of doubt and distrust, surely, where the woman confides nothing, and ties up a man for his good behaviour for life, taking church and state sanctions in aid of the obligation she imposes upon him.

I shall go on Monday morning to a kind of ball, to which Colonel Ambrose has invited me. It is given on a family account. I care not on what: for all that delights me in the thing, is, that Mrs. and Miss Howe are to be there—Hickman, of course; for the old lady [illegible] without him. The colonel is in hopes that Miss Arabella Harlowe will be there likewise; for all the men and women of fashion round him are invited.

I fell in by accident with the colonel, who, I believe, hardly thought I would accept of the invitation. But he knows me not, if he thinks I am ashamed to appear at any place, where women dare shew their faces. Yet he hinted to me, that my name was up, on Miss Harlowe's account. But, to allude to one of Lord M.'s phrases, if it be, I will not lie-a-bed when any-thing joyous is going forward.

As I shall go in my lord's chariot, I would have had one of my cousins Montague to go with me: but they both refused: and I shall not chuse to take either of thy brethren. It would look as if I thought I wanted a body-guard: besides, one of them is too rough, the other too smooth, and too great a fop for some of the staid company that will be there; and for me in particular. Men are known by their companions; and a fop [as Tourville, for example] takes great pains to hang out a sign by his dress of what he has in his shop. Thou, indeed, art an exception; dressing like a coxcomb, yet a very clever fellow. Nevertheless, so clumsy a beau, that thou seemest to me to owe thyself a double spite, making thy ungracefulness appear the more ungraceful, by thy remarkable tawdriness when thou art out of mourning.

I remember, when I first saw thee, my mind laboured with a strong puzzle, whether I should put thee down for a great fool, or a smatterer in wit. Something I saw was wrong in thee, by thy dress. 'If this fellow,' thought I, 'delights not so much in ridicule, that 'he will not spare himself, he must be 'plaguy silly to take so much pains to 'make his ugliness more conspicuous 'than it would otherwise be.'

Plain dress, for an ordinary man or woman, implies at least modesty, and always procures kind quarter from the censorious. Who will ridicule a personal imperfection in one that seems conscious, that it is an imperfection? Who ever said an anchoret was poor? But who would spare so very absurd a wrong-head, as should bestow tinsel to make his deformity the more conspicuous?

But, although I put on these lively airs, I am sick at my soul!—My whole heart is with my charmer! With what indifference shall I look upon all the assembly at the colonel's, my beloved in my ideal eye, and engrossing my whole heart!

LETTER LXXXIII.

MISS HOWE, TO MISS ARABELLA HARLOWE.

THURSDAY, JULY 20.

MISS HARLOWE,

I Cannot help acquainting you (however it may be received, coming from me) that your poor sister is dangerously ill, at the house of one Smith, who keeps a glover's and perfume-shop, in King Street, Covent Garden. She knows not that I write. Some violent words, in the nature of an imprecation, from her father, afflict her greatly in her weak state. I presume not to direct you what to do in this case. You are her sister. I therefore could not help writing to you, not only for her sake, but for your own. I am, Madam, your humble servant,

LETTER LXXXIV.

MISS ARABELLA HARLOWE. IN ANSWER.

THURSDAY, JULY 20.

MISS HOWE,

I Have yours of this morning. All that has happened to the unhappy body you mention, is what we foretold and expected. Let him, for whose sake she abandoned us, be her comfort. We are told he has remorse, and would marry her. We don't believe it, indeed. She may be very ill. Her disappointment may make her so, or ought. Yet is she the only one I know, who is disappointed.

I cannot say, Miss, that the notification from you is the more welcome for the liberties you have been pleased to take with our whole family, for resenting a conduct, that it is a shame any young lady should justify. Excuse this freedom, occasioned by greater. I am, Miss, your humble servant,

LETTER LXXXVI.

MISS ARABELLA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

FRIDAY, JULY 21.

MISS ANN HOWE,

YOUR pert letter I have received. You, that ſpare nobody, I cannot expect ſhould ſpare me. You are very happy in a prudent and watchful mother.—But elſe—Mine cannot be exceeded in prudence: but we had all too good an opinion of ſomebody, to think watchfulneſs needful. There may poſſibly be ſome reaſon why you are ſo much attached to her, in an error of this flagrant nature.

I help to make a ſiſter unhappy!—It is falſe, Miſs!—It is all her own doings!—Except, indeed, what ſhe may owe to ſomebody's advice—You know who can beſt anſwer for that.

Let us know your mind as ſoon as you pleaſe: as we ſhall know it to be your mind, we ſhall judge what attention to give it. That's all, from, &c.

LETTER LXXXVII.

MISS HOWE, TO MISS ARABELLA HARLOWE.

SAT. JULY 22.

IT may be the misfortune of ſome people to engage every-body's notice: others may be the happier, though they may be the more envious, for nobody's thinking them worthy of any. But one would be glad people had the ſenſe to be thankful for that want of conſequence, which ſubjected them not to hazards they would hardly have been able to manage under.

I own to you, that had it not been for the prudent advice of that admirable ſomebody, (whoſe principal fault is the ſuperiority of her talents, and whoſe misfortune to be brother'd and ſiſter'd by a couple of creatures, who are not able to comprehend her excellences) I might at one time have been plunged into diſcuſſion. But, ſweet as the ſuperlatively pert may think me, I thought not myſelf wiſer, becauſe I was older; nor for that your reaſon qualified to preſcribe to, much leſs to mutilate, a genius ſo ſuperior.

I repeat it with gratitude, that the dear creature's advice was of very great ſervice to me—And this before my mother's watchfulneſs became neceſſary. But how it would have fared with me, I cannot ſay, had I had a brother or ſiſter, who had deemed it their intereſt, as well as a gratification of their ſordid envy, to miſrepreſent me.

Your admirable ſiſter, in effect, ſaved you, Miſs, as well as me—With this difference—You, againſt your will—Me, with mine: and but for your own brother, and his own ſiſter, would not have been loſt herſelf.

Would to Heaven both ſiſters had been obliged with their own wills!—The moſt admirable of her ſex would never then have been out of her father's houſe!—You, Miſs—I don't know what had become of you.—But, let what would have happened, you would have met with the humanity you have not ſhewn, whether you had deſerved it or not:—nor, at worſt, loſt either a kind ſiſter, or a pitying friend, in the moſt excellent of ſiſters.

But why run I into length to ſuch a poor thing?—Why puſh I ſo weak an adverſary; whoſe firſt letter is all low malice, and whoſe next is made up of fulſhood and inconſiſtence, as well as ſpite and ill-manners! Yet I was willing to give you a part of my mind. Call for more of it; it ſhall be at your ſervice: from one, who, though ſhe thanks God ſhe is not your ſiſter, is not your enemy: but that ſhe is not the latter, is witheld but by two conſiderations; one that you bear, though unworthily, a relation to a ſiſter ſo excellent; the other, that you are not of conſequence enough to engage anything but the pity and contempt of

LETTER LXXXVIII.

MRS. HARLOWE, TO MRS. HOWE.

SAT. JULY 22.

DEAR MADAM,

I Send you, incloſed, copies of five letters that have paſſed between Miſs Howe and my Arabella. You are a perſon of ſo much prudence and good ſenſe, and (being a mother yourſelf) can ſo well enter into the diſtreſſes of all all our family, upon the raſhneſs and ingratitude of a child we once doated upon, that, I dare ſay, you will not countenance the ſtrange freedoms your daughter has taken with us all. Theſe are not the only ones we have to complain of; but we were ſilent on the others, as they did not, as theſe have done, ſpread themſelves out upon paper. We only beg, that we may not be reflected upon by a young lady, who knows not what we have ſuffered, and do ſuffer, by the raſhneſs of a naughty creature who has brought ruin upon herſelf, and diſgrace upon a family which ſhe has robbed of all comfort. I offer not to preſcribe to your known wiſdom in this caſe; but leave it to you to do as you think moſt proper. I am, Madam, your moſt humble ſervant, CHARL. HARLOWE.

LETTER LXXXIX.

MRS. HOWE. IN ANSWER.

SAT. JULY 22.

DEAR MADAM,

I Am highly offended with my daughter's letters to Miſs Harlowe. I knew nothing at all of her having taken ſuch a liberty. Theſe young creatures have ſuch romantick notions, ſome of love, ſome of friendſhip, that there is no governing them in either. Nothing but time, and dear experience, will convince them of their abſurdities in both. I have chidden Miſs Howe very ſeverely. I had before ſo juſt a notion of what your whole family's diſtreſs muſt be, that, as I told your brother, Mr. Antony Harlowe, I had often forbid her correſponding with the poor fallen angel—For ſurely never did young lady more reſemble what we imagine of angels, both in perſon and mind. But, tired out with her headſtrong ways, [I am ſorry to ſay this of my own child] I was forced to give way to it again. And, indeed, ſo ſturdy was ſhe in her will, that I was afraid it would end in a fit of ſickneſs, as too often it did in fits of ſullens.

None but parents know the trouble that children give: they are happieſt, I have often thought, who have none. And theſe women-grown girls, bleſs my heart! how ungovernable!

I believe, however, you will have no more ſuch letters from my Nancy. I have been forced to uſe compulſion with her, upon Miſs Clary's illneſs, [and it ſeems ſhe is very bad] or ſhe would have run away to London, to attend upon her: and this ſhe calls doing the duty of a friend; forgetting, that ſhe ſacrifices to her romantick friendſhip her duty to her fond indulgent mother.

There are a thouſand excellences in the poor ſufferer, notwithſtanding her fault: and, if the hints ſhe has given to my daughter be true, ſhe has been moſt grievouſly abuſed. But I think your forgiveneſs and her father's forgiveneſs of her ought to be all at your own choice; and nobody ſhould intermeddle in that, for the ſake of due authority in parents: and, beſides, as Miſs Harlowe writes, it was what everybody expected, though Miſs Clary would not believe it, till ſhe ſmarted for her credulity. And for theſe reaſons, I offer not to plead any-thing in alleviation of her fault, which is aggravated by her admirable ſenſe, and a judgment above her years.

I am, Madam, with compliments to good Mr. Harlowe, and all your afflicted family, your moſt humble ſervant,

ANNABELLA HOWE.

I ſhall ſet out for the Iſle of Wight in a few days, with my daughter. I will haſten our ſetting out, on purpoſe to break her mind from her friend's diſtreſſes; which afflict us as much, nearly, as Miſs Clary's raſhneſs has done you.

LETTER XC.

MISS HOWE, TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

SAT. JULY 22.

MY DEAREST FRIEND,

WE are buſy in preparing for our little journey and voyage: but I will be ill, I will be very ill, if I cannot hear you are better before I go.

Rogers greatly afflicted me, by telling me the bad way you are in. But now you have been able to hold a pen, and as your ſenſe is ſtrong and clear, I hope that the amuſement you will receive from writing will make you better.

I diſpatch this by an extraordinary way, that it may reach you time enough to move you to conſider well before you abſolulely decide upon the contents of mine of the 13th, on the ſubject of the two Miſs Montague's viſit to me; ſince, according to what you write, muſt I anſwer them.

In your laſt, you conclude very poſitively, that you will not be his. To be ſure, he rather deſerves an infamous death, than ſuch a wife. But, as I really really believe him innocent of the arreſt, and as all his family are ſuch earneſt pleaders, and will be guarantees, for him, I think the compliance with their entreaties, and his own, will be now the beſt ſtep you can take; your own family remaining implacable, as I can aſſure you they do. He is a man of ſenſe; and it is not impoſſible but he may make you a good huſband, and in time may become no bad man.

My mother is entirely of my opinion, and on Friday, purſuant to a hint I gave you in my laſt, Mr. Hickman had a conference with the ſtrange wretch: and, though he liked not, by any means, his behaviour to himſelf; nor, indeed, had reaſon to do ſo; yet he is of opinion, that he is ſincerely determined to marry you, if you will condeſcend to have him.

Perhaps Mr. Hickman may make you a private viſit before we ſet out. If I may not attend you myſelf, I ſhall not be eaſy, except he does. And he will then give you an account of the admirable character the ſurprizing wretch gave of you, and of the juſtice he does to your virtue.

He was as acknowledging to his relations, though to his own condemnation, as his two couſins told me. All that he apprehends, as he ſaid to Mr. Hickman, is, that if you go on expoſing him, wedlock itſelf will not wipe off the diſhonour to both: and moreover, that you would ruin your conſtitution by your immoderate ſorrow: and, by ſeeking death when you might avoid it, would not be able to eſcape it when you would wiſh to do ſo.

So, my deareſt friend, I charge you, if you can, to get over your averſion to this vile man. You may yet live to ſee many happy days, and be once more the delight of all your friends, neighbours and acquaintance, as well as a ſtay, a comfort, a bleſſing, to your Anna Howe.

I long to have your anſwer to mine of the 13th. Pray keep the meſſenger till it be ready. If he return on Monday night, it will be time enough for his affairs, and to find me come back from Colonel Ambroſe's; who gives a ball on the anniverſary of Mrs. Ambroſe's birth and marriage, both in one. The gentry all round the neighbourhood are invited this time, on ſome good news they have received from Mrs. Ambroſe's brother, the governor.

My mother promiſed the colonel for me and herſelf, in my abſence. I would fain have excuſed myſelf to her; and the rather, as I had exceptions on account of the day: but ſhe is almoſt as young as her daughter; and thinking it not ſo well to go without me, ſhe told me, She could propoſe nothing that was agreeable to me. And having had a few ſparring blows with each other very lately, I think I muſt comply. For I don't love jangling when I can help it; though I ſeldom make it my ſtudy to avoid the occaſion, when it offers of itſelf. I don't know, if either were not a little afraid of the other, whether it would be poſſible that we could live together:—I, all my father!—My mamma—What?—All my mother—What elſe ſhould I ſay?

O my dear, how many things happen in this life to give us diſpleaſure! How few to give us joy!—I am ſure I ſhall have none on this occaſion; ſince the true partner of my heart, the principal half of the one ſoul, that, it uſed to be ſaid, animated the pair of friends, as we were called; you, my dear, [who uſed to irradiate every circle you ſet your foot into, and to give me real ſignificance in a ſecond place to yourſelf] cannot be there!—One hour of your company, my ever-inſtructive friend, [I thirſt for it!] how infinitely preferable would it be to me, to all the diverſions and amuſements with which our ſex are generally moſt delighted—Adieu, my dear!

A. Howe.

LETTER XCI.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

SUNDAY, JULY 23.

WHAT pain, my deareſt friend, does your kind ſolicitude for my welfare give me! How much more binding and tender are the ties of pure friendſhip, and the union of like minds, than the ties of nature! Well might the ſweet-ſinger of Iſrael, when he was carrying to the utmoſt extent the praiſes of the friendſhip between him and his beloved friend, ſay, that the love of Jonathan to him was wonderful; that it ſurpaſſed the love of women! What an exalted idea does it give of the ſoul of Jonathan, ſweetly attempered for the ſacred band, if we may ſuppoſe it but equal to that of my Anna Howe for her fallen Clariſſa!—But, although I can glory in your kind love for me, think, my dear, what concern muſt fill a mind, not ungenerous, when the obligation lies all on one ſide: and when, at the ſame time that your light is the brighter for my darkneſs, I muſt give pain to a dear friend, to whom I delighted to give pleaſure; and not pain only, but diſcredit, for ſupporting my blighted fame againſt the buſy tongues of uncharitable cenſurers!

This it is that makes me, in the words of my admired exclaimer, very little altered, often repeat: 'O! that I were as 'in months paſt! as in the days when 'God preſerved me! When his candle 'ſhined upon my head, and when by his 'light I walked through darkneſs! As 'I was in the days of my childhood— 'when the Almighty was yet with me; 'when I was in my father's houſe: when I 'waſhed my ſteps with butter, and the 'rock poured me out rivers of oil.'

You ſet before me your reaſons, enforced by the opinion of your honoured mother, why I ſhould think of Mr. Lovelace for a huſband.

And I have before me your letter of the 13th, containing the account of the viſit and propoſals, and kind interpoſition of the two Miſſes Montague, in the names of the good Ladies Sarah Sadleir and Betty Lawrance, and in that of Lord M.

Alſo yours of the 18th, demanding me, as I may ſay, of thoſe ladies, and of that family, when I was ſo infamouſly and cruelly arreſted, and you knew not what was become of me.

The anſwer likewiſe of thoſe ladies, ſigned in ſo full and ſo generous a manner by themſelves, and by that nobleman, and thoſe two venerable ladies; and, in his light way, by the wretch himſelf.

Theſe, my deareſt Miſs Howe; and your letter of the 16th, which came when I was under arreſt, and which I received not till ſome days after;

Are all before me.

And I have as well weighed the whole matter, and your arguments in ſupport of your advice, as at preſent my head and my heart will let me weigh them.

I am, moreover, willing to believe, not only from your own opinion, but from the aſſurances of one of Mr. Lovelace's friends, Mr. Belford, a good-natured and humane man, who ſpares not to cenſure the author of my calamities, (I think, with undiſſembled and undeſigning ſincerity) that that man is innocent of the diſgraceful arreſt:

And even, if you pleaſe, in ſincere compliment to your opinion, and to that of Mr. Hickman, that (over-perſuaded by his friends, and aſhamed of his unmerited baſeneſs to me) he would in earneſt marry me, if I would have him.

'* Well, and now, what is the reſult 'of all?—It is this—That I muſt abide 'by what I have already declared—And 'that is, [Don't be angry at me, my beſt 'friend] that I have much more pleaſure 'in thinking of death, than of ſuch a 'huſband. In ſhort, as I declared in my 'laſt, that I cannot [Forgive me, if I 'ſay, I will not] ever be his.

'But you will expect my reaſons: I 'know you will: and if I give them not, 'will conclude me either obſtinate, or 'implacable, or both: and thoſe would 'be ſad imputations, if juſt, to be laid 'to the charge of a perſon who thinks 'and talks of dying. And yet, to ſay, 'that reſentment and diſappointment 'have no part in my determination, 'would be ſaying a thing hardly to be 'credited. For I own I have reſent-'ments, ſtrong reſentments, but not un-'reaſonable ones, as you will be con-'vinced, if already you are not ſo, when 'you know all my ſtory—If ever you do 'know it—For I begin to fear (ſo many 'things more neceſſary to be thought of, 'than either this man, or my own vindi-'cation, have I to do) that I ſhall not have 'time to compaſs what I have intended, 'and, in a manner, promiſed you.

'I have one reaſon to give in ſupport 'of my reſolution, that, I believe your-'ſelf will allow of: but having owned, 'that I have reſentments, I will begin 'with thoſe conſiderations, in which an-'ger and diſappointment have too great 'a ſhare; in hopes, that having once 'diſburdened my mind upon paper, and 'to my Anna Howe, of thoſe corrod-'ing uneaſy paſſions, I ſhall prevent them 'for ever from returning to my heart, 'and to have their place ſupplied by 'better, milder, and more agreeable 'ones.

'My pride, then, my deareſt friend, 'although a great deal mortified, is not 'ſufficiently mortified, if it be neceſſary 'for me to ſubmit to make that man my 'choice, whoſe actions are, and ought 'to be, my abhorrence!—What!—Shall 'I, who have been treated with ſuch 'premeditated and perfidious barbarity,

* Thoſe parts of this letter which are marked with inverted comma's [thus '] were afterwards tranſcribed by Miſs Howe in Letter IV. of Vol. VII. written to the ladies of Mr. Lovelace's family; and are thus diſtinguiſhed to avoid the neceſſity of repeating them in that letter.

'as is painful to be thought of, and cannot with modesty be described, think 'of taking the violator to my heart? Can 'I vow duty to one so wicked, and hazard my salvation by joining myself to so 'great a profligate, now I know him to 'be so? Do you think your Clarissa Harlowe so lost, so sunk, at least, as that she 'could, for the sake of patching up, in 'the world's eye, a broken reputation, 'meanly appear indebted to the generosity, or perhaps compassion, of a man, 'who has, by means so inhuman, robbed 'her of it? Indeed, my dear, I should 'not think my penitence for the rash step 'I took, any-thing better than a specious delusion, if I had not got above the 'least wish to have Mr. Lovelace for my 'husband.

'Yes, I warrant, I must creep to the 'violator, and be thankful to him for 'doing me poor justice!

'Do you not already see me, (pursuing the advice you give) with a downcast eye, appear before his friends, and 'before my own, (supposing the latter 'would at last condescend to own me) 'divested of that noble confidence, which 'arises from a mind unconscious of having deserved reproach?

'Do you not see me creep about mine 'own house, preferring all my honest 'maidens to myself—as if afraid, too, 'to open my lips, either by way of reproof or admonition, lest their bolder 'eyes should bid me look inward, and 'not expect perfection from them?

'And shall I entitle the wretch to upbraid me with his generosity, and his 'pity; and perhaps to reproach me, for 'having been capable of forgiving crimes 'of such a nature?

'I once indeed hoped, little thinking 'him so premeditatedly vile a man, that 'I might have the happiness to reclaim 'him: I vainly believed, that he loved 'me well enough to suffer my advice for 'his good, and the example I humbly 'presumed I should be enabled to set 'him, to have weight with him; and the 'rather, as he had no mean opinion of 'my morals and understanding: but 'now, what hope is there left for this 'my prime hope?—Were I to marry him, 'what a figure should I make, preaching virtue and morality to a man whom 'I had trusted with opportunities to seduce me from all my own duties?—'And then, supposing I were to have 'children by such a husband, must it 'not, think you, cut a thoughtful person to the heart, to look round upon 'her little family, and think she had 'given them a father destined, without 'a miracle, to perdition; and whose immoralities, propagated among them 'by his vile example, might, too probably, bring down a curse upon them?

'And, after all, who knows but that 'my own sinful compliances with a man, 'who would think himself entitled to 'my obedience, might taint my own morals, and make me, instead of a reformer, an imitator of him?—For who 'can touch pitch, and not be defiled?

'Let me then repeat, that I truly despise this man! If I know my own heart, 'indeed I do!—I pity him! Beneath my 'very pity as he is, I nevertheless pity 'him!—But this I could not do, if I 'still loved him: for, my dear, one 'must be greatly sensible of the baseness 'and ingratitude of those we love. I love 'him not, therefore! My soul disdains 'communion with him.

'But although thus much is due to 'resentment, yet have I not been so far 'carried away by it's angry effects, as to 'be rendered incapable of casting about 'what I ought to do, and what could be 'done, if the Almighty, in order to 'lengthen the time of my penitence, 'were to bid me to live.

'The single life, at such times, has 'offered to me, as the life, the only life, 'to be chosen. But in that, must I not 'now sit brooding over my past afflictions, and mourning my faults till the 'hour of my release? And would not 'every-one be able to assign the reason, 'why Clarissa Harlowe chose solitude, 'and to sequester herself from the world? 'Would not the look of every creature, 'who beheld me, appear as a reproach 'to me? And would not my conscious 'eye confess my fault, whether the eyes 'of others accused me or not? One of 'my delights was, to enter the cots of 'my poor neighbours, to leave lessons 'to the boys, and cautions to the elder 'girls: and how should I be able, unconscious, and without pain, to say to 'the latter, "Fly the delusions of men," 'who had been supposed to have run 'away with one?

'What then, my dear and only friend, 'can I wish for but death?—And what, 'after all, is death? 'Tis but a cessation 'from mortal life: 'tis but the finishing 'of an appointed course: the refreshing 'inn after a fatiguing journey: the end 'of a life of cares and troubles; and if 'happy, the beginning of a life of immortal happiness.

'If I die not now, it may possibly 'happen, that I may be taken when I 'am

'am less prepared. Had I escaped the 'evils I labour under, it might have been 'in the midst of some gay promising 'hope; when my heart had beat high 'with the desire of life; and when the 'vanity of this earth had taken hold of 'me.

'But now, my dear, for your satis-'faction let me say, that although I wish 'not for life, yet would I not, like a 'poor coward, desert my post when I 'can maintain it, and when it is my duty 'to maintain it.

'More than once, indeed, was I urg-'ed by thoughts so sinful: but then it 'was in the height of my distress: and 'once, particularly, I have reason to 'believe, I saved myself by my despe-'ration from the most shocking personal 'insults; from a repetition, as far as I 'know, of his vileness; the base wo-'men (with so much reason dreaded by 'me) present, to intimidate me, if not 'to assist him!—O my dear, you know 'not what I suffered on that occasion!— 'Nor do I what I escaped at the time, if 'the wicked man had approached me to 'execute the horrid purposes of his vile 'heart.'

As I am of opinion, that it would have manifested more of revenge and despair, than of principle, had I committed a violence upon myself, when the villainy was perpetrated; so I should think it equally criminal, were I now wilfully to neglect myself; were I purposely to run into the arms of death, (as that man supposes I shall do) when I might avoid it.

Nor, my dear, whatever are the suppositions of such a short-sighted, such a low-souled man, must you impute to gloom, to melancholy, to despondency, nor yet to a spirit of faulty pride, or still more faulty revenge, the resolution I have taken never to marry this; and if not this, any man. So far from deserving this imputation, I do assure you, (my dear and only love) that I will do every-thing I can to prolong my life, till God, in mercy to me, shall be pleased to call for it. I have reason to think my punishment is but the due consequence of my fault, and I will not run away from it; but beg of Heaven to sanctify it to me. When appetite serves, I will eat and drink what is sufficient to support nature. A very little, you know, will do for that. And whatever my physicians shall think fit to prescribe, I will take, though ever so disagreeable. In short, I will do every-thing I can do, to convince all my friends, who hereafter may think it worth their while to enquire after my last behaviour, that I possessed my soul with tolerable patience; and endeavoured to bear with a lot of my own drawing; for thus, in humble imitation of the sublimest exemplar, I often say:—'Lord, it is thy will; and it shall 'be mine. Thou art just in all thy 'dealings with the children of men, and 'I know thou wilt not afflict me beyond 'what I can bear: and, if I can bear it, 'I ought to bear it; and (thy grace as-'sisting me) I will bear it.'

'But here, my dear, is another rea-'son, a reason that will convince you 'yourself, that I ought not to think of 'wedlock; but of a preparation for a 'quite different event. I am per-'suaded, as much as that I am now 'alive, that I shall not long live. The 'strong sense I have ever had of my 'fault, the loss of my reputation, my 'disappointments, the determined re-'sentment of my friends, aiding the 'barbarous usage I have met with 'where I least deserved it, have seized 'upon my heart: seized upon it, be-'fore it was so well fortified by reli-'gious considerations as I hope it now is. 'Don't be concerned, my dear—But I 'am sure, if I may say it with as little 'presumption as grief, That God will 'soon dissolve my substance; and bring me 'to death, and to the house appointed for all 'living.'

And now, my dearest friend, you know all my mind. And you will be pleased to write to the ladies of Mr. Lovelace's family, that I think myself infinitely obliged to them, for their good opinion of me; and that it has given me greater pleasure than I thought I had to come in this life, that, upon the little knowledge they have of me, and that not personal, I was thought worthy (after the ill usage I have received) of an alliance with their honourable family: but that I can by no means think of their kinsman for a husband: and do you, my dear, extract from the above, such reasons as you think have any weight in them.

I would write myself to acknowledge their favour, had I not more employment for my head, my heart, and my fingers, than I doubt they will be able to go through.

I should be glad to know when you set out on your journey; as also your little stages; and your time of stay at your aunt Harman's; that my prayers

may may locally attend you, whitherſoever you go, and wherever you are.

CLARISSA HARLOWE.

LETTER XCII.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

SUNDAY, JULY 23.

THE letter accompanying this being upon a very particular ſubject, I would not embarraſs it, as I may ſay, with any other. And yet having ſome further matters upon my mind, which will want your excuſe for directing them to you, I hope the following lines will have that excuſe.

My good Mrs. Norton, ſo long ago as in a letter dated the third of this month, hinted to me, that my relations took amiſs ſome ſevere things you were pleaſed, in love to me, to ſay of them. Mrs. Norton mentioned it with that reſpectful love which ſhe bears to my deareſt friend: but wiſhed, for my ſake, that you would rein-in a vivacity, which, on moſt other occaſions, ſo charmingly becomes you. This was her ſenſe. You know that I am warranted to ſpeak and write freer to my Anna Howe, than Mrs. Norton would do.

I durſt not mention it to you at that time, becauſe appearances were ſo ſtrong againſt me, on Mr. Lovelace's getting me again into his power, (after my eſcape to Hampſtead) as made you very angry with me when you anſwered mine on my ſecond eſcape. And, ſoon afterwards, I was put under that barbarous arreſt; ſo that I could not well touch upon that ſubject till now.

Now, therefore, my deareſt Miſs Howe, let me repeat my earneſt requeſt, (for this is not the firſt time by ſeveral that I have been obliged to chide you on this occaſion) that you will ſpare my parents, and other relations, in all your converſations about me.—Indeed, I wiſh they had thought fit to take other meaſures with me: but who ſhall judge for them?—The event has juſtified them, and condemned me.—They expected nothing good of this vile man; he has not, therefore, deceived them: but they expected other things from me; and I have. And they have the more reaſon to be ſet againſt me, if (as my aunt Hervey wrote formerly) they intended not to force my inclinations, in favour of Mr. Solmes; and if they believe, that my going off was the effect of choice and premeditation.

I have no deſire to be received to favour by them: for why ſhould I ſit down to wiſh for what I have no reaſon to expect?—Beſides, I could not look them in the face, if they would receive me. Indeed I could not. All I have to hope for, is, firſt, that my father will abſolve me from his heavy malediction: and next, for a laſt bleſſing. The obtaining of theſe favours are needful to my peace of mind.

I have written to my ſiſter; but have only mentioned the abſolution.

I am afraid, I ſhall receive a very harſh anſwer from her: my fault, in the eyes of my family, is of ſo enormous a nature, that my firſt application will hardly be encouraged. Then they know not (nor perhaps will believe) that I am ſo very ill as I am. So that, were I actually to die before they could have time to take the neceſſary informations, you muſt not blame them too ſeverely. You muſt call it a fatality. I know not what you muſt call it: for, alas! I have made them as miſerable as I am myſelf. And yet ſometimes I think, that, were they cheerfully to pronounce me forgiven, I know not whether my concern for having offended them would not be augmented: ſince I imagine, that nothing can be more wounding to a ſpirit not ungenerous, than a generous forgiveneſs.

I hope your mother will permit our correſpondence for one month more, although I do not take her advice as to having this man. Only for one month. I will not deſire it longer. When cataſtrophes are winding-up, what changes (changes that make one's heart ſhudder to think of) may one ſhort month produce!—But if ſhe will not—why then, my dear, it becomes us both to acquieſce.

You can't think what my apprehenſions would have been, had I known Mr. Hickman was to have had a meeting (on ſuch a queſtioning occaſion as muſt have been his errand from you) with that haughty and uncontroulable man.

You give me hope of a viſit from Mr. Hickman: let him expect to ſee me greatly altered. I know he loves me: for he loves every-one whom you love. A painful interview, I doubt! But I ſhall be glad to ſee a man, whom you will one day, and that on an early day, I hope, make happy; and whoſe gentle manners, manners, and unbounded love for you, will make you so, if it be not your own fault.

I am, my dearest, kindest friend, the truest companion of my happy hours, the friend ever dearest and nearest to my fond heart, your equally obliged and faithful

CLARISSA HARLOWE.

LETTER XCIII.

MRS. NORTON, TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

MONDAY, JULY 24.

EXCUSE, my dearest young lady, my long silence. I have been extremely ill. My poor boy has also been at death's door; and, when I hoped that he was better, he has relapsed. Alas! my dear, he is very dangerously ill. Let us both have your prayers!

Very angry letters have passed between your sister and Miss Howe. Every one of your family is incensed against that young lady. I wish you would remonstrate against her warmth; since it can do no good: for they will not believe, but that her interposition has your connivance; nor that you are so ill as Miss Howe assures them you are.

Before she wrote, they were going to send up young Mr. Brand the clergyman, to make private enquiries of your health, and way of life.—But now they are so exasperated, that they have laid aside their intention.

We have flying reports here, and at Harlowe Place, of some fresh insults which you have undergone: and that you are about to put yourself into Lady Betty Lawrance's protection. I believe they would now be glad (as I should be) that you would do so; and this, perhaps, will make them suspend, for the present, any determination in your favour.

How unhappy am I, that the dangerous way my son is in prevents my attendance on you! Let me beg of you to write me word how you are, both as to person and mind. A servant of Sir Robert Beachcroft, who rides post on his master's business to town, will present you with this; and, perhaps, will bring me the favour of a few lines in return. He will be obliged to stay in town several hours, for an answer to his dispatches.

This is the anniversary, that used to give joy to as many as had the pleasure and honour of knowing you. May the Almighty bless you, and grant, that it may be the only unhappy one that may be ever known by you, my dearest young lady; and by your ever-affectionate

THE HISTORY OF CLARISSA HARLOWE.

VOLUME THE SEVENTH.

LETTER I.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MRS. NORTON.

MONDAY NIGHT, JULY 24.

MY DEAR MRS. NORTON,

HAD I not fallen into freſh troubles, which diſabled me for ſeveral days from holding a pen, I ſhould not have forborne enquiring after your health, and that of your ſon; for I ſhould have been but too ready to impute your ſilence to the cauſe, to which, to my very great concern, I find it was owing. I pray to Heaven, my dear good friend, to give you comfort in the way moſt deſirable to yourſelf.

I am exceedingly concerned at Miſs Howe's writing about me to my friends. I do aſſure you, that I was as ignorant of her intention ſo to do, as of the contents of her letter. Nor has ſhe yet let me know (diſcouraged, I ſuppoſe, by her ill ſucceſs) that ſhe did write. It is impoſſible to ſhare the delight which ſuch charming ſpirits give, without the inconvenience that will attend their volatility.—So mixed are our beſt enjoyments!

It was but yeſterday that I wrote to chide the dear creature for freedoms of that nature, which her unſeaſonably-expreſſed love for me had made her take, as you wrote me word in your former. I was afraid, that all ſuch freedoms would be attributed to me. And I am ſure, that nothing but my own application to my friends, and a full conviction of my contrition, will procure me favour. Leaſt of all can I expect, that either your mediation or hers (both of whoſe fond and partial love of me is ſo well known) will avail me.

She then gives a brief account of the arreſt: of her dejection under it: of her apprehenſions of being carried to her former lodgings: of Mr. Lovelace's avowed innocence, as to that inſult: of her releaſe by Mr. Belford: of Mr. Lovelace's promiſe not to moleſt her: of her cloaths being ſent her: of the earneſt deſire of all his friends, and of himſelf, to marry her: of Miſs Howe's advice to comply with their requeſts: and of her declared reſolution rather to die, than be his, ſent to Miſs Howe, to be given to his relations, but as the day before. After which ſhe thus proceeds:

Now, my dear Mrs. Norton, you will be ſurprized, perhaps, that I ſhould have returned ſuch an anſwer: but, when you have every-thing before you, you, who know me ſo well, will not think me wrong. And, beſides, I am upon a better preparation, than for an earthly huſband.

Nor let it be imagined, my dear and ever-venerable friend, that my preſent turn of mind proceeds from gloomineſs or melancholy: for although it was brought on by diſappointment, (the world ſhewing me early, even at my firſt ruſhing into it, it's true and ugly face;) yet I hope, that it has obtained a better root, and will every day more and more, by it's fruits, demonſtrate to me, and to all my friends, that it has.

I have written to my ſiſter. Laſt Friday I wrote. So the dye is thrown. I hope for a gentle anſwer. But, perhaps, they will not vouchſafe me any. It is my my firſt direct application, you know. I wiſh Miſs Howe had left me to my own workings in this tender point.

It will be a great ſatisfaction to me to hear of your perfect recovery; and that my foſter-brother is out of danger. But why ſaid I, out of danger?—When can this be juſtly ſaid of creatures, who hold by ſo uncertain a tenure? This is one of thoſe forms of common ſpeech, that proves the frailty and the preſumption of poor mortals, at the ſame time.

Don't be uneaſy you cannot anſwer your wiſhes to be with me. I am happier than I could have expected to be among mere ſtrangers. It was grievous at firſt; but uſe reconciles every-thing to us. The people of the houſe where I am, are courteous and honeſt. There is a widow who lodges in it, [Have I not ſaid ſo formerly?) a good woman; who is the better for having been a proficient in the ſchool of affliction.

An excellent ſchool, my dear Mrs. Norton! in which we are taught to know ourſelves, to be able to compaſſionate and bear with one another, and to look up to a better hope.

I have as humane a phyſician, (whoſe fees are his leaſt regard) and as worthy an apothecary, as ever patient was viſited by. My nurſe is diligent, obliging, ſilent, and ſober. So I am not unhappy without: and within—I hope, my dear Mrs. Norton, that I ſhall be every day more and more happy within.

No doubt, it would be one of the greateſt comforts I could know, to have you with me: you, who love me ſo dearly: who have been the watchful ſuſtainer of my helpleſs infancy: you, by whoſe precepts I have been ſo much benefited!—In your dear boſom could I repoſe all my griefs: and by your piety, and experience in the ways of Heaven, ſhould I be ſtrengthened in what I am ſtill to go through.

But, as it muſt not be, I will acquieſce; and ſo, I hope, will you: for you ſee in what reſpects I am not unhappy; and in thoſe that I am, they lie not in your power to remedy.

Then, as I have told you, I have all my cloaths in my own poſſeſſion. So I am rich enough, as to this world, in common conveniences.

So you ſee, my venerable and dear friend, that I am not always turning the dark ſide of my proſpects, in order to move compaſſion; a trick imputed to me, too often, by my hard-hearted ſiſter; when, if I know my own heart, it is above all trick or artifice. Yet I hope at laſt I ſhall be ſo happy, as to receive benefit rather than reproach from this talent, if it be my talent. At laſt, I ſay; for whoſe heart have I hitherto moved?—Not one, I am ſure, that was not predetermined in my favour.

As to the day—I have paſſed it, as I ought to paſs it. It has been a very heavy day to me!—More for my friends ſake, too, than for my own!—How did they uſe to paſs it!—What a feſtivity!—How have they now paſſed it?—To imagine it, how grievous!—Say not, that thoſe are cruel, who ſuffer ſo much for my fault; and who, for eighteen years together, rejoiced in me, and rejoiced me, by their indulgent goodneſs!—But I will think the reſt!—Adieu, my deareſt Mrs. Norton!—

Adieu!

LETTER II.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS ARABELLA HARLOWE.

FRIDAY, JULY 21.

IF, my deareſt ſiſter, I did not think the ſtate of my health very precarious, and that it was my duty to take this ſtep, I ſhould hardly have dared to approach you, although but with my pen, after having found your cenſures ſo dreadfully juſtified as they have been.

I have not the courage to write to my father himſelf; nor yet to my mother. And it is with trembling, that I addreſs myſelf to you, to beg of you to intercede for me, that my father will have the goodneſs to revoke that heavieſt part of the very heavy curſe he laid upon me, which relates to HEREAFTER: for, as to the HERE, I have indeed met with my puniſhment from the very wretch in whom I was ſuppoſed to place my confidence.

As I hope not for reſtoration to favour, I may be allowed to be very earneſt on this head: yet will I not uſe any arguments in ſupport of my requeſt, becauſe I am ſure my father, were it in his power, would not have his poor child miſerable for ever.

I have the moſt grateful ſenſe of my mother's goodneſs in ſending me up my cloaths. I would have acknowledged the favour the moment I received them, with the moſt thankful duty, but that I feared any line from me would be unacceptable.

I would not give freſh offence: ſo will decline all other commendations of duty and love: appealing to my heart for both, where both are flaming with an ardour that nothing but death can extinguiſh:

extinguiſh: therefore only ſubſcribe myſelf, without ſo much as a name, my dear and happy ſiſter,

Your afflicted Servant.

A letter directed for me, at Mr. Smith's, a glover, in King Street, Covent Garden, will come to hand.

LETTER III.

MR. BELFORD, TO ROBERT LOVELACE, ESQ.

[IN ANSWER TO LETTERS LXXIX. LXXXII. VOL. VI.]

EDGWARE, MONDAY, JULY 24.

WHAT pains thou takeſt to perſuade thyſelf, that the lady's ill health is owing to the vile arreſt, and to the implacableneſs of her friends! Both primarily (if they were) to be laid at thy door. What poor excuſes will good heads make for the evils they are put upon by bad hearts!—But 'tis no wonder that he who can ſit down premeditatedly to do a bad action, will content himſelf with a bad excuſe: and yet, what fools muſt he ſuppoſe the reſt of the world to be, if he imagines them as eaſy to be impoſed upon, as he can impoſe upon himſelf?

In vain doſt thou impute to pride or wilfulneſs the neceſſity to which thou haſt reduced this lady, of parting with her cloaths: for can ſhe do otherwiſe, and be the noble-minded creature ſhe is?

Her implacable friends have refuſed her the current caſh ſhe left behind her; and wiſhed, as her ſiſter wrote to her, to ſee her reduced to want: probably therefore they will not be ſorry that ſhe is reduced to ſuch ſtreights; and will take it for a juſtification from Heaven of their wicked hard-heartedneſs. Thou canſt not ſuppoſe ſhe would take ſupplies from thee: to take them from me would, in her opinion, be taking them from thee. Miſs Howe's mother is an avaricious woman; and, perhaps, the daughter can do nothing of that ſort unknown to her; and, if ſhe could, is too noble a girl to deny it, if charged. And then Miſs Harlowe is firmly of opinion, that ſhe ſhall never want nor wear the things ſhe diſpoſes of.

Having heard nothing from town that obliges me to go thither, I ſhall gratify poor Belton with my company till to-morrow, or perhaps till Wedneſday: for the unhappy man is more and more loth to part with me. I ſhall ſoon ſet out for Epſom, to endeavour to ſerve him there, and reinſtate him in his own houſe. Poor fellow! he is moſt horribly low-ſpirited; mopes about; and nothing diverts him. I pity him at my heart; but can do him no good.—What conſolation can I give him, either from his paſt life, or from his future proſpects?

Our friendſhips and intimacies, Lovelace, are only calculated for ſtrong life and health. When ſickneſs comes, we look round us, and upon one another, like frighted birds at the ſight of a kite ready to ſouſe upon them. Then, with all our bravery, what miſerable wretches are we!

Thou telleſt me, that thou ſeeſt reformation is coming ſwiftly upon me. I hope it is. I ſee ſo much difference in the behaviour of this admirable woman in her illneſs, and that of poor Belton in his, that it is plain to me, the ſinner is the real coward, and the ſaint the true hero; and, ſooner or later, we ſhall all find it to be ſo, if we are not cut off ſuddenly.

The lady ſhut herſelf up at ſix o'clock yeſterday afternoon; and intends not to ſee company till ſeven or eight this; not even her nurſe—Impoſing upon herſelf a ſevere faſt. And why? It is her BIRTH-DAY!—Blooming—yet declining in her very bloſſom!—Every birth-day till this, no doubt, happy!—What muſt be her reflections!—What ought to be thine!

What ſport doſt thou make with my aſpirations, and my proſtrations, as thou calleſt them; and with my dropping of the Bank note behind her chair! I had too much awe of her at the time, and too much apprehended her diſpleaſure at the offer, to make it with the grace that would better have become my intention. But the action, if aukward, was modeſt. Indeed, the fitter ſubject for ridicule with thee; who canſt no more taſte the beauty and delicacy of modeſt obligingneſs, than of modeſt love. For the ſame may be ſaid of inviolable reſpect, that the poet ſays of unfeigned affection—

'I ſpeak! I know not what!
'Speak ever ſo; and if I anſwer you
'I know not what, it ſhews the more of 'love.
'Love is a child that talks in broken language;
'Yet then it ſpeaks moſt plain.'

The like may be pleaded in behalf of that modeſt reſpect which made the humble offerer afraid to invade the awful ful eye, or the revered hand; but awkwardly to drop it's incense beside the altar it should have been laid upon. But how should that soul, which could treat delicacy itself brutality, know any-thing of this!

But I am still more amazed at thy courage, to think of throwing thyself in the way of Miss Howe, and Miss Arabella Harlowe!—Thou wilt not dare, surely, to carry this thought into execution!

As to my dress, and thy dress, I have only to say, that the sum total of thy observation is this: that my outside is the worst of me; and thine the best of thee: and what getteſt thou by the comparison? Do thou reform the one, and I'll try to mend the other. I challenge thee to begin.

Mrs. Lovick gave me, at my request, the copy of a meditation she shewed me, which was extracted by the lady, from the Scriptures, while under arrest at Rowland's, as appears by the date. The lady is not to know that I have taken a copy.

You and I always admired the noble simplicity, and natural ease and dignity of style, which are the distinguishing characteristicks of these books, whenever any passages from them, by way of quotation in the works of other authors, popt upon us. And once I remember you, even you, observed, that those passages always appeared to you like a rich vein of golden ore, which runs through baser metals; embellishing the work they were brought to authenticate.

Try, Lovelace, if thou canst relish a divine beauty. I think it must strike transient (if not permanent) remorse into thy heart. Thou boastest of thy ingenuousness: let this be the test of it; and whether thou canst be serious on a subject so deep, the occasion of it resulting from thyself.

'MEDITATION.

SATURDAY, JULY 15.

'O That my grief were thoroughly weighed, and my calamity laid in the balance together!

'For now it would be heavier than the sand of the sea: therefore my words are swallowed up!

'For the arrows of the Almighty are within me; the poison whereof drinketh up my spirit. The terrors of God do set themselves in array against me.

'When I lie down, I say, When shall I arise? When will the night be gone? And I am full of tossings to and fro, unto the dawning of the day.

'My days are swifter than a weaver's shuttle, and are spent without hope—Mine eye shall no more see good.

'Wherefore is light given to her that is in misery; and life unto the bitter in soul?

'Who longeth for death; but it cometh not; and diggeth for it more than for hid treasures?

'Why is light given to one whose way is hid; and whom God hath hedged in?

'For the thing which I greatly feared is come upon me!

'I was not in safety; neither had I rest; neither was I quiet: yet trouble came.

'But behold God is mighty, and despiseth not any.

'He giveth right to the poor—And if they be bound in fetters, and holden in cords of affliction, then he sheweth them their work and their transgressions.'

I HAVE a little leisure, and am in a scribbling vein: indulge me, Lovelace, a few reflections on these sacred books.

We are taught to read the Bible, when children, and as a rudiment only; and, as far as I know, this may be the reason, why we think ourselves above it, when at a maturer age. For you know, that our parents, as well as we, wisely rate our proficiency by the books we are advanced to, and not by our understanding of those we have passed through. But, in my uncle's illness, I had the curiosity, in some of my dull hours, (lighting upon one in his closet) to dip into it: and then I found, whereever I turned, that there were admirable things in it. I have borrowed one, on receiving from Mrs. Lovick the above meditation; for I had a mind to compare the passages contained in it by the book, hardly believing they could be so exceedingly apposite as I find they are. And one time or other, it is very likely, that I shall make a resolution to give the whole Bible a perusal, by way of course, as I may say.

This, mean time, I will venture to repeat, is certain, that the style is that truly easy, simple, and natural one, which we should admire in other authors excessively. Then all the world join in an opinion of the antiquity, and authenticity too, of the book; and the learned are fond of strengthening their different arguments by it's sanctions. Indeed, I was so much taken with it at my uncle's, that I was half ashamed that it appeared so new to me. And yet I cannot not but ſay, that I have ſome of the Old Teſtament hiſtory, as it is called, in my head: but, perhaps, am more obliged for it to Joſephus, than to the Bible itſelf.

Odd enough, with all our pride of learning, that we chuſe to derive the little we know from the under-currents, perhaps muddy ones too, when the clear, the pellucid fountain head, is much nearer at hand, and eaſier to be come at—Slighted the more, poſſibly, for that very reaſon!

But man is a pragmatical, fooliſh creature; and the more we look into him, the more we muſt deſpiſe him.—Lords of the creation!—Who can forbear indignant laughter! When we ſee not one of the individuals of that creation (his perpetually eccentric ſelf excepted) but acts within it's own natural and original appointments: and all the time, proud and vain as the conceited wretch is of fancied and ſelf-dependent excellence, he is obliged not only for the ornaments, but for the neceſſaries of life, (that is to ſay, for food as well as raiment) to all the other creatures; ſtrutting with their blood and ſpirits in his veins, and with their plumage on his back: for what has he of his own, but a very miſchievous, monkey-like, bad nature! Yet thinks himſelf at liberty to kick, and cuff, and elbow out every worthier creature: and when he has none of the animal creation to hunt down and abuſe, will make uſe of his power, his ſtrength, or his wealth, to oppreſs the leſs powerful and weaker of his own ſpecies!

When you and I meet next, let us enter more largely into this ſubject: and, I dare ſay, we ſhall take it by turns, in imitation of the two ſages of antiquity, to laugh and to weep at the thoughts of what miſerable, yet conceited beings, men in general, but we libertines in particular, are.

I fell upon a piece at Dorrell's, this very evening, intituled, The Sacred Claſſicks, written by one Blackwall.

I took it home with me, and had not read a dozen pages, when I was convinced, that I ought to be aſhamed of myſelf to think, how greatly I have admired leſs noble and leſs natural beauties in Pagan authors; while I have known nothing of this all-excelling collection of beauties, the Bible! By my faith, Lovelace, I ſhall for the future have a better opinion of the good ſenſe and taſte of half a ſcore parſons, whom I have fallen in with in my time, and deſpiſed for magnifying, as I thought they did, the language and the ſentiments to be found in it, in preference to all the ancient poets and philoſophers. And this is now a convincing proof to me, and ſhames as much an infidel's preſumption as his ignorance, that thoſe who know leaſt, are the greateſt ſcoffers. A pretty pack of would-be wits of us, who cenſure without knowledge, laugh without reaſon, and are moſt noiſy and loud againſt things we know leaſt of!

LETTER IV.

MR. BELFORD, TO ROBERT LOVELACE, ESQ.

WEDNESDAY, JULY 7th.

I Came not to town till this morning early: poor Belton clinging to me, as a man deſtitute of all other hold.

I haſtened to Smith's, and had but a very indifferent account of the lady's health. I ſent up my compliments; and ſhe deſired to ſee me in the afternoon.

Mrs. Lovick told me, that after I went away on Saturday, ſhe actually parted with one of her beſt ſuits of cloaths to a gentlewoman who is her [Mrs. Lovick's] benefactreſs, and who bought them for a niece who is very ſpeedily to be married, and whom ſhe fits out and portions as her intended heireſs. The lady was ſo jealous that the money might come from you or me, that ſhe would ſee the purchaſer: who owned to Mrs. Lovick, that ſhe bought them for half their worth: but yet, though her conſcience permitted her to take them at ſuch an under-rate, the widow ſays, her friend admired the lady, as one of the loveliеſt of her ſex: and having been let into a little of her ſtory, could not help tears at taking away her purchaſe.

She may be a good ſort of a woman: Mrs. Lovick ſays ſhe is: but SELF is an odious devil, that reconciles to ſome people the moſt cruel and diſhoneſt actions. But, nevertheleſs, it is my opinion, that thoſe who can ſuffer themſelves to take advantage of the neceſſities of their fellow-creatures, in order to buy any-thing at a leſs rate than would allow them the legal intereſt of their purchaſe-money, (ſuppoſing they purchaſe before they want) are no better than robbers for the difference.—To plunder a wreck, and to rob at a fire, are indeed higher degrees of wickedneſs: but do not thoſe, as well as theſe, heighten heighten the diſtreſſes of the diſtreſſed, and heap miſery on the miſerable, whom it is the duty of every-one to relieve?

About three o'clock I went again to Smith's. The lady was writing when I ſent up my name; but admitted of my viſit. I ſaw a viſible alteration in her countenance for the worſe; and Mrs. Lovick reſpectfully accuſing her of great aſſiduity to her pen, early and late, and of her abſtinence the day before, I took notice of the alteration; and told her, that her phyſician had greater hopes of her than ſhe had of herſelf; and I would take the liberty to ſay, that deſpair of recovery allowed not room for cure.

She ſaid, She neither deſpaired nor hoped. Then ſtepping to the glaſs, with great compoſure, 'My counte-'nance,' ſaid ſhe, 'is indeed an honeſt 'picture of my heart. But the mind 'will run away with the body at any 'time.

'Writing is all my diverſion,' continued ſhe; 'and I have ſubjects that 'cannot be diſpenſed with. As to my 'hours, I have always been an early 'riſer: but now reſt is leſs in my pow-'er than ever. Sleep has a long time 'ago quarrelled with me, and will not 'be friends, although I have made the 'firſt advances. What will be, muſt.'

She then ſtept to her cloſet, and brought me a parcel ſealed up with three ſeals: 'Be ſo kind,' ſaid ſhe, 'as 'to give this to your friend. A very 'grateful preſent it ought to be to him: 'for, Sir, this packet contains ſuch let-'ters of his to me, as, compared with 'his actions, would reflect diſhonour 'upon all his ſex, were they to fall into 'other hands.

'As to my letters to him, they are 'not many. He may either keep or 'deſtroy them, as he pleaſes.'

I thought, Lovelace, I ought not to forego this opportunity to plead for you: I therefore, with the packet in my hand, urged all the arguments I could think of in your favour.

She heard me out with more attention than I could have promiſed myſelf, conſidering her determined reſolution.

'I would not interrupt you, Mr. 'Belford,' ſaid ſhe, 'though I am far 'from being pleaſed with the ſubject 'of your diſcourſe. The motives for 'your pleas in his favour, are generous. 'I love to ſee inſtances of generous 'friendſhip in either ſex. But I have 'written my full mind on this ſubject 'to Miſs Howe, who will communicate it 'to the ladies of his family. No more, 'therefore, I pray you, upon a topick 'that may lead to diſagreeable recrimi-'nations.'

Her apothecary came in. He adviſed her to the air, and blamed her for ſo great an application, as he was told ſhe made, to her pen; and he gave it as the doctor's opinion, as well as his own, that ſhe would recover, if ſhe herſelf deſired to recover, and would uſe the means.

She may poſſibly write too much for her health; but I have obſerved, on ſeveral occaſions, that when the phyſical men are at a loſs what to preſcribe, they enquire what their patients beſt like, or are moſt diverted with, and forbid them that.

But, noble-minded as they ſee this lady is, they know not half her nobleneſs of mind, nor how deeply ſhe is wounded; and depend too much upon her youth, which I doubt will not do in this caſe; and upon time, which will not alleviate the woes of ſuch a mind: for, having been bent upon doing good, and upon reclaiming a libertine whom ſhe loved, ſhe is diſappointed in all her darling views, and will never be able, I fear, to look up with ſatisfaction enough in herſelf to make life deſirable to her. For this lady had other views in living, than the common ones of eating, ſleeping, dreſſing, viſiting, and thoſe other faſhionable amuſements, which fill up the time of moſt of her ſex, eſpecially of thoſe of it, who think themſelves fitted to ſhine in, and adorn polite aſſemblies. Her grief, in ſhort, ſeems to me to be of ſuch a nature, that time, which alleviates moſt other perſons afflictions, will, as the poet ſays, give increaſe to hers.

Thou, Lovelace, mighteſt have ſeen all this ſuperior excellence, as thou wenteſt along. In every word, in every ſentiment, in every action is it viſible.—But thy curſed inventions and intriguing ſpirit ran away with thee. 'Tis fit that the ſubject of thy wicked boaſt, and thy reflections on talents ſo egregiouſly miſapplied, ſhould be thy puniſhment and thy curſe.

Mr. Goddard took his leave; and I was going to do ſo too, when the maid came up, and told her, a gentleman was below, who very earneſtly enquired after her health, and deſired to ſee her: his name Hickman.

She was overjoyed; and bid the maid deſire the gentleman to walk up.

I would have withdrawn; but I ſuppoſe poſe ſhe thought it was likely I ſhould have met him upon the ſtairs; and ſo ſhe forbid it.

She ſhot to the ſtairs-head to receive him, and taking his hand, aſked half a dozen queſtions (without waiting for any anſwer) in relation to Miſs Howe's health; acknowledging, in high terms, her goodneſs in ſending him to ſee her, before ſhe ſet out upon her little journey.

He gave her a letter from that young lady; which ſhe put into her boſom, ſaying, ſhe would read it by-and-by.

He was viſibly ſhocked to ſee how ill ſhe looked.

'You look at me with concern, Mr. 'Hickman,' ſaid ſhe—'O Sir! times 'are ſtrangely altered with me, ſince I 'ſaw you laſt at my dear Miſs Howe's! '—What a cheerful creature was I 'then!—My heart at reſt! My proſ-'pects charming! And beloved by 'every-body!—But I will not pain 'you!'

'Indeed, Madam,' ſaid he, 'I am 'grieved for you at my ſoul.'

He turned away his face, with viſible grief in it.

Her own eyes gliſtened: but ſhe turned to each of us, preſenting one to the other—Him to me, as a gentleman truly deſerving to be called ſo—Me to him, as your friend, indeed; [How was I, at that inſtant, aſhamed of myſelf!] but, nevertheleſs, as a man of humanity; deteſting my friend's baſeneſs; and deſirous of doing her all manner of good offices.

Mr. Hickman received my civilities with a coldneſs, which however, was rather to be expected on your account, than that it deſerved exception on mine. And the lady invited us both to breakfaſt with her in the morning; he being obliged to return the next day.

I left them together, and called upon Mr. Dorrell, my attorney, to conſult him upon poor Belton's affairs; and then went home, and wrote thus far, preparative to what may occur in my breakfaſting-viſit in the morning.

LETTER V.

MR. BELFORD, TO ROBERT LOVELACE, ESQ.

THURSDAY, JULY 27.

I Went this morning, according to the lady's invitation, to breakfaſt, and found Mr. Hickman with her.

A good deal of heavineſs and concern hung upon his countenance; but he received me with more reſpect than he did yeſterday; which, I preſume was owing to the lady's favourable character of me.

He ſpoke very little; for I ſuppoſe they had all their talk out yeſterday and before I came this morning.

By the hints that dropped, I perceived that Miſs Howe's letter gave an account of your interview with her at Colonel Ambroſe's—of your profeſſions to Miſs Howe; and Miſs Howe's opinion, that marrying you was the only way now left to repair her wrongs.

Mr. Hickman, as I alſo gathered, had preſſed her, in Miſs Howe's name, to let her, on her return from the Iſle of Wight, find her at a neighbouring farm-houſe, where neat apartments would be made ready to receive her. She aſked how long it would be before they returned? And he told her, It was propoſed to be no more than a fortnight out and in. Upon which, ſhe ſaid, ſhe ſhould then perhaps have time to conſider of that kind propoſal.

He had tendered her money from Miſs Howe; but could not induce her to take any. No wonder I was refuſed! She only ſaid, That, if ſhe had occaſion, ſhe would be obliged to nobody but Miſs Howe.

Mr. Goddard her apothecary came in before breakfaſt was over. At her deſire he ſat down with us. Mr. Hickman aſked him, If he could give him any conſolation in relation to Miſs Harlowe's recovery, to carry down to a friend who loved her as ſhe loved her own life?

'The lady,' ſaid he, 'will do very 'well, if ſhe will reſolve upon it her-'ſelf.—Indeed you will, Madam, the 'doctor is entirely of this opinion; and 'has ordered nothing for you, but weak 'jellies, and innocent cordials, leſt you 'ſhould ſtarve yourſelf. And let me 'tell you, Madam, that ſo much watch-'ing, ſo little nouriſhment, and ſo much 'grief, as you ſeem to indulge, is 'enough to impair the moſt vigorous 'health, and to wear out the ſtrongeſt 'conſtitution.'

'What, Sir,' ſaid ſhe, 'can I do? I 'have no appetite. Nothing you call 'nouriſhing, will ſtay on my ſtomach. 'I do what I can: and have ſuch kind 'directors in Dr. H. and you, that I 'ſhould be inexcuſable if I did not.'

'I'll give you a regimen, Madam,' replied he; 'which, I am ſure, the doc-'tor ſhall approve of, and will make

'phyſick

'physick unnecessary in your case. And 'that is, go to rest at ten at night. Rise 'not till seven in the morning. Let your 'breakfast be water-gruel, or milk-pot-'tage; or weak broths: your dinner 'any-thing you like, so you will but eat: 'a dish of tea, with milk, in the after-'noon; and sagoe for your supper: and, 'my life for yours, this diet, and a 'month's country-air, will set you up.'

We were much pleased with the worthy gentleman's disinterested regimen: and she said, referring to her nurse, (who vouched for her) 'Pray, Mr. 'Hickman, let Miss Howe know the 'good hands I am in: and as to the 'kind charge of the gentleman, assure 'her, that all I promised to her, in the 'longest of my two last letters, on the 'subject of my health, I do and will, 'to the utmost of my power, observe. '—I have engaged, Sir,' [To Mr. Goddard]—'I have engaged, Sir,' [To me] 'to Miss Howe, to avoid all wilful 'neglects. It would be an unpardonable 'fault, and very ill become the character 'I would be glad to deserve, or the tem-'per of mind I wish my friends here-'after to think me mistress of, if I did 'not.'

Mr. Hickman and I went afterwards to a neighbouring coffee-house; and he gave me some account of your behaviour at the ball on Monday night; and of your treatment of him in the conference he had with you before that; which he represented in a more favourable light than you had done yourself. And yet he gave his sentiments of you with great freedom, but with the politeness of a gentleman.

He told me how very determined the lady was against marrying you; that she had, early this morning, set herself to write a letter to Miss Howe, in answer to one he brought her, which he was to call for at twelve, it being almost finished before he saw her at breakfast; and that at three he proposed to set out on his return.

He told me, that Miss Howe and her mother, and himself, were to begin their little journey for the Isle of Wight on Monday next: but that he must make the most favourable representation of Miss Harlowe's bad health, or they should have a very uneasy absence. He expressed the pleasure he had in finding the lady in such good hands. He proposed to call on Dr. H. to take his opinion, whether it were likely she would recover; and hoped he should find it favourable.

As he was resolved to make the best of the matter, and as the lady had refused to accept of money offered by Mr. Hickman, I said nothing of her parting with her cloaths. I thought it would serve no other end to mention it, but to shock Miss Howe: for it has such a sound with it, that a woman of her rank and fortune should be so reduced, that I cannot myself think of it with patience; nor know I but one man in the world who can.

This gentleman is a little finical and formal. Modest or diffident men wear not soon off those little precisenesses, which the confident, if ever they had them, presently get above. And why? Because they are too confident to doubt any-thing. But I think Mr. Hickman is an agreeable sensible man, and not at all deserving of the treatment or the character you give him.

But you are really a strange mortal: because you have advantages in your person, in your air, and intellect, above all the men I know, and a face that would deceive the devil, you can't think any man else tolerable.

It is upon this modest principle that thou derideſt some of us, who, not having thy confidence in their outside appearance, seek to hide their defects by the taylor's and peruke-maker's assistance; [Mistakenly enough, if it be really done so absurdly as to expose them more] and sayest, That we do but hang out a sign, in our dress, of what we have in the shop of our minds. This, no doubt, thou thinkest, is smartly observed: but pr'ythee, Lovelace, tell me, if thou canst, what sort of a sign must thou hang out, wert thou obliged to give us a clear idea by it of the furniture of thy mind?

Mr. Hickman tells me, He should have been happy with Miss Howe some weeks ago; (for all the settlements have been some time engrossed) but that she will not marry, she declares, while her dear friend is so unhappy.

This is truly a charming instance of the force of female friendship; which you and I, and our brother rakes, have constantly ridiculed as a chimerical thing in women of equal age, rank, and perfections.

But really, Lovelace, I see more and more, that there are not in the world, with all our conceited pride, narrower-souled wretches than we rakes and libertines are. And I'll tell thee how it comes about.

Our early love of roguery makes us generally generally run away from inſtruction; and ſo we become mere ſmatterers in the ſciences we are put to learn; and, becauſe we will know no more, think there is no more to be known.

With an infinite deal of vanity, unreined imaginations, and no judgments at all, we next commence half-wits, and then think we have the whole field of knowledge in poſſeſſion, and deſpiſe every-one who takes more pains, and is more ſerious, than ourſelves, as phlegmatick ſtupid fellows, who have no taſte for the moſt poignant pleaſures of life.

This makes us inſufferable to men of modeſty and merit, and obliges us to herd with thoſe of our own caſt; and by this means we have no opportunities of ſeeing or converſing with any-body who could or would ſhew us what we are; and ſo we conclude, that we are the cleverеſt fellows in the world, and the only men of ſpirit in it: and, looking down with ſupercilious eyes on all who give not themſelves the liberties we take, imagine the world made for us, and for us only.

Thus as to uſeful knowledge, while others go to the bottom, we only ſkim the ſurface; are deſpiſed by people of ſolid ſenſe, of true honour, and ſuperior talents; and ſhutting our eyes, move round and round (like ſo many blind mill-horſes) in one narrow circle, while we imagine we have all the world to range in.

I THREW myſelf in Mr. Hickman's way, on his return from the lady.

He was exceedingly moved at taking leave of her; being afraid, as he ſaid to me, (though he would not tell her ſo) that he ſhould never ſee her again. She charged him to repreſent everything to Miſs Howe in the moſt favourable light that the truth would bear.

He told me of a tender paſſage at parting; which was, that having ſaluted her at her cloſet-door, he could not help once more taking the ſame liberty, in a more fervent manner, at the ſtairs-head, whither ſhe accompanied him; and this in the thought, that it was the laſt time he ſhould ever have that honour; and offering to apologize for his freedom, (for he had preſſed her to his heart with a vehemence, that he could neither account for or reſiſt)—'Excuſe you, Mr. Hickman! that I 'will: you are my brother and my 'friend: and to ſhew you, that the 'good man who is to be happy with 'my beloved Miſs Howe, is very dear 'to me, you ſhall carry to her this 'token of my love:' [offering her ſweet face to his ſalute, and preſſing his hand between hers] 'and perhaps her love 'of me will make it more agreeable to 'her, than her punctilio would other-'wiſe allow it to be: and tell her,' ſaid ſhe, dropping on one knee, with claſped hands, and uplifted eyes, 'that 'in this poſture you ſaw me, in the laſt 'moment of our parting, begging a 'bleſſing upon you both, and that you 'may be the delight and comfort of 'each other, for many, very many, 'happy years!'

'Tears,' ſaid he, 'fell from my eyes: 'I even ſobbed with mingled joy and 'ſorrow; and ſhe retreating as ſoon as 'I raiſed her, I went down ſtairs highly 'diſſatisfied with myſelf for going; yet 'unable to ſtay; my eyes fixed the 'contrary way to my feet, as long as I 'could behold the ſkirts of her rai-'ment

'I went into the back-ſhop,' continued the worthy man, 'and recom-'mended the angelick lady to the beſt 'care of Mrs. Smith; and, when I 'was in the ſtreet, caſt my eye up at 'her window: there, for the laſt time, 'I doubt,' ſaid he, 'that I ſhall ever 'behold her. I ſaw her; and ſhe waved 'her charming hand to me, and with 'ſuch a look of ſmiling goodneſs, and 'mingled concern, as I cannot de-'ſcribe.'

Pr'ythee tell me, thou vile Lovelace, if thou haſt not a notion, even from theſe jejune deſcriptions of mine, that there muſt be a more exalted pleaſure in intellectual friendſhip, than ever thou couldſt taſte in the groſs fumes of ſenſuality? And whether it may not be poſſible for thee, in time, to give that preference to the infinitely preferable, which, I hope, now, that I ſhall always give?

I will leave thee to make the moſt of this reflection, from thy true friend,

J. BELFORD.

LETTER VI.

MISS HOWE, TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

TUESDAY, JULY 25.

YOUR two affecting letters were brought to me (as I had directed any letter from you ſhould be) to the colonel's, about an hour before we broke brother up. I could not forbear dipping into them there; and shedding more tears over them than I will tell you of; although I dried my eyes as well as I could, that the company I was obliged to betray me, and my mother, should not an little of my concern as possible.

I am yet (and was then still more) excessively fluttered. The occasion I will communicate to you by-and-by: for nothing but the flutters given by the stroke of death could divert my first attention from the sad and solemn contents of your last favour. These therefore I must begin with.

How can I bear the thoughts of losing so dear a friend! I will not so much as suppose it. Indeed I cannot! Such a mind as yours was not vested in humanity to be snatched away from us so soon. There must be still a great deal for you to do for the good of all who have the happiness to know you.

You enumerate in your letter of Thursday last, the particulars in which your situation is already mended: let me see by effects that you are in earnest in that enumeration; and that you really have the courage to resolve to get above the sense of injuries you could not avoid; and then will I trust to Providence and my humble prayers for your perfect recovery; and glad at my heart shall I be, on my return from the little island, to find you well enough to be near us, according to the proposal Mr. Hickman has to make to you.

You chide me in yours of Sunday on the freedom I take with your friends.

I may be warm. I know I am—Too warm. Yet warmth in friendship, surely, cannot be a crime; especially when our friend has great merit, labours under oppression, and is struggling with undeserved calamity.

I have no notion of coolness in friendship, be it dignified or distinguished by the name of prudence, or what it will.

You may excuse your relations. It was ever your way to do so. But, my dear, other people may be allowed to judge as they please. I am not their daughter, nor the sister of your brother and sister—I thank Heaven, I am not.

But if you are displeased with me for the freedoms I took so long ago as you mention, I am afraid, if you knew what passed upon an application I made to your sister, very lately, (in hopes to procure you the absolution your heart is so much set upon) that you would be still more concerned. But they have been even with me—But I must not tell you all. I hope, however, that these unforgivers [my mother is among them] were always good, dutiful, passive children to their parents.

Once more forgive me. I owned I was too warm. But I have no example to the contraty, but from you: and the treatment you meet with is very little encouragement to me to endeavour to imitate you in your dutiful meekness.

You leave it to me to give a negative to the hopes of the noble family, whose only disgrace is, that so very vile a man is so nearly related to them. But yet—Alas! my dear, I am so fearful of consequences, so selfishly fearful, if this negative must be given—I don't know what I should say—But give me leave to suspend, however, this negative, till I hear from you again.

This earnest courtship of you into their splendid family is so very honourable to you—They so justly admire you—You must have had such a noble triumph over the base man—He is so much in earnest—The world knows so much of the unhappy affair—You may do still so much good—Your will is so inviolate—Your relations are so implacable—Think, my dear, and re-think.

And let me leave you to do so, while I give you the occasion of the flutter I mentioned at the beginning of this letter; in the conclusion of which you will find the obligation I have consented to lay myself under, to refer this important point once more to your discussion, before I give, in your name, the negative that cannot, when given, be with honour to yourself, repented of or recalled.

Know then, my dear, that I accompanied my mother to Colonel Ambrose's, on the occasion I mentioned to you in my former. Many ladies and gentlemen were there whom you know; particularly Miss Kitty D'Oily, Miss Lloyd, Miss Biddy D'Ollysse, Miss Biddulph, and their respective admirers, with the colonel's two nieces, fine women both; besides many whom you know not; for they were strangers to me, but by name. A splendid company, and all pleased with one another, till Colonel Ambrose introduced one, who, the moment he was brought into the hall, set the whole assembly into a kind of agitation.

It was your villain.

I thought I should have sunk as soon as I set my eyes upon him. My mother was also affected; and coming to me, 'Nancy, whispered she, 'can you

'bear the ſight of that wretch without 'ſo much emotion?—If not, withdraw 'into the next apartment.'

I could not remove. Every-body's eyes were glanced from him to me. I ſat down and fanned myſelf, and was forced to order a glaſs of water. 'O 'that I had the eye the baſiliſk is re-'ported to have,' thought I, 'and that 'his life were within the power of it! '—Directly would I kill him.'

He entered with an air ſo hateful to me, but ſo agreeable to every other eye, that I could have looked him dead for that too.

After the general ſalutations, he fingled out Mr. Hickman, and told him, he had recollected ſome parts of his behaviour to him when he ſaw him laſt, which had made him think himſelf under obligation to his patience and politeneſs.

And ſo, indeed, he was.

Miſs D'Oily upon his complimenting her, among a knot of ladies, aſked him, in their hearing, How Miſs Clariſſa Harlowe did?

He heard, he ſaid, you were not ſo well as he wiſhed you to be, and as you deſerved to be.

'O, Mr. Lovelace,' ſaid ſhe, 'what 'have you to anſwer for, on that young 'lady's account, if all be true that I 'have heard!'

'I have a great deal to anſwer for,' ſaid the unblufhing villain: 'but that 'dear lady has ſo many excellences, and 'ſo much delicacy, that little ſins are 'great ones in her eye.'

'Little ſins!' replied Miſs D'Oily: 'Mr. Lovelace's character is ſo well 'known, that nobody believes he can 'commit little ſins.'

'You are very good to me, Miſs 'D'Oily.'

'Indeed I am not.'

'Then I am the only perſon to whom 'you are not very good, and ſo I am 'the leſs obliged to you.'

He turned, with an unconcerned air, to Miſs Playford, and made her ſome genteel compliments. I believe you know her not. She viſits his couſins Montague. Indeed he had ſomething in his ſpecious manner to ſay to every-body: and this too ſoon quieted the diſguſt each perſon had at his entrance.

I ſtill kept my ſeat, and he either ſaw me not, or would not yet ſee me; and addreſſing himſelf to my mother, taking her unwilling hand, with an air of high aſſurance, 'I am glad to ſee you 'here, Madam. I hope Miſs Howe is 'well. I have reaſon to complain 'greatly of her; but hope to owe to 'her the higheſt obligation that can be 'laid on man.'

'My daughter, Sir, is accuſtomed to 'be too warm and too zealous in her 'friendſhips, for either my tranquillity, 'or her own.'

There had indeed been ſome late occaſion given for mutual diſpleaſure between my mother and me: but I think ſhe might have ſpared this to him; though nobody heard it I believe but the perſon to whom it was ſpoken, and the lady who told it to me; for my mother ſpoke it low.

'We are not wholly, Madam, to live 'for ourſelves,' ſaid the vile hypocrite: 'it is not every-one who has a ſoul ca-'pable of friendſhip; and what a heart 'muſt that be, which can be inſenſible 'to the intereſts of a ſuffering friend?'

'This ſentiment from Mr. Lovelace's 'mouth!' ſaid my mother—'Forgive 'me, Sir; but you can have no end, 'ſurely, in endeavouring to make us 'think as well of you as ſome innocent 'creatures have thought of you, to their 'coſt.'

She would have flung from him. But, detaining her hand—'Leſs ſe-'vere, dear Madam,' ſaid he, 'be leſs 'ſevere in this place, I beſeech you. 'You will allow, that a very faulty 'perſon may ſee his errors; and when 'he does, and owns them, and re-'pents, ſhould he not be treated mer-'cifully?'

'Your air, Sir, ſeems not to be that 'of a penitent. But the place may as 'properly excuſe this ſubject, as what 'you call my ſeverity.'

'But, deareſt Madam, permit me to 'ſay, that I hope for your intereſt with 'your charming daughter,' (was his ſycophant word) 'to have it put into my 'power to convince all the world, that 'there never was a truer penitent. 'And why, why this anger, dear Ma-'dam?' (for ſhe ſtruggled to get her hand out of his) 'theſe violent airs—'ſo maidenly!' [Impudent fellow!]—'May I not aſk if Miſs Howe be here?'

'She would not have been here,' replied my mother, 'had ſhe known whom 'ſhe had been to ſee.'

'And is ſhe here, then?—Thank 'Heaven!'—He diſengaged her hand, and ſtept forward into company.

'Dear Miſs Lloyd,' ſaid he, 'with 'an air,' (taking her hand, as he quitted my mother's) 'tell me, tell me, 'is Miſs Arabella Harlowe here? Or 'will she be here? I was informed she 'would—And his, and the opportu-'nity of paying my compliments to your 'friend Miss Howe, were great induce-'ments with me to attend the colonel.'

Superlative assurance! Was it not, my dear?

'Miss Arabella Harlowe, excuse me, 'Sir,' said Miss Lloyd, 'would be very 'little inclined to meet you here, or 'any where else'

'Perhaps so, my dear Miss Lloyd: 'but, perhaps, for that very reason, I 'am more desirous to see her.'

'Miss Harlowe, Sir,' said Miss Biddulph, with a threatening air, 'will 'hardly be here without her brother. I 'imagine, if one come, both will come.'

'Heaven grant they both may,' said the wretch. 'Nothing, Miss Biddulph, 'shall be in from me to disturb this as-'sembly, I assure you, if they do. One 'calm half-hour's conversation with 'that brother and sister, would be a most 'fortunate opportunity to me, in pre-'sence of the colonel and his lady, or 'whom else they should chuse.'

Then turning round, as if desirous to find out the one or the other, or both, he spied me, and, with a very low bow, approached me.

I was all in a flutter, you may suppose. He would have taken my hand. I refused it, all glowing with indignation: every-body's eyes upon us.

I went from him to the other end of the room, and sat down, as I thought, out of his hated sight: but presently I heard his odious voice, whispering, behind my chair, (he leaning upon the back of it, with impudent unconcern) 'Charming Miss Howe!' looking over my shoulder: 'One request'—I started up from my seat; but could hardly stand neither, for very indignation—'O this sweet, but becoming disdain!' whispered on the insufferable creature—'I am sorry to give you all this emo-'tion: but either here, or at your own 'house, let me entreat from you one 'quarter of an hour's audience.—I be-'seech you, Madam, but one quarter 'of an hour, in any of the adjoining 'apartments.'

'Not for a kingdom,' fluttering my fan. I knew not what I did.—But I could have killed him.

'We are so much observed—Else 'on my knees, my dear Miss Howe, 'would I beg your interest with your 'charming friend.'

'She'll have nothing to say to you.'

I had not then your letters, my dear.

'Killing words!—But indeed I have 'deserved them, and a dagger in my 'heart besides. I am so conscious of 'my demerits, that I have no hope, but 'in your interposition—Could I owe 'that favour to Miss Howe's mediation, 'which I cannot hope for on any other 'account ——'

'My mediation, vilest of men!—My 'mediation!—I abhor you!—From my 'soul, I abhor you, vilest of men!—Three or four times I repeated these words, stammering too.—I was excessively flattered.

'You can call me nothing, Madam, 'so bad as I will call myself. I have 'been, indeed, the vilest of men: but 'now I am not so. Permit me—Every-'body's eyes are upon us!—but one 'moment's audience—To exchange but 'ten words with you, dearest Miss 'Howe—in whose presence you please '—for your dear friend's sake—but 'ten words with you in the next apart-'ment.'

'It is an insult upon me, to presume, 'that I would exchange one with you, if 'I could help it;—Out of my way! 'Out of my sight—fellow!'

And away I would have flung: but he took my hand. I was excessively disordered.—Every-body's eyes more and more intent upon us.

Mr. Hickman, whom my mother had drawn on one side, to enjoin him a patience, which perhaps needed not to have been enforced, came up just then, with my mother, who had him by his leading strings—By his sleeve, I should say.

'Mr. Hickman,' said the bold wretch, 'be my advocate but for ten words in 'the next apartment with Miss Howe, 'in your presence—and in yours, Ma-'dam,' to my mother.

'Hear, Nancy, what he has to say to 'you. To get rid of him, hear his ten 'words.'

'Excuse me, Madam!—His very 'breath—Unhand me, Sir!'

He sighed and looked—O how the practised villain sighed and looked!—He then let go my hand, with such a reverence in his manner, as brought blame upon me with some, that I would not hear him. And this incensed me the more.—O my dear, this man is a devil!—This man is indeed a devil!—So much patience, when he pleases!—So much gentleness!—Yet so resolute, so persisting, so audacious!

I was

I was going out of the aſſembly in great diſorder. He was at the door as ſoon as I.

'How kind this is,' ſaid the wretch; and, ready to follow me, opened the door for me.

I turned back, upon this; and not knowing what I did, ſnapped my fan juſt in his face, as he turned ſhort upon me; and the powder flew from his wig.

Every-body ſeemed as much pleaſed, as I was vexed.

He turned to Mr. Hickman, nettled at the powder flying, and at the ſmiles of the company upon him—'Mr. Hick-'man, you will be one of the happieſt 'men in the world, becauſe you are a 'good man, and will do nothing to pro-'voke this paſſionate lady, and be-'cauſe ſhe has too much good ſenſe to 'be provoked without reaſon: but elſe, 'the Lord have mercy upon you!'

This man, this Mr. Hickman, my dear, is too meek for a man—Indeed he is.—But my patient mother twits me, that her paſſionate daughter ought to like him the better for that. But meek men abroad are not always meek men at home. I have obſerved that in more inſtances than one: and if they were, I ſhould not, I verily think, like them the better for being ſo.

He then turned to my mother, reſolved to begin with her too: 'Where, 'good Madam, could Miſs get all this 'ſpirit?'

The company around ſmiled; for I need not tell you, that my mother's high-ſpiritedneſs is pretty well known; and ſhe, ſadly vexed, ſaid, 'Sir, you 'treat me, as you do the reſt of the 'world—But——'

'I beg pardon, Madam,' interrupted he: 'I might have ſpared my queſtion.' —And inſtantly (I retiring to the other end of the hall) he turned to Miſs Playford—'What would I give, Miſs, to 'hear you ſing that ſong you obliged us 'with at Lord M.'s!'

He then, as if nothing had happened, fell into a converſation with her, and Miſs D'Ollyffe, upon muſick; and whiſperingly ſung to Miſs Playford, holding her two hands, with ſuch airs of genteel unconcern, that it vexed me not a little to look round, and ſee how pleaſed half the giddy fools of our ſex were with him, notwithſtanding his notorious wicked character. To this it is, that ſuch vile fellows owe much of their vileneſs, whereas if they found themſelves ſhunned, and deſpiſed, and treated as beaſts of prey as they are; they would run to their caverns; there howl by themſelves; and none but ſuch as ſad accident, or unpitiable preſumption, threw in their way, would ſuffer by them.

He afterwards talked very ſeriouſly at times, to Mr. Hickman: at times, I ſay; for it was with ſuch breaks and ſtarts of gaiety, turning to this lady, and to that, and then to Mr. Hickman again, reſuming a ſerious or gay air at pleaſure, that he took every-body's eye, the women's eſpecially; who were full of their whiſpering admirations of him, qualified with 'If's,' and 'But's,' and 'What pity's;' and ſuch ſort of ſtuff, that ſhewed in their very diſpraiſes too much liking.

Well may our ſex be the ſport and ridicule of ſuch libertines!—Unthinking eye-governed creatures!—Would not a little reflection teach us, that a man of merit muſt be a man of modeſty, becauſe a diffident one? And that ſuch a wretch as this muſt have taken his degrees in wickedneſs, and gone through a courſe of vileneſs, before he could arrive at this impenetrable effrontery? An effrontery which can proceed only from the light opinion he has of us, and the high one of himſelf.

But our ſex are generally modeſt and baſhful themſelves, and are too apt to conſider that which in the main is their principal grace, as a defect; and finely do they judge, when they think of ſupplying that defect by chuſing a man who cannot be aſhamed.

His diſcourſe to Mr. Hickman turned upon you, and his acknowledged injuries of you; though he could ſo lightly ſtart from the ſubject, and return to it.

I have no patience with ſuch a devil —Man he cannot be called. To be ſure he would behave in the ſame manner any-where, or in any preſence, even at the altar itſelf, if a woman were with him there.

It ſhall ever be a rule with me, that he who does not regard a woman with ſome degree of reverence, will look upon her and occaſionally treat her with contempt.

He had the confidence to offer to take me out; but I abſolutely refuſed him, and ſhunned him all I could, putting on the moſt contemptuous airs; but nothing could mortify him.

I wiſhed twenty times I had not been there.

The gentlemen were as ready as I to wiſh he had broken his neck, rather than than been present, I believe: for nobody was regarded but he. So little of the fop; yet so elegant and rich in his dress: his person so specious: his air so intrepid: so much meaning and penetration in his face: so much gaiety, yet so little of the monkey: though a travelled gentleman, yet no affectation; no mere toupet-man; but all manly; and his courage and wit, the one so known, the other so dreaded, you must think the petits-maitres (of which there were four or five present) were most deplorably off in his company; and one grave gentleman observed to me, (pleased to see me shun him as I did) that the poet's observation was too true, That the generality of ladies were rakes in their hearts, or they could not be so much taken with a man who had so notorious a character.

I told him, The reflection both of the poet and applier was much too general, and made with more ill-nature than good-manners.

When the wretch saw how industriously I avoided him, (shifting from one part of the hall to another) he at last boldly stept up to me, as my mother and Mr. Hickman were talking to me; and thus before them accosted me:

'I beg your pardon, Madam; but, 'by your mother's leave, I must have a 'few moments conversation with you, 'either here, or at your own house; 'and I beg you will give me the opportunity.'

'Nancy,' said my mother, 'hear 'what he has to say to you. In my pre'sence you may: and better in the ad'joining apartment, if it must be, than 'to come to you at our own house.'

I retired to one corner of the hall, my mother following me; and he, taking Mr. Hickman under the arm, following her—'Well, Sir,' said I, 'what have 'you to say?—Tell me here.'

'I have been telling Mr. Hickman,' said he, 'how much I am concerned for 'the injuries I have done to the most 'excellent woman in the world: and 'yet, that she obtained such a glorious 'triumph over me the last time I had 'the honour to see her, as, with my 'penitence, ought to have abated her 'former resentments: but that I will, 'with all my soul, enter into any measures to obtain her forgiveness of me. 'My cousins Montague have told you 'this. Lady Betty, and Lady Sarah, 'and my Lord M. are engaged for my 'honour. I know your power with the 'dear creature. My cousins told me, 'you gave them hopes you would use it 'in my behalf. My Lord M. and his 'two sisters are impatiently expecting 'the fruits of it. You must have heard 'from her before now: I hope you have. 'And will you be so good as to tell me, 'if I may have any hopes?'

'If I must speak on this subject, let 'me tell you, that you have broken her 'heart. You know not the value of the 'lady you have injured. You deserve 'her not. And she despises you, as she 'ought.'

'Dear Miss Howe, mingle not passion 'with denunciations so severe. I must 'know my fate. I will go abroad once 'more, if I find her absolutely irreconcileable. But I hope she will give me 'leave to attend upon her, to know my 'doom from her own mouth.'

'It would be death immediate for her 'to see you. And what must you be, to 'be able to look her in the face?'

I then reproached him (with vehemence enough, you may believe) on his baseness, and the evils he had made you suffer: the distress he had reduced you to: all your friends made your enemies: the vile house he had carried you to: hinted at his villainous arts; the dreadful arrest: and told him of your present deplorable illness, and resolution to die rather than have him.

He vindicated not any part of his conduct, but that of the arrest; and so solemnly protested his sorrow for his usage of you, accusing himself in the freest manner, and by deserved appellations, that I promised to lay before you this part of our conversation. And now you have it.

My mother, as well as Mr. Hickman, believes, from what passed on this occasion, that he is touched in conscience for the wrongs he has done you: but, by his whole behaviour, I must own, it seems to me, that nothing can touch him for half an hour together. Yet I have no doubt, that he would willingly marry you; and it piques his pride, I could see, that he should be denied; as it did mine, that such a wretch had dared to think it in his power to have such a woman whenever he pleased; and that it must be accounted a condescension, and matter of obligation, (by all his own family at least) that he would vouchsafe to think of marriage.

Now, my dear, you have before you the reason why I suspend the decisive negative to the ladies of his family. My mother, Miss Lloyd, and Miss Biddulph, who were inquisitive after the subject of our

our retired converſation, and whoſe curioſity I thought it was right, in ſome degree, to gratify, (eſpecially as thoſe young ladies are of our ſelect acquaintance) are all of opinion, that you ſhould be his.

You will let Mr. Hickman know your whole mind; and when he acquaints me with it, I will tell you all my own.

Mean time, may the news he will bring me of the ſtate of your health, be favourable! prays, with the utmoſt fervency, your ever-faithful and affectionate ANNA HOWE.

LETTER VII.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

THURSDAY JULY 27.

MY DEAREST MISS HOWE,

AFTER I have thankfully acknowledged your favour in ſending Mr. Hickman to viſit me before you ſet out upon your intended journey, I muſt chide you (in the ſincerity of that faithful love, which could not be the love it is if it would not admit of that cementing freedom) for ſuſpending the deciſive negative, which, upon ſuch full deliberation, I had entreated you to give to Mr. Lovelace's relations.

I am ſorry that I am obliged to repeat to you, my dear, who know me ſo well, that, were I ſure I ſhould live many years, I would not have Mr. Lovelace; much leſs can I think of him, as it is probable I may not live one.

As to the world and it's cenſures, you know, my dear, that however deſirous I always was of a fair fame, yet I never thought it right to give more than a ſecond place to the world's opinion. The challenges made to Mr. Lovelace by Miſs D'Oily, in publick company, are a freſh proof that I have loſt my reputation: and what advantage would it be to me, were it retrievable, and were I to live long, if I could not acquit myſelf to myſelf?

Having in my former ſaid ſo much on the freedoms you have taken with my friends, I ſhall ſay the leſs now; but your hint, that ſomething elſe has newly paſſed between ſome of them and you, gives me great concern, and that as well for my own ſake, as for theirs; ſince it muſt neceſſarily incenſe them againſt me. I wiſh, my dear, that I had been left to my own courſe on an occaſion ſo very intereſting to myſelf. But ſince what is done cannot be helped, I muſt abide the conſequences; yet I dread, more than before, what may be my ſiſter's anſwer, if an anſwer be at all vouchſafed.

Will you give me leave, my dear, to cloſe this ſubject with one remark?—It is this: That my beloved friend, in points where her own laudable pride is concerned, has ever ſeemed more ready to fly from the rebuke, than from the fault. If you will excuſe this freedom, I will acknowledge thus far in favour of your way of thinking, as to the conduct of ſome parents in theſe nice caſes. That indiſcreet oppoſition does frequently as much miſchief as giddy love.

As to the invitation you are ſo kind as to give me, to remove privately into your neighbourhood, I have told Mr. Hickman, that I will conſider of it; but believe, if you will be ſo good as to excuſe me, that I ſhall not accept of it, even ſhould I be able to remove. I will give you my reaſons for declining it; and ſo I ought, when both my love, and my gratitude, would make a viſit now-and-then from my dear Miſs Howe the moſt conſolatory thing in the world to me.

You muſt know then, that this great town, wicked as it is, wants not opportunities of being better; having daily prayers at ſeveral churches in it; and I am deſirous, as my ſtrength will permit, to embrace thoſe opportunities. The method I have propoſed to myſelf, (and was beginning to practiſe when that cruel arreſt deprived me both of freedom and ſtrength) is this: When I was diſpoſed to gentle exerciſe, I took a chair to St. Dunſtan's Church in Fleet Street, where are prayers at ſeven in the morning; I propoſed, if the weather favoured, to walk, (if not, to take chair) to Lincoln's Inn Chapel; where at eleven in the morning, and at five in the afternoon, are the ſame deſirable opportunities; and at other times to go no farther than Covent Garden Church, where are early morning-prayers likewiſe.

This method purſued, I doubt not, will greatly help, as it has already done, to calm my diſturbed thoughts, and to bring me to that perfect reſignation, after which I aſpire: for I muſt own, my dear, that ſometimes ſtill my griefs and my reflections are too heavy for me; and all the aid I can draw from religious duties is hardly ſufficient to ſupport my ſtaggering reaſon. I am a very young creature, you know, my dear, to be left to my own conduct in ſuch circumſtances as I am in.

Another reaſon why I chuſe not to go down into your neighbourhood, is, [illegible] diſpleaſure displeasure that might arise, on my account, between your mother and you.

If indeed you were actually married, and the worthy man (who would then have a title to all your regard) were earnestly desirous of my near neighbourhood, I know not what I might do: for although I might not perhaps intend to give up my other important reasons at the time I should make you a congratulatory visit, yet I might not know how to deny myself the pleasure of continuing near you when there.

I send you inclosed the copy of my letter to my sister. I hope it will be thought to be written with a true penitent spirit; for indeed it is. I desire that you will not think I stoop too low in it; since there can be no such thing as that in a child to parents whom she has unhappily offended.

But if still (perhaps more disgusted than before at your freedom with them) they should pass it by with the contempt of silence, (for I have not yet been favoured with an answer) I must learn to think it right in them so to do; especially as it is my first direct application: for I have often censured the boldness of those, who, applying for a favour, which it is in a person's option to grant, or to refuse, take the liberty of being offended, if they are not gratified; as if the petitioned had not as good a right to reject, as the petitioner to ask.

But if my letter should be answered, and that in such terms as will make me loth to communicate it to so warm a friend—you must not, my dear, take upon you to censure my relations; but allow for them, as they know not what I have suffered; as being filled with just resentments against me; (just to them, if they think them just) and as not being able to judge of the reality of my penitence.

And after all, what can they do for me?—They can only pity me: and what will that do, but augment their own grief; to which at present their resentment is an alleviation? For can they by their pity restore to me my lost reputation? Can they by it purchase a sponge that will wipe out from the year the past fatal five months of my life?

Your account of the gay unconcerned behaviour of Mr. Lovelace, at the colonel's, does not surprize me at all, after I am told, that he had the intrepidity to go thither, knowing who were invited and expected.—Only this, my dear, I really wonder at, that Miss Howe could imagine, that I could have a thought of such a man for a husband.

Poor wretch! I pity him, to see him fluttering about; abusing talents that were given him for excellent purposes; taking inconsideration for courage, and dancing, fearless of danger, on the edge of a precipice!

But indeed his threatening to see me, most sensibly alarms and shocks me. I cannot but hope that I never, never more shall see him in this world.

Since you are so loth, my dear, to send the desired negative to the ladies of his family, I will only trouble you to transmit the letter I shall inclose for that purpose; directed indeed to yourself, because it was to you that those ladies applied themselves on this occasion; but to be sent by you to any one of the ladies, at your own choice.

I commend myself, my dearest Miss Howe, to your prayers; and conclude with repeated thanks for sending Mr. Hickman to me; and with wishes for your health and happiness, and for the speedy celebration of your nuptials; your ever-affectionate and obliged

CLARISSA HARLOWE.

LETTER VIII.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

[INCLOSED IN THE PRECEDING.]

THURSDAY, JULY 27.

MY DEAREST MISS HOWE,

SINCE you seem loth to acquiesce in my determined resolution, signified to you as soon as I was able to hold a pen, I beg the favour of you, by this, or by any other way you think most proper, to acquaint the worthy ladies who have applied to you in behalf of their relation, that, although I am infinitely obliged to their generous opinion of me, yet I cannot consent to sanctify, as I may say, Mr. Lovelace's repeated breaches of all moral sanctions, and hazard my future happiness by an union with a man, through whose premeditated injuries, in a long train of the basest contrivances, I have forfeited my temporal hopes.

He himself, when he reflects upon his own actions, must surely bear testimony to the justice, as well as fitness of my determination. The ladies, I dare say, would, were they to know the whole of my unhappy story.

Be pleased to acquaint them, that I deceive myself, if my resolution on this head (however ungratefully, and even inhumanly inhumanly, he has treated me) be not owing more to principle than paſſion. Nor can I give a ſtronger proof of the truth of this aſſurance, than by declaring, that I can and will forgive him, on this one eaſy condition, that he will never moleſt me more.

In whatever way you chuſe to make this declaration, be pleaſed to make my moſt reſpectful compliments to the ladies of the noble family, and to my Lord M. accompany it. And do you, my dear, believe that I ſhall be, to the laſt moment of my life, your ever-obliged and affectionate

CLARISSA HARLOWE.

LETTER IX.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

FRIDAY, JULY 28.

I Have three letters of thine to take notice of, but am divided in my mind, whether to quarrel with thee, on thy unmerciful reflections, or to thank thee for thy acceptable particularity and diligence. But ſeveral of my ſweet dears have I, indeed, in my time made to cry and laugh, before the cry could go off the other: Why may I not, therefore, curſe and applaud thee in the ſame moment? So take both in one: and what follows, as it ſhall riſe from my pen.

How often have I ingenuouſly confeſſed my ſins againſt this excellent creature?—Yet thou never ſpareſt me, although as bad a man as myſelf. Since then I get ſo little by my confeſſions, I had a good mind to try to defend myſelf; and that not only from ancient and modern ſtory, but from common practice; and yet avoid repeating any-thing I have ſuggeſted before in my own behalf.

I am in a humour to play the fool with my pen: briefly then, from ancient ſtory firſt:—Doſt thou not think, that I am as much entitled to forgiveneſs on Miſs Harlowe's account, as Virgil's hero was on Queen Dido's? For what an ungrateful varlet was that vagabond to the hoſpitable princeſs who had willingly conferred upon him the laſt favour?—Stealing away (whence, I ſuppoſe, the ironical phraſe of truſty Trojan to this day) like a thief—Pretendedly indeed at the command of the gods; but could that be, when the errand he went upon was to rob other princes, not only of their dominions, but of their lives?—Yet this fellow is, at every word, the pious Æneas with the immortal bard who celebrates him.

Should Miſs Harlowe even break her heart (which Heaven forbid!) for the uſage ſhe has received, (to ſay nothing of her diſappointed pride, to which her death would be attributable, more than to reaſon) what compariſon will her fate hold to Queen Dido's? And have I half the obligation to her, that Æneas had to the Queen of Carthage? The latter placing a confidence, the former none, in her man?—Then, whom elſe have I robbed? Whom elſe have I injured? Her brother's worthleſs life I gave him, inſtead of taking any man's; while the Trojan vagabond deſtroyed his thouſands. Why then ſhould it not be the pious Lovelace, as well as the pious Æneas? For, doſt thou think, had a conflagration happened, and had it been in my power, that I would not have ſaved my old Anchiſes (as he did his from the Ilion bonfire) even at the expence of my Creüſa, had I had a wife of that name?

But for a more modern inſtance in my favour—Have I uſed Miſs Harlowe, as our famous maiden queen, as ſhe was called, uſed one of her own blood, a ſiſter-queen; who threw herſelf into her protection from her rebel-ſubjects; and whom ſhe detained priſoner eighteen years, and at laſt cut off her head? Yet do not honeſt proteſtants pronounce her pious too?—And call her particularly their queen?

As to common practice—Who, let me aſk, that has it in his power to gratify a predominant paſſion, be it what it will, denies himſelf the gratification?—Leaving it to cooler deliberation (and if he be a great man, to his flatterers) to find a reaſon for it afterwards?

Then, as to the worſt part of my treatment of this lady—How many men are there, who, as well as I, have ſought, by intoxicating liquors, firſt to inebriate, then to ſubdue? What ſignifies what the potations were, when the ſame end was in view?

Let me tell thee, upon the whole, that neither the Queen of Carthage, nor the Queen of Scots, would have thought they had any reaſon to complain of cruelty, had they been uſed no worſe than I have uſed the queen of my heart: and then do I not aſpire with my whole ſoul to repair by marriage? Would the pious Æneas, thinkeſt thou, have done ſuch a piece of juſtice by Dido, had ſhe lived?

Come, come, Belford, let people run

[illegible] pretend as they will, I am [illegible] very innocent man. And if by [illegible] and other like reasonings, I have quieted my own conscience, a great cry is answered. What have I to do with the world?

And now I sit me peaceably down to consider thy letters.

I hope thy pleas in my favour, when she gave thee (so generously gave thee) for me, my letters, were urged with an honest energy. But I suspect thee much for being too ready to give up thy client. Then thou hast such a misgiving aspect; an aspect, rather inviting rejection, than carrying persuasion with it; and art such an hesitating, such an humming and hawing caitiff, that I shall attribute my failure, if I do fail, rather to the inability and ill looks of my advocate, than to my cause. Again, thou art deprived of the force men of our cast give to arguments; for she won't let thee swear!—Art moreover a very heavy thoughtless fellow; tolerable only at a second rebound; a horrid dunce at the impromptu. These, encountering with such a lady, are great disadvantages.—And still a greater is thy balancing (as thou dost at present) between old rakery and new reformation: since this puts thee into the same situation with her, as they told me at Leipsic Martin Luther was in, at the first publick dispute which he held, in defence of his supposed new doctrines with Eckius. For Martin was then but a linsey-wolsey reformer. He retained some dogmas, which, by natural consequence, made others, that he held, untenable: so that Eckius, in some points, had the better of him. But from that time, he made clear work, renouncing all that stood in his way: and then his doctrines ran upon all-fours. He was never puzzled afterwards; and could boldly declare, that he would defend them in the face of angels and men: and to his friends, who would have dissuaded him from venturing to appear before the emperor Charles the Fifth at Spires, That, were there as many devils at Spires, as tiles upon the houses, he would go. An answer that is admired by every Protestant Saxon to this day.

Since then thy unhappy awkwardness destroys the force of thy arguments, I think thou hadst better (for the present, however) forbear to urge her on the subject of accepting the reparation I offer; lest the continual teasing of her to forgive me should but strengthen her in her denials of forgiveness; till for consistency sake, she'll be forced to adhere to a resolution so often avowed —Whereas, if left to herself, a little time, and better health, which will bring on better spirits, will give her quicker resentments; those quicker resentments will lead her into vehemence; that vehemence will subside, and turn into expostulation and parley: my friends will then interpose, and guaranty for me: and all our trouble on both sides will be over. Such is the natural course of things.

I cannot endure thee for thy hopelessness in the lady's recovery; and that in contradiction to the doctor and apothecary.

'Time,' in the words of Congreve, thou sayest, 'will give increase to her 'afflictions.' But why so? Knowest thou not, that those words (so contrary to common experience) were applied to the case of a person, while passion was in it's full vigour?—At such a time every-one in a heavy grief thinks the same: but as enthusiasts do by Scripture, so dost thou by the poets thou hast read: any-thing that carries the most distant allusion from either to the case in hand, is put down by both for gospel, however incongruous to the general scope of either, and to that case. So once, in a pulpit, I heard one of the former very vehemently declare himself to be a dead dog; when every man, woman, and child, were convinced to the contrary by his howling.

I can tell thee, that, if nothing else will do, I am determined, in spite of thy buskin-airs, and of thy engagements for me to the contrary, to see her myself.

Face to face have I known many a quarrel made up, which distance would have kept alive, and widened. Thou wilt be a madder Jack than he in the Tale of a Tub, if thou givest an active opposition to this interview.

In short, I cannot bear the thought, that a woman whom once I had bound to me in the silken cords of love, should slip through my fingers, and be able, while my heart flames out with a violent passion for her, to despise me, and to set both love and me at defiance. Thou canst not imagine how much I envy thee, and her doctor, and her apothecary, and every-one who I hear are admitted to her presence and conversation; and wish to be the one or the other in turn.

Wherefore, if nothing else will do, I will see her. I'll tell thee of an admirable rable expedient, just come croſs me, to ſave thy promiſe, and my own.

Mrs. Lovick, you ſay, is a good woman: if the lady be worſe, ſhe ſhall advice her to ſend for a parſon to pray by her: unknown to her, unknown to the lady, unknown to thee, (for ſo it may paſs) I will contrive to be the man, petticoated out, and veſted in a gown and caſſock. I once, for a certain purpoſe, did aſſume the canonicals; and I was thought to make a fine ſleek appearance; my broad roſe-bound beaver became me mightily; and I was much admired upon the whole by all who ſaw me.

Methinks it muſt be charmingly apropos to ſee me kneeling down by her bed-ſide, (I am ſure I ſhall pray heartily) beginning out of the Common-Prayer Book the Sick Office for the reſtoration of the languiſhing lady, and concluding with an exhortation to charity and forgiveneſs for myſelf.

I will conſider of this matter. But, in whatever ſhape I ſhall chuſe to appear, of this thou mayeſt aſſure thyſelf, I will apprize thee before-hand of my viſit, that thou mayeſt contrive to be out of the way, and to know nothing of the matter. This will ſave thy word; and, as to mine, can the think worſe of me than ſhe does at preſent?

An indiſpenſable of true love and profound reſpect, in thy wiſe opinion, is abſurdity or aukwardneſs.—'Tis ſurprizing that thou ſhouldſt be one of thoſe partial mortals, who take their meaſures of right and wrong from what they find themſelves to be, and cannot help being!—So aukwardneſs is a perfection in the aukward!—At this rate, no man ever can be in the wrong. But I inſiſt upon it, that an aukward fellow will do every-thing aukwardly: and if he be like thee, will, when he has done fooliſhly, rack his unmeaning brain for excuſes as aukward as his firſt fault. Reſpectful love is an inſpirer of actions worthy of itſelf; and he who cannot ſhew it, where he moſt means it, manifeſts, that he is an unpolite, rough creature, a perfect Belford, and has it not in him.

But here thou'lt throw out that notable witticiſm, that my outſide is the beſt of me, thine the worſt of thee, and that, if I ſet about mending my mind, thou wilt mend thy appearance.

But, pr'ythee, Jack, don't ſtay for that; but ſet about thy amendment in dreſs when thou leaveſt off thy mourning; for why ſhouldeſt thou prepoſſeſs in thy diſfavour all thoſe who never ſaw thee before!—It is hard to remove early-taken prejudices, whether of liking or diſlike: people will think, as I may ſay, for reaſons to confirm their impreſſions, in compliment to their own ſagacity: nor is it every mind that has the ingenuouſneſs to confeſs itſelf miſtaken, when it finds itſelf to be wrong. Thou thyſelf art an adept in the pretended ſcience of reading men; and, whenever thou art out, wilt ſtudy to find ſome reaſons why it was more probable that thou ſhouldſt have been right; and wilt watch every motion and action, and every word and ſentiment, in the perſon thou haſt once cenſured, for proofs, in order to help thee to revive and maintain thy firſt opinion. And, indeed, as thou ſeldom erreſt on the favourable ſide, human nature is ſo vile a thing, that thou art likely to be right five times in ſix, on the other: and perhaps it is but gueſſing of others, by what thou findeſt in thy own heart, to have reaſon to compliment thyſelf on thy penetration.

Here is preachment for thy preachment: and I hope if thou likeſt thine own, thou wilt thank me for mine; the rather, as thou mayeſt be the better for it, if thou wilt, ſince it is calculated for thy own meridian.

Well, but the lady refers my deſtiny to the letter ſhe has written, already written, to Miſs Howe; to whom, it ſeems, ſhe has given her reaſons why ſhe will not have me. I long to know the contents of this letter; but am in great hopes that ſhe has ſo expreſſed her denials, as ſhall give room to think, ſhe only wants to be perſuaded to the contrary, in order to reconcile herſelf to herſelf.

I could make ſome pretty obſervations upon one or two places of the lady's meditation: but, wicked as I am thought to be, I never was ſo abandoned, as to turn into ridicule, or even to treat with levity, things ſacred. I think it the higheſt degree of ill-manners, to jeſt upon thoſe ſubjects which the world in general look upon with veneration, and call divine. I would not even treat the mythology of the heathen, to a heathen, with the ridicule that perhaps would fairly lie from ſome of the abſurdities that ſtrike every common obſerver. Nor, when at Rome, and in other Popiſh countries, did I ever behave indecently at thoſe ceremonies which I thought very extraordinary: for I ſaw ſome people affected, and ſeemingly edified by them: and I contented myself to think, though they were beyond my comprehenſion, that if they anſwered any good end to the many, there was religion enough in them, or civil policy at leaſt, to exempt them from the ridicule of even a bad man who had common ſenſe and good manners.

For the like reaſon I have never given noiſy or tumultuous inſtances of diſlike to a new play, if I thought it ever ſo indifferent: for I concluded, firſt, that every-one was entitled to ſee quietly what he paid for: and, next, as the theatre (the epitome of the world) conſiſted of pit, boxes, and gallery, it was hard, I thought, if there could be ſuch a performance exhibited, as would not pleaſe ſomebody in that mixed multitude: and, if it did, thoſe ſomebodies had as much right to enjoy their own judgments undiſturbedly, as I had to enjoy mine.

This was my way of ſhewing my diſapprobation; I never went again. And as a man is at his option, whether he will go to a play or not, he has not the ſame excuſe for expreſſing his diſlike clamorouſly, as if he were compelled to ſee it.

I have ever, thou knoweſt, declared againſt thoſe ſhallow libertines, who could not make out their pretenſions to wit, but on two ſubjects, to which every man of true wit will ſcorn to be beholden: PROFANENESS and OBSCENITY, I mean; which muſt ſhock the ears of every man or woman of ſenſe, without anſwering any end, but of ſhewing a very low and abandoned nature. And, till I came acquainted with the brutal Mowbray, [No great praiſe to myſelf from ſuch a tutor] I was far from making ſo free as I now do, with oaths and curſes; for then I was forced to outſwear him ſometimes, in order to keep him in his allegiance to me his general: nay, I often check myſelf to myſelf, for this empty unprofitable liberty of ſpeech; in which we are outdone by the ſons of the common-ſewer.

All my vice is women, and the love of plots and intrigues; and I cannot but wonder, how I fell into thoſe ſhocking freedoms of ſpeech; ſince, generally-ſpeaking, they are far from helping forward my main end: only, now-and-then, indeed, a little novice riſes to one's notice, who ſeems to think oaths, and oaths, and curſes, the diagneſticks of the rakiſh ſpirit ſhe is inclined to favour: and indeed they are the only qualifications that ſome who are called rakes and pretty fellows have to boaſt of. But what muſt the women be, who can be attracted by ſuch empty-ſouled profligates! —Since wickedneſs with wit is hardly tolerable; but, without, is equally ſhocking and contemptible.

There again is preachment for thy preachment; and thou wilt be apt to think, that I am reforming too: but no ſuch matter. If this were new light darting in upon me, as thy morality ſeems to be to thee, ſomething of this kind might be apprehended: but this was always my way of thinking; and I defy thee, or any of thy brethren, to name a time, when I have either ridiculed religion, or talked obſcenely. On the contrary, thou knoweſt how often I have checked that beer in love-matters, Mowbray, and the finical Tourville, and thyſelf too, for what ye have called the double-entendre. In love, as in points that required a manly reſentment, it has always been my maxim, to act, rather than talk; and I do aſſure thee, as to the firſt, the women themſelves will excuſe the one ſooner than the other.

As to the admiration thou expreſſeſt, for the books of Scripture, thou art certainly right in it. But 'tis ſtrange to me, that thou wert ignorant of their beauty, and noble ſimplicity, till now. Their antiquity always made me reverence them: and how was it poſſible that thou couldeſt not, for that reaſon, if for no other, give them a peruſal?

I'll tell thee a ſhort ſtory, which I had from my tutor, admoniſhing me againſt expoſing myſelf by ignorant wonder, when I ſhould quit college, to go to town, or travel.

The firſt time Dryden's Alexander's Feaſt fell into his hands, he told me, he was prodigiouſly charmed with it: and, having never heard any-body ſpeak of it before, thought, as thou doſt of the Bible, that he had made a new diſcovery.

He haſtened to an appointment which he had with ſeveral wits, (for he was then in town) one of whom was a noted critick, who, according to him, had more merit than good fortune; for all the nibblers in wit, whoſe writings would not ſtand the teſt of criticiſm, made it, he ſaid, a common cauſe to run him down, as men would a mad dog.

The young gentleman (for young he then was) ſet forth magnificently in the praiſes of that inimitable performance; and gave himſelf airs of ſecond hand merit, for finding out it's beauties.

The Story of the OLD BARD and COLLEGIAN, and LOVELACE, from the Tatler.

Published by Alex.r Hogg N.o 16 Paternoster Row, Jan.y 25. 1794.

The old bard heard him out with a ſmile, which the collegian took for approbation, till he ſpoke; and then it was in theſe mortifying words: 'Sdeath, 'Sir, where have you lived till now, or 'with what ſort of company have you 'converſed, young as you are, that you 'have never before heard of the fineſt 'piece in the Engliſh language?'

This ſtory had ſuch an effect upon me, who had ever a proud heart, and wanted to be thought a clever fellow, that in order to avoid the like diſgrace, I laid down two rules to myſelf. The firſt, whenever I went into company where there were ſtrangers, to hear every-one of them ſpeak, before I gave myſelf liberty to prate: the other, if I found any of them above my match, to give up all title to new diſcoveries, contenting myſelf to praiſe what they praiſed, as beauties familiar to me, though I had never heard of them before. And ſo, by degrees, I got the reputation of a wit myſelf: and when I threw off all reſtraint, and books, and learned converſation, and fell in with ſome of our brethren who are now wandering in Erebus, and with ſuch others as Belton, Mowbray, Tourville, and thyſelf, I ſet up on my own ſtock; and, like what we have been told of Sir Richard, in his latter days, valued myſelf on being the emperor of the company: for, having fathomed the depth of them all, and afraid of no rival but thee, whom alſo I had got a little under, (by my gaiety and promptitude at leaſt) I proudly, like Addiſon's Cato, delighted to give laws to my little ſenate.

Proceed with thee by-and-by.

LETTER X.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

PUT now I have cleared myſelf of any intentional levity on occaſion of my beloved's meditation; which, as you obſerve, is finely ſuited to her caſe; (that is to ſay, as ſhe and you have drawn her caſe) I cannot help expreſſing my pleaſure, that by one or two verſes of it, [The arrow, Jack, and what ſhe feared being come upon her!] I am encouraged to hope, what it will be very ſurprizing to me if it does not happen; that is, in plain Engliſh, that the dear creature is in the way to be a mamma.

This curſed arreſt, becauſe of the ill effects the terror might have had upon her, in that hoped-for circumſtance, has concerned me more than any other account. It would be the pride of my life to prove, in this charming frontpiece, the triumph of nature over principle, and to have a young Lovelace by ſuch an angel: and then, for it's ſake, I am confident ſhe will live, and will legitimate it. And what a meritorious little cherub would it be, that ſhould lay an obligation upon both parents before it was born, which neither of them would be able to repay—Could I be ſure it was ſo, I ſhould be out of all pain for her recovery: pain, I ſay; ſince, were ſhe to die—[Die! abominable word! how I hate it!]—I verily think I ſhould be the moſt miſerable man in the world.

As for the earneſtneſs ſhe expreſſes for death, ſhe has found the words ready to her hand in honeſt Job; elſe ſhe would not have delivered herſelf with ſuch ſtrength and vehemence.

Her innate piety (as I have more than once obſerved) will not permit her to ſhorten her own life, either by violence or neglect. She has a mind too noble for that; and would have done it before now, had ſhe deſigned any ſuch thing: for to do it, like the Roman matron, when the miſchief is over, and it can ſerve no end; and when the man, however a Tarquin, as ſome may think me in this action, is not a Tarquin in power, ſo that no national point can be made of it; is what ſhe has too much good ſenſe to think of.

Then, as I obſerved in a like caſe, a little while ago, the diſtreſs, when this was written, was ſtrong upon her; and ſhe ſaw no end of it: but all was darkneſs and apprehenſion before her. Moreover, has ſhe it not in her power to diſappoint as much as ſhe has been diſappointed? Revenge, Jack, has induced many a woman to cheriſh a life, to which grief and deſpair would otherwiſe have put an end.

And, after all, death is no ſuch eligible thing, as Job, in his calamities, makes it. And a death deſired merely from worldly diſappointments ſhews not a right mind, let me tell this lady, whatever ſhe may think of it. You and I, Jack, although not afraid, in the height of paſſion or reſentment, to ruſh into thoſe dangers which might be followed by a ſudden and violent death, whenever a point of honour calls upon us, would ſhudder at his cool and deliberate approach in a lingering ſickneſs, which had debilitated the ſpirits.

So we read of a famous French general,

[I forget as well the reign of the prince, as the name of the man] who, having faced with intrepidity the ghaſtly viſage on an hundred occaſions in the field, was the moſt dejected of wretches, when, having forfeited his life for treaſon, he was led with all the cruel parade of preparation, and ſurrounding guards, to the ſcaffold.

The poets ſay well:

'Tis not the Stoick leſſon, got by rote,
The pomp of words, and pedant diſſertation,
That can ſupport us in the hour of terror.
Books have taught cowards to talk nobly of it:
But when the trial comes, they ſtart, and ſtand aghaſt.'

Very true: for then it is the old man in the fable, with his bundle of ſticks.

The lady is well read in Shakeſpeare, our Engliſh pride and glory; and muſt ſometimes reaſon with herſelf in his words, ſo greatly expreſſed, that the ſubject, affecting as it is, cannot produce any-thing greater.

'Aye, but to die, and go we know not where;
To lie in cold obſtruction, and to rot;
This ſenſible, warm motion, to become
A kneaded clod; and the delighted ſpirit
To bathe in the fiery floods, or to reſide
In thrilling regions of thick-ribbed ice:
To be impriſon'd in the viewleſs winds,
Or blown, with reſtleſs violence, about
The pendent worlds; or to be worſe than worſt
Of thoſe that lawleſs and uncertain thought
Imagines howling: 'tis too horrible!
The weariſt and moſt loaded worldly life,
That pain, age, penury, and impriſonment,
Can lay on nature, is a paradiſe
To what we fear of death.'

I find, by one of thy three letters, that my beloved had ſome account from Hickman of my interview with Miſs Howe, at Colonel Ambroſe's. I had a very agreeable time of it there; although ſeverely rallied by ſeveral of the aſſembly. It concerns me, however, not a little, to find our affair ſo generally known among the Flippanti of both ſexes. It is all her own fault. There never, ſurely, was ſuch an odd little ſoul as this.—Not to keep her own ſecret, when the revealing of it could anſwer no poſſible good end; and when ſhe wants not (one would think) to raiſe to herſelf either pity or friends, or to me enemies, by the proclamation!—What, Jack, muſt not all her own ſex laugh in their ſleeves at her weakneſs? What would become of the peace of the world, if all women ſhould take it into their heads to follow her example?—What a fine time of it would the heads of families have? Their wives always filling their ears with their confeſſions; their daughters with theirs: ſiſters would be every day ſetting their brothers about cutting of throats, if the brothers had at heart the honour of their families, as it is called; and the whole world would either be a ſcene of confuſion; or cuckoldom as much the faſhion as it is in Lithuania*.

I am glad, however, that Miſs Howe (as much as ſhe hates me) kept her word with my couſins on their viſit to her, and with me at the colonel's, to endeavour to perſuade her friend to make up all matters by matrimony; which, no doubt, is the beſt, nay, the only method ſhe can take, for her own honour, and that of her family.

I had once thoughts of revenging myſelf on that vixen, and, particularly, as thou mayſt remember, had planned ſomething to this purpoſe on the journey ſhe is going to take, which has been talked of ſome time. But, I think—Let me ſee—Yes, I think, I will let this Hickman have her ſafe and entire, as thou believeſt the fellow to be a tolerable ſort of a mortal, and that I had made the worſt of him: and I am glad, for his own take, he has not launched out too virulently againſt me to thee.

But thou ſeeſt, Jack, by her refuſal of money from him, or Miſs Howe, that the dear extravagant takes a delight in oddneſſes, chuſing to part with her cloaths, though for a ſong. Doſt think ſhe is not a little touched at times? I am afraid ſhe is. A little ſpice of that inſanity, I doubt, runs through her, that ſhe had in a ſtronger degree, in the firſt week of my operations. Her contempt of life; her proclamations; her refuſal of matrimony; and now of money from her moſt intimate friends; are ſprinklings of this kind, and no other way, I think, to be accounted for.

Her apothecary is a good honeſt fellow. I like him much. But the ſilly dear's harping ſo continually upon one ſtring, dying, dying, dying, is what I have no patience with. I hope all this melancholy jargon is owing entirely to the way I would have her to be in. And it being as new to her, as the Bible beauties to thee, no wonder ſhe knows

* In Lithuania, the women are ſaid to have ſo allowedly their gallants, called adjutores, that the huſbands hardly ever enter upon any party of pleaſure without them.

not

not what to make of herſelf; and ſo fancies ſhe is breeding death, when the event will turn out quite the contrary.

Thou art a ſorry fellow in thy remarks on the education and qualification of ſmarts and beaus of the rakiſh order; if by thy we's and us's thou meaneſt thyſelf or me: for I preſume to ſay, that the picture has no reſemblance of us, who have read and converſed as we have done. It may, indeed, and I believe it does, reſemble the generality of the fops and coxcombs about town. But that let them look to; for, if it affects not me, to what purpoſe thy random-ſhot?—If indeed thou findeſt, by the new light darted in upon thee, ſince thou haſt had the honour of converſing with this admirable creature, that the cap fits thy own head, why then, according to the Qui capit rule, e'en take and clap it on: and I will add a ſtring of bells to it, to complete thee for the fore-horſe of the idiot team.

Although I juſt now ſaid a kind thing or two for this fellow Hickman; yet I can tell thee, I could (to uſe one of my noble peer's humble phraſes) eat him up without a corn of ſalt, when I think of his impudence to ſalute my charmer twice at parting: and have ſtill leſs patience with the lady herſelf for preſuming to offer her cheek or lip [Thou ſayeſt not which] to him, and to preſs his clumſy fiſt between her charming hands. An honour worth a king's ranſom; and what I would give—What would I not give!—to have!—And then he, in return, to preſs her, as thou ſayeſt he did, to his ſtupid heart; at that time, no doubt, more ſenſible than ever it was before!

By thy deſcription of their parting, I ſee thou wilt be a delicate fellow in time. My mortification in this lady's diſpleaſure, will be thy exaltation from her converſation. I envy thee as well for thy opportunities as for thy improvements: and ſuch an impreſſion has thy concluding paragraph made upon me, that I wiſh I do not get into a reformation-humour as well as thou: and then what a couple of lamentable puppies ſhall we make, howling in recitative to each other's diſcordant muſick!

Let me improve upon the thought, and imagine that, turned hermits, we have opened the two old caves at Hornſey, or dug new ones; and in each of our cells ſet up a death's-head, and an hour-glaſs, for objects of contemplation—I have ſeen ſuch a picture: but then, Jack, had not the old penitent fornicator a ſuffocating long grey beard? What figures would a couple of brocaded or lace-waiſtcoated toupets make with their ſour ſcrewed-up half-cocked faces, and more than half-ſhut eyes, in a kneeling attitude, recapitulating their reſpective rogueries? This ſcheme, were we only to make trial of it, and return afterwards to our old ways, might ſerve to the better purpoſe by far, than Horner's in the Country Wife, to bring the pretty wenches to us.

Let me ſee—The author of Hudibras has ſomewhere a deſcription that would ſuit us, when met in one of our caves, and comparing our diſmal notes together. This is it. Suppoſe me deſcribed—

'—He ſat upon his rump,
'His head like one in doleful dump:
'Betwixt his knees his hands apply'd
'Unto his cheeks, on either ſide:
'And by him, in another hole,
'Sat ſtupid Belford, cheek by jowl.'

I know thou wilt think me too ludicrous. I think myſelf ſo. It is truly, to be ingenious, a forced-put: for my paſſions are ſo wound up, that I am obliged either to laugh or cry. Like honeſt drunken Jack Daventry—[Poor fellow!—What an unhappy end was his!]—Thou knoweſt, I uſed to obſerve, that whenever he roſe from an entertainment, which he never did ſober, it was his way, as ſoon as he got to the door, to look round him like a carrier-pigeon juſt thrown up, in order to ſpy out his courſe; and then, taking to his heels, he would run all the way home, though it were a mile or two, when he could hardly ſtand, and muſt have tumbled on his noſe if he had attempted to walk moderately. This then be my excuſe, in this my unconverted eſtate, for a concluſion ſo unworthy of the concluſion to thy third letter.

What a length have I run!—Thou wilt own, that if I pay thee not in quality, I do in quantity: and yet I leave a multitude of things unobſerved upon. Indeed I hardly at this preſent know what to do with myſelf but ſcribble. Tired with Lord M. who, in his recovery, has played upon me the fable of the Nurſe, the Crying Child, and the Wolf—Tired with my couſins Montague, though charming girls, were they not ſo near of kin—Tired with Mowbray and Tourville, and their everlaſting identity—Tired with the country—Tired of myſelf—Longing for what I have not—I muſt go to town; and there have an interview with the charmer of my my soul; for desperate diseases must have desperate remedies: and I only wait to know my doom from Miss Howe; and then, if it be rejection, I will try my fate, and receive my sentence at her feet.—But I will apprize thee of it before-hand, as I told thee, that thou mayst keep thy parole with the lady in the best manner thou canst.

LETTER XI.

MISS HOWE, TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

[IN ANSWER TO HERS OF JULY 27. NO. VII. VIII.]

FRIDAY NIGHT, JULY 28.

I Will now, my dearest friend, write to you all my mind, without reserve, on your resolution not to have this vilest of men. You gave me, in yours of Sunday the 23d, reasons so worthy of the pure mind of my Clarissa, in support of this your resolution, that nothing but self-love, lest I should lose my ever-amiable friend, could have prevailed upon me to wish you to alter it.

Indeed, I thought it was impossible there could be (however desirable) so noble an instance given by any of our sex, of a passion conquered, when there were so many inducements to give way to it. And therefore I was willing to urge you once more to overcome your just indignation, and to be prevailed upon by the solicitations of his friends, before you carried your resentments to so great a height, that it would be more difficult for you, and less to your honour to comply, than if you had complied at first.

But now, my dear, that I see you fixed in your noble resolution; and that it is impossible for your pure mind to join itself with that of so perjured a miscreant; I congratulate you most heartily upon it; and beg your pardon for but seeming to doubt, that theory and practice were not the same thing with my beloved Clarissa.

I have only one thing that saddens my heart on this occasion; and that is, the bad state of health Mr. Hickman (unwillingly) owns you are in. Hitherto you have well observed the doctrine you always laid down to me, That a censured person should first seek to be justified to herself, and give but a second place to the world's opinion of her; and, in all cases where the two could not be reconciled, have preferred the first to the last; and are, of consequence, well justified to your own heart, as well as to your Anna Howe. Let me, therefore, beseech you to endeavour, by all possible means, to recover your health and spirits: and this, as what, if it can be effected, will crown the work, and shew the world that you were indeed got above the base wretch; and, though put out of your course for a little while, could resume it again, and go on blessing all within your knowledge, as well by your example, as by your precepts.

For Heaven's sake, then—for the world's sake, for the honour of our sex, and for my sake, once more I beseech you, try to overcome this shock: and, if you can overcome it, I shall then be as happy as I wish to be; for I cannot, indeed I cannot think of parting with you, for many, many years to come.

The reasons you give for discouraging my wishes to have you near us, are so convincing, that I ought at present to acquiesce in them: but, my dear, when your mind is fully settled, as (now you are so absolutely determined in it, with regard to this wretch) I hope it will soon be, I shall expect you with us, or near us: and then you shall chalk out every path that I will set my foot in; nor will I turn aside either to the right-hand, or to the left.

You wish I had not mediated for you to your friends. I wish so too; because my mediation was ineffectual; because it may give new ground for the malice of some of them to work upon; and because you are angry with me for doing so. But how, as I said in my former, could I sit down in quiet, when I knew how uneasy their implacableness made you?—But I will tear myself from the subject; for I see I shall be warm again—and displease you—And there is not one thing in the world that I would do, however agreeable to myself, if I thought it would disoblige you; nor any one that I would omit to do, if I knew it would give you pleasure. And, indeed, my dear half-severe friend, I will try if I cannot avoid the fault as willingly as I would the rebuke.

For this reason, I forbear saying anything on so nice a subject as your letter to your sister. It must be right, because you think it so—and if it be taken as it ought, that will shew you that it is. But if it begets insults and revilings, as it is but too likely—I find you don't intend to let me know it.

You were always so ready to accuse yourself for other peoples faults, and to suspect your own conduct, rather than the judgment of your relations, that I have often often told you, I cannot imitate you in this. It is not a neceſſary point of belief with me, that all people in years are therefore wiſe; or that all young people are therefore rath and headſtrong: it may be generally the caſe, as far as I know: and poſſibly it may be ſo in the caſe of my mother and her girl; but I will venture to ſay, that it has not yet appeared to be ſo between the principals of Harlowe Place, and their ſecond daughter.

You are for excu ng them beforehand for their expected cruelty, as not knowing what you have ſuffered, nor how ill you are: they have heard of the former, and are not ſorry for it: of the latter they have been told, and I have moſt reaſon to how how they have taken it—But I ſh.ll be far from avoiding the fault, and as ſurely ſhall incur the rebuke, if I ſay any more upon this ſubject. I will therefore only add at preſent, that your reaſonings in their behalf ſhew you to be all excellence; their returns to you, that they are all—Do, my dear, let me end with a little bit of ſpiteful juſtice—But you won't I know—So I have done, quite done, however reluctantly: yet if you think of the word I would have ſaid, don't doubt the juſtice of it, and fill up the blank with it.

You intimate that were I actually married, and Mr. Hickman to deſire it, you would think of obliging me with a viſit on the occaſion; and that perhaps when with me, it would be difficult for you to remove far from me.

Lord, my dear, what a ſtreſs you ſeem to lay upon Mr. Hickman's deſiring it!—To be ſure he does, and would of all things deſire to have you near us, and with us, if we might be ſo favoured—Policy, as well as veneration for you, would undoubtedly make the man, if not a fool, deſire this. But let me tell you, that if Mr. Hickman, after marriage, ſhould pretend to diſpute with me my friendſhips, as I hope I am not quite a fool, I ſhould let him know how far his own quiet was concerned in ſuch an impertinence; eſpecially if they were ſuch friendſhips as were contracted before I knew him.

I know I always differed from you on this ſubject; for you think more highly of a huſband's prerogative, than moſt people do of a royal one. Theſe notions, my dear, from a perſon of your ſenſe and judgment, are no-way advantageous to us; inaſmuch as they juſtify that aſſuming ſex in their inſolence; when hardly one out of ten of them, their opportunities conſidered, deſerves any prerogative at all. Look through all the families we know; and we ſhall not find one-third of them have half the ſenſe of their wives. And yet theſe are to be veſted with prerogatives! And a woman of twice their ſenſe has nothing to do but hear, tremble, and obey—And for conſcience-ſake too, I warrant!

But Mr. Hickman and I may perhaps have a little diſcourſe upon theſe ſort of ſubjects, before I ſuffer him to talk of the day: and then I ſhall let him know what he has to truſt to; as he will me, if he be a ſincere man, what he pretends to expect from me. But let me tell you, my dear, that it is more in your power, than perhaps you think it, to haſten the day ſo much preſſed for by my mother, as well as wiſhed-for by you—For the very day that you can aſſure me, that you are in a tolerable ſtate of health, and have diſcharged your doctor and apothecary, at their own motions, on that account—Some day in a month, from that deſirable news, ſhall be it. So, my dear, make haſte and be well, and then this matter will be brought to effect in a manner more agreeable to your Anna Howe than it otherwiſe ever can.

I ſend this day, by a particular hand, to the Miſſes Montague, your letter of juſt reprobation of the greateſt profligate in the kingdom; and hope I ſhall not have done amiſs that I tranſcribe ſome of the paragraphs of your letter of the 23d, and ſend them with it, as you at firſt intended ſhould be done.

You are, it ſeems (and that too much for your health) employed in writing; I hope it is in penning down the particulars of your tragical ſtory. And my mother has put me in mind to preſs you to it, with a view, that one day, if it might be publiſhed under feigned names, it would be of as much uſe as honour to the ſex. My mother ſays, ſhe cannot help admiring you for the propriety of your reſentment in your refuſal of the wretch; and the would be extremely glad to have her advice of penning your ſad ſtory complied with. And then, ſhe ſays, your noble conduct throughout your trials and calamities will afford not only a ſhining example to your ſex; but at the ſame time (thoſe calamities befalling ſuch a perſon) a fearful warning to the inconſiderate young creatures of it.

On Monday we ſhall ſet out on our journey; and I hope to be back in a fortnight, and on my return will have one pull more with my mother for a London journey: and, if the pretence muſt be the buying of cloaths, the principal motive will be that of ſeeing once more my friend, while I can ſay, I have not finally given conſent to the change of a viſitor into a relation, and ſo can call myſelf MY OWN, as well as YOUR

ANNA HOWE.

LETTER XII.

MISS HOWE, TO THE TWO MISSES MONTAGUE.

SAT. JULY 29.

DEAR LADIES,

I Have not been wanting to uſe all my intereſt with my beloved friend, to induce her to forgive and be reconciled to your kinſman; (though he has ſo ill deſerved it) and have even repeated my earneſt advice to her on this head. This repetition, and the waiting for her anſwer, having taken up time, have been the cauſe, that I could not ſooner do myſelf the honour of writing to you on this ſubject.

You will ſee by the incloſed, her immoveable reſolution, grounded on noble and high-ſouled motives, which I cannot but regret and applaud at the ſame time: applaud, for the juſtice of her determination, which will confirm all your worthy houſe in the opinion you had conceived of her unequalled merit; and regret, becauſe I have but too much reaſon to apprehend, as well by that, as by the report of a gentleman juſt come from her, that ſhe is in ſuch a declining way as to her health, that her thoughts are very differently employed than on a continuance here.

The incloſed letter ſhe thought fit to ſend to me unſealed, that, after I had peruſed it, I might forward it to you; and this is the reaſon it is ſuperſcribed by myſelf, and ſealed with my ſeal. It is very full and peremptory; but as ſhe had been pleaſed, in a letter to me, dated the 23d inſtant, (as ſoon as ſhe could hold a pen) to give me more ample reaſons why ſhe could not comply with your preſſing requeſts, as well as mine, I will tranſcribe ſome of the paſſages in that letter, which will give one of the wickedeſt men in the world (if he ſees them) reaſon to think himſelf one of the moſt unhappy, in the loſs of ſo incomparable a wife as he might have gloried in, had he not been ſo ſuperlatively wicked. Theſe are the paſſages:

[See for theſe paſſages, Miſs Harlowe's letter, No. XCI. of Vol. VI. dated July 23, marked with turned comma's thus '']

And now, ladies, you have before you my beloved friend's reaſons for her refuſal of a man unworthy of the relation he bears to ſo many excellent perſons: and I will add (for I cannot help it) that, the merit and rank of the perſon conſidered, and the vile manner of his proceedings, there never was a greater villainy committed: and ſince ſhe thinks her firſt and only fault cannot be expiated but by death, I pray to God daily, and will hourly from the moment I ſhall hear of that ſad cataſtrophe, that he will be pleaſed to make him the ſubject of his vengeance in ſome ſuch way, as that all who know of his perfidious crime, may ſee the hand of Heaven in the puniſhment of it!

You will forgive me, ladies: I love not mine own ſoul better than I do Miſs Clariſſa Harlowe. And the diſtreſſes ſhe has gone through; the perſecution ſhe ſuffers from all her friends: the curſe ſhe lies under, for his ſake, from her implacable father; her reduced health and circumſtances, from high health and affluence; and that execrable arreſt and confinement, which have deepened all her other calamities, (and which muſt be laid at his door, as it was the act of his vile agents, that, whether from his immediate orders or not, naturally flowed from his preceding baſeneſs;) the ſex diſhonoured in the eye of the world, in the perſon of one of the greateſt ornaments of it; the unmanly methods, whatever they were, (for I know not all as yet) by which he compaſſed her ruin—All theſe conſiderations join to juſtify my warmth, and my execrations of a man, whom I think excluded by his crimes from the benefit even of Chriſtian forgiveneſs—And were you to ſee all ſhe writes, and to know the admirable talents ſhe is miſtreſs of, you yourſelves would join with me to admire her, and execrate him.

Believe me to be, with a high ſenſe of your merits, dear ladies, your moſt obedient humble ſervant,

ANNA HOWE.

LETTER XIII.

MRS. NORTON, TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

FRIDAY, JULY 28.

MY DEAREST YOUNG LADY,

I Have the conſolation to tell you, that my ſon is once again in an hopeful way, as to his health. He deſires his duty duty to you. He is very low and weak. And ſo am I. But this is the firſt time that I have been able, for ſeveral days paſt, to ſit up to write, or I would not have been ſo long ſilent.

Your letter to your ſiſter is received and anſwered. You have the anſwer by this time, I ſuppoſe. I wiſh it may be to your ſatisfaction; but am afraid it will not: for, by Betty Barnes, I find they were in a great ferment on receiving yours, and much divided whether it ſhould be anſwered or not. They will not yet believe that you are ſo ill, as (to my infinite concern) I find you are. What paſſed between Miſs Harlowe and Miſs Howe, has been, as I feared it would be, an aggravation.

I ſhewed Betty two or three paſſages in your letter to me: and ſhe ſeemed moved, and ſaid, ſhe would report them favourably, and would procure me a viſit from Miſs Harlowe, if I would promiſe to ſhew the ſame to her. But I have heard no more of that.

Methinks, I am ſorry you refuſe the wicked man: but doubt not, nevertheleſs, that your motives for doing ſo are more commendable than my wiſhes that you would not. But as you would be reſolved, as I may ſay, on life, if you gave way to ſuch a thought; and as I have ſo much intereſt in your recovery; I cannot forbear ſhewing this regard to myſelf, and to aſk you, if you cannot get over your juſt reſentments?—But I dare ſay no more on this ſubject.

What a dreadful thing indeed was it for my deareſt tender young lady to be arreſted in the ſtreets of London!—How does my heart go over again for you, what yours muſt have ſuffered at that time!—Yet this, to ſuch a mind as yours, muſt be light, compared to what you had ſuffered before.

O my deareſt Miſs Clary, how ſhall we know what to pray for, when we pray, but that God's will may be done, and that we may be reſigned to it!—When at nine years old, and afterwards at eleven, you had a dangerous fever, how inceſſantly did we all grieve, and pray, and put up our vows to the Throne of Grace for your recovery!—For all our lives were bound up in your life—Yet now, my dear, as it has proved, (eſpecially if we are ſoon to loſe you) what a much more deſirable event, both for you and for us, would it have been, had we then loſt you.

A ſad thing to ſay! But as it is in pure love to you that I ſay it, and in full conviction that we are not always fit to be our own chuſers, I hope it may be excuſable; and the rather, as the ſame reflection will naturally lead both you and me to acquieſce under the preſent diſpenſation; ſince we are aſſured, that nothing happens by chance; and that the greateſt good may, for ought we know, be produced from the heavieſt evils.

I am glad you are with ſuch honeſt people: and that you have all your effects reſtored. How dreadfully have you been uſed, that one ſhould be glad of ſuch a poor piece of juſtice as that?

Your talent at moving the paſſions is always hinted at; and this Betty of your ſiſter's never comes near me, that ſhe is not full of it. But, as you ſay, whom has it moved that you wiſhed to move? Yet, were it not for this unhappy notion, I am ſure your mother would relent. Forgive me, my dear Miſs Clary; for I muſt try one way to be convinced if my opinion be not juſt. But I will not tell you what that is, unleſs it ſucceeds. I will try, in pure duty and love to them, as to you.

May Heaven be your ſupport in all your trials, is the conſtant prayer, my deareſt young lady, of your ever-affectionate friend and ſervant,

JUDITH NORTON.

LETTER XIV.

MRS. NORTON, TO MRS. HARLOWE.

FRIDAY, JULY 28.

HONOURED MADAM,

BEING forbidden (without leave) to ſend you any thing I might happen to receive from my beloved Miſs Clary, and ſo ill, that I cannot attend to aſk your leave, I give you this trouble to let you know, that I have received a letter from her; which, I think, I ſhould hereafter be held inexcuſable, as things may happen, if I did not deſire permiſſion to communicate to you, and that as ſoon as poſſible.

Applications have been made to the dear young lady from Lord M. from the two ladies his ſiſters, and from both his nieces, and from the wicked man himſelf, to forgive and marry him. This, in noble indignation for the uſage ſhe has received from him, ſhe has abſolutely refuſed. And perhaps, Madam, if you and the honoured family ſhould be of opinion, that to comply with their wiſhes is now the propereſt meaſure that can be taken, the circumſtances of things may require your authority or advice to induce her to change her mind.

I have reaſon to believe, that one motive for her refuſal, is her full conviction that ſhe ſhall not long be a trouble to any-body; and ſo ſhe would not give a huſband a right to interfere with her family, in relation to the eſtate her grandfather deviſed to her. But of this, however, I have not the leaſt intimation from her. Nor would ſhe, I dare ſay, mention it, as a reaſon, having ſtill ſtronger reaſons, from his vile treatment of her, to refuſe him.

The letter I have received will ſhow how truly penitent the dear creature is; and if I have your permiſſion, I will ſend it ſealed up, with a copy of mine, to which it is an anſwer. But as I reſolve upon this ſtep without her knowledge, [and indeed I do] I will not acquaint her with it, unleſs it be attended with deſirable effects: becauſe, otherwiſe, beſides making me incur her diſpleaſure, it might quite break her already half-broken heart. I am, honoured Madam, your dutiful and ever-obliged ſervant,

JUDITH NORTON.

LETTER XV.

MRS. HARLOWE, TO MRS. JUDITH NORTON.

SUNDAY, JULY 30.

WE all know your virtuous prudence, worthy woman: we all do. But your partiality to this your raſh favourite is likewiſe known. And we are no leſs acquainted with the unhappy body's power of painting her diſtreſſes ſo as to pierce a ſtone.

Every-one is of opinion, that the dear naughty creature is working about to be forgiven and received; and for this reaſon it is, that Betty has been forbidden [Not by me, you may be ſure!] to mention any more of her letters: for ſhe did ſpeak to my Bella of ſome moving paſſages you read to her.

This will convince you, that nothing will be heard in her favour. To what purpoſe then ſhould I mention anything about her?—But you may be ſure that I will, if I can but have one ſecond. However, that is not at all likely, until we ſee what the conſequences of her crime will be: and who can tell that?—She may—How can I ſpeak it, and my once darling daughter unmarried!—She may be with child?—This would perpetuate her ſtain. Her brother may come to ſome harm; which God forbid!—One child's ruin, I hope, will not be followed by another's murder.

As to her grief, and her preſent miſery, whatever it be, ſhe muſt bear with it: and it muſt be ſhort of what I hourly bear for her! Indeed I am afraid nothing but her being at the laſt extremity of all will make her father, and her uncles, and her other friends, forgive her.

The eaſy pardon perverſe children meet with, when they have done the raſheſt and moſt rebellious thing they can do, is the reaſon (as is pleaded to us every day) that ſo many follow their example. They depend upon the indulgent weakneſs of their parents tempers, and, in that dependence, harden their own hearts: and a little humiliation, when they have brought themſelves into the foretold miſery, is to be a ſufficient atonement for the greateſt perverſeneſs.

But for ſuch a child as this [I mention what others hourly ſay, but what I moſt ſorrowfully ſubſcribe to] to lay plots and ſtratagems to deceive her parents, as well as herſelf; and to run away with a libertine: Can there be any atonement for her crime! And is ſhe not anſwerable to God, to us, to you, and to all the world who know her, for the abuſe of ſuch talents as ſhe has abuſed?

You ſay her heart is half-broken: is it to be wondered at? Was not her ſin committed equally againſt warning and the light of her own knowledge?

That he would now marry her, or that ſhe would refuſe him, if ſhe believed him in earneſt, as ſhe has circumſtanced herſelf, is not at all probable; and were I inclined to believe it, nobody elſe here would. He values not his relations; and would deceive them as ſoon as any others; his averſion to marriage he has always openly declared; and ſtill occaſionally declares it. But if he be now in earneſt; which every-one who knows him muſt doubt: which do you think (hating us, too, as he profeſſes to hate and deſpiſe us all) would be moſt eligible here: to hear of her death or of her marriage with ſuch a vile man?

To all of us, yet, I cannot ſay! For, Oh! my good Mrs. Norton, you know what a mother's tenderneſs for the child of her heart would make her chuſe, notwithſtanding all that child's faults, rather than loſe her for ever!

But I muſt ſail with the tide; my own judgment alſo joining with the general reſentment; or I ſhould make the unhappineſs of the more worthy ſtill greater; [my dear Mr. Harlowe's particularly] which is already more than enough enough to make them unhappy for the remainder of their days. This I know; if I were to oppose the reſt, our ſon would fly out to find this libertine; and who could tell what would be the iſſue of that with ſuch a man of violence and blood, as that Lovelace is known to be?

All I can expect to prevail for her, is, that in a week, or ſo, Mr. Brand may be ſent up to enquire privately about her preſent ſtate, and way of life, and to ſee ſhe is not altogether deſtitute: for nothing ſhe writes herſelf will be regarded.

Her father indeed has, at her earneſt requeſt withdrawn the curſe, which, in a paſſion, he laid upon her, at her firſt wicked flight from us. But Miſs Howe [It is a ſad thing, Mrs. Norton, to ſuffer ſo many ways at once] had made matters ſo difficult by her undue liberties with us all, as well by ſpeech in all companies as by letters written to my Bella, that we could hardly prevail upon him to hear her letter read.

Theſe liberties of Miſs Howe with us; the general cry againſt us abroad, wherever we are ſpoken of; and the viſible, and not ſeldom audible diſreſpectfulneſs, which high and low treat us with to our faces, as we go to and from church, and even at church (for no-where elſe have we the heart to go) as if none of us had been regarded but upon her account; and as if ſhe were innocent, we all in fault; are conſtant aggravations, you muſt needs think, to the whole family.

She has made my lot heavy, I am ſure, that was far from being light before!—To tell you truth, I am enjoined not to receive any-thing of hers, from any hand, without leave. Should I therefore gratify my yearnings after her, ſo far as to receive privately the letter you mention, what would the caſe be, but to torment myſelf without being able to do her good?—And were it to be known—Mr. Harlowe is ſo paſſionate—And ſhould it throw his gout into his ſtomach, as her raſh flight did—Indeed, indeed, I am very unhappy!—For, Oh my good woman, ſhe is my child ſtill!—But unleſs it were more in my power—Yet do I long to ſee the letter—You ſay it tells of her preſent way and circumſtances.—The poor child, who ought to be in poſſeſſion of thouſands!—And will!—For her father will be a faithful ſteward for her.—But it muſt be in his own way, and at his own time.

And is ſhe really ill?—ſo very ill?—But ſhe ought to ſorrow.—She has given a double meaſure of it.

But does ſhe really believe ſhe ſhall not long trouble us?—But, O my Norton!—ſhe muſt, ſhe will, long trouble us—For can ſhe think her death, if we ſhould be deprived of her, will put an end to our afflictions?—Can it be thought, that the fall of ſuch a child will not be regretted by us to the laſt hour of our lives?

But, in the letter you have, does ſhe, without reſerve, expreſs her contrition? Has ſhe in it no reflecting hints? Does ſhe not aim at extenuations?—If I am to ſee it, will it not ſhock me ſo much, that my apparent grief may expoſe me to harſhneſſes?—Can it be contrived—

But to what purpoſe?—Don't ſend it—I charge you, don't—I dare not ſee it—

Yet—

But, alas!—

O forgive the almoſt diſtracted mother! You can.—You know how to allow for all this—So I will let it go.—I will not write over again this part of my letter.

But I chuſe not to know more of her, than is communicated to us all—No more than I dare own I have ſeen—And what ſome of them may rather communicate to me, than receive from me: and this for the ſake of my outward quiet: although my inward peace ſuffers more and more by the compelled reſerve.

I WAS forced to break off. But I will now try to conclude my long letter.

I am ſorry you are ill. But if you were well, I could not, for your own ſake, wiſh you to go up, as Betty tells us you long to do. If you went, nothing would be minded that came from you. As they already think you too partial in her favour, your going up would confirm it, and do yourſelf prejudice, and her no good. And as every-body values you here, I adviſe you not to intereſt yourſelf too warmly in her favour, eſpecially before my Bella's Betty, till I can let you know a proper time. Yet to forbid you to love the dear naughty creature, who can? O my Norton! you muſt love her!—And ſo muſt I!

I ſend you five guineas, to help you in your preſent illneſs, and your ſon's; for it muſt have been heavy upon you. What a ſad, ſad thing, my dear good woman, that all your pains, and all my pains, for eighteen or nineteen years together, have, in ſo few months, been rendered rendered thus deplorably vain! Yet I muſt be always your friend, and pity you, for the very reaſon that I myſelf deſerve every one's pity.

Perhaps I may find an opportunity to pay you a viſit, as in your illneſs, and then may weep over the letter you mention, with you. But, for the future, write nothing to me about the poor girl, that you think may not be communicated to us all.

And I charge you, as you value my friendſhip, as you wiſh my peace, not to ſay any thing of a letter you have from me, either to the naughty one, or to any-body elſe. It was ſome little relief (the occaſion given) to write to you, who muſt, in ſo particular a manner, ſhare my affliction. A mother, Mrs. Norton, cannot forget her child, though that child could abandon her mother; and, in ſo doing, run away with all her mother's comforts!—As I can truly ſay, is the caſe of your unhappy friend,

CHARLOTTE HARLOWE.

LETTER XVI.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MRS. JUDITH NORTON.

SAT. JULY 29.

I Congratulate you, my dear Mrs. Norton, with all my heart, on your ſon's recovery; which I pray to God, with your own health, to perfect.

I write in ſome hurry, being apprehenſive of the conſequence of the hints you give of ſome method you propoſe to try in my favour: [With my relations, I preſume you mean] but you will not tell me what, you ſay, if it prove unſucceſsful.

Now I muſt beg of you, that you will not take any ſtep in my favour, with which you do not firſt acquaint me.

I have but one requeſt to make to them, beſides what is contained in my letter to my ſiſter: and I would not, methinks, for the ſake of their own future peace of mind, that they ſhould be teazed ſo, by your well-meant kindneſs, and that of Miſs Howe, as to be put upon denying me that. And why ſhould more be aſked for me than I can partake of? More than is abſolutely neceſſary for my own peace?

You ſuppoſe I ſhould have my ſiſter's anſwer to my letter, by the time yours reached my hand. I have it: and a ſevere one, a very ſevere one it is. Yet, conſidering my fault in their eyes, and the provocations I am to ſuppoſe they ſo newly had from my dear Miſs Howe, I am to look upon it as a favour, that it was anſwered at all. I will ſend you a copy of it ſoon; as alſo of mine, to which it is an anſwer.

I have reaſon to be very thankful, that my father has withdrawn that heavy malediction, which affected me ſo much—A parent's curſe, my dear Mrs. Norton! What child could die in peace under a parent's curſe! ſo literally fulfilled too as this has been in what relates to this life?

My heart is too full to touch upon the particulars of my ſiſter's letter. I can make but one atonement for my fault. May that be accepted! And may it ſoon be forgotten, by every dear relation, that there was ſuch an unhappy daughter, ſiſter, or niece, as Clariſſa Harlowe!

My couſin Morden was one of thoſe, who was ſo earneſt in prayer for my recovery, at nine and eleven years of age, as you mention. My ſiſter thinks he will be one of thoſe, who will wiſh I never had had a being. But pray, when he does come, let me hear of it with the firſt.

You think, that were it not for that unhappy notion of my moving talent, my mother would relent. What would I give to ſee her once more, and, although unknown to her, to kiſs but the hem of her garment!

Could I have thought, that the laſt time I ſaw her would have been the laſt, with what difficulty ſhould I have been torn from her embraced feet!—And when, ſcreened behind the yew-hedge, on the 5th of April laſt, I ſaw my father, and my uncle Antony, and my brother and ſiſter, how little did I think, that that would be the laſt time I ſhould ever ſee them: and, in ſo ſhort a ſpace, that ſo many dreadful evils would befal me!

But I can write nothing but what muſt give you trouble. I will therefore, after repeating my deſire that you will not intercede for me but with my previous conſent, conclude with the aſſurance, that I am, and ever will be, your moſt affectionate and dutiful

CLARISSA HARLOWE.

LETTER XVII.

MISS ARABELLA HALLOWE, TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

[IN ANSWER TO HERS ON FRIDAY, JULY 21. LETTER II.]

THURSDAY, JULY 27.

O MY UNHAPPY LOST SISTER!

WHAT a miſerable hand have you made of your romantick and and giddy expedition!—I pity you at my heart.

You may well grieve and repent!—Lovelace has left you!—In what way or circumſtances, you know beſt.

I wiſh your conduct had made your caſe more pitiable. But 'tis your own ſeeking!

God help you!—For you have not a friend will look upon you!—Poor, wicked, undone creature!—Fallen, as you are, againſt warning, againſt expoſtulation, againſt duty!

But it ſignifies nothing to reproach you. I weep over you.

My poor mother!—Your raſhneſs and folly have made her more miſerable than you can be.—Yet ſhe has beſought my father to grant your requeſt.

My uncle joined with her; for they thought there was a little more modeſty in your letter than in the letters of your pert advocate: and my father is pleaſed to give me leave to write—but only theſe words for him and no more:—That he withdraws the curſe he laid upon you, at the firſt hearing of your wicked flight, ſo far as it is in his power to do it; and hopes that your preſent puniſhment may be all that you will meet with. For the reſt, he will never own you, nor forgive you; and grieves he has ſuch a daughter in the world.

All this, and more, you have deſerved from him, and from all of us: but what have you done to this abandoned libertine, to deſerve what you have met with at his hands?—I fear, I fear, ſiſter!—But no more!—A bleſſed four months work have you made of it!

My brother is now at Edinburgh, ſent thither by my father, [though he knows not this to be the motive] that he may not meet your triumphant deluder.

We are told he would be glad to marry you: but why, then, did he abandon you? He had kept you till he was tired of you, no queſtion; and it is not likely he would wiſh to have you, but upon the terms you have already, without all doubt, been his.

You ought to adviſe your friend Miſs Howe to concern herſelf leſs in your matters than ſhe does, except ſhe could do it with more decency. She has written three letters to me: very inſolent ones. Your favourer, poor Mrs. Norton, thinks you know nothing of the pert creature's writing. I hope you don't. But then the more impertinent the writer. But believing the fond woman, I ſat down the more readily to anſwer your letter; and I write with leſs ſeverity, I can tell you, than otherwiſe I ſhould have done, if I had anſwered it at all.

Monday laſt was your birth-day. Think, poor ungrateful wretch, as you are! how we all uſed to keep it; and you will not wonder to be told, that we ran away from one another that day. But God give you true penitence, if you have it not already! And it will be true, if it be equal to the ſhame and the ſorrow you have given us all. Your afflicted ſiſter,

ARABELLA HARLOWE.

Your couſin Morden is every day expected in England. He, as well as others of the family, when he comes to hear what a bleſſed piece of work you have made of it, will wiſh you never had had a being.

LETTER XVIII.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

SUNDAY, JULY 30.

YOU have given me great pleaſure, my deareſt friend, by your approbation of my reaſonings, and of my reſolution founded upon them, never to have Mr. Lovelace. This approbation is ſo right a thing, give me leave to ſay, from the nature of the caſe, and from the ſtrict honour and true dignity of mind, which I always admired in my Anna Howe, that I could hardly tell to what, but to my evil deſtiny, which of late would not let me pleaſe any body, to attribute the advice you gave me to the contrary.

But let not the ill ſtate of my health, and what that may naturally tend to, ſadden you. I have told you, that I will not run away from life, nor avoid the means that may continue it, if God ſee fit: and if he do not, who ſhall repine at his will?

If it ſhall be found, that I have not acted unworthy of your love, and of my own character, in my great trials, that will be a happineſs to both on reflection.

The ſhock which you ſo earneſtly adviſe me to try to get above, was a ſhock, the greateſt that I could receive. But, my dear, as it was not occaſioned by my fault, I hope I am already got above it. I hope I am.

I am more grieved (at times, however) for others, than for myſelf. And ſo I ought. For as to myſelf, I cannot but reflect, that I have had an eſcape, rather rather than a loſs, in miſſing Mr. Lovelace for a huſband—Even had he not committed the vileſt of all outrages.

Let any-one, who knows my ſtory, collect his character from his behaviour to me, before that outrage; and then judge, whether it was in the leaſt probable that ſuch a man ſhould make me happy. But to collect his character from his principles with regard to the ſex in general, and from his enterprizes upon many of them, and to conſider the cruelty of his nature, and the ſportiveneſs of his invention, together with the high opinion he has of himſelf, it will not be doubted that a wife of his muſt have been miſerable; and more miſerable if ſhe loved him, than ſhe could have been were ſhe to be indifferent to him.

A twelvemonth might very probably have put a period to my life; ſituated as I was with my friends; perſecuted and harraſſed as I have been by my brother and ſiſter; and my very heart torn in pieces by the wilful, and (as it is now apparent) premeditated ſuſpences of the man, whoſe gratitude I wiſhed to engage, and whoſe protection I was the more entitled to expect, as he had robbed me of every other, and reduced me to an abſolute dependence upon himſelf. Indeed I once thought that it was all his view to bring me to this, (as he hated my family;) and uncomfortable enough for me, if it had been all.

Can it be thought, my dear, that my heart was not more than half broken (happy as I was before I knew Mr. Lovelace) by ſuch a grievous change in my circumſtances?—Indeed it was. Nor perhaps was the wicked violence wanting to have cut ſhort, though poſſibly not ſo very ſhort, a life that he has ſported with.

Had I been his but a month, he muſt have poſſeſſed the eſtate on which my relations had ſet their hearts; the more to their regret, as they hated him as much as he hated them.

Have I not reaſon, theſe things conſidered, to think myſelf happier without Mr. Lovelace than I could have been with him?—My will too unviolated; and and very little, nay, not any-thing as to him, to reproach myſelf with?

But with my relations it is otherwiſe. They indeed deſerve to be pitied. They are, and no doubt will long be, unhappy.

To judge of their reſentments and of their conduct, we muſt put ourſelves in their ſituation:—And while they think me more in fault than themſelves, (whether my favourers are of their opinion, or not) and have a right to judge for themſelves, they ought to have great allowances made for them; my parents eſpecially. They ſtand at leaſt ſelf-acquitted, (that cannot I;) and the rather, as they can recollect, to their pain, their paſt indulgences to me, and their unqueſtionable love.

Your partiality for the friend you ſo much value, will not eaſily let you come into this way of thinking. But only, my dear, be pleaſed to conſider the matter in the following light.

Here was my MOTHER, one of the moſt prudent perſons of her ſex, married into a family, not perhaps ſo happily tempered as herſelf; but every-one of which ſhe had the addreſs, for a great while, abſolutely to govern as ſhe pleaſed by her directing wiſdom, at the ſame time that they knew not but her preſcriptions were the dictates of their own hearts; ſuch a ſweet art had ſhe of conquering by ſeeming to yield. Think, my dear, what muſt be the pride and the pleaſure of ſuch a mother, that in my brother ſhe could give a ſon to the family ſhe diſtinguiſhed with her love, not unworthy of their wiſhes; a daughter, in my ſiſter, of whom ſhe had no reaſon to be aſhamed; and in me a ſecond daughter, whom every-body complimented, (ſuch was their partial favour to me) as being the ſtill more immediate likeneſs of herſelf? How, ſelf-pleaſed, could ſhe ſmile round upon a family ſhe had ſo bleſſed! What compliments were paid her upon the example ſhe had given us, which was followed with ſuch hopeful effects! With what noble confidence could ſhe look upon her dear Mr. Harlowe, as a perſon made happy by her; and he delighted to think, that nothing but purity ſtreamed from a fountain ſo pure!

Now, my dear, reverſe, as I daily do, this charming proſpect. See my dear mother, ſorrowing in her cloſet; endeavouring to ſuppreſs her ſorrow at her table, and in thoſe retirements where ſorrow was before a ſtranger: hanging down her penſive head: ſmiles no more beaming over her benign aſpect: her virtue made to ſuffer for faults ſhe could not be guilty of: her patience continually tried, (becauſe ſhe has more of it than any other) with repetitions of faults ſhe is as much wounded by, as thoſe can be from whom ſhe ſo often hears of them: taking to herſelf, as the fountain-head, a taint which only had infected one of the under-currents: afraid to open her lips (were ſhe willing) in my favour, leſt it ſhould be thought ſhe has any bias in her own mind to failings that never could have been ſuſpected in her: robbed of that pleaſing merit, which the mother of well-nurtured and hopeful children may glory in: every one who viſits her, or is viſited by her, by dumb ſhew, and looks that mean more than words can expreſs, condoling where they uſed to congratulate: the affected ſilence wounding: the compaſſionating look reminding: the half ſuppreſſed ſigh in them, calling up deeper ſighs from her; and their averted eyes, while they endeavour to reſtrain the riſing tear, provoking tears from her, that will not be reſtrained.

When I conſider theſe things, and, added to theſe, the pangs that tear in pieces the ſtronger heart of my FATHER, becauſe it cannot relieve itſelf by thoſe tears which carry the torturing grief to the eyes of ſofter ſpirits: the over-boiling tumults of my impatient and uncontroulable BROTHER, piqued to the heart of his honour, in the fall of a ſiſter, in whom he once gloried: the pride of an ELDER SISTER, who had given unwilling way to the honours paid over her head to one born after her: and, laſtly, the diſhonour I have brought upon two UNCLES, who each contended which ſhould moſt favour their then happy niece:—When, I ſay, I reflect upon my fault in theſe ſtrong, yet juſt lights, what room can there be to cenſure any-body but my unhappy ſelf? And how much reaſon have I to ſay, 'If I juſtify myſelf, mine own heart ſhall condemn me: if I ſay I am perfect, it ſhall alſo prove me perverſe.'

Here permit me to lay down my pen for a few moments.

You are very obliging to me, intentionally, I know, when you tell me, It is in my power to haſten the day of Mr. Hickman's happineſs. But yet, give me leave to ſay, that I admire this kind aſſurance leſs than any other paragraph of your letter.

In the firſt place you know it is not in my power to ſay when I can diſmiſs my phyſician; and you ſhould not put the celebration of a marriage intended by yourſelf, and ſo deſirable to your mother, upon ſo precarious an iſſue. Nor will I accept of a compliment, which muſt mean a ſlight to her.

If any-thing could give me a reliſh for life, after what I have ſuffered, it would be the hopes of the continuance of the more than ſiſterly love, which has, for years, uninterruptedly bound us together as one mind.—And why, my dear, ſhould you defer giving (by a tie ſtill ſtronger) another friend to one who has ſo few?

I am glad you have ſent my letter to Miſs Montague. I hope I ſhall hear no more of this unhappy man.

I had begun the particulars of my tragical ſtory: but it is ſo painful a taſk, and I have ſo many more important things to do, and, as I apprehend, ſo little time to do them in, that, could I avoid it, I would go no farther in it.

Then, to this hour, I know not by what means ſeveral of his machinations to ruin me were brought about; ſo that ſome material parts of my ſad ſtory muſt be defective, if I were to ſit down to write it. But I have been thinking of a way that will anſwer the end wiſhed for by your mother and you full as well, perhaps better.

Mr. Lovelace, it ſeems, has communicated to his friend Mr. Belford all that has paſſed between himſelf and me, as he went on. Mr. Belford has not been able to deny it. So that (as we may obſerve by the way) a poor young creature, whoſe indiſcretion has given a libertine power over her, has a reaſon the little thinks of, to regret her folly; ſince theſe wretches, who have no more honour in one point than in another, ſcruple not to make her weakneſs a part of their triumph to their brother libertines.

I have nothing to apprehend of this ſort, if I have the juſtice done me in his letters, which Mr. Belford aſſures me I have: and therefore the particulars of my ſtory, and the baſe arts of this vile man, will, I think, be beſt collected from thoſe very letters of his, (if Mr. Belford can be prevailed upon to communicate them;) to which I dare appeal with the ſame truth and fervor as he did, who ſays—'Oh that one would hear me! and that mine adverſary had written a book!—Surely, I would take it upon my ſhoulders, and bind it to me as a crown. For I covered not my tranſgreſſions as Adam, by hiding mine iniquity in my boſom.'

There is one way which may be fallen upon to induce Mr. Belford to communicate theſe letters; ſince he ſeems to have (and declares he always had) a ſincere abhorrence of his friend's baſeneſs to me: but that, you'll ſay, when you hear it, is a ſtrange one. Nevertheleſs, I am very earneſt upon it at preſent.

It is no other than this:

I think to make Mr. Belford the executor of my laſt will, [Don't be ſurpriſed:] and with this view I permit his viſits with the leſs ſcruple: and every time I from his concern for me, am ready and more inclined to do so. If I find in the same mind, and if he accept the trust, and will communicate the materials in his power, those, joined with what you can furnish, will answer the whole end.

I know you will start at my notion of such an executor: but pray, my dear, consider, in my present circumstances, what I can do better, as I am empowered to make a will, and have considerable matters in my own disposal.

Your mother, I am sure, would not consent that you should take this office upon you. It might subject Mr. Hickman to the insults of that violent man. Mrs. Norton cannot, for several reasons respecting herself. My brother looks upon what I ought to have, as his right: my uncle Harlowe is already one of my trustees (to my cousin Morden is the other) for the estate my grandfather left me: but you see I could not get from my own family the few guineas I left behind me at Harlowe-place; and my uncle Antony once threatened to have my grandfather's will controverted. My father!—To be sure, my dear, I could not expect that my father would do all I wish should be done: and a will to be executed by a father for a daughter, (parts of it, perhaps absolutely against his own judgment) carries somewhat daring and prescriptive in the very word.

If indeed my cousin Morden were to come in time, and would undertake this trust—But even him it might subject to hazards; and the more, as he is a man of great spirit; and as the other man (of no great) looks upon me (unprotected as I have long been) as his property.

Now Mr. Belford, as I have already mentioned, knows every-thing that has passed. He is a man of spirit, and it seems, as fearless as the other, with more humane qualities. You don't know, my dear, what instances of sincere humanity this Mr. Belford has shewn, not only on occasion of the cruel arrest, but on several occasions since. And Mrs. Lovick has taken pains to enquire after his general character; and hears a very good one of him, for justice and generosity in all his concerns of meum and tuum, as they are called: he has a knowledge of law-matters; and has two executorships upon him at this time, in the discharge of which his honour is unquestioned.

All these reasons have already in a manner determined me to ask this favour of him, although it will have an odd found with it to make an intimate friend of Mr. Lovelace my executor.

This is certain: my brother will be more acquiescent a great deal in such a case with the articles of my will, as he will see, that it will be to no purpose to controvert some of them, which else, I dare say, he would controvert, or persuade my other friends to do so. And who would involve an executor in a law-suit, if they could help it?—Which would be the case, if any-body were left whom my brother could hope to awe or controul; since my father has possession of all, and is absolutely governed by him. [Angry spirits, my dear, as I have often seen, will be overcome by more angry ones, as well as sometimes be disarmed by the meek.]—Nor would I wish, you may believe, to have effects torn out of my father's hands: while Mr. Belford, who is a man of fortune, (and a good œconomist in his own affairs) would have no interest but to do justice.

Then he exceedingly presses for some occasion to shew his readiness to serve me: and he would be able to manage his violent friend, over whom he has more influence than any other person.

But, after all, I know not, if it were not more eligible by far, that my story, and myself too, should be forgotten as soon as possible. And of this I shall have the less doubt, if the character of my parents [You will forgive me, my dear] cannot be guarded against the unqualified bitterness, which, from your affectionate zeal for me, has sometimes mingled with your ink—A point that ought, and (I insist upon it) must be well considered of, if any-thing be done which your mother and you are desirous to have done. The generality of the world is too apt to oppose duty—And general duties, my dear, ought not to be weakened by the justification of a single person, however unhappily circumstanced.

My father has been so good as to take off the heavy malediction he laid me under. I must be now solicitous for a last blessing; and that is all I shall presume to petition for. My sister's letter, communicating this grace, is a severe one: but as she writes to me as from everybody, how could I expect it to be otherwise?

If you set out to-morrow, this letter cannot reach you till you get to your aunt Harman's. I shall therefore direct it thither, as Mr. Hickman instructed me.

I hope

I hope you will have met with no inconveniences in your little journey and voyage; and that you will have found in good health all whom you wish to see well.

If your relations in the little island join their solicitations with your mother's commands, to have your nuptials celebrated before you leave them, let me beg of you, my dear, to oblige them. How grateful will the notification that you have done so be to your ever-faithful and affectionate CL. HARLOWE.

LETTTR XIX.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HARLOWE.

SATURDAY, JULY 29.

I Repine not, my dear sister, at the severity you have been pleased to express in the letter you favoured me with; because that severity was accompanied with the grace I had petitioned for; and because the reproaches of mine own heart are stronger than any other person's reproaches can be: and yet I am not half so culpable as I am imagined to be: as would be allowed, if all the circumstances of my unhappy story were known; and which I shall be ready to communicate to Mrs. Norton, if she be commissioned to enquire into them; or to you, my sister, if you can have patience to hear them.

I remembered, with a bleeding heart, what day the 29th of July was. I began with the eve of it; and I passed the day itself—as it was fit I should pass it. Nor have I any comfort to give to my dear and ever-honoured father and mother, and to you, my Bella, but this—That, as it was the first unhappy anniversary of my birth, in all probability, it will be the last.

Believe me, my dear sister, I say not this, merely to move compassion, but from the best grounds. And as, on that account, I think it of the highest importance to my peace of mind to obtain one further favour, I would chuse to owe to your intercession, as my sister, the leave I beg, to address half a dozen lines (with the hope of having them answered as I wish) to either or to both my honoured parents, to beg their last blessing.

This blessing is all the favour I have now to ask: it is all I dare to ask: yet am I afraid to rush at once, though by letter, into the presence of either. And if I did not ask it, it might seem to be owing to stubbornness and want of duty, when my heart is all humility and penitence. Only, be so good as to enable me to attempt this rule—Write but this one line, 'Clary Harlowe, you are 'at liberty to write as you desire.' This will be enough—And shall, to my last hour, be acknowledged as the greatest favour, by your truly sincere sister,

CLARISSA HARLOWE.

LETTER XX.

MRS. NORTON, TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

MONDAY, JULY 31.

MY DEAREST YOUNG LADY,

I Must indeed own, that I took the liberty to write to your mother, offering to inclose to her, if she gave me leave, yours of the 24th: by which I thought she would see what was the frame of your mind; what the nature of your last troubles was, from the wicked arrest; what the people are where you lodge; what proposals were made you from Lord M.'s family; also your sincere penitence; and how much Miss Howe's writing to them, in the terms she wrote in, disturbed you—But, as you have taken the matter into your own hands, and forbid me, in your last, to act in this nice affair unknown to you, I am glad the letter was not received of me—And indeed it may be better that the matter lie wholly between you and them; since my affection for you is thought to proceed from partiality.

They would chuse, no doubt, that you should owe to themselves, and not to my humble mediation, the favour for which you so earnestly sue, and of which I would not have you despair: for I will venture to assure you, that your mother is ready to take the first opportunity to shew her maternal tenderness: and this I gather from several hints I am not at liberty to explain myself upon.

I long to be with you, now I am better, and now my son is in a fine way of recovery. But is it not hard, to have it signified to me, that at present it will not be taken well, if I go!—I suppose, while the reconciliation, which I hope will take place, is negociating by means of the correspondence so newly opened between you and your sister. But if you would have me come, I will rely upon my good intentions, and risque every-one's displeasure.

Mr. Brand has business in town; to solicit for a benefice which it is expected the incumbent will be obliged to quit for a better preferment: and when there, he is to enquire privately after your way of life, and of your health.

He is a very officious young man; and, but that your uncle Harlowe (who has chosen him for this errand) regards him as an oracle, your mother had rather any-body else had been sent.

He is one of those puzzling, over-doing gentlemen, who think they see farther into matters than any-body else, and are fond of discovering mysteries where there are none, in order to be thought shrewd men.

I can't say I like him, either in the pulpit or out of it: I who had a father one of the soundest divines and finest scholars in the kingdom; who never made an ostentation of what he knew; but loved and venerated the gospel he taught, preferring it to all other learning; to be obliged to hear a young man depart from his text as soon as he has named it; (so contrary, too, to the example set him by his learned and worthy principal, [Dr. Lewen] when his health permits him to preach) and throwing about, to a Christian and country audience, scraps of Latin and Greek from the Pagan classicks; and not always brought in with great propriety neither; (if I am to judge, by the only way given me to judge of them, by the English he puts them into) is an indication of something wrong, either in his head, or his heart, or both; for, otherwise, his education at the university must have taught him better. You know, my dear Miss Clary, the honour I have for the cloth: it is owing to that, that I say what I do.

I know not the day he is to set out; and as his enquiries are to be private, be pleased to take no notice of this intelligence. I have no doubt, that your life and conversation are such, as may defy the scrutinies of the most officious enquirer.

I am just now told, that you have written a second letter to your sister: but am afraid they will wait for Mr. Brand's report, before further favour will be obtained from them; for they will not yet believe you are so ill as I fear you are.

But you would soon find, that you have an indulgent mother, were she at liberty to act according to her own inclination. And this gives me great hopes that all will end well at last: for I verily think that you are in the right way to a reconciliation. God give a blessing to it, and restore your health, and you to all your friends, prays your ever-affectionate

JUDITH NORTON.

Your good mother has privately sent me five guineas: she is pleased to say, to help us in the illness we have been afflicted with; but, more likely, that I might send them to you, as from myself. I hope, therefore, I may send them up, with ten more I have still left.

I will send you word of Mr. Morden's arrival, the moment I know it.

If agreeable, I should be glad to know all that passes between your relations and you.

LETTER XXI.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MRS. NORTON.

WEDNESDAY, AUG. 2.

YOU give me, my dear Mrs. Norton, great pleasure in hearing of yours and your son's recovery. May you continue, for many, many years, a blessing to each other!

You tell me, that you did actually write to my mother, offering to inclose to her mine of the 24th past: and you say, It was not required of you. That is to say, although you cover it over as gently as you could, that your offer was rejected; which makes it evident, that no plea will be made for me. Yet, you bid me hope, that the grace I sued for would, in time, be granted.

The grace I then sued for was indeed granted: but you are afraid, you say, that they will wait for Mr. Brand's report, before favour will be obtained in return to the second letter which I wrote to my sister: and you add, That I have an indulgent mother, were she at liberty to act according to her own inclination; and that all will end well at last.

But what, my dear Mrs. Norton, what is the grace I sue for in my second letter?—It is not that they will receive me into favour—If they think it is, they are mistaken. I do not, I cannot expect that: nor, as I have often said, should I, if they would receive me, bear to live in the eye of those dear friends whom I have so grievously offended. 'Tis only, simply, a blessing I ask: a blessing to die with, not to live with.—Do they know that? And do they know, that their unkindness will perhaps shorten my date? So that their favour, if ever they intend to grant it, may come too late.

Once more, I desire you not to think of of coming to me. I have no uneasiness now, but what proceeds from the apprehension of seeing a man I would not see for the world, if I could help it; and from the severity of my nearest and dearest relations: a severity entirely their own, I doubt; for you tell me, that my brother is at Edinburgh! You would therefore heighten their severity, and make yourself enemies besides, if you were to come to me—Don't you see that you would?

Mr. Brand may come, if he will. He is a clergyman, and must mean well; or I must think so, let him say of me what he will. All my fear is, that, as he knows I am in disgrace with a family whose esteem he is desirous to cultivate; and as he has obligations to my uncle Harlowe, and to my father; he will be but a languid acquitter—Not that I am afraid of what he, or any-body in the world, can hear as to my conduct. You may, my revered and dear friend, indeed you may, rest satisfied, that that is such as may warrant me to challenge the enquiries of the most officious.

I will send you copies of what passes, as you desire, when I have an answer to my second letter. I now begin to wish, that I had taken the heart to write to my father himself; or to my mother, at least; instead of to my sister! and yet I doubt my poor mother can do nothing for me of herself. A strong confederacy, my dear Mrs. Norton, (a strong confederacy, indeed!) against a poor girl, their daughter, sister, niece!—My brother, perhaps, got it renewed before he left them. He needed not—His work is done; and more than done.

Don't afflict yourself about money-matters on my account. I have no occasion for money. I am glad my mother was so considerate to you. I was in pain for you, on the same subject. But Heaven will not permit so good a woman to want the humble blessings she was always satisfied with. I wish every individual of our family were but as rich as you!—O my mamma Norton, you are rich! You are rich indeed!—The true riches are such content as you are blessed with.—And I hope in God, that I am in the way to be rich too.

Adieu, my ever-indulgent friend. You say, all will be at last happy—And I know it will—I confide that it will, with as much security, as you may, that I will be to my last hour your ever-grateful and affectionate

CL. HARLOWE.

LETTER XIII.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

TUESDAY, APRIL 4.

I Am most confoundedly chagrined and disappointed: for here, on Saturday, arrived a messenger from Miss Howe, with a letter to my cousins; which I knew nothing of till yesterday; when Lady Sarah and Lady Betty were procured to be here, to sit in judgment upon it with the old peer, and my two kinswomen. And never was bear so miserably baited as thy poor friend!—And for what?—Why, for the cruelty of Miss Harlowe: for have I committed any new offence? And would I not have reinstated myself in her favour upon her own terms, if I could? And is it fair to punish me for what is my misfortune, and not my fault? Such event-judging fools! as I have for my relations! I am ashamed of them all.

In that of Miss Howe was inclosed one to her from Miss Harlowe, to be transmitted to my cousins, containing a final rejection of me; and that in very vehement and positive terms; yet she pretends, that in this rejection she is governed more by principle than passion—[Damn'd lye, as ever was told!] And, as a proof that she is, says, that she can forgive me, and does, on this one condition, That I will never molest her more—The whole letter so written, as to make herself more admired, me more detested.

What we have been told of the agitations and workings, and sighings, and sobbings, of the French prophets among us formerly, was nothing at all to the scene exhibited by these maudlin fools, at the reading of these letters; and of some affecting passages extracted from another of my fair implacable's to Miss Howe—Such lamentations for the loss of so charming a relation! Such applaudings of her virtue, of her exalted-ness of soul and sentiment! Such execrations of dis-inheritions! I, not needing their reproaches to be flung to the heart with my own reflections, and with the rage of disappointment; as sincerely as any of them admiring her—'What the 'devil,' cried I, 'is all this for? Is it 'not enough to be despised and rejected? Can I help her implacable spirit? '—Would I not repair the evils I have 'made her suffer?'—Then was I ready to curse them all, herself and Miss house, his company: and heartily I desire that she should yet be mine.

Once more, it, over again to thee—Were her death to follow in a week after the knot is tied, by the Lord of Heaven, it shall be tied, and she shall die a Lovelace! Tell her so, if thou wilt: but, at the same time, tell her, that I have no view to her fortune; and that I will solemnly resign that, and all pretensions to it, in whose favour she pleases, if she resign life itself.—I am not so low-minded a wretch as to be guilty of any sordid views to her fortune.—Let her judge for herself then, whether it be not for her honour rather to leave this world a Lovelace than a Harlowe.

But do not think I will entirely rest a cause so near my heart, upon an advocate, who so much more admires his client's adversary, than his client. I will go to town in a few days, in order to throw myself at her feet: and I will carry with me, or have at hand, a resolute, well-prepared parson; and the ceremony shall be performed, let what will be the consequence.

But if she will permit me to attend her for this purpose at either of the churches mentioned in the licence; (which she has by her, and, thank Heaven! has not returned me with my letters) then will I not disturb her; but meet her at the altar in either church, and will engage to bring my two cousins to attend her, and even Lady Sarah and Lady Betty; and my Lord M. in person shall give her to me.

Or, if it will be still more agreeable to her, I will undertake, that either Lady Sarah or Lady Betty, or both, shall go to town, and attend her down; and the marriage shall be celebrated in their presence, and in that of Lord M. either here or elsewhere, at her own choice.

Do not play me booty, Belford; but sincerely and warmly use all the eloquence thou art master of, to prevail upon her to chuse one of these three methods. One of them she must chuse —By my soul, she must.

Here is Charlotte tapping at my closet door for admittance. What a devil wants Charlotte!—I will hear no more reproaches!—'Come in, girl!'

My cousin Charlotte, finding me writing on with too much earnestness to have any regard for politeness to her, and guessing at my subject, besought me to let her see what I had written.

I obliged her, and she was so highly pleased on seeing me so much in earnest, that she offered, and I accepted her offer, to write a letter to Miss Harlowe; with permission to treat me in it as she thought fit.

I shall inclose a copy of her letter.

When she had written it, she brought it to me, with apologies for the freedom taken with me in it: but I excused it; and she was ready to have given me a kiss for joy of my approbation: and I gave her two for writing it; telling her, I had hopes of success from it; and that I thought she had luckily hit it off.

Every-one approves of it, as well as I; and is pleased with me for so patiently submitting to be abused, and undertaken for.—If it do not succeed, all the blame will be thrown upon the dear creature's perverseness: her charitable or forgiving disposition, about which she makes so much parade, will be justly questioned; and the pity of which she is now in full possession, will be transferrred to me.

Putting, therefore, my whole confidence in this letter, I postpone all my other alternatives, as also my going to town, till my empress send an answer to my cousin Montague.

But if she persist, and will not promise to take time to consider of the matter, thou mayest communicate to her what I had written, as above, before my cousin entered; and if she be still perverse, assure her, that I must and will see her.—But this with all honour, all humility: and, if I cannot move her in my favour, I will then go abroad, and perhaps never more return to England.

I am sorry thou art, at this critical time, so busily employed, as thou informest me thou art, in thy Watford affairs, and in preparing to do Belton justice. If thou wanteſt my assistance in the latter, command me. Though engrossed by this perverse beauty, and plagued as I am, I will obey thy first summons.

I have great dependence upon thy zeal and thy friendship: hasten back to her, therefore, and resume a task so interesting to me, that it is equally the subject of my dreams, as of my waking hours.

LETTER XXIII.

MISS MONTAGUE, TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

TUESDAY, AUG. 1.

DEAREST MADAM,

ALL our family is deeply sensible of the injuries you have received at the the hands of one of it, whom you only can render in any manner worthy of the relation he ſtands in to us all: and if, as an act of mercy and charity, the greateſt your pious heart can ſhew, you will be pleaſed to look over his paſt wickedneſs and ingratitude, and ſuffer yourſelf to be our kinſwoman, you will make us the happieſt family in the world: and I can engage that Lord M. and Lady Sarah Sadleir, and Lady Betty Lawrance, and my ſiſter, who are all admirers of your virtues, and of your nobleneſs of mind, will for ever love and reverence you, and do every-thing in all their powers to make you amends for what you have ſuffered from Mr Lovelace. This, Madam, we ſhould not, however, dare to petition for, were we not aſſured, that Mr. Lovelace is moſt ſincerely ſorry for his paſt vileneſs to you; and that he will, on his knees, beg your pardon, and vow eternal love and honour to you.

Wherefore, my deareſt couſin, [How you will charm us all, if this agreeable ſtile may be permitted!] for all our ſakes, for his ſoul's ſake, [You muſt, I am ſure, be ſo good a lady, as to wiſh to ſave a ſoul!] and allow me to ſay, for your own fame's ſake, condeſcend to our joint requeſt: and if, by way of encouragement, you will but ſay, you will be glad to ſee, and to be as much known perſonally, as you are by fame, to Charlotte Montague, I will, in two days time from the receipt of your permiſſion, wait upon you, with or without my ſiſter, and receive your further commands.

Let me, our deareſt couſin, [We cannot deny ourſelves the pleaſure of calling you ſo; let me] entreat you to give me your permiſſion for my journey to London; and put it in the power of Lord M. and of the ladies of the family, to make you what reparation they can make you, for the injuries which a perſon of the greateſt merit in the world has received from one of the moſt audacious men in it; and you will infinitely oblige us; and particularly her, who repeatedly preſumes to ſtile herſelf, your affectionate couſin, and obliged ſervant, CHARLOTTE MONTAGUE.

LETTER XXIV.

MR. BELFORD, TO ROBERT LOVELACE, ESQ.

THURSDAY MORNING, AUG. 3. SIX O'CLOCK.

I Have been ſo much employed in my own and Belton's affairs, that I could not come to town till laſt night; having contented myſelf with ſending to Mrs. Lovick, to know, from time to time, the ſtate of the lady's health, of which I received but very indifferent accounts, owing, in a great meaſure, to letters or advices brought her from her implacable family.

I have now completed my own affairs; and, next week, ſhall go to Epſom, to endeavour to put Belton's affairs into poſſeſſion of his own houſe, for him: after which, I ſhall devote myſelf wholly to your ſervice, and to that of the lady.

I was admitted to her preſence laſt night; and found her viſibly altered for the worſe. When I went home, I had your letter of Tueſday laſt put into my hands. Let me tell thee, Lovelace, that I inſiſt upon the performance of thy engagement to me, that thou will not perſonally moleſt her.

Mr. Belford dates again on Thurſday morning ten o'clock, and gives an account of a converſation which he had juſt held with the lady upon the ſubject of Miſs Montague's letter to her, preceding, and upon Mr. Lovelace's alternatives, as mentioned in Letter XXII. which Mr. Belford ſupported with the utmoſt earneſtneſs. But, as the reſult of this converſation will be found in the ſubſequent letters, Mr. Belford's pleas and arguments in favour of his friend, and the lady's anſwer, are omitted.

LETTER XXV.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS MONTAGUE.

THURSDAY, AUG. 3.

DEAR MADAM,

I Am infinitely obliged to you for your kind and condeſcending letter. A letter, however, which heightens my regrets, as it gives me a new inſtance of what a happy creature I might have been in an alliance ſo much approved of by ſuch worthy ladies; and which, on their accounts, and on that of Lord M. would have been ſo reputable to myſelf, and was once ſo deſirable.

But, indeed, indeed, Madam, my heart ſincerely repulſes the man, who, deſcended from ſuch a family, could be guilty, firſt, of ſuch premeditated violence as he has been guilty of; and, as he knows, further intended me, on the night previous to the day he ſet out for Berkſhire; and, next, pretending no ſpirit, could be ſo mean, as to wiſh to lift into that family a perſon he was en-public of shaking into a companionship with the most abandoned of her sex.

Allow me then, dear Madam, to declare with fervour, that I think I never could deserve to be ranked with the ladies of a family so splendid and so noble, if, by vowing love and honour at the altar to such a violator, I could sanctify, as I may say, his unprecedented and elaborate wickedness.

Permit me, however, to make one request to my good Lord M. and to Lady Betty, and Lady Sarah, and to your kind self, and your sister—It is, That you will all be pleased to join your authority and interests to prevail upon Mr. Lovelace not to molest me further.

Be pleased to tell him, That, if I am designed for life, it will be very cruel in him to attempt to hunt me out of it; for I am determined never to see him more, if I can help it. The more cruel, because he knows, that I have nobody to defend me from him: nor do I wish to engage any-body to his hurt, or to their own.

If I am, on the other hand, destined for death, it will be no less cruel, if he will not permit me to die in peace—Since a peaceable and happy end I wish him. Indeed I do.

Every worldly good attend you, dear Madam, and every branch of the honourable family, is the wish of one, whose misfortune it is, that she is obliged to disclaim any other title, than that of dear Madam, your and their obliged and faithful servant,

CLARISSA HARLOWE.

LETTER XXVI.

MR. BELFORD, TO ROBERT LOVELACE, ESQ.

THURSDAY AFTERNOON, AUG. 3.

I Am just now agreeably surprized by the following letter, delivered into my hands by a messenger from the lady. The letter she mentions, as inclosed, I have returned, without taking a copy of it. The contents of it will soon be communicated to you, I presume, by other hands. They are an absolute rejection of thee—Poor Lovelace!

'TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

'SIR, 'AUG. 3.

'YOU have frequently offered to 'oblige me in any-thing that shall be 'within your power: and I have such 'an opinion of you as to be willing to 'hope, that at the times you made 'these offers, you meant more than 'mere compliment.

'I have therefore two requests to 'make to you: the first I will now 'mention; the other, if this shall be 'complied with, otherwise not.

'It behoves me to leave behind me 'such an account as may clear up my 'conduct to several of my friends who 'will not at present concern themselves 'about me: and Miss Howe, and her 'mother, are very solicitous that I will 'do so.

'I am apprehensive that I shall not 'have time to do this; and you will not 'wonder that I have less and less inclination to set about such a painful task; 'especially as I find myself unable to 'look back with patience on what I 'have suffered; and shall be too much 'disposed by the retrospection, were I 'obliged to make it, to proceed with 'the requisite temper in a task of still 'greater importance which I have before me.

'It is very evident to me, that your 'wicked friend has given you, from 'time to time, a circumstantial account 'of all his behaviour to me, and devices against me; and you have more 'than once assured me, that he has done 'my character all the justice I could 'wish for, both by writing and speech.

'Now, Sir, if I may have a fair, a 'faithful specimen from his letters or 'accounts to you, written upon some 'of the most interesting occasions, I 'shall be able to judge, whether there 'will or will not be a necessity for me, 'for my honour's sake, to enter upon 'the solicited task.

'You may be assured, from my in-'closed answer to the letter which Miss 'Montague has honoured me with, '(and which you'll be pleased to re-'turn me as soon as read) that it is im-'possible for me ever to think of your 'friend in the way I am importuned to 'think of him: he cannot, therefore, 'receive any detriment from the re-'quested specimen: and I give you my 'honour, that no use shall be made of 'it to his prejudice, in law, or other-'wise. And that it may not, after I 'am no more, I assure you that it is a 'main part of my view that the passages 'you shall oblige me with shall be always 'in your own power, and not in that of 'any other person.

'If, Sir, you think fit to comply with 'my request, the passages I would wish 'to be transcribed (making neither bet-'ter nor worse of the matter) are those 'which

'which he has written to you, on or 'about the 7th and 8th of June, when 'I was alarmed by the wicked pretence 'of a fire; and what he has written 'from Sunday June 11, to the 19th. 'And in doing this you will much 'oblige your humble servant,

'CL. HARLOWE.'

Now, Lovelace, Since there are no hopes for thee of her returning favour—Since some praise may lie for thy ingenuousness, having never offered [as more diminutive minded libertines would have done] to palliate thy crimes by aspersing the lady, or her sex—Since she may be made easier by it—Since thou must fare better from thine own pen, than from hers—And, finally, Since thy actions have manifested, that thy letters are not the most guilty part of what she knows of thee—I see not why I may not oblige her, upon her honour, and under the restrictions, and for the reasons she has given; and this without breach of the confidence due to friendly communications; especially, as I might have added, Since thou glorieſt in thy pen, and in thy wickedneſs, and canſt not be aſhamed.

But, be this as it may, she will be obliged before thy remonstrances or clamours against it can come: so, pr'ythee, now, make the best of it, and rave not; except for the sake of a pretence against me, and to exercise thy talent at execration:—And, if thou likest to do so for these reasons, rave and welcome.

I long to know what the second request is: but this I know, that if it be any-thing less than cutting thy throat, or endangering my own neck, I will certainly comply, and be proud of having it in my power to oblige her.

And now I am actually going to be busy in the extracts.

LETTER XXVII.

MR. BELFORD, TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

MADAM, AUG. 3, 4

YOU have engaged me to communicate to you, upon honour, (making neither better nor worse of the matter) what Mr. Lovelace has written to me, in relation to yourself, in the period preceding your going to Hampstead, and in that between the 11th and 19th of June: and you assure me, you have no view in this request, but to see if it be necessary for you, from the account he gives, to touch the pistol subject yourself, for the sake of your own character.

Your commands, Madam, are of a very delicate nature, as they may seem to affect the secrets of private friendſhip: but as I know you are not capable of a view, the motives to which you will not own; and as I think the communication may do some credit to my unhappy friend's character, as an ingenuous man; though his actions by the most excellent woman in the world have lost him all title to that of an honourable one; I obey you with the greater cheerfulness.

He then proceeds with his extracts, and concludes them with an address to her in his friend's behalf in the following words:

'And now, Madam, I have fulfilled 'your commands; and, I hope, have 'not dis-served my friend with you; 'since you will hereby see the justice 'he does to your virtue in every line 'he writes. He does the same in all 'his letters, though to his own con-'demnation: and give me leave to add, 'that if this ever-amiable sufferer can 'think it in any manner consistent with 'her honour to receive his vows at the 'altar, on his truly penitent turn of 'mind, I have not the least doubt, but 'that he will make her the best and 'tenderest of husbands. What obliga-'tion will not the admirable lady here-'by lay upon all his noble family, who 'so greatly admire her! and, I will pre-'sume to say upon her own, when the 'unhappy family-aversion (which cer-'tainly has been carried to an unrea-'sonable height against him) shall be 'got over, and a general reconciliation 'takes place! For who is it, that would 'not give these two admirable persons 'to each other, were not his morals an 'objection?'

However this be, I would humbly refer to you, Madam, whether, as you will be mistress of very delicate particulars from me his friend, you should not in honour think yourself concerned to pass them by, as if you had never seen them; and not to take any advantage of the communication, not even in argument, as some perhaps might lie, with respect to the premeditated design he seems to have had, not against you, as you; but as against the sex; over whom (I am sorry I can bear witness myself) it is the villainous aim of all libertines to triumph; and I would not, if any misunderstanding should arise between him and me, give him room to reproach me, that his loſing of you, and (through his uſage of you) of his own friends, were owing to what perhaps he would call a breach of truſt, were he to judge rather by the event than by my intention.

I am, Madam, with the moſt profound veneration, your moſt faithful humble ſervant,

J. BELFORD.

LETTER XXVIII.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

SIR, FRIDAY, AUG. 4.

I Hold myſelf extremely obliged to you for your communications. I will make no uſe of them, that you ſhall have reaſon to reproach either yourſelf or me with. I wanted no new lights to make the unhappy man's premeditated baſeneſs to me unqueſtionable, as my anſwer to Miſs Montague's letter might convince you.

I muſt own in his favour, that he has obſerved ſome decency in his accounts to you of the moſt indecent and ſhocking actions. And if all his ſtrangely communicative narrations are equally decent, nothing will be rendered criminally odious by them, but the vile heart that could meditate ſuch contrivances as were much ſtronger evidences of his inhumanity, than of his wit: ſince men of very contemptible parts and underſtanding may ſucceed in the vileſt attempts, if they can once bring themſelves to trample on the ſanctions which bind man to man: and ſooner upon an innocent perſon than upon any other: becauſe ſuch a one is apt to judge of the integrity of other hearts, by it's own.

I find I have had great reaſon to think myſelf obliged to your intention in the whole progreſs of my ſufferings. It is, however, impoſſible, Sir, to miſs the natural inference on this occaſion, that lies againſt his predetermined baſeneſs. But I ſay the leſs, becauſe you ſhall not think I borrow, from what you have communicated, aggravations that are not needed.

And now, Sir, that I may ſpare you the trouble of offering any future arguments in his favour, let me tell you, that I have weighed every-thing thoroughly—All that human vanity could ſuggeſt—All that a deſirable reconciliation with my friends and the kind reſpects of his own, could bid me to hope for—The enjoyment of Miſs Howe's friendſhip, the deareſt conſideration to me, now, of all worldly ones—All theſe I have weighed: and the reſult is, and was before you favoured me with theſe communications, that I have more ſatisfaction in the hope, that in one month, there will be an end of all with me, than in the moſt agreeable things that could happen from an alliance with Mr. Lovelace, although I were to be aſſured he would make the beſt and tendereſt of huſbands. But as to the reſt; if, ſatisfied with the evils he has brought upon me, he will forbear all further perſecutions of me, I will, to my laſt hour, wiſh him good: although he hath overwhelmed the fatherleſs, and digged a pit for his friend: fatherleſs may ſhe well be called, and motherleſs too, who has been denied all paternal protection, and motherly forgiveneſs.

AND now, Sir, acknowledging gratefully your favour in the extracts, I come to the ſecond requeſt I had to make you; which requires a great deal of courage to mention: and which courage nothing but a great deal of diſtreſs, and a very deſtitute condition, can give. But, if improper, I can but be denied; and dare to ſay, I ſhall be at leaſt excuſed. Thus, then, I preface it:

You ſee, Sir, that I am thrown abſolutely into the hands of ſtrangers, who, although as kind and compaſſionate as ſtrangers can be wiſhed to be, are nevertheleſs perſons from whom I cannot expect any thing more than pity and good wiſhes; nor can my memory receive from them any more protection than my perſon, if either ſhould need it.

If then I requeſt it, of the only perſon poſſeſſed of materials that will enable him to do my character juſtice;

And who has courage, independence, and ability to oblige me;

To be the protector of my memory, as I may ſay;

And to be my executor; and to ſee ſome of my dying requeſts performed;

And if I leave it to him to do the whole in his own way, manner, and time: conſulting, however, in requiſite caſes, my deareſt Miſs Howe;

I preſume to hope, that this my ſecond requeſt may be granted.

And if it may, theſe ſatisfactions will accrue to me from the favour done me, and the office undertaken:

It will be an honour to my memory, with all thoſe who ſhall know, that I was

was ſo well ſatisfied of my innocence, that having not time to write my own ſtory, I could entruſt it to the relation which the deſtroyer of my fame and fortunes has given of it.

I ſhall not be apprehenſive of involving any one in troubles or hazards by this taſk, either with my own relations, or with your friend; having diſpoſitions to make, which perhaps my own friends will not be ſo well pleaſed with as it were to be wiſhed they would be; as I intend not unreaſonable ones; but you know, Sir, where ſelf is judge, matters, even with good people, will not always be rightly judged of.

I ſhall alſo be freed from the pain of recollecting things, that my ſoul is vexed at; and this at a time when it's tumults ſhould be allayed; in order to make way for the moſt important preparation.

And who knows, but that Mr. Belford, who already, from a principle of humanity, is touched at my misfortunes, when he comes to revolve the whole ſtory, placed before him in one ſtrong light; and when he ſhall have the cataſtrophe likewiſe before him; and ſhall become in a manner intereſted in it; who knows, but that, from a ſtill higher principle, he may ſo regulate his future actions as to find his own reward in the everlaſting welfare which is wiſhed him by his obliged ſervant,

CLARISSA HARLOWE?

LETTER XXIX.

MR. BELFORD, TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

MADAM, FRIDAY, AUG. 4.

I Am ſo ſenſible of the honour done me in yours of this day, that I would not delay for one moment the anſwering of it. I hope you will live to ſee many happy years; and be your own executrix in thoſe points which your heart is moſt ſet upon. But, in caſe of ſurvivorſhip, I moſt cheerfully accept of the ſacred office you are pleaſed to offer me: and you may abſolutely rely upon my fidelity, and if poſſible, upon the literal performance of every article you ſhall enjoin me.

The effect of the kind wiſh you conclude with, has been my concern ever ſince I have been admitted to the honour of your converſation. It ſhall be my whole endeavour that it be not in vain. The happineſs of approaching you, which this truſt, as I preſume, will give me frequent opportunities of doing, muſt neceſſarily promote the deſirable end: ſince it will be impoſſible to be a witneſs of your piety, equanimity, and other virtues, and not aſpire to emulate you. All I beg is, that you will not ſuffer any future candidate, or event, to diſplace me; unleſs ſome new inſtances of unworthineſs appear either in the morals or behaviour of, Madam, your moſt obliged and faithful ſervant,

J. BELFORD.

LETTER XXX.

MR. BELFORD, TO ROBERT LOVELACE, ESQ.

FRIDAY NIGHT, AUG. 4.

I Have actually delivered to the lady the extracts ſhe requeſted me to give her from your letters. I do aſſure you that I have made the very beſt of the matter for you, not that conſcience, but that friendſhip, could oblige me to make. I have changed or omitted ſome free words. The warm deſcription of her perſon in the fire-ſcene, as I may call it, I have omitted. I have told her, that I have done juſtice to you, in the juſtice you have done to her unexampled virtue. But take the very words which I wrote to her immediately following the extracts:

'And now, Madam,'— See the paragraph marked with inverted commas ['thus] p. 981.

The lady is extremely uneaſy at the thoughts of your attempting to viſit her. For Heaven's ſake, (your word being given) and for pity's ſake, (for ſhe is really in a very weak and languiſhing way) let me beg of you not to think of it.

Yeſterday afternoon ſhe received a cruel letter (as Mrs. Lovick ſuppoſes it to be, by the effect it had upon her) from her ſiſter, in anſwer to one written laſt Saturday, entreating a bleſſing and forgiveneſs from her parents.

She acknowledges, that if the ſame decency and juſtice are obſerved in all your letters as in the extracts I have obliged her with, (as I have aſſured her they are) ſhe ſhall think herſelf freed from the neceſſity of writing her own ſtory: and this is an advantage to thee which thou oughteſt to thank me for.

But what thinkeſt thou is the ſecond requeſt ſhe had to make to me? No other than that I would be her executor? —Her motives will appear before thee in proper time; and then, I dare to answer, will be satisfactory.

You cannot imagine how proud I am of this trust. I am afraid I shall too soon come into the execution of it. As she is always writing, what a melancholy pleasure will the perusal and disposition of her papers afford me! Such a sweetness of temper, so much patience and resignation, as she seems to be mistress of; yet writing of, and in the midst of present distresses! How much more lively and affecting, for that reason must her style be; her mind tortured by the pangs of uncertainty, (the events then hidden in the womb of fate) than the dry, narrative, unanimated style of persons, relating difficulties and dangers surmounted; the relator perfectly at ease; and if himself unmoved by his own story, not likely to affect the reader!

SATURDAY MORNING, AUG. 5.

I AM just returned from visiting the lady, and thanking her in person for the honour she has done me; and assuring her, if called to the sacred trust, of the utmost fidelity and exactness.

I found her very ill. I took notice of it. She said, she had received a second hard-hearted letter from her sister; and she had been writing a letter (and that on her knees) directly to her mother; which, before, she had not had the courage to do. It was for a last blessing, and forgiveness. No wonder, she said, that I saw her affected. Now that I had accepted of the last charitable office for her, (for which, as well as for complying with her other request, she thanked me) I should one day have all these letters before me: and could she have a kind one in return to that she had been now writing, to counterbalance the unkind one she had from her sister, she might be induced to shew me both together—otherwise, for her sister's sake, it were no matter how few saw the poor Bella's letter.

I knew she would be displeased if I had censured the cruelty of her relations. I therefore only said, That surely she must have enemies, who hoped to find their account in keeping up the resentments of her friends against her.

'It may be so, Mr. Belford,' said she: 'the unhappy never want enemies. 'One fault, wilfully committed, au'thorizes the imputation of many more. 'Where the ear is opened to accusations, accusers will not be wanting; 'and every-one will officiously come 'with stories against a disgraced child, 'where nothing dare be said in her favour. I should have been wise in 'time, and not have needed to be convinced, by my own misfortunes, of 'the truth of what common experience 'daily demonstrates. Mr. Lovelace's 'baseness, my father's inflexibility, my 'sister's reproaches, are the natural 'consequences of my own rashness; so 'I must make the best of my hard lot. 'Only, as these consequences follow 'one another so closely, while they are 'new, how can I help being a-new affected?'

I asked if a letter written by myself, by her doctor or apothecary, to any of her friends, representing her low state of health, and great humility, would be acceptable? Or if a journey to any of them would be of service, I would gladly undertake it in person, and strictly conform to her orders, to whomsoever she should direct me to apply.

She earnestly desired, that nothing of this sort might be attempted, especially without her knowledge and consent. Miss Howe, she said, had done harm by her kindly intended zeal; and if there were room to expect favour by mediation, she had ready at hand a kind friend, Mrs. Norton, who for piety and prudence, had few equals; and who would let slip no opportunity to endeavour to do her service.

I let her know, that I was going out of town till Monday: she wished me pleasure; and said she should be glad to see me on my return.

Adieu!

LETTER XXXI.

MISS ARABELLA HARLOWE, TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

[IN ANSWER TO HERS OF JULY 29. SEE NO. XIX.]

THURSDAY MORN. AUG. 3.

SISTER CLARY,

I Wish you would not trouble me with any more of your letters. You had always a knack at writing; and depended upon making every-one do what you would when you wrote. But your wit and your folly have undone you. And now, as all naughty creatures do, when they can't help themselves, you come begging and praying, and make others as unhappy as yourself.

When I wrote last to you, I expected that I should not be at rest.

And so you'd creep on, by little and little, till you'll want to be received again.

But you only hope for forgiveness, and a blessing, you say. A blessing for what, sister Clary? Think for what! —However, I re'd your letter to my father and mother.

I won't tell you what my father said —One who has the true sense you boast to have of your misdeeds, may guess, without my telling you, what a justly-incensed father would say on such an occasion.

My poor mother—O wretch! What has not your ungrateful folly cost my poor mother!—Had you been less a darling, you would not, perhaps, have been so graceless; but I never in my life saw a cockered favourite come to good.

My heart is full, and I cant't help writing my mind; for your crimes have disgraced us all; and I am afraid and ashamed to go to any publick or private assembly or diversion: and why?—I need not say why, when your actions are the subject either of the open talk, or of the affronting whispers of both sexes at all such places.

Upon the whole, I am sorry I have no more comfort to send you: but I find nobody willing to forgive you.

I don't know what time may do for you; and when it is seen that your penitence is not owing more to disappointment than to true conviction: for it is too probable, Miss Clary, that, had you gone on as swimmingly as you expected, and had not your feather-headed villain abandoned you, we should have heard nothing of these moving supplications; nor of anything but defiances from him, and a guilt gloried in from you. And this is every-one's opinion as well as that of your afflicted sister,

ARABELLA HARLOWE.

I send this by a particular hand, who undertakes to give it you or leave it for you by to-morrow night.

LETTER XXXII.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO HER MOTHER.

SAT. AUG. 5.

HONOURED MADAM,

NO self-convicted criminal ever approached her angry and just judge with greater awe, not with a truer contrition, than I do you by these lines.

Indeed I must say, that if the matter of my humble prayer had not respected my future welfare, I had not dared to take this liberty. But my heart is set upon it, as upon a thing next to God Almighty's forgiveness necessary for me.

Had my happy sister known my distresses, she would not have wrung my heart, as she has done by a severity, which I must needs think unkind and unsisterly.

But complaint of any unkindness from her belongs not to me: yet as she is pleased to write, that it must be seen that my penitence is less owing to disappointment, than to true conviction, permit me, Madam, to insist upon it, that, if such a plea can be allowed me, I am actually entitled to the blessing I sue for; since my humble prayer is founded upon a true and unfeigned repentance: and this you will the readier believe, if the creature who never, to the best of her remembrance, told her mamma a wilful falsehood, may be credited, when she declares, as she does in the most solemn manner, that she met the seducer, with a determination not to go off with him: that the rash step was owing more to compulsion than to infatuation; and that her heart was so little in it, that she repented and grieved from the moment she found herself in his power; and for every moment after, for several weeks before she had any cause from him to apprehend the usage she met with.

Wherefore, on my knees, my ever-honoured mamma, (for on my knees I write this letter) I do most humbly beg your blessing: say but, in so many words, (I ask you not, Madam, to call me your daughter) —'Lost, unhappy 'wretch, I forgive you! and may God bless 'you!'—This is all! Let me, on a blessed scrap of paper, but see one sentence to this effect, under your dear hand, that I may hold it to my heart in my most trying struggles, and I shall think it a passport to Heaven. And if I do not too much presume, and it were WE instead of I, and both your honoured names subjoined to it, I should then have nothing more to wish. Then would I say, 'Great and merciful God! 'thou seest here in this paper the poor 'unworthy creature absolved by her 'justly-offended parents; O join, for 'my Redeemer's sake, thy all-gracious 'fiat, and receive a repentant sinner to 'the arms of thy mercy!'

I can

I can conjure you, Madam, by no ſubject of motherly tenderneſs, that will not, in the opinion of my ſevere cenſurers, (before whom this humble addreſs muſt appear) add to my reproach; let me therefore, for God's ſake, prevail upon you to pronounce me bleſt and forgiven, ſince you will thereby ſprinkle comfort through the laſt hours of your

CLARISSA HARLOWE.

LETTER XXXIII.

MISS MONTAGUE, TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

[IN ANSWER TO HERS OF AUG. 3. See NO. XXV.]

MONDAY, AUG. 7.

DEAR MADAM,

WE were all of opinion before your letter came, that Mr. Lovelace was utterly unworthy of you, and deſerved condign puniſhment, rather than to be bleſſed with ſuch a wife: and hoped far more from your kind conſideration for us, than any we ſuppoſed you could have for ſo baſe an injurer. For we were all determined to love you, and admire you, let his behaviour to you be what it would.

But, after your letter, what can be ſaid?

I am, however, commanded to write in all the ſubſcribing names, to let you know how greatly your ſufferings have affected us: to tell you, that my Lord M. has forbid him ever more to enter the doors of the apartments where he ſhall be: and as you labour under the unhappy effects of your friends diſpleaſure, which may ſubject you to inconveniences, his lordſhip, and Lady Sarah, and Lady Betty, beg of you to accept for your life, or, at leaſt, till you are admitted to enjoy your own eſtate, of one hundred guineas per quarter, which will be regularly brought you by an eſpecial hand, and of the incloſed Bank bill for a beginning. And do not, deareſt Madam, we all beſeech you, do not think you are beholden (for this token of Lord M's and Lady Sarah's and Lady Betty's love to you) to the friends of this vile man; for he has not one friend left among us.

We each of us deſire to be favoured with a place in your eſteem; and to be conſidered upon the ſame foot of relationſhip, as if what was once ſo much our pleaſure to hope would be, had been.

And it ſhall be our united prayer, that you may recover health and ſpirits, and live to ſee many happy years: and, ſince this wretch can no more be pleaded for, that, when he is gone abroad, as he is now preparing to do, we may be permitted the honour of a perſonal acquaintance with a lady who has no equal. Theſe are the earneſt requeſts, deareſt young lady, of your affectionate friends and moſt faithful ſervants,

M.
SARAH SADLEIR.
ELIZ. LAWRANCE.
CHARL. MONTAGUE.
MARTH. MONTAGUE.

You will break the hearts of the three firſt-named more particularly, if you refuſe them your acceptance. Deareſt young lady, puniſh not them for his crimes. We ſend by a particular hand, which will bring us, we hope, your accepting favour.

Mr. Lovelace writes by the ſame hand; but he knows nothing of our letter, nor we of his: for we ſhun each other; and one part of the houſe holds us, another him, the remoteſt from each other.

LETTER XXXIV.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

SAT. AUG. 23.

I Am ſo exceſſively diſturbed at the contents of Miſs Harlowe's anſwer to my couſin Charlotte's letter of Tueſday laſt, (which was given her by the ſame fellow that gave me yours) that I have hardly patience or conſideration enough to weigh what you write.

She had need indeed to cry out for mercy for herſelf from her friends, who knows not how to ſhew any! She is a true daughter of the Harlowes—By my ſoul, Jack, ſhe is a true daughter of the Harlowes! Yet has ſhe ſo many excellences, that I muſt love her; and, fool that I am, love her the more for her deſpiſing me.

Thou runneſt on with thy curſed nonſenſical reformado rote, of dying, dying, dying! and, having once got the word by the end, canſt not help ſoiſting it in at every period! The devil take me, if I don't think thou wouldſt give her poiſon with thy own hands rather than ſhe ſhould recover, and rob thee of the merit of being a conjuror!

But no more of thy curſed knell; thy changes upon death's candleſtick turned bottom-upwards: ſhe'll live to bury me; I ſee that: for, by my ſoul, I can neither neither eat, drink, nor ſleep; nor, what is ſtill worſe, love any woman in the world but her. Nor care I to look upon a woman now: on the contrary, I turn my head from every-one I meet: except by chance an eye, an air, a feature, ſtrikes me, reſembling hers in ſome glancing-by face; and then I cannot forbear looking again; though the ſecond look recovers me, for there can be nobody like her.

But, ſurely, Belford, the devil's in this woman! The more I think of her nonſenſe and obſtinacy, the leſs patience I have with her. Is it poſſible ſhe can do herſelf, her family, her friends, ſo much juſtice any other way, as by marrying me? Were ſhe ſure ſhe ſhould live but a day, ſhe ought to die a wife. If her Chriſtian revenge will not let her wiſh to do ſo for her own ſake, ought ſhe not for the ſake of her family, and of her ſex, which ſhe pretends ſometimes to have ſo much concern for? And if no ſake is dear enough to move her Harlowe-ſpirit in my favour, has ſhe any title to the pity that thou ſo pitifully art always beſpeaking for her?

As to the difference which her letter has made between me and the ſtupid family here, [And I muſt tell thee we are all broke in pieces] I value not that of a button. They are fools to anathematize and curſe me, who can give them ten curſes for one, were they to hold it for a day together.

I have one half of the houſe to myſelf; and that the beſt; for the great enjoy that leaſt which coſts them moſt: grandeur and uſe are two things: the common part is theirs; the ſtate part is mine: and here I lord it, and will lord it, as long as I pleaſe; while the two purſy ſiſters, the old gouty brother, and the two muſty nieces, are ſtived up in the other half, and dare not ſtir for fear of meeting me: whom (that's the jeſt of it) they have forbidden coming into their apartments, as I have them into mine. And ſo I have them all priſoners, while I range about as I pleaſe. Pretty dogs and doggeſſes, to quarrel and bark at me, and yet, whenever I appear, afraid to pop out of their kennels; or if out before they ſee me, at the ſight of me run growling in again, with their flapt ears, their ſweeping dewlaps, and their quivering tails curling inwards.

And here, while I am thus worthily waging war with beetles, drones, waſps, and hornets, and am all on fire with the rage of ſlighted love, thou art regaling thyſelf with phlegm and rock-water, and art going on with thy reformation-ſcheme and thy exultations in my misfortunes!

The devil take thee for an inſenſible dough-baked varlet! I have no more patience with thee than with the lady; for thou knoweſt nothing either of love or friendſhip, but art as unworthy of the one, as incapable of the other; elſe wouldeſt thou not rejoice, as thou doſt, under the grimace of pity, in my diſappointments.

And thou art a pretty fellow, art thou not? to engage to tranſcribe for her ſome parts of my letters written to thee in confidence? Letters that thou ſhouldeſt ſooner have parted with thy curſed tongue, than have owned thou ever hadſt received ſuch: yet theſe are now to be communicated to her! But I charge thee, and woe be to thee if it be too late! that thou do not oblige her with a line of mine.

If thou haſt done it, the leaſt vengeance I will take, is to break through my honour given to thee not to viſit her, as thou wilt have broken through thine to me, in communicating letters written under the ſeal of friendſhip.

I am now convinced, too ſadly for my hopes, by her letter to my couſin Charlotte, that ſhe is determined never to have me.

Unprecedented wickedneſs, ſhe calls mine to her. But how does ſhe know what love, in it's flaming ardour, will ſtimulate men to do? How does ſhe know the requiſite diſtinctions of the words ſhe uſes in this caſe?—To think the worſt, and to be able to make compariſons in theſe very delicate ſituations, muſt ſhe not be leſs delicate than I had imagined her to be?—But ſhe has heard, that the devil is black; and having a mind to make one of me, brays together, in the mortar of her wild fancy, twenty chimney-ſweepers, in order to make one ſootier than ordinary riſe out of the dirty maſs.

But what a whirlwind does ſhe raiſe in my ſoul, by her proud contempts of me! Never, never, was mortal man's pride ſo mortified! How does ſhe ſink me, even in my own eyes!—Her heart ſincerely repulſes me, ſhe ſays, for my MEANNESS.—Yet ſhe intends to reap the benefit of what ſhe calls ſo!—Curſe upon her haughtineſs, and her meanneſs, at the ſame time!—Her haughtineſs to me, and her meanneſs to her own relations; more unworthy of kindred with her, than I can be, or I am mean indeed.

Yet

Yet who but muſt admire, who but muſt adore her? O that curſed, curſed, blaſted! But for the women of that!—Then their damn'd potion! But for ſtyle, and her unimpaired intellects, and the majeſty of her virtue, ſaved her, as once it did by her humble eloquence, another time by her terrifying menaces againſt her own life.

Yet in both theſe to find her power over me, and my love for her, and to hate, to deſpiſe, and to refuſe me!—She might have done this with ſome ſhew of juſtice, had the laſt intended violation been perpetrated: but to go away conquereſs and triumphant in every light!—Well may ſhe deſpiſe me for ſuffering her to do ſo.

She left me low and mean indeed!—And the impreſſion holds with her.—I could tear my fleſh, that I gave her not cauſe—that I humbled her not indeed;—or that I ſtaid not in town to attend her motions inſtead of Lord M.'s, till I could have exalted myſelf, by giving to myſelf a wife ſuperior to all trial, to all temptation.

I will venture one more letter to her, however; and if that don't do, or procure me an anſwer, then will I endeavour to ſee her, let what will be the conſequence. If ſhe get out of my way, I will do ſome noble miſchief to the vixen girl whom ſhe moſt loves, and then quit the kingdom for ever.

And now, Jack, ſince thy hand is in at communicating the contents of private letters, tell her this, if thou wilt. And add to it, That if SHE abandon me, GOD will: and what then will be the fate of her

LOVELACE!

LETTER XXXV.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

[IN ANSWER TO HIS OF AUG. 4. See No. XXX.]

MONDAY, AUG. 7.

AND ſo you have actually delivered to the fair implacable extracts of letters written in the confidence of friendſhip! Take care—Take care, Belford—I do indeed love you better than I love any man in the world: but this is a very delicate point. The matter is grown very ſerious to me. My heart is bent upon having her. And have her I will, though I marry her in the agonies of death.

She is very earneſt, you ſay, that I will not offer to moleſt her. That, let me tell her, will abſolutely depend upon herſelf, and the anſwer ſhe returns, whether by pen and ink, or the contemptuous one of ſilence, which ſhe beſtowed upon my laſt four to her: and I will write it in ſuch humble, and in ſuch reaſonable terms, that, if ſhe be not a true Harlowe, ſhe ſhall forgive me. But as to the executorſhip which ſhe is for conferring upon thee—Thou ſhalt not be her executor: let me periſh if thou ſhalt.—Nor ſhall ſhe die. Nobody ſhall be any-thing, nobody ſhall dare to be any-thing, to her, but I.—Thy happineſs is already too great, to be admitted daily to her preſence; to look upon her, to talk to her, to hear her talk, while I am forbid to come within view of her window—What a reprobation is this, of the man who was once more dear to her than all the men in the world!—And now to be able to look down upon me, while her exalted head is hid from me among the ſtars, ſometimes with ſcorn, at other times with pity, I cannot bear it.

This I tell thee, that if I have not ſucceſs in my effort by letter, I will overcome the creeping folly that has found it's way to my heart, or I will tear it out in her preſence, and throw it at hers, that ſhe may ſee how much more tender than her own that organ is, which ſhe, and you, and every-one elſe, have taken the liberty to call callous.

Give notice to the people who live back and edge, and on either hand, of the curſed mother, to remove their beſt effects if I am rejected: for the firſt vengeance I ſhall take, will be to ſet fire to that den of ſerpents. Nor will there be any fear of taking them when they are in any act that has the reliſh of ſalvation in it, as Shakeſpeare ſays—So that my revenge, if they periſh in the flames I ſhall light up, will be complete as to them.

LETTER XXXVI.

MR. LOVELACE, TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

MONDAY, AUG. 7.

LITTLE as I have reaſon to expect either your patient ear, or forgiving heart, yet cannot I forbear to write to you once more, (as a more pardonable intruſion, perhaps, than a viſit would be) to beg of you to put it in my power to atone, as far as it is poſſible to atone, for the injuries I have done you.

Your angelick purity, and my awakened guilty conscience, are standing records of your exalted merit and of my detestable baseness: but your forgiveness will lay me under an eternal obligation to you.—Forgive me then, my dearest life, my earthly good, the visible anchor of my future hope!—As you (who believe you have something to be forgiven for) hope for pardon yourself, forgive me, and consent to meet me, upon your own conditions, and in whose company you please, at the holy altar, and to give yourself a title to the most repentant and affectionate heart that ever beat in a human bosom.

But perhaps a time of probation may be required. It may be impossible for you, as well from indisposition as doubt, so soon to receive me to absolute favour as my heart wishes to be received. In this case, I will submit to your pleasure; and there shall be no penance which you can impose, that I will not cheerfully undergo, if you will be pleased to give me hope, that, after an expiation, suppose of months, wherein the regularity of my future life and actions shall convince you of my reformation, you will at last be mine.

Let me beg the favour, then, of a few lines, encouraging me in this conditional hope, if it must not be a still nearer hope, and a more generous encouragement.

If you refuse me this, you will make me desperate. But even then I must, at all events, throw myself at your feet, that I may not charge myself with the omission of any earnest, any humble effort, to move you in my favour: for in YOU, Madam, in YOUR forgiveness, are centered my hopes as to both worlds: since to be reprobated finally by you, will leave me without expectation of mercy from above!—For I am now awakened enough to think, that to be forgiven by injured innocence is necessary to the Divine pardon; the Almighty putting into the power of such (as is reasonable to believe) the wretch who causelessly and capitally offends them. And who can be entitled to this power, if YOU are not?

Your cause, Madam, in a word, I look upon to be the cause of virtue, and, as such, the cause of God. And may I not expect, that he will assert it in the perdition of a man, who has acted by a person of the most spotless purity, as I have done, if you, by rejecting me, shew that I have offended beyond the possibility of forgiveness?

I do most solemnly assure you, that no temporal or worldly views induce me to this earnest address. I disclaim forgiveness from you. Nor do my Lord M. and his sisters from me. I despise them from my heart, for presuming to imagine, that I will be commanded by the prospect of any benefits in their power to confer. There is not a person breathing, but yourself, who shall prescribe to me. Your whole conduct, Madam, has been so nobly principled, and your resentments are so admirably just, that you appear to me even in a divine light; and in an infinitely more amiable one at the same time, than you could have appeared in, had you not suffered the barbarous wrongs, that now fill my mind with anguish and horror at my own recollected villainy to the most excellent of women.

I repeat, that all I beg for the present, is a few lines, to guide my doubtful steps; and (if possible for you so far to condescend) to encourage me to hope, that, if I can justify my present vows by my future conduct, I may be permitted the honour to style myself eternally yours,

LETTER XXXVII.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO LORD M. AND TO THE LADIES OF HIS HOUSE.

[IN REPLY TO MISS MONTAGUE'S OF AUG. 7. See No. XXXIII.]

TUESDAY, AUG. 8.

EXCUSE me, my good lord, and my ever-honoured ladies, from accepting of your noble quarterly bounty; and allow me to return, with all grateful acknowledgment, and true humility, the inclosed earnest of your goodness to me. Indeed I have no need of the one, and cannot possibly want the other: but, nevertheless, have such a sense of your generous favour, that, to my last hour, I shall have pleasure in contemplating upon it, and be proud of the place I hold in the esteem of such venerable persons, to whom I once had the ambition to hope to be related.

But give me leave to express my concern that you have banished your kinsman from your presence and favour: since now, perhaps, he will be under less restraint than ever; and since I, in particular, who had hoped, by your influences to remain unmolested for the remainder of my days, may be again subjected to his persecutions.

He has not, my good lord, and my dear ladies, offended againſt you, as he has againſt me; and yet you could all very generouſly intercede for him with me: and ſhall I be very improper, if I decline, for my own peace ſake; for the ſake of other poor creatures, who may be ſtill injured by him, if he be made quite deſperate; and for the ſake of all your worthy family, that you will extend to him that forgiveneſs which you hoped for from me? And this the rather, as I preſume to think, that his daring impetuous ſpirit will not be ſubdued by violent methods; ſince I have no doubt, that the gratifying of a preſent paſſion will be always more prevalent with him, than any future proſpects, however unwarrantable the one or beneficial the other.

Your reſentments on my account are extremely generous, as your goodneſs to me is truly noble: but I am not without hope, that he will be properly affected by the evils he has made me ſuffer; and that, when I am laid low and forgotten, your whole honourable family will be enabled to rejoice in his reformation; and ſee many of thoſe happy years together, which, my good lord, and my dear ladies, you ſo kindly wiſh to your ever-grateful and obliged

CLARISSA HARLOWE.

LETTER XXXVIII.

MR. BELFORD, TO ROBERT LOVELACE, ESQ.

THURSDAY, AUG. 10.

YOU have been informed by Tourville, how much Belton's illneſs and affairs have engaged me, as well as Mowbray and him, ſince my former. I called at Smith's on Monday, in my way to Epſom.

The lady was gone to chapel: but I had the ſatisfaction to hear ſhe was not worſe; and left my compliments, and an intimation that I ſhould be out of town for three or four days.

I refer myſelf to Tourville, who will let you know the difficulty we had to drive out this meek miſtreſs, and frugal manager, with her cubs, and to give the poor fellow's ſiſter poſſeſſion for him of his own houſe; he ſkulking meanwhile at an inn at Croydon, too diſpirited to appear in his own cauſe.

But I muſt obſerve, that we were probably but juſt in time to ſave the ſhattered remains of his fortune from this rapacious woman, and her accomplices: for as he cannot live long, and ſhe thinks ſo, we found ſhe had certainly taken meaſures to ſet up a marriage, and keep poſſeſſion of all for herſelf and her ſons.

Tourville will tell you how I was forced to chaſtiſe the quondam hoſtler in her ſight, before I could drive him out of the houſe. He had the inſolence to lay hands on me: and I made him take but one ſtep from the top to the bottom of a pair of ſtairs. I thought his neck and all his bones had been broken. And then, he being carried out neck-and-heels, Thomaſine thought fit to walk out after him.

Charming conſequences of keeping; the ſtate we have been ſo fond of extolling!—Whatever it may be thought of in ſtrong health, ſickneſs and declining ſpirits in the keeper, will bring him to ſee the difference.

She ſhould ſoon have him, ſhe told a confident, in the ſpace of ſix feet by five; meaning his bed: and then ſhe would let nobody come near him but whom ſhe pleaſed. The hoſtler-fellow, I ſuppoſe, would then have been his phyſician; his will ready made for him; and widows weeds probably ready provided; who knows, but ſhe to appear in them in his own ſight? As once I knew an inſtance in a wicked wife; inſulting a huſband ſhe hated, when ſhe thought him paſt recovery: though it gave the man ſuch ſpirits, and ſuch a turn, that he got over it, and lived to ſee her in her coffin, dreſſed out in the very weeds ſhe had inſulted him in.

So much, for the preſent, for Belton, and his Thomaſine.

I BEGIN to pity thee heartily, now I ſee thee in earneſt, in the fruitleſs love thou expreſſeſt to this angel of a woman; and the rather, as, ſay what thou wilt, it is impoſſible ſhe ſhould get over her illneſs, and her friends implacableneſs, of which ſhe has had freſh inſtances.

I hope thou art not indeed diſpleaſed with the extracts I have made from thy letters for her. The letting her know the juſtice thou haſt done to her virtue in them, is ſo much in favour of thy ingenuouſneſs, (a quality, let me repeat, that gives thee a ſuperiority over common libertines) that I think in my heart I was right; though to any other woman, and to one who had not known the worſt of thee that ſhe could know, it might have been wrong.

If the end will juſtify the means, it is plain, that I have done well with regard to ye both; ſince I have made her eaſier, and thee appear in a better light to her, than otherwiſe thou wouldſt have done.

But if, nevertheleſs, thou art diſſatisfied with my having obliged her in a point, which I acknowledge to be delicate, let us canvas this matter at our firſt meeting: and then I will ſhew thee what the extracts were, and what connexions I gave them in thy favour.

But ſurely thou doſt not pretend to ſay what I ſhall, or ſhall not do, as to the executorſhip.

I am my own man, I hope. I think thou ſhouldſt be glad to have the juſtification of her memory left to one, who, at the ſame time, thou mayſt be aſſured, will treat thee, and thy actions, with all the lenity the caſe will admit.

I cannot help expreſſing my ſurprize at one inſtance of thy ſelf-partiality; and that is, where thou ſayeſt, 'She 'had need, indeed, to cry out for mercy 'herſelf from her friends, who knows 'not how to ſhew any.'

Surely thou canſt not think the caſes alike—For ſhe, as I underſtand, deſires but a laſt bleſſing, and a laſt forgiveneſs, for a fault in a manner involuntary, if a fault at all; and does not ſo much as hope to be received; thou, to be forgiven premeditated wrongs; (which, nevertheleſs, ſhe forgives, on condition to be no more moleſted by thee) and hopeſt to be received into favour, and to make the fineſt jewel in the world thy abſolute property in conſequence of that forgiveneſs.

I will now briefly proceed to relate what has paſſed ſince my laſt, as to the excellent lady. By the account I ſhall give thee, thou wilt ſee, that ſhe has troubles enough upon her, all ſpringing originally from thyſelf, without needing to add more to them by new vexations. And as long as thou canſt exert thyſelf ſo very cavalierly at M. Hall, where every-one is thy priſoner, I ſee not but the bravery of thy ſpirit may be as well gratified in domineering there over half a dozen perſons of rank and diſtinction, as it could be over an helpleſs orphan, as I may call this lady, ſince ſhe has not a ſingle friend to ſtand by her, if I do not; and who will think herſelf happy, if ſhe can refuge herſelf from thee, and from all the world, in the arms of death.

My laſt was dated on Saturday.

On Sunday, in compliance with the doctor's advice, ſhe took a little airing. Mrs. Lovick, and Mr. Smith and his wife were with her. After being at Highgate chapel at divine ſervice, ſhe treated them with a little repaſt; and in the afternoon was at Iſlington church, in her way home; returning tolerably cheerful.

She had received ſeveral letters in my abſence, as Mrs. Lovick acquainted me, beſides yours. Yours, it ſeems, much diſtreſſed her; but ſhe ordered the meſſenger, who preſſed for an anſwer, to be told, that it did not require an immediate one.

On Wedneſday ſhe received a letter from her uncle Harlowe, in anſwer to one ſhe had written to her mother on Saturday on her knees. It muſt be a very cruel one, Mrs. Lovick ſays, by the effects it had upon her: for, when ſhe received it, ſhe was intending to take an afternoon airing in a coach; but was thrown into ſo violent a fit of hyſterics upon it, that ſhe was forced to lie down; and (being not recovered by it) to go to bed about eight o'clock.

On Thurſday morning ſhe was up very early; and had recourſe to the Scriptures to calm her mind, as ſhe told Mrs. Lovick: and weak as ſhe was, would go in a chair to Lincoln's Inn Chapel, about eleven. She was brought home a little better; and then ſat down to write to her uncle. But was obliged to leave off ſeveral times—To ſtruggle, as ſhe told Mrs. Lovick, for an humble temper.—'My heart,' ſaid ſhe to the good woman, 'is a proud heart, and 'not yet, I find, enough mortified to 'my condition; but, do what I can, 'will be for preſcribing reſenting things 'to my pen.'

I arrived in town from Belton's this Thurſday evening; and went directly to Smith's. She was too ill to receive my viſit. But on ſending up my compliments, ſhe ſent me down word, that ſhe ſhould be glad to ſee me in the morning.

Mrs. Lovick obliged me with the copy of a Meditation collected by the lady from the Scriptures. She has entitled it, 'Poor Mortals the Cauſe of their 'own Miſery;' ſo entitled, I preſume, with intention to take off the edge of her repinings at hardſhips ſo diſproportioned to her fault, were her fault even as great as ſhe is inclined to think it. We may ſee by this, the method ſhe takes to fortify her mind, and to which ſhe owes, in a great meaſure, the magnanimity with which ſhe bears her undeſerved perſecutions.

'MEDITATION.

'POOR MORTALS THE CAUSE OF THEIR 'OWN MISERY.

'SAY not thou, It is through the Lord that 'I fell away; for thou oughteſt not to 'do the thing that he hateth.

Wash me clean, He hath caused me to err;
for he hath no need of the sinful man.
He himself made man from the beginning, and left him in the hand of his own counsel.
If thou wilt, to keep the commandments,
and to perform acceptable faithfulness.
He hath set fire and water before thee:
stretch forth thine hand to whether thou wilt.
He hath commanded no man to do wickedly; neither hath he given any man licence to sin.
And now, Lord, what is my hope?
Truly my hope is only in thee.
Deliver me from all my offences: and make me not a rebuke unto the foolish.
When thou with rebuke doth chasten man for sin, thou makest his beauty to consume away, like as it were a moth fretting a garment: every man therefore is vanity.
Turn thee unto me, and have mercy upon me; for I am desolate and afflicted.
The troubles of my heart are enlarged.
O bring thou me out of my distresses!"

Mrs. Smith gave me the following particulars of a conversation that passed between herself and a young clergyman, on Tuesday afternoon, who, as it appears, was employed to make enquiries about the lady by her friends.

He came into the shop in a riding-habit, and asked for some Spanish snuff; and finding only Mrs. Smith there, he desired to have a little talk with her in the back-shop.

He beat about the bush in several distant questions, and at last began to talk more directly about Miss Harlowe.

He said, he knew her before her fall, [That was his impudent word;] and gave the substance of the following account of her, as I collected it from Mrs. Smith.

She was then, he said, the admiration and delight of every-body: he lamented, with great solemnity her backsliding; another of his phrases. Mrs. Smith said, he was a fine scholar: for he spoke several things she understood not; and either in Latin or Greek, she could not tell which; but was so good as to give her the English of them without asking. A fine thing, she said, for a scholar to be so condescending!

He said, Her going off with so vile a rake had given great scandal and offence to all the neighbouring ladies, as well as to her friends.

He told Mrs. Smith how much she used to be followed by every-one's eye, however she went abroad, or to church; and praised and blessed by every tongue, as she passed; especially by the poor; that she gave the fashion to the fashionable, without seeming herself to intend it, or to know she did: that, however, it was pleasant to see ladies imitate her in dress and behaviour, who, being unable to come up to her in grace and ease, exposed but their own affectation and awkwardness, at the time that they thought themselves secure of a general approbation because they wore the same things, and put them on in the same manner that she did, who had every-body's admiration; little considering, that were her person like theirs, or if she had had their defects, she would have brought up a very different fashion; for that nature was her guide in every-thing, and ease her study; which, joined with a mingled dignity and condescension in her air and manner, whether she received or paid a compliment, distinguished her above all her sex

He spoke not, he said, his own sentiments only on this occasion, but those of every-body: for that the praises of Miss Clarissa Harlowe were such a favourite topick, that a person who could not speak well upon any other subject, was sure to speak well upon that; because he could say nothing but what he had heard repeated and applauded twenty times over.

Hence it was, perhaps, that this novice accounted for the best things he said himself; though I must own that the personal knowledge of the lady which I am favoured with, made it easy to me to lick into shape what the good woman reported to me, as the character given her by the young Levite: for who, even now, in her decline of health, sees not that all these attributes belong to her?

I suppose he has not been long come from college, and now thinks he has nothing to do but to blaze away for a scholar among the ignorant; as such young fellows are apt to think those who cannot cap verses with them, and tell us how an ancient author expressed himself in Latin on a subject, upon which, however, they may know how, as well as that author, to express themselves in English.

Mrs. Smith was so taken with him, that she would fain have introduced him to the lady, not questioning but it would be very acceptable to her to see one who knew her and her friends so well: but this he declined for several reasons, as he called them; which he gave. One was, that persons of his cloth cloth, should be very cautious of the company they were in, especially where sex was concerned, and where a woman had slurred her reputation—[I wish I had been there when he gave himself these airs.]—Another, that he was desired to inform himself of her present way of life, and who her visitors were; for, as to the praises Mrs. Smith gave the lady, he hinted, that she seemed to be a good-natured woman, and might (though for the ladies sake he hoped not) be too partial and short-sighted to be trusted to, absolutely, in a concern of so high a nature as he intimated the task was which he had undertaken; nodding out words of doubtful import; and assuming airs of great significance, (as I could gather) throughout the whole conversation. And when Mrs. Smith told him, that the lady was in a very bad state of health, he gave a careless shrug—'She may be 'very ill,' says he: 'her disappoint-'ments must have touched her to the 'quick: but she is not bad enough, I 'dare say, yet, to atone for her very 'great lapse, and to expect to be for-'given by those whom she has so much 'disgraced.'

A starched, conceited coxcomb!—What would I give he had fallen in my way!

He departed, highly satisfied with himself, no doubt, and assured of Mrs. Smith's great opinion of his sagacity and learning: but bid her not say any-thing to the lady about him, or his enquiries. And I, for very different reasons, enjoined the same thing.

I am glad, however, for her peace of mind's sake, that they begin to think it behoves them to enquire about her.

LETTER XXXIX.

MR. BELFORD, TO ROBERT LOVELACE, ESQ.

FRIDAY, AUG. 11.

MR. Belford acquaints his friend with the generosity of Lord M. and the ladies of his family; and with the lady's grateful sentiments upon the occasion.

He says, that in hopes to avoid the pain of seeing him, [Mr. Lovelace] she intends to answer his letter of the 7th, though much against her inclination.

'She took great notice,' says Mr. Belford, 'of that passage in yours, which 'makes necessary to the Divine pardon, 'the forgiveness of a person causelessly 'injured.

'Her grandfather, I find, has en-'abled her, at eighteen years of age, to 'make her will, and to devise [illegible] 'part of his estate to whom she pleases 'in the family, and the rest out of it, '(if she die single) at her own disposi-'tion; and this to create respect to her, 'as he apprehended that she would be 'envied: and she now resolves on the 'about making her will out of hand.'

Mr. Belford insists upon the promise he had made him, not to molest the lady: and gives him the contents of her answer to Lord M. and the ladies of his family, declining their generous offers. See Letter XXXVII.

LETTER XL.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO ROBERT LOVELACE, ESQ.

FRIDAY, AUG. 11.

IT is a cruel alternative, to be either forced to see you, or to write to you. But a will of my own has been long denied me; and to avoid a greater evil, nay, now I may say, the greatest, I write.

Were I capable of disguising or concealing my real sentiments, I might safely, I dare say, give you the remote hope you request, and yet keep all my resolutions. But I must tell you, Sir, (it becomes my character to tell you) that, were I to live more years than perhaps I may weeks, and there were not another man in the world, I could not, I would not, be yours.

There is no merit in performing a duty.

Religion enjoins me, not only to forgive injuries, but to return good for evil. It is all my consolation, and I bless God for giving me that, that I am now in such a state of mind with regard to you, that I can cheerfully obey its dictates. And accordingly I tell you, that, wherever you go, I wish you happy. And in this I mean to include every good wish.

And now having, with great reluctance I own, complied with one of your compulsatory alternatives, I expect the fruits of it. CL. HARLOWE.

LETTER XLI.

MR. JOHN HARLOWE, TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

[IN ANSWER TO HERS TO HER MOTHER. See NO. XXXII.]

MONDAY, AUG. 7.

POOR UNGRATEFUL NAUGHTY KINSWOMAN,

YOUR mother neither caring, nor being permitted, to write, I am desired averse to set pen to paper, though I resolved against it.

And so I aim to tell you, that your letters, joined to the occasion of them, almost break the hearts of us all.

Were we sure you had seen your folly, and were truly penitent, and, at the same time, that you were so very ill as you pretend, I know not what might be done for you. But we are all acquainted with your moving ways, when you want to carry a point.

Unhappy girl! how miserable have you made us all! We, who used to visit with so much pleasure, now cannot endure to look upon one another.

If you had not known, upon an hundred occasions, how dear you once was to us, you might judge of it now, were you to know how much your folly has unhinged us all.

Naughty, naughty girl! You see the fruits of preferring a rake and libertine to a man of sobriety and morals. Against full warning, against better knowledge. And such a modest creature, too, as you were! How could you think of such an unworthy preference!

Your mother can't ask, and your sister knows not in modesty how to ask; and so I ask you, If you have any reason to think yourself with child by this villain? —You must answer this, and answer it truly, before any-thing can be resolved upon about you.

You may well be touched with a deep remorse for your misdeeds. Could I ever have thought that my doating-piece, as every-one called you, would have done thus? To be sure I loved you too well. But that is over now. Yet, though I will not pretend to answer for any-body but myself, for my own part I say, God forgive you! And this is all from your afflicted uncle,

JOHN HARLOWE.

THE FOLLOWING MEDITATION WAS STITCHED TO THE BOTTOM OF THIS LETTER, WITH BLACK SILK.

'MEDITATION.

'O That thou wouldst hide me in the grave!

'That thou wouldst keep me secret, till thy wrath be past!

'My face is foul with weeping; and on my eye lid is the shadow of death.

'My friends scorn me; but mine eye poureth out tears unto God.

'A dreadful sound is in my ears; in prosperity the destroyer came upon me!

'I have sinned! What shall I do unto thee, O thou Preserver of men! Why hast thou set me as a mark against thee; so that I am a burden to myself!

'When I say, My bed shall comfort me; my couch shall ease my complaint;

'Then thou scarest me with dreams, and terrifiest me through visions;

'So that my soul chuseth strangling, and death rather than life.

'I loath it! I would not live always!—Let me alone; for my days are vanity!

'He hath made me a bye-word of the people; and aforetime I was as a tabret.

'My days are past, my purposes are broken off, even the thoughts of my heart.

'When I looked for good, then evil came unto me; and when I waited for light, then came darkness.

'And where now is my hope?—

'Yet all the days of my appointed time will I wait, till my change come.'

LETTER XLII.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO JOHN HARLOWE, ESQ.

THURSDAY AUG. 10.

HONOURED SIR,

IT was an act of charity I begged: only for a last blessing, that I might die in peace. I ask not to be received again, as my severe sister [O! that I had not written to her!] is pleased to say, is my view. Let that grace be denied me when I do.

I could not look forward to my last scene with comfort, without seeking, at least, to obtain the blessing I petitioned for; and that with a contrition so deep, that I deserved not, were it known, to be turned over from the tender nature of a mother, to the upbraiding pen of an uncle! and to be wounded by a cruel question, put by him in a shocking manner; and which a little, a very little time, will better answer than I can: for I am not either a hardened or shameless creature; if I were, I should not have been so solicitous to obtain the favour I sued for.

And permit me to say, that I asked it, as well for my father and mother's sake, as for my own; for I am sure, they at least will be uneasy, after I am gone, that they refused it to me.

I should still be glad to have theirs and yours, Sir, and all your blessings, and your prayers: but denied in such a manner, I will not presume again to ask it: relying entirely on the Almighty's; which is never denied, when supplicated for with such true penitence as I hope mine is.

God preserve my dear uncle, and all my my honoured friend: I prays your unhappy

CL. HARLOWE.

LETTER XLIII.

MISS HOWE, TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

YARMOUTH, ISLE OF WIGHT, MONDAY, AUG. 7.

MY DEAREST CREATURE,

I Can write but juſt now a few lines. I cannot tell how to bear the ſound of that Mr. Belford for your executor, cogent as your reaſons for that meaſure are: and yet I am firmly of opinion, that none of your relations ſhould be named for the truſt. But I dwell the leſs upon this ſubject, as I hope (and cannot bear to apprehend the contrary) that you will ſtill live many, many years.

Mr. Hickman, indeed, ſpeaks very handſomely of Mr. Belford. But he, poor man! has not much penetration.—If he had, he would hardly think ſo well of me as he does.

I have a particular opportunity of ſending this by a friend of my aunt Harman's; who is ready to ſet out for London, (and this occaſions my hurry) and is to return out of hand. I expect, therefore, by him a large packet from you; and hope and long for news of your amended health: which Heaven grant to the prayers of your ever-affectionate

ANNA HOWE.

LETTER XLIV.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

FRIDAY AUG. 11.

I Will ſend you a large packet, as you deſire and expect; ſince I can do it by ſo ſafe a conveyance: but not all that is come to my hand—For I muſt own that my friends are very ſevere;—too ſevere for any-body who loves them not, to ſee their letters. You, my dear, would not call them my friends, you ſaid, long ago; but my relations: indeed I cannot call them my relations, I think!—But I am ill; and therefore perhaps more peeviſh than I ſhould be. It is difficult to go out of ourſelves, to give a judgment againſt ourſelves; and yet, oftentimes, to paſs a juſt judgment, we ought.

I thought I ſhould alarm you in the choice of my executor. But the ſad neceſſity I am reduced to muſt excuſe me.

I ſhall not repeat any-thing I have ſaid before on that ſubject: but if your objections will not be anſwered to your ſatisfaction by the papers and letters I ſhall incloſe, marked 1, 2, 3, 4, to 9, I muſt think myſelf in another inſtance unhappy; ſince I am engaged too far (and with my own judgment too) to recede.

As Mr. Belford has tranſcribed for me, in confidence, from his friend's letters, the paſſages which accompany this, I muſt inſiſt, that you ſuffer no ſoul but yourſelf to peruſe them; and that you return them by the very firſt opportunity; that ſo no uſe may be made of them that may do hurt either to the original writer, or to the communicator. You'll obſerve I am bound by promiſe to this care. If through my means any miſchief ſhould ariſe, between this inhumane and that inhuman libertine, I ſhould think myſelf utterly inexcuſeable.

I ſubjoin a liſt of the papers or letters I ſhall incloſe. You muſt return them all when peruſed*.

I am very much tired and fatigued—with—I don't know what—with writing, I think—But moſt with myſelf, and with a ſituation I cannot help aſpiring to get out of, and above!

O my dear! the world we live in is a ſad, a very ſad world!—While under our parents protecting wings, we know nothing at all of it. Book-learned and a ſcribbler, and looking at people as I ſaw them as viſitors or viſiting, I thought I knew a great deal of it. Pitiable ignorance!—Alas! I knew nothing at all!

* 1. A letter from Miſs Montague, dated - - - - - - - - - - Aug. 1.
2. A copy of my anſwer - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - Aug. 3.
3. Mr. Belford's letter to me, which will ſhew you what my requeſt was to him, and his compliance with it; and the deſired extracts from his friend's letters - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

With studious wishes for happiness, and the happiness of every one dear to you, I am, and will ever be, your gratefully affectionate,&c. CL. HARLOWE.

LETTER XLV.

MR. ANTONY HARLOWE, TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

[IN REPLY TO HERS TO HER UNCLE HARLOWE, OF THURSDAY, AUG. 10.]

AUG. 12.

UNHAPPY GIRL!

AS your uncle Harlowe chuses not to answer your pert letter to him; and as mine written to you before, was written as if it were in the spirit of prophecy, as you have found to your sorrow; and as you are now making yourself worse than you are in your health, and better than you are in your penitence, as we are very well assured, in order to move compassion; which you do not deserve, having had so much warning: for all these reasons, I take up my pen once more; though I had told your brother, at his going to Edinburgh, that I would not write to you, even were you to write to me, without letting him know. So indeed had we all; for he prognosticated what would happen, as to your applying to us, when you knew not how to help it.

Brother John has hurt your niceness, it seems, by asking you a plain question, which your mother's heart is too full of grief to let her ask; and modesty will not let your sister ask, though but the consequence of your actions—And yet it must be answered, before you'll obtain from your father and mother, and us, the notice you hope for, I can tell you that.

You lived several guilty weeks with one of the vilest fellows that ever drew breath, at bed, as well as board, no doubt, (for is not his character known?) and pray don't be ashamed to be asked after what may naturally come of such free living. This modesty, indeed, would have become you for eighteen years of your life—You'll be pleased to mark that—But makes no good figure compared with your behaviour since the beginning of April last. So pray don't take it up, and wipe your mouth upon it, as if nothing had happened.

But, may-be, I likewise am too shocking to your niceness!—O girl, girl! your modesty had better been shewn at the right time and place!—Every-body but you believed what the rake was. But you would believe nothing bad of him—What think you now?

Your folly has ruined all our peace. And who knows where it may yet end? Your poor father but yesterday shewed me this text—With bitter grief he shewed it me, poor man:—and do you lay it to your heart:

'A father waketh for his daughter, 'when no man knoweth; and the care 'for her taketh away his sleep—When 'she is young, lest she pass away the 'flower of her age:'—[and you know what proposals were made to you at different times]—'and, being married, lest she should 'be hated: in her virginity, lest she 'should be defiled, and gotten with child 'in her father's house:'—[I don't make 'the words, mind that]—'and, having an 'husband, lest she should misbehave her-'self.'—And what follows?—'Keep a sure 'watch over a shameless daughter,'—[yet no watch could hold you!]—'lest she 'make thee a laughing stock to thine 'enemies,' [as you have made us all to this cursed Lovelace] 'and a bye-word in the 'city, and a reproach among the people, 'and make thee ashamed before the mul-'titude.' Ecclus. xlii. 9, 10, &c.

Now will you wish you had not written pertly. Your sister's severities!—Never, girl, say that is severe, that is deserved. You know the meaning of words. Nobody better. Would to the Lord you had acted up but to one half of what you know! Then had we not been disappointed and grieved, as we all have been: and nobody more than him who was your loving uncle,

ANTONY HARLOWE.

This will be with you to-morrow. Perhaps you may be suffered to have some part of your estate, after you have smarted a little more. Your pertly-answered uncle John, who is your trustee, will not have you be destitute. But we hope all is not true that we hear of you.—Only take care, I advise you, that, bad as you have acted, you act not still worse, if it be possible to act worse. Improve upon the hint.

LETTER XLVI.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO ANTONY HARLOWE, ESQ.

SUNDAY AUG. 13.

HONOURED SIR,

I Am very sorry for my pert letter to my uncle Harlowe. Yet I did not intend it to be pert. People new to misfortune fortune may be too eaſily moved to impatience.

The fall of a regular perſon, no doubt, is dreadful and inexcuſable. It is like the ſin of apoſtaſy. Would to Heaven, however, that I had had the circumſtances of mine enquired into!

If, Sir, I make myſelf worſe than I am in my health, and better than I am in my penitence, it is fit I ſhould be puniſhed for my double diſſimulation: and you have the pleaſure of being one of my puniſhers. My ſincerity, in both reſpects, will, however, be beſt juſtified by the event. To that I refer.—May Heaven give you always as much comfort in reflecting upon the reprobation I have met with, as you ſeem to have pleaſure in mortifying a poor creature, extremely mortified; and that from a right ſenſe, as ſhe preſumes to hope, of her own fault!

What you have heard of me I cannot tell. When the neareſt and deareſt relations give up an unhappy wretch, it is not to be wondered at, that thoſe who are not related to her are ready to take up and propagate ſlanders againſt her. Yet I think I may defy calumny itſelf, and (excepting the fatal, though involuntary ſtep of April 10) wrap myſelf in my own innocence, and be eaſy. I thank you, Sir, nevertheleſs, for your caution, mean it what it will.

As to the queſtion required of me to anſwer, and which is allowed to be too ſhocking either for a mother to put to a daughter, or a ſiſter to a ſiſter; and which, however, you ſay I muſt anſwer—O Sir!—And muſt I anſwer?—This then be my anſwer:—'A little time, a much 'leſs time than is imagined, will afford 'a more ſatisfactory anſwer to my whole 'family, and even to my brother and ſiſter, 'than I can give in words.'

Nevertheleſs, be pleaſed to let it be remembered that I did not petition for a reſtoration to favour. I could not hope for that. Nor yet to be put in poſſeſſion of any part of my own eſtate. Nor even for means of neceſſary ſubſiſtence from the produce of that eſtate—But only for a bleſſing; for a laſt bleſſing!

And this I will further add, becauſe it is true, that I have no wilful crime to charge againſt myſelf: no free living at bed and at board, as you phraſe it!

Why, why, Sir, were not other enquiries made of me, as well as this ſhocking one?—Enquiries that modeſty would have permitted a mother or a ſiſter to make; and, which, if I may be excuſed to ſay ſo, would have been [illegible] proper, and more charitable, to [illegible] been made by them, (were the matter forbidden, or the ſiſter not [illegible] to make them) than thoſe they have made.

Although my humble application has brought upon me ſo much ſevere reproach, I repent not that I have written to my mother; (although I cannot but wiſh that I had not written to my ſiſter) becauſe I have ſatisfied a dutiful conſciouſneſs by it, however unanſwered by the wiſhed-for ſucceſs. Nevertheleſs, I cannot help ſaying, that mine is indeed a hard fate, that I cannot beg pardon for my capital error, without doing it in ſuch terms, as ſhall be an aggravation of the offence.

But I had beſt leave off, leſt, as my full mind, I find, is riſing to my pen, I have other pardons to beg as I multiply lines, where none will be given.

God Almighty bleſs, preſerve, and comfort my dear ſorrowing and grievouſly offended father and mother!—And continue in honour, favour, and merit, my happy ſiſter! May God forgive my brother, and protect him from the violence of his own temper, as well as from the deſtroyer of his ſiſter's honour!—And may you, my dear uncle, and you no leſs now than ever dear brother, my ſecond papa, as he uſed to bid me call him, be bleſſed and happy in them, and in each other!—And, in order to this, may you all ſpeedily baniſh from your remembrance for ever the unhappy

CLARISSA HARLOWE.

LETTER XLVII.

MRS. NORTON, TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

MONDAY AUG. 14.

ALL your friends here, my dear young lady, now ſeem ſet upon propoſing to you to go to one of the plantations. This, I believe, is owing to ſome miſrepreſentations of Mr. Brand; from whom they have received a letter.

I wiſh, with all my heart, that you could, conſiſtently with your own notions of honour, yield to the preſſing requeſt of all Mr. Lovelace's family in his behalf. This, I think, would ſtop every mouth, and, in time, reconcile everybody to you. For your own friends will not believe that he is in earneſt to marry you; and the hatred between the families is ſuch, that they will not condeſcend to inform themſelves better; nor would believe him, if he were ever ſo ſolemnly to avow that he is.

I ſhould be very glad to have in readineſs, upon occaſion, ſome brief particulars of your ſad ſtory under your own hand. But let me tell you, at the ſame time, that no miſrepreſentation, nor even your own confeſſion, ſhall leſſen my opinion either of your piety, or of your prudence in eſſential points; becauſe I know it was always your humble way to make lighe faults heavy againſt yourſelf: and well might you, my deareſt young lady, aggravate your own failings, who ever had ſo few; and thoſe few ſo ſlight, that your ingenuouſneſs has turned moſt of them into excellences.

Nevertheleſs, let me adviſe you, my dear Miſs Clary, to diſcountenance any viſits, which, with the cenſorious, may affect your character. As that has not hitherto ſuffered by your wilful default, I hope you will not, in a deſponding negligence, (ſatisfying yourſelf with a conſciouſneſs of your own innocence) permit it to ſuffer. Difficult ſituations, you know, my dear young lady, are the teſts not only of prudence, but of virtue.

I think, I muſt own to you, that, ſince Mr. Brand's letter has been received, I have a renewed prohibition to attend you. However, if you will give me leave, that ſhall not detain me from you. Nor would I ſtay for that leave, if I were not in hopes, that in this critical ſituation I may be able to do you ſervice here.

I have often had meſſages and enquiries after your health from the truly reverend Dr. Lewen, who has always expreſſed, and ſtill expreſſes, infinite concern for you. He entirely diſapproves of the meaſures of the family with regard to you. He is too much indiſpoſed to go abroad. But, were he in good health, he would not, as I underſtand, viſit at Harlowe Place; having ſome time ſince been unhandſomely treated by your brother, on his offering to mediate for you with your family.

I AM juſt now informed, that your couſin Morden is arrived in England. He is at Canterbury, it ſeems, looking after ſome concerns he has there; and is ſoon expected in theſe parts. Who knows what may ariſe from his arrival?—God be with you, my deareſt Miſs Clary, and be your comforter and ſuſtainer. And never fear but he will; for I am ſure, I am very ſure, that you put your whole truſt in Him.

And what, after all, is this world, on which we ſo much depend for durable good, poor creatures that we are!—When all the joys of it, and (what is a balancing comfort) all the troubles of it, are but momentary, and vaniſh like a morning dream!

And be this remembered, my deareſt young lady, that worldly joys claim no kindred with the joys we are bid to aſpire after. Theſe latter we muſt be fitted for by affliction and diſappointment. You are therefore in the direct road to glory, however thorny the path you are in. And I had almoſt ſaid, that it depends upon yourſelf, by your patience, and by your reſignedneſs to the diſpenſation, (God enabling you, who never fails the true penitent, and ſincere invoker) to be an heir of a bleſſed immortality.

But this glory, I humbly pray, that you may not be permitted to enter into, ripe as you are ſo ſoon likely to be for it, till with your gentle hand (a pleaſure I have ſo often, as you know, promiſed to myſelf) you have cloſed the eyes of your maternally affectionate

JUDITH NORTON.

LETTER XLVIII.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MRS. NORTON.

THURSDAY, AUG. 17.

WHAT Mr. Brand, or any-body can have written or ſaid to my prejudice, I cannot imagine; and yet ſome evil reports have gone out againſt me; as I find by ſome hints, in a very ſevere letter written to me by my uncle Antony. Such a letter as I believe was never written to any poor creature, who, by ill health of body, as well as mind, was before tottering on the brink of the grave. But my friends may poſſibly be better juſtified than the reporters—For who knows what they may have heard?

You give me a kind caution, which ſeems to imply more than you expreſs, when you adviſe me againſt countenancing viſitors that may diſcredit me. You ſhould, in ſo tender a point, my dear Mrs. Norton, have ſpoken quite out. Surely, I have had afflictions enough to ſtrengthen my mind, and to enable it to bear the worſt that can now happen. But I will not puzzle myſelf by conjectured evils; as I might perhaps do, if I had not enough that were certain. I ſhall hear all, when it is thought proper that I ſhould. Mean time, let me ſay, for your ſatisfaction, that I know not that I have any-thing criminal or diſreputable to anſwer for, either in word or deed, ſince the fatal 10th of April laſt.

You deſire an account of what paſſes between me and my friends; and alſo particulars, or brief heads, of my ſad ſtory, in order to ſerve me as occaſions ſhall offer. My dear good Mrs. Norton, you ſhall have a whole packet of papers, which I have ſent to my Miſs Howe, when ſhe returns them; and you ſhall have likewiſe another packet, (and that with this letter) which I cannot at preſent think of ſending to that dear friend, for the ſake of my own relations; whom, without ſeeing that packet, ſhe is but too ready to cenſure heavily. From theſe you will be able to collect a great deal of my ſtory. But for what is previous to theſe papers, and which more particularly relates to what I have ſuffered from Mr. Lovelace, you muſt have patience; for at preſent I have neither head nor heart for ſuch ſubjects. The papers I ſend you with this, will be thoſe mentioned in the margin*. You muſt reſtore them to me as ſoon as peruſed; and upon your honour make no uſe of them, or of any intelligence you have from me, but by my previous conſent.

Theſe communications you muſt not, my good Mrs. Norton, look upon as appeals againſt my relations. On the contrary, I am heartily ſorry, that they have incurred the diſpleaſure of ſo excellent a divine as Dr. Lewen. But you deſire to have every thing before you: and, I think you ought; for who knows, as you ſay, but you may be applied to at laſt to adminiſter comfort from their conceding hearts, to one that wants it; and who ſometimes judging by what ſhe knows of her own heart, thinks herſelf entitled to it?

I know that I have a moſt indulgent and ſweet-tempered mother; but having to deal with violent ſpirits, ſhe has too often forfeited that peace of mind which ſhe ſo much prefers, by her over-concern to preſerve it.

I am ſure ſhe would not have turned me over for an anſwer to a letter written with ſo contrite and ſervent a ſpirit, as was mine to her, to a moſtuſing ſpirit, had ſhe been left to herſelf.

But, my dear Mrs. Norton, might not, think you, the revered lady have favoured me with one private line? If not, might not you have written by her order, or connivance, one ſoftening, one motherly line, when ſhe ſaw her poor girl, whom once ſhe dearly loved, borne ſo hard upon?

O no, ſhe might not!—Becauſe her heart, to be ſure, is in their meaſures!—And if ſhe think them right, perhaps they muſt be right!—At leaſt knowing only what they know, they muſt!—And yet they might know all, if they would!—And poſſibly, in their own good time, they think to make proper enquiry.—My application was made to them but lately.—Yet how deeply will it afflict them, if their time ſhould be out of time!

When you have before you the letters I have ſent to Miſs Howe, you will ſee, that Lord M. and the ladies of his family, jealous as they are of the honour of their houſe, (to expreſs myſelf in their language) think better of me than my own relations do. You will ſee an inſtance of their generoſity to me, which, at the time, extremely affected me, and indeed ſtill affects me. Unhappy man! gay, inconſiderate, and cruel! What has been his gain, by making unhappy a creature who hoped to make him happy! And who was determined to deſerve the love of all to whom he is related!—Poor man!—But you will miſtake a compaſſionate and placable nature, for love!—He took care, great care, that I ſhould rein-in betimes any paſſion that I might have had for him, had he known how to be but commonly grateful or generous!—But the Almighty knows what is beſt for his poor creatures.

Some of the letters in the ſame packet will alſo let you into the knowledge of a ſtrange ſtep which I have taken, (ſtrange you will think it;) and at the ſame time, give you my reaſons for taking it.

It muſt be expected, that ſituations uncommonly difficult, will make ne-ceſſary ſome extraordinary ſteps, which, but for thoſe ſituations, would be hardly excuſeable. It will be very happy indeed, and ſomewhat wonderful, if all the meaſures I have been driven to take ſhould be right. A pure intention, void of all undutiful reſentment, is what muſt be my conſolation, whatever others may think of thoſe meaſures, when they come to know them: which, however, will hardly be, till it is out of my power to juſtify them, or to anſwer for myſelf.

I am glad to hear of my couſin Morden's ſafe arrival. I ſhould wiſh to ſee him, methinks; but I am afraid, that he will ſail with the ſtream, as it muſt be expected, that he will hear what they have to ſay firſt.—But what I moſt fear, is, that he will take upon himſelf to avenge me—Rather than he ſhould do ſo, I would have him look upon me as a creature utterly unworthy of his concern; at leaſt of his vindictive concern.

How ſoothing to the wounded heart of your Clariſſa, how balmy, are the aſſurances of your continued love and favour!—love me, my dear mamma Norton, continue to love me, to the end!—I now think that I may, without preſumption, promiſe to deſerve your love to the end. And when I am gone, cheriſh my memory in your worthy heart; for in ſo doing you will cheriſh the memory of one who loves and honours you more than ſhe can expreſs.

But when I am no more, get over, I charge you, as ſoon as you can, the ſmarting pangs of grief that will attend a recent loſs; and let all be early turned into that ſweetly melancholy regard to MEMORY, which, engaging us to forget all faults, and to remember nothing but what was thought amiable, gives more pleaſure than pain to ſurvivors—Eſpecially if they can comfort themſelves with the humble hope, that Divine mercy has taken the dear departed to itſelf.

And what is the ſpace of time to look backward upon, between an early departure, and the longeſt ſurvivance!—And what the conſo ation attending the ſweet hope of meeting again, never more to be ſeparated, never more to be pained, grieved, or aſperſed;—but mutually bleſſing, and being bleſſed, to all eternity!

In the contemplation of this happy ſtate, in which I hope, in God's good time, to rejoice with you, my beloved Mrs. Norton, and alſo with my dear relations, all reconciled to, and bleſſing the child againſt whom they are now ſo much incenſed, I conclude myſelf your ever-dutiful and affectionate

CLARISSA HARLOWE.

LETTER XLIX.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

SUNDAY, AUG. 15.

I Don't know what a devil ails me; but I never was ſo much indiſpoſed in my life. At firſt, I thought ſome of my bleſſed relations here had got a doſe adminiſtered to me, in order to get the whole houſe to themſelves. But, as I am the hopes of the family, I believe they would not be ſo wicked.

I muſt lay down my pen. I cannot write with any ſpirit at all. What a plague can be the matter with me!

LORD M. paid me juſt now a curſed gloomy viſit, to aſk how I do after bleeding. His ſiſters both drove away yeſterday, God be thanked. But they aſked not my leave; and hardly bid me good-bye. My lord was more tender, and more dutiful, than I expected. Men are leſs unforgiving than women. I have reaſon to ſay ſo, I am ſure. For, beſid s implacable Miſs Harlowe, and the old ladies, the two Mantague apes han't been near me yet.

NEITHER eat, drink, nor ſleep!—A piteouſe caſe, Jack! If I ſhould die like a fool now, people would ſay Miſs Harlowe had broken my heart.—That ſhe vexes me to the heart, is certain.

Confounded ſqueamiſh! I would fain write it off. But muſt lay down my pen again. It won't do. Poor Lovelace!—What a devil ails thee?

WELL, but now let's try for't—Hoy—Hoy—Hoy! Confound me for a gaping puppy, how I yawn!—Where ſhall I begin? At thy executorſhip—Thou ſhalt have a double office of it: for I really think thou mayſt ſend me a coffin and a ſhroud. I ſhall be ready for them by the time they can come down.

What a little fool is this Miſs Harlowe! I warrant ſhe'll now repent that ſhe refuſed me. Such a lovely young widow—What a charming widow would ſhe have made! How would ſhe have adorned the weeds! To be a widow in the firſt twelve months is one of the greateſt felicities that can befal a fine woman. Such pretty employment in new diſmals, when ſhe had hardly worn round her her blazing joyfuls! Such lights, and such shades! how would they set off one another, and be adorned by the wearer!

'Go to the devil!—I will write!—'Can I do any-thing else?'

They would not have me write, Belford.—I must be ill indeed, when I can't write.

But thou seemest nettled, Jack! Is it because I was stung? It is not for two friends, any more than for man and wife, to be out of patience at one time.—What must be the consequence if they are?—I am in no fighting mood just now: but as patient and passive as the chickens that are brought me in broth—For I am come to that already.

But I can tell thee, for all this, be thy own man, if thou wilt, as to the executorship, I will never suffer thee to expose my letters. They are too ingenuous by half to be seen. And I absolutely insist upon it, that, on receipt of this, thou burn them all.

I will never forgive thee that impudent and unfriendly reflection, of my cavaliering it here over half a dozen persons of distinction: remember, to, thy words poor helpless orphan—These reflections are too serious, and thou art also too serious, for me to let these things go off as jesting; notwithstanding the Roman style is preserved; and, indeed, but just preserved. But by my soul, Jack, if I had not been taken thus egregiously cropsick, I would have been up with thee, and the lady too, before now.

But write on, however: and send me copies, if thou canst, of all that passes between our Charlotte and Miss Harlowe. I'll take no notice of what thou communicatest of that sort. I like not the people here the worse for their generous offer to the lady. But you see she is as proud, as implacable. There's no obliging her. She'd rather sell her cloaths, than be beholden to any-body, although she would oblige by permitting the obligation.

Oh Lord! Oh Lord!—Mortal ill—Adieu, Jack!

I WAS forced to leave off, I was so ill, at this place. And what dost think! Why Lord M. brought the parson of the parish to pray by me; for his chaplain is at Oxford. I was lain down in my night-gown over my waistcoat, and in a doze: and, when I opened my eyes, who should I see, but the parson, kneeling on one side the bed; Lord M. on the other; Mrs. Greme, who had been sent for to nurse me, as they call it, at the feet! 'God 'be thanked, my lord!' said I, in an extasy.—'Where's Miss!'—For I supposed they were going to marry me.

They thought me delirious, at first, and prayed louder and louder.

This rouzed me: off the bed I started; slid my feet into my slippers; put my hand in my waistcoat pocket, and pulled out thy letter with my beloved's meditation in it: 'My lord — Dr. 'Wright — Mrs. Greme — you have 'thought me a very wicked fellow: 'but see! I can read you as good as 'you can read me.'

They stared at one another. I gaped, and read, 'Poor mo-or-tals the cau-o-'ause of their own—their own mis-fer-'ry.'

It is as suitable to my case, as to the lady's, as thou'lt observe, if thou readest it again. At the passage where it is said, That when a man is chastened for sin, his beauty consumes away, I stept to the glass, 'A poor figure, by Jupiter!' cried I.—And they all praised and admired me; lifted up their hands and their eyes: and the doctor said, he always thought it impossible, that a man of my sense could be so wild as the world said I was. My lord chuckled for joy; congratulated me; and, thank my dear Miss Harlowe, I got high reputation among good, bad, and indifferent. In short, I have established myself for ever with all here.—But, O Belford, even this will not do!—I must leave off again.

A VISIT from the Montague sisters, led in by the hobbling peer to congratulate my amendment and reformation both in one. What a lucky event this illness with this meditation in my pocket; for we were all to pieces before! Thus, when a boy, have I joined with a crowd coming out of church, and have been thought to have been there myself.

I am incensed at the insolence of the young Levite. Thou wilt highly oblige me, if thou'lt find him out, and send me his ears in the next letter.

My beloved mistakes me, if she thinks I proposed her writing to me as an alternative that should dispense with my attendance upon her. That it shall not do, nor did I intend it should, unless she had pleased me better in the contents of her letter than she has done.

Bid

bid her read again. I gave no such leave. I would have been with her in spite of you both, by to-morrow, at farthest, had I not been laid by the heels thus, like a helpless miscreant.

But I grow better and better every hour, I say: the doctor says not? but I am sure I know best: and I will soon be in London, depend on't. But say nothing of this to my dear, cruel, and implacable Miss Harlowe.

A—dieu—u, Ja—aack—What a gaping puppy (Yaw—n! yaw—n! yaw—n!) ails

LOVELACE!

LETTER L.

MR. BELFORD, TO ROBERT LOVELACE, ESQ.

MONDAY, AUG. 14.

I Am extremely concerned for thy illness. I should be very sorry to lose thee. Yet, if thou dieſt ſo ſoon, I could wiſh, from my ſoul, it had been before the beginning of laſt April: and this as well for thy ſake, as for the ſake of the moſt excellent woman in the world: for then thou wouldſt not have had the moſt crying ſin of thy life to anſwer for.

I was told on Saturday, that thou wert very much out of order; and this made me forbear writing till I heard further. Harry, on his return from thee, confirmed the bad way thou art in. But I hope Lord M. in his unmerited tenderneſs for thee, thinks the worſt of thee. What can it be, Bob? A violent fever, they ſay; but attended with odd and ſevere ſymptoms.

I will not trouble thee, in the way thou art in, with what paſſes here with Miſs Harlowe. I wiſh thy repentance as ſwift as thy illneſs: and as efficacious, if thou dieſt; for it is elſe to be feared, that ſhe and you will never meet in one place.

I told her how ill you are. 'Poor 'man!' ſaid ſhe. 'Dangerouſly ill, ſay 'you?'

'Dangerouſly indeed, Madam!—So 'Lord M. ſends me word!'

'God be merciful to him, if he die!' —ſaid the admirable creature.—Then, after a pauſe, 'Poor wretch!—May 'he meet with the mercy he has not 'ſhewn!'

I ſend this by a ſpecial meſſenger: for I am impatient to hear how it goes with thee.—If I have received thy laſt letter, what melancholy reflections will that laſt, ſo full of ſhocking levity, give to thy true friend,

JOHN BELFORD!

LETTER LI.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

TUESDAY, AUG. 15.

THANK thee, Jack; moſt heartily I thank thee, for the ſober concluſion of thy laſt!—I have a good mind, for the ſake of it, to forgive thy till-now abſolutely unpardonable extracts.

But doſt think I will loſe ſuch an angel, ſuch a forgiving angel, as this?—By my ſoul, I will not!—To pray for mercy for ſuch an ungrateful miſcreant!—How ſhe wounds me, how ſhe cuts me to the ſoul, by her exalted generoſity!—But SHE muſt have mercy upon me firſt!—Then will ſhe teach me a reliance for the ſake of which her prayer for me will be anſwered.

But haſten, haſten to me, particulars of her health, of her employments, of her converſation.

I am ſick only of love!—O that I could have called her mine!—It would then have been worth while to be ſick!—To have ſent for her down to me from town; and to have had her, with healing in her dove-like wings, flying to my comfort; her duty and her choice to pray for me, and to bid me live for her ſake!—O Jack! what an angel have I—

But I have not loſt her!—I will not loſe her! I am almoſt well; ſhould be quite well, but for theſe preſcribing raſcals, who to do credit to their ſkill, will make the diſeaſe of importance.—And I will make her mine!—And be ſick again; to entitle myſelf to her dutiful tenderneſs, and pious as well as perſonal concern!

God for ever bleſs her!—Haſten, haſten particulars of her!—I am ſick of love!—Such generous goodneſs!—By all that's great and good I will not loſe her!—So tell her!—She ſays, that ſhe could not pity me, if ſhe thought of being mine! This, according to Miſs Howe's tranſcriptions to Charlotte.—But bid her hate me, and have me: and my behaviour to her ſhall ſoon turn that hate to love!—For, body and mind, I will be wholly hers.

LETTER

LETTER LII.

MR. BELFORD, TO ROBERT LOVELACE, ESQ.

THURSDAY, AUG. 17.

I Am ſincerely rejoiced to hear that thou art already ſo much amended, as thy ſervant tells me thou art. Thy letter looks as if thy morals were mending with thy health. This was a letter I could ſhew, as I did, to the lady.

She is very ill: (Curſed letters received from her implacable family!) ſo I could not have much converſation with her, in thy favour, upon it.—But what paſſed will make thee more and more adore her.

She was very attentive to me, as I read it; and, when I had done, 'Poor 'man!' ſaid ſhe, 'what a letter is this! 'He had timely inſtances, that my tem- 'per was not ungenerous, if generoſity 'could have obliged him! But his re- 'morſe, and that for his own ſake, is all 'the puniſhment I wiſh him.—Yet I 'muſt be more reſerved, if you write to 'him every-thing I ſay!'

I extolled her unbounded goodneſs —How could I help it, though to her face!

No goodneſs in it! ſhe ſaid—It was a frame of mind ſhe had endeavoured after, for her own ſake. She ſuffered too much in want of mercy, not to wiſh it to a penitent heart.—'He ſeems to be 'penitent,' ſaid ſhe; 'and it is not for 'me to judge beyond appearances.—If 'he be not, he deceives himſelf more 'than any-body elſe.'

She was ſo ill, that this was all that paſſed on the occaſion.

What a fine ſubject for tragedy would the injuries of this lady, and her behaviour under them, both with regard to her implacable friends, and to her perſecutor, make! What a grand objection as to the moral, nevertheleſs; for here virtue is puniſhed! Except indeed we look forward to the rewards of HEREAFTER, which morally, ſhe muſt be ſure of, or who can? Yet, after all, I know not, ſo ſad a fellow art thou, and ſo vile an huſband mighteſt thou have made, whether her virtue is not rewarded in miſſing thee: for things the moſt grievous to human nature, when they happen, as this charming creature once obſerved, are often the happieſt for us in the event.

I have frequently thought, in my attendance on this lady, That if Belton's admired author, Nick Rowe, had had ſuch a character before him, he would have drawn another ſort of a Penitent than he has done, or given his play, which he calls The Fair Penitent, a better title. Miſs Harlowe is a penitent indeed! I think, if I am not guilty of a contradiction in terms; a penitent without a fault; her parents conduct towards her from the firſt conſidered.

The whole ſtory of the other is a pack of damned ſtuff. Lothario, 'tis true, ſeems ſuch another wicked ungenerous varlet as thou knoweſt who: the author knew how to draw a rake; but not to paint a penitent. Califta is a deſiring luſcious wench, and her penitence is nothing elſe but rage, inſolence, and ſcorn. Her paſſions are all ſtorm and tumult; nothing of the finer paſſions of the ſex, which, if naturally drawn, will diſtinguiſh themſelves from the maſculine paſſions, by a ſoftneſs that will even ſhine through rage and deſpair. Her character is made up of deceit and diſguiſe. She has no virtue; is all pride; and her devil is as much within her, as without her.

How then can the fall of ſuch a one create a proper diſtreſs, when all the circumſtances of it are conſidered? For does ſhe not brazen out her crime, even after detection? Knowing her own guilt, ſhe calls for Altamont's vengeance on his beſt friend, as if he had traduced her; yields to marry Altamont, though criminal with another; and actually beds that whining puppy, when ſhe had given up herſelf body and ſoul to Lothario; who, nevertheleſs, refuſed to marry her.

Her penitence, when begun, ſhe juſtly ſtiles The phrenzy of her ſoul; and, as I ſaid, after having, as long as ſhe could, moſt audaciouſly brazened out her crime, and done all the miſchief ſhe could do, (occaſioning the death of Lothario, of her father, and others) ſhe ſtabs herſelf.

And can this be an act of penitence?

But, indeed, our poets hardly know how to create a diſtreſs without horror, murder, and ſuicide; and muſt ſhock your ſoul, to bring tears from your eyes.

Altamont, indeed, who is an amorous blockhead, a credulous cuckold, and (though painted as a brave fellow, and a ſoldier) a mere Tom Eſſence, and a quarreller with his beſt friend, dies like a fool, (as we are led to ſuppoſe at the concluſion of the play) without either ſword or pop-gun, of mere grief and nonſenſe, for one of the vileſt of her ſex: but the Fair Penitent, as ſhe is called, periſhes by her own hand; and, having having all their past crimes to laudable piety, forfeits all claim to true penitence, and, in all probability, to future mercy.

But here is Miss CLARISSA HARLOWE, a virtuous, noble, wise, and pious young lady; who being ill-used by her friends, and unhappily ensnared by a vile libertine, whom she believes to be a man of honour, is in a manner forced to throw herself upon his protection. And he, in order to obtain her confidence, never scruples the deepest and most solemn protestations of honour.

After a series of plots and contrivances, all baffled by her virtue and vigilance, he basely has recourse to the vilest of arts, and to rob her of her honour, is forced first to rob her of her senses.

Unable to bring her, notwithstanding, to his ungenerous views of cohabitation, she over-awes him in the very entrance of a fresh act of premeditated guilt, in presence of the most abandoned of women assembled to assist his devilish purpose; triumphs over them all, by virtue only of her innocence; and escapes from the vile hands he had put her into.

She nobly, not frantickly, resents: refuses to see, or to marry the wretch; who, repenting his usage of so divine a creature, would fain move her to forgive his baseness, and make him her husband: and this, though persecuted by all her friends, and abandoned to the deepest distress, being obliged, from ample fortunes, to make away with her apparel for subsistence; surrounded also by strangers, and forced (in want of others) to make a friend of the friend of her seducer.

Though longing for death, and making all proper preparations for it, convinced that grief and ill-usage have broken her noble heart, she abhors the impious thought of shortening her allotted period; and, as much a stranger to revenge as despair, is able to forgive the author of her ruin; wishes his repentance, and that she may be the last victim to his barbarous perfidy: and is solicitous for nothing so much in this life, as to prevent vindictive mischief to and from the man who used her basely.

This is penitence!—This is piety!—And hence a distress naturally arises, that must earthly affect every heart.

Whatever the ill-usage of this excellent woman is from her relations, she breaks not out into excesses: she strives, on the contrary, to find reason to justify them at her expence; and seems more concerned for their cruelty to her for their sakes hereafter, when she shall be no more, than for her own: for, as to herself, she is sure, she says, God will forgive her, though no one on earth will.

On every extraordinary provocation she has recourse to the Scriptures, and endeavours to regulate her vehemence by sacred precedents. Better people, she says, have been more afflicted than she, grievous as she sometimes thinks her afflictions: and shall she not bear what less faulty persons have borne?—On the very occasion I have mentioned, (some new instances of implacableness from her friends) the inclosed meditation will shew, how mildly, and yet how forcibly she complains. See if thou, in the wicked levity of thy heart, canst apply it to thy case, as thou didst the other. If thou canst not, give way to thy conscience, and that will make the properest application.

'MEDITATION.

'HOW long will ye vex my soul, and break me in pieces with words!

'Be it indeed that I have erred, mine error remaineth with myself.

'To her that is afflicted, pity should be shewn from her friend.

'But she that is ready to slip with her feet, is as a lamp despised in the thought of them that are at ease.

'There is a shame which bringeth sin, and there is a shame which bringeth glory and grace.

'Have pity upon me, have pity upon me, O ye my friends! for the hand of God hath touched me.

'If your soul were in my soul's stead, I also could speak as ye do, I could heap up words against you.

'But I would strengthen you with my mouth, and the moving of my lips should assuage your grief.

'Why will ye break a leaf driven to and fro? Why will ye pursue the dry stubble?

'Why will ye write bitter words against me, and make me possess the iniquities of my youth?

'Mercy is seasonable in the time of affliction, as clouds of rain in the time of drought.

'Are not my days few? Cease, then, and let me alone, that I may take comfort a little—Before I go whence I shall not return; even to the land of darkness, and shadow of death!'

Let me add, that the excellent lady is informed by a letter from Mrs. Norton, that Colonel Morden is juſt arrived in England. He is now the only perſon ſhe wiſhes to ſee.

I expreſſed ſome jealouſy upon it, leſt he ſhould have place given over me in the executorſhip. She ſaid, That ſhe had no thoughts to do ſo now; becauſe ſuch a truſt, were he to accept of it, (which ſhe doubted) might, from the nature of ſome of the papers which in that caſe would neceſſarily paſs through his hands, occaſion miſchiefs between my friend and him, that would be worſe than death for her to think of.

Poor Belton, I hear, is at death's door. A meſſenger is juſt come from him, who tells me, He cannot die till he ſees me. I hope the poor fellow will not go off yet; ſince neither his affairs in this world, nor for the other, are in tolerable order. I cannot avoid going to the poor man. Yet am unwilling to ſtir, till I have an aſſurance from you, that you will not diſturb the lady: for I know he will be very loth to part with me, when he gets me to him.

Tourville tells me how faſt thou mendeſt: let me conjure thee not to think of moleſting this incomparable woman. For thy own ſake I requeſt this, as well as for hers, and for the ſake of thy given promiſe: for, ſhould ſhe die within a few weeks, as I fear ſhe will, it will be ſaid, and perhaps too juſtly, that thy viſit has haſtened her end.

In hopes thou wilt not, I wiſh thy perfect recovery: elſe that thou mayeſt relapſe, and be confined to thy bed.

LETTER LIII.

MR. BELFORD, TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

SAT. MORN. AUG. 19.

MADAM,

I Think myſelf obliged in honour to acquaint you, that I am afraid Mr. Lovelace will try his fate by an interview with you.

I wiſh to Heaven you could prevail upon yourſelf to receive his viſit. All that is reſpectful, even to veneration, and all that is penitent, will you ſee in his behaviour, if you can admit of it. But as I am obliged to ſet out directly for Epſom, (to perform, as I apprehend, the laſt friendly offices for poor Mr. Belton, whom once you ſaw) and as I think it more likely, that Mr. Lovelace will not be prevailed upon, than that he will, I thought fit to give you this intimation, leſt, if he ſhould come, you ſhould be too much ſurprized.

He flatters himſelf, that you are not ſo ill as I repreſent you to be. When he ſees you, he will be convinced, that the moſt obliging things he can do, will be as proper to be done for the ſake of his own future peace of mind, as for your health-ſake; and, I dare ſay, in fear of hurting the latter, he will forbear the thoughts of any further intruſion; at leaſt, while you are ſo much indiſpoſed: ſo that one half hour's ſhock, if it will be a ſhock to ſee the unhappy man, (but juſt got up himſelf from a dangerous fever) will be all you will have occaſion to ſtand.

I beg you will not too much hurry and diſcompoſe yourſelf. It is impoſſible he can be in town till Monday, at ſooneſt. And if he reſolves to come, I hope to be at Mr. Smith's before him.

I am, Madam, with the profoundeſt veneration, your moſt faithful and moſt obedient ſervant,

J. BELFORD.

LETTER LIV.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

[IN ANSWER TO HIS OF AUGUST 17. See LETTER LII.]

SUNDAY, AUG. 20.

WHAT an unmerciful fellow art thou!—A man has no need of a conſcience, who has ſuch an impertinent monitor. But if Nic Rowe wrote a play that anſwers not his title, am I to be reflected upon for that!—I have ſinned; I repent; I would repair—She forgives my ſin; ſhe accepts my repentance: but ſhe won't let me repair—What wouldſt have me to do?

But get thee gone to Belton, as ſoon as thou canſt. Yet whether thou goeſt or not, up I muſt go, and ſee what I can do with the ſweet oddity myſelf. The moment theſe proſcribing varlets will let me, depend upon it, I go. Nay, Lord M. thinks ſhe ought to permit me one interview. His opinion has great authority with me—when it ſquares with my own: and I have aſſured him, and my two couſins, that I will behave with all the decency and reſpect that man can behave with to the perſon whom he moſt reſpects. And ſo I will. Of this, if thou chuſeſt not to go to Belton, meaſn time, thou ſhalt be witneſs.

Colonel Morden, thou haſt heard me he, is a man of honour and bravery:—But Colonel Morden has had his girls, as well as you and I. And, indeed, either openly or secretly, who has not? The devil always baits with a pretty wench, when he angles for a man, be his age, rank, or degree, what it will.

I have often heard my beloved speak of the colonel with great distinction and esteem. I wish he could make matters a little easier, for her mind's-sake, between the rest of the implacables and herself.

Methinks I am sorry for honest Belton. But a man cannot be ill, or vapourish, but thou liftest up thy shriek-owl note, and killest him immediately. None but a fellow, who is fit for a drummer in Death's forlorn-hope, could take so much delight, as thou dost, in beating a dead march with thy goose-quills.

Whereas didst thou but know thine own talents, thou art formed to give mirth by thy very appearance; and wouldst make a better figure by half, leading up thy brother-bears at Hockley in the Hole, to the musick of a Scots bagpipe. Methinks I see thy clumsy sides shaking (and shaking the sides of all beholders) in these attitudes; thy fat head archly beating time on thy porterly shoulders, right and left by turns, as I once beheld thee practising to the hornpipe at Preston. Thou remembrest the frolick, as I have done an hundred times; for I never before saw thee appear so much in character.

But I know what I shall get by this—Only that notable observation repeated, That thy outside is the worst of thee, and mine the best of me. And so let it be. Nothing thou writest of this sort can I take amiss.

But I shall call thee seriously to account, when I see thee, for the extracts thou hast given the lady from my letters, notwithstanding what I said in my last; especially if she continue to refuse me. An hundred times have I myself known a woman deny, yet comply at last; but, by these extracts, thou hast, I doubt, made her bar up the door of her heart, as she used to do her chamber-door, against me.—This, therefore, is a disloyalty that friendship cannot bear, nor honour allow me to forgive.

LETTER LV.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

LONDON, AUG. 21, MONDAY.

I believe I am bound to curse thee, Jack. Nevertheless I won't anticipate, but proceed to write thee a longer letter, than thou hast had from me for some time past. So here goes.

That thou mightest have as little notice as possible of the time I was resolved to be in town, I set out in my lord's chariot-and-six yesterday, as soon as I had dispatched my letter to thee, and arrived in town last night: for I knew I could have no dependence on thy friendship where Miss Harlowe's humour was concerned.

I had no other place so ready, and so was forced to go to my old lodgings, where also my wardrobe is; and there I poured out millions of curses upon the whole crew, and refused to see either Sally or Polly; and this not only for suffering the lady to escape, but for the villainous arrest, and for their detestable insolence to her at the officer's house.

I dressed myself in a never-worn suit, which I had intended for one of my wedding suits; and liked myself so well, that I began to think with thee, that my outside was the best of me.

I took a chair to Smith's, my heart bounding in almost audible thumps to my throat, with the assured expectation of seeing my beloved. I clasped my fingers as I was danced along: I charged my eyes to languish and sparkle by turns: I talked to my knees, telling them how they must bend; and, in the language of a charming describer, acted my part in fancy, as well as spoke it to myself—

'Tenderly kneeling, thus will I complain:
'Thus court her pity; and thus plead my pain;
'Thus sigh for fancy'd frowns, if frowns
'should rise;
'And thus meet favour in her soft'ning eyes.'

In this manner entertained I myself, till I arrived at Smith's; and there the fellows set down their gay burden. Off went their hats; Will, ready at hand in a new livery; up went the head; out rushed my honour; the woman behind the compter all in flutters—respect and fear giving due solemnity to her features; and her knees, I doubt not, knocking against the inside of a wainscot-fence.

'Your servant, Madam—Will, let 'the fellows move to some distance, and 'wait.

'You have a young lady lodges here; 'Miss Harlowe, Madam: is she above?'

'Sir, Sir, and please your honour!' [The woman is struck with my figure,' thought I] 'Miss Harlowe, Sir! There 'is,

'is, indeed, such a young lady lodges 'here.—But, but—'

'But what, Madam?—I must see her. '—One pair of stairs; is it not?—Don't 'trouble yourself—I shall find her apart- 'ment.' And was making towards the stairs.

'Sir, Sir, the lady, the lady is not at 'home—She is abroad—She is in the 'country.'

'In the country! not at home!—Im- 'possible! You will not pass this story 'upon me, good woman. I must see her. 'I have business of life and death with 'her.'

'Indeed, Sir, the lady is not at home! 'Indeed, Sir, she is abroad!'

She then rung a bell: 'John,' cried she, 'pray step down!—Indeed, Sir, the 'lady is not at home.'

Down came John, the good man of the house, when I expected one of his journeymen, by her saucy familiarity.

'My dear,' said she, 'the gentleman will not believe Miss Harlowe is 'abroad.'

John bowed to my fine cloaths: 'Your 'servant, Sir—Indeed the lady is a- 'broad. She went out of town this morn- 'ing by six o'clock—into the country— 'By the doctor's advice.'

Still I would not believe either John or his wife. 'I am sure,' said I, 'she can- 'not be abroad. I heard she was very 'ill—She is not able to go out in a 'coach. Do you know Mr. Belford, 'friend?'

'Yes, Sir; I have the honour to 'know Squire Belford. He is gone into 'the country to visit a sick friend; he 'went on Saturday, Sir.'

This had also been told from thy lodg- ings to Will, whom I sent to desire to see thee on thy first coming to town.

'Well, and Mr. Belford wrote me 'word that she was exceeding ill. How 'then can she be gone out?'

'O, Sir, she is very ill; very ill, in- 'deed—She could hardly walk to the 'couch.'

'Belford,' thought I, 'himself knew 'nothing of the time of my coming; 'neither can he have received my letter 'of yesterday: and so ill, 'tis impossible 'she should go out.

'Where is her servant? Call her ser- 'vant to me.'

'Her servant, Sir, is her nurse: she 'has no other. And she is gone with her.'

'Well, friend, I must not believe 'you. You'll excuse me; but I must 'go up stairs myself.' And was step- ping up.

John hereupon put on a serious, and a less respectful face—'Sir, this house 'is mine; and—'

'And what, friend?' not doubting then but she was above.—'I must and will see 'her. I have authority for it. I am 'a justice of peace. I have a search- 'warrant.'

And up I went; they following me, muttering, and in a plaguy flutter.

The first door I came to was locked, I tapped at it.

'The lady, Sir, has the key of her 'own apartment.'

'On the inside, I question not, my 'honest friend;' tapping again. And being assured, if she heard my voice that her timorous and soft temper would make her betray herself by some flutter, to my listening ear, I said aloud, 'I am 'confident Miss Harlowe is here;'—'dearest Madam, open the door: ad- 'mit me, but for one moment, to your 'presence.'

But neither answer nor fluttering sa- luted my ear; and the people being very quiet, I led on to the next apartment; 'and the key being on the outside, I opened it, and looked all round it, and into the closet.

The man said he never saw so uncivil a gentleman in his life.

'Hark thee, friend,' said I; 'let me 'advise thee to be a little decent; or I 'shall teach thee a lesson thou never 'learnedst in all thy life.'

'Sir,' said he, 'tis not like a gentle- 'man, to affront a man in his own house.'

'Then pr'ythee, man,' replied I, 'don't 'crow upon thine own dunghill.'

I stepped back to the locked door: 'My 'dear Miss Harlowe, I beg of you to 'open the door, or I'll break it open;'—pushing hard against it, that it crack- ed again.

The man looked pale; and trembling with his fright, made a plaguy long face; and called to one of his bodice- makers above, 'Joseph, come down quickly.'

Joseph came down: a lion's-face grin- ning fellow; thick, and short, and bushy- headed, like an old oak-pollard. Then did master John put on a sturdier look. But I only hummed a tune, traversed all the other apartments, sounded the pas- sages with my knuckles, to find whether there were private doors, and walked up the next pair of stairs singing all the way; John and Joseph, and Mrs. Smith, following me trembling.

I looked round me there, and went into two open-door bed-chambers; searched the closets, the passages, and peeped through the key-hole of another? Miss Harlowe, by Jupiter! 'What 'shall I do!—What shall I do!' as the 'play-boy says.—Now will she be grieved that 'she is out of the way.'

I said this on purpose to find out whether these people knew the lady's story; and had the answer I expected from Mrs. Smith—'I believe not, Sir.'

'Why so, Mrs. Smith? Do you know 'who I am?'

'I can guess, Sir.'

'Whom do you guess me to be?'

'Your name is Mr. Lovelace, Sir, I 'make no doubt.'

'The very same. But how came 'you to guess so well, dame Smith? You 'never saw me before—Did you?'

Here, Jack, I laid out for a compliment, and missed it.

'Tis easy to guess, Sir; for there 'cannot be two such gentlemen as you.'

'Well said, dame Smith—But mean 'you good or bad?'—Handsome was the least I thought she would have said.'

'I leave you to guess, Sir.'

'Condemned,' thought I, 'by myself, on this appeal.'

'Why, father Smith, thy wife is a 'wit, man!——Didst thou ever find 'that out before?—But where is widow 'Lovick, dame Smith? My cousin John 'Belford says she is a very good woman. Is she within? Or is she gone 'with the lady too?'

'She will be within by-and-by, Sir. 'She is not with the lady.'

'Well, but my good dear Mrs. 'Smith, whither is the lady gone? And 'when will she return?'

'I can't tell, Sir.'

'Don't tell fibs, Dame Smith; don't 'tell fibs,' chucking her under the chin: which made John's upper-lip, with chin shortened, rise to his nose,—'I am sure 'you know!—But here's another pair 'of stairs: let us see; who lives up there? '—But hold, here's another room locked up,' tapping at the door—'Who's 'at home?' cried I.

'That's Mrs. Lovick's apartment. 'She is gone out, and has the key with 'her.'

'Widow Lovick!' rapping again, 'I 'believe you are at home: pray open 'the door.'

John and Joseph muttered and whispered together.

'No whispering, honest friends: 'tis 'not manners to whisper.—Joseph, 'what said John to thee?'

'John, Sir!' disdainfully repeated the good woman.

'I beg pardon, Mrs. Smith: but you 'see the force of example. Had you 'shewed your husband more respect, I 'should. Let me give you a piece of 'advice—Women who treat their husbands irreverently, teach strangers to 'use them with contempt.—There, honest master John; why dost not pull 'off thy hat to me?—O, so thou wouldst, 'if thou hadst it on: but thou never 'wearest thy hat in thy wife's presence, 'I believe; dost thou?'

'None of your fleers and your jeers, 'Sir,' cried John; 'I wish every married pair lived as happily as we do.'

'I wish so, too, honest friend. But 'I'll be hanged if thou hast any children.'

'Why so, Sir?'

'Hast thou?—Answer me, man: hast 'thou, or not?'

'Perhaps not, Sir. But what of that?'

'What of that?—Why I'll tell thee; 'the man who has no children by his 'wife must put up with plain John. 'Hadst thou a child or two, thou'dst 'be called Mr. Smith, with a curtsey, 'or a smile at least, at every word.'

'You are very pleasant, Sir,' replied my dame. 'I fancy, if either my husband or I had as much to answer for 'as I know whom, we should not be so 'merry.'

'Why then, dame Smith, so much 'the worse for those who were obliged 'to keep you company.—But I am not 'merry—I am sad!—Hey-ho!—Where 'shall I find my dear Miss Harlowe?

'My beloved Miss Harlowe!' [calling at the foot of the third pair of stairs] 'if you are above, for Heaven's sake 'answer me. I am coming up.'

'Sir,' said the good man, 'I wish 'you'd walk down. The servants rooms, 'and the working rooms, are up those 'stairs, and another pair; and nobody's 'there that you want.'

'Shall I go up and see if Miss Harlowe be there, Mrs. Smith?'

'You may, Sir, if you please.'

'Then I won't go; for, if she was, 'you would not be so obliging.

'I am ashamed to give you all this 'attendance: you are the politest traders 'I ever knew.—Honest Joseph,' slapping him upon the shoulders on a sudden, which made him jump, 'didst 'ever grin for a wager, man?' For the rascal seemed not displeased with me; and, cracking his flat face from ear to ear, with a distended mouth, shewed his teeth, as broad and as black as his thumb nails.—'But don't I hinder thee?

'What

'What canst earn a-day, man?'

'Half-a-crown, I can earn a-day;' with an air of pride and petulance, at being ſtartled.

'There, then, is a day's wages for 'thee. But thou needeſt not attend me 'farther.

'Come, Mrs. Smith—Come, John, '(Maſter Smith I ſhould ſay) let's walk 'down, and give me an account where 'the lady is gone, and when ſhe will 'return.'

So down ſtairs led I. John and Joſeph, (though I had diſcharged the latter) and my dame, following me, to ſhew their complaiſance to a ſtranger.

I re-entered one of the firſt-floor rooms. 'I have a great mind to be your 'lodger: for I never ſaw ſuch obliging 'folks in my life. What rooms have 'you to lett?'

'None at all, Sir.'

'I am ſorry for that. But whoſe is 'this?'

'Mine, Sir,' chuffily ſaid John.

'Thine, man! Why then I will take 'it of thee. This, and a bed-chamber, 'and a garret for one ſervant, will con-'tent me. I will give thee thine own 'price, and half a guinea a day over, 'for thoſe conveniences.'

'For ten guineas a day, Sir—'

'Hold, John! (Maſter Smith I ſhould 'ſay)—Before thou ſpeakeſt, conſider—'I won't be affronted, man.'

'Sir, I wiſh you'd walk down,' ſaid the good woman. 'Really, Sir, you 'take—'

'Great liberties, I hope you would 'not ſay, Mrs. Smith?'

'Indeed, Sir, I was going to ſay ſome-'thing like it.'

'Well, then, I am glad I prevented 'you; for ſuch words better become 'my mouth than yours. But I muſt 'lodge with you till the lady returns. 'I believe I muſt. However, you may 'be wanted in the ſhop; ſo we'll talk 'that over there.'

Down I went, they paying diligent attendance on my ſteps.

When I came into the ſhop, ſeeing no chair or ſtool, I went behind the compter, and ſat down under an arched kind of canopy of carved work, which theſe proud traders, emulating the royal nich ſitters, often give themſelves, while a joint-ſtool, perhaps, ſerves thoſe, by whom they get their bread: ſuch is the dignity of trade in this mercantile nation!

I looked about me, and above me; and told them, I was very proud of my ſeat; aſking, if John were ever permitted to ſit this ſuperb nich?

Perhaps he was, he ſaid, very ſurlily.

'That is it, that makes thee look ſo 'like a ſtatue, man.'

John looked plaguy glum upon me. But his man Joſeph and my mate Will, turned round with their backs to us, to hide their grinning, with each his fiſt in his mouth.

I aſked, What it was they ſold?

'Powder, and waſh-balls, and ſnuff,' they ſaid; 'and gloves and ſtockings.'

'O, come, I'll be your cuſtomer.—'Will, do I want waſh-balls?'

'Yes, and pleaſe your honour, you 'can diſpenſe with one or two.'

'Give him half a dozen, dame Smith.'

She told me ſhe muſt come where I was, to ſerve them.—'Pray, Sir, walk 'from behind the compter.'

'Indeed, but I won't. The ſhop 'ſhall be mine. Where are they, if a 'cuſtomer ſhould come in?'

She pointed over my head, with a purſe-mouth, as if ſhe would not have ſimpered, could ſhe have helped it. I reached down the glaſs, and gave Will ſix. 'There—put 'em up, ſirrah.'

He did, grinning with his teeth out before; which touching my conſcience; as the loſs of them was owing to me; 'Joſeph,' ſaid I, 'come hither. Come 'hither, man, when I bid thee.'

He ſtalked towards me, his hands behind him, half willing, and half unwilling.

I ſuddenly wrapped my arm round his neck. 'Will, thy penknife, this mo-'ment. D—n the fellow, where's thy 'penknife?'

'O Lord!' ſaid the pollard headed dog, ſtruggling to get his head looſe from under my arm, while my other hand was muzzling about his curſed chaps, as if I would take his teeth out.

'I will pay thee a good price, man: 'don't ſtruggle thus!—The penknife, 'Will!'

'O Lord,' cried Joſeph, ſtruggling ſtill more and more: and out comes Will's pruning knife; for the raſcal is a gardener in the country. 'I have 'only this, Sir.'

'The beſt in the world to lance a 'gum.—D—n the fellow, why doſt 'ſtruggle thus?'

Maſter and Miſtreſs Smith being afraid, I ſuppoſe, that I had a deſign upon Joſeph's throat becauſe he was their champion, (and this, indeed, made me take the more notice of him) coming towards me me with countenances tragi-comical, I laughed.

'I only wanted,' said I, 'to take out 'two or three of this rascal's broad 'teeth, to put them into my servant's 'jaws—And I would have paid him his 'price for them.—I would, by my soul, 'Joseph.'

Joseph shook his ears; and with both hands stroaked down, smooth as it would lie, his bushy hair; and looked at me, as if he knew not whether he should laugh or be angry: but, after a stupid stare or two, stalked off to the other end of the shop, nodding his head at me as he went, still stroaking down his hair; and took his stand by his master; facing about, and muttering, that I was plaguy strong in the arms, and he thought would have throttled him. Then folding his arms, and shaking his bristled head, added, 'Twas well I was a gentleman, or he would not have taken such an affront.

I demanded where their rappee was? The good woman pointed to the place; and I took up a scollop shell of it, refusing to let her weigh it, and filled my box. 'And now, Mrs. Smith,' said I, 'where are your gloves?'

She shewed me; and I chose four pair of them, and set Joseph, who looked as if he wanted to be taken notice of again, to open the fingers.

A female customer, who had been gaping at the door, came in for some Scots snuff; and I would serve her. The wench was plaguy homely; and I told her so; or else, I said, I would have treated her. She in anger [No woman is homely in her own opinion] threw down her penny; and I put it in my pocket.

Just then, turning my eye to the door, I saw a pretty, genteel lady, with a footman after her, peeping in with a 'What's the matter, good folks?' to the starers; and I ran to her from behind the compter, and, as she was making off, took her hand, and drew her into the shop, begging that she would be my customer; for that I had but just begun trade.

'What do you sell, Sir?' said she, smiling; but a little surprized.

'Tapes, ribbands, silk-laces, pins, 'and needles; for I am a pedlar: pow-'der, patches, wash-balls, stockings, 'garters, snuffs, and pin-cushions—'Don't we, Goody Smith?'

So in I gently drew her to the compter, running behind it myself, with an air of great diligence and obligingness,

'I have excellent gloves and wash-balls, 'Madam; Rappee, Scots, Portugal, 'and all sorts of snuff.'

'Well,' said she, in a very good humour, 'I'll encourage a young beginner for once.—Here, Andrew,' [to her footman] 'you want a pair of 'gloves, don't you?'

I took down a parcel of gloves, which Mrs. Smith pointed to, and came round to the fellow to fit them on myself.

'No matter for opening them,' said I: 'thy fingers, friend, are as stiff as 'drum-sticks. Push!—Thou'rt an 'awkward dog; I wonder such a pretty 'lady will be followed by such a clumsy 'varlet.'

The fellow had no strength for laughing: and Joseph was mightily pleased, in hopes, I suppose, I would borrow a few of Andrew's teeth, to keep him in countenance! and, father and mother Smith, like all the world, as the jest was turned from themselves, seemed diverted with the humour.

The fellow said, the gloves were too little.

'Thrust, and be d—n'd to thee,' said I: why, fellow, thou hast not the 'strength of a cat.'

'Sir, Sir,' said he, laughing, 'I 'shall hurt your honour's side.'

'D—n thee, thrust, I say.'

He did; and burst out the sides of the glove.

'Will,' said I, 'where's thy pruning-'knife?—By my soul, friend, I have a 'good mind to pare thy cursed paws. 'But come, here's a larger pair: try 'them, when thou gettest home; and 'let thy sweetheart, if thou hast one, 'mend the other, so take both.'

The lady laughed at the humour; as did my fellow and Mrs. Smith, and Joseph: even John laughed, though he seemed, by the force put upon his countenance, to be but half pleased with me neither.

'Madam,' said I, and stept behind the compter, bowing over it, 'now I 'hope you will buy something for your-'self. Nobody shall use you better, nor 'sell you cheaper.'

'Come,' said she, 'give me six-pen-'ny-worth of Portugal snuff.'

They shewed me where it was, and I served her; and said, when she would have paid me, I took nothing at my opening.

If I treated her footman, she told me, I should not treat her.

'Well, with all my heart,' said I: 'Tis not for us tradesmen to be saucy

'—is

'—Is it, Mrs. Smith?'

I put her tixpence in my pocket; and, seizing her hand, took notice to her of the crowd that had gathered about the door, and beſought her to walk into the back-ſhop with me.

She ſtruggled her hand out of mine, and would ſtay no longer.

So I bowed, and bid her kindly welcome, and thanked her, and hoped I ſhould have her cuſtom another time.

She went away ſmiling; and Andrew after her; who made me a fine bow.

I began to be out of countenance at the crowd, which thickened apace; and bid Will order the chair to the door.

'Well, Mrs. Smith,' with a grave air, 'I am heartily ſorry Miſs Harlowe 'is abroad. You don't tell me where 'ſhe is?'

'Indeed, Sir, I cannot.'

'You will not, you mean.—She could 'have no notion of my coming. I came 'to town but laſt night. I have been 'very ill. She has almoſt broken my 'heart by her cruelty. You know my 'ſtory, I doubt not. Tell her, I muſt 'go out of town to-morrow morning. 'But I will ſend my ſervant, to know if 'ſhe will favour me with one half-hour's 'converſation; for as ſoon as I get 'down, I ſhall ſet out for Dover, in my 'way to France, if I have not a coun-'termand from her who has the ſole diſ-'poſal of my fate.'

And ſo, flinging down a Portugal ſix-and-thirty, I took Mr. Smith by the hand, telling him, I was ſorry we had not more time to be better acquainted; and bidding farewel to honeſt Joſeph, (who purſed up his mouth as I paſſed by him, as if he thought his teeth ſtill in jeopardy) and Mrs. Smith adieu, and to recommend me to her fair lodger, hummed an air, and, the chair being come, whipt into it; the people about the door ſeeming to be in good-humour with me; one crying 'A pleaſant gentleman, I 'warrant him!' And away I was carried to White's according to direction.

As ſoon as I came thither, I ordered Will to go and change his cloaths, and to diſguiſe himſelf by putting on his black wig, and keeping his mouth ſhut; and then to dodge about Smith's, to inform himſelf of the lady's motions.

I GIVE thee this impudent account of myſelf, that thou mayeſt rave at me, and call me hardened, and what thou wilt. For, in the firſt place, I, who had been ſo lately ill, was glad I was alive; and then I was ſo baulked by my charmer's unexpected abſence, and ſo ruffled by that, and by the bluff treatment of father John, that I had no other way to avoid being out of humour with all I met with. Moreover I was rejoiced to find, by the lady's abſence, and by her going out at ſix in the morning, that it was impoſſible ſhe ſhould be ſo ill as they repreſented her to be; and this gave me ſtill higher ſpirits. Then I know the ſex always love cheerful and humorous fellows. The dear creature herſelf uſed to be pleaſed with my gay temper and lively manner; and had ſhe been told, that I was blubbering for her in the back-ſhop, ſhe would have deſpiſed me ſtill more than ſhe does.

Furthermore, I was ſenſible, that the people of the houſe muſt needs have a terrible notion of me, as a ſavage, bloody-minded, obdurate fellow; a perfect woman-eater; and, no doubt, expected to ſee me with the claws of a lion, and the fangs of a tyger; and it was but policy to ſhew them, what a harmleſs, pleaſant fellow, I am, in order to familiarize the John's and the Joſeph's to me. For it was evident to me, by the good woman's calling them down, that ſhe thought me a dangerous man. Whereas now, John and I have ſhaken hands together, and dame Smith having ſeen that I have the face, and hands, and looks of a man, and walk upright, and prate, and laugh, and joke, like other people; and Joſeph, that I can talk of taking his teeth out of his head, without doing him the leaſt hurt; they will all, at my next viſit, be much more eaſy and pleaſant to me than Andrew's gloves were to him; and we ſhall be as thoroughly acquainted, as if we had known one another a twelve-month.

When I returned to our mother's, I again curſed her, and all her nymphs together; and ſtill refuſed to ſee either Sally or Polly. I raved at the horrid arreſt; and told the old dragon, that it was owing to her and hers, that the faireſt virtue in the world was ruined, my reputation for ever blaſted; and that I was not married, and happy in the love of the moſt excellent of her ſex.

She, to pacify, ſaid, ſhe would ſhew me a new face that would pleaſe me; hence I would not ſee my Sally, who was dying for grief.

'Where is this new face?' cried I: 'let me ſee her, though I ſhall never 'ſee any face with pleaſure but Miſs 'Harlowe's.'

'She won't come down,' replied ſhe. 'She

'She will not be at the word of com'mand yet. She is but just in the 'trammels: and must be waited upon,
'I'll assure you; and courted much
'besides.'

'Aye,' said I, 'that looks well.
'Lead me to her this instant.'

I followed her up: and who should she be, but that little toad Sally!

'O curse you,' said I, 'for a devil!
'Is it you? Is yours the new face?'

'O my dear, dear Mr. Lovelace!' cried she, 'I am glad any-thing will 'bring you to me!'—And so the little beast threw herself about my neck, and there clung like a cat. Come,' said she, 'what will you give me, and I'll 'be virtuous for a quarter of an hour,
'and mimick your Clarissa to the life.'

I was Belforded all over. I could not bear such an insult upon the dear creature; (for I have a soft and generous nature in the main, whatever thou thinkest) and cursed her most devoutly for taking my beloved's name in her mouth in such a way. But the little devil was not to be baulked; but fell a crying, sobbing, praying, begging, exclaiming, fainting, that I never saw my lovely girl so well aped. Indeed I was almost taken in; for I could have fancied I had her before me once more.

O this sex! this artful sex! There's no minding them. At first, indeed, their grief, and their concern may be real: but give way to the hurricane, and it will soon die away in soft murmurs, trilling upon your ears like the notes of a well-tuned viol. And, by Sally, one sees, that art will generally so well supply the place of nature, that you shall not easily know the difference. Miss Clarissa Harlowe indeed is the only woman in the world I believe that can say, in the words of her favourite Job, (for I can quote a text as well as she) 'But it is not so with me.'

They were very inquisitive about my fair-one. They told me, that you seldom came near them; that, when you did, you put on plaguy grave airs; would hardly stay five minutes; and did nothing but praise Miss Harlowe, and lament her hard fate. In short, that you despised them; was full of sentences; and they doubted not, in a little while, would be a lost man, and marry.

A pretty character for thee, is it not? Thou art in a blessed way; yet hast nothing to do but to go on in it; and then what a work hast thou to go through! If thou turnest back, these sorceresses will be like the Czar's cossacks, [at Pultowa, I think it was] who were planted with ready primed and cocked pistols, behind the regulars, in order to shoot them dead, if they did not push on and conquer; and then wilt thou be most lamentably despised by every harlot thou hast made—And, O Jack, how formidable, in that case, will be the number of thy enemies!

I intend to regulate my motions by Will's intelligence; for see this dear creature I must and will. Yet I have promised Lord M. to be down in two or three days, at fartheſt; and he is grown plaguy fond of me since I was ill.

I am in hopes, that the word I left, that I am to go out of town to-morrow morning, will soon bring the lady back again.

Mean time I thought I would write to divert thee, while thou art of such importance about the dying; and as thy servant, it seems, comes backward and forward every day, perhaps I may send thee another letter to-morrow, with the particulars of the interview between the dear creature and me, after which my soul thirsteth.

LETTER LVI.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

TUESDAY, AUG. 22.

I Must write on to divert myself: for I can get no rest; no refreshing rest. I awaked just now in a curst fright. How a man may be affected by dreams!

Methought I had an interview with my beloved. I found her all goodness, condescension, and forgiveness. She suffered herself to be overcome in my favour by the joint intercessions of Lord M. Lady Sarah, Lady Betty, and my two cousins Montague, who waited upon her in deep mourning; the ladies in long trains sweeping after them; Lord M. in a long black mantle trailing after him. They told her, they came in these robes to express their sorrow for my sins against her, and to implore her to forgive me.

I myself, I thought, was upon my knees, with a sword in my hand, offering either to put it up in the scabbard, or to thrust it into my heart, as she should command the one or the other.

At that moment her cousin Morden, I thought, all of a sudden, flashed in through a window, with his drawn sword —'Die, Lovelace!' said he; 'this in'stant die, and be damned, if in earnest
'thou

'thou repairest not by marriage my
'cousin's wrongs!'

I was rising to resent this insult, I thought, when Lord M. ran between us with his great black mantle, and threw it over my face: and instantly, my charmer, with that sweet voice which has so often played upon my ravished ears, wrapped her arms round me, muffled as I was in my lord's mantle: 'O, 'spare, spare my Lovelace!—And spare, 'O Lovelace, my beloved cousin Mor-'den!—Let me not have my distresses 'augmented by the fall of either or both 'of those who are so dear to me!'

At this, charmed with her sweet mediation, I thought I would have clasped her in my arms: when immediately the most angelick form I had ever beheld, all clad in transparent white, descended in a cloud, which opening, discovered a firmament above it, clouded with golden cherubs, and glittering seraphs, all addressing her with, 'Welcome, 'welcome, welcome!' and, encircling my charmer, ascended with her to the region of seraphims; and instantly, the opened cloud closing, I lost sight of her, and of the bright form together, and found wrapt in my arms her azure robe, (all stuck thick with stars of embossed silver) which I had caught hold of in hopes of detaining her; but was all that was left me of my beloved Clarissa. And then (horrid to relate!) the floor sinking under me, as the firmament had opened for her, I dropt into a hole more frightful than that of Elden; and, tumbling over and over down it, without view of a bottom, I awaked in a panick; and was as effectually disordered for half an hour, as if my dream had been a reality.

Wilt thou forgive me troubling thee with such visionary stuff? Thou wilt see by it, only, that, sleeping or waking, my Clarissa is always present with me.

But here this moment is Will come running hither to tell me, that his lady actually returned to her lodgings last night between eleven and twelve; and is now there, though very ill.

I hasten to her. But, that I may not add to her indisposition, by any rough or boisterous behaviour, I will be as soft and as gentle as the dove herself in my addresses to her.

'That I do love her, O all ye host of Heaven
'Be witness—That she is dear to me!
'Dearer than day, to one whom sight must 'leave;
'Dearer than life, to one who fears to die.'

The chair is come. I fly to my beloved.

LETTER LVII.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

CURSE upon my stars!—Disappointed again!—It was about eight when I arrived at Smith's.—The bedman was in the shop.

'So, old acquaintance, how do you 'now? I know my love is above.—'Let her be acquainted that I am here, 'waiting for admission to her presence, 'and can take no denial. Tell her, 'that I will approach her with the most 'respectful duty, and in whose company 'she pleases; and I will not touch 'the hem of her garment, without her 'leave.'

'Indeed, Sir, you are mistaken. The 'lady is not in this house, nor near it.'

'I'll see that.—Will!'—beckoning 'him to me, and whispering—'See if 'thou canst any way find out (without 'losing sight of the door, lest she should 'be below-stairs) if she be in the neigh-'bourhood, if not within.'

Will bowed, and went off. Up went I, without further ceremony; attended now only by the good woman.

I went into each apartment, except that which was locked before, and was now also locked: and I called to my Clarissa in the voice of love; but by the still silence was convinced she was not there. Yet, on the strength of my intelligence, I doubted not but she was in the house.

I then went up two pair of stairs, and looked round the first room: but no Miss Harlowe.

'And who, pray, is in this room?' stopping at the door of another.

'A widow gentlewoman, Sir.—Mrs. 'Lovick.'

'O my dear Mrs. Lovick!' said I, 'I am intimately acquainted with Mrs. 'Lovick's character, from my cousin 'John Belford. I must see Mrs. Lovick 'by all means.—Good Mrs. Lovick, 'open the door.'

She did.

'Your servant, Madam. Be so good 'as to excuse me.—You have heard my 'story. You are an admirer of the most 'excellent woman in the world.—Dear 'Mrs. Lovick, tell me what is become 'of her?'

'The poor lady, Sir, went out yester-'day, on purpose to avoid you.'

'How

'How so? She knew not that I would be here.'

'She was afraid you would come, when she heard you were recovered from your illness.—Ah, Sir! what spirit is it that so fine a gentleman should make such ill returns for God's goodness to him!'

'You are an excellent woman, Mrs. Lovick: I know that, by my cousin John Belford's account of you: and Miss Clarissa Harlowe is an angel.'

'Miss Harlowe is indeed an angel,' replied she; 'and soon will be company for angels.'

No jesting with such a woman as this, Jack.

'Tell me of a truth, good Mrs. Lovick, where I may see this dear lady. Upon my soul, I will neither fright nor offend her. I will only beg of her to hear me speak for one half-quarter of an hour; and, if she will have it so, I will never trouble her more.'

'Sir,' said the widow, 'it would be death for her to see you. She was at home last night; I'll tell you truth: but fitter to be in bed all day. She came home, she said, to die; and, if she could not avoid your visit, she was unable to fly from you; and believed she should die in your presence.'

'And yet go out again this morning early! How can that be, widow?'

'Why, Sir, she rested not two hours, for fear of you. Her fear gave her strength, which she'll suffer for, when that fear is over. And finding herself, the more she thought of your visit, the less able to stay to receive it, she took chair, and is gone nobody knows whither. But, I believe, she intended to be carried to the water-side, in order to take boat; for she cannot bear a coach. It extremely incommoded her yesterday.'

'But before we talk any further,' said I, 'if she be gone abroad, you can have no objection to my looking into every apartment above and below; because I am told she is actually in the house.

'Indeed, Sir, she is not. You may satisfy yourself, if you please: but Mrs. Smith and I waited on her to her chair. We were forced to support her, she was so weak. She said, "Whither can I go, Mrs. Lovick?—Whither can I go, Mrs. Smith?—Cruel, cruel man!—Tell him I called him so, if he come again!—God give him that peace which he denies me!"

'Sweet creature!' cried I, and looked down, and took out my handkerchief.

The widow wept. 'I wish,' said she, 'I had never known so excellent a lady, 'and so great a sufferer! I love her as 'my own child!'

Mrs. Smith wept.

I then gave over the hope of seeing her for this time. I was extremely chagrined at my disappointment, and at the account they gave of her ill health.

'Would to Heaven,' said I, 'she 'would put it in my power to repair her 'wrongs! I have been an ungrateful 'wretch to her. I need not tell you, 'Mrs. Lovick, how much I have in-'jured her, nor how much she suffers 'by her relations implacableness. 'Tis 'that, Mrs. Lovick—'tis that implaca-'bleness, Mrs. Smith—that cuts her to 'the heart. Her family is the most 'implacable family on earth; and the 'dear creature, in refusing to see me, 'and to be reconciled to me, shews her 'relationship to them a little too 'plainly.'

'O Sir!' said the widow, 'not one 'syllable of what you say belongs to this 'lady. I never saw so sweet a crea-'ture; so edifying a piety! and one of 'so forgiving a temper: she is always 'accusing herself, and excusing her re-'lations. And, as to you, Sir, she for-'gives you: she wishes you well, and 'happier than you will let her be. Why 'will you not, Sir, why will you not let 'her die in peace? 'Tis all she wishes 'for. You don't look like a hard-heart-'ed gentleman!—How can you thus 'hunt and persecute a poor lady, whom 'none of her relations will look upon? '—it makes my heart bleed for her.'

And then she wept again. Mrs. Smith wept also. My seat grew uneasy to me. I shifted to another several times; and what Mrs. Lovick farther said, and shewed me, made me still more uneasy.

'Bad as the poor lady was last night,' said she, 'she transcribed into her book 'a meditation on your persecuting her 'thus. I have a copy of it. If I thought 'it would have any effect, I would read 'it to you.'

'Let me read it myself, Mrs. Lovick.'

She gave it to me. It has an Harlowe-spirited title: and from a forgiving spirit, intolerable. I desired to take it with me. She consented, on condition that I shewed it to Squire Belford. So here, Mr. Squire Belford, thou mayest read it, if thou wilt.

'on

'OR BEING HUNTED AFTER BY THE 'ENEMY OF MY SOUL.

MONDAY, AUG. 21.

'DELIVER me, O Lord, from the evil 'man,

'Preserve me from the violent man,

'Who imagines miſchief in his heart.

'He hath ſharpened his tongue like a ſer- 'pent. Adders poiſon is under his lips.

'Keep me, O Lord, from the hands of the 'wicked. Preſerve me from the violent 'man who has purpoſed to overthrow my go- 'ings.

'He hath hid a ſnare for me. He hath 'ſpread a net by the way-ſide. He hath 'ſet gins for me in the way wherein I 'walked.

'Keep me from the ſnares which he hath 'laid for me, and the gins of this worker of 'iniquity.

'The enemy hath perſecuted my ſoul. He 'hath ſmitten my life down to the ground. 'He hath made me dwell in darkneſs, as 'thoſe that have been long dead.

'Therefore is my ſpirit overwhelmed with- 'in me My heart within me is deſolate.

'Hide not thy face from me in the day 'when I am in trouble.

'For my days are conſumed like ſmoke; 'and my bones are burnt as the hearth.

'My heart is ſmitten and withered like 'graſs: ſo that I forget to eat my bread.

'By reaſon of the voice of my groaning, 'my bones cleave to my ſkin.

'I am like a pelican of the wilderneſs. I 'am like an owl of the deſart.

'I watch; and am as a ſparrow alone 'upon the houſe-top.

'I have eaten aſhes like bread; and min- 'gled my drink with weeping:

'Becauſe of thine indignation, and thy 'wrath: for thou haſt lifted me up, and 'caſt me down.

'My days are like a ſhadow that declineth, 'and I am withered like graſs.

'Grant not, O Lord, the deſires of the 'wicked: further not his devices, leſt he 'exalt himſelf.'

'Why now, Mrs. Lovick,' ſaid I, when I had read this meditation, as ſhe called it, 'I think I am very ſeverely 'treated by the lady, if ſhe mean me in 'all this. For how is it that I am the 'enemy of her ſoul, when I love her both 'ſoul and body?

'She ſays, that I am a violent man, and 'a wicked man.—That I have been ſo, I 'own: but I repent, and only wiſh to 'have it in my power to repair the in-'juries I have done her.

'The gin, the ſnare, the net, mean 'matrimony, I ſuppoſe—But is it a 'crime in me to wiſh to marry her? 'Would any other woman think it ſo? 'and chuſe to become a pelican in the 'wilderneſs, or a lonely ſparrow on the 'houſe-top, rather than to have a mate 'that would chirp about her all day 'and all night?

'She ſays, ſhe has eaten aſhes like 'bread—A ſad miſtake, to be ſure!— 'and mingled her drink with weeping— 'Sweet maudlin ſoul! ſhould I ſay of 'any body confeſſing this, but Miſs 'Harlowe.

'She concludes with praying, that 'the deſires of the wicked (meaning poor 'me, I doubt) may not be granted; that 'my devices may not be furthered, leſt I 'exalt myſelf. I ſhould undoubtedly 'exalt myſelf, and with reaſon, could 'I have the honour and the bleſſing of 'ſuch a wife. And if my deſires have 'ſo honourable an end, I know not why 'I ſhould be called wicked, and why 'I ſhould not be allowed to hope, that 'my honeſt devices may be furthered, 'that I MAY exalt myſelf.

'But here, Mrs. Lovick, let me aſk, 'as ſomething is undoubtedly meant 'by the lonely ſparrow on the houſe-top, is 'not the dear creature at this very in-'ſtant (tell me truly) concealed in Mrs. 'Smith's cock-loft?—What ſay you, 'Mrs. Lovick?—what ſay you, Mrs. 'Smith—to this?'

They aſſured me to the contrary; and that ſhe was actually abroad, and they knew not where.

Thou ſeeſt, Jack, that I would fain have diverted the chagrin given me not only by the women's talk, but by this collection of Scripture-texts drawn up in array againſt me. Several other whimſical and light things I ſaid, [All I had for it!] with the ſame view: but the widow would not let me come off ſo. She ſtuck to me; and gave me, as I told thee, a good deal of uneaſineſs, by her ſenſible and ſerious expoſtulations. Mrs. Smith put in now-and-then; and the two Jack-pudden fellows, John and Joſeph, not being preſent, I had no provocation to turn the converſation into a farce; and at laſt, they both joined warmly to endeavour to prevail upon me to give up all thoughts of ſeeing the lady. But I could not hear of that. On the contrary, I beſought Mrs. Smith to let me have one of her rooms but till I could ſee her; and were it but for one, two or three days, I would pay a year's rent for it; and quit it the moment the interview was over. But they deſired to be excyfed; and were ſure the lady would not come to the houſe till I was gone, were it for a month.

This pleaſed me; for I found they did not think her ſo very ill as they would have me believe her to be; but I took no notice of the ſlip, becauſe I would not guard them againſt more of the like.

In ſhort, I told them, I muſt and would ſee her: but that it ſhould be with all the reſpect and veneration that heart could pay to excellence like hers: and that I would go round to all the churches in London and Weſtminſter, where there were prayers or ſervice, from ſun-riſe to ſun-ſet, and haunt their houſe like a ghoſt, till I had the opportunity my ſoul panted after.

This I bid them tell her. And thus ended our ſerious converſation.

I took leave of them; and went down; and ſtepping into my chair, cauſed myſelf to be carried to Lincoln's Inn; and walked in the gardens till chapel was opened: and then I went in, and ſtaid prayers, in hopes of ſeeing the dear creature enter: but to no purpoſe; and yet I prayed moſt devoutly that ſhe might be conducted thither, either by my good angel or her own. And indeed I burn more than ever with impatience to be once more permitted to kneel at the feet of this adorable woman. And had I met her, or eſpied her in the chapel, it is my firm belief, that I ſhould not have been able (though it had been in the midſt of the ſacred office, and in the preſence of thouſands) to have forborne proſtration to her, and even clamorous ſupplication for her forgiveneſs: a Chriſtian act; the exerciſe of it therefore worthy of the place.

After ſervice was over, I ſtepped into my chair again, and once more was carried to Smith's, in hopes I might have ſurprized her there: but no ſuch happineſs for thy friend. I ſtaid in the back-ſhop an hour and a half by my watch; and again underwent a good deal of preachment from the women. John was mainly civil to me now; won over a little by my ſerious talk, and the honour I profeſſed for the lady. They all three wiſhed matters could be made up between us; but ſtill inſiſted that ſhe could never get over her illneſs; and that her heart was broken. A cue, I ſuppoſe, they had from you.

While I was there, a letter was brought by a particular hand. They ſeemed very ſolicitous to hide it from me; which made me ſuſpect it was for her. I deſired to be ſuffered to caſt an eye upon the ſeal, and the ſuperſcription; promiſing to give it back to them unopened.

Looking upon it, I told them, I knew the hand and ſeal. It was from her ſiſter. And I hoped it would bring her news that ſhe would be pleaſed with.

They joined moſt heartily in the ſame hope: and giving the letter to them again, I civilly took my leave, and went away.

But I will be there again preſently; for I fancy my courteous behaviour to theſe women, will on their report of it, procure me the favour I ſo earneſtly covet. And ſo I will leave my letter unſealed, to tell thee the event of my next viſit at Smith's.

THY ſervant juſt calling, I ſend thee this: and will ſoon follow it by another. Mean time, I long to hear how poor Belton is; to whom my beſt wiſhes.

MR. BELFORD, TO ROBERT LOVELACE, ESQ.

TUESDAY, AUG. 22.

I Have been under ſuch concern for the poor man, whoſe exit I almoſt hourly expect, and at the ſhocking ſcenes his illneſs and his agonies exhibit, that I have been only able to make memoranda of the melancholy paſſages, from which to draw up a more perfect account, for the inſtruction of us all, when the writing appetite ſhall return.

IT is returned! Indignation has revived it, on receipt of thy letters of Sunday and yeſterday, by which I have reaſon to reproach thee in very ſerious terms that thou haſt not kept thy honour with me: and if the breach of it be attended with ſuch effects as I fear it will be, I ſhall let thee know more of my mind on this head.

If thou wouldſt be thought in earneſt in thy wiſhes to move the poor lady in thy favour, thy ludicrous behaviour at Smith's, when it comes to be repreſented to her, will have a very conſiſtent appearance, will it not?—I will, indeed, confirm her in her opinion, that the grave is more to be wiſhed for, by one of her ſerious and pious turn, than a huſband either incapable of reflection or remorſe; juſt recovered as thou art from a dangerous, at leaſt a ſharp illneſs.

I am

I am extremely concerned for the poor unprotected lady. She was so excessively low and weak on Saturday, that I could not be admitted to her speech: and to be driven out of her lodgings, when it was fitter for her to be in bed, is such a piece of cruelty, as he only could be guilty of, who could act as thou hast done, by such an angel.

Canst thou thyself say, on reflection, that it has not the look of a wicked and hardened sportiveness, in thee, for the sake of a wanton humour only, (since it can answer no end that thou proposest to thyself, but the direct contrary) to hunt from place to place a poor lady, who, like a harmless deer, that has already a barbed shaft in her breast, seeks only a refuge from thee, in the shades of death.

But I will leave this matter upon thy own conscience, to paint thee such a scene from my memoranda, as thou perhaps wilt be moved by more effectually than by any other: because it is such a one, as thou thyself must one day be a principal actor in, and, as I thought, hadst very lately in apprehension: and is the last scene of one of thy most intimate friends, who has been for the four past days labouring in the agonies of death. For, Lovelace, let this truth, this undoubted truth, be engraven on thy memory, in all thy gaities, That the life we are so fond of, is hardly life; a mere breathing space only; and that at the end of it's longest date,

THOU MUST DIE AS WELL AS BELTON.

Thou knowest by Tourville what we had done as to the poor man's worldly affairs; and that we had got his unhappy sister to come and live with him, (little did we think him so very near his end:) and so I will proceed to tell thee, that when I arrived at his house on Saturday night, I found him excessively ill: but just raised, and in his elbow chair, held up by his nurse and Mowbray, (the roughest and most untouched creature that ever entered a sick man's chamber;) while the maid-servants were trying to make that bed easier which he was to return to; his mind ten times uneasier than that could be, and the true cause that the down was no softer to him.

He had so much longed to see me, as I was told by his sister, (whom I sent for down to enquire how he was) that they all rejoiced when I entered:—'Here,' said Mowbray, 'here, Tommy, is honest 'Jack Belford!'

'Where, where!' said the poor man.

'I hear his voice,' cried Mowbray: 'he is coming up stairs.'

In a transport of joy, he would have raised himself at my entrance, but had like to have pitched out of the chair: and when recovered, called me his best friend! his kindest friend! but burst out into a flood of tears; 'O Jack! O 'Belford!' said he, 'see the way I am 'in! See how weak! So much, and so 'soon reduced! do you know me? Do 'you know your poor friend Belton?'

'You are not so much altered, my 'dear Belton, as you think you are. But 'I see you are weak; very weak—And 'I am sorry for it.'

'Weak, weak, indeed, my dearest 'Belford! said he, 'and weaker in 'mind, if possible, than in body:' and wept bitterly—'or I should not thus 'unman myself. I, who never feared 'any-thing, to be forced to shew myself 'such a nursling!—I am quite ashamed 'of myself!—but don't despise me; dear 'Belford, don't despise me, I beseech 'thee.'

'I ever honoured a man that could 'weep for the distresses of others; and 'ever shall,' said I; 'and such a one 'cannot be insensible of his own.'

However, I could not help being visibly moved at the poor fellow's emotion.

'Now,' said the brutal Mowbray, 'do 'I think thee insufferable, Jack. Our 'poor friend is already a peg too low; 'and here thou art letting him down 'lower and lower still. This soothing 'of him in his dejected moments, and 'joining thy womanish tears with his, is 'not the way; I am sure it is not. If 'our Lovelace were here, he'd tell thee 'so.'

'Thou art an impenetrable creature,' replied I; 'unfit to be present at a scene, 'the terrors of which thou wilt not be 'able to feel, till thou feelest them in 'thyself; and then, if thou hast time for 'feeling, my life for thine, thou behavest 'as pitifully, as those thou thinkest most 'pitiful.'

Then turning to the poor sick man, 'Tears, my dear Belton, are no signs of 'an unmanly, but, contrarily, of an humane nature; they ease the over-'charged heart, which would burst but 'for that kindly and natural relief.—

"Give

"Give sorrow words," (says Shakspeare)
"—The grief that does not speak,
"Whispers the o'er-fraught heart, and bids it
"break."

'I know, my dear Belton, thou usedst 'to take pleasure in repetitions from 'the poets; but thou must be tasteless 'of their beauties now: yet be not dis-'countenanced by this uncouth and un-'reflecting Mowbray; for, as Juvenal 'says, Tears are the prerogative of man-'kind.'

'Tis, at least, seasonably said, my 'dear Belford. It is kind to keep me 'in countenance for this womanish weak-'ness, as Mowbray has been upbraid-'ingly calling it, ever since he has been 'with me: and in so doing, (whatever 'I might have thought in such high 'health as he enjoys) has convinced me, 'that bottle-friends feel nothing but 'what moves in that little circle.'

'Well, well, proceed in your own 'way, Jack. I love my friend Belton 'as well as you can do; yet, for the 'blood of me, I cannot but think, that 'soothing a man's weakness is increas-'ing it.'

'If it be a weakness, to be touched 'at great and concerning events, in 'which our humanity is concerned,' said I, 'thou mayest be right.'

'I have seen many a man,' said the rough creature, 'going up Holborn Hill, 'that has behaved more like a man than 'either of you.'

'Aye, but, Mowbray,' replied the poor man, 'those wretches have not had 'their minds enervated by such infirmi-'ties of body as I have long laboured 'under. Thou art a shocking fellow, 'and ever wert—But to be able to re-'member nothing in these moments, but 'what reproaches me, and to know that 'I cannot hold it long, and what may 'then be my lot, if——' But interrupt-ing himself, and turning to me, 'Give 'me thy pity, Jack; 'tis balm to my 'wounded soul; and let Mowbray sit 'indifferent enough to the pangs of a 'dying friend, to laugh at us both.'

The hardened fellow then retired, with the air of a Lovelace; only more stupid; yawning and stretching, instead of humming a tune, as thou didst at Smith's.

I assisted to get the poor man into bed. He was so weak and low, that he could not bear the fatigue, and fainted away; and I verily thought was quite gone. But recovering, and his doctor coming, and advising him to keep quiet, I retired and joined Mowbray in the garden; who took more delight to talk of the living Lovelace and his levities, than of the dying Belton and his re-pentance.

I just saw him again on Saturday night before I went to bed; which I did early; for I was surfeited with Mowbray's frothy insensibility, and could not bear him.

It is such a horrid thing to think of, that a man who had lived in such strict terms of—what shall I call it?—with another; the proof does not come out so, as to say, friendship; who had pre-tended so much love for him: could not bear to be out of his company; would ride an hundred miles an end to enjoy it; and would fight for him, be the cause right or wrong: yet now could be so little moved to see him in such misery of body and mind, as to be able to re-buke him, and rather ridicule than pity him, because he was more affected by what he felt, than he had seen a male-factor (hardened perhaps by liquor, and not softened by previous sickness) on his going to execution.

This put me strongly in mind of what the divine Miss HARLOWE once said to me, talking of friendship, and what my friendship to you required of me:—'Depend upon it, Mr. Belford,' said she, 'that one day you will be convin-'ced, that what you call friendship is 'chaff and stubble; and that nothing 'is worthy of that sacred name,

'THAT HAS NOT VIRTUE FOR IT'S 'BASE.'

Sunday morning, I was called up at six o'clock, at the poor man's earnest request, and found him in a terrible agony. 'O, Jack! Jack!' said he, looking wildly as if he had seen a spec-tre—'Come nearer me!' reaching out both arms—'Come nearer me!—Dear, 'dear Belford, save me!' Then clasp-ing my arm with both his hands, and rearing up his head towards me, his eyes strangely rolling, 'Save me! dear 'Belford, save me!' repeated he.

I put my other arm about him—'Save 'you from what, my dear Belton!' said I; 'save you from what? Nothing 'shall hurt us. What must I save you 'from?'

Recovering from his terror, he sunk down again. 'O save me from my-'self!' said he; 'save me from my own 'reflections. O, dear Jack! what a 'thing it is to die; and not to have 'one comfortable reflection to revolve!

'What

'What would I give for one year of 'my paſſed life!—only one year—and to 'have the ſame ſenſe of things that I 'now have!'

I tried to comfort him as well as I could: but free-livers to free-livers are ſorry death-bed comforters. And he broke in upon me: 'O, my dear Bel-'ford,' ſaid he, 'I am told (and have 'heard you ridiculed for it) that the 'excellent Miſs Harlowe has wrought a 'converſion in you. May it be ſo! You 'are a man of ſenſe: O may it be ſo! 'Now is your time! Now, that you are 'in full vigour of mind and body!—But 'your poor Belton, alas! your poor 'Belton kept his vices till they left him '—And ſee the miſerable effects in de-'bility of mind and deſpondency! Were 'Mowbray here, and were he to laugh 'at me, I would own, that this is the 'cauſe of my deſpair—That God's juſ-'tice cannot let his mercy operate for my 'comfort: for, oh! I have been very, 'very wicked; and have deſpiſed the 'offers of his grace, till he has with-'drawn it from me for ever.'

I uſed all the arguments I could think of to give him conſolation: and what I ſaid, had ſuch an effect upon him, as to quiet his mind for the greateſt part of the day; and in a lucid hour his memory ſerved him to repeat thoſe lines of Dry-den, graſping my hand and looking wiſt-fully upon me—

'O that I leſs could fear to loſe this being,
'Which, like a ſnow-ball, in my coward
'hand,
'The more 'tis graſp'd, the faſter melts
'away!'

In the afternoon of Sunday, he was inquiſitive after you, and your preſent behaviour to Miſs Harlowe. I told him how you had been, and how light you made of it. Mowbray was pleaſed with your impenetrable hardneſs of heart, and ſaid, 'Bob Lovelace was a good 'edged-tool, and ſteel to the back:' and ſuch coarſe but hearty praiſes he gave you, as an abandoned man might give, and only an abandoned man could wiſh to deſerve.

But hadſt thou heard what the poor dying Belton ſaid on this occaſion, per-haps it would have made thee ſerious an hour or two, at leaſt.

'When poor Lovelace is brought,' ſaid he, 'to a ſick-bed, as I am now, and 'his mind forebodes, that it is impoſſi-'ble he ſhould recover, (which his could 'not do in his late illneſs; if it had, he 'could not have behaved ſo lightly in 'it) when he revolves his paſt miſ-ſpent 'life; his actions of offence to [illegible] 'innocents; in Miſs Harlowe's caſe par-'ticularly; what then will be the ſtate of 'himſelf, or of his paſt actions? His 'mind debilitated; his ſtrength turned 'into weakneſs; unable to ſtir or to move 'without help; not one ray of hope dart-'ing in upon his benighted ſoul; his con-'ſcience ſtanding in the place of a thou-'ſand witneſſes; his pains excruciating! 'weary of the poor remnant of life he 'drags, yet dreading that, in a few 'ſhort hours, his bad will be changed 'to worſe, nay, to worſt of all; and 'that worſt of all, to laſt beyond time and 'to all eternity! O Jack! what will he 'then think of the poor tranſitory gra-'tifications of ſenſe, which now engage 'all his attention? Tell him, dear Bel-'ford, tell him, how happy he is, if he 'know his own happineſs; how happy, 'compared to his poor dying friend, 'that he has recovered from his illneſs, 'and has ſtill an opportunity left him, 'for which I would give a thouſand 'worlds, had I them to give!'

I approved exceedingly of his reflec-tions, as ſuited to his preſent circum-ſtances; and inferred conſolations to him from a mind ſo properly touched.

He proceeded in the like penitent ſtrain. 'I have lived a very wicked life; 'ſo have we all. We have never made 'a conſcience of doing whatever miſ-'chief either force or fraud enabled us 'to do. We have laid ſnares for the in-'nocent heart; and have not ſcrupled, 'by the too-ready ſword, to extend, as 'occaſions offered, the wrongs we did to 'the perſons whom we had before in-'jured in their deareſt relations. But 'yet I flatter myſelf ſometimes, that I 'have leſs to anſwer for than either 'Lovelace or Mowbray; for I, by tak-'ing to myſelf that accurſed deceiver 'from whom thou haſt freed me, (and 'who for years, unknown to me, was 'retaliating upon my own head ſome of the 'evils I had brought upon others) and 'retiring, and living with her as a wife, 'was not party to half the miſchiefs, 'that I doubt they and Tourville, and 'even you, Belford, committed. As to 'the ungrateful Thomaſine, I hope I 'have met with my puniſhment in her. 'But notwithſtanding this, doſt thou not 'think, that ſuch an action—and ſuch an 'action—and ſuch an action;' [and then he recapitulated ſeveral enormities, in the perpetration of which (led on by falſe bravery, and the heat of youth and wine) we have all been concerned] 'doſt 'thou not think that theſe villainies (let 'me call them now by their proper [illegible]

'joun

'joined to the wilful and gloried-in neglect of every duty that our better ſenſe 'and education gave us to know were 'required of us as men and Chriſtians, 'are not enough to weigh down my ſoul 'into deſpondency?—Indeed, indeed, 'they are! and now to hope for mercy; 'and to depend upon the efficacy of that 'gracious attribute when that no leſs 'ſhining one of juſtice forbids me to hope; 'how can I!—I, who have deſpiſed all 'warnings, and taken no advantage of 'the benefit I might have reaped from 'the lingering conſumptive illneſs I have 'laboured under, but left all to the laſt 'ſtake; hoping for recovery againſt hope, 'and driving off repentance, till that 'grace is denied me; for, oh! my dear 'Belford! I can now neither repent, nor 'pray, as I ought; my heart is harden-'ed, and I can do nothing but deſpair!'

More he would have ſaid; but, overwhelmed with grief and infirmity, he bowed his head upon his pangful boſom, endeavouring to hide from the ſight of the hardened Mowbray, who juſt then entered the room, thoſe tears which he could not reſtrain.

Prefaced by a phlegmatick hem; 'Sad, 'very ſad, truly!' cried Mowbray; who ſat himſelf down on one ſide of the bed, as I ſat on the other: his eyes half cloſed, and his lips pouting out to his turned-up noſe, his chin curled; [to uſe one of thy deſcriptions] leaving one at a loſs to know, whether ſtupid drowzineſs or intenſe contemplation had got moſt hold of him.

'An excellent, however uneaſy leſſon, 'Mowbray!' ſaid I.—'By my faith, it 'is! It may one day, who knows how 'ſoon? be our own caſe!'

I thought of thy yawning fit, as deſcribed in thy letter of Auguſt 13. For up ſtarted Mowbray, writhing and ſhaking himſelf as in an ague-fit; his hands ſtretched over his head—with thy 'Hoy! 'hoy! hoy!' yawning. And then recovering himſelf, with another ſtretch and a ſhake, 'What's a clock?' cried he; pulling out his watch—And ſtalking by long tip-toe ſtrides through the room, down ſtairs he went; and meeting the maid in the paſſage, I heard him ſay—'Betty, bring me a bumper of claret; 'thy poor maſter, and this damned Bel-'ford, are enough to throw a Hercules 'into the vapours.'

Mowbray, after this, amuſing himſelf in our friend's library, which is, as thou knoweſt, chiefly claſſical and dramatical, found out a paſſage in Lee's Oedipus, which he would needs have to be extremely apt; and in he came full fraught with the notion of the courage it would give the dying man, and read it to him. 'Tis poetical and pretty. This is it.

'When the ſun ſets, ſhadows that ſhew'd at 'noon
'But ſmall, appear moſt long and terrible:
'So when we think fate hovers o'er our heads,
'Our apprehenſions ſhoot beyond all bounds:
'Owls, ravens, crickets, ſeem the watch of 'death;
'Nature's worſt vermin ſcare her godlike ſons:
'Echoes, the very leavings of a voice,
'Grow babbling ghoſts, and call us to our 'graves.
'Each mole-hill thought ſwells to a huge 'Olympus;
'While we, fantaſtick dreamers, heave and 'puff,
'And ſweat with our imagination's weight.'

He expected praiſes for finding this out. But Belton, turning his head from him, 'Ah, Dick!' [ſaid he] 'theſe are 'not the reflections of a dying man!—'What thou wilt one day feel, if it be 'what I now feel, will convince thee, 'that the evils before thee, and with thee, 'are more than the effects of imagina-'tion.'

I was called twice on Sunday night to him; for the poor fellow, when his reflections on his paſt life annoy him moſt, is afraid of being left with the women; and his eyes, they tell me, hunt and roll about for me, 'Where's Mr. Belford? '—But I ſhall tire him out,' cries he—'yet beg of him to ſtep to me—yet don't '—yet do;' were at once the doubting and changeful orders he gave: and they called me accordingly.'

But, alas! what could Belford do for him? Belford, who had been but too often the companion of his guilty hours; who wants mercy as much as he does; and is unable to promiſe it to himſelf, though 'tis all he can bid his poor friend rely upon.

What miſcreants are we! What figures ſhall we make in theſe terrible hours!

If Miſs HARLOWE's glorious example, on one hand, and the terrors of this poor man's laſt ſcene on the other, affect me not, I muſt be abandoned to perdition; as I fear thou wilt be, if thou beneſiteſt not thyſelf from both.

Among the conſolatory things I urged, when I was called up the laſt time on Sunday night, I told him, That he muſt not abſolutely give himſelf up to deſpair: that many of the apprehenſions he was under, were ſuch as the beſt men muſt have, on the dreadful uncertainty of what was to ſucceed to this life. 'Tis 'well obſerved,' ſaid I, 'by a poetical 'divine, who was an excellent Chriſ-'tian, [Mr. Norris] That—

" Death could not a more ſad retinue find,
" Sickneſs and pain before, and darkneſs all
" behind."

About eight o'clock yeſterday (Monday) morning, I found him a little calmer. He aſked me, who was the author of the two lines I had repeated to him; and made me ſpeak them over again. 'A ſad retinue, indeed!' ſaid the poor man. And then expreſſing his hopeleſſneſs of life, and his terrors at the thoughts of dying; and drawing from thence terrible concluſions with regard to his future ſtate; 'There is,' ſaid I, 'ſuch a natural averſion to death in 'human nature, that you are not to ima-'gine, that you, my dear Belton, are 'ſingular in the fear of it, and in the ap-'prehenſions that fill the thoughtful 'mind upon it's approach; but you 'ought, as much as poſſible, to ſeparate 'thoſe natural fears which all men muſt 'have on ſo ſolemn an occaſion from 'thoſe particular ones which your juſtly-'apprehended unfitneſs fills you with. 'Mr. Pomfret, in his Proſpect of Death, 'which I dipped into laſt night from a 'collection in your cloſet, which I put 'into my pocket, ſays,'—[And I turned to the place]

" Merely to die no man of reaſon fears;
" For certainly we muſt,
" As we are born, return to duſt;
" 'Tis the laſt point of many ling'ring years:
" But whither then we go,
" Whither we fain would know;
" But human underſtanding cannot ſhew.
" This makes US tremble."

'Mr. Pomfret, therefore,' proceeded I, 'had ſuch apprehenſions of this 'dark ſtate as you have: and the excel-'lent divine I hinted at laſt night, who 'had very little elſe but human frailties 'to reproach himſelf with, and whoſe 'miſcellanies fell into my hands among 'my uncle's books in my attendance 'upon him in his laſt hours, ſays—

" It muſt be done, my ſoul: but 'tis a ſtrange,
" A diſmal and myſterious change,
" When thou ſhalt leave this tenement of clay,
" And to an unknown—ſomewhere—wing
" away;
" When time ſhall be eternity, and thou
" Shalt be—thou know'ſt not what—and " live—thou know'ſt not how!
" Amazing ſtate! no wonder that we dread
" To think of death, or view the dead!
" Thou'rt all wrapt up in clouds, as if to this
" Our very knowledge had antipathy."

'Then follows, what I repeated—

" Death could not a more ſad retinue find,
" Sickneſs and pain before, and darkneſs all
" behind."

'Alas! my dear Belford,' [inferred the unhappy deep-thinker] 'what poor 'creatures does this convince me we 'mortals are at beſt!—But what then 'muſt be the caſe of ſuch a profligate as 'I, who by a paſt wicked life have ad-'ded greater force to theſe natural ter-'rors? If death be ſo repugnant a thing 'to human nature, that good men will 'be ſtartled at it, what muſt it be to one 'who has lived a life of ſenſe and appe-'tite; nor ever reflected upon the end 'which I now am within view of?'

What could I ſay to an inference ſo fairly drawn? Mercy, mercy, unbounded mercy, was ſtill my plea, though his repeated oppoſition of juſtice to it, in a manner ſilenced that plea: and what would I have given to have had riſe to my mind, one good, one eminently good action to have remembered him of, in order to combat his fears with it?

I believe, Lovelace, I ſhall tire thee, and that more with the ſubject of my letter, than even with the length of it. But, really, I think thy ſpirits are ſo offenſively up ſince thy recovery, that I ought, as the melancholy ſubjects offer, to endeavour to reduce thee to the ſtandard of humanity, by expatiating upon them. And then thou canſt not but be curious to know every thing that concerns the poor man, for whom thou haſt always expreſſed a great regard. I will therefore proceed as I have begun. If thou likeſt not to read it now, lay it by, if thou wilt, till the like circumſtances befal thee, till like reflections from thoſe circumſtances ſeize thee; and then take it up, and compare the two caſes together.

At his earneſt requeſt, I ſat up with him laſt night; and, poor man! it is impoſſible to tell thee, how eaſy and ſafe he thought himſelf in my company, for the firſt part of the night: 'A drowning man will catch at a ſtraw,' the proverb well ſays: and a ſtraw was I, with reſpect to any real help I could give him. He often awaked in terrors; and once calling out for me, 'Dear Belford,' ſaid he, 'where are you?—Oh! There you 'are!—Give me your friendly hand!' Then graſping it, and putting his clammy, half-cold lips to it—'How kind!—'I fear every-thing when you are abſent. 'But the preſence of a friend, a ſym-'pathizing friend—Oh! how comfort-'able!'

But about four in the morning he frighted me much: he waked with three terrible groans; and endeavoured to ſpeak, but could not preſently—and when he did—'Jack, Jack, Jack,' five or ſix times repeated he as quick as thought, 'now, now, now, ſave me, ſave 'me, ſave me—I am going—going, in-'deed!'

I threw my arms about him, and raiſ-ed him upon his pillow, as he was ſink-ing (as it to hide himſelf) in the bed-cloaths—And ſtaring wildly, 'Where 'am I?' ſaid he, a little recovering. 'Did you not ſee him?' turning his head this way and that; horror in his counte-nance; 'Did you not ſee him?'

'See whom, ſee what, my dear Bel-'ton!'

'O lay me upon the bed again!' cried he.—'Let me not die upon the floor!—'Lay me down gently; and ſtand by me! '—Leave me not!—All, all will ſoon 'be over!'

'You are already, my dear Belton, 'upon the bed. You have not been upon 'the floor. This is a ſtrong delirium; 'you are faint for want of refreſhment:' [for he had refuſed ſeveral times to take any-thing] 'let me perſuade you to 'take ſome of this cordial julap. I will 'leave you, if you will not oblige me.'

He then readily took it; but ſaid he could have ſworn that Tom Metcalfe had been in the room, and had drawn him out of bed by the throat, upbraiding him with the injuries he had firſt done his ſiſter, and then him, in the duel to which he owed that fever which coſt him his life.

Thou knoweſt the ſtory, Lovelace, too well, to need my repeating it: but, mercy on us, if in theſe terrible mo-ments all the evils we do, riſe to our af-frighted imaginations!—If ſo, what ſhocking ſcenes have I, but ſtill what more ſhocking ones haſt thou, to go through, if, as the noble poet ſays,

'If any ſenſe at that ſad time remains!'

The doctor ordered him an opiate, this morning early, which operated ſo well, that he doſed and ſlept ſeveral hours more quietly than he had done for the two paſt days and nights, though he had ſleeping draughts given him be-fore. But it is more and more evident every hour, that nature is almoſt worn out in him.

MOWBRAY, quite tired with this houſe of mourning, intends to ſet out in the morning to find you. He was not a little rejoiced to hear you were in town; I believe to have a pretence to leave us.

HE has juſt taken leave of his poor friend, intending to go away early: an everlaſting leave, I may venture to ſay; for I think he will hardly live till to-morrow night.

I believe the poor man would not have been ſorry had he left him when I ar-rived; for 'tis a ſhocking creature, and enjoys too ſtrong health to know how to pity the ſick. Then (to borrow an ob-ſervation from thee) he has, by nature, ſtrong bodily organs, which thoſe of his ſoul are not likely to whet out; and he, as well as the wicked friend he is going to, may laſt a great while from the ſtrength of their conſtitutions, though ſo greatly different in their talents: if nei-ther the ſword nor the halter interpoſe.

I muſt repeat, that I cannot but be very uneaſy for the poor lady whom you ſo cruelly perſecute; and that I do not think you have kept your honour with me. I was apprehenſive, indeed, that you would attempt to ſee her, as ſoon as you got well enough to come up; and I told her as much, making uſe of it as an argument to prepare her for your viſit, and to induce her to ſtand it. But ſhe could not, it is plain, bear the ſhock of it: and indeed ſhe told me, that ſhe would not ſee you, though but for one half hour, for the world.

Could ſhe have prevailed upon her-ſelf, I know that the ſight of her would have been as affecting to you, as your viſit could have been to her; when you had ſeen to what a lovely ſkeleton (for ſhe is really lovely ſtill, nor can ſhe, with ſuch a form and features, be other-wiſe) you have, in a few weeks, reduc-ed one of the moſt charming women in the world; and that in the full bloom of her youth and beauty.

Mowbray undertakes to carry this, that he may be more welcome to you, he ſays. Were it to be ſent unſealed, the characters we write in would be He-brew to the dunce. I deſire you to re-turn it; and I'll give you a copy of it upon demand; for I intend to keep it by me, as a guard againſt the infection of your company, which might otherwiſe, perhaps, ſome time hence, be apt to weaken

weaken the impreſſions I always deſire to have of the awful ſcene before me. God convert us both!

LETTER LIX.

MR. BELFORD, TO ROBERT LOVELACE, ESQ.

WEDNESDAY MORN. 11 O'CLOCK.

I Believe no man has two ſuch ſervants as I have. Becauſe I treat them with kindneſs, and do not lord it over my inferiors, and damn and curſe them by looks and words like Mowbray; or beat their teeth out like Lovelace; but cry, 'Pr'ythee, Harry, do this,' and, 'Pr'ythee, Jonathan, do that;' the fellows purſue their own devices and regard nothing I ſay, but what falls in with theſe.

Here, this vile Harry, who might have brought your letter of yeſterday in good time, came not in with it till paſt eleven laſt night, (drunk, I ſuppoſe;) and concluding that I was in bed, as he pretends, (becauſe he was told I ſat up the preceding night) brought it not to me; and having overſlept himſelf, juſt as I had ſealed up my letter, in comes the villain with the forgotten one, ſhaking his ears, and looking as if he himſelf did not believe the excuſes he was going to make. I queſtioned him about it, and heard his pitiful pleas; and though I never think it becomes a gentleman to treat people inſolently who by their ſtations are humbled beneath his feet, yet could I not forbear to Lovelace and Mowbray him moſt cordially.

And this detaining Mowbray (who was ready to ſet out to you before) while I write a few lines upon it, the fierce fellow, who is impatient to exchange the company of a dying Belton for that of a too lively Lovelace, affixed a ſupplement of curſes upon the ſtaring fellow, that was larger than my book—Nor did I offer to take off the bear from ſuch a mongrel, ſince, on this occaſion, he deſerved not of me the protection which every maſter owes to a good ſervant.

He has not done curſing him yet; for ſtalking about the court-yard with his boots on, (the poor fellow dreſſing his horſe, and unable to get from him) he is at him without mercy; and I will heighten his impatience (ſince being juſt under the window where I am writing, he will not let me attend to my pen) by telling you, how he fills my ears as well as the fellow's, with his—'Hay, Sir!' 'And, G—d damn ye, Sir!' And, 'Were you my ſervant, ye dog ye!' And, 'Muſt I ſtay here till the mid-'day ſun ſcorches me to a parchment, 'for ſuch a mangey dog's drunken 'neglect?—Ye lye, Sirrah!—Ye lye, I 'tell you!'—[I hear the fellow's voice in an humble excuſatory tone, though not articulately] 'Ye lye, ye dog!—I'd 'a good mind to thruſt my whip down 'your drunken throat: damn me, if I 'would not ſtay the ſkin from the back 'of ſuch a raſcal, if thou wert mine, and 'have dog's-ſkin gloves made of it, for 'thy brother ſcoundrels to wear in re-'membrance of thy abuſes of ſuch a 'maſter.'

The poor horſe ſuffers for this, I doubt not; for, 'What now;' and, 'Stand ſtill, and be damn'd to ye,' cries the fellow, with a kick, I ſuppoſe, which he better deſerves himſelf; for theſe varlets, where they can, are Mowbrays and Lovelaces to man or beaſt; and not daring to anſwer him, is ſtaying the poor horſe.

I hear the fellow is juſt eſcaped, the horſe (better curried than ordinary, I ſuppoſe, in half the uſual time) by his clanking ſhoes, and Mowbray's ſilence, letting me know, that I may now write on: and ſo, I will tell thee, that in the firſt place, (little as I, as well as you, regard dreams) I would have thee lay thine to heart; for I could give thee ſuch an interpretation of it, as would ſhock thee, perhaps: and if thou aſkeſt me for it, I will.

Mowbray calls to me from the court-yard, that 'tis a curſed hot day, and he ſhall be fried by riding in the noon of it: and that poor Belton longs to ſee me. So I will only add my earneſt deſire, that you will give over all thoughts of ſeeing the lady, if, when this comes to your hand, you have not ſeen her: and, that it would be kind, if you'd come, and, for the laſt time you will ever ſee your poor friend, ſhare my concern for him; and, in him, ſee what, in a little time will be your fate and mine, and that of Mowbray, Tourville, and the reſt of us—For what are ten, fifteen, twenty, or thirty years, to look back to; in the longeſt of which periods forward we ſhall all perhaps be mingled with the duſt from which we ſprung?

LETTER LX.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

WEDNESDAY MORN. AUG. 23.

ALL alive, dear Jack, and in ecſtaſy—Likely to be once more a happy man! For I have received a letter from my beloved Miss HARLOWE; in consequence, I suppose, of that which I mentioned in my last to be left for her from her sister. And I am setting out for Berks directly, to shew the contents to my Lord M. and to receive the congratulations of all my kindred upon it.

I went last night, as I intended, to Smith's: but the dear creature was not returned at near ten o'clock. And, lighting upon Tourville, I took him home with me, and made him sing me out of my megrims. I went to bed tolerably easy at two; had bright and pleasant dreams; (not such a frightful one as that I gave thee an account of) and at eight this morning, as I was dressing, to be in readiness against the return of my fellow, whom I had sent to enquire after the lady, I had this letter brought me by a chairman.

'TO ROBERT LOVELACE, ESQ.

'TUESDAY NIGHT, 11 O'CLOCK (AUG. 2.)

'SIR,

'I Have good news to tell you. I am 'setting out with all diligence for 'my father's house. I am bid to hope 'that he will receive his poor penitent 'with a goodness peculiar to himself; 'for I am overjoyed with the assurance 'of a thorough reconciliation, through 'the interposition of a dear blessed 'friend, whom I always loved and ho'noured. I am so taken up with my 'preparation for this joyful and long 'wished for journey, that I cannot spare 'one moment for any other business, 'having several matters of the last im'portance to settle first. So, pray, Sir, 'don't disturb or interrupt me—I be'seech you, don't. You may possibly 'in time see me at my father's; at least 'if it be not your own fault

'I will write a letter, which shall be 'sent you when I am got thither and 'received: till when, I am, &c.

'CLARISSA HARLOWE.'

I dispatched instantly a letter to the dear creature, assuring her, with the most thankful joy, That I would directly set out for Berks, and wait the issue of the happy reconciliation, and the charming hopes she had filled me with. I poured out upon her a thousand blessings. I declared that it should be the study of my whole life to merit such transcendent goodness: and that there was nothing which her father or friends should require at my hands, that I would not for her sake comply with, in order to promote and complete so desirable a reconciliation.

I hurried it away without taking a copy of it; and I have ordered the chariot-and-six to be got ready; and hey for M. Hall! Let me but know how Belton does. I hope a letter from thee is on the road. And if the poor fellow can spare thee, make haste, I command thee, to attend this truly divine lady. Thou mayest not else see her of months perhaps; at least not while she is Miss HARLOWE. And oblige me, if possible, with one letter before she sets out, confirming to me, and accounting for this generous change.

But what accounting for it is necessary? The dear creature cannot receive consolation herself but she must communicate it to others. How noble!—She would not see me in her adversity; but no sooner does the sun of prosperity begin to shine upon her, than she forgives me.

I know to whose mediation all this is owing. It is to Colonel Morden's. She always, as she says, loved and honoured him! And he loved her above all his relations.

I shall now be convinced that there is something in dreams. The opening cloud is the reconciliation in view. The bright form, lifting up my charmer through it to a firmament stuck round with golden cherubims and seraphims, indicates the charming little boys and girls, that will be the fruits of this happy reconciliation. The welcomes, thrice repeated, are those of her family, now no more to be deemed implacable. Yet are they a family too, that my soul cannot mingle with.

But then what is my tumbling over and over through the floor in a frightful hole, descending as she ascends?—Ho! only this!—it alludes to my disrelish to matrimony: which is a bottomless-pit, a gulph, and I know not what. And I suppose, had I not awoke in such a plaguy fright, I had been soused into some river at the bottom of the hole, and then been carried (mundified or purified from my past iniquities) by the same bright form, (waiting for me upon the mossy banks) to my beloved girl; and we should have gone on cherubiming of it and carolling to the end of the chapter.

But what are the black sweeping mantles and robes of Lord M. thrown over my my face?—and what are thoſe of the ladies?—Oh, Jack! I have theſe two:—they indicate nothing in the world but that my lord will be ſo good as to die, and leave me all he has. So, reſt to thy good-natured ſoul, honeſt Lord M.

Lady Sarah Sadleir, and Lady Betty Lawrance, will alſo die and leave me ſwinging legacies.

Miſs Charlotte and her ſiſter—what will become of them?—O! they will be in mourning of courſe for their uncle and aunts—that's right!

As to Morden's flaſhing through the window, and crying, 'Die, Lovelace, 'and be damn'd, if thou wilt not re-'pair my couſin's wrongs!'—That is only, that he would have ſent me a challenge, had I not been diſpoſed to do the lady juſtice.

All I diſlike is this part of the dream: for, even in a dream, I would not be thought to be threatened into any meaſure, though I liked it ever ſo well.

And ſo much for my prophetick dream.

Dear charming creature! What a meeting will there be between her and her father and mother and uncles! What tranſports, what pleaſure, will this happy long-wiſhed-for reconciliation give her dutiful heart! And indeed now methinks I am glad ſhe is ſo dutiful to them; for her duty to her parents is a conviction to me that ſhe will be as dutiful to her huſband; ſince duty upon principle is an uniform thing.

Why, pr'ythee now, Jack, I have not been ſo much to blame as thou thinkeſt: for had it not been for me, who have led her into ſo much diſtreſs, ſhe could neither have received nor given the joy that will now overwhelm them all. So here riſes great and durable good out of temporary evil!

I knew they loved her (the pride and glory of their family) too well to hold out long.

I wiſh I could have ſeen Arabella's letter. She has always been ſo much eclipſed by her ſiſter, that, I dare ſay, ſhe has ſignified this reconciliation to her with intermingled phlegm and worm-wood; and her invitation moſt certainly runs all in the rock-water ſtile.

I ſhall long to ſee the promiſed letter too when ſhe is got to her father's, which I hope will give an account of the reception ſhe will meet with.

There is a ſolemnity, however, I think, in the ſtile of her letter, which pleaſes and affects me at the ſame time. But as it is evident ſhe loves me ſtill, and hopes ſoon to ſee me at her father's, ſhe could not help being a little ſolemn, and half-aſhamed, (dear bluſhing pretty rogue!) to own her love, after my uſage of her.

And then her ſubſcription: 'Till 'when I am, CLARISSA HARLOWE:' as much as to ſay, 'After that, I ſhall be, 'if not your own fault, CLARISSA 'LOVELACE'

'O my beſt love! My ever-generous 'and adorable creature! How much 'does this thy forgiving goodneſs exalt 'us both!—Me, for the occaſion given 'thee!—Thee, for turning it ſo glori-'ouſly to thy advantage, and to the ho-'nour of both!

'And if, my beloved creature, you 'will but connive at the imperfections 'of your adorer, and not play the wife 'upon me: if, while the charms of no-'velty have their force with me, I ſhould 'happen to be drawn aſide by the love 'of intrigue, and of plots that my ſoul 'delights to form and purſue; and if 'thou wilt not be open-eyed to the fol-'lies of my youth, [a tranſitory ſtate!] 'every excurſion ſhall ſerve but the 'more to endear thee to me, till in time, 'and in a very little time too, I ſhall 'get above ſenſe; and then charmed 'by thy ſoul-attracting converſe, and 'brought to deſpiſe my former courſes, 'what I now, at diſtance, conſider as a 'painful duty, will be my joyful choice, 'and all my delight will centre in 'thee!'

MOWBRAY is juſt arrived with thy letters. I therefore cloſe my agreeable ſubject, to attend to one, which I doubt will be very ſhocking.

I have engaged the rough varlet to bear me company in the morning to Berks, where I ſhall file off the ruſt he hath contracted in his attendance upon the poor fellow.

He tells me, that between the dying Belton, and the preaching Belford, he ſhan't be his own man theſe three days: and ſays, that thou addeſt to the unhappy fellow's weakneſs, inſtead of giving him courage to help him to bear his deſtiny.

I am ſorry he takes the unavoidable lot ſo heavily. But he has been long ill; and ſickneſs enervates the mind, as well as the body; as he himſelf very ſignificantly obſerved to thee.

LETTER

LETTER LXI.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

WEDN. EVENING.

I Have been reading thy ſhocking letter—Poor Belton! what a multitude of lively hours have we paſſed together! He was a tearleſs cheerful fellow! Who'd have thought that all ſhould end in ſuch dejected whimpering and terror?

But why didſt thou not comfort the poor man about the rencounter between him and that poltroon Metcalfe? He acted in that affair like a man of true honour, and as I ſhould have acted in the ſame circumſtances. Tell him I ſay ſo; and that what happened, he could neither help nor foreſee.

Some people are as ſenſible of a ſcratch from a pin's-point, as others from the puſh of a ſword: and who can ſay anything for the ſenſibility of ſuch fellows?—Metcalfe would reſent for his ſiſter, when his ſiſter reſented not for herſelf. Had ſhe demanded her brother's protection and reſentment, that would have been another man's matter, to ſpeak in Lord M.'s phraſe; but ſhe herſelf thought her brother a coxcomb to buſy himſelf, undeſired, in her affairs, and wiſhed for nothing but to be provided for decently and privately in her lying-in; and was willing to take the chance of Maintenon-ing his conſcience in her favour, and getting him to marry when the little ſtranger came; for ſhe knew what an eaſy, good-natured fellow he was. And indeed if ſhe had prevailed upon him, it might have been happy for both; as then he would not have fallen in with his curſed Thomaſine. But truly this officious brother of her's muſt interpoſe. This made a trifling affair important: and what was the iſſue? Metcalfe challenged; Belton met him; diſarmed him; gave him his life: but the fellow, more ſenſible in his ſkin than in his head, having received a ſcratch, was frighted; it gave him firſt a puke, then a fever, and then he died. That was all. And how could Belton help that?—But ſickneſs, a long tedious ſickneſs, will make a bug-bear of any thing to a languiſhing heart, I ſee that. And ſo far was Mowbray apropos in the verſes from Nat Lee which thou haſt tranſcribed.

Merely to die, no man of reaſon fears; is a miſtake, ſay thou, or ſay thy author, what ye will. And thy ſolemn parading about the natural repugnance between life and death, is a proof that it is.

Let me tell thee, Jack, that ſo much am I pleaſed with this world, in the main; though, in ſome points too, the world (to make a perſon of it) has been a raſcal to me; ſo delighted am I with the joys of youth; with my worldly proſpects as to fortune; and now, newly, with the charming hopes given me by my dear, thrice dear, and for ever dear CLARISSA! that were I even ſure that nothing bad would come hereafter, I ſhould be very loth (very much afraid, if thou wilt have it ſo) to lay down my life and them together; and yet, upon a call of honour, no man fears death leſs than myſelf.

But I have not either inclination or leiſure to weigh thy leaden arguments, except in the pig, or, as thou wouldſt ſay, in the lump.

If I return thy letters, let me have them again ſome time hence, that is to ſay, when I am married, or when poor Belton is half-forgotten; or when time has enrolled the honeſt fellow among thoſe whom we have ſo long loſt, that we may remember them with more pleaſure than pain; and then I may give them a ſerious peruſal, and enter with thee as deeply as thou wilt into the ſubject.

When I am married, ſaid I?—What a ſound has that!

I muſt wait with patience for a ſight of this charming creature, till ſhe is at her father's. And yet, as the but bloſſoming beauty, as thou telleſt me, is reduced to a ſhadow, I ſhould have been exceedingly delighted to ſee her now, and every day till the happy one; that I might have the pleaſure of beholding how ſweetly, hour by hour, ſhe will riſe to her priſtine glories, by means of that ſtate of eaſe and contentment, which will take place of the ſtormy paſt upon her reconciliation with her friends, and our happy nuptials.

LETTER LXII.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

WELL, but now my heart is a little at eaſe, I will condeſcend to take brief notice of ſome other paſſages in thy letters.

I find, I am to thank thee, that the dear creature has avoided my viſit. Things are now in ſo good a train, that I muſt forgive thee; elſe thou ſhouldſt have heard more of this new inſtance of diſloyalty to thy general.

Thou art continually giving thyſelf high high praiſe, by way of oppoſition, as I may ſay, to others; gently and artfully blaming thyſelf for qualities thou wouldſt, at the ſame time, have to be thought, and which generally are thought, praiſe-worthy.

Thus, in the airs thou aſſumeſt about thy ſervants, thou wouldſt paſs for a mighty humane mortal; and that at the expence of Mowbray and me, whom thou repreſenteſt as kings and emperors to our menials. Yet art thou always unhappy in thy attempts of this kind, and never canſt make us, who know thee, believe that to be a virtue in thee, which is but the effect of conſtitutional phlegm and abſurdity.

Knoweſt thou not, that ſome men have a native dignity in their manner, that makes them more regarded by a look, than either thou canſt be in thy low ſtyle, or Mowbray in his high?

I am fit to be a prince, I can tell thee; for I reward well, and I puniſh ſeaſonably and properly; and I am generally as well ſerved as any man.

The art of governing theſe underbred varlets lies more in the dignity of looks than in words; and thou art a ſorry fellow, to think humanity conſiſts in acting by thy ſervants, as men muſt act who are not able to pay them their wages; or had made them maſters of ſecrets, which, if divulged, would lay them at the mercy of ſuch wretches.

Now to me, who never did any-thing I was aſhamed to own, and who have more ingenuouſneſs than ever man had; who can call a villainy by it's right name, though practiſed by myſelf, and (by my own readineſs to reproach myſelf) anticipate all reproach from others; who am not ſuch a hypocrite, as to wiſh the world to think me other or better than I am—It is my part, to look a ſervant into his duty, if I can: nor will I keep one, who knows not how to take me by a nod, or a wink; and who, when I ſmile, ſhall not be all tranſport; when I frown, all terror.

If, indeed, I am out of the way a little, I always take care to reward the varlets for patiently bearing my diſpleaſure. But this I hardly ever am, but when a fellow is egregiouſly ſtupid in any plain point of duty, or will be wiſer than his maſter; and when he ſhall tell me, that he thought acting contrary to my orders was the way to ſerve me beſt.

One time or other I will enter the liſts with thee upon thy conduct and mine to ſervants: and I will convince thee, that what thou wouldeſt have paſs for humanity, if it be indiſcriminately practiſed to all tempers, will perpetually ſubject thee to the evils thou complaineſt of; and juſtly too; and that he only is fit to be a maſter of ſervants, who can command their attention as much by a nod, as if he were to pr'ythee a fellow to do his duty, on one hand, or to talk of ſtaying and horſe-whipping, like Mowbray, on the other: for the ſervant, who being uſed to expect the creeping ſtyle, will always be maſter of his maſter, and he who deſerves to be treated as the other, is not fit to be any man's ſervant; nor would I keep ſuch a fellow to rub my horſe's heels.

I ſhall be the readier to enter the liſts with thee upon this argument, becauſe I have preſumption enough to think, that we have not in any of our dramatick poets, that I can at preſent call to mind, one character of a ſervant, of either ſex, that is juſtly hit off. So abſurdly wiſe ſome, and ſo ſottiſhly fooliſh others; and both ſometimes in the ſame perſon. Fools drawn from the lees or dregs of the people to ſet off the characters of their maſters and miſtreſſes; nay, ſometimes, which is ſtill more abſurd, introduced with more wit than the poet has to beſtow upon their principals.—Mere flints and ſteels to ſtrike fire with.—Or, to vary the metaphor, to ſerve for whetſtones to wit, which otherwiſe could not be made apparent—Or for engines to be made uſe of like the machinery of the ancient poets, (or the ſtill more unnatural ſoliloquy) to help on a ſorry plot, or to bring about a neceſſary eclairciſſement, to ſave the poet the trouble of thinking deeply for a better way to wind up his bottoms.

Of this I am perſuaded, (whatever my practice be to my own ſervants) that thou wilt be benefited by my theory, when we come to controvert the point. For then I ſhall convince thee that the dramatick as well as natural characteriſticks of a good ſervant ought to be fidelity, common ſenſe, cheerful obedience, and ſilent reſpect: that wit in his ſtation, except to his companions, would be ſaucineſs: that he ſhould never preſume to give his advice: that if he ventured to expoſtulate upon any unreaſonable command, or ſuch a one as appeared to him to be ſo, he ſhould do it with humility and reſpect, and take a proper ſeaſon for it. But ſuch leſſons do moſt of the dramatick performances I have ſeen give, where ſervants are introduced as characters eſſential to the play, or to act very ſignificant or long parts parts in it; (which, of itſelf, I think a fault) ſuch leſſons, I ſay, do they give to the footmen's gallery, that I have not wondered we have ſo few modeſt or good men-ſervants among thoſe who often attend their maſters or miſtreſſes to plays. Then how miſerably evident muſt that poet's conſcious want of genius be, who can ſtoop to raiſe or give force to a clap by the indiſcriminate roar of the party-coloured gallery!

But this ſubject I will ſuſpend to a better opportunity; that is to ſay, to the happy one, when my nuptials with my Clariſſa will oblige me to increaſe the number of my ſervants, and of conſequence to enter more nicely into their qualifications.

ALTHOUGH I have the higheſt opinion that man can have of the generoſity of my dear Miſs Harlowe, yet I cannot, for the heart of me, account for this agreeable change in her temper, but one way. Faith and troth, Belford, I verily believe, laying all circumſtances together, that the dear creature unexpectedly finds herſelf in the way I have ſo ardently wiſhed her to be in; and that this makes her, at laſt, incline to favour me, that ſhe may ſet the better face upon her geſtation, when at her father's.

If this be the caſe, all her falling away, and her fainting fits, are charmingly accounted for. Nor is it ſurprizing, that ſuch a ſweet novice in theſe matters ſhould not, for ſome time, have known to what to attribute her frequent indiſpoſitions. If this ſhould be the caſe, how ſhall I laugh at thee! and (when I am ſure of her) at the dear novice herſelf, that all her grievous diſtreſſes ſhall end in a man-child; which I ſhall love better than all the cherubims and ſeraphims that may come after; though there were to be as many of them as I beheld in my dream; in which a vaſt expanſe of firmament was ſtuck as full of them as it could hold.

I ſhall be afraid to open thy next, leſt it bring me the account of poor Belton's death. Yet, as there are no hopes of his recovery—But what ſhould I ſay, unleſs the poor man were better fitted—But thy heavy ſermon ſhall not affect me too much neither.

I incloſe thy papers: and do thou tranſcribe them for me, or return them; for there are ſome things in them, which, at a proper ſeaſon, a mortal man ſhould not avoid attending to: and thou ſeemeſt to have entered deeply into the ſhocking ſubject—But here I will end, leſt I grow too ſerious.

THY ſervant called here about an hour ago, to know if I had any commands: I therefore hope that thou wilt have this early in the morning. And if thou canſt let me hear from thee, do. I'll ſtretch an hour or two in expectation of it. Yet I muſt be at Lord M.'s to-morrow night, if poſſible, though ever ſo late.

Thy fellow tells me the poor man is much as he was when Mowbray left him.

Wouldſt thou think that this varlet Mowbray is ſorry that I am ſo near being happy with Miſs Harlowe? And, egad, Jack, I know not what to ſay to it, now the fruit ſeems to be within my reach—But let what will come, I'll ſtand to't: for I find I can't live without her.

LETTER LXIII.

MR. BELFORD, TO ROBERT LOVELACE, ESQ.

WEDNESDAY, THREE O'CLOCK.

I Will proceed where I left off in my laſt.

As ſoon as I had ſeen Mowbray mounted, I went to attend upon poor Belton; whom I found in dreadful agonies, in which he awoke, as he generally does.

The doctor came in preſently after; and I was concerned at the ſcene that paſſed between them.

It opened with the dying man's aſking him, with melancholy earneſtneſs, If nothing, if nothing at all, could be done for him?

The doctor ſhook his head, and told him, He doubted not.

'I cannot die,' ſaid the poor man: 'I 'cannot think of dying. I am very de-'ſirous of living a little longer, if I could 'but be free from theſe horrible pains 'in my ſtomach and head. Can you 'give me nothing to make me paſs one 'week, but one week, in tolerable eaſe, 'that I may die like a man?—If I muſt 'die!

'But, doctor, I am yet a young man; 'in the prime of my years—Youth is a 'good ſubject for a phyſician to work 'upon: can you do nothing, nothing 'at all for me, doctor?'

'Alas! Sir,' replied his phyſician, 'you have been long in a bad way. I 'fear, I fear, nothing in phyſick can 'help you.'

He

He was then out of all patience. 'What, then, is your art, Sir!—I have 'been a paſſive machine for a whole 'twelvemonth, to be wrought upon at 'the pleaſure of you people of the fa-'culty. I verily believe, had I not 'taken ſuch doſes of naſty ſtuff, I had 'been now a well man—But who the 'plague would regard phyſicians, whoſe 'art is to cheat us with hopes, while 'they help to deſtroy us? And who, not 'one of you, know any-thing but by 'gueſs!

'Sir,' continued he fiercely, (and with more ſtrength of voice, and cohe-rence, than he had ſhewn for ſeveral hours before) 'if you give me over, I 'give you over.—The only honeſt and 'certain part of the art of healing is ſur-'gery. A good ſurgeon is worth a 'thouſand of you. I have been in ſur-'geons hands often, and have always 'found reaſon to depend upon their 'ſkill: but your art, Sir, what is it?—'but to dawb, dawb, dawb; load, load, 'load; plaſter, plaſter, plaſter; till ye 'utterly deſtroy the appetite firſt, and 'the conſtitution afterwards, which you 'are called in to help. I had a com-'panion once—My dear Belford, thou 'knoweſt honeſt Blomer—as pretty a 'phyſician he would have made as any 'in England, had he kept himſelf from 'exceſs in wine and women; and he 'always uſed to ſay, there was nothing 'at all but pick-pocket parade in the 'phyſician's art; and that the beſt gueſ-'ſer was the beſt phyſician: and I uſed 'to believe him too: and yet, fond of 'life, and fearful of death, what do we 'do, when we are taken ill, but call ye 'in? And what do ye do, when called 'in, but nurſe our diſtempers, till from 'pygmies you make giants of them?—'And then ye come creeping with ſo-'lemn faces, when ye are aſhamed to 'preſcribe, or when the ſtomach won't 'bear it's natural food, by reaſon of 'your poiſonous potions, "Alas! I am 'afraid phyſick can do no more for him!"—'Nor need it, when it has brought to 'the brink of the grave, the poor wretch 'who placed all his reliance in your 'curſed ſlops, and the flattering hopes 'you give him.'

The doctor was out of countenance; but ſaid, 'If we could make mortal 'men immortal, and would not, all this 'might be juſt.'

I blamed the poor man; yet excuſed him to the phyſician. 'To die, dear 'doctor, when, like my poor friend, we 'are ſo deſirous of life, is a melancholy 'thing. We are apt to hope too much, 'not conſidering that the ſeeds of death 'are ſown in us when we begin to live, 'and grow up, till, like rampant weeds, 'they choak the tender flower of life; 'which declines in us, as thoſe weeds 'flouriſh. We ought therefore to be-'gin early to ſtudy what our conſtitutions 'will bear, in order to root out, by 'temperance, the weeds which the ſoil 'is moſt apt to produce; or, at leaſt, to 'keep them down as they riſe; and not, 'when the flower or plant is withered 'at the root, and the weed in it's full 'vigour, expect, that the medical art 'will reſtore the one, or deſtroy the 'other; when that other, as I hinted, 'has been rooting itſelf in the habit 'from the time of our birth.'

This ſpeech, Bob, thou wilt call a prettineſs; but the allegory is juſt; and thou haſt not quite cured me of the me-taphorical.

'Very true,' ſaid the doctor; 'you have 'brought a good metaphor to illuſtrate 'the thing. I am ſorry I can do nothing 'for the gentleman; and can only re-'commend patience, and a better frame 'of mind.'

'Well, Sir,' ſaid the poor angry man, vexed at the doctor, but more at death; 'you will perhaps recommend 'the next in ſucceſſion to the phyſician, 'when he can do no more; and, I ſup-'poſe, will ſend your brother to pray 'by me for thoſe virtues which you 'wiſh me.'

It ſeems the phyſician's brother is a clergyman in the neighbourhood.

I was greatly concerned to ſee the gentleman thus treated; and ſo I told poor Belton when he was gone. But he continued impatient, and would not be denied, he ſaid, the liberty of talking to a man, who had taken ſo many gui-neas of him for doing nothing, or worſe than nothing, and never declined one, though he knew all the time he could do him no good.

It ſeems the gentleman, though rich, is noted for being greedy after fees; and poor Belton went on, raving at the extravagant fees of Engliſh phyſicians, compared with thoſe of the moſt emi-nent foreign ones. But, poor man! he, like the Turks, who judge of a general by his ſucceſs, (out of patience to think he muſt die) would have worſhipped the doctor, and not grudged three times the ſum, could he have given him hopes of recovery.

But nevertheleſs, I muſt needs ſay, that gentlemen of the faculty ſhould be more moderate in their fees, or take more pains to deſerve them; for, generally, they only come into a room, feel the ſick man's pulſe, aſk the nurſe a few queſtions, inſpect the patient's tongue, and perhaps his water; then ſit down, look plaguy wiſe; and write. The golden fee fills the ready hand, and they hurry away, as if the ſick man's room were infectious. So to the next they troll, and to the next, if men of great practice; valuing themſelves upon the number of viſits they make in a morning, and the little time they make them in. They go to dinner, and unload their pockets; and ſally out again to refill them. And, thus, in a little time, they raiſe vaſt eſtates; for, as Ratcliffe ſaid, when firſt told of a great loſs which befel him, It was only going up and down a hundred pair of ſtairs to fetch it up.

Mrs. Sambre (Belton's ſiſter) had ſeveral times propoſed to him a miniſter to pray by him; but the poor man could not, he ſaid, bear the thoughts of one; for that he certainly ſhould die in an hour or two after: and he was willing to hope ſtill, againſt all probability, that he might recover; and was often aſking his ſiſter, If ſhe had not ſeen people as bad as he was, who, almoſt to a miracle, when every-body gave them over, had got up again?

She, ſhaking her head, told him, ſhe had: but, once ſaying, that their diſorders were of an acute kind, and ſuch as had a criſis in them, he called her Small hopes, and Job's comforter; and bid her ſay nothing, if ſhe could not ſay more to the purpoſe, and what was fitter for a ſick man to hear. And yet, poor fellow! he has no hopes himſelf, as is plain by his deſponding terrors; one of which he fell into, and a very dreadful one, ſoon after the doctor went.

WEDNESDAY, NINE O'CLOCK AT NIGHT.

THE poor man has been in convulſions, terrible convulſions! for an hour paſt. O Lord, Lovelace! death is a ſhocking thing!—By my faith it is!—I wiſh thou wert preſent on this occaſion. It is not merely the concern a man has for his friend; but, as death is the common lot, we ſee, in his agonies, how it will be one day with ourſelves. I am all over as if cold water were poured down my back, or if I had a ſtrong ague-fit upon me. I was obliged to come away. And I write, hardly knowing what—I wiſh thou wert here.

THOUGH I left him, becauſe I could ſtay no longer, I can't be eaſy by myſelf, but muſt go to him again.

ELEVEN O'CLOCK.

POOR Belton!—Drawing on apace! Yet was he ſenſible when I went in—too ſenſible, poor man! He has ſomething upon his mind to reveal, he tells me, that is the worſt action of his life; worſe than ever you or I knew of him, he ſays. It muſt be then very bad!

He ordered every-body out; but was ſeized with another convulſion-fit, before he could reveal it: and in it he lies ſtruggling between life and death. But I'll go in again.

ONE O'CLOCK IN THE MORNING.

ALL now muſt ſoon be over with him:—poor! poor fellow! he has given me ſome hints of what he wanted to ſay; but all incoherent, interrupted by dying hiccoughs and convulſions.

Bad enough it muſt be, Heaven knows, by what I can gather!—Alas, Lovelace! I fear, I fear, he came too ſoon into his uncle's eſtate.

If a man were to live always, he might have ſome temptation to do baſe things, in order to procure to himſelf, as it would then be everlaſting eaſe, plenty, or affluence: but for the ſake of ten, twenty, thirty years of poor life, to be a villain—Can that be worth while? With a conſcience ſtinging him all the time too! And when he comes to wind up all, ſuch agonizing reflections upon his paſt guilt! All then appearing as nothing! What he moſt valued, moſt diſguſtful! And not one thing to think of, as the poor fellow ſays twenty and twenty times over, but what is attended with anguiſh and reproach!

To hear the poor man wiſh he had never been born! To hear him pray to be nothing after death! Good God! how ſhocking!

By his incoherent hints, I am afraid 'tis very bad with him. No pardon, no mercy, he repeats, can lie for him!

I hope I ſhall make a proper uſe of this leſſon. Laugh at me, if thou wilt; but never, never more, will I take the liberties I have taken; but whenever I am tempted, will think of Belton's dying agonies, and what my own may be.

THURSDAY, THREE IN THE MORNING.

HE is now at his laſt gaſp—Rattles in the throat—Has a new convulſion every minute almoſt!—What horror is he he in! His eyes look like breath-ſtained glaſs! They roll ghaſtly no more; are quite ſet: his face diſtorted, and drawn out, by his ſinking jaws, and erected ſtaring eye-brows, with his lengthened furrowed forehead, to double it's uſual length, as it ſeems. It is not, it cannot be, the face of Belton, thy Belton, and my Belton, whom we have beheld with ſo much delight over the ſocial bottle, comparing notes, that one day may be brought againſt us, and make us groan, as they very lately did him—that is to ſay, while he had ſtrength to groan; for now his voice is not to be heard; all inward, loſt; not ſo much as ſpeaking by his eyes: yet, ſtrange! how can it be? —the bed rocking under him like a cradle!

FOUR O'CLOCK.

'Alas! he's gone! That groan, that dreadful
'groan,
'Was the laſt farewel of the parting mind!
'The ſtruggling ſoul has bid a long adieu
'To it's late manſion—Fled! ah! whither
'fled?'

Now is all indeed over!—Poor, poor Belton! By this time thou knoweſt if thy crimes were above the ſize of God's mercies! Now are every one's cares and attendance at an end! Now do we, thy friends—poor Belton!—know the worſt of thee, as to this life! Thou art releaſed from inſufferable tortures, both of body and mind! May thoſe tortures, and thy repentance, expiate for thy offences, and mayſt thou be happy to all eternity!

We are told, that God deſireth not the death, the ſpiritual death, of a ſinner: and 'tis certain, that thou didſt deeply repent! I hope, therefore, as thou wert not cut off in the midſt of thy ſins, by the ſword of injured friendſhip, which more than once thou hadſt braved, [the dreadfulleſt of all deaths, next to ſuicide, becauſe it gives no opportunity for repentance] that this is a merciful earneſt that thy penitence is accepted; and that thy long illneſs, and dreadful agonies in the laſt ſtages of it, were thy only puniſhment.

I wiſh, indeed, I heartily wiſh, we could have ſeen one ray of comfort darting in upon his benighted mind, before he departed. But all, alas! to the very laſt gaſp, was horror and confuſion. And my only fear ariſes from this, that, till within the four laſt days of his life, he could not be brought to think he ſhould die, though in a viſible decline for months; and, in that preſumption, was too little inclined to ſet about a ſerious preparation for a journey, which he hoped he ſhould not be obliged to take; and when he began to apprehend that he could not put it off, his impatience, and terror, and apprehenſion, ſhewed too little of that reliance and reſignation which afford the moſt comfortable reflections to the friends of the dying, as well as to the dying themſelves.

But we muſt leave poor Belton to that mercy, of which we have all ſo much need; and for my own part, (do you, Lovelace, and the reſt of the fraternity, as ye will) I am reſolved I will endeavour to begin to repent of my follies while my health is ſound, my intellects untouched, and while it is in my power to make ſome atonement, as near to reſtitution or reparation as is poſſible, to thoſe I have wronged or miſled. And do ye outwardly, and from a point of falſe bravery, make as light as ye will of my reſolution, as ye are none of ye of the claſs of abandoned and ſtupid ſots, who endeavour to diſbelieve the future exiſtence of which ye are afraid, I am ſure you will juſtify me in your hearts, if not by your practices; and one day you will wiſh you had joined with me in the ſame reſolution, and will confeſs there is more good-ſenſe in it, than now perhaps you will own.

SEVEN O'CLOCK, THURSDAY MORNING.

YOU are very earneſt, by your laſt letter juſt given me, to hear again from me, before you ſet out for Berks. I will therefore cloſe with a few words upon the only ſubject in your letter which I can at preſent touch upon: and this is the letter of which you give me a copy from the lady.

Want of reſt, and the ſad ſcene I have before my eyes, have rendered me altogether incapable of accounting for the contents of it in any ſhape. You are in ecſtacies upon it. You have reaſon to be ſo, if it be as you think. Nor would I rob you of your joy: but I muſt ſay that I am amazed at it.

Surely, Lovelace, this ſurprizing letter cannot be a forgery of thy own, in order to carry on ſome view, and to impoſe upon me. Yet by the ſtile of it, it cannot; though thou art a perfect Proteus, too.

I will not, however, add another word, after I have deſired the return of this, and have told you, that I am, your true friend and well-wiſher,

J. BELFORD.

LETTER LXIV.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

AUG. 24. THURSDAY MORN.

I Received thy letter in such good time, by the fellow's dispatch, that it gives me an opportunity of throwing in a few paragraphs upon it. I read a passage or two of it to Mowbray; and we both agree, that thou art an absolute master of the lamentable.

Poor Belton, what terrible conflicts were thy last conflicts!—I hope, however, that he is happy: and I have the more hope, because the hardness of his death is likely to be such a warning to thee. If it have the effect thou declarest it shall have, what a world of mischief will it prevent! How much good will it do! How many poor wretches will rejoice at the occasion, (if they know it) however melancholy in itself, which shall bring them in a compensation for injuries they had been forced to sit down contented with!—But, Jack, though thy uncle's death hath made thee a rich fellow, art thou sure, that the making good of such a vow will not totally bankrupt thee?

Thou sayest I may laugh at thee, if I will. Not I, Jack; I do not take it to be a laughing subject: and I am heartily concerned at the loss we all have in poor Belton: and when I get a little settled, and have leisure to contemplate the vanity of all sublunary things, (a subject that will now-and-then, in my gayest hours, obtrude itself upon me) it is very likely, that I may talk seriously with thee upon these topicks; and, if thou hast not got too much the start of me in the repentance thou art entering upon, will go hand-in-hand with thee in it. If thou hast, thou wilt let me just keep thee in my eye; for it is an up-hill work; and I shall see thee, at setting out, at a great distance; but as thou art a much heavier and clumsier fellow than myself, I hope that without much puffing and sweating, only keeping on a good round dog-trot, I hope I shall be able to overtake thee.

Mean time, take back thy letter, as thou desirest. I would not have it in my pocket upon any account at present; nor read it once more.

I am going down without seeing my beloved. I was a hasty fool to write her a letter, promising that I would not come near her till I saw her at her father's. For as she is now actually at Smith's, and I so near her, one short visit could have done no harm.

I sent Will, two hours ago, with my grateful compliments, and to know how she does.

How must I adore this charming creature! For I am ready to think my servant a happier fellow than myself, for having been within a pair of stairs and an apartment of her.

Mowbray and I will drop a tear a-piece, as we ride along, to the memory of poor Belton:—as we ride along, I say; for we shall have so much joy when we arrive at Lord M's, and when I communicate to him and my cousins the dear creature's letter, that we shall forget every-thing grievous: since now their family hopes in my reformation (the point which lies so near their hearts) will all revive; it being an article of their faith, that if I marry, repentance and mortification will follow of course.

Neither Mowbray nor I shall accept of thy verbal invitation to the funeral. We like not these dismal formalities. And as to the respect that is supposed to be shewn to the memory of a deceased friend in such an attendance, why should we do any thing to reflect upon those who have made it a fashion to leave this parade to people whom they hire for that purpose?

Adieu, and be cheerful. Thou canst now do no more for poor Belton, wert thou to howl for him to the end of thy life.

LETTER LXV.

MR. BELFORD, TO ROBERT LOVELACE, ESQ.

SAT. AUG. 26.

ON Thursday afternoon I assisted at the opening of poor Belton's will, in which he has left me his sole executor, and bequeathed me a legacy of an hundred guineas; which I shall present to his unfortunate sister, to whom he has not been so kind as I think he ought to have been. He also left twenty pounds a-piece to Mowbray, Tourville, thyself, and me, for a ring to be worn in remembrance of him.

After I had given some particular orders about the preparations to be made for his funeral, I went to town; but having made it late before I got in on Thursday night, and being fatigued for want of rest several nights before, and low in my spirits, [I could not help it, Lovelace] I contented myself to send my compliments to the innocent ſufferer, to enquire after her health.

My ſervant ſaw Mrs. Smith, who told him, ſhe was very glad I was come to town; for that the lady was worſe than ſhe had been yet.

It is impoſſible to account for the contents of her letter to you; or to reconcile thoſe contents to the facts I have to communicate.

I was at Smith's by ſeven yeſterday (Friday) morning, and found that the lady was gone in a chair to St. Dunſtan's to prayers: ſhe was too ill to get out by ſix to Covent Garden church; and was forced to be ſupported to her chair by Mrs. Lovick. They would have perſuaded her againſt going; but ſhe ſaid ſhe knew not but that it might be her laſt opportunity. Mrs. Lovick, dreading that ſhe would be taken worſe at church, walked thither before her.

Mrs. Smith told me, ſhe was ſo ill on Wedneſday night, that ſhe had deſired to receive the ſacrament; and accordingly it was adminiſtered to her by the parſon of the pariſh: whom ſhe beſought to take all opportunities of aſſiſting her in her ſolemn preparation.

This the gentleman promiſed: and called in the morning to enquire after her health: and was admitted at the firſt word. He ſtaid with her about half an hour; and when he came down, with his face turned aſide, and a faltering accent, 'Mrs. Smith,' ſaid he, 'you 'have an angel in your houſe.—I will 'attend her again in the evening, as ſhe 'deſires, and as often as I think it will 'be agreeable to her.'

Her increaſed weakneſs ſhe attributed to the fatigues ſhe had undergone by your means; and to a letter ſhe had received from her ſiſter, which ſhe anſwered the ſame day.

Mrs. Smith told me, that two different perſons had called there, one on Thurſday morning, one in the evening, to enquire after her ſtate of health; and ſeemed as if commiſſioned from her relations for that purpoſe; but aſked not to ſee her,-only were very inquiſitive after her viſitors, (particularly, it ſeems, after me: what could they mean by that?) after her way of life, and expences; and one of them enquired after her manner of ſupporting them; to the latter of which, Mrs. Smith ſaid, ſhe had anſwered as the truth was, that ſhe had been obliged to ſell ſome of her cloaths, and was actually about parting with more; at which the inquiriſt (a grave old farmer-looking man) held up his hands and ſaid, 'Good God!—this 'will be ſad, ſad news to ſomebody! I 'believe I muſt not mention it.' But Mrs. Smith ſays, ſhe deſired he would, let him come from whom he would. He ſhook his head, and ſaid, If ſhe died, the flower of the world would be gone, and the family ſhe belonged to would be no more than a common family*. I was pleaſed with the man's expreſſion.

You may be curious to know how ſhe paſſed her time when ſhe was obliged to leave her lodging to avoid you.

Mrs. Smith tells me, that ſhe was very ill when ſhe went out on Monday morning, and ſighed as if her heart would break as ſhe came down ſtairs, and as ſhe went through the ſhop into the coach, her nurſe with her, as you had informed me before: that ſhe ordered the coachman (whom ſhe hired for the day) to drive any-whither, ſo it was in the air: he accordingly drove her to Hampſtead, and thence to Highgate. There at the Bowling-green Houſe ſhe alighted, extremely ill, and having breakfaſted, ordered the coachman to drive very ſlowly any-whither. He crept along to Muſwell Hill, and put up at a publick houſe there; where ſhe employed herſelf two hours in writing, though exceedingly weak and low; till the dinner ſhe had ordered was brought in: ſhe endeavoured to eat, but could not: her appetite was gone, quite gone, ſhe ſaid. And then ſhe wrote on for three hours more: after which, being heavy, ſhe dozed a little in an elbow-chair. When ſhe awoke ſhe ordered the coachman to drive her very ſlowly to town, to the houſe of a friend of Mrs. Lovick; whom, as agreed upon, ſhe met there: but, being extremely ill, ſhe would venture home at a late hour, although ſhe heard from the widow, that you had been there; and had reaſon to be ſhocked at your behaviour. She ſaid, ſhe found there was no avoiding you: ſhe was apprehenſive ſhe ſhould not live many hours, and it was not impoſſible but the ſhock the ſight of you muſt give her would determine her fate in your preſence.

She accordingly went home. She heard the relation of your aſtoniſhing

* This man came from her couſin Morden; as will be ſeen hereafter, Letter XCIV. of this Volume, and Letter I. of Vol. VIII.

vagaries, vagancies, with hands and eyes often lifted up; and with these words intermingled, 'Shocking creature! Incorrigible 'wretch!' and, 'Will nothing make 'him serious?' And not being able to bear the thoughts of an interview with a man so hardened, she took to her usual chair early in the morning, and was carried to the Temple Stairs, whither she had ordered her nurse before her, to get a pair of oars in readiness; (for her fatigues the day before made her unable to bear a coach) and then she was rowed to Chelsea, where she breakfasted; and after rowing about, put in at the Swan at Brentford-Aight, where she dined; and would have written, but had no conveniency either of tolerable pens, or ink, or a private room: and then proceeding to Richmond, they rowed her back to Mortlake; where she put in, and drank tea at a house her waterman recommended to her. She wrote there for an hour; and returned to the Temple; and when she landed, made one of the watermen get her a chair, and so was carried to the widow's friend, as the night before; where she again met the widow, who informed her, that you had been after her twice that day.

Mrs. Lovick gave her there her sister's letter; and she was so much affected with the contents of it, that she was twice very nigh fainting away; and wept bitterly, as Mrs. Lovick told Mrs. Smith; dropping some warmer expressions than ever they had heard proceed from her lips, in relation to her friends; calling them cruel, and complaining of ill offices done her, and of vile reports raised against her.

While she was thus disturbed, Mrs. Smith came to her, and told her that you had been there a third time, and was just gone (at half an hour after nine) having left word, how civil and respectful you would be; but that you was determined to see her at all events.

She said, it was hard she could not be permitted to die in peace: that her lot was a severe one: that she began to be afraid she should not forbear repining, and to think her punishment greater than her fault: but recalling herself immediately, she comforted herself that her life would be short, and with the assurance of a better.

By what I have mentioned, you will conclude with me, that the letter brought her by Mrs. Lovick (the superscription of which you saw to be written in her sister's hand) could not be the letter on the contents of which she grounded that she wrote to you, on her return home. And yet neither Mrs. Lovick, nor Mrs. Smith, nor the servant of the latter, know of any other brought her. But as the woman assured me, that she actually did write to you, I was eased of a suspicion which I had begun to entertain, that you, (for some purpose I could not guess at) had forged the letter from her of which you sent me a copy.

On Wednesday morning, when she received your letter in answer to hers, she said, 'Necessity may well be called 'the mother of invention—But calamity is the test of integrity.—I hope I 'have not taken an inexcusable step—' And there she stopt a minute or two; and then said, 'I shall now, perhaps, 'be allowed to die in peace.'

I staid till she came in. She was glad to see me; but, being very weak, said, she must sit down before she could go up stairs: and so went into the back-shop, leaning upon Mrs. Lovick: and when she had sat down, 'I am glad to 'see you, Mr. Belford,' said she; 'I 'must say so—let mis-reporters say what 'they will.'

I wondered at this expression; but would not interrupt her.

'Oh! Sir,' said she, 'I have been 'grievously harrassed. Your friend, 'who would not let me live with re-'putation, will not permit me to die in 'peace. You see how I am. Is there 'not a great alteration in me within 'this week? But 'tis all for the better. 'Yet were I to wish for life, I must 'say, that your friend, your barbarous 'friend, has hurt me greatly.'

She was so very weak, so short-breathed, and her words and her actions so very moving, that I was forced to walk from her; the two women and her nurse turning away their faces also weeping.

'I have had, Madam,' said I, 'since 'I saw you, a most shocking scene be-'fore my eyes, for days together. My 'poor friend Belton is no more. He 'quitted the world yesterday morning 'in such dreadful agonies, that the im-'pression they have left upon me, has 'so weakened my mind—'

I was loth to have her think, that my grief was owing to the weak state I saw her in, for fear of dispiriting her.

'This is only, Mr. Belford,' interrupted she, 'in order to strengthen it, if 'a proper use be made of the impression. 'But I should be glad, since you are so 'humanely affected with the solemn 'circumstance, that you could have 'written on account of it to your gay

'friend

'friend, in the ſtile and manner you 'are maſter of. Who knows, as it 'would have come from an aſſociate and 'of an aſſociate, how it might have af-'fected him?'

That I had done, I told her, in ſuch a manner as had, I believed, ſome effect upon you.

'His behaviour in this honeſt family 'ſo lately,' ſaid ſhe, 'and his cruel pur-'ſuit of me, give but little hope that 'any thing ſerious or ſolemn will affect 'him.'

We had ſome talk about Belton's dying behaviour, and I gave her ſeveral particulars of the poor man's impatience and deſpair; to which ſhe was very attentive: and made fine obſervations upon the ſubject of procraſtination.

A letter and packet were brought her by a man on horſeback from Miſs Howe, while we were talking. She retired up ſtairs to read it; and while I was in diſcourſe with Mrs. Smith and Mrs. Lovick, the doctor and apothecary both came in together. They confirmed to me my fears, as to the dangerous way ſhe is in. They had both been apprized of the new inſtances of implacableneſs in her friends, and of your perſecutions: and the doctor ſaid, he would not for the world be either the unforgiving father of that lady, or the man who had brought her to this diſtreſs. 'Her heart's broken: ſhe'll 'die,' ſaid he: 'there is no ſaving her. 'But how, were I either the one or the 'other of the people I have named, I 'ſhould ſupport myſelf afterwards I 'cannot tell.'

When ſhe was told we were all three together, ſhe deſired us to walk up. She aroſe to receive us, and after anſwering two or three general queſtions relating to her health, ſhe addreſſed herſelf to us to the following effect.

'As I may not,' ſaid ſhe, 'ſee you 'three gentlemen together again, let 'me take this opportunity to acknow-'ledge my obligations to you all.—I 'am inexpreſſibly obliged to you, Sir— 'and to you, Sir,' [curtſeying to the doctor and to Mr. Goddard] 'for your 'more than friendly, your paternal care 'and concern for me. Humanity in your 'profeſſion, I dare ſay, is far from be-'ing a rare qualification, becauſe you are 'gentlemen by your profeſſion: but ſo 'much kindneſs, ſo much humanity, 'did never deſolate creature meet with, 'as I have met with from you both. But 'indeed I have always obſerved, that 'where a perſon relies upon Providence, 'it never fails to raiſe up a new friend 'for every old one that falls off.

'This gentleman,' [bowing to me] 'who, ſome people think, ſhould have 'been one of the laſt I ſhould have 'thought of for my executor—is never-'theleſs (ſuch is the ſtrange turn that 'things have taken!) the only one I can 'chuſe; and therefore I have choſen 'him for that charitable office, and he 'has been ſo good as to accept of it: for, 'rich as I may boaſt myſelf to be, I am 'rather ſo in right, than in fact, at this 'preſent. I repeat therefore my hum-'ble thanks to you all three, and beg 'of God to return to you and yours,' [looking to each] 'an hundred fold, the 'kindneſs and favour you have ſhewn 'me; and that it may be in the power 'of you and of yours, to the end of time, 'to confer benefits, rather than to be 'obliged to receive them. This is a god-'like power, gentlemen: I once rejoic-'ed in it in ſome little degree; and much 'more in the proſpect I had of it's be-'ing enlarged to me; though I have had 'the mortification to experience the re-'verſe, and to be obliged almoſt to 'every-body I have ſeen or met with: '—but all, originally, through my own 'fault; ſo I ought to bear the puniſh-'ment without repining: and I hope I 'do—Forgive theſe impertinences: a 'grateful heart, that wants the power it 'wiſhes for, to expreſs itſelf ſuitably to 'it's own impulſes, will be at a loſs what 'properly to dictate to the tongue; and 'yet, unable to reſtrain it's overflow-'ings, will force the tongue to ſay weak 'and ſilly things, rather than appear un-'gratefully ſilent. Once more then, I 'thank you all three for your kindneſs 'to me: and God Almighty make you 'that amends which at preſent I cannot!'

She retired from us to her cloſet with her eyes full; and left us looking upon one another.

We had hardly recovered ourſelves, when ſhe, quite eaſy, cheerful, and ſmiling, returned to us. 'Doctor,' ſaid ſhe, (ſeeing we had been moved) 'you 'will excuſe me for the concern I give 'you—and ſo will you, Mr. Goddard— 'and you, Mr. Belford—for 'tis a con-'cern that only generous natures can 'ſhew; and to ſuch natures ſweet is the 'pain, if I may ſo ſay, that attends ſuch 'a concern. But as I have ſome few 'preparations ſtill to make, and would 'not (though in caſe of Mr. Belford's 'future cares, which is, and ought to 'be, part of my ſtudy) undertake more 'than it is likely I shall have time lent 'me to perform, I would beg of you to 'give me your opinions, [You see my 'way of living; and you may be assured, 'that I will do nothing wilfully to shorten my life] how long it may possibly 'be, before I may hope to be released 'from all my troubles.'

They both hesitated, and looked upon each other. 'Don't be afraid to answer 'me,' said she, each sweet hand pressing upon the arm of each gentleman, with that mingled freedom and reserve, which virgin modesty, mixed with conscious dignity, can only express, and with a look serenely earnest, 'Tell me 'how long you think I may hold it! And 'believe me, gentlemen, the shorter 'you tell me my time is likely to be, the 'more comfort you will give me.'

'With what pleasing woe,' said the doctor, 'do you fill the minds of those 'who have the happiness to converse 'with you, and see the happy frame you 'are in! What you have undergone 'within a few days past, has much hurt 'you: and should you have fresh troubles of those kinds, I could not be answerable for your holding it—' And there he paused.

'How long, doctor?—I believe I shall 'have a little more ruffling—I am afraid 'I shall—But there can happen only one 'thing that I shall not be tolerably easy 'under—How long then, Sir?'

He was silent.

'A fortnight, Sir?'

He was still silent.

'Ten days?—A week?—How long, 'Sir?' with smiling earnestness.

'If I must speak, Madam, if you have 'not better treatment than you have 'lately met with, I am afraid—' There again he stopt.

'Afraid of what, doctor? Don't be 'afraid—How long, Sir?'

'That a fortnight or three weeks may 'deprive the world of the finest flower 'in it.'

'A fortnight or three weeks yet, doctor?—But, God's will be done! I shall, 'however, by this means, have full 'time, if I have but strength and intellect left, to do all that is now upon my 'mind to do.—And so, Sirs, I can but 'once more thank you' [turning to each of us] 'for all your goodness to me; 'and, having letters to write, will take 'up no more of your time—Only, doctor, be pleased to order me some more 'of those drops: they cheer me a little 'when I am low;' and putting a fee into his unwilling hand—'You know the 'terms, Sir!'—Then, turning to Mr. Goddard, 'You'll be so good, Sir, as 'to look in upon me to-night, or to-'morrow, as you have opportunity—'and you, Mr. Belford, I know, will 'be desirous to set out to prepare for 'the last office of your late friend: so I 'wish you a good journey, and hope to 'see you when that is performed.'

She then retired, with a cheerful and serene air. The two gentlemen went away together. I went down to the women, and, enquiring, found, that Mrs. Lovick was this day to bring her twenty guineas more, for some other of her apparel.

The widow told me, that she had taken the liberty to expostulate with her, upon the occasion she had for raising this money, to such great disadvantage; and it produced the following short and affecting conversation between them.

'None of my friends will wear any-'thing of mine,' said she. 'I shall leave 'a great many good things behind me. '—And as to what I want the money for '—don't be surprized:—but suppose I 'want it to purchase a house.'

'You are all mystery, Madam. I don't 'comprehend you.'

'Why, then, Mrs Lovick, I will explain myself.—I have a man, not a 'woman, for my executor: and think 'you that I will leave to his care anything that concerns my own person? '—Now, Mrs. Lovick,' smiling, 'do 'you comprehend me?'

Mrs. Lovick wept.

'O fie!' proceeded the lady, drying up her tears with her own handkerchief, and giving her a kiss—'Why this 'kind weakness for one, with whom you 'have been so little a while acquainted? 'Dear, good Mrs. Lovick, don't be 'concerned for me on a prospect with 'which I have occasion to be pleased; 'but go to-morrow to your friends, and 'bring me the money they have agreed 'to give you.'

Thus, Lovelace, it is plain, that she means to bespeak her last house! Here's presence of mind; here's tranquillity of heart, on the most affecting occasion!—This is magnanimity, indeed!—Couldst thou, or could I, with all our boisterous bravery, and offensive false courage, act thus?—Poor Belton! how unlike was thy behaviour!

Mrs. Lovick tells me, that the lady spoke of a letter she had received from her favourite divine Dr. Lewen, in the time time of my abſence; and of an anſwer ſhe had returned to it. But Mrs. Lovick knows not the contents of either.

When thou receiveſt the letter I am now writing, thou wilt ſee what will ſoon be the end of all thy injuries to this divine lady. I ſay, when thou receiveſt it; for I will delay it for ſome little time, leſt thou ſhouldeſt take it into thy head (under pretence of reſenting the diſappointment her letter muſt give thee) to moleſt her again.

This letter having detained me by it's length, I ſhall not now ſet out for Epſom till to-morrow.

I ſhould have mentioned, that the lady explained to me what the one thing was, that ſhe was afraid might happen to ruffle her. It was the apprehenſion of what may reſult from a viſit which Colonel Morden, ſhe is informed, deſigns to make you.

LETTER LXVI.

THE REV. DR. LEWEN, TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

FRIDAY, AUG. 18.

PRESUMING, deareſt and ever-reſpectable young lady, upon your former favour, and upon your opinion of my judgment and ſincerity, I cannot help addreſſing you by a few lines, on your preſent unhappy ſituation.

I will not look back upon the meaſures into which you have either been led or driven: but will only ſay as to thoſe, that I think you are the leaſt to blame of any young lady that was ever reduced from happy to unhappy circumſtances; and I have not been wanting to ſay as much, where I hoped my freedom would have been better received than I have had the mortification to find it to be.

What I principally write for now, is, to put you upon doing a piece of juſtice to yourſelf, and to your ſex, in the proſecuting for his life (I am aſſured his life is in your power) the moſt profligate and abandoned of men, as he muſt be, who could act ſo baſely, as I underſtand Mr. Lovelace has acted by you.

I am very ill; and am now forced to write upon my pillow; my thoughts confuſed; and incapable of method: I ſhall not therefore aim at method: but to give you in general my opinion.—And that is, that your religion, your duty to your family, the duty you owe to your honour, and even charity to your ſex, oblige you to give publick evidence againſt this very wicked man.

And let me add another conſideration: the prevention, by this means, of the miſchiefs that may otherwiſe happen between your brother and Mr. Lovelace, or between the latter and your couſin Morden, who is now, I hear, arrived, and reſolves to have juſtice done you.

A conſideration which ought to affect your conſcience; [Forgive me, deareſt young lady, I think I am now in the way of my duty] and to be of more concern to you, than that hard preſſure upon your modeſty which I know the appearance againſt him in an open court muſt be of to ſuch a lady as you; and which, I conceive, will be your great difficulty. But I know, Madam, that you have dignity enough to become the bluſhes of the moſt naked truth, when neceſſity, juſtice, and honour, exact it from you. Rakes and raviſhers would meet with encouragement indeed, and moſt from thoſe who had the greateſt abhorrence of their actions, if violated modeſty were never to complain of the injury it received from the villainous attempters of it.

In a word, the reparation of your family diſhonour now reſts in your own boſom: and which only one of theſe two alternatives can repair; to wit, either to marry the offender, or to proſecute him at law. Bitter expedients for a foul ſo delicate as yours!

He, and all his friends, I underſtand, ſolicit you to the firſt: and it is certainly now, all the amends within his power to make. But I am aſſured, that you have rejected their ſolicitations, and his, with the indignation and contempt that his foul actions have deſerved: but yet, that you refuſe not to extend to him the Chriſtian forgiveneſs he has ſo little reaſon to expect, provided he will not diſturb you further.

But, Madam, the proſecution I adviſe, will not let your preſent and future exemption from freſh diſturbance from ſo vile a moleſter depend upon his courteſy: I ſhould think ſo noble and ſo rightly-guided a ſpirit as yours, would not permit that it ſhould, if you could help it.

And can indignities of any kind be properly pardoned till we have it in our power to puniſh them? To pretend to pardon, while we are labouring under the pain or diſhonour of them, will be thought by ſome to be but the vaunted mercy of a puſillanimous heart, trembling bling to resent them. The remedy I propose, is a severe one; but what pain can be more severe than the injury? or how will injuries be believed to grieve us, that are never honourably complained of?

I am sure, Miss Clarissa Harlowe, however injured and oppressed, remains unshaken in her sentiments of honour and virtue: and although she would sooner die than deserve that her modesty should be drawn into question; yet she will think no truth immodest that is to be uttered in the vindicated cause of innocence and chastity. Little, very little difference is there, my dear young lady, between a suppressed evidence, and a false one.

It is a terrible circumstance, I once more own, for a young lady of your delicacy, to be under the obligation of telling so shocking a story in publick court: but it is still a worse imputation, that she should pass over so mortal an injury unresented.

Conscience, honour, justice, are on your side: and modesty would, by some, be thought but an empty name, should you refuse to obey their dictates.

I have been consulted, I own, on this subject. I have given it as my opinion, that you ought to prosecute the abandoned man—But without my reasons. These I reserved, with a resolution to lay them before you unknown to anybody, that the result, if what I wish, may be your own.

I will only add, that the misfortunes which have befallen you, had they been the lot of a child of my own, could not have affected me more than yours have done. My own child I love: but I both love and honour you: since to love you, is to love virtue, good sense, prudence, and every thing that is good and noble in woman.

Wounded as I think all these are by the injuries you have received, you will believe that the knowledge of your distresses must have afflicted, beyond what I am able to express, your sincere admirer, and humble servant,

ARTHUR LEWEN.

I just now understand, that your sister will, by proper authority, propose this prosecution to you. I humbly presume, that the reason why you resolved not upon this step from the first, was, that you did not know, that it would have the countenance and support of your relations.

LETTER LXVII.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO THE REV. DR. LEWEN.

SAT. AUG. 19.

REV'D AND DEAR SIR,

I Thought, till I received your affectionate and welcome letter, that I had neither father, uncle, brother left; nor hardly a friend among my former favourers of your sex. Yet knowing you so well, and having no reason to upbraid myself with a faulty will, I was to blame (even although I had doubted the continuance of your good opinion) to decline the trial whether I had forfeited it or not; and if I had, whether I could not, honourably, reinstate myself in it.

But, Sir, it was owing to different causes that I did not; partly to shame, to think how high, in my happier days, I stood in your esteem, and how much I must be sunk in it, since those so much nearer in relation to me gave me up; partly to deep distress, which makes the humbled heart diffident; and made mine afraid to claim the kindred mind in yours, which would have supplied to me, in some measure, all the dear and lost relations I have named.

Then, so loth, as I sometimes was, to be thought to want to make a party against those whom both duty and inclination bid me reverence: so long trailed on between hope and doubt: so little my own mistress at one time; so fearful of making or causing mischief, at another; and not being encouraged to hope, by your kind notice, that my application to you would be acceptable:—apprehending, that my relations had engaged your silence at least.

THESE—But why these unavailing retrospections now?—I was to be happy—In order to be happy; that is my hope!—Resigning therefore to that hope, I will, without any further preamble, write a few lines (if writing to you, I can write but a few) in answer to the subject of your kind letter.

Permit me, then, to say, That I believe your arguments would have been unanswerable in almost every other case of this nature, but in that of the unhappy Clarissa Harlowe.

It is certain, that creatures who cannot stand the shock of publick shame, should be doubly careful how they expose themselves to the danger of incurring private guilt, which may possibly bring them to it. But as to myself, suppose there were no objections from the declining way I am in as to my health; and ſuppoſing I could have prevailed upon myſelf to appear againſt this man; were there not room to apprehend, that the end ſo much wiſhed for by my friends (to wit, his condign puniſhment) would not have been obtained, when it came to be ſeen, that I had conſented to give him a clandeſtine meeting; and, in conſequence of that, had been weekly tricked out of myſelf; and further ſtill, had not been able to avoid living under one roof with him for ſeveral weeks; which I did (not only without complaint, but) without cauſe of complaint?

Little advantage in a court (perhaps, bandied about, and jeſted profligately with) would ſome of thoſe pleas in my favour have been, which out of court, and to a private and ſerious audience, would have carried the greateſt weight againſt him—Such, particularly, as the infamous methods to which he had recourſe.

It would, no doubt, have been a ready retort from every mouth, that I ought not to have thrown myſelf into the power of ſuch a man, and that I ought to take for my pains what had befallen me.

But had the proſecution been carried on to effect, and had he even been ſentenced to death, can it be ſuppoſed, that his family would not have had intereſt enough to obtain his pardon, for a crime thought too lightly of, though one of the greateſt that can be committed againſt a creature valuing her honour above her life?—While I had been cenſured as purſuing, with ſanguinary views, a man who offered me early all the reparation in his power to make?

And had he been pardoned, would he not then have been at liberty to do as much miſchief as ever?

I dare ſay, Sir, ſuch is the aſſurance of the man upon whom my unhappy deſtiny threw me; and ſuch his inveteracy to my family, (which would then have appeared to be juſtified by their known inveteracy to him, and by their earneſt endeavours to take away his life;) that he would not have been ſorry to have had an opportunity to confront me, and my father, uncles, and brother, at the bar of a court of juſtice, on ſuch an occaſion. In which caſe, would not (on his acquittal, or pardon) reſentments have been reciprocally heightened? And then would my brother, or my couſin Morden, have been more ſecure than now?

How do theſe conſiderations aggravate my fault!—My motives, at firſt, were not indeed blameable: but I had forgotten the excellent caution, which yet I was not ignorant of, That we ought not to do evil that good may come of it.

In full conviction of the purity of my heart, and of the firmneſs of my principles, [Why may I not, thus called upon, ſay what I am conſcious of, and yet without the imputation of faulty pride; ſince all is but a duty, and I ſhould be utterly inexcuſeable, could I not juſtly ſay what I do?—In this full conviction] he had offered me marriage. He has avowed his penitence: a ſincere penitence I have reaſon to think it, though perhaps not a Chriſtian one. And his noble relations, (kinder to the poor ſufferer than her own) on the ſame conviction, and his own not ungenerous acknowledgments, have joined to intercede with me to forgive and accept of him. Although I cannot comply with the latter part of their interceſſion, have not you, Sir, from the beſt rules, and from the divineſt example, taught me to forgive injuries?

The injury I have received from him is indeed of the higheſt nature, and it was attended with circumſtances of unmanly baſeneſs, and premeditation; yet, I bleſs God, it has not tainted my mind; it has not hurt my morals. No thanks indeed to the wicked man that it has not. No vile courſes have followed it. My will is unviolated. The evil (reſpecting myſelf, and not my friends) is merely perſonal. No credulity, no weakneſs, no want of vigilance, have I to reproach myſelf with. I have, through grace, triumphed over the deepeſt machinations. I have eſcaped from him. I have renounced him. The man whom once I could have loved, I have been enabled to deſpiſe: and ſhall not charity complete my triumph? And ſhall I not enjoy it?—And where would be my triumph, if he deſerved my forgiveneſs?—Poor man! He has had a loſs in loſing me! I have the pride to think ſo, becauſe I think I know my own heart. I have had none in loſing him!

But I have another plea to make, which alone would have been enough (as I preſume) to anſwer the contents of your very kind and friendly letter.

I know, my dear and reverend friend, the ſpiritual guide and director of my happier days! I know, that you will allow of my endeavour to bring myſelf to this charitable diſpoſition, when I tell you how near I think myſelf to that great and awful moment, in which, and even in the ardent preparation to which, every ſenſe of indignity or injury that concerns not the immortal ſoul, ought to be abſorbed in higher and more important contemplations.

Thus much for myſelf.

And for the ſatisfaction of my friends and favourers, Miſs Howe is ſolicitous to have all thoſe letters and materials preſerved, which will ſet my whole ſtory in a true light. The good Dr. Lewen is one of the principal of thoſe friends and favourers.

The warning that may be given from thoſe papers to all ſuch young creatures as may have known or heard of me, may be of more efficacy to the end wiſhed for, as, I humbly preſume to think, than my appearance could have been in a court of juſtice, purſuing a doubtful event, under the diſadvantages I have mentioned. And if, my dear and good Sir, you are now, on conſidering every thing, of this opinion, and I could know it, I ſhould conſider it as a particular felicity; being as ſolicitous as ever to be juſtified in what I may in your eyes.

I am ſorry, Sir, that your indiſpoſition has reduced you to the neceſſity of writing upon your pillow. But how much am I obliged to that kind and generous concern for me, which has impelled you, as I may ſay, to write a letter, containing ſo many paternal lines, with ſuch inconvenience to yourſelf!

May the Almighty bleſs you, dear and reverend Sir, for all your goodneſs to me of long time paſt, as well as for that which engages my preſent gratitude! Continue to eſteem me to the laſt, as I do and will venerate you! And let me beſpeak your prayers, the continuance, I ſhould ſay, of your prayers; for I doubt not, that I have always had them: and to them, perhaps, has in part been owing, (as well as to your pious precepts inſtilled through my earlier youth) that I have been able to make the ſtand I have made; although every-thing that you prayed for has not been granted to me by that Divine Wiſdom, which knows what is beſt for it's poor creatures.

My prayers for you are, That it will pleaſe God to reſtore you to your affectionate flock; and after as many years of life as ſhall be for His ſervice, and to your own comfort, give us a happy meeting in thoſe regions of bleſſedneſs, which you have taught me, as well by example, as by precept, to aſpire to!

LETTER LXVIII.

MISS ARABELLA HARLOWE, TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

[IN ANSWER TO HERS TO HER UNCLE ANTONY, OF AUG. 13.]

MONDAY, AUG. 21.

SISTER CLARY,

I Find, by your letters to my uncles, that they, as well as I, are in great diſgrace with you for writing our minds to you.

We can't help it, ſiſter Clary.

You don't think it worth your while, I find, a ſecond time to preſs for the bleſſing you pretend to be ſo earneſt about. You think, no doubt, that you have done your duty in aſking for it: ſo you'll ſit down ſatisfied with that, I ſuppoſe, and leave it to your wounded parents to repent hereafter that they have not done theirs, in giving it to you, at the firſt word; and in making ſuch enquiries about you, as you think ought to have been made. Fine encouragement to enquire after a run-away daughter! living with her fellow, as long as he would live with her! You repent alſo (with your full mind, as you modeſtly call it) that you wrote to me.

So we are not likely to be applied to any more, I find, in this way.

Well, then, ſince this is the caſe, ſiſter Clary, let me, with all humility, addreſs myſelf with a propoſal or two to you; to which you will be graciouſly pleaſed to give an anſwer.

Now you muſt know that we have had hints given us from ſeveral quarters, that you have been uſed in ſuch a manner by the villain you ran away with, that his life would be anſwerable for his crime, if it were fairly to be proved. And by your own hints, ſomething like it appears to us.

If, Clary, there be any thing but jingle and affected period in what proceeds from your full mind, and your dutiful conſciouſneſs; and if there be truth in what Mrs. Norton and Mrs. Howe have acquainted us with, you may yet juſtify your character to us, and to the world, in every-thing but your ſcandalous elopement; and the law may reach the villain: and could we but bring him to the gallows, what a meritorious revenge would that be to our whole injured family, and to the innocents he has deluded, as well as the ſaving from ruin many others!

Let me, therefore, know, (if you pleaſe) whether you are willing to appear to do yourſelf, and us, and your ſex, this this juſtice? If not, ſiſter Clary, we ſhall know what to think of you; for neither you nor we can ſuffer more than we have done from the ſcandal of your fall: and if you will, Mr. Ackland and Counſellor Derham will both attend you to make proper enquiries, and to take minutes of your ſtory, to found a próceſs upon, if it will bear one, with as great a probability of ſucceſs as we are told it may be proſecuted with.

But by what Mrs. Howe intimates, this is not likely to be complied with; for it is what ſhe hinted to you, it ſeems, by her lively daughter, but without effect; and then, again, poſſibly, you may not at preſent behave ſo prudently in ſome certain points, as to entitle yourſelf to publick juſtice; which, if true, the Lord have mercy upon you.

One word only more as to the above propoſal:—Your admirer, Dr. Lewen, is clear in his opinion that you ſhould proſecute the villain.

But if you will not agree to this, I have another propoſal to make to you; and that in the name of every-one in the family; which is, that you will think of going to Penſylvania to reſide there for ſome few years till all is blown over: and, if it pleaſe God to ſpare you, and your unhappy parents, till they can be ſatisfied that you behave like a true and uniform penitent; at leaſt till you are one-and-twenty; you may then come back to your own eſtate, or have the produce of it ſent you thither, as you ſhall chuſe. A period which my father fixes, becauſe it is the cuſtom; and becauſe he thinks your grandfather ſhould have fixed it; and becauſe, let me add, you have fully proved, by your fine conduct, that you were not at years of diſcretion at eighteen. Poor doating, though good old man!—Your grandfather, he thought—But I would not be too ſevere.

Mr. Hartley has a widow-ſiſter at Penſylvania, with whom he will undertake you may board, and who is a ſober, ſenſible, well-read woman. And if you were once well there, it would rid your father and mother of a world of cares and fears, and ſcandal; and I think is what you ſhould wiſh for of all things.

Mr. Hartley will engage for all accommodations in your paſſage ſuitable to your rank and fortune; and he has a concern in a ſhip, which will ſail in a month; and you may take your ſecret-keeping Hannah with you, or whom you will of your newer acquaintance. 'Tis preſumed that your companions will be of your own ſex.

Theſe are what I had to communicate to you; and if you'll oblige me with an anſwer, (which the hand that conveys this will call for on Wedneſday morning) it will be very condeſcending.

ARABELLA HARLOWE.

LETTER LXIX.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS ARABELLA HARLOWE.

TUESDAY, AUG. 22.

WRITE to me, my hard-hearted ſiſter, in what manner you pleaſe, I ſhall always be thankful to you for your notice. But (think what you will of me) I cannot ſee Mr. Ackland and the counſellor on ſuch a buſineſs as you mention.

The Lord have mercy upon me, indeed! For none elſe will.

Surely I am believed to be a creature paſt all ſhame, or it could not be thought of ſending two gentlemen to me on ſuch an errand.

Had my mother required of me (or would modeſty have permitted you to enquire into) the particulars of my ſad ſtory, or had Mrs. Norton been directed to receive them from me, methinks it had been more fit: and I preſume to think, that it would have been more in every-one's character too, had they been required of me before ſuch heavy judgment had been paſſed upon me, as has been paſſed.

I know that this is Dr. Lewen's opinion. He has been ſo good as to enforce it in a kind letter to me. I have anſwered his letter; and given ſuch reaſons as I hope will ſatisfy him. I could wiſh it were thought worth while to requeſt of him a ſight of my anſwer.*

To your other propoſal, of going to Penſylvania; this is my anſwer—If nothing happen within a month which may fall as effectually rid my parents and friends of that world of cares, and fears, and ſcandals, which you mention, and if I am then able to be carried on board a ſhip, I will cheerfully obey my father and mother, although I were ſure to die in the paſſage. And, if I

* Her letter containing the reaſons ſhe refers to, was not aſked for; and Dr. Lewen's death, which fell out ſoon after he had received it, was the reaſon that it was not communicated to the family, till it was too late to do the ſervice that might have been hoped for from it.

may may be forgiven for saying so, (for indeed it proceeds not from a spirit of revenge) you shall let over me, instead of my poor obliging, but really unculpable, Hannah, your Betty Barnes; to whom I will be answerable for all my conduct. And I will make it worth her while to accompany me.

I am equally surprized and concerned at the hints which both you and my uncle Antony give of new points of misbehaviour in me!—What can be meant by them?

I will not tell you, Miss Harlowe, how much I am afflicted at your severity, and how much I suffer by it, and by your hard-hearted levity of stile, because what I shall say may be construed into jingle and period, and because I know it is intended, very possibly, for that end, to mortify me. All I will therefore say, is, that it does not lose it's end, if that be it.

But, nevertheless, (divesting myself as much as possible of all resentment) I will only pray, that Heaven will give you, for your own sake, a kinder heart than at present you seem to have; since a kind heart, I am convinced, is a greater blessing to it's possessor, than it can be to any other person. Under this conviction, I subscribe myself, my dear Bella, your ever-affectionate sister,

CL. HARLOWE.

LETTER LXX.

MRS. NORTON, TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

[IN ANSWER TO HERS OF THURSDAY, AUGUST 17.]

TUESDAY, AUG. 22.

MY DEAREST YOUNG LADY,

THE letters you sent me, I now return by the hand that brings you this.

It is impossible for me to express how much I have been affected by them, and by your last of the 17th. Indeed, my dear Miss Clary, you are very harshly used; indeed you are! And if you should be taken from us, what grief and what punishment are they not treasuring up against themselves in the heavy reflections which their rash censures and unforgivingness will occasion them!

But I find to what your uncle Antony's cruel letter is owing, as well as one you will be still more afflicted by, [God help you, my poor dear child!] when it comes to your hand, written by your sister, with proposals to you.

It was finished to send you yesterday, I know; and I apprize you of it, that you should fortify your heart against the contents of it.

The motives, which incline them all to this severity, if well grounded, would authorize any severity they could express, and which, while they believe them to be so, both they and you are to be equally pitied.

They are owing to the information of that officious Mr. Brand, who has acquainted them, (from some enemy of yours in the neighbourhood about you) that visits are made you, highly censurable, by a man of a free character, and an intimate of Mr. Lovelace; who is often in private with you; sometimes twice or thrice a-day.

Betty gives herself great liberties of speech upon this occasion, and all your friends are too ready to believe, that things are not as they should be; which makes me wish, that, let the gentleman's views be ever so honourable, you could entirely drop acquaintance with him.

Something of this nature was hinted at by Betty to me before, but so darkly, that I could not tell what to make of it; and this made me mention it to you so generally, as I did in my last.

Your cousin Morden has been among them. He is exceedingly concerned for your misfortunes; and as they will not believe Mr. Lovelace would marry you, he is determined to go to Lord M.'s, in order to inform himself, from Mr. Lovelace's own mouth, whether he intends to do you that justice or not.

He was extremely caressed by everyone at his first arrival; but I am told there is some little coldness between them and him at present.

I was in hopes of getting a sight of this letter of Mr. Brand, (a rash officious man!) but it seems Mr. Morden had it given him yesterday to read, and he took it away with him.

God be your comfort, my dear Miss! But indeed I am exceedingly disturbed at the thoughts of what may still be the issue of all these things. I am, my beloved young lady, your most affectionate and faithful

JUDITH NORTON.

LETTER LXXI.

MRS. NORTON, TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

TUESDAY, AUG. 22.

AFTER I had sealed up the inclosed, I had the honour of a private visit from from your aunt Hervey; who has been in a very low-ſpirited way, and kept her chamber for ſeveral weeks paſt; and is but juſt got abroad.

She longed, ſhe ſaid, to ſee me, and to weep with me, on the hard fate that had befallen her beloved niece.

I will give you a faithful account of what paſſed between us; as I expect that it will, upon the whole, adminiſter hope and comfort to you.

She pitied very much your good mother, who, ſhe aſſured me, is obliged to act a part entirely contrary to her inclinations; as ſhe herſelf, ſhe owns, had been in a great meaſure.

She ſaid, that the poor lady was with great difficulty witheld from anſwering your letter to her; which had (as was your aunt's expreſſion) almoſt broken the heart of every-one: that ſhe had reaſon to think, that ſhe was neither conſenting to your two uncles writing, nor approving of what they wrote.

She is ſure they all love you dearly; but have gone ſo far, that they know not how to recede.

That, but for the abominable league which your brother had got every-body into, (he refuſing to ſet out for Scotland till it was renewed, and till they had all promiſed to take no ſtep towards a reconciliation in his abſence but by his conſent; and to which your ſiſter's reſentments kept them up;) all would, before now, have happily ſubſided.

That nobody knew the pangs which their inflexible behaviour gave them, ever ſince you had begun to write to them in ſo affecting and humble a ſtile.

That, however, they were not inclined to believe that you were either ſo ill, or ſo penitent, as you really are; and ſtill leſs, that Mr. Lovelace is in earneſt in his offers of marriage.

She is ſure, however, ſhe ſays, that all will ſoon be well: and the ſooner for Mr. Morden's arrival: who is very zealous in your behalf.

She wiſhed to Heaven, that you would accept of Mr. Lovelace, wicked as he has been, if he were now in earneſt.

It had always, ſhe ſaid, been matter of aſtoniſhment to her, that ſo weak a pride in her couſin James, of making himſelf the whole family, ſhould induce them all to refuſe an alliance with ſuch a family as Mr. Lovelace's was.

She would have it, that your going off with Mr. Lovelace, was the unhappieſt ſtep for your honour and your intereſt that could have been taken; for that although you would have had a ſevere trial the next day, yet it would probably have been the laſt; and your pathetick powers muſt have drawn you off ſome friends—hearing at your mother, at your uncle Harlowe, at your uncle Hervey, and herſelf.

But here (that the regret that you did not truſt to the event of that meeting, may not, in your preſent low way, too much afflict you) I muſt obſerve, that it ſeems a little too evident, even from this opinion of your aunt's, that it was not abſolutely determined that all compulſion was deſigned to be avoided, ſince your freedom from it muſt have been owing to the party to be made among them by your perſuaſive eloquence and dutiful expoſtulation.

She owned, that ſome of them were as much afraid of meeting you, as you could be of meeting them:—but why ſo, if they deſigned, in the laſt inſtance, to give you your way?

Your aunt told me, that Mrs. Williams had been with her, and aſked her opinion if it would be taken amiſs, if ſhe deſired leave to go up, to attend her deareſt young lady in her calamity. Your aunt referred her to your mother: but had heard no more of it.

Her daughter, (Miſs Dolly) ſhe ſaid, had been frequently earneſt with her on the ſame ſubject; and renewed her requeſt with the greateſt fervour when your firſt letter came to hand.

Your aunt ſays, that ſhe then being very ill, wrote to your mother upon it, hoping it would not be taken amiſs, if ſhe permitted Miſs Dolly to go; but that your ſiſter, as from your mother, anſwered her, that now you ſeemed to be coming to, and to have a due ſenſe of your faults, you muſt be left entirely to their own management.

Miſs Dolly, ſhe ſaid, had pined ever ſince ſhe had heard of Mr. Lovelace's baſeneſs; being doubly mortified by it; firſt, on account of your ſufferings; next, becauſe ſhe was one who rejoiced in your getting off, and vindicated you for it: and had incurred cenſure and ill-will on that account; eſpecially from your brother and ſiſter; ſo that ſhe ſeldom went to Harlowe Place.

Make the beſt uſe of theſe intelligences, my deareſt young lady, for your conſolation.

I will only add, that I am, with the moſt fervent prayers for your recovery and reſtoration to favour, your ever faithful

JUDITH NORTON.

LETTER

LETTER LXXII.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MRS. JUDITH NORTON.

THURSDAY, AUG. 24.

THE relation of such a conversation as passed between my aunt and you, would have given me pleasure, had it come some time ago; because it would have met with a spirit more industrious than mine now is, to pick out remote comfort in the hope of a favourable turn that might one day have rewarded my patient duty.

I did not doubt my aunt's good-will to me. Her affection I did not doubt. But shall we wonder that kings and princes meet with so little controul in their passions, be they ever so violent, when in a private family, an aunt, nay even a mother in that family, shall chuse to give up a once favoured child against their own inclinations, rather than oppose an aspiring young man, who had armed himself with the authority of a father, who, when once determined, never would be expostulated with?

And will you not blame me, if I say, that good sense, that kindred indulgence, must be a little offended at the treatment I have met with; and if I own, that I think, that great rigour has been exercised towards me? And yet I am now authorized to call it rigour by the judgment of two excellent sisters, my mother and my aunt, who acknowledge (as you tell me from my aunt) that they have been obliged to join against me, contrary to their inclinations; and that, even in a point which might seem to concern my eternal welfare.

But I must not go on at this rate. For may not the inclination my mother has given up, be the effect of a too fond indulgence, rather than that I merit the indulgence? And yet so petulantly perverse am I, that I must tear myself from the subject.

All then that I will say further to it, at this time, is, that were the intended goodness to be granted to me but a week hence, it would possibly be too late—Too late, I mean, to be of the consolation to me, that I would wish from it: for what an ineffacacious preparation must I have been making, if it has not, by this time, carried me above—But above what?—Poor mistaken creature! Unhappy self-deluder! that finds herself above nothing! Not able to subdue her own faulty impatience!

But in-deed to have done with a subject, that I dare not trust myself with; if it comes in your way, let my aunt Hervey, let my dear cousin Dolly, let the worthy Mrs. Williams, know, how exceedingly grateful to me their kind intentions and concern for me are: and, as the best warrant or justification of their good opinions, (since I know that their favour of me is founded on the belief that I loved virtue) tell them, that I continued to love virtue to my last hour, as I presume to hope it may be said; and assure them, that I never made the least wilful deviation, however unhappy I became for one faulty step; which nevertheless was not owing to unworthy or perverse motives.

I am very sorry, that my cousin Morden has taken a resolution to see Mr. Lovelace.

My apprehensions on this intelligence are a great abatement to the pleasure I have in knowing that he still loves me.

My sister's letter to me is a most affecting one—So needlessly, so ludicrously taunting!—But for that part of it that is so, I ought rather to pity her, than to be so much concerned at it as I am.

I wonder what I have done to Mr. Brand—I pray God to forgive both him and his informants, whoever they be. But if the scandal arise solely from Mr. Belford's visits, a very little time will confute it. Meanwhile the packet I shall send you, which I sent to Miss Howe, will, I hope, satisfy you, my dear Mrs. Norton, as to my reasons for admitting his visits.

My sister's taunting letter, and the inflexibleness of my dear friends—But how do remoter-begun subjects tend to the point which lies nearest the heart! —As new-caught bodily disorders all croud to a fractured or distempered part.

I will break off, with requesting your prayers, that I be blessed with patience and due resignation; and with assuring you, that I am, and will be, to the last hour of my life, your equally grateful and affectionate CL. HARLOWE.

LETTER LXXIII.

MISS HOWE, TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

[IN REPLY TO HERS OF FRIDAY, AUG. 11.]

YARMOUTH, ISLE OF WIGHT, AUG. 23.

MY DEAREST FRIEND,

I Have read the letters, and copies of letters, you favoured me with: and I return them by a particular hand.

I am

I am extremely concerned at your indifferent ſtate of health: but I approve of all your proceedings and precautions in relation to the appointment of Mr. Belford for an office, in which, I hope, neither he nor any-body elſe will be wanted to act, for many, very many years.

I admire, and ſo we do all, that greatneſs of mind which can make you ſo ſtedfaſtly deſpiſe (through ſuch inducements as no other woman could reſiſt, and in ſuch deſolate circumſtances as you have been reduced to) the wretch that ought to be ſo heartily deſpiſed and deteſted.

What muſt the contents of thoſe letters from your relations be, which you will not communicate to me!—Fie upon them! How my heart riſes!—But I dare ſay no more—Though you yourſelf now begin to think they uſe you with great ſeverity.

Every-body here is ſo taken with Mr. Hickman, (and the more from the horror they conceive at the character of the deteſtable Lovelace) that I have been teazed to death almoſt to name a day. This has given him airs; and, did I not keep him to it, he would behave as careleſsly and as inſolently as if he were ſure of me. I have been forced to mortify him no leſs than four times ſince we have been here.

I made him lately undergo a ſevere penance for ſome negligences that were not to be paſſed over: not deſigned ones, he ſaid: but that was a poor excuſe, as I told him: for, had they been deſigned, he ſhould never have come into my preſence more: that they were not, ſhewed his want of thought and attention; and thoſe were inexcuſable in a man only in his probatory ſtate.

He hoped he had been more than in a probatory ſtate, he ſaid.

'And therefore, Sir, might be more 'careleſs!—So you add ingratitude to 'negligence, and make what you plead as 'accident, that itſelf wants an excuſe, de-'ſign, which deſerves none.'

I would not ſee him for two days, and he was ſo penitent, and ſo humble, that I had like to have loſt myſelf, to make him amends: for, as you have ſaid, a reſentment carried too high, often ends in an amends too humble.

I long to be nearer to you: but that muſt not yet be, it ſeems. Pray, my dear, let me hear from you as often as you can.

May Heaven increaſe your comforts, and reſtore your health, are the prayers of your ever faithful and affectionate

ANNA HOWE.

P. S. Excuſe me that I did not write before: it was owing to a little coaſting voyage I was obliged to give into.

LETTER LXXIV.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

FRIDAY, AUG. 25.

YOU are very obliging, my dear Miſs Howe, to account to me for your ſilence. I was eaſy in it, as I doubted not, that among ſuch near and dear friends as you are with, you was diverted from writing by ſome ſuch agreeable excurſion, as that you mention.

I was in hopes that you had given over, at this time of day, thoſe very ſprightly airs, which I have taken the liberty to blame you for, as often as you have given me occaſion to do ſo; and that has been very often.

I was always very grave with you upon this ſubject: and while your own and a worthy man's future happineſs are in the queſtion, I muſt enter into it, whenever you forget yourſelf, although I had not a day to live: and indeed I am very ill.

I am ſure it was not your intention to take your future huſband with you to the little iſland, to make him look weak and ſilly among thoſe of your relations, who never before had ſeen him. Yet do you think it poſſible for them (however prepared and reſolved they may be to like him) to forbear ſmiling at him, when they ſee him ſuffering under your whimſical penances? A modeſt man ſhould no more be made little in his own eyes, than in the eyes of others. If he be, he will have a diffidence, which will give an aukwardneſs to everything he ſays or does: and this will be no more to the credit of your choice, than to that of the approbation he meets with from your friends, or to his own credit.

I love an obliging, and even an humble deportment in a man to the woman he addreſſes. It is a mark of his politeneſs, and tends to give her that opinion of herſelf, which it may be ſuppoſed baſhful merit wants to be inſpired with. But if the woman exacts it with an high hand, ſhe ſhews not either her own politeneſs or gratitude; although I muſt confeſs ſhe does her courage. I gave you expectation that I would be very ſerious with you.

O, my dear, that it had been my lot (as I was not permitted to live ſingle) to have met with a man by whom I could have acted generouſly and unreſervedly!

Mr. Lovelace, it is now plain, in order to have a pretence againſt me, taxed my behaviour to him with ſtiffneſs and diſtance. You, at one time, thought me guilty of ſome degree of prudery. Difficult ſituations ſhould be allowed for; which often make ſeeming occaſions for cenſure unavoidable. I deſerved not blame from him who made mine difficult. And you, my dear, had I had any other man to deal with, or had he had but half the merit which Mr. Hickman has, would have found that my doctrine on this ſubject ſhould have governed my practice.

But to put myſelf out of the queſtion —I'll tell you what I ſhould think, were I an indifferent by-ſtander, of thoſe high airs of yours, in return for Mr. Hickman's humble demeanour. 'The lady thinks of having the gentleman, I ſee plainly,' would I ſay. 'But I ſee, as plainly, that ſhe has a very great indifference to him. And to what may this indifference be owing? To one or all of theſe conſiderations, no doubt: that ſhe receives his addreſſes rather from motives of convenience than choice: that ſhe thinks meanly of his endowments and intellects; at leaſt more highly of her own: or, ſhe has not the generoſity to uſe that power with moderation, which his great affection for her puts into her hands.'

How would you like, my dear, to have any of theſe things ſaid?

Then to give but the ſhadow of a reaſon for free-livers and free-ſpeakers to ſay; or to imagine, that Miſs Howe gives her hand to a man who has no reaſon to expect any ſhare in her heart, I am ſure you would not with that ſuch a thing ſhould be ſo much as ſuppoſed. Then all the regard from you to come afterwards; none to be ſhewn before; muſt, I ſhould think, be capable of being conſtrued as a compliment to the huſband made at the expence of the wife's and even of the ſex's delicacy.

There is no fear that attempts could be formed by the moſt audacious [Two Lovelace's there cannot be!] upon a character ſo revered for virtue, and ſo charmingly ſpirited, as Miſs Howe's: yet, to have any man encouraged to deſpiſe a huſband by the example of one who is moſt concerned to do him honour; what, my dear, think you of that? It is but too natural for envious men (and who that knows Miſs Howe, will not envy Mr. Hickman!) to ſcoff at, and to jeſt upon, thoſe who are treated with, or will bear indignity from a woman.

If a man ſo treated have a true and ardent love for the woman he addreſſes, he will be eaſily over-awed by her diſpleaſure: and this will put him upon acts of ſubmiſſion, which will be called meanneſs. And what woman of true ſpirit would like to have it ſaid, that ſhe would impoſe any-thing upon the man from whom ſhe one day expects protection and defence, that ſhould be capable of being conſtrued as a meanneſs, or unmanly abjectneſs in his behaviour, even to herſelf?—Nay, I am not ſure, and I aſk it of you, my dear, to reſolve me, whether, in your own opinion, it is not likely, that a woman of ſpirit will deſpiſe rather than value more, the man who will take patiently an inſult at her hands; eſpecially before company.

I have always obſerved, that prejudices in diſfavour of a perſon at his firſt appearance, fix deeper, and are much more difficult to be removed when fixed, than prejudices in favour: whether owing to envy, or to that malignant principle ſo eminently viſible in little minds, which makes them with to bring down the more worthy characters to their own low level, I pretend not to determine. When once, therefore, a woman of your good ſenſe gives room to the world to think ſhe has not an high opinion of the lover, whom, nevertheleſs, ſhe entertains, it will be very difficult for her afterwards, to make that world think ſo well as ſhe would have it, of the huſband ſhe has choſen.

Give me leave to obſerve, that to condeſcend with dignity, and to command with ſuch kindneſs, and ſweetneſs of manners, as ſhould let the condeſcenſion, while in a ſingle ſtate, be ſeen and acknowledged, are points, which a wiſe woman, knowing her man, ſhould aim at: and a wiſe woman, I ſhould think, would chuſe to live ſingle all her life rather than give herſelf to a man whom ſhe thinks unworthy of a treatment ſo noble.

But when a woman lets her lover ſee, that ſhe has the generoſity to approve prove of and reward a well-meant ſervice; that ſhe has a mind that lifts her above the little captious follies, which ſome (too licentiouſly, I hope) attribute to the ſex in general: that ſhe reſents not (if ever ſhe thinks ſhe has reaſon to be diſpleaſed) with petulance, or through pride: nor thinks it neceſſary to inſiſt upon little points, to come at or ſecure great ones, perhaps not proper to be aimed at: nor leaves room to ſuppoſe ſhe has ſo much cauſe to doubt her own merit, as to put the love of the man ſhe intends to favour, upon diſagreeable or arrogant trials: but lets reaſon be the principal guide of her actions—She will then never fail of that true reſpect, of that ſincere veneration, which ſhe wiſhes to meet with; and which will make her judgment after marriage conſulted, ſometimes with a preference to a man's own; at other times, as a delightful confirmation of his.

And ſo much, my beloved Miſs Howe, for this ſubject now, and I dare ſay for ever!

I will begin another letter by-and-by, and ſend both together. Mean time, I am, &c.

LETTER LXXV.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

IN this letter the lady acquaints Miſs Howe with Mr. Brand's report; with her ſiſter's propoſals either that ſhe will go abroad, or proſecute Mr. Lovelace. She complains of the ſevere letters of her uncle Antony and her ſiſter; but in milder terms than they deſerved.

She ſends her Dr. Lewen's letter, and the copy of her anſwer to it.

She tells her of the difficulties ſhe had been under to avoid ſeeing Mr. Lovelace. She gives her the contents of the letter ſhe wrote to him to divert him from his propoſed viſit: ſhe is afraid, ſhe ſays, that it is a ſtep that is not ſtrictly right, if allegory or metaphor be not allowable to one in her circumſtances.

She informs her of her couſin Morden's arrival and readineſs to take her part with her relations; of his deſigned interview with Mr. Lovelace; and tells her what her apprehenſions are upon it.

She gives her the purport of the converſation between her aunt Hervey and Mrs. Norton. And then adds:

BUT were they ever ſo favourably inclined to me now, what can they do for me? I wiſh, and that for their ſakes more than for my own, that they would yet relent—But I am very ill—I muſt drop my pen—A ſudden faintneſs overſpreads my heart—Excuſe my crooked writing!—Adieu, my dear!—Adieu!

THREE O'CLOCK, FRIDAY.

ONCE more, I reſume my pen. I thought I had taken my laſt farewel of you. I never was ſo very oddly affected: ſomething that ſeemed totally to overwhelm my faculties—I don't know how to deſcribe it—I believe I do amiſs in writing ſo much, and taking too much upon me: but an active mind, though clouded by bodily illneſs, cannot be idle.

I'll ſee if the air, and a diſcontinued attention, will help me. But if it will not, don't be concerned for me, my dear. I ſhall be happy. Nay, I am more ſo already, than of late I thought I could ever be in this life.—Yet how this body clogs!—How it encumbers!

SEVEN O'CLOCK.

I COULD not ſend this letter away with ſo melancholy an ending, as you would have thought it. So I deferred cloſing it, till I ſaw how it ſhould be on my return from my airing: and now I muſt ſay, I am quite another thing: ſo alert!—that I could proceed with as much ſpirit as I began, and add more preachment to your lively ſubject, if I had not written more than enough upon it already.

I wiſh you would let me give you and Mr. Hickman joy. Do, my dear. I ſhould take ſome to myſelf, if you would.

My reſpectful compliments to all your friends, as well to thoſe I have the honour to know, as to thoſe I do not know.

I HAVE juſt now been ſurpriſed with a letter from one whom I long ago gave up all thoughts of hearing from. From Mr. Wyerley. I will incloſe it. You'll be ſurpriſed at it, as much as I was. This ſeems to be a man whom I might have reclaimed. But I could not love him. Yet I hope I never treated him with arrogance. Indeed, my dear, if I am not too partial to myſelf, I think I refuſed him with more gentleneſs, than you retain ſomebody elſe. And this recollection gives me leſs pain than I ſhould have had in the other caſe, on receiving this inſtance of a generoſity that affects me. I will alſo incloſe the rough draught of my answer, as soon as I have transcribed it.

If I begin another sheet, I shall write to the end of it: wherefore I will only add, my prayers for your honour and prosperity, and for a long, long, happy life; and that, when it comes to be wound up, you may be as calm and as easy at quitting it, as I hope in God I shall be. I am, and will be, to the latest moment, your truly affectionate and obliged servant,

CL. HARLOWE.

LETTER LXXVI.

MR. WYERLEY, TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

WEDNESDAY, AUG. 23.

DEAREST MADAM,

YOU will be surprised to find renewed, at this distance of time, an address so positively, though so politely discouraged: but, however it be received, I must renew it. Every-body has heard, that you have been vilely treated by a man, who, to treat you ill, must be the vilest of men. Every-body knows your just resentment of his base treatment: that you are determined never to be reconciled to him: and that you persist in these sentiments against all the entreaties of his noble relations, against all the prayers and repentance of his ignoble self. And all the world that have the honour to know you, or have heard of him, applaud your resolution, as worthy of yourself; worthy of your virtue, and of that strict honour which was always attributed to you by every one who spoke of you.

But, Madam, were all the world to have been of a different opinion, it could never have altered mine. I ever loved you; I ever must love you. Yet have I endeavoured to resign to my hard fate. When I had so many ways, in vain, sought to move you in my favour, I sat down seemingly contented. I even wrote to you, that I would sit down contented. And I endeavoured to make all my friends and companions think I was. But nobody knows what pangs this self-denial cost me! In vain did the chace, in vain did travel, in vain did lively company offer themselves, and were embraced in their turn: with redoubled force did my passion for you renew my unhappiness, when I looked into myself, into my own heart; for there did your charming image sit enthroned; and you engrossed me all.

I truly deplore those misfortunes; and those sufferings, for your own sake! which, nevertheless, encourage me to renew my bold hope. I know not particulars. I dare not enquire after them; because my sufferings would be increased with the knowledge of what yours have been. I therefore desire not to know more than what common report wounds my ears with; and what is given me to know, by your absence from your cruel family, and from the sacred place, where I, among numbers of your rejected admirers, used to be twice a week sure to behold you doing credit to that service of which your example gave me the highest notions. But whatever be those misfortunes, of whatsoever nature those sufferings, I shall bless the occasion for my own sake, (though for yours curse the author of them) if they may give me the happiness to know, that this my renewed address may not be absolutely rejected.—Only give me hope, that it may one day meet with encouragement, if in the interim nothing happen, either in my morals or behaviour, to give you fresh offence. Give me but hope of this—Not absolutely to reject me is all the hope I ask for; and I will love you, if possible, still more than I ever loved you—And that for your sufferings; for well you deserve to be loved, even to adoration, who can, for honour's and for virtue's sake, subdue a passion which common spirits [I speak by cruel experience] find invincible; and this at a time when the black offender kneels and supplicates, as I am well assured he does, (all his friends likewise supplicating for him) to be forgiven.

That you cannot forgive him, not forgive him so as to receive him again into favour, is no wonder. His offence is against virtue: this is a part of your essence. What magnanimity is this! How just to yourself, and to your spotless character! Is it any merit to admire more than ever a lady who can so exaltedly distinguish? It is not. I cannot plead it.

What hope have I left, may it be said, when my address was before rejected, now, that your sufferings, so nobly borne, have, with all good judges, exalted your character? Yet, Madam, I have to pride myself in this, that while your friends (not looking upon you in the just light I do) persecute and banish you; while your estate is withheld from you, and threatened (as I know) to be witheld, as long as the chicaning chicaning law, or rather the chicaneries of it's practifers, can keep it from you. While you are deftitute of protection; every-body ftanding aloof, either through fear of the injurer of one family, or of the hard-hearted of the other; I pride myfelf, I fay, to ftand forth, and offer my fortune, and my life, at your devotion. With a felfifh hope, indeed: I fhould be too great an hypocrite not to own this! And I know how much you abhor infincerity.

But, whether you encourage that hope or not, accept my beft fervices, I befeech you, Madam: and be pleafed to excufe me for a piece of honeft art, which the nature of the cafe (doubting the honour of your notice otherwife) makes me chufe to conclude with —It is this:

If I am ftill to be the moft unhappy of men, let your pen by one line tell me fo. If I am permitted to indulge a hope, however diftant, your filence fhall be deemed by me, the happieft indication of it that you can give—Except that ftill happier—(the happieft that can befal me) a fignification that you will accept the tender of that life and fortune, which it would be my pride and my glory to facrifice in your fervice, leaving the reward to yourfelf.

Be your determination as it may, I muft for ever admire and love you. Nor will I ever change my condition, while you live, whether you change yours or not: for, having once had the prefumption to addrefs you, I cannot ftoop to think of any other woman: and this I folemnly declare in the prefence of that God, whom I daily pray to blefs and protect you, be your determination what it will with regard to, deareft Madam, your moft devoted and ever-affectionate and faithful fervant,

ALEXANDER WYERLEY.

LETTER LXXVII.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO ALEXANDER WYERLEY, ESQ.

SIR, SATURDAY, AUG. 26.

THE generofity of your purpofe would have commanded not only my notice, but my thanks, although you had not given me the alternative you are pleafed to call artful. And I do therefore give you my thanks for your kind letter.

At the time you diftinguifhed me by your favourable opinion, I told you, Sir, that my choice was the fingle life. And moft truly did I tell you fo.

When that was not permitted me, and I looked round upon the feveral gentlemen who had been propofed to me, and had reafon to believe that there was not one of them againft whofe morals or principles there lay not fome exception, it would not have been much to be wondered at, if FANCY had been allowed to give a preference, where JUDGMENT was at a lofs to determine.

Far be it from me to fay this with a defign to upbraid you, Sir, or to reflect upon you. I always wifhed you well. You had reafon to think I did. You had the generofity to be pleafed with the frankneſs of my behaviour to you; as I had with that of yours to me: and I am forry, very forry, to be now told, that the acquiefcence you obliged me with, gave you fo much pain.

Had the option I have mentioned been allowed me afterwards, (as I not only wifhed but propofed) things had not happened that did happen. But there was a kind of fatality by which our whole family was impelled, as I may fay; and which none of us were permitted to avoid. But this is a fubject that cannot be dwelt upon.

As matters are, I have only to wifh, for your own fake, that you will encourage and cultivate thofe good motions in your mind, to which many paffages in your kind and generous letter, now before me, muft be owing. Depend upon it, Sir, that fuch motions wrought into habit, will yield you pleafure at a time when nothing elfe can. And at prefent, fhining out in your actions and converfation, will commend you to the worthieft of our fex. For, Sir, the man who is good upon choice, as well as by education, has that in himfelf, which ennobles the human race, and without which the moft dignified by birth or rank are ignoble.

As to the refolution you folemnly make not to marry while I live, I fhould be concerned at it, were I not morally fure, that you may keep it and yet not be detrimented by it: fince a few, a very few days, will convince you, that I am got above all human dependence; and that there is no need of that protection and favour, which you fo generoufly offer to, Sir, your obliged well-wifher, and humble fervant,

CL. HARLOWE.

LETTER

LETTER LXXVIII.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

MONDAY NOON, AUG. 28.

ABOUT the time of poor Belton's interment laſt night, as near as we could gueſs, Lord M. Mowbray, and myſelf, toaſted once, 'To the memory of 'honeſt Tom Belton;' and by a quick tranſition to the living, 'Health to Miſs Har-'lowe;' which Lord M. obligingly began, and, 'To the happy reconciliation;' and then we ſtuck in a remembrance, 'To honeſt Jack Belford,' who, of late, we all agreed, is become an uſeful and humane man; and one who prefers his friend's ſervice to his own.

But what is the meaning I hear nothing from thee? And why doſt thou not let me into the grounds of the ſudden reconciliation between my beloved and her friends, and the cauſe of the generous invitation which ſhe gives us of attending her at her father's ſome time hence?

Thou muſt certainly have been let into the ſecret by this time; and I can tell thee, I ſhall be plaguy jealous if there be any one thing paſs between my angel and thee, that is to be concealed from me. For either I am a principal in this cauſe, or I am nothing.

I have diſpatched Will to know the reaſon of thy neglect.

But, let me whiſper a word or two in thy ear. I begin to be afraid, after all, that this letter was a ſtratagem to get me out of town, and for nothing elſe: for, in the firſt place, Tourville, in a letter I received this morning, tells me, that the lady is actually very ill. [I am ſorry for it with all my ſoul!] This, thou'lt ſay, I may think a reaſon why ſhe cannot ſet out as yet: but then I have heard, on the other hand, but laſt night, that the family is as implacable as ever; and my lord and I expect this very afternoon a viſit from Colonel Morden; who undertakes, it ſeems, to queſtion me as to my intention with regard to his couſin.

This convinces me, that if ſhe has apprized her friends of my offers to her, they will not believe me to be in earneſt, till they are aſſured that I am ſo from my own mouth. But then I underſtand, that the intended viſit is an officiouſneſs of Morden's own, without the deſire of any of her friends.

Now, Jack, what can a man make of all this? My intelligence as to the continuance of her family's implacableneſs is not to be doubted; and yet when I read her letter, what can one ſay!—Surely, the dear little rogue will not lye!

I never knew her diſpenſe with her word, but once: and that was, when ſhe promiſed to forgive me after the dreadful fire that had like to have happened at our mother's, and yet would not ſee me the next day, and afterwards made her eſcape to Hampſtead, in order to avoid forgiving me: and as ſhe ſeverely ſmarted for this departure from her honour given, (for it is a ſad thing for good people to break their word when it is in their power to keep it) one would not expect, that ſhe ſhould ſet about deceiving again; more eſpecially by the premeditation of writing. Thou, perhaps, wilt aſk, 'What honeſt man 'is obliged to keep his promiſe with a 'highwayman!' for well I know thy unmannerly way of making compariſons: but I ſay, every honeſt man is—And I will give thee an illuſtration.

Here is a marauding varlet, who demands your money, with a piſtol at your breaſt. You have neither money nor valuable effects about you; and promiſe ſolemnly, if he will ſpare your life, that you will ſend him an agreed upon ſum, by ſuch a day, to ſuch a place.

The queſtion is, if your life is not in the fellow's power?

How he came by the power is another queſtion; for which he muſt anſwer with his life when caught—So he runs riſque for riſque.

Now if he give you your life, does he not give, think you, a valuable conſideration for the money you engage your honour to ſend him! If not, the ſum muſt be exorbitant, or your life is a very paltry one, even in your own opinion.

I need not make the application; and I am ſure, that even thou thyſelf, who never ſpareſt me, and thinkeſt thou knoweſt my heart by thy own, canſt not poſſibly put the caſe in a ſtronger light againſt me.

Then, why do good people take upon themſelves to cenſure, as they do, perſons leſs ſcrupulous than themſelves? Is it not becauſe the latter allow themſelves in any liberty, in order to carry a point? And can my not doing my duty, warrant another for not doing his?—Thou wilt not ſay it can.

And how would it ſound, to put the caſe as ſtrongly, once more, as my greateſt enemy would put it, both as to fact and in words—'Here has that pro-'fligate wretch Lovelace broken his vow 'with and deceived Miſs Clariſſa Har-'lowe.—A vile fellow!' would an enemy my ſay: 'but it is like him.' But when it comes to be ſaid, that the pious Clariſſa has broken her word with and deceived Lovelace; 'Good Lord!' would every one ſay, 'Sure it cannot be!'

Upon my ſoul, Jack, ſuch is the veneration I have for this admirable woman, that I am ſhocked barely at putting the caſe—And ſo wilt thou, if thou reſpecteſt her as thou oughteſt: for thou knoweſt, that men and women, all the world over, form their opinions of one another, by each perſon's profeſſions and known practices. In this lady, therefore, it would be as unpardonable to tell a wilful untruth, as it would be ſtrange if I keep my word.—In love-caſes, I mean; for as to the reſt, I am an honeſt moral man, as all who know me can teſtify.

And what, after all, would this lady deſerve if ſhe has deceived me in this caſe? For did ſhe not ſet me prancing away upon Lord M's beſt nag, to Lady Sarah's, and to Lady Betty's, with an erect and triumphing countenance, to ſhew them her letter to me?

And let me tell thee, that I have received their congratulations upon it! 'Well, and now, couſin Lovelace,' cries one; 'Well, and now, couſin 'Lovelace,' cries t'other; 'I hope 'you'll make the beſt of huſbands to 'ſo excellent and ſo forgiving a lady! 'And now we ſhall ſoon have the plea'ſure of looking upon you as a reform'ed man!' added one—'And now we 'ſhall ſee you in the way we have ſo 'long wiſhed you to be in!' cried out the other.

My couſins Montague alſo have been ever ſince rejoicing in the new relationſhip. Their charming couſin, and their lovely couſin, at every word! And how dearly they will love her! What leſſons they will take from her! And yet Charlotte, who pretends to have the eye of an eagle, was for finding out ſome myſtery in the ſtyle and manner, till I overbore her, and laughed her out of it.

As for Lord M. he has been in hourly expectation of being ſent to with propoſals of one ſort or other from the Harlowes: and ſtill we have it, that ſuch propoſals will be made by Colonel Morden when he comes; and that the Harlowes only put on a face of irreconcileableneſs, till they know the iſſue of Morden's viſit, in order to make the better terms with us.

Indeed, if I had not undoubted reaſon, as I ſaid, to believe the continuance of their antipathy to me, and implacableneſs to her, I ſhould be apt to think there might be ſome foundation for my lord's conjectures; for there is a curſed deal of low cunning in all that family, except in the angel of it; who has ſo much generoſity of ſoul, that ſhe deſpiſes cunning, both name and thing.

What I mean by all this, is, to let thee ſee, what a ſtupid figure I ſhall make to all my own family, if my Clariſſa has been capable, as Gulliver in his abominable Yahoo ſtory phraſes it, of ſaying the thing that is not. By my ſoul, Jack, if it were only that I ſhould be outwitted by ſuch a novice at plotting, and that it would make me look ſilly to my kinſwomen here, who know I value myſelf upon my contrivances, it would vex me to the heart; and I would inſtantly clap a feather-bed into a coach-and-ſix, and fetch her away, ſick or well, and marry her at my leiſure.

But Colonel Morden is come, and I muſt break off.

LETTER LXXIX.

MR. BELFORD, TO ROBERT LOVELACE, ESQ.

MONDAY NIGHT, AUG. 28.

I Doubt you will be all impatience, that you have not heard from me ſince mine of Thurſday laſt. You would be ſtill more ſo, if you knew that I had by me a letter ready-written.

I went early yeſterday morning to Epſom; and found every-thing diſpoſed according to the directions I had left on Friday; and at night the ſolemn office was performed. Tourville was there; and behaved very decently, and with greater concern than I thought he would ever have expreſſed for anybody.

Thomaſine, they told me, in a kind of diſguiſe, was in an obſcure pew, out of curioſity, (for it ſeems, ſhe was far from ſhewing any tokens of grief) to ſee the laſt office performed for the man whoſe heart ſhe had already contributed to break.

I was obliged to ſtay till this afternoon, to ſettle ſeveral neceſſary matters, and to direct inventories to be taken, in order for appraiſement; for every-thing is to be turned into money, by his will. I preſented his ſiſter with the hundred guineas the poor man left me as his executor, and deſired her to continue in the houſe, and take the direction of every-thing till I could hear from his nephew at Antigua, who is heir at law. He had left her but fifty pounds, although though he knew her indigence; and that it was owing to a vile husband, and not to herself, that she was indigent.

The poor man left about two hundred pounds in money; and two hundred pounds in two East India bonds; and I will contrive, if I can, to make up the poor woman's fifty pounds, and my hundred guineas, two hundred pounds to her; and then she will have some little matter coming in certain, which I will oblige her to keep out of the hands of a son, who has compleated that ruin which his father had very near effected.

I gave Tourville his twenty pounds, and will send you and Mowbray yours by the first order.

And so much for poor Belton's affairs till I see you.

I got to town in the evening, and went directly to Smith's. I found Mrs. Lovick and Mrs. Smith in the back-shop, and I saw they had been both in tears. They rejoiced to see me, however; and told me that the doctor and Mr. Goddard were but just gone; as was also the worthy clergyman, who often comes to pray by her; and all three were of opinion, that she would hardly live to see the entrance of another week. I was not so much surprized as grieved; for I had feared as much when I left her on Saturday.

I sent up my compliments; and she returned, that she would take it for a favour if I would call upon her in the morning, by eight o'clock. Mrs. Lovick told me, that she had fainted away on Saturday, while she was writing, as she had done likewise the day before; and having received benefit then by a little turn in a chair, she was carried abroad again. She returned somewhat better; and wrote till late; yet had a pretty good night; and went to Covent Garden church in the morning: but came home so ill, that she was obliged to lay down.

When she arose, seeing how much grieved Mrs. Lovick and Mrs. Smith were for her, she made apologies for the trouble she gave them—'You were 'happy,' said she, 'before I came hi-'ther. It was a cruel thing in me to 'come among honest strangers, and to 'be sick and die with you.'

When they touched upon the irreconcileableness of her friends, 'I have 'had ill offices done me to them,' said she, 'and they do not know how ill I 'am; nor will they believe any-thing 'I should write. But yet I cannot 'sometimes forbear thinking it a little 'hard, that out of so many near and 'dear friends as I have living, not one 'of them will vouchsafe to look upon 'me.—No old servant, no old friend,' proceeded she, 'to be permitted to come 'near me, without being sure of incur-'ring displeasure! And to have such 'a great work to go through by my-'self, a young creature as I am, and to 'have every-thing to think of as to my 'temporal matters, and to order, to my 'very interment!—No dear mother,' said the sweet sufferer, 'to pray by me 'and bless me!—No kind sister to soothe 'and comfort me!—But come,' recollected she, 'how do I know but all is 'for the best—If I can but make a right 'use of my discomforts?—Pray for me, 'Mrs. Lovick—Pray for me, Mrs. 'Smith that I may—I have great need 'of your prayers—This cruel man has 'discomposed me. His persecutions 'have given me a pain just here,' [put-'ing her hand to her heart]—'What a 'step has he made me take to avoid 'him!—Who can touch pitch, and not 'be defiled?—He has made a bad spirit 'take possession of me, I think—Broken 'in upon all my duties. And will not 'yet, I doubt, let me be at rest. Indeed 'he is very cruel.—But, this is one of 'my trials, I believe. By God's grace, 'I shall be easier to-morrow, and espe-'cially if I have no more of his tormen-'tings, and if I can get a tolerable night. 'And I will sit up till eleven, that I 'may.'

She said, That though this was so heavy a day with her, she was at other times, within these few days past especially, blessed with bright hours; and particularly, that she had now-and-then such joyful assurances, (which she hoped were not presumptuous ones) that God would receive her to his mercy, that she could hardly contain herself, and was ready to think herself above this earth while she was in it:—'And what,' inferred she to Mrs. Lovick, must be the 'state itself, the very aspirations after 'which have often cast a beamy light 'through the thickest darkness, and 'when I have been at the lowest ebb, 'have dispelled the black clouds of des-'pondency?—as I hope they soon will 'this spirit of repining.'

She had a pretty good night, it seems; and this morning went in a chair to St. Dunstan's church.

The chairmen told Mrs. Smith, that after prayers, (for she did not return till between nine and ten) they carried the her to a houſe in Fleet Street, whither they never waited on her before. And where doſt think this was?—Why to an undertaker's!—Good Heaven! what a woman is this!—She went into the back-ſhop, and talked with the maſter of it about half an hour, and came from him with great ſerenity; he waiting upon her to her chair with a reſpectful countenance, but full of curioſity and ſerioufneſs.

'Tis evident, that ſhe then went to beſpeak her houſe that ſhe talked of—'As 'ſoon as you can, Sir,' were her words to him as ſhe got into the chair. Mrs. Smith told me this with the ſame ſurprize and grief that I heard it.

She was very ill in the afternoon, having got cold either at St. Dunſtan's, or at chapel, and ſent for the clergyman to pray by her; and the women, unknown to her, ſent both for Dr. H. and Mr. Goddard; who were juſt gone, as I told you, when I came to pay my reſpects to her this evening.

And thus have I recounted from the good women what paſſed to this night ſince my abſence.

I long for to-morrow, that I may ſee her: and yet 'tis ſuch a melancholy longing, as I never experienced, and know not how to deſcribe.

TUESDAY, AUG. 29.

I WAS at Smith's at half an hour after ſeven. They told me that the lady was gone in a chair to St. Dunſtan's; but was better than ſhe had been on either of the two preceding days; and that ſhe ſaid to Mrs. Lovick and Mrs. Smith, as ſhe went into the chair—'I have a good 'deal to anſwer for to you, my good 'friends, for my vapouriſh converſation 'of laſt night.

'If, Mrs. Lovick,' ſaid ſhe, ſmiling, 'I 'have no new matters to diſcompoſe me, 'I believe my ſpirits will hold out 'purely.'

She returned immediately after prayers.

'Mr. Belford,' ſaid ſhe, as ſhe entered the back-ſhop where I was, (and upon my approaching her) 'I am very 'glad to ſee you. You have been per-'forming for your poor friend a kind 'laſt office. 'Tis not long ago ſince you 'did the ſame for a near relation. Is it 'not a little hard upon you, that theſe 'troubles ſhould fall ſo thick to your 'lot? But they are charitable offices: 'and it is a praiſe to your humanity, 'that poor dying people know not where 'to chuſe ſo well.'

I told her I was ſorry to hear ſhe had been ſo ill ſince I had the honour to attend her; but rejoiced to find, that now ſhe ſeemed a good deal better.

'It will be ſometimes better and ſome-'times worſe,' replied ſhe, 'with poor 'creatures, when they are balancing 'between life and death. But no more 'of theſe matters juſt now. I hope, 'Sir, you'll breakfaſt with me. I was 'quite vapouriſh yeſterday. I had a very 'bad ſpirit upon me.—Had I not, Mrs. 'Smith?—But I hope I ſhall be no more 'ſo. And to-day I am perfectly ſe-'rene. This day riſes upon me as if it 'would be a bright one.'

She deſired me to walk up, and invited Mr. Smith and his wife, and Mrs. Lovick alſo, to breakfaſt with her. I was better pleaſed with her livelineſs than with her looks.

The good people retiring after breakfaſt, the following converſation paſſed between us.

'Pray, Sir, let me aſk you,' ſaid ſhe, 'if you think I may promiſe myſelf that 'I ſhall no more be moleſted by your 'friend?'

I heſitated: for how could I anſwer for ſuch a man?

'What ſhall I do if he comes again? '—You ſee how I am.—I cannot fly 'from him now.—If he has any pity 'left for the poor creature whom he has 'thus reduced, let him not come.—But 'have you heard from him lately? And 'will he come?'

'I hope not, Madam. I have not 'heard from him ſince Thurſday laſt, 'that he went out of town, rejoicing in 'the hopes your letter gave him of a re-'conciliation between your friends and 'you, and that he might in good time 'ſee you at your father's; and he is 'gone down to give all his friends joy 'of the news, and is in high ſpirits up-'on it.'

'Alas for me! I ſhall then ſurely have 'him come up to perſecute me again! 'As ſoon as he diſcovers that that was 'only a ſtratagem to keep him away, 'he will come up; and who knows but 'even now he is upon the road? I thought 'I was ſo bad, that I ſhould have been 'out of his and every-body's way before 'now; for I expected not, that this 'contrivance would ſerve me above two 'or three days; and by this time he muſt 'have found out, that I am not ſo hap-'py as to have any hope of a reconcilia-'tion with my family; and then he will 'come, if it be only in revenge for what 'he will think a deceit, but is not, I 'hope, a wicked one.'

I believe I looked surprized, to hear her confess that her letter was a stratagem only; for she said, 'You wonder, 'Mr. Belford, I observe, that I could 'be guilty of such an artifice. I doubt it 'is not right: it was done in a hurry of 'spirits. How could I see a man who 'had so mortally injured me; yet, pre-'tending sorrow for his crimes, (and 'wanting to see me) could behave with 'so much shocking levity, as he did, to 'the honest people of the house? Yet, 'tis strange too, that neither you nor 'he found out my meaning on perusal 'of my letter. You have seen what I 'wrote, no doubt?'

'I have, Madam. And then I be-'gan to account for it as an innocent ar-'tifice.'

'Thus far, indeed, Sir, it is innocent, 'that I meant him no hurt, and had a 'right to the effect I hoped for from it; 'and he had none to invade me. But 'have you, Sir, that letter of his, in 'which he gives you (as I suppose he 'does) the copy of mine?'

'I have, Madam.' And pulled it out of my letter-case: but hesitating—'Nay, Sir,' said she, 'be pleased to 'read my letter to yourself—I desire 'not to see his—and see if you can be 'longer a stranger to a meaning so ob-'vious.'

I read it to myself—'Indeed, Madam, 'I can find nothing but that you are 'going down to Harlowe Place, to be 'reconciled to your father, and other 'friends: and Mr. Lovelace presumed, 'that a letter from your sister, which he 'saw brought when he was at Mr. 'Smith's, gave you the welcome news 'of it.'

She then explained all to me, and, that, as I may say, in six words—A religious meaning is couched under it, and that's the reason that neither you nor I could find it out.

'Read but for my father's house, 'Heaven,' said she, 'and for the inter-'position of my dear blessed friend, 'suppose the mediation of my Saviour, '(which I humbly rely upon;) and all 'the rest of the letter will be accounted 'for.—I hope,' (repeated she) 'that it 'is a pardonable artifice. But I am a-'fraid it is not strictly right.'

I read it so, and stood astonished for a minute at her invention, her piety, her charity, and at thine and mine own stupidity, to be thus taken in.

And now, thou vile Lovelace, what hast thou to do, (the lady all consistent with herself, and no hopes left for thee) but to hang, drown, or shoot thyself, for an outwitted boaster?

My surprize being a little over, she proceeded, 'As to the letter that came 'from my sister, while your friend was 'here, you will soon see, Sir, that it is 'the cruellest letter she ever wrote me.'

And then she expressed a deep concern for what might be the consequence of Colonel Morden's intended visit to you; and besought me, that if now, or at any time hereafter, I had opportunity to prevent any further mischief, without any detriment or danger to myself, I would do it.

I assured her of the most particular attention to this and to all her commands; and that in a manner so agreeable to her, that she invoked a blessing upon me for my goodness, as she called it, to a desolate creature, who suffered under the worst of orphanage; those were her words.

She then went back to her first subject, her uneasiness for fear of your molesting her again; and said, 'If you 'have any influence over him, Mr. Bel-'ford, prevail upon him, that he will 'give me the assurance, that the short 'remainder of my time shall be all my 'own. I have need of it. Indeed I 'have. Why will he wish to interrupt 'me in my duty? Has he not punished 'me enough for my preference of him 'to all his sex? Has he not destroyed 'my fame and fortune? And will not 'his causeless vengeance upon me be 'complete, unless he ruin my soul too? '—Excuse me, Sir, for this vehemence! 'But, indeed, it greatly imports me, to 'know that I shall be no more disturbed 'by him. And yet, with all this aver-'sion, I would sooner give way to his 'visit, though I were to expire the mo-'ment I saw him, than to be the cause 'of any fatal misunderstanding between 'you and him.'

I assured her, that I would make such a representation of the matter to you, and of the state of her health, that I would undertake to answer for you, that you would not attempt to come near her.

And for this reason, Lovelace, do I lay the whole matter before you, and desire you will authorize me, as soon as this, and mine of Saturday last, come to your hands, to dissipate her fears.

This gave her a little satisfaction; and then she said, that had I not told her, that I could promise for you, she was determined, ill as she was, to remove somewhere out of my knowledge, as well well as out of yours. 'And yet, to 'have been obliged to leave people I 'am but just got acquainted with,' said the poor lady, 'and to have died among 'perfect strangers, would have com-'pleted my hardships.'

This conversation, I found, as well from the length, as the nature of it, had fatigued her; and seeing her change colour once or twice, I made that my excuse, and took leave of her: desiring her permission, however, to attend her in the evening; and as often as possible; for I could not help telling her, that every time I saw her, I more and more considered her as a beatified spirit, and as one sent from Heaven to draw me after her, out of the miry gulph in which I had been so long immersed.

And laugh at me, if thou wilt; but it is true, that every time I approach her, I cannot but look upon her, as one just entering into a companionship with saints and angels. This thought so wholly possessed me, that I could not help begging, as I went away, her prayers and her blessing; with the reverence due to an angel.

In the evening she was so low and weak, that I took my leave of her, in less than a quarter of an hour. I went directly home. Where, to the pleasure and wonder of my cousin and her family, I now pass many honest evenings: which they impute to your being out of town.

I shall dispatch my packet to-morrow morning early, by my own servant, to make thee amends for the suspence I must have kept thee in: thou'lt thank me for that, I hope; but wilt not, I am sure, for sending thy servant back without a letter.

I long for the particulars of the conversation between you and Mr. Morden: the lady, as I have hinted, is full of apprehensions about it. Send me back this packet when perused; for I have not had either time or patience to take a copy of it.—And I beseech you, enable me to make good my engagements to the poor lady, that you will not invade her again.

LETTER LXXX.

MR. BELFORD, TO ROBERT LOVELACE, ELQ.

WEDNESDAY, AUG. 30.

I Have a conversation to give you, that passed between this admirable lady, and Dr. H. which will furnish a new instance of the calmness and serenity with which she can talk of death, and prepare for it, as if it were an occurrence as familiar to her as dressing and undressing.

As soon as I had dispatched my servant to you with my letters of the 26th, 28th, and yesterday the 29th, I went to pay my duty to her, and had the pleasure to find her, after a tolerable night, pretty lively and cheerful. She was but just returned from her usual devotions. And Doctor H. alighted as she entered the door.

After enquiring how she did, and hearing her complaints of shortness of breath, (which he attributed to inward decay, precipitated by her late harrasses, as well from her friends as from you) he was for advising her to go into the air.

'What will that do for me?' said she: 'tell me truly, good Sir,' with a cheerful aspect, '(you know you cannot dis-'turb me by it) whether now you do 'not put on the true physician; and, de-'spairing that any-thing in medicine will 'help me, advise me to the air, as the 'last resource?—Can you think the air 'will avail in such a malady as mine?'

He was silent.

'I ask,' said she, 'because my friends '(who will possibly sometime hence en-'quire after the means I used for my re-'covery) may be satisfied that I omitted 'nothing which so worthy and so skilful 'a physician prescribed?'

'The air, Madam, may possibly help 'the difficulty of breathing which has so 'lately attacked you.'

'But, Sir, you see how weak I am. 'You must see that I have been con-'suming from day to day; and now, if 'I can judge by what I feel in myself,' putting her hand to her heart, 'I can-'not continue long. If the air would 'very probably add to my days, though 'I am far from being desirous to have 'them lengthened, I would go into it; 'and the rather, as I know Mrs. Lovick 'would kindly accompany me. But if 'I were to be at the trouble of remov-'ing into new lodgings, (a trouble 'which I think now would be too much 'for me) and this only to die in the 'country, I had rather the scene were 'to be shut up here. For here have I 'meditated the spot, and the manner, 'and every-thing, as well of the minu-'test as of the highest consequence, that 'can attend the solemn moments. So, 'doctor, tell me truly, may I stay here, 'and be clear of any imputations of cur-'tailing, through wilfulness or impati-

'ence, or through resentments which I 'hope I am got above, a life that might 'otherwise be prolonged?—Tell me, 'Sir; you are not talking to a coward 'in this respect; indeed you are not!'—Unaffectedly smiling.

The doctor turning to me, was at a loss what to say, lifting up his eyes only in admiration of her.

'Never had any patient,' said she, 'a 'more indulgent and more humane phy-'sician—But since you are loth to an-'swer my question directly, I will put it 'in other words—You don't enjoin me to 'go into the air, doctor, do you?'

'I do not, Madam. Nor do I now 'visit you as a physician; but as a per-'son whose conversation I admire, and 'whose sufferings I condole. And to 'explain myself more directly, as to the 'occasion of this day's visit in particu-'lar, I must tell you, Madam, that, un-'derstanding how much you suffer by 'the displeasure of your friends; and 'having no doubt, but that if they knew 'the way you are in, they would alter 'their conduct to you; and believing it 'must cut them to the heart, when, too 'late, they shall be informed of every-'thing; I have resolved to apprize 'them by letter, (stranger as I am to 'their persons) how necessary it is for 'some of them to attend you very spee-'dily. For their sakes, Madam, let me 'press for your approbation of this 'measure.'

She paused; and at last said, 'This 'is kind, very kind, in you, Sir. But 'I hope that you do not think me so per-'verse, and so obstinate, as to have left 'till now any means unessayed, which 'I thought likely to move my friends in 'my favour. But now, doctor,' said she; 'I should be too much disturbed at 'their grief, if they were any of them 'to come or to send to me: and per-'haps, if I found they still loved me, 'wish to live; and so should quit un-'willingly that life, which I am now 'really fond of quitting, and hope to 'quit, as becomes a person who has had 'such a weaning-time as I have been fa-'voured with.'

'I hope, Madam,' said I, 'you are 'not so near as you apprehend, to that 'deplorable catastrophe you hint at with 'such an amazing presence of mind. 'And therefore I presume to second the 'doctor's motion, if it were only for 'the sake of your father and mother, 'that they may have the satisfaction, if 'they must lose you, to think, they were 'first reconciled to you.'

'It is very kindly, very humanely 'considered,' said she. 'But, if you 'think me not so very near my last hour; 'let me desire this may be postponed till 'I see what effect my cousin Morden's 'mediation may have. Perhaps he 'may vouchsafe to make me a visit yet, 'after his intended interview with Mr. 'Lovelace is over; of which, who 'knows, Mr. Belford, but your next 'letters may give an account? I hope it 'will not be a fatal one to any-body.—'Will you promise me, doctor, to for-'bear writing for two days only, and I 'will communicate to you any-thing 'that occurs in that time; and then you 'shall take your own way? Mean time, 'I repeat my thanks for your goodness 'to me.—Nay, dear doctor, hurry not 'away from me so precipitately,' [for he was going, for fear of an offered fee:] 'I will no more affront you with tenders 'that have pained you for some time 'past: and since I must now, from this 'kindly offered favour, look upon you 'only as a friend, I will assure you 'henceforth, that I will give you no 'more uneasiness on that head: and 'now, Sir, I know I shall have the 'pleasure of seeing you oftener than 'heretofore.'

The worthy gentleman was pleased with this assurance, telling her, that he had always come to see her with great pleasure, but parted with her, on the account she hinted at, with as much pain; and that he should not have forborne to double his visits, could he have had this kind assurance as early as he wished for it.

There are few instances of like disinterestedness, I doubt, in this tribe. Till now I always held it for gospel, that friendship and physician were incompatible things; and little imagined, that a man of medicine, when he had given over his patient to death, would think of any visits but those of ceremony, that he might stand well with the family, against it came to their turns to go through his turnpike.

After the doctor was gone, she fell into a very serious discourse of the vanity of life, and the wisdom of preparing for death, while health and strength remained, and before the infirmities of body impaired the faculties of the mind, and disabled them from acting with the necessary efficacy and clearness: the whole calculated for every one's meridian, but particularly, as it was easy to observe, for mine and mine.

She was very curious to know further

ther

ther particulars of the behaviour of poor Belton in his laſt moments. 'You muſt 'not wonder at my enquiries, Mr. Bel- 'ford,' ſaid ſhe; 'for who is it that is 'to undertake a journey into a country 'they never travelled to before, that 'enquires not into the difficulties of the 'road, and what accommodations are 'to be expected in the way?'

I gave her a brief account of the poor man's terrors, and unwillingneſs to die: and when I had done: 'Thus, Mr. 'Belford,' ſaid ſhe, 'muſt it always be 'with poor ſouls, who have never 'thought of their long voyage till the 'moment they are to embark for it.'

She made ſuch other obſervations upon this ſubject, as coming from the mouth of a perſon who will ſo ſoon be a companion for angels, I ſhall never forget. And indeed, when I went home, that I might engraft them the better on my memory, I entered them down in writing: but I will not let you ſee them until you are in a frame more proper to benefit by them, than you are likely to be in one while.

Thus far I had written, when the unexpected early return of my ſervant with your packet, (yours and he meeting at Slough, and exchanging letters) obliged me to leave off to give it's contents a reading.—Here, therefore, I cloſe this letter.

LETTER LXXXI.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

TUESDAY MORN. AUG. 29.

NOW, Jack, will I give thee an account of what paſſed on occaſion of the viſit made us by Colonel Morden.

He came on horſeback, attended by one ſervant; and Lord M. received him, as a relation of Miſs Harlowe's, with the higheſt marks of civility and reſpect.

After ſome general talk of the times, and of the weather, and ſuch nonſenſe as Engliſhmen generally make their introductory topicks to converſation, the colonel addreſſed himſelf to Lord M. and to me, as follows:

'I need not, my lord—and Mr. 'Lovelace—as you know the relation I 'bear to the Harlowe family, make any 'apology for entering upon a ſubject, 'which, on account of that relation, 'you muſt think is the principal reaſon 'of the honour I have done myſelf in 'this viſit.'

'Miſs Harlowe, Miſs Clariſſa Har- 'lowe's affair,' ſaid Lord M. with his uſual forward bluntneſs. 'That, Sir,' 'is what you mean. She is, by all ac- 'counts, the moſt excellent woman in 'the world.'

'I am glad to hear that is your lord- 'ſhip's opinion of her. It is every- 'one's.'

'It is not only my opinion, Colonel 'Morden,' (proceeded the prating peer) 'but it is the opinion of all my family. 'Of my ſiſters, of my nieces, and of 'Mr. Lovelace himſelf.'

Col. 'Would to Heaven it had been 'always Mr. Lovelace's opinion of 'her!'

Lovel. 'You have been out of Eng- 'land, colonel, a good many years. 'Perhaps you are not yet fully apprized 'of all the particulars of this caſe.'

Col. 'I have been out of England, 'Sir, about ſeven years. My couſin 'Clary was then about twelve years of 'age: but never was there at twenty ſo 'diſcreet, ſo prudent, and ſo excellent 'a creature. All that knew her, or ſaw 'her, admired her. Mind and perſon, 'never did I ſee ſuch promiſes of per- 'fection in any young lady: and I am 'told, nor is it to be wondered at, that 'as ſhe advanced to maturity, ſhe more 'than juſtified and made good thoſe pro- 'miſes.—Then as to fortune—what her 'father, what her uncles, and what I 'myſelf, intended to do for her, be- 'ſides what her grandfather had done— 'There is not a finer fortune in the 'county.'

Lovel. 'All this, colonel, and more 'than this, is Miſs Clariſſa Harlowe; 'and had it not been for the implacable- 'neſs and violence of her family, (all 'reſolved to puſh her upon a match as 'unworthy of her, as hateful to her) ſhe 'had ſtill been happy.'

Col. 'I own, Mr. Lovelace, the truth 'of what you obſerved juſt now, that I 'am not thoroughly acquainted with all 'that has paſſed between you and my 'couſin. But permit me to ſay, that 'when I firſt heard that you made your 'addreſſes to her, I knew but of one 'objection againſt you. That, indeed, 'a very great one: and upon a letter 'ſent me, I gave her my free opinion 'upon the ſubject. But had it not been 'for that, I own, that in my private 'mind, there could not have been a 'more ſuitable match: for you are a 'gallant gentleman, graceful in your 'perſon, eaſy and genteel in your de- 'portment, and in your family, for'tune

'nities, and expectations, happy as a 'man can wish to be. Then the know-'ledge I had of you in Italy, (although, 'give me leave to say, your conduct 'there was not wholly unexceptionable) 'convinces me that you are brave: and 'few gentlemen come up to you in wit 'and vivacity. Your education has 'given you great advantages; your 'manners are engaging, and you have 'travelled; and I know, if you'll ex-'cuse me, you make better observations 'than you are governed by. All these 'qualifications make it not at all sur-'prizing, that a young lady should love 'you: and that this love, joined to that 'indiscreet warmth wherewith my cou-'sin's friends would have forced her in-'clinations in favour of men who are far 'your inferiors in the qualities I have 'named, should throw her upon your 'protection. But then, if there were 'these two strong motives, the one to 'induce, and the other to impel her, let 'me ask you, Sir, if she were not dou-'bly entitled to generous usage from a 'man whom she chose for her protec-'tor; and whom, let me take the li-'berty to say, she could so amply reward 'for the protection he was to afford 'her?'

Lovel. 'Miss Clarissa Harlowe was en-'titled, Sir, to the best usage that man 'could give her. I have no scruple to 'own it. I will always do her the jus-'tice she so well deserves. I know what 'will be your inference; and have only 'to say, that time past cannot be recall-'ed. Perhaps I wish it could.'

The colonel, then, in a very manly strain, set forth the wickedness of at-tempting a woman of virtue and charac-ter. He said, that men had generally too many advantages from the weakness, credulity, and inexperience of the fair-sex: that their early learning, which chiefly consisted in enflaming novels, and idle and improbable romances, con-tributed to enervate and weaken their minds: that his cousin, however, he was sure, was above the reach of com-mon seduction, and not to be influenced to the rashness her parents accused her of, by weaker motives than their vio-lence; and the most solemn promises on my part: but, nevertheless, having those motives, and her prudence (eminent as it was) being rather the effect of consti-tution than experience, (a fine advantage, however, he said, to ground an un-blameable future life upon) she might not be apprehensive of bad designs in a man she loved: it was, therefore, a very heinous thing to abuse the confi-dence of such a woman.

He was going on in this trite manner; when interrupting him, I said; 'These 'general observations, colonel, suit not 'perhaps this particular case. But you 'yourself are a man of gallantry; and, 'possibly, were you to be put to the 'question, might not be able to vindi-'cate every action of your life, any 'more than me.'

Col. 'You are welcome, Sir, to put 'what questions you please to me. And, 'I thank God, I can both own and be 'ashamed of my errors.'

Lord M. looked at me; but as the colonel did not by his manner seem to intend a reflection, I had no occasion to take it for one; especially as I can as readily own my errors, as he, or any man, can his, whether ashamed of them or not.

He proceeded. 'As you seem to call 'upon me, Mr. Lovelace, I will tell you '(without boasting of it) what has been 'my general practice, till lately, that I 'hope I have reformed it a good deal.

'I have taken liberties, which the 'laws of morality will by no means jus-'tify; and once I should have thought 'myself warranted to cut the throat of 'any young fellow, who should make as 'free with a sister of mine, as I have 'made with the sisters and daughters of 'others. But then I took care never to 'promise any-thing I intended not to 'perform. A modest ear should as soon 'have heard downright obscenity from 'my lips, as matrimony, if I had not 'intended it. Young ladies are gene-'rally ready enough to believe we mean 'honourably, if they love us; and it 'would look like a strange affront to 'their virtue and charms, that it should 'be supposed needful to put the question 'whether, in your address, you mean 'a wife. But when once a man makes 'a promise, I think it ought to be per-'formed; and a woman is well war-'ranted to appeal to every-one against 'the perfidy of a deceiver; and is al-'ways sure to have the world on her 'side.

'Now, Sir,' continued he, 'I be-'lieve you have so much honour as to 'own, that you could not have made 'way to so eminent a virtue, without 'promising marriage; and that very ex-'plicitly and solemnly.'

'I know very well, colonel,' inter-rupted I, 'all you would say. You 'will

'will excuſe me, I am ſure, that I 'break in upon you, when you find it 'is to anſwer the end you drive at.

'I own to you, then, that I have act-'ed very unworthily by Miſs Clariſſa 'Harlowe; and I'll tell you further, 'that I heartily repent of my ingratitude 'and baſeneſs to her. Nay, I will ſay 'ſtill further, that I am ſo groſsly cul-'pable, as to her, that even to plead, 'that the abuſes and affronts I daily re-'ceived from her implacable relations, 'were in any manner a provocation to 'me to act vilely by her, would be a 'mean and low attempt to excuſe my-'ſelf—So low and ſo mean, that it would 'doubly condemn me. And if you can 'ſay worſe, ſpeak it.'

He looked upon Lord M. and then upon me, two or three times. And my lord ſaid, 'My kinſman ſpeaks what he 'thinks, I'll anſwer for him.'

Lovel. 'I do, Sir; and what can I 'ſay more?—And what further, in your 'opinion, can be done?'

Col. 'Done! Sir? Why, Sir,' [in a haughty tone he ſpoke] 'I need not tell 'you that reparation follows repentance. 'And I hope you make no ſcruple of 'juſtifying your ſincerity as to the one, 'by the other.'

I heſitated (for I reliſhed not the manner of his ſpeech, and his haughty accent) as undetermined whether to take proper notice of it or not.

Col. 'Let me put this queſtion to you, 'Mr. Lovelace: Is it true, as I have 'heard it is, That you would marry my 'couſin, if ſhe would have you?—What 'ſay you, Sir?'

This wound me up a peg higher.

Lovel. 'Some queſtions, as they may 'be put, imply commands, colonel. I 'would be glad to know how I am to 'take yours? And what is to be the end 'of your interrogatories?'

Col. 'My queſtions are not meant by 'me as commands, Mr. Lovelace. The 'end is, to prevail upon a gentleman to 'act like a gentleman, and a man of 'honour.'

Lovel. (Briſkly) 'And by what argu-'ments, Sir, do you propoſe to prevail 'upon me?'

Col. 'By what arguments, Sir, pre-'vail upon a gentleman to act like a 'gentleman!—I am ſurprized at that 'queſtion from Mr. Lovelace.'

Lovel. 'Why ſo, Sir?'

Col. 'WHY ſo, Sir!' (Angrily.)—'Let me—'

Lovel. (Interrupting) 'I don't chuſe, 'colonel, to be repeated upon in that 'accent.'

Lord M. 'Come, come, gentlemen, I 'beg of you to be willing to underſtand 'one another. You young gentlemen 'are ſo warm—!'

Col. 'Not I, my lord—I am neither 'very young, nor unduly warm. Your 'nephew, my lord, can make me be 'every-thing he would have me to be.'

Lovel. 'And that ſhall be, whatever 'you pleaſe to be, colonel.'

Col. (Fiercely) 'The choice be yours, 'Mr. Lovelace. Friend or foe! as you 'do or are willing to do juſtice to one of 'the fineſt women in the world.'

Lord M. 'I gueſſed from both your 'characters what would be the caſe 'when you met. Let me interpoſe, gen-'tlemen, and beg you but to underſtand 'one another. You both ſhoot at one mark; 'and if you are patient, will both hit it. '—Let me beg of you, colonel, to give 'no challenges.'

Col. 'Challenges, my lord!—They 'are things I ever was readier to accept 'than to offer. But does your lordſhip 'think, that a man, ſo nearly related 'as I have the honour to be to the moſt 'accompliſhed woman on earth—'

Lord M. (Interrupting) 'We all allow 'the excellences of the lady—And we 'ſhall all take it as the greateſt honour 'to be allied to her that can be confer-'red upon us.'

Col. 'So you ought, my lord!'

'A perfect Chamont!' thought I.

Lord M. 'So we ought, colonel! And 'ſo we do!—And pray let every-one do 'as he ought!—and no more than he 'ought; and you, colonel, let me tell 'you, will not be ſo haſty.'

Lovel. (Coolly) 'Come, come, Colo-'nel Morden, don't let this diſpute, 'whatever you intend to make of it, go 'farther than with you and me. You 'deliver yourſelf in very high terms. 'Higher than ever I was talked to in 'my life. But here, beneath this roof, 'twould be inexcuſeable for me to take 'that notice of it, which perhaps it 'would become me to take elſewhere.'

Col. 'This is ſpoken as I wiſh the 'man to ſpeak, whom I ſhould be pleaſ-'ed to call my friend, if all his actions 'were of a piece, and as I would have 'the man ſpeak, whom I would think 'it worth my while to call my foe. I love 'a man of ſpirit, as I love my ſoul. 'But, Mr. Lovelace, as my lord thinks 'we aim at one mark, let me ſay, that 'were we permitted to be alone for ſix

'minutes, I dare say, we should soon 'understand one another perfectly well.' —And he moved to the door.

Lovel. 'I am entirely of your opinion, 'Sir: and will attend you.'

My lord rung, and stept between us: 'Colonel, return, I beseech you, re-'turn,' said he: for he had stept out of the room, while my lord held me— 'Nephew, you shall not go out.'

The bell and my lord's raised voice brought in Mowbray, and Clements, my lord's gentleman; the former in his careless way, with his hands behind him, 'What's the matter, Bobby?—What's 'the matter, my lord?'

'Only, only, only,' stammered the agitated peer, 'these young gentlemen 'are, are, are—are young gentlemen, 'that's all.—Pray, Colonel Morden,' [who again entered the room with a sedater aspect] 'let this cause have a fair 'trial, I beseech you.'

Col. 'With all my heart, my lord.'

Mowbray whispered me, 'What is 'the cause, Bobby?—Shall I take the 'gentleman to task for thee, my boy?'

'Not for the world,' whispered I. 'The colonel is a gentleman, and I de-'sire you'll not say one word.'

'Well, well, well, Bobby, I have 'done. I can turn thee loose to the best 'man upon God's earth; that's all, 'Bobby;' strutting off to the other end of the room.

Col. 'I am sorry, my lord, I should 'give your lordship the least uneasiness. 'I came not with such a design.'

Lord M. 'Indeed, colonel, I thought 'you did, by your taking fire so quick-'ly. I am glad to hear you say you did 'not. How soon a little spark kindles into 'a flame; especially when it meets with 'such combustible spirits!'

Col. 'If I had had the least thought of 'proceeding to extremities, I am sure 'Mr. Lovelace would have given me the 'honour of a meeting where I should 'have been less an intruder: but I came 'with an amicable intention—To re-'concile differences, rather than to 'widen them.'

Lovel. 'Well then, Colonel Morden, 'let us enter upon the subject in your 'own way. I don't know the man I 'should sooner chuse to be upon terms 'with, than one whom Miss Clarissa 'Harlowe so much respects. But I can-'not bear to be treated, either in word 'or accent, in a menacing way.'

Lord M. 'Well, well, well, well, 'gentlemen, this is somewhat like. Angry men make to themselves beds of nettles, and when they lay down in them, 'are uneasy with every-body. But I 'hope you are friends. Let me hear you 'say you are.—I am persuaded, colonel, 'that you don't know all this unhappy 'story. You don't know how desirous 'my kinsman is, as well as all of us, to 'have this matter end happily. You don't 'know, do you, colonel, that Mr. 'Lovelace, at all our requests, is dis-'posed to marry the lady?'

Col. 'At all your requests, my lord?— 'I should have hoped, that Mr. Love-'lace was disposed to do justice for the 'sake of justice; and when at the same 'time the doing of justice was doing 'himself the highest honour.'

Mowbray lifted up his before half-closed eyes to the colonel, and glanced them upon me.

Lovel. 'This is in very high language, 'colonel.'

Mowbr. 'By my soul, I thought so.'

Col. 'High language, Mr. Lovelace? 'Is it not just language?'

Lovel. 'It is, colonel. And I think, 'the man that does honour to Miss 'Clarissa Harlowe, does me honour. 'But, nevertheless, there is a manner 'in speaking, that may be liable to ex-'ception, where the words, without 'that manner, can bear none.'

Col. 'Your observation in the general 'is undoubtedly just: but if you have 'the value for my cousin, that you say 'you have, you must needs think—'

Lovel. 'You must allow me, Sir, to 'interrupt you.—If I have the value I 'say I have—I hope, Sir, when I say 'I have that value, there is no room 'for that if, pronounced as you pro-'nounced it with an emphasis.'

Col. 'You have broken in upon me 'twice, Mr. Lovelace. I am as little 'accustomed to be broken in upon, as 'you are to be repeated upon.'

Lord M. 'Two barrels of gunpow-'der, by my conscience! What a devil 'will it signify talking, if thus you are 'to blow one another up at every wry 'word?'

Lovel. 'No man of honour, my lord, 'will be easy to have his veracity called 'in question, though but by implica-'tion.'

Col. 'Had you heard me out, Mr. 'Lovelace, you would have found, that 'my if was rather an if of inference, than 'of doubt. But 'tis, really, a strange 'liberty gentlemen of free principles 'take; who at the same time that they 'would resent unto death the imputa-'tion of being capable of telling an un-

'truth

'truth to a man, will not ſcruple to 'break through the moſt ſolemn oaths 'and promiſes to a woman. I muſt aſ-'ſure you, Mr. Lovelace, that I always 'made a conſcience of my vows and 'promiſes.'

Lovel. 'You did right, colonel. But 'let me tell you, Sir, that you know 'not the man you talk to, if you ima-'gine he is not able to riſe to a proper 'reſentment, when he ſees his generous 'conceſſions taken for a mark of baſe-'ſpiritedneſs.'

Col. (Warmly and with a ſneer) 'Far 'be it from me, Mr. Lovelace, to im-'pute to you the baſeneſs of ſpirit you 'ſpeak of; for what would that be, 'but to imagine, that a man who has 'done a very flagrant injury, is not 'ready to ſhew his bravery in defending 'it?'

Mowbr. 'This is damn'd ſevere, co-'lonel. It is, by Jove. I could not 'take ſo much at the hands of any man 'breathing as Mr. Lovelace before this 'took at yours.'

Col. 'Who are you, Sir? What pre-'tence have you to interpoſe in a cauſe 'where there is an acknowledged guilt 'on one ſide, and the honour of a con-'ſiderable family, wounded in the ten-'dereſt part by that guilt, on the other?'

Mowbr. (Whiſpering to the colonel) 'My 'dear child, you will oblige me highly, 'if you will give me the opportunity of 'anſwering your queſtion.' And was going out.

The colonel was held in by my lord. And I brought in Mowbray.

Col. 'Pray, my good lord, let me at-'tend this officious gentleman, I beſeech 'you do. I will wait upon your lord-'ſhip in three minutes, depend upon it.'

Lovel. 'Mowbray, is this acting like 'a friend by me, to ſuppoſe me inca-'pable of anſwering for myſelf? And 'ſhall a man of honour and bravery, as 'I know Colonel Morden to be, (raſh 'as perhaps in this viſit he has ſhewn 'himſelf) have it to ſay, That he comes 'to my Lord M.'s houſe, in a manner 'naked as to attendants and friends, 'and ſhall not for that reaſon be rather 'borne with, than inſulted? This mo-'ment, my dear Mowbray, leave us. 'You have really no concern in this 'buſineſs; and if you are my friend, I 'deſire you'll aſk the colonel pardon for 'interfering in it in the manner you 'have done.'

Mowbr. 'Well, well, Bob; thou ſhalt 'be arbiter in this matter. I know I 'have no buſineſs in it—And, colonel,' (holding out his hand) 'I leave you to 'one who knows how to defend his own 'cauſe as well as any man in England.'

Col. (Taking Mowbray's hand, at Lord M.'s requeſt) 'You need not tell me 'that, Mr. Mowbray. I have no doubt 'of Mr. Lovelace's ability to defend 'his own cauſe, were it a cauſe to be 'defended.—And let me tell you, Mr. 'Lovelace, that I am aſtoniſhed to think, 'that a brave man, and a generous man, 'as you have appeared to be in two or 'three inſtances that you have given in 'the little knowledge I have of you, 'ſhould be capable of acting as you 'have done by the moſt excellent of her 'ſex.'

Lord M. 'Well, but, gentlemen, now 'Mr. Mowbray is gone, and you have 'both ſhewn inſtances of courage and 'generoſity to boot, let me deſire you 'to lay your heads together amicably, 'and think whether there be any-thing 'to be done to make all end happily for 'the lady.'

Lovel. 'But hold, my lord, let me 'ſay one thing, now Mowbray is gone; 'and that is, that I think a gentleman 'ought not to put up tamely one or 'two ſevere things that the colonel has 'ſaid.'

Lord M. 'What the devil canſt thou 'mean? I thought all had been over. 'Why thou haſt nothing to do, but to 'confirm to the colonel, that thou art 'willing to marry Miſs Harlowe, if ſhe 'will have thee.'

Col. 'Mr. Lovelace will not ſcruple 'to ſay that, I ſuppoſe, notwithſtanding 'all that has paſſed.—But if you think, 'Mr. Lovelace, I have ſaid any-thing 'I ſhould not have ſaid, I ſuppoſe it is 'this, That the man who has ſhewn ſo 'little of the thing honour, to a defence-'leſs unprotected woman, ought not to 'ſtand ſo nicely upon the empty name of 'it, with a man who is expoſtulating 'with him upon it. I am ſorry to have 'cauſe to ſay this, Mr. Lovelace; but 'I would on the ſame occaſion repeat 'it to a king upon his throne, and ſur-'rounded by all his guards.'

Lord M. 'But what is all this, but 'more ſacks upon the mill? more coals 'upon the fire? You have a mind to 'quarrel, both of you, I ſee that.—'Are you not willing, nephew, are you 'not moſt willing, to marry this lady, if 'ſhe can be prevailed upon to have 'you?'

Lovel. 'Damn me, my lord, if I'd 'marry an empreſs upon ſuch treatment 'as this!'

Lord M. 'Why now, Bob, thou art 'more cholerick than the colonel. It 'was his turn juſt now. And now 'you ſee he is cool, you are all gun-'powder.'

Lovel. 'I own the colonel has many 'advantages over me; but, perhaps, 'there is one advantage he has not if 'it were put to the trial.'

Col. 'I came not hither, as I ſaid be-'fore, to ſeek the occaſion: but if it be 'offered me, I won't refuſe it—And 'ſince we find we diſturb my good Lord 'M. I'll take my leave, and will go 'home by the way of St. Alban's.'

Lovel. 'I'll ſee you part of the way, 'with all my heart, colonel.'

Col. 'I accept your civility very cheer-'fully, Mr. Lovelace.'

Lord M. (Interpoſing again, as we were both for going out) 'And what will this 'do, gentlemen? Suppoſe you kill one 'another, will the matter be bettered 'or worſted by that? Will the lady be 'made happier or unhappier, do you 'think, by either or both of your deaths? 'Your characters are too well known 'to make freſh inſtances of the courage 'of either needful.—And, I think, if 'the honour of the lady is your view, 'colonel, it can be no other way ſo ef-'fectually promoted, as by marriage. 'And, Sir, if you would uſe your intereſt 'with her, it is very probable, that you 'may ſucceed, though nobody elſe can.'

Lovel. 'I think, my lord, I have ſaid 'all that a man can ſay; (ſince what is 'paſſed cannot be recalled) and you ſee 'Colonel Morden riſes in proportion to 'my coolneſs, till it is neceſſary for me 'to aſſert myſelf, or even he would de-'ſpiſe me.'

Lord M. 'Let me aſk you, colonel; 'Have you any way, any method, that 'you think reaſonable and honourable 'to propoſe, to bring about a reconci-'liation with the lady? That is what 'we all wiſh for. And I can tell you, 'Sir, it is not a little owing to her fa-'mily, and to their implacable uſage of 'her, that her reſentments are height-'ened againſt my kinſman; who, how-'ever, has uſed her vilely; but is willing 'to repair her wrongs.'

Lovel. 'Not, my lord, for the ſake of 'her family; nor for this gentleman's 'haughty behaviour; but for her own 'ſake, and in full ſenſe of the wrongs I 'have done her.'

Col. 'As to my haughty behaviour, 'as you call it, Sir, I am miſtaken if 'you would not have gone beyond it 'in the like caſe, of a relation ſo meri-'torious, and ſo unworthily injured. 'And, Sir, let me tell you, that if your 'motives are not love, honour, and 'juſtice, and if they have the leaſt tinc-'ture of mean compaſſion for her, or of 'an uncheerful aſſent on your part, I am 'ſure it will neither be deſired nor ac-'cepted by a perſon of my couſin's merit 'and ſenſe, nor ſhall I wiſh that it 'ſhould.'

Lovel. 'Don't think, colonel, that I 'am meanly compounding off a debate, 'that I ſhould as willingly go through 'with you as to eat or drink, if I have 'the occaſion given me for it: but 'thus much I will tell you, that my 'lord, that Lady Sarah Sadleir, Lady 'Betty Lawrance, my two couſins Mon-'tague, and myſelf, have written to her 'in the moſt ſolemn and ſincere man-'ner, to offer her ſuch terms, as no one 'but herſelf would refuſe, and this long 'enough before Colonel Morden's ar-'rival was dreamt of.'

Col. 'What reaſon, Sir, may I aſk, 'does ſhe give, againſt liſtening to ſo 'powerful a mediation, and to ſuch 'offers?'

Lovel. 'It looks like capitulating, or 'elſe——'

Col. 'It looks not like any ſuch thing 'to me, Mr. Lovelace, who have as good 'an opinion of your ſpirit as man can 'have. And what, pray, is the part I 'act, and my motives for it? Are they 'not, in deſiring that juſtice may be 'done to my couſin Clariſſa Harlowe, 'that I ſeek to eſtabliſh the honour of 'Mrs. Lovelace, if matters can once be 'brought to bear?'

Lovel. 'Were ſhe to honour me with 'her acceptance of that name, Mr. 'Morden, I ſhould not want you or 'any man to aſſert the honour of Mrs. 'Lovelace.'

Col. 'I believe it. But till ſhe has 'honoured you with that acceptance, 'ſhe is nearer to me than to you, Mr. 'Lovelace. And I ſpeak this, only to 'ſhew you, that in the part I take, I 'mean rather to deſerve your thanks 'than your diſpleaſure, though againſt 'yourſelf, were there occaſion. Nor 'ought you to take it amiſs, if you 'rightly weigh the matter: for, Sir, 'whom does a lady want protection 'againſt but her injurers? And who 'has been her greateſt injurer?—Till, 'therefore, ſhe becomes entitled to your 'protection, as your wife, you yourſelf 'cannot refuſe me ſome merit in wiſh-'ing to have juſtice done my couſin. But, 'Sir, you were a going to ſay, that if it

'were

'were not to look like capitulating, 'you would hint the reaſons my couſin 'gives againſt accepting ſuch an honour-'able mediation?'

I then told him of my ſincere offers of marriage: I made no difficulty, I ſaid, to own my apprehenſions, that my unhappy behaviour to her had greatly affected her: but that it was the implacableneſs of her friends that had thrown her into deſpair, and given her a contempt for life. I told him, That ſhe had been ſo good, as to ſend me a letter to divert me from a viſit my heart was ſet upon making her: a letter, on which I built great hopes, becauſe ſhe aſſured me in it, that ſhe was going to her father's; and that I might ſee her there, when ſhe was received, if it were not my own fault.

Col. 'Is it poſſible? And were you, 'Sir, thus earneſt? And did ſhe ſend 'you ſuch a letter?'

Lord M. confirmed both; and alſo, that, in obedience to her deſire, and that intimation, I had come down without the ſatisfaction I had propoſed to myſelf in ſeeing her.

'It is very true, colonel,' ſaid I: 'and 'I ſhould have told you this before: 'but your heat made me decline it; for, 'as I ſaid, it had an appearance of mean-'ly capitulating with you. An abject-'neſs of heart, of which had I been ca-'pable, I ſhould have deſpiſed myſelf as 'much as I might have expected you 'would deſpiſe me.'

Lord M. propoſed to enter into the proof of all this: he ſaid, in his phraſeological way, That one ſtory was good, till another was heard: that the Harlowe family and I, 'twas true, had behaved like ſo many Orſons to one another; and that they had been very free with all our family beſides: that, nevertheleſs, for the lady's ſake, more than for theirs, or even for mine, (he could tell me) he would do greater things for me, than they could aſk, if ſhe could be brought to have me: and that this he wanted to declare, and would ſooner have declared, if he could have brought us ſooner to patience, and a good underſtanding.

The colonel made excuſes for his warmth, on the ſcore of his affection to his couſin.

My regard for her made me readily admit them: and ſo a freſh bottle of Burgundy, and another of Champagne, being put upon the table, we ſat down in good humour, after all this bluſtering, in order to enter cloſer into the particulars of the caſe: which I undertook, at both their deſires, to do.

But theſe things muſt be the ſubject of another letter, which ſhall immediately follow this, if it do not accompany it.

Mean time you will obſerve, That a bad cauſe gives a man great diſadvantages: for I myſelf think, that the interrogatories put to me with ſo much ſpirit by the colonel, made me look curſedly mean; at the ſame time that it gave him a ſuperiority which I know not how to allow to the beſt man in Europe. So that, literally ſpeaking, as a good man would infer, guilt is it's own puniſher; in that it makes the moſt lofty ſpirit look like the miſcreant he is.—A good man, I ſay: ſo, Jack, proleptically I add, thou haſt no right to make the obſervation.

LETTER LXXXII.

MR. LOVELACE, IN CONTINUATION.

TUESDAY AFTERNOON AUG. 29.

I Went back in this part of our converſation to the day that I was obliged to come down to attend my lord, in the dangerous illneſs which ſome feared would have been his laſt.

I told the colonel What earneſt letters I had written to a particular friend, to engage him to prevail upon the lady not to ſlip a day that had been propoſed for the private celebration of our nuptials; and of my letters written to herſelf on that ſubject; for I had ſtept to my cloſet, and fetched down all the letters, and draughts, and copies of letters relating to this affair.

I read to him ſeveral paſſages in the copies of thoſe letters, which thou wilt remember make not a little to my honour. And I told him, That I wiſhed I had kept copies of thoſe to my friend on the ſame occaſion; by which he would have ſeen how much in earneſt I was in my profeſſions to her, although ſhe would not anſwer one of them. And thou mayſt remember, that one of thoſe four letters accounted to herſelf, why I was deſirous ſhe ſhould remain where I had left her.

I then proceeded to give him an account of the viſit made by Lady Sarah and Lady Betty to Lord M. and me, in order to induce me to do her juſtice: of my readineſs to comply with their deſires; and of their high opinion of her merit: of the viſit made to Miſs Howe by my couſins Montague, in the name of us all, to engage her intereſt with her friend in my behalf: of my converſation with Miſs Howe, at a private aſſembly, to whom I gave the ſame aſſurances, and beſought her intereſt with her friend.

I then read the copy of the letter (though ſo much to my diſadvantage) which was written to her by Miſs Charlotte Montague, Auguſt 1, entreating her alliance in the names of all our family.

This made him ready to think, that his fair couſin carried her reſentment againſt me too far. He did not imagine, he ſaid, that either myſelf or our family had been ſo much in earneſt.

So thou ſeeſt, Belford, that it is but gloſſing over one part of a ſtory, and omitting another, that will make a bad cauſe a good one at any time. What an admirable lawyer ſhould I have made! And what a poor hand would this charming creature, with all her innocence, have made of it in a court of juſtice, againſt a man who had ſo much to ſay, and to ſhew for himſelf!

I then hinted at the generous annual tender which Lord M. and his ſiſters made to his fair couſin, in apprehenſion that ſhe might ſuffer by her friends implacableneſs.

And this alſo the colonel highly applauded, and was pleaſed to lament the unhappy miſunderſtanding between the two families, which had made the Harlowes leſs fond of an alliance with a family of ſo much honour, as this inſtance ſhewed ours to be.

I then told him, That having, by my friend, [meaning thee] who was admitted into her preſence, (and who had always been an admirer of her virtues, and had given me ſuch advice from time to time in relation to her as I wiſhed I had followed) been aſſured, that a viſit from me would be very diſagreeable to her, I once more reſolved to try what a letter would do; and that, accordingly, on the 7th of Auguſt I wrote her one.

'This, colonel, is the copy of it. I 'was then out of humour with my Lord 'M. and the ladies of my family. You 'will therefore read it to yourſelf.'

This letter gave him high ſatisfaction. 'You write here, Mr. Lovelace, 'from your heart. 'Tis a letter full of 'penitence and acknowledgment. Your 'requeſt is reaſonable—To be forgiven 'only as you ſhall appear to deſerve it 'after a time of probation, which you 'leave to her to fix.—Pray, Sir, did ſhe 'return an anſwer to this letter?'

'She did, but with reluctance, I own, 'and not till I had declared by my 'friend, that if I could not procure one, 'I would go up to town, and throw 'myſelf at her feet.'

'I wiſh I might be permitted to ſee 'it, Sir, or to hear ſuch parts of it read, 'as you ſhall think proper.'

Turning over my papers, 'Here it 'is, Sir. I will make no ſcruple to put 'it into your hands.'

'This is very obliging, Mr. Love-'lace.'

He read it.—'My charming couſin! '—How ſtrong her reſentments!—Yet, 'how charitable her wiſhes!—Good 'Heaven! that ſuch an excellent crea-'ture—But, Mr. Lovelace, it is to your 'regret, as much as to mine, I doubt 'not——'

Interrupting him, I ſwore that it was.

'So it ought,' ſaid he. 'Nor do I 'wonder that it ſhould be ſo. I ſhall 'tell you, by-and by,' proceeded he, 'how much ſhe ſuffers with her friends 'by falſe and villainous reports. But, 'Sir, will you permit me to take with 'me theſe two letters? I ſhall make uſe 'of them to the advantage of you both.'

I told him, I would oblige him with all my heart. And this he took very kindly, (as he had reaſon;) and put them in his pocket-book, promiſing to return them in a few days.

I then told him, That upon this her refuſal, I took upon myſelf to go to town, in hopes to move her in my favour; and that, though I went without giving her notice of my intention, yet had ſhe got ſome notion of my coming, and ſo contrived to be out of the way: 'And at laſt, when ſhe found I 'was fully determined at all events to 'ſee her, before I went abroad, (which 'I ſhall do,' ſaid I, 'if I cannot prevail 'upon her) ſhe ſent me the letter I have 'already mentioned to you, deſiring me 'to ſuſpend my purpoſed viſit: and that 'for a reaſon which amazes and con-'founds me; becauſe I don't find there 'is any-thing in it: and yet I never 'knew her once diſpenſe with her word; 'for ſhe always made it a maxim, that 'it was not lawful to do evil, that good might 'come of it: and yet in this letter, for 'no reaſon in the world but to avoid 'ſeeing me, (to gratify an humour only) 'has ſhe ſent me out of town, depend-'ing upon the aſſurance ſhe had given 'me.'

Col. 'This is indeed ſurpriſing. But 'I cannot believe that my couſin, for 'ſuch an end only, or indeed for any end,

'according

'according to the character I hear of 'her, would ſtoop to make uſe of ſuch 'an artifice.'

Lovel. 'This, colonel, is the thing 'that aſtoniſhes me; and yet, ſee here! '—This is the letter ſhe wrote me— 'Nay, Sir, 'tis her own hand.'

Col. 'I ſee it is; and a charming hand 'it is.'

Lovel. 'You obſerve, colonel, that all 'her hopes of reconciliation with her 'parents are from you. You are her 'dear bleſſed friend! She always talked 'of you with delight.'

Col. 'Would to Heaven I had come 'to England before ſhe left Harlowe 'Place!—Nothing of this had then hap- 'pened. Not a man of thoſe whom I 'have heard that her friends propoſed 'for her, ſhould have had her. Nor 'you, Mr. Lovelace, unleſs I had found 'you to be the man every-one who ſees 'you, muſt with you to be: and if you 'had been that man, no one living 'ſhould I have preferred to you for ſuch 'an excellence.'

My lord and I both joined in the wiſh: and 'faith I wiſhed it moſt cordially.

The colonel read the letter twice over, and then returned it to me. 'Tis all 'a myſtery,' ſaid he. 'I can make no- 'thing of it. For, alas! her friends 'are as averſe to a reconciliation as 'ever.'

Lord M. 'I could not have thought 'it. But don't you think there is ſome- 'thing very favourable to my nephew in 'this letter—Something that looks as if 'the lady would comply at laſt?'

Col. 'Let me die if I know what to 'make of it. This letter is very dif- 'ferent from her preceding one.—You 'returned an anſwer to it, Mr. Love- 'lace?'

Lovel. 'An anſwer, colonel! No doubt 'of it. And an anſwer full of tranſ- 'port. I told her, I would directly ſet 'out for Lord M.'s, in obedience to her 'will. I told her, that I would conſent 'to any-thing ſhe ſhould command, in 'order to promote this happy reconci- 'liation. I told her, that it ſhould be 'my hourly ſtudy to the end of my life, 'to deſerve a goodneſs ſo tranſcendent. 'But I cannot forbear ſaying, that I am 'not a little ſhocked and ſurpriſed, if 'nothing more be meant by it than to 'get me into the country without ſee- 'ing her.'

Col. 'That can't be the thing, depend 'upon it, Sir: there muſt be more 'in it than that. For were that all, ſhe 'muſt think you would ſoon be unde- 'ceived, and that you would then moſt 'probably reſume your intention.—Un- 'leſs, indeed, ſhe depended upon ſeeing 'me in the interim, as ſhe knew I was 'arrived. But I own, I know not what 'to make of it. Only that ſhe does me 'a great deal of honour, if it be me that 'ſhe calls her bleſſed friend, whom ſhe al- 'ways loved and honoured. Indeed, I 'ever loved her: and if I die unmar- 'ried, and without children, ſhall be as 'kind to her as her grandfather was: 'and the rather, as I fear that there is 'too much of envy and ſelf-love in the 'reſentments her brother and ſiſter en- 'deavour to keep up in her father and 'mother againſt her. But I ſhall know 'better how to judge of this, when my 'couſin James comes from Edinburgh; 'and he is every hour expected.

'But let me aſk you, Mr. Lovelace, 'What is the name of your friend, 'who is admitted ſo eaſily into my cou- 'ſin's preſence? Is it not Belford, pray?'

Lovel. 'It is, Sir; and Mr. Belford's 'a man of honour; and a great admirer 'of your fair couſin.'

Was I right, as to the firſt, Jack? The laſt I have ſuch ſtrong proof of, that it makes me queſtion the firſt; ſince ſhe would not have been out of the way of my intended viſit but for thee.

Col. 'Are you ſure, Sir, that Mr. 'Belford is a man of honour?'

Lovel. 'I can ſwear for him, colo- 'nel. What makes you put this queſ- 'tion?'

Col. 'Only this: that an officious prag- 'matical novice has been ſent up to en- 'quire into my couſin's life and conver- 'ſation: and, would you believe it? the 'frequent viſits of this gentleman have 'been interpreted baſely to her diſrepu- 'tation.—Read that letter, Mr. Love- 'lace; and you will be ſhocked at every 'part of it.'

This curſed letter, no doubt, is from the young Levite, whom thou, Jack, deſcribedſt, as making enquiry of Mrs. Smith about Miſs Harlowe's character and viſitors.

I believe I was a quarter of an hour in reading it: for I made it, though not a ſhort one, ſix times as long as it is, by the additions of oaths and curſes to every pedantick line. Lord M. too helped to lengthen it, by the like execrations. And thou, Jack, wilt have as much rea- ſon to curſe as we.

'You cannot but ſee,' ſaid the co- lonel, when I had done reading it, 'that 'this fellow has been officious in his ma- 'levolence; for what he ſays is mere hearſay,

'hearſay, and that hearſay conjectural 'ſcandal without fact, or the appear-'ance of fact, to ſupport it; ſo that 'an unprejudiced eye, upon the face of 'the letter, would condemn the writer 'of it, as I did, and acquit my couſin. 'But yet, ſuch is the ſpirit by which the 'reſt of my relations are governed, that 'they run away with the belief of the 'worſt it inſinuates, and the dear crea-'ture has had ſhocking letters upon it; 'the pedant's hints are taken; and a 'voyage to one of the colonies has 'been propoſed to her, as the only way 'to avoid Mr. Belford and you. I have 'not ſeen theſe letters, indeed; but 'they took a pride in repeating ſome of 'their contents, which muſt have cut the 'poor ſoul to the heart; and theſe, 'joined to her former ſufferings—What 'have you not, Mr. Lovelace, to an-'ſwer for?'

Lovel. 'Who the devil could have 'expected ſuch conſequences as theſe? 'Who could have believed there could 'be parents ſo implacable? Brother and 'ſiſter ſo envious? And, give me leave 'to ſay, a lady ſo immoveably fixed a-'gainſt the only means that could be 'taken to put all right with every-'body?—And what now can be done?'

Lord M. 'I have great hopes that 'Colonel Morden may yet prevail upon 'his couſin. And by her laſt letter, it 'runs in my mind, that ſhe has ſome 'thoughts of forgiving all that's paſt.—'Do you think, colonel, if there ſhould 'not be ſuch a thing as reconciliation 'going forward at preſent, that her 'letter may not imply, that if we could 'bring ſuch a thing to bear with her 'friends, ſhe would be reconciled with 'Mr. Lovelace?'

Col. 'Such an artifice would better 'become the Italian ſubtilty than the 'Engliſh ſimplicity.—Your lordſhip has 'been in Italy, I preſume?'

Lovel. 'My lord has read Boccacio, 'perhaps; and that's as well, as to the 'hint he gives, which may be borrowed 'from one of that author's ſtories. But 'Miſs Clariſſa Harlowe is above all ar-'tifice. She muſt have ſome meaning 'I cannot fathom.'

Col. 'Well, my lord, I can only ſay, 'that I will make ſome uſe of the let-'ters Mr. Lovelace has obliged me 'with: and after I have had ſome talk 'with my couſin James, who is hourly 'expected; and when I have diſpatched 'two or three affairs that preſs upon 'me, I will pay my reſpects to my dear 'couſin; and ſhall be then able to form 'a better judgment of things. Mean 'time I will write to her; for I have 'ſent to enquire about her, and find ſhe 'wants conſolation.'

Lovel. 'If you favour me, colonel, 'with the damn'd letter of that fellow 'Brand, for a day or two, you will o-'blige me.'

Col. 'I will. But remember, the 'man is a parſon, Mr. Lovelace; an 'innocent one too, they ſay. Elſe I 'had been at him before now. And 'theſe college novices, who think they 'know every-thing in their cloiſters, 'and that all learning lies in books, make 'diſmal figures when they come into the 'world among men and women.'

Lord M. 'Brand! Brand! It ſhould 'have been Firebrand, I think, in my 'conſcience!'

Thus ended this doughty conference.

I cannot ſay, Jack, but I am greatly taken with Colonel Morden. He is brave and generous, and knows the world; and then his contempt of the parſons is a certain ſign that he is one of us.

We parted with great civility: Lord M. (not a little pleaſed that we did, and as greatly taken with the colonel) repeated his wiſh, after the colonel was gone, that he had arrived in time to ſave the lady; if that would have done it.

I wiſh ſo too. For by my ſoul, Jack, I am every day more and more uneaſy about her. But I hope ſhe is not ſo ill as I am told ſhe is.

I have made Charlotte tranſcribe the letter of this Firebrand, as my lord calls him; and will incloſe her copy of it. All thy phlegm, I know, will be rouzed into vengeance when thou readeſt it.

I know not what to adviſe as to ſhewing it to the lady. Yet, perhaps, ſhe will be able to reap more ſatisfaction than concern from it, knowing her own innocence; in that it will give her to hope that her friends treatment of her is owing as much to miſrepreſentation as to their own natural implacableneſs. Such a mind as hers, I know, would be glad to find out the ſhadow of a reaſon for the ſhocking letters the colonel ſays they have ſent her, and for their propoſal to her of going to ſome one of the colonies. [Confound them all—But if I begin to curſe, I ſhall never have done]—Then it may put her upon ſuch a defence as ſhe might be glad of an opportunity to make, and to ſhame them for their monſtrous credulity—But this I leave to thy own fat-headed prudence—Only it vexes me to the heart, that even ſcandal and calumny ſhould dare to ſurmiſe the bare poſſibility of any man's ſharing the favours of a woman, whom now methinks I could worſhip with a veneration due only to a divinity.

Charlotte and her ſiſter could not help weeping at the baſe aſperſion: 'When, 'when,' ſaid Patty, lifting up her hands, 'will this ſweet lady's ſufferings be at an 'end?—O couſin Lovelace!'

And thus am I blamed for every-one's faults!—When her brutal father curſes her, it is I. I upbraid her with her ſevere mother. The implacableneſs of her ſtupid uncles is all mine. The virulence of her brother, and the ſpite and envy of her ſiſter, are entirely owing to me. The letter of this raſcal Brand is of my writing—O Jack, what a wretch is thy Lovelace!

RETURNED without a letter!—This damn'd fellow Will is returned without a letter!—Yet the raſcal tells me that he hears you have been writing to me theſe two days!

Plague confound thee, who knoweſt my impatience, and the reaſon for it! To ſend a man and horſe on purpoſe; as I did! My imagination chained to the belly of the beaſt, in order to keep pace with him!—Now he is got to this place; now to that; now to London; now to thee!

Now [a letter given him] whip and ſpur upon the return. This town juſt entered, not ſtaying to bait: that village paſſed by: leaves the wind behind him: in a foaming ſweat man and horſe.

And in this way did he actually enter Lord M's court-yard.

The reverberating pavement brought me down—The letter, Will! The let-'ter, dog!—The letter, ſirrah!'

'No letter, Sir!'—Then wildly ſtaring round me, fiſts clenched, and grinning like a maniack, 'Confound thee 'for a dog, and him that ſent thee with-'out one!—This moment out of my 'ſight, or I'll ſcatter thy ſtupid brains 'through the air.' I ſnatched from his holſters a piſtol, while the raſcal threw himſelf from the foaming beaſt, and ran to avoid the fate which I wiſhed with all my ſoul thou hadſt been within the reach of me to have met with.

But to be as meek as a lamb to one who has me at his mercy, and can wring and torture my ſoul as he pleaſes, what canſt thou mean to ſend back my varlet without a letter?—I will ſend away by day-dawn another fellow upon another beaſt for what thou haſt written; and I charge thee, on thy allegiance, that thou diſpatch him not back empty-handed.

POSTSCRIPT.

Charlotte, in a whim of delicacy, is diſpleaſed that I ſend the incloſed letter to you—That her hand-writing, forſooth! ſhould go into the hands of a ſingle man!

There's encouragement for thee, Belford! This is a certain ſign that thou may'ſt have her if thou wilt. And yet, till ſhe had given me this unerring demonſtration of her glancing towards thee, I could not have thought it. Indeed I have often in pleaſantry told her that I would bring ſuch an affair to bear. But I never intended it; becauſe ſhe really is a dainty girl: And thou art ſuch a clumſy fellow in thy perſon, that I ſhould as ſoon have wiſhed her a rhinoceros for an huſband, as thee. But, poor little dears! they muſt ſtay till their times come! They won't have this man, and they won't have that man, from ſeventeen to twenty-five: but then, afraid as the ſaying is, that God has forgot them, and finding their bloom departing, they are glad of whom they can get, and verify the fable of the Parſon and the Pears.

LETTER LXXXIII.

MR. BRAND, TO JOHN HARLOWE, ESQ.

[INCLOSED IN THE PRECEDING.]

WORTHY SIR, MY VERY GOOD FRIEND AND PATRON.

I Arrived in town yeſterday, after a tolerably pleaſant journey, (conſidering the hot weather, and duſty roads.) I put up at the Bull and Gate in Holborn, and haſtened to Covent Garden. I ſoon found the houſe where the unhappy lady lodgeth. And, in the back-ſhop, had a good deal of diſcourſe with Mrs. Smith (her landlady) whom I found to be ſo highly preposſeſſed in her favour, that I ſaw it would not anſwer your deſires to take my informations altogether from her: and being obliged to attend my patron, who (to my ſorrow.

Miſerum eſt aliena vivere quadra.)

I find wanteth much waiting upon, and is another ſort of a man than he was at college; college: for, Sir, inter nos, honours change manners. For the aforesaid causes, I thought it would best answer all the ends of the commission with which you honoured me, to engage, in the desired scrutiny, the wife of a particular friend, who liveth almost over-against the house where she lodgeth, and who is a gentlewoman of character and sobriety, a mother of children, and one who knoweth the world well.

To her I applied myself therefore, and gave her a short history of the case, and desired she would very particularly enquire into the conduct of the unhappy young lady; her present way of life and subsistence; her visitors, her employments, and such like: for these, Sir, you know, are the things whereof you wished to be informed.

Accordingly, Sir, I waited upon the gentlewoman aforesaid, this day; and, to my very great trouble (because I know it will be to yours, and likewise to all your worthy family's) I must say, that I do find things look a little more darkly, than I hoped they would. For, alas! Sir, the gentlewoman's report turneth not out so favourable for Miss's reputation, as I wished, as you wished, and as every-one of her friends wished. But so it is throughout the world, that one false step generally brings on another; and peradventure, a worse, and a still worse; till the poor soul is quite entangled, and (without infinite mercy) lost for ever.

It seemeth, Sir, she is, notwithstanding, in a very ill state of health. In this, both gentlewomen (that is to say, Mrs. Smith her landlady, and my friend's wife) agree. Yet she goeth often out in a chair, to prayers (as it is said.) But my friend's wife told me, that nothing is more common in London, than that the frequenting of the church at morning prayers is made the pretence and cover for private assignations. What a sad thing is this! that what was designed for wholesome nourishment to the poor soul, should be turned into rank poison! But, as Mr. Daniel de Foe (an ingenious man, though a dissenter) observeth, (But indeed it is an old proverb; only I think he was the first that put it into verse)—

'God never had a house of prayer,
'But Satan had a chapel there.'

Yet, to do the lady justice, nobody cometh home with her: nor indeed can they, because she goeth forward and backward in a sedan, or chair, (as they call it.) But then there is a gentleman of no good character (an intimado of Mr. Lovelace) who is a constant visitor of her, and of the people of the house, whom he regaleth and treateth, and hath (of consequence) their high good words.

I have thereupon taken the trouble (for I love to be exact in any commission I undertake) to inquire particularly about this gentleman, as he is called: (albeit I hold no man so but by his actions: for, as Juvenal saith—

'—Nobilitas sola est, atque unica virtus.')

And this I did before I would sit down to write to you.

His name is Belford. He hath a paternal estate of upwards of one thousand pounds by the year; and is now in mourning for an uncle, who left him very considerably besides. He beareth a very profligate character as to women, (for I enquired particularly about that) and is Mr. Lovelace's more especial privado, with whom he holdeth a regular correspondence; and hath been often seen with Miss (tête-à-tête) at the window—In no bad way, indeed: but my friend's wife is of opinion, that all is not as it should be. And, indeed, it is mighty strange to me, if Miss be so notable a penitent, (as is represented) and if she have such an aversion to Mr. Lovelace, that she will admit his privado into her retirements, and see no other company.

I understand from Mrs. Smith, that Mr. Hickman was to see her some time ago, from Miss Howe; and I am told by another hand, (You see, Sir, how diligent I have been to execute the commissions you gave me) that he had no extraordinary opinion of this Belford, at first; though they were seen together one morning by the opposite neighbour, at breakfast: and another time this Belford was observed to watch Mr. Hickman's coming from her; so that, as it should seem, he was mighty zealous to ingratiate himself with Mr. Hickman; no doubt, to engage him to make a favourable report to Miss Howe of the intimacy he was admitted into by her unhappy friend; who (as she is very ill) may mean no harm in allowing his visits: (for he, it seemeth, brought to her, or recommended at least, the doctor and apothecary that attend her) but I think (upon the whole) it looketh not well.

I am sorry, Sir, I cannot give you a better account of the young lady's prudence. But what shall we say?—

'Uvaque conspecta livorem ducit ab uvâ,' as Juvenal observeth.

One

One thing I am afraid of; which is, that Miſs may be under neceſſities; and that this Belford (who, as Mrs. Smith owns, hath offered her money, which ſhe, at the time, refuſed) may find an opportunity to take advantage of thoſe neceſſities: and it is well obſerved by that poet, that—

'Ægrè formoſam poteris ſervare puellam:
'Nunc prece, nunc pretio, forma petita ruit.'

And this Belford (who is a bold man, and hath, as they ſay, the look of one) may make good that of Horace; (with whoſe writings you are ſo well acquainted; nobody better)—

'Audax omnia perpeti,
'Gens humana ruit per vetitum nefas.'

Forgive me, Sir, for what I am going to write! But if you could prevail upon the reſt of your family to join in the ſcheme which you, and her virtuous ſiſter Miſs Arabella, and the archdeacon, and I, once talked of, (which is to perſuade the unhappy young lady to go, in ſome creditable manner, to ſome one of the foreign colonies) it might ſave not only her own credit and reputation, but the reputation and credit of all her family, and a great deal of vexation moreover. For it is my humble opinion, that you will hardly (any of you) enjoy yourſelves while this (once innocent) young lady is in the way of being ſo frequently heard of by you: and this would put her out of the way both of this Belford and of that Lovelace, and it might, peradventure, prevent as much evil as ſcandal.

You will forgive me, Sir, for this my plainneſs. Ovid pleadeth for me—

'Adulator nullus amicus erit.'

And I have no view but that of approving myſelf a zealous well-wiſher to all your worthy family, (whereto I owe a great number of obligations) and very particularly, Sir, your obliged and humble ſervant,

ELIAS BRAND.

WEDN. AUG. 9.

P. S. I ſhall give you further hints when I come down; (which will be in a few days) and who my informants were; but by theſe you will ſee, that I have been very aſſiduous (for the time) in the taſk you ſet me upon.

The length of my letter you will excuſe; for I need not tell you, Sir, what narrative, complex, and converſation letters, (ſuch a one as mine) require. Every one to his talent. Letter-writing is mine, I will be bold to ſay; and that my correſpondence was much coveted at the univerſity, on that account, by Tyros, and even by Sophs, when I was hardly a Soph myſelf. But this I ſhould not have taken upon me to mention, but only in defence of the length of my letter; for nobody writeth ſhorter, or pithier, when the ſubject requireth common forms only—Put in apologizing for my prolixity, I am adding to the fault: (if it were one, which, however, I cannot think it to be, the ſubject conſidered: but this I have ſaid before in other words) ſo, Sir, if you will excuſe my poſtſcript, I am ſure you will not find fault with my letter.

One word more, as to a matter of erudition, which you greatly love to hear me ſtart, and dwell upon. Dr. Lewen once, in your preſence, (as you, my good patron, cannot but remember) in a ſmartiſh kind of debate between him and me, took upon him to cenſure the parenthetical ſtyle, as I call it. He was a very learned and judicious man, to be ſure, and an ornament to our function: but yet I muſt needs ſay, that it is a ſtyle which I greatly like; and the good doctor was then paſt his youth, and that time of life, of conſequence, when a fertile imagination, and rich fancy, pour in ideas ſo faſt upon a writer, that parentheſes are often wanted (and that for the ſake of brevity, as well as perſpicuity) to ſave the reader the trouble of reading a paſſage more than once. Every man to his talent (as I ſaid before.) We are all ſo apt to ſet up our natural biaſſes for general ſtandards, that I wondered the leſs at the worthy doctor's ſtiffneſs on this occaſion. He ſmiled at me, you may remember, Sir—And, whether I was right or not, I am ſure I ſmiled at him. And you, my worthy patron, (as I had the ſatisfaction to obſerve) ſeemed to be of my party. But was it not ſtrange, that the old gentleman and I ſhould ſo widely differ, when the end with both (that is to ſay, preſpicuity or clearneſs) was the ſame?—But what ſhall we ſay?—

'Errare eſt hominis, ſ d non perſiſtere.'

I think I have nothing to add, until I have the honour of attending you in perſon; but that I am (as above) &c. &c. &c.

LETTER LXXXIV.

MR. BELFORD, TO ROBERT LOVELACE, ESQ.

WEDNESDAY NIGHT, AUG. 30.

IT was lucky enough that our two ſervants met at Hannah's, which gave them ſo good an opportunity of exchanging their letters time enough for each to return to his maſter early in the day.

Thou doſt well to boaſt of thy capacity for managing ſervants, and to ſet up for correcting our poets in their characters of this claſs of people, when, like a madman, thou canſt beat their teeth out, and attempt to ſhoot them through the head, for not bringing to thee what they had no power to obtain.

You well obſerve, that you would have made a thorough-paced lawyer. The whole of the converſation-piece between you and the colonel, affords a convincing proof, that there is a black and a white ſide to every cauſe: but what muſt the conſcience of a partial whitener of his own cauſe, or blackener of another's, tell him, while he is throwing duſt in the eyes of his judges, and all the time knows his own guilt?

The colonel, I ſee, is far from being a faultleſs man: but while he ſought not to carry his point by breach of faith, he has an excuſe which thou haſt not. But with reſpect to him, and to us all, I can now, with deteſtation of ſome of my own actions, ſee, that the taking advantage of another perſon's good opinion of us, to injure (perhaps to ruin) that other, is the moſt ungenerous wickedneſs that can be committed.

Man acting thus by man, we ſhould not be at a loſs to give ſuch actions a name: but is it not doubly and trebly aggravated, when ſuch advantage is taken of an unexperienced and innocent young creature, whom we pretend to love above all the women in the world; and when we ſeal our pretence by the moſt ſolemn vows and proteſtations of inviolable honour, that we can invent.

I ſee that this gentleman is the beſt match thou ever couldſt have had, upon all accounts: his ſpirit ſuch another impetuous one as thy own; ſoon taking fire; vindictive; and only differing in this, that the cauſe he engages in is a juſt one. But, commend me to honeſt brutal Mowbray, who, before he knew the cauſe, offers his ſword in thy behalf againſt a man who had taken the injured ſide, and whom he had never ſeen before.

As ſoon as I had run through your letters, and the copy of that of the incendiary Brand's, (by the latter of which I ſaw to what cauſe a great deal of this laſt implacableneſs of the Harlowe family is owing) I took coach to Smith's, although I had been come from thence but about an hour, and had taken leave of the lady for the night.

I ſent down for Mrs. Lovick, and deſired her, in the firſt place, to acquaint the lady, (who was buſied in her cloſet) that I had letters from Berks: in which I was informed, that the interview between Colonel Morden and Mr. Lovelace had ended without ill conſequences; that the colonel intended to write to her very ſoon, and was intereſting himſelf mean while in her favour, with her relations; that I hoped, that this agreeable news would be the means of giving her good reſt; and I would wait upon her in the morning, by the time ſhe ſhould return from prayers, with all the particulars.

She ſent me word, that ſhe ſhould be glad to ſee me in the morning; and was highly obliged to me for the good news I had ſent her up.

I then, in the back-ſhop, read to Mrs. Lovick and to Mrs. Smith, the copy of Brand's letter, and aſked them, If they could gueſs at the man's informant?—They were not at a loſs; Mrs. Smith having ſeen the ſame fellow Brand who had talked with her, as I mentioned in a former, come out of a milliner's ſhop over-againſt them; which milliner, ſhe ſaid, had alſo lately been very inquiſitive about the lady.

I wanted no further hint; but, bidding them take no notice to the lady of what I had read, I ſhot over the way, and aſking for the miſtreſs of the houſe, ſhe came to me.

Retiring with her, at her invitation, into her parlour, I deſired to know, if ſhe were acquainted with a young country clergyman of the name of Brand. She heſitatingly, ſeeing me in ſome emotion, owned, that ſhe had ſome ſmall knowledge of the gentleman. Juſt then came in her huſband, who is, it ſeems, a petty officer in the exciſe, (and not an ill-behaved man) who owned a fuller knowledge of him.

'I have the copy of a letter,' ſaid I, 'from this Brand, in which he has taken 'greater liberties with my character, 'and with that of the moſt unblameable 'lady in the world, which he grounds 'upon informations that you, Madam, 'have given him.' And then I read to them ſeveral paſſages in his letter; and aſked, What foundation ſhe had for giving that fellow ſuch impreſſions of either of us?

They knew not what to anſwer: but at laſt ſaid, that he had told them how wickedly the young lady had run away from her parents: what worthy and rich people they were: in what favour he ſtood with them; and that they had employed him to enquire after her behaviour, viſitors, &c.

They ſaid, That indeed they knew very little of the young lady; but that [Curſe upon their cenſoriouſneſs!] it was but too natural to think, that where a lady had given way to a deluſion, and taken ſo wrong a ſtep, ſhe would not ſtop there: that the moſt ſacred places and things were but too often made cloaks for bad actions: that Mr. Brand had been informed (perhaps by ſome enemy of mine) that I was a man of very free principles, and an intimado, as he calls it, of the man who had ruined her. And that their couſin Barker, a mantua-maker, who lodged up one-pair of ſtairs, (and who, at their deſire, came down and confirmed what they ſaid) had often, from her window, ſeen me with the lady, in her chamber, and both talking very earneſtly together: and that Mr. Brand being unable to account for her admitting my viſits, and knowing I was but a new acquaintance of hers, and an old one of Mr. Lovelace, thought himſelf obliged to lay theſe matters before her friends.

This was the ſum and ſubſtance of their tale.—O how I curſed the cenſoriouſneſs of this plaguy triumvirate! A parſon, a milliner, and a mantua-maker! The two latter, not more by buſineſs led to adorn the perſons, than generally by ſcandal to deſtroy the reputations, of thoſe they have a mind to exerciſe their talents upon!

The two women took great pains to perſuade me, that they themſelves were people of conſcience:—Of conſequence, I told them, too much addicted, I feared, to cenſure other people who pretended not to their ſtrictneſs; for that I had ever found cenſoriouſneſs, narrowneſs, and uncharitableneſs, to prevail too much with thoſe who affected to be thought more pious than their neighbours.

They anſwered, That that was not their caſe; and that they had ſince enquired into the lady's character and manner of life, and were very much concerned to think any-thing they had ſaid ſhould be made uſe of againſt her: and as they heard from Mrs. Smith, that ſhe was not likely to live long, they ſhould be ſorry ſhe ſhould go out of the world a ſufferer by their means, or with an ill opinion of them, though ſtrangers to her. The huſband offered to write, if I pleaſed, to Mr. Brand, in vindication of the lady; and the two women ſaid, they ſhould be glad to wait upon her in perſon, to beg her pardon for any-thing ſhe had reaſon to take amiſs from them; becauſe they were now convinced that there was not ſuch another young lady in the world.

I told them, That the leaſt ſaid of the affair to the lady, in her preſent circumſtances, was beſt. That ſhe was an heavenly creature, and fond of taking all occaſions to find excuſes for her relations on their implacableneſs to her: that therefore I ſhould take ſome notice to her of the uncharitable and weak ſurmiſes which gave birth to ſo vile a ſcandal: but that I would have him, Mr. Walton; (for that is the huſband's name) write to his acquaintance Brand as ſoon as poſſible, as he had offered—And ſo I left them.

As to what thou ſayeſt of thy charming couſin, let me know, if thou haſt any meaning in it. I have not the vanity to think myſelf deſerving of ſuch a lady as Miſs Montague: and ſhould not therefore care to expoſe myſelf to her ſcorn, and to thy deriſion. But were I aſſured I might avoid both theſe, I would ſoon acquaint thee, that I ſhould think no pains nor aſſiduity too much, to obtain a ſhare in the good graces of ſuch a lady.

But I know thee too well to depend upon any-thing thou ſayeſt on this ſubject. Thou loveſt to make thy friends the objects of ridicule to ladies; and imagineſt, from the vanity (and in this reſpect, I will ſay littleneſs) of thine own heart, that thou ſhineſt the brighter for the foil.

Thus didſt thou once play off the rough Mowbray with Miſs Hatton, till the poor fellow knew not how to go either backward or forward.

LETTER LXXXV.

MR. BELFORD, TO ROBERT LOVELACE, ESQ.

THURSDAY, 11 O'CLOCK, AUG. 31.

I Am juſt come from the lady, whom I left cheerful and ſerene.

She thanked me for my communication of the preceeding night. I read to her ſuch parts of your letters as I could read to her; and I thought it was a good teſt to diſtinguiſh the froth and whipt-ſyllabub in them from the cream in what one could and could not read to a woman of ſo fine a mind; ſince four parts out of ſix of thy letters, which I thought entertaining as I read them to myſelf, appeared to me, when I ſhould have read them to her, moſt abominable ſtuff, and gave me a very contemptible idea of thy talents, and of my own judgment.

She was far from rejoicing, as I had done, at the diſappointment her letter gave you when explained.

She ſaid, She meant only an innocent allegory, which might carry inſtruction and warning to you, when the meaning was taken, as well as anſwer her own hopes for the time. It was run off in a hurry. She was afraid, it was not quite right in her. But hoped the end would excuſe (if it could not juſtify) the means. And then ſhe again expreſſed a good deal of apprehenſion, leſt you ſhould ſtill take it into your head to moleſt her, when her time, ſhe ſaid, was ſo ſhort, that ſhe wanted every moment of it; repeating what ſhe had ſaid once before, that when ſhe wrote, ſhe was ſo ill, that ſhe believed ſhe ſhould not have lived till now. If ſhe had thought ſhe ſhould, ſhe muſt have ſtudied for an expedient that would have better anſwered her intentions. Hinting at a removal out of the knowledge of us both.

But ſhe was much pleaſed that the conference between you and Colonel Morden, after two or three ſuch violent ſallies, as I acquainted her you had between you, ended ſo amicably; and ſaid ſhe muſt abſolutely depend upon the promiſe I had given her to uſe my utmoſt endeavours to prevent further miſchief on her account.

She was pleaſed with the juſtice you did her character to her couſin

She was glad to hear, that he had ſo kind an opinion of her, and that he would write to her.

I was under an unneceſſary concern, how to break to her, that I had the copy of Brand's vile letter: unneceſſary, I ſay; for ſhe took it juſt as you thought ſhe would, as an excuſe ſhe wiſhed to have for the implacableneſs of her friends; and begged I would let her read it herſelf; 'For,' ſaid ſhe, 'the 'contents cannot diſturb me, be they 'what they will.'

I gave it to her, and ſhe read it to herſelf; a tear now-and-then being ready to ſtart, and a ſigh ſometimes interpoſing.

She gave me back the letter with great and ſurpriſing calmneſs, conſidering the ſubject.

'There was a time,' ſaid ſhe, 'and 'that not long ſince, when ſuch a letter 'as this would have greatly pained me. 'But I hope I have now got above all 'theſe things: and I can refer to your 'kind offices, and to thoſe of Miſs Howe, 'the juſtice that will be done to my me-'mory among my friends. There is a 'good and a bad light in which every-'thing that befals us may be taken. If 'the human mind will buſy itſelf to 'make the worſt of every diſagreeable 'occurrence, it will never want woe. 'This letter, affecting as the ſubject of 'it is to my reputation, gives me more 'pleaſure than pain, becauſe I can ga-'ther from it, that had not my friends 'been prepoſſeſſed by miſinformed or 'raſh and officious perſons, who are al-'ways at hand to flatter or ſoothe the 'paſſions of the affluent, they could not 'have been ſo immoveably determined 'againſt me. But now they are ſuffi-'ciently cleared from every imputation 'of unforgivingneſs; for, while I ap-'peared to them in the character of a 'vile hypocrite, pretending to true pe-'nitence, yet giving up myſelf to pro-'fligate courſes, how could I expect 'either their pardon or bleſſing?'

'But, Madam,' ſaid I, 'you'll ſee 'by the date of this letter, Auguſt 9, that 'their ſeverity, previous to that, cannot 'be excuſed by it.'

'It imports me much,' replied ſhe, 'on account of my preſent wiſhes, as 'to the office you are ſo kind to under-'take, that you ſhould not think harſh-'ly of my friends. I muſt own to you, 'that I have been apt ſometimes myſelf 'to think them not only ſevere, but 'cruel. Suffering minds will be par-'tial to their own cauſe and merits. 'Knowing their own hearts, if ſincere, 'they are apt to murmur when harſhly 'treated: but if they are not believed 'to be innocent, by perſons who have 'a right to decide upon their conduct 'according to their own judgments, 'how can it be helped? Beſides, Sir, 'how do you know, that there are not 'about my friends as well-meaning miſ-'repreſenters as Mr. Brand really ſeems 'to be? But be this as it will, there is 'no doubt that there are and have been 'multitudes of perſons, as innocent as 'myſelf, who have ſuffered upon ſur-'miſes as little probable as thoſe on

'which Mr. Brand founds his judgment.—Your intimacy, Sir, with Mr. Lovelace, and (may I say?) a character which, it seems, you have been less solicitous formerly to justify, than perhaps you will be for the future, and your frequent visits to me, may well be thought to be questionable circumstances in my conduct.'

I could only admire her in silence.

'But you see, Sir,' proceeded she, 'how necessary it is for young people of our sex to be careful of our company. And how much, at the same time, it behoves young persons of yours, to be chary of their own reputation, were it only for the sake of such of ours, as they may mean honourably by; and who otherwise may suffer in their good names for being seen in their company.

'As to Mr. Brand,' continued she, 'he is to be pitied; and let me enjoin you, Mr. Belford, not to take up any resentments against him, which may be detrimental either to his person or his fortunes. Let his function and his good meaning plead for him. He will have concern enough, when he finds every-body, whose displeasure I now labour under, acquitting my memory of perverse guilt, and joining in a general pity for me.'

This, Lovelace, is the woman whose life thou hast curtailed in the blossom of it!—How many opportunities must thou have had of admiring her inestimable worth, yet couldst have thy senses so much absorbed in the WOMAN in her charming person, as to be blind to the ANGEL that shines out in such full glory in her mind!—Indeed, I have ever thought myself, when blest with her conversation, in the company of a real angel: and I am sure it would be impossible for me, were she to be as beautiful, and as crimsoned over with health, as I have seen her, to have the least thought of sex, when I heard her talk.

THURSDAY, THREE O'CLOCK, AUG. 31.

ON my re-visit to the lady, I found her almost as much a sufferer from joy, as she had sometimes been from grief: for she had just received a very kind letter from her cousin Morden; which she was so good as to communicate to me. As she had already begun to answer it, I begged leave to attend her in the evening, that I might not interrupt her in it.

The letter is a very tender one * Here Mr. Belford gives the substance of it upon his memory; but this is omitted; as the letter is given at length, [See the next letter.] And then adds:

But, alas! all will be now too late. For the decree is certainly gone out—The world is unworthy of her.

LETTER LXXXVI.

COLONEL MORDEN, TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

TUESDAY, AUG. 29.

I Should not, my dearest cousin, have been a fortnight in England, without either doing myself the honour of waiting upon you in person, or of writing to you; if I had not been busying myself almost all the time in your service, in hopes of making my visit or letter still more acceptable to you—acceptable as I have reason to presume either will be, from the unquestionable love I ever bore you, and from the esteem you always honoured me with.

Little did I think, that so many days would have been required to effect my well-intended purpose, where there used to be a love so ardent on one side, and where there still is, as I am thoroughly convinced, the most exalted merit on the other!

I was yesterday with Mr. Lovelace and Lord M. I need not tell you, it seems, how very desirous the whole family and all the relations of that nobleman are of the honour of an alliance with you; nor how exceedingly earnest the ungrateful man is to make you all the reparation in his power.

I think, my dear cousin, that you cannot now do better than to give him the honour of your hand. He says such just and great things of your virtue, and so heartily condemns himself, that I think there is honourable room for you to forgive him: and the more room, as it seems you are determined against a legal prosecution.

Your effectual forgiveness of Mr. Lovelace, it is evident to me, will accelerate a general reconciliation: for, at present, my other cousins cannot persuade themselves, that he is in earnest to do you justice; or that you would refuse him, if you believed he was.

But, my dear cousin, there may possibly be something in this affair, to which I may be a stranger. If there be, and you will acquaint me with it, all that a naturally warm heart can do in your behalf shall be done.

I hope

I hope I ſhall be able, in my next viſits to my ſeveral couſins, to ſet all right with them. Haughty ſpirits, when convinced they have carried reſentments too high, want but a good excuſe to condeſcend: and parents muſt always love the child they once loved.

But if I find them inflexible, I will ſet out, and attend you without delay; for I long to ſee you after ſo many years abſence.

Meanwhile, I beg the favour of a few lines to know if you have reaſon to doubt Mr. Lovelace's ſincerity. For my part, I can have none, if I am to judge from the converſation that paſſed between us yeſterday, in preſence of Lord M.

You will be pleaſed to direct for me at your uncle Antony's.

Permit me, my deareſt couſin, till I can procure a happy reconciliation between you and your father, and brother, and uncles, to ſupply the place to you of all thoſe near relations, as well as that of your affectionate kinſman, and humble ſervant,

WM. MORDEN.

LETTER LXXXVII.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO WILLIAM MORDEN, ESQ.

THURSDAY, AUG. 21.

I Moſt heartily congratulate you, dear Sir, on your return to your native country.

I heard with much pleaſure that you were come; but I was both afraid and aſhamed, till you encouraged me by a firſt notice, to addreſs myſelf to you.

How conſoling it is to my wounded heart to find, that you have not been carried away by that tide of reſentment and diſpleaſure with which I have been ſo unhappily overwhelmed—But that, while my ſtill nearer relations have not thought fit to examine into the truth of vile reports raiſed againſt me, you have informed yourſelf of my innocence, and generouſly credited the information!

I have not the leaſt reaſon to doubt Mr. Lovelace's ſincerity in his offers of marriage: nor that all his relations are heartily deſirous of ranking me among them. I have had noble inſtances of their eſteem for me, on their apprehending that my father's diſpleaſure muſt have ſubjected me to difficulties: and this, after I had abſolutely refuſed their preſſing ſolicitations in their kinſman's favour, as well as his own.

Nor think me, my dear couſin, blameable for refuſing him. I had given Mr. Lovelace no reaſon to think me a weak creature. If I had, a man of his character might have thought himſelf warranted to endeavour to take ungenerous advantage of the weakneſs he had been able to inſpire. The conſciouſneſs of my own weakneſs (in that caſe) might have brought me to a compoſition with his wickedneſs.

I can indeed forgive him. But that is, becauſe I think his crimes have ſet me above him. Can I be above the man, Sir, to whom I ſhall give my hand and my vows; and with them a ſanction to the moſt premeditated baſeneſs? No, Sir! Let me ſay, that your couſin Clariſſa, were ſhe likely to live many years, and that (if ſhe married not this man) in penury or want, deſpiſed and forſaken by all her friends, puts not ſo high a value upon the conveniences of life, nor upon life itſelf, as to ſeek to re-obtain the one, or to preſerve the other, by giving ſuch a ſanction: a ſanction, which (were ſhe to perform her duty) would reward the violator.

Nor is it ſo much from pride as from principle, that I ſay this. What, Sir! when virtue, when chaſtity, is the crown of a woman, and particularly of a wife, ſhall your couſin ſtoop to marry the man who could not form an attempt upon hers, but upon a preſumption, that ſhe was capable of receiving his offered hand, when he had found himſelf miſtaken in the vile opinion he had conceived of her? Hitherto he has not had reaſon to think me weak. Nor will I give an inſtance ſo flagrant, that weak I am, in a point in which it would be criminal to be found weak.

One day, Sir, you will perhaps know all my ſtory. But, whenever it is known, I beg that the author of my calamities may not be vindictively ſought after. He could not have been the author of them, but for a ſtrange concurrence of unhappy cauſes. As the law will not be able to reach him when I am gone, the apprehenſion of any other ſort of vengeance terrifies me: ſince, in ſuch a caſe, ſhould my friends be ſafe, what honour would his death bring to my memory?—If any of them ſhould come to misfortune, how would my fault be aggravated!

God long preſerve you, my deareſt couſin, and bleſs you but in proportion to the conſolation you have given me, in letting me know that you ſtill love me; and that I have one near and dear relation who can pity and forgive me, (and then will you be greatly bleſſed—) is the prayer of your ever grateful and affectionate

CLARISSA HARLOWE.

LETTER LXXXVIII.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

[IN ANSWER TO HIS LETTERS LXV. LXXIX.]

THURSDAY, AUG. 31.

I Cannot but own, that I am cut to the heart by this Miſs Harlowe's interpretation of her letter. She ought never to be forgiven. She, a meek perſon, and a penitent, and innocent, and pious, and I know not what, who can deceive with a foot in the grave!

'Tis evident, that ſhe ſat down to write this letter with a deſign to miſlead and deceive. And if ſhe be capable of that, at ſuch a criſis, ſhe has as much need of Heaven's forgiveneſs, as I have of hers: and, with all her cant of charity and charity, if ſhe be not more ſure of it than I am of her real pardon, and if ſhe take the thing in the light ſhe ought to take it in, ſhe will have a few darker moments yet to come than ſhe ſeems to expect.

Lord M. himſelf, who is not one of thoſe (to ſpeak in his own phraſe) who can penetrate a mill-ſtone, ſees the deceit, and thinks it unworthy of her; though my couſins Montague vindicate her. And no wonder: this curſed partial ſex [I hate 'em all—by my ſoul, I hate 'em all!] will never allow any thing againſt an individual of it, where ours is concerned. And why, becauſe, if they cenſure deceit in another, they muſt condemn their own hearts.

She is to ſend me a letter after ſhe is in Heaven, is ſhe? The devil take ſuch allegories; and the devil take thee for calling this abſurdity an innocent artifice!

I inſiſt upon it, that if a woman of her character, at ſuch a critical time, is to be juſtified in ſuch a deception, a man in full health and vigour of body and mind, as I am, may be excuſed for all his ſtratagems and attempts againſt her. And, thank my ſtars, I can now ſit me down with a quiet conſcience on that ſcore. By my ſoul, I can, Jack. Nor has any-body, who can acquit her, a right to blame me. But with ſome, indeed, every-thing ſhe does muſt be good, every-thing I do muſt be bad—And why? Becauſe ſhe has always taken care to coax the ſtupid mis-judging world, like a woman: while I have conſtantly defied and deſpiſed it's cenſures, like a man.

But, notwithſtanding all, you may let her know from me, that I will not moleſt her, ſince my viſits would be ſo ſhocking to her: and I hope ſhe will take this into her conſideration as a piece of generoſity, which ſhe could hardly expect after the deception ſhe has put upon me. And let her further know, that if there be any-thing in my power that will contribute either to her eaſe or honour, I will obey her, at the very firſt intimation, however diſgraceful or detrimental to myſelf. All this, to make her unapprehenſive, and that ſhe may have nothing to pull her back.

If her curſed relations could be brought as cheerfully to perform their parts, I'd anſwer life for life for her recovery.

But who, that has ſo many ludicrous images raiſed in his mind by thy awkward penitence, can forbear laughing at thee? Spare, I beſeech thee, dear Belford, for the future, all thine own aſpirations, if thou wouldſt not diſhonour thoſe of an angel indeed.

When I came to that paſſage where thou ſayeſt, that thou conſidereſt her as one ſent from Heaven to draw thee after her—for the heart of me, I could not for an hour put thee out of my head, in the attitude of Dame Elizabeth Carteret, on her monument in Weſtminſter Abbey. If thou never obſerveđſt it, go thither on purpoſe; and there wilt thou ſee this dame in effigie, with uplifted head and hand, the latter taken hold of by a Cupid every inch of ſtone, one clumſy foot lifted up alſo, aiming, as the ſculptor deſigned it, to aſcend, but ſo executed, as would rather make one imagine, that the figure (without ſhoe or ſtocking, as it is, though the reſt of the body is robed) was looking up to it's corn-cutter: the other rivetted to it's native earth, bemired, like thee, (immerſed thou calleſt it) beyond the poſſibility of unſticking itſelf. Both figures, thou wilt find, ſeem to be in a contention, the bigger, whether it ſhould pull down the leſſer about it's ears—the leſſer, (a chubby fat little varlet, of a fourth part of the other's bigneſs, with wings not much larger than thoſe of a butterfly) whether it ſhould raiſe the larger to a Heaven it points to, hardly big enough to contain the great toes of either.

Thou wilt ſay, perhaps, that the dame's figure in ſtone may do credit, in in the compariſon, to thine, both in grain and ſhape, wooden as thou art all over: but that the lady, who, in everything but in the trick ſhe has played me ſo lately, is truly an angel, is but ſorrily repreſented by the fat-flanked Cupid. This I allow thee. But yet there is enough in thy aſpirations, to ſtrike my mind with a reſemblance of thee and the lady to the figures on the wretched monument; for thou oughteſt to remember, that, prepared as ſhe may be to mount to her natives ſkies, it is impoſſible for her to draw after her a heavy fellow who has ſo much to repent of as thou haſt.

But now, to be ſerious once more, let me tell you, Belford, that if the lady be really ſo ill as you write ſhe is, it will become you, [No Roman ſtyle here!] in a caſe ſo very affecting, to be a little leſs pointed and ſarcaſtick in your reflections. For, upon my ſoul, the matter begins to grate me moſt confoundedly.

I am now ſo impatient to hear oftener of her, that I take the hint accidentally given me by our two fellows meeting at Slough, and reſolve to go to our friend Doleman's at Uxbridge; whoſe wife and ſiſter, as well as he, have ſo frequently preſſed me to give them my company for a week or two. There ſhall I be within two hours ride, if anything ſhould happen to induce her to ſee me: for it will well become her piety, and avowed charity, ſhould the worſt happen, [The Lord of Heaven and earth, however, avert that worſt!] to give me that pardon from her lips, which ſhe has not denied me by pen and ink. And as ſhe wiſhes my reformation, ſhe knows not what good effects ſuch an interview may have upon me.

I ſhall accordingly be at Doleman's to-morrow morning, by eleven at furtheſt: My fellow will find me there at his return from you, (with a letter, I hope.) I ſhall have Joel with me likewiſe, that I may ſend the oftener, as matters fall out. Were I to be ſtill nearer, or in town, it would be impoſſible to with-hold myſelf from ſeeing her.

But, if the worſt happen!—as, by your continual knelling, I know not what to think of it!—[Yet, once more, Heaven avert that worſt!—How natural is it to pray, when one cannot help one's ſelf!]—THEN ſay not, in ſo many dreadful words, what the event is—Only, that you adviſe me to take a trip to Paris—And that will ſtab me to the heart.

I ſo well approve of your generoſity to poor Belton's ſiſter, that I have made Mowbray give up his legacy, as I do mine, towards her India bonds. When I come to town, Tourville ſhall do the like; and we will buy each a ring, to wear in memory of the honeſt fellow, with our own money, that we may perform his will, as well as our own.

My fellow rides the reſt of the night. I charge you, Jack, if you would ſave his life, that you ſend him not back empty-handed.

LETTER LXXXIX.

MR. BELFORD, TO ROBERT LOVELACE, ESQ.

TUESDAY NIGHT. AUG. 28.

WHEN I concluded my laſt, I hoped, that my next attendance upon this ſurpriſing lady would furniſh me with ſome particulars as agreeable as now could be hoped for from the declining way ſhe is in, by reaſon of the welcome letter ſhe had received from her couſin Morden. But it proved quite otherwiſe to me, though not to herſelf; for I think I never was more ſhocked in my life than on the occaſion I ſhall mention preſently.

When I attended her about ſeven in the evening, ſhe told me, that ſhe found herſelf in a very petulant way, after I had left her. 'Strange,' ſaid ſhe, 'that the pleaſure I received from 'my couſin's letter ſhould have ſuch 'an effect upon me! But I could not 'help giving way to a comparative humour, as I may call it, and to think 'it very hard, that my nearer relations 'did not take the methods which my 'couſin Morden kindly took, by enquiring into my merit or demerit, 'and giving my cauſe a fair audit, before they proceeded to condemnation.'

She had hardly ſaid this, when ſhe ſtarted, and a bluſh overſpread her ſweet face, on hearing, as I alſo did, a ſort of lumbering noiſe upon the ſtairs, as if a large trunk were bringing up between two people; and, looking upon me with an eye of concern, 'Blunder-'ers!' ſaid ſhe, 'they have brought in 'ſomething two hours before the time.—'Don't be ſurprized, Sir—It is all to 'ſave you trouble.'

Before I could ſpeak, in came Mrs. Smith: 'O, Madam,' ſaid ſhe, 'what 'have you done?'—Mrs. Lovick, entering, made the ſame exclamation!—'Lord have mercy upon me, Madam,' cried I, 'what have you done!'—For, ſhe ſhe ſtepping at the inſtant to the door, the women told me, it was a coffin.—O, Lovelace! that thou hadſt been there at the moment!—Thou, the cauſer of all theſe ſhocking ſcenes! Surely thou couldſt not have been leſs affected than I, who have no guilt, as to her, to anſwer for.

With an intrepidity of a piece with the preparation, having directed them to carry it into her bed-chamber, ſhe returned to us: 'They were not to 'have brought it in till after dark,' ſaid ſhe—'Pray, excuſe me, Mr. Bel-'ford—and don't you, Mrs. Lovick, 'be concerned—nor you, Mrs. Smith. '—Why ſhould you? There is nothing 'more in it, than the unuſualneſs of 'the thing. Why may we not be as 'reaſonably ſhocked at going to the 'church where are the monuments of 'our anceſtors, with whoſe duſt we 'even hope our duſt ſhall be one day 'mingled, as to be moved at ſuch a ſight 'as this?'

We all remaining ſilent, the women having their aprons at their eyes, 'Why 'this concern for nothing at all?' ſaid ſhe: 'if I am to be blamed for any 'thing, it is for ſhewing too much ſo-'licitude, as it may be thought, for 'this earthly part. I love to do every-'thing for myſelf that I can do. I 'ever did. Every other material point 'is ſo far done, and taken care of, 'that I have had leiſure for things of 'leſſer moment. Minuteneſſes may be 'obſerved, where greater articles are 'not neglected for them. I might have 'had this to order, perhaps, when leſs 'fit to order it. I have no mother, no 'ſiſter, no Mrs. Norton, no Miſs Howe, 'near me. Some of you muſt have 'ſeen this in a few days, if not now; 'perhaps have had the friendly trouble 'of directing it. And what is the dif-'ference of a few days to you, when I am 'gratified, rather than diſcompoſed by 'it? I ſhall not die the ſooner for ſuch 'preparation. Should not every-body 'that has any-thing to bequeathe make 'their will? And who,' that makes a 'will, ſhould be afraid of a coffin?—'My dear friends.' [To the women] 'I have conſidered theſe things; do 'not, with ſuch an object before you 'as you have had in me for weeks, give 'me reaſon to think you have not.'

How reaſonable was all this!—It ſhewed, indeed, that ſhe herſelf had well conſidered it. But yet we could not help being ſhocked at the thoughts of the coffin thus brought in; the lovely perſon before our eyes, who is in all likelihood ſo ſoon to fill it.

We were all ſilent ſtill, the women in grief, I in a manner ſtunned. She would not aſk me, ſhe ſaid; but would be glad, ſince it had thus earlier than ſhe had intended been brought in, that her two good friends would walk in and look upon it. They would be leſs ſhocked, when it was made more familiar to their eye: 'Don't you lead 'back,' ſaid ſhe, 'a ſtarting ſteed to 'the object he is apt to ſtart at, in or-'der to familiarize him to it, and cure 'his ſtarting? The ſame reaſon will 'hold in this caſe.—Come, my good 'friends, I will lead you in.'

I took my leave; telling her ſhe had done wrong, very wrong; and ought not, by any means, to have ſuch an object before her.

The women followed her in.—'Tis a ſtrange ſex! Nothing is too ſhocking for them to look upon, or ſee acted, that has but novelty and curioſity in it.

Down I poſted; got a chair; and was carried home, extremely ſhocked and diſcompoſed: yet, weighing the lady's arguments, I know not why I was ſo affected—except, as ſhe ſaid, at the unuſualneſs of the thing.

While I waited for a chair, Mrs. Smith came down, and told me, that there were devices and inſcriptions upon the lid. Lord bleſs me! Is a coffin a proper ſubject to diſplay fancy upon?—But theſe great minds cannot avoid doing extraordinary things!

LETTER XC.

MR. BELFORD, TO ROBERT LOVELACE, ESQ.

FRIDAY MORN. SEPT. 2.

IT is ſurpriſing, that I, a man, ſhould be ſo much affected as I was, at ſuch an object as is the ſubject of my former letter; who, alſo, in my late uncle's caſe, and poor Belton's, had the like before me, and the directing of it: when ſhe, a woman, of ſo weak and tender a frame, who was to fill it, (ſo ſoon perhaps to fill it!) could give orders about it, and draw out the devices upon it, and explain them with ſo little concern, as the women tell me ſhe did to them laſt night after I was gone.

I really was ill, and reſtleſs all night. Thou wert the ſubject of my execration, as ſhe of my admiration, all the time I was quite awake: and, when I dozed, I dreamt of nothing but of flying hour-glaſſes, deaths-heads, ſpades, mattocks, mattocks, and eternity; the hint of her devices (as given me by Mrs. Smith) running in my head.

However, not being able to keep away from Smith's, I went thither about seven. The lady was just gone out: she had slept better, I found, than I, though her solemn repository was under her window not far from her bedside.

I was prevailed upon by Mrs. Smith and her nurse Shelburne, (Mrs. Lovick being abroad with her) to go up and look at the devices. Mrs. Lovick has since shewn me a copy of the draught by which all was ordered. And I will give thee a sketch of the symbols.

The principal device, neatly etched, on a plate of white metal, is a crowned serpent, with it's tail in it's mouth, forming a ring, the emblem of eternity: and in the circle made by it is this inscription:

'CLARISSA HARLOWE.
'APRIL X.
[Then the year]
'ÆTAT. XIX.'

For ornaments: at top, an Hour-glass winged. At bottom, an Urn.

Under the Hour-glass, on another plate, this inscription:

'HERE the wicked cease from troubling:
'and HERE the weary be at rest.' Job.
'iii. 17.

Over the urn, near the bottom:

'Turn again unto thy rest, O my soul!
'For the Lord hath rewarded thee: and
'why? Thou hast delivered my soul from 'death; mine eyes from tears; and my
'feet from falling.' Ps. cxvi. 7, 8.

Over this text is the head of a white Lily snapt short off, and just falling from the stalk; and this inscription over that, between the principal plate and the Lily:

'The days of man are but as grass. For
'he flourisheth as a flower of the field:
'for, as soon as the wind goeth over it,
'it is gone; and the place thereof shall
'know it no more.' Ps. ciii. 15, 16.

She excused herself to the women, on the score of her youth, and being used to draw for her needle-works, for having shewn more fancy than would perhaps be thought suitable on so solemn an occasion.

The date, April 10, she accounted for, as not being able to tell what her closing-day would be; and as that was the fatal day of her leaving her father's house.

She discharged the undertaker's bill after I went away, with as much cheerfulness as she could ever have paid for the cloaths she sold to purchase this her palace: for such she called it; reflecting upon herself for the expensiveness of it, saying, That they might observe in her, that pride left not poor mortals to the last: but indeed she did not know but her father would permit it, when furnished, to be carried down to be deposited with her ancestors; and, in that case, she ought not to discredit those ancestors in her appearance among them.

It is covered with fine black cloth, and lined with white sattin; soon, she said, to be tarnished by viler earth than any it could be covered by.

The burial-dress was brought home with it. The women had curiosity enough, I suppose, to see her open that, if she did open it.—And, perhaps, thou wouldest have been glad to have been present, to have admired it too!

Mrs. Lovick said, she took the liberty to blame her; and wished the removal of such an object—from her bed-chamber, at least: and was so affected with the noble answer she made upon it, that she entered it down the moment she left her.

'To persons in health,' said she, 'this 'sight may be shocking; and the prepa-'ration, and my unconcernedness in it, 'may appear affected: but to me, who 'have had so gradual a weaning-time 'from the world, and so much reason 'not to love it, I must say, I dwell on '—I indulge—(and, strictly speaking, I 'enjoy)—the thoughts of death. For, 'believe me,' [looking stedfastly at the awful receptacle;] 'believe what at 'this instant I feel to be most true, that 'there is such a vast superiority of 'weight and importance in the thought 'of death, and it's hoped-for happy 'consequences, that it in a manner an-'nihilates all other considerations and 'concerns. Believe me, my good friends, 'it does what nothing else can do: it 'teaches me, by strengthening in me the 'force of the divinest example, to for-'give the injuries I have received; and 'shuts out the remembrance of past 'evils from my soul.'

And now let me ask thee, Lovelace, Dost thou think, that, when the time shall come that thou shalt be obliged to launch into the boundless ocean of eternity, thou wilt be able (any more than than poor Belton) to act thy part with ſuch true heroiſm, as this ſweet and tender bloſſom of a woman has manifeſted, and continues to manifeſt!

O no! it cannot be!—And why can't it be?—The reaſon is evident: ſhe has no wilful errors to look back upon with ſelf-reproach—and her mind is ſtrengthened by the conſolations which flow from that religious rectitude which has been the guide of her actions; and which has taught her rather to chuſe to be a ſufferer, than an aggreſſor!

This was the ſupport of the divine Socrates, as thou haſt read. When led to execution, his wife lamenting that he ſhould ſuffer, being innocent, 'Thou 'fool,' ſaid he, 'wouldſt thou wiſh me 'to be guilty!'

LETTER XCI.

MR. BELFORD, TO ROBERT LOVELACE, ESQ.

FRIDAY, SEPT. 1.

HOW aſtoniſhing, in the midſt of ſuch affecting ſcenes, is thy mirth on what thou calleſt my own aſpirations!—Never, ſurely, was there ſuch another man in this world, thy talents and thy levity taken together!—Surely, what I ſhall ſend thee with this will affect thee. If not, nothing can, till thy own hour come:—And heavy will then thy reflections be!

I am glad, however, that thou enableſt me to aſſure the lady, that thou wilt no more moleſt her; that is to ſay, in other words, that, after having ruined her fortunes, and all her worldly proſpects, thou wilt be ſo gracious, as to let her lie down and die in peace.

Thy giving up to poor Belton's ſiſter the little legacy, and thy undertaking to make Mowbray and Tourville follow thy example, are, I muſt ſay, to thy honour, of a piece with thy generoſity to thy Roſebud and her Johnny; and to a number of other good actions, in pecuniary matters; although thy Roſebud's is, I believe, the only inſtance, where a pretty woman was concerned, of ſuch a diſintereſted bounty.

Upon my faith, Lovelace, I love to praiſe thee; and often and often, as thou knoweſt, have I ſtudied for occaſions to do it: inſomuch that when for the life of me I could not think of anything done by thee that deſerved praiſe, I have taken pains to applaud the not ungraceful manner in which thou haſt performed actions that merited the gallows.

Now thou art ſo near, I will diſpatch my ſervant to thee, if occaſion requires But, I fear, I ſhall ſoon give thee the news thou art apprehenſive of. For I am juſt now ſent for by Mrs. Smith; who has ordered the meſſenger to tell me, that ſhe knew not if the lady will be alive when I come.

FRIDAY, SEPT. 1. TWO O'CLOCK, AT SMITH'S.

I COULD not cloſe my letter in ſuch an uncertainty as muſt have added to your impatience. For you have, on ſeveral occaſions, convinced me, that the ſuſpence you love to give, would be the greateſt torment to you that you could receive. A common caſe with all aggreſſive and violent ſpirits, I believe. I will juſt mention then (your ſervant waiting here till I have written) that the lady has had two very ſevere fits: in the laſt of which, while ſhe lay, they ſent to the doctor and Mr. Goddard, who both adviſed, that a meſſenger ſhould be diſpatched for me, as her executor: being doubtful whether, if ſhe had a third, it would not carry her off.

She was tolerably recovered by the time I came; and the doctor made her promiſe before me, that, while ſhe was ſo weak, ſhe would not attempt any more to go abroad; for, by Mrs. Lovick's deſcription, who attended her, the ſhortneſs of her breath, her extreme weakneſs, and the fervour of her devotions when at church, were contraries, which, pulling different ways, (the ſoul aſpiring, the body ſinking) tore her tender frame in pieces.

So much for the preſent. I ſhall detain Will no longer, than juſt to beg, that you will ſend me back this packet, and the laſt.

A letter from Miſs Howe is juſt now brought by a particular meſſenger, who ſays he muſt carry back a few lines in return. But, as the lady is juſt retired to lie down, the man is to call again by-and-by.

LETTER XCII.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

UXBRIDGE, SEPT. 1. TWELVE O'CLOCK AT NIGHT.

I Send you the papers with this. Whatever thou doſt, don't let the wonderful creature leave us!—Set before her the ſin of her preparation, as if ſhe thought ſhe could depart when ſhe pleaſed. She'll perſuade herſelf, at this rate, that ſhe has nothing to do, when all is ready, but to lie down, and go to sleep: and such a lively fancy as hers will make a reality of a jest at any time.

A jest, I call all that has passed between her and me; a mere jest to die for—For has not her triumph over me, from first to last, been infinitely greater than her sufferings from me?

Would the sacred regard I have for her purity, even for her personal as well as intellectual purity, permit, I could prove this as clear as the sun. Tell, therefore, the dear creature, that she must not be wicked in her piety. There is a too much, as well as a too little, even in righteousness. Perhaps she does not think of that.—O that she would have permitted my attendance, as obligingly as she does thine!—The dear soul used to love humour. And, let me tell thee, a smile upon the lips, or a sparkling in the eye, must have had it's correspondent cheerfulness in a heart so sincere as hers.

Tell the doctor, I will make over all my possessions, and all my reversions, to him, if he will but prolong her life for one twelvemonth to come. But for one twelvemonth, Jack.—He will lose all his reputation with me, and I shall treat him as Belton did his doctor, if he cannot do this for me, on so young a subject. But nineteen, Belford!—Nineteen cannot so soon die of grief, if the doctor deserve that title; and so blooming and so fine a constitution as she had but three or four months ago!

But what need the doctor to ask her leave to write to her friends? Could he not have done it, without letting her know any-thing of the matter? That was one of the likeliest means that could be thought of, to bring some of them about her, since she is so desirous to see them. At least, it would have induced them to send up her favourite Norton. But these plaguy solemn fellows are great traders in parade. They'll cram down your throat their poisonous drugs by wholesale, without asking you a question; and have the assurance to own it to be prescribing: but, when they are to do good, they are to require your consent.

How the dear creature's character rises in every line of thy letters! But it is owing to the uncommon occasions she has met with that she blazes out upon us with such a meridian lustre. How, but for those occasions, could her noble sentiments, her prudent consideration, her forgiving spirit, her exalted benevolence, and her equanimity in view of the most shocking prospects, (which set her in a light so superior to all her sex, and even to the philosophers of antiquity) have been manifested?

I know thou wilt think I am going to claim some merit to myself, for having given her such opportunities of signalizing her virtues. But I am not; for, if I did, I must share that merit with her implacable relations, who would justly be entitled to two-thirds of it, at least: and my soul disdains a partnership in any-thing with such a family.

But this I mention as an answer to thy reproaches, that I could be so little edified by perfections, to which, thou supposest, I was for so long together daily and hourly a personal witness—When, admirable as she was in all she said, and in all she did, occasion had not at that time ripened, and called forth, those amazing perfections which now astonish and confound me.

Hence it is, that I admire her more than ever; and that my love for her is less personal, as I may say, and more intellectual, than ever I thought it could be to woman.

Hence also it is, that I am confident, (would it please the Fates to spare her, and make her mine) I could love her with a purity that would draw on my own FUTURE, as well as ensure her TEMPORAL happiness.—And hence, by necessary consequence, shall I be the most miserable of all men, if I am deprived of her.

Thou severely reflectest upon me for my levity: the abbey instance in thine eye, I suppose. And I will be ingenuous enough to own, that as thou seest not my heart, there may be passages, in every one of my letters, which (the melancholy occasion considered) deserve thy most pointed rebukes. But, faith, Jack, thou art such a tragi-comical mortal, with thy leaden aspirations at one time, and thy flying hour-glasses, and dreaming terrors, at another, that, as Prior says, 'What serious is, thou turnest 'to farce;' and it is impossible to keep within the bounds of decorum or gravity, when one reads what thou writest.

But to restrain myself, (for my constitutional gaiety was ready to run away with me again) I will repeat, I must ever repeat, that I am most egregiously affected with the circumstances of the case: and were this paragon actually to quit the world, should never enjoy myself one hour together, though I were to live to the age of Methuselah.

Indeed it is to this deep concern, that my my levity is owing: for I ſtruggle and ſtruggle, and try to buffet down my cruel reflections as they riſe; and when I cannot, I am forced, as I have often ſaid, to try to make myſelf laugh, that I may not cry; for one or other I muſt do: and is it not philoſophy carried to the higheſt pitch, for a man to conquer ſuch tumults of ſoul as I am ſometimes agitated by, and in the very height of the ſtorm, to be able to quaver out an horſe-laugh?

Your Seneca's, your Epictetus's, and the reſt of your Stoical tribe, with all their apathy-nonſenſe, could not come up to this. They could forbear wry faces: bodily pains they could well enough ſeem to ſupport; and that was all: but the pangs of their own ſmitten-down ſouls they could not laugh over, though they could at the follies of others. They read grave lectures; but they were grave. This high point of philoſophy, to laugh and be merry in the midſt of the moſt ſoul-harrowing woes, when the heart-ſtrings are juſt burſting aſunder, was reſerved for thy Lovelace.

There is ſomething owing to conſtitution, I own; and that this is the laughing-time of my life. For what a woe muſt that be, which for an hour together can mortify a man of ſix or ſeven-and-twenty, in high blood and ſpirits, of a naturally gay diſpoſition, who can ſing, dance, and ſcribble, and take and give delight to them all?—But then my grief, as my joy, is ſharper-pointed than moſt other mens; and, like what Dolly Welby once told me, deſcribing the parturient throes, if there were not lucid intervals, if they did not come and go, there would be no bearing them.

After all, as I am ſo little diſtant from the dear creature, and as ſhe is ſo very ill, I think I cannot excuſe myſelf from making her one viſit. Nevertheleſs, if I thought her ſo near—[What word ſhall I uſe, that my ſoul is not ſhocked at!]—and that ſhe would be too much diſcompoſed by a viſit; I would not think of it.—Yet how can I bear the recollection, that, when ſhe laſt went from me, (her innocence ſo triumphant over my premeditated guilt, as was enough to reconcile her to life, and to ſet her above the ſenſe of injuries ſo nobly ſuſtained, that) ſhe ſhould then depart with an incurable fracture in her heart; and that that ſhould be the laſt time I ſhould ever ſee her!—How, how, can I bear this reflection!

O Jack! how my conſcience, that gives edge even to thy blunt reflections, tears me!—Even this moment would I give the world to puſh the cruel reproacher from me by one ray of my uſual gaiety!—Sick of myſelf!—Sick of the remembrance of my vile plots; and of my light, my momentary extaſy. [Villainous burglar, felon, thief, that I was!] which has brought upon me ſuch durable and ſuch heavy remorſe! What would I give that I had not been guilty of ſuch barbarous and ungrateful perfidy to the moſt excellent of God's creatures!

I would end, methinks, with one ſprightlier line!—But it will not be.—Let me tell then, and rejoice at it if thou wilt, that I am inexpreſſibly miſerable!

LETTER XCIII.

MR. BELFORD, TO ROBERT LOVELACE, ESQ.

SAT. MORN. SEPT. 2.

I Have ſome little pleaſure given me by thine, juſt now brought me. I ſee now that thou haſt a little humanity left. Would to Heaven, for the dear lady's ſake, as well as for thy own, that thou hadſt rummaged it up from all the dark forgotten corners of thy ſoul a little ſooner!

The lady is alive, and ſerene, and calm, and has all her noble intellects clear and ſtrong: but nineteen will not however ſave her. She ſays, ſhe will now content herſelf with her cloſet duties, and the viſits of the pariſh-miniſter; and will not attempt to go out. Nor, indeed, will ſhe, I am afraid, ever walk up or down a pair of ſtairs again.

I am ſorry at my ſoul to have this to ſay: but it would be a folly to flatter thee.

As to thy ſeeing her, I believe the leaſt hint of that ſort, now, would cut off ſome hours of her life.

What has contributed to her ſerenity, it ſeems, is, that, taking the alarm her fits gave her, ſhe has entirely finiſhed, and ſigned and ſealed, her laſt will: which ſhe had deferred doing till this time, in hopes, as ſhe ſaid, of ſome good news from Harlowe Place; which would have induced her to alter ſome paſſages in it.

Miſs Howe's letter was not given her till four in the afternoon, yeſterday; at which time the meſſenger returned for an anſwer. She admitted him into her preſence in the dining-room, ill as ſhe then was, and ſhe would have written a few few lines, as desired by Miss Howe; but not being able to hold a pen, she bid the messenger tell her, that she hoped to be well enough to write a long letter by the next day's post, and would not now detain him.

SATURDAY, SIX IN THE AFTERNOON.

I CALLED just now, and found the lady writing to Miss Howe. She made me a melancholy compliment, that she shewed me not Miss Howe's letter, because I should soon have that and all her papers before me. But she told me, that Miss Howe had very considerately obviated to Colonel Morden several things which might have occasioned misapprehensions between him and me; and had likewise put a lighter construction, for the sake of peace, on some of your actions, than they deserved.

She added, that her cousin Morden was warmly engaged in her favour with her friends: and one good piece of news Miss Howe's letter contained; that her father would give up some matters which (appertaining to her of right) would make my executorship the easier in some particulars that had given her a little pain.

She owned she had been obliged to leave off (in the letter she was writing) through weakness.

Will says, he shall reach you to-night. I shall send in the morning; and if I find her not worse, will ride to Edgware, and return in the afternoon.

LETTER XCIV.

MISS HOWE, TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

TUESDAY, AUG. 29.

MY DEAREST FRIEND,

WE are at length returned to our own home. I had intended to wait on you in London; but my mother is very ill—Alas! my dear, she is very ill, indeed—And you are likewise very ill—I see that by yours of the 25th—What shall I do, if I lose two such near, and dear, and tender friends? She was taken ill yesterday at our last stage in our return home—And has a violent surfeit and fever, and the doctors are doubtful about her.

If she should die, how will all my pertnesses to her fly in my face!—Why, why, did I ever vex her? She says I have been all duty and obedience!—She kindly forgets all my faults, and remembers every-thing I have been so happy as to oblige her in. And this cuts me to the heart.

I see, I see, my dear, you are very bad—And I cannot bear it. Do, my beloved Miss Harlowe, if you can be better, do, for my sake, be better; and send me word of it. Let the bearer bring me a line. Be sure you send me a line. If I lose you, my more than sister, and lose my mother, I shall distrust my own conduct, and will not marry. And why should I?—Creeping, cringing in courtship!—O my dear, these men are a vile race of reptiles in our day, and mere bears in their own. See in Lovelace all that is desirable in figure, in birth, and in fortune: but in his heart a devil!—See in Hickman—Indeed, my dear, I cannot tell what any-body can see in Hickman, to be always preaching in his favour. And is it to be expected that I, who could hardly bear controul from a mother, should take it from a husband?—From one too, who has neither more wit, nor more understanding, than myself? Yet he to be my instructor!—So he will, I suppose; but more by the insolence of his will, than by the merit of his counsel. It is in vain to think of it. I cannot be a wife to any man breathing whom I at present know. This I the rather mention now, because, on my mother's danger, I know you will be for pressing me the sooner to throw myself into another sort of protection, should I be deprived of her. But no more of this subject, or indeed of any other: for I am obliged to attend my mamma, who cannot bear me out of her sight.

WEDNESDAY, AUG. 30.

My mother, Heaven be praised! has had a fine night, and is much better. Her fever has yielded to medicine! And now I can write once more with freedom and ease to you, in hopes that you also are better. If this be granted to my prayers, I shall again be happy. I write with still the more alacrity, as I have an opportunity given me to touch upon a subject in which you are nearly concerned.

You must know then, my dear, that your cousin Morden has been here with me. He told me of an interview he had on Monday at Lord M's with Lovelace; and asked me abundance of questions about you, and about that villainous man.

I could have raised a fine flame between them if I would: but, observing ing that he is a man of very lively paſſions, and believing you would be miſerable if any-thing ſhould happen to him from a quarrel with a man who is known to have ſo many advantages at his ſword, I made not the worſt of the ſubjects we talked of. But, as I could not tell untruths in his favour, you muſt think I ſaid enough to make him curſe the wretch.

I don't find, well as they all uſed to reſpect Colonel Morden, that he has influence enough upon them to bring them to any terms of reconciliation.

What can they mean by it?—But your brother is come home, it ſeems: ſo, The honour of the houſe, the reputation of the family, is all the cry!

The colonel is exceedingly out of humour with them all. Yet has he not hitherto, it ſeems, ſeen your brutal brother. I told him how ill you were, and communicated to him ſome of the contents of your letter. He admired you, curſed Lovelace, and raved againſt all your family.—He declared that they were all unworthy of you.

At his earneſt requeſt, I permitted him to take ſome brief notes of ſuch of the contents of your letters to me, as I thought I could read to him; and, particularly, of your melancholy concluſion.

He ſays, that none of your friends think you ſo ill as you are, nor will believe it. He is ſure they all love you, and that dearly too.

If they do, their preſent hardneſs of heart will be the ſubject of everlaſting remorſe to them, ſhould you be taken from us—But now it ſeems [Barbarous wretches!] you are to ſuffer within an inch of your life.

He aſked me queſtions about Mr. Belford: and when he had heard what I had to ſay of that gentleman, and his diſintereſted ſervices to you, he raved at ſome villainous ſurmiſes thrown out againſt you by that officious pedant, Brand: who, but for his gown, I find, would come off poorly enough between your couſin and Lovelace.

He was ſo uneaſy about you himſelf, that on Thurſday the 24th, he ſent up an honeſt ſerious man, one Alſton, a gentleman-farmer, to enquire of your condition, your viſitors, and the like; who brought him word, that you was very ill, and was put to great ſtreights to ſupport yourſelf: but as this was told him by the gentlewoman of the houſe where you lodge, who it ſeems mingled it with ſome tart, though deſerved, reflections upon your relations cruelty, it was not credited by them: and I myſelf hope it cannot be true; for ſurely you could not be ſo unjuſt, I will ſay, to my friendſhip, as to ſuffer any inconveniences for want of money. I think I could not forgive you, if it were ſo.

The colonel (as one of your truſtees) is reſolved to ſee you put into poſſeſſion of your eſtate: and, in the mean time, he has actually engaged them to remit to him for you the produce of it accrued ſince your grandfather's death, (a very conſiderable ſum) and propoſes himſelf to attend you with it. But, by a hint he dropt, I find you had diſappointed ſome people's littleneſs, by not writing to them for money and ſupplies; ſince they were determined to diſtreſs you, and to put you at defiance.

Like all the reſt!—I hope I may ſay that without offence.

Your couſin imagines, that, before a reconciliation takes place, they will inſiſt, that you ſhall make ſuch a will, as to that eſtate, as they ſhall approve of: but he declares, he will not go out of England till he has ſeen juſtice done you by every-body; and that you ſhall not be impoſed on either by friend or foe—

By relation or foe, ſhould he not have ſaid?—For a friend will not impoſe upon a friend.

So, my dear, you are to buy your peace, if ſome people are to have their wills!

Your couſin [Not I, my dear, though it was always my opinion] ſays, that the whole family is too rich to be either humble, conſiderate, or contented. And as for himſelf, he has an ample fortune, he ſays, and thinks of leaving it wholly to you.

Had this villain Lovelace conſulted his worldly intereſt only, what a fortune would he have had in you, even although your marrying him had deprived you of a paternal ſhare!

I am obliged to leave off here. But having a good deal ſtill to write, and my mother better, I will purſue the ſubject in another letter, although I ſend both together. I need not ſay how much I am, and will ever be, your affectionate, &c.

ANNA HOWE.

LETTER XCV.

MISS HOWE, TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

THURSDAY, AUG. 31.

THE colonel thought fit once, in praiſe of Lovelace's generoſity, to ſay, ſay, That (as a man of honour ought) he took to himſelf all the blame, and acquitted you of the conſequences of the precipitate ſtep you had taken; ſince, he ſaid, as you loved him, and was in his power, he muſt have had advantages, which he would not have had, if you had continued at your father's, or at any friend's.

Mighty generous, I ſaid, (were it as he ſuppoſed) in ſuch inſolent reflectors, the beſt of them; who pretend to clear reputations which never had been ſullied but by falling into their dirty acquaintance! But in this caſe, I averred, that there was no need of any-thing but the ſtricteſt truth, to demonſtrate Lovelace to be the blackeſt of villains, you the brighteſt of innocents.

This he catched at; and ſwore, that if any-thing uncommon or barbarous in the ſeduction were to come out, as indeed one of the letters you had written to your friends, and which had been ſhewn him, very ſtrongly implied; that is to ſay, my dear, if any-thing worſe than perjury, breach of faith, and abuſe of a generous confidence, were to appear!—[Sorry fellows!] he would avenge his couſin to the utmoſt.

I urged your apprehenſions on this head from your laſt letter to me: but he ſeemed capable of taking what I know to be real greatneſs of ſoul, in an unworthy ſenſe: for he mentioned directly upon it, the expectation your friends had, that you ſhould (previous to any reconciliation with them) appear in a court of juſtice againſt the villain—IF you could do it with the advantage to yourſelf that I hinted might be done.

And truly, if I would have heard him, he had indelicacy enough to have gone into the nature of the proof of the crime upon which they wanted to have Lovelace arraigned. Yet this is a man improved by travel and learning!—Upon my word, my dear, I, who have been accuſtomed to the moſt delicate converſation ever ſince I had the honour to know you, deſpiſe this ſex from the gentleman down to the peaſant.

Upon the whole, I find that Mr. Morden has a very ſlender notion of women's virtues in particular caſes: for which reaſon I put him down, though your favourite, as one who is not entitled to caſt the firſt ſtone.

I never knew a man who deſerved to be well thought of himſelf for his morals, who had a ſlight opinion of the virtue of our ſex in general. For if, from the difference of temperament and education, modeſty, chaſtity, and piety too, are not to be found in our ſex preferably to the other, I ſhould think it a ſign of a much worſe nature in ours.

He even hinted, (as from your relations indeed) that it is impoſſible but there muſt be ſome will where there is much love.

Theſe ſort of reflections are enough to make a woman, who has at heart her own honour and the honour of her ſex, to look about her, and conſider what ſhe is doing when ſhe enters into an intimacy with theſe wretches; ſince it is plain, that whenever ſhe throws herſelf into the power of a man, and leaves for him her parents or guardians, everybody will believe it to be owing more to her good luck than to her diſcretion, if there be not an end of her virtue: and let the man be ever ſuch a villain to her, ſhe muſt take into her own boſom a ſhare of his guilty baſeneſs.

I am writing to general caſes. You, my dear, are out of the queſtion. Your ſtory, as I have heretofore ſaid, will afford a warning as well as an example: for who is it that will not infer, That if a perſon of your fortune, character, and merit, could not eſcape ruin, after ſhe had put herſelf into the power of her hyæna, what can a thoughtleſs, fond, giddy creature expect?

'Every man,' they will ſay, 'is not 'a LOVELACE.'—True: but then, neither is every woman a CLARISSA. And allow for the one and for the other, the example muſt be of general uſe.

I prepared Mr. Morden to expect your appointment of Mr. Belford for an office that we both hope he will have no occaſion to act in (nor any-body elſe) for many, very many years to come. He was at firſt ſtartled at it: but, upon hearing ſuch of your reaſons as had ſatisfied me, he only ſaid, That ſuch an appointment, were it to take place, would exceedingly affect his other couſins.

He told me, he had a copy of Lovelace's letter to you, imploring your pardon, and offering to undergo any penance to procure it; and alſo of your anſwer to it.

I find he is willing to hope, that a marriage between you may ſtill take place; which, he ſays, will heal up all breaches.

I would have written much more—On the following particulars eſpecially:

to wit, of the wretched man's hunting you out of your lodgings: of your relations ſtrange implacableneſs: [I am in haſte, and cannot think of a word you would like better, juſt now] of your laſt letter to Lovelace to divert him from purſuing you: of your aunt Hervey's penitential converſation with Mrs. Norton: of Mr. Wyerley's renewed addreſs: of your leſſons to me in Hickman's behalf, ſo approveable, were the man more ſo than he is: but indeed I am offended with him at this inſtant, and have been for theſe two days:—of your ſiſter's tranſportation-project:—and of twenty and twenty other things:—but am obliged to leave off, to attend my two couſins Spilſworth, and my couſin Herbert, who are come to viſit us on account of my mother's illneſs—I will therefore diſpatch theſe by Rogers; and if my mother gets well ſoon, (as I hope ſhe will) I am reſolved to ſee you in town, and tell you every-thing that now is upon my mind; and particularly, mingling my ſoul with yours, how much I am, and will ever be, my deareſt dear friend, your affectionate

ANNA HOWE.

Let Rogers bring one line, I pray you. I thought to have ſent him this afternoon; but he cannot ſet out till to-morrow morning early.

I cannot expreſs how much your ſtaggering lines, and your concluſion, affect me!

LETTER XCVI.

MR. BELFORD, TO ROBERT LOVELACE, ESQ.

SUNDAY EVENING, SEPT. 3.

I Wonder not at the impatience your ſervant tells me you expreſs to hear from me. I was deſigning to write you a long letter, and was juſt returned from Smith's for that purpoſe; but ſince you are ſo urgent, you muſt be contented with a ſhort one.

I attended the lady this morning, juſt before I ſet out for Edgware. She was ſo ill overnight, that ſhe was obliged to leave unfiniſhed her letter to Miſs Howe. But early this morning ſhe made an end of it, and had juſt ſealed it up as I came. She was ſo fatigued with writing, that ſhe told me, ſhe would lay down after I was gone, and endeavour to recruit her ſpirits.

They had ſent for Mr. Goddard, when ſhe was ſo ill laſt night; and not being able to ſee him out of her own chamber, he, for the firſt time, ſaw her houſe, as ſhe calls it. He was extremely ſhocked and concerned at it; and chid Mrs. Smith and Mrs. Lovick for not perſuading her to have ſuch an object removed from her bed-chamber: and when they excuſed themſelves on the little authority it was reaſonable to ſuppoſe they muſt have with a lady ſo much their ſuperior, he reflected warmly on thoſe who had more authority, and who left her to proceed with ſuch a ſhocking and ſolemn whimſey, as he called it.

It is placed near the window, like a harpſichord, though covered over to the ground: and when ſhe is ſo ill, that ſhe cannot well go to her cloſet, ſhe writes and reads upon it, as others would upon a deſk or table. But (only as ſhe was ſo ill laſt night) ſhe chuſes not to ſee any-body in that apartment.

I went to Edgeware; and, returning in the evening, attended her again. She had a letter brought her from Mrs. Norton, (a long one, as it ſeems by it's bulk) juſt before I came. But ſhe had not opened it; and ſaid, That as ſhe was pretty calm and compoſed, ſhe was afraid to look into the contents, leſt ſhe ſhould be ruffled; expecting, now, to hear of nothing that could do her good or give her pleaſure from that good woman's dear hard-hearted neighbours, as ſhe called her own relations.

Seeing her ſo weak and ill, I withdrew; nor did ſhe deſire me to tarry, as ſometimes ſhe does, when I make a motion to depart.

I had ſome hints, as I went away, from Mrs. Smith, that ſhe had appropriated that evening to ſome offices, that were to ſave trouble, as ſhe called it, after her departure; and had been giving orders to her nurſe, and to Mrs. Smith, about what ſhe would have done when ſhe was gone; and I believe they were of a very delicate and affecting nature; but Mrs. Smith deſcended not to particulars.

The doctor had been with her, as well as Mr. Goddard; and they both joined with great earneſtneſs to perſuade her to have her houſe removed out of her ſight: but ſhe aſſured them, that it gave her pleaſure and ſpirits; and, being a neceſſary preparation, ſhe wondered they ſhould be ſurprized at it, when ſhe had not any of her family about her, or any old acquaintance, on whoſe care and exactneſs in theſe punctilios, as ſhe called them, ſhe could rely.

The doctor told Mrs. Smith, That he believed ſhe would hold out long enough enough for any of her friends to have notice of her ſtate, and to ſee her; and hardly longer; and ſince he could not find, that ſhe had any certainty of ſeeing her couſin Morden, (which made it plain that her relations continued inflexible) he would go home, and write a letter to her father, take it as ſhe would.

She had ſpent great part of the day in intenſe devotions; and to-morrow morning ſhe is to have with her the ſame clergyman who has often attended her; from whoſe hands ſhe will again receive the ſacrament.

Thou ſeeſt, Lovelace, that all is preparing, that all will be ready; and I am to attend her to-morrow afternoon, to take ſome inſtructions from her in relation to my part in the office to be performed for her. And thus, omitting the particulars of a fine converſation between her and Mrs. Lovick, which the latter acquainted me with, as well as another between her and the doctor and apothecary, which I had a deſign this evening to give you, they being of a very affecting nature, I have yielded to your impatience.

I ſhall diſpatch Harry to-morrow morning early with her letter to Miſs Howe: an offer ſhe took very kindly; as ſhe is extremely ſolicitous to leſſen that young lady's apprehenſions for her on not hearing from her by Saturday's poſt: and yet, if ſhe write truth, as no doubt but ſhe will, how can her apprehenſions be leſſened?

LETTER XCVII.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

SATURDAY, SEPT. 2.

I Write, my beloved Miſs Howe, though very ill ſtill: but I could not by the return of your meſſenger; for I was then unable to hold a pen.

Your mother's illneſs (as mentioned in the firſt part of your letter) gave me great diſtreſs for you, till I re'd farther. You bewailed it as it became a daughter ſo ſenſible. May you be bleſſed in each other for many, very many, happy years to come! I doubt not, that even this ſudden and grievous indiſpoſition, by the frame it has put you in, and the apprehenſion it has given you of loſing ſo dear a mother, will contribute to the happineſs I wiſh you: for, alas! my dear, we ſeldom know how to value the bleſſings we enjoy, till we are in danger of loſing them, or have actually loſt them: and then, what would we give to have them reſtored to us!

What, I wonder, has again happened between you and Mr. Hickman? Although I know it not, I dare ſay it is owing to ſome pretty petulance, to ſome half-ungenerous advantage taken of his obligingneſs and aſſiduity. Will you never, my dear, give the weight you and all our ſex ought to give to the qualities of ſobriety and regularity of life and manners in that ſex? Muſt bold creatures, and forward ſpirits, for even, and by the beſt and wiſeſt of us, as well as by the indiſcreeteſt, be the moſt kindly treated?

My dear friends know not, that I have actually ſuffered within leſs than an inch of my life.

Poor Mr. Brand! He meant well, I believe. I am afraid all will turn heavily upon him, when he probably imagined, that he was taking the beſt method to oblige. But were he not to have been ſo light of belief, and ſo weakly officious; and had given a more favourable, and, it would be ſtrange, if I could not ſay, a juſter report; things would have been, nevertheleſs, exactly as they are.

I muſt lay down my pen. I am very ill. I believe I ſhall be better by-and-by. The bad writing would betray me, although I had a mind to keep from you, what the event muſt ſoon——

Now I reſume my trembling pen. Excuſe the unſteady writing. It will be ſo.

I have wanted no money: ſo don't be angry about ſuch a trifle as money. Yet am I glad of what you inclined me to hope, that my friends will give up the produce of my grandfather's eſtate ſince it has been in their hands: becauſe, knowing it to be my right, and that they could not want it, I had already diſpoſed of a good part of it; and could only hope that they would be willing to give it up at my laſt requeſt. And now how rich ſhall I think myſelf in this my laſt ſtage!—And yet I did not want before—Indeed I did not—For who, that has many ſuperfluities, can be ſaid to want?

Do not, my dear friend, be concerned that I call it my laſt ſtage; for what is even the long life which in high health we wiſh for? What, but, as we go along, a life of apprehenſion, ſometimes for our friends, oftener for ourſelves? And at laſt, when arrived at the old age we covet, one heavy loſs or deprivation having having ſucceeded another, we ſee ourſelves ſtript, as I may ſay, of every one we loved; and find ourſelves expoſed, as uncompanionable poor creatures, to the ſlights, to the contempts, of joſtling youth, who want to puſh us off the ſtage, in hopes to poſſeſs what we have:—And, ſuperadded to all, our own infirmities every day increaſing, of themſelves enough to make the life we wiſhed for the greateſt diſeaſe of all!

In the diſpoſition of what belongs to me, I have endeavoured to do every thing in the juſteſt and beſt manner I could think of; putting myſelf in my relations places, and, in the greater points, ordering my matters, as if no miſunderſtanding had happened.

I hope they will not think much of ſome bequeſts where wanted, and where due from my gratitude: but if they ſhould, what is done, is done; and I cannot now help it. Yet I muſt repeat, that I hope—I hope—I have pleaſed every-one of them. For I would not, on any account, have it thought, that, in my laſt diſpoſition, any-thing undaughterly, unſiſterly, or unlike a kinſwoman, ſhould have had place in a mind that is ſo truly free (as I will preſume to ſay) from all reſentment, that it now overflows with gratitude and bleſſings for the good I have received, although it be not all that my heart wiſhed to receive. Were it even an hardſhip that I was not favoured with more, what is it but an hardſhip of half a year, againſt the moſt indulgent goodneſs of eighteen years and an half, that ever was ſhewn to a daughter?

My couſin, you tell me, thinks I was off my guard, and that I was taken at ſome diſadvantage. Indeed, my dear, I was not. Indeed I gave no room for advantage to be taken of me. I hope, one day, that will be ſeen, if I have the juſtice done me which Mr. Belford aſſures me of.

I ſhould hope, that my couſin has not taken the liberties, which you (by an obſervation not, in general, unjuſt) ſeem to charge him with. For it is ſad to think, that the generality of that ſex ſhould make ſo light of crimes, which they juſtly hold ſo unpardonable in their own moſt intimate relations of ours—Yet cannot commit them without doing ſuch injuries to other families as they think themſelves obliged to reſent unto death, when offered to their own.

But we women are too often to blame on this head; ſince the moſt virtuous among us ſeldom make virtue the teſt of their approbation of the other ſex: inſomuch that a man may glory in his wickedneſs of this ſort without being rejected on that account, even to the faces of women of unqueſtionable virtue. Hence it is, that a libertine ſeldom thinks himſelf concerned ſo much as to ſave appearances: and what is it not that our ſex ſuffers in their opinion on this very ſcore? And what have I, more than many others, to anſwer for on this account, in the world's eye?

May my ſtory be a warning to all, how they prefer a libertine to a man of true honour; and how they permit themſelves to be miſled (where they mean the beſt) by the ſpecious, yet fooliſh hope of ſubduing rivetted habits, and, as I may ſay, of altering natures!—The more fooliſh, as conſtant experience might convince us, that there is hardly one in ten, of even tolerably happy marriages, in which the wife keeps the hold in the huſband's affections, which ſhe had in the lover's. What influence then can ſhe hope to have over the morals of an avowed libertine, who marries perhaps for conveniency, who deſpiſes the tie, and whom, it is too probable, nothing but old age, or ſickneſs, or diſeaſe, (the conſequence of ruinous riot) can reclaim?

I am very glad you gave my couſ—

SUNDAY MORNING, (SEPT. 3.) SIX O'CLOCK.

HITHER I had written, and was forced to quit my pen. And ſo much weaker and worſe I grew, that had I reſumed it, to have cloſed here, it muſt have been with ſuch trembling unſteadineſs, that it would have given you more concern for me, than the delay of ſending it away by laſt night's poſt can do. I deferred it, therefore, to ſee how it would pleaſe God to deal with me. And I find myſelf, after a better night than I expected, lively and clear; and hope to give you a proof that I do, in the continuation of my letter, which I will purſue as currently as if I had not left off.

I am glad you ſo conſiderately gave my couſin Morden favourable impreſſions of Mr. Belford; ſince, otherwiſe, ſome miſunderſtanding might have happened between them: for although I hope this Mr. Belford is an altered man, and in time will be a reformed one, yet is he one of thoſe high ſpirits that has been accuſtomed to reſent imaginary indignities to himſelf, when, I believe, he has not been ſtudious to avoid giving real offences to others; men of this caſt acting as if they thought all the world was made to bear with them, and they with nobody in it.

Mr. Lovelace, you tell me, thought fit to entruſt my couſin with the copy of his letter of penitence to me, and with my anſwer to it, rejecting him and his ſuit: and Mr. Belford moreover acquaints me, how much concerned Mr. Lovelace is, for his baſeneſs, and how freely he accuſed himſelf to my couſin. This ſhews, that the true bravery of ſpirit is to be above doing a vile action; and that nothing ſubjects the human mind to ſo much meanneſs, as the conſciouſneſs of having done wilful wrong to our fellow-creatures. How low, how ſordid, are the ſubmiſſions which elaborate baſeneſs compels! That that wretch could treat me as he did, and then could ſo poorly creep to me for forgiveneſs of crimes ſo wilful, ſo black, and ſo premeditated! How my ſoul deſpiſed him for his meann ſs on a certain occaſion, of which you will one day be informed *! And him whoſe actions one's heart deſpiſes, it is far from being difficult to reject, had one ever ſo partially favoured him once.

Yet am I glad this violent ſpirit can thus creep; that, like a poiſonous ſerpent, he can thus coil himſelf, and hide his head in his own narrow circlets; becauſe this ſtooping, this abaſement, gives me hope that no further miſchief will enſue.

All my apprehenſion is, what may happen when I am gone; leſt then my couſin, or any other of my family, ſhould endeavour to avenge me, and riſque their own more precious lives on that account.

If that part of Cain's curſe were Mr. Lovelace's—To be a fugitive and vagabond in the earth—that is to ſay, if it meant no more harm to him, than that he ſhould be obliged to travel, as it ſeems he intends, (though I wiſh him no ill in his travels;) and I could know it; then ſhould I be eaſy in the hoped-for ſafety of my friends from his ſkilful violence—O that I could hear he was a thouſand miles off!

When I began this letter, I did not think I could have run to ſuch a length. But 'tis to YOU, my deareſt friend, and ſo you have a title to the ſpirits you raiſe and ſupport; for they are no longer mine, and will ſubſide the moment I ceaſe writing to you.

But what do you bid me hope for, when you tell me, that if your mother's health will permit, you will ſee me in town? I hope your mother's health will be perfected as you wiſh; but I dare not promiſe myſelf ſo great a favour—ſo great a bleſſing, I will call it—And indeed I know not if I ſhould be able to bear it now!

Yet one comfort it is in your power to give me; and that is, Let me know, and very ſpeedily it muſt be, if you wiſh to oblige me, that all matters are made up between you and Mr. Hickman; to whom, I ſee, you are reſolved, with all your bravery of ſpirit, to owe a multitude of obligations for his patience with your flightineſs. Think of this, my dear proud friend! and think, likewiſe, of what I have often told you, That PRIDE, in man or woman, is an extreme that hardly ever fails, ſooner or later, to bring forth its mortifying CONTRARY.

May you, my dear Miſs Howe, have no diſcomforts but what you make to yourſelf! As it will be in your own power to leſſen ſuch as theſe, they ought to be your puniſhment if you do not. There is no ſuch thing as perfect happineſs here, ſince the buſy mind will make to itſelf evils, were it to find none. You will therefore pardon this limited wiſh, ſtrange as it may appear, till you conſider it: for to wiſh you no infelicities, either within or without you, were to wiſh you what can never happen in this world; and what perhaps ought not to be wiſhed for, if by a wiſh one could give one's friend ſuch an exemption; ſince we are not to live here always.

We muſt not, in ſhort, expect that our roſes will grow without thorns: but then they are uſeful and inſtructive thorns; which, by pricking the fingers of the too haſty plucker, teach future caution. And who knows not that difficulty gives poignancy to our enjoyments; which are apt to loſe their reliſh with us when they are over-eaſily obtained?

I muſt conclude.

God for ever bleſs you, and all you love and honour, and reward you here and hereafter for your kindneſs to your ever-obliged and affectionate

CLARISSA HARLOWE.

THE HISTORY OF CLARISSA HARLOWE.

VOLUME THE EIGHTH.

LETTER I.

MRS. NORTON, TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

[IN ANSWER TO HERS OF THURSDAY, AUGUST 24. SEE VOL. VII.]

THURSDAY, AUG. 31.

I Had written sooner, my dearest young lady, but that I have been endeavouring, ever since the receipt of your last letter, to obtain a private audience of your mother, in hopes of leave to communicate it to her. But last night I was surprized by an invitation to breakfast at Harlowe Place this morning: and the chariot came early to fetch me: an honour I did not expect.

When I came, I found there was to be a meeting of all your family with Colonel Morden at Harlowe Place; and it was proposed by your mother, and consented to, that I should be present. Your cousin, I understand, had with difficulty brought this meeting to bear; for your brother had before industriously avoided all conversation with him on the affecting subject; urging, That it was not necessary to talk to Mr. Morden upon it, who, being a remoter relation than themselves, had no business to make himself a judge of their conduct to their daughter, their niece, and their sister; especially as he had declared himself in her favour; adding, that he should hardly have patience to be questioned by Mr. Morden on that head.

I was in hopes that your mother would have given me an opportunity of talking with her alone before the company met; but she seemed studiously to avoid it; I dare say, however, not with her inclination.

I was ordered in just before Mr. Morden came; and was bid to sit down—Which I did in the window.

The colonel, when he came, began the discourse, by renewing, as he called it, his solicitations in your favour. He set before them your penitence; your ill health; your virtue, though once betrayed, and basely used: he then read to them Mr. Lovelace's letter, a most contrite one indeed; and your high-soaled answer; for that was what he justly called it; and he treated as it deserved Mr. Brand's officious information, (of which I had before heard he had made them ashamed) by representations founded upon enquiries made by Mr. Alston, whom he had procured to go up on purpose to acquaint himself with your manner of life, and what was meant by the visits of that Mr. Belford.

He then told them, That he had the day before waited upon Miss Howe, and had been shewn a letter from you to her, and permitted to take some memorandums from it, in which you appeared, both by hand-writing, and the contents, to be so very ill, that it seemed doubtful to him, if it were possible for you to get over it. And when he read to them that passage, where you ask Miss Howe, What can be done for you now, were your friends to be ever so favourable? and wish, for their sakes, more than for your own, that they would still relent; and then say you are very ill—you must drop your pen—And ask excuse for your crooked writing; and take, as it were, a laſt

'last farewel of Miss Howe:—'Adieu, 'my dear, adieu,' are your words—

'O my child! my child!' said your mamma, weeping, and clasping her hands.

'Dear Madam,' said your brother, 'be so good as to think you have more 'children than this ungrateful one.'

Yet your sister seemed affected.

Your uncle Harlowe wiping his eyes, 'O cousin!' said he, 'if one thought the 'poor girl was really so ill——'

'She must,' said your uncle Antony. 'This is written to her private friend. 'God forbid she should be quite lost!'

Your uncle Harlowe wished they did not carry their resentments too far.

I begged for God's sake, wringing my hands, and with a bended knee, that they would permit me to go up to you; engaging to give them a faithful account of the way you were in. But I was chidden by your brother; and this occasioned some angry words between him and Mr. Morden.

'I believe, Sir—I believe, Madam,' said your sister to her father and mother, 'we need not trouble my cousin to read 'any more. It does but grieve and 'disturb you. My sister Clary seems 'to be ill: I think, if Mrs. Norton 'were permitted to go up to her, it 'would be right. Wickedly as she has 'acted, if she be truly penitent—'

Here she stopt, and every one being silent, I stood up once more, and besought them to let me go: and then I offered to read a passage or two in your letter to me of the 24th. But I was taken up again by your brother; and this occasioned still higher words between the colonel and him.

Your mother hoping to gain upon your inflexible brother, and to divert the anger of the two gentlemen from each other, proceeded in reading the minutes he had taken from your letter.

He accordginly read, Of your resuming your pen: that you thought you had taken your last farewel; and the rest of that very affecting passage, in which you are obliged to break off more than once, and afterwards take an airing in a chair. Your brother and sister were affected at this; and he had recourse to his snuff-box. And where you comfort Miss Howe, and say, You shall be happy; 'It is more,' said he, 'than she will let 'any-one else be.'

Your sister called you sweet soul; but with a low voice: then grew hard-hearted again; yet said, Nobody could help being affected by your pathetick grief—but that it was your talent.

The colonel then went on to the good effect your airing had upon you; to your good wishes to Miss Howe and Mr. Hickman; and to your concluding sentence, That when the happy life you wished to her comes to be wound up, she may be as calm and as easy at quitting it, as you hope in God you shall be. Your mother could not stand this; but retired to a corner of the room, and sobbed, and wept. Your father for a few minutes could not speak, though he seemed inclined to say something.

Your uncles were also both affected—But your brother went round to each; and again reminded your mother, that she had other children:—What was there, he said, in what was read, but the result of the talent you had of moving the passions? And he blamed them for chusing to hear read what they knew their abused indulgence could not be a proof against.

This set Mr. Morden up again:—'Fie upon you, cousin Harlowe!' 'said he—'I see plainly to whom it is owing 'that all relationship and ties of blood 'with regard to this sweet sufferer are 'laid aside. Such rigours as these make 'it difficult for a sliding virtue ever to 'recover itself.'

Your brother pretended the honour of the family; and declared that no child ought to be forgiven who abandoned the most indulgent of parents against warning, against the light of knowledge, as you had done.

'But, Sir—and ladies,' said I, rising from my seat in the window, and humbly turning round to each, 'if I may be 'permitted to speak, my dear Miss asks 'only for a blessing. She does not beg 'to be received to favour: she is very 'ill, and asks only for a last blessing.'

'Come, come, goody Norton,' [I need not tell you who said this] 'you are up 'again with your lamentables!—A good 'woman, as you are, to forgive so rea-'dily a crime that has been as disgrace-'ful to your part in her education, as to 'her family, is a weakness that would 'induce one to suspect your virtue, if 'you were to be encountered by a temp-'tation properly adapted.'

'By some such charitable logick,' said Mr. Morden, 'as this, is my cousin Ara-'bella captivated, I doubt not.—If to 'be uncharitable and unforgiving, is to 'give a proof of virtue, you, Mr. James 'Harlowe, are the most virtuous young 'man in the world.'

'I knew how it would be,' replied your brother, in a passion, 'if I met Mr. 'Morden upon this business. I would 'have

'have declined it—but you, Sir,' to his father, 'would not permit me so to do.'

'But, Sir,' turning to the colonel, 'in no other presence—'

'Then, cousin James,' interrupted the other gentleman, 'that which is your 'protection, it seems, is mine. I am not 'used to bear defiances thus—You are 'my cousin, Sir—and the son and ne-'phew of persons, as dear as near to 'me—' There he paused.

'Are we,' said your father, 'to be 'made still more unhappy among our-'selves, when the villain lives that ought 'to be the object of every-one's resent-'ment who has either a value for the 'family, or for this ungrateful girl?'

'That's the man,' said your cousin, 'whom last Monday, as you know, I 'went purposely to make the object of 'mine. But what could I say, when I 'found him so willing to repair his 'crime?—And I give it as my opinion, 'and have written accordingly to my 'poor cousin, that it is best for all round, 'that his offer should be accepted; and 'let me tell you—'

'Tell me nothing,' said your father, quite enraged, 'of that very vile fellow! 'I have a rivetted hatred to him. I 'would rather see the rebel die an hun-'dred deaths, were it possible, than that 'she should give such a villain as him a 'relation to my family.'

'Well, but there is no room to think,' said your mother, 'that she will give us 'such a relation, my dear. The poor 'girl will lessen, I fear, the number of 'our relations; not increase it. If she 'be so ill as we are told she is, let us 'send Mrs. Norton up to her.—That's 'the least we can do—Let us take her, 'however, out of the hands of that 'Belford.'

Both your uncles supported this motion: the latter part of it especially.

Your brother observed, in his ill-natured way, what a fine piece of consistency it was, in you, to refuse the vile injurer, and the amends he offered; yet to throw yourself upon the protection of his fast friend.

Miss Harlowe was apprehensive, she said, that you would leave all you could leave to that pert creature Miss Howe, [So she called her] if you should die.

'O do not, do not suppose that, my 'Bella,' said your poor mother. 'I can-'not think of parting with my Clary—'With all her faults, she is my child—'Her reasons for her conduct are not 'heard. It would break my heart to 'lose her.—I think, my dear,' to your father, 'none so fit as I to go up, if you 'will give me leave; and Mrs. Norton 'shall accompany me.'

This was a sweet motion; and your father paused upon it. Mr. Morden offered his service to escort her. Your uncles seemed to approve of it. But your brother dashed all. 'I hope, Sir,' said he to his father—'I hope, Madam,' to his mother—'that you will not en-'deavour to recover a faulty daughter, 'by losing an unculpable son. I do 'declare, that if ever my sister Clary 'darkens these doors again, I never 'will. I will set out, Madam, the same 'hour you go to London (on such an 'errand) to Edinburgh; and there I will 'reside; and try to forget that I have 'relations in England so near and so 'dear as you are now all to me.'

'Good God,' said the colonel, 'what 'a declaration is this!—And suppose, 'Sir—and suppose, Madam,' [turning to your father and mother] 'this should 'be the case, whether is it better, think 'you, that you should lose for ever such 'a daughter as my cousin Clary, or that 'your son should go to Edinburgh, and 'reside there upon an estate which will 'be the better for his residence upon it?'

Your brother's passionate behaviour hereupon is hardly to be described. He resented it as promoting an alienation of the affection of the family to him. And to such a height were resentments carried, every one siding with him, that the colonel, with hands and eyes lifted up, cried out, 'What hearts of flint 'am I related to!—O, cousin Harlowe,' to your father, 'are you resolved to 'have but one daughter?—Are you, 'Madam, to be taught by a son who has 'no bowels, to forget you are a mother?'

The colonel turned from them to draw out his handkerchief, and could not for a minute speak. The eyes of every-one, but the hard-hearted brother, caught tears from his.

But then turning to them, (with the more indignation, as it seemed, as he had been obliged to shew a humanity, which, however, no brave heart should be ashamed of) 'I leave ye all,' said he, 'fit company for one another. I 'will never open my lips to any of you 'more upon this subject. I will in-'stantly make my will, and in me shall 'the dear creature have the father, un-'cle, brother, she has lost. I will pre-'vail upon her to take the tour of 'France and Italy with me; nor shall 'she return till ye know the value of 'such a daughter.'

And

And saying this, he hurried out of the room, went into the court-yard, and ordered his horse.

Mr. Antony Harlowe went to him there, just as he was mounting; and said, he hoped he should find him cooler in the evening; (for he, till then, had lodged at his house) and that then they would converse calmly; and every-one, mean time, would weigh all matters well—But the angry gentleman said, 'Cousin Harlowe, I shall endeavour to discharge the obligations I owe to your civility, since I have been in England: but I have been so treated by that hot-headed young man, (who, as far as I know, has done more to ruin his sister than Lovelace himself, and this with the approbation of you all) that I will not again enter into your doors, or theirs. My servants shall have orders whither to bring what belongs to me from your house. I will see my dear cousin Clary as soon as I can. And so God bless you all together!—only this one word to your nephew, if you please, that he wants to be taught the difference between courage and bluster; and it is happy for him, perhaps, that I am his kinsman; though I am sorry he is mine.'

I wondered to hear your uncle, on his return to them all, repeat this; because of the consequences it may be attended with, though I hope it will not have bad ones: yet it was considered as a sort of challenge, and so it confirmed every-body in your brother's favour; and Miss Harlowe forgot not to inveigh against that error which had brought on all these evils.

I took the liberty again, but with fear and trembling, to desire leave to attend you.

Before any other person could answer, your brother said, 'I suppose you look upon yourself, Mrs. Norton, to be your own mistress. Pray do you want our consents and courtship to go up?—If I may speak my mind, you and my sister Clary are the fittest to be together.—Yet I wish you would not trouble your head about our family matters, till you are desired to do so.'

'But don't you know, brother,' said Miss Harlowe, 'that the error of any branch of a family splits that family into two parties, and makes not only every common friend and acquaintance, but even servants, judges over both?—This is one of the blessed effects of my sister Clary's fault!'

'There never was a creature so criminal,' said your father, looking with displeasure at me, 'who had not some weak heads to pity and side with her.'

I wept. Your mother was so good as to take me by the hand: 'Come, good woman,' said she, 'come along with me. You have too much reason to be afflicted with what afflicts us, to want additions to your grief.'

But, my dearest young lady, I was more touched for your sake than for my own: for I have been low in the world for a great number of years; and, of consequence, must have been accustomed to snubs and rebuffs from the affluent. But I hope, that patience is written as legibly on my forehead, as haughtiness on that of any of my obligers.

Your mother led me to her chamber; and there we sat and wept together for several minutes, without being able to speak either of us one word to the other. At last she broke silence, asking, me, if you were really and indeed so ill, as it was said you were?

I answered in the affirmative; and would have shewn her your last letter; but she declined seeing it.

I would fain have procured from her the favour of a line to you with her blessing. I asked, what was intended by your brother and sister? Would nothing satisfy them but your final reprobation?—I insinuated, how easy it would be, did not your duty and humility govern you, to make yourself independent as to circumstances; but that nothing but a blessing, a last blessing, was requested by you. And many other things I urged in your behalf. The following brief repetition of what she was pleased to say in answer to my pleas, will give you a notion of it all; and of the present situation of things.

She said, she was very unhappy!—She had lost the little authority she once had over her other children, through one child's failing; and all influence over Mr. Harlowe and his brothers. Your father, she said, had besought her to leave it to him to take his own methods with you; and (as she valued him) to take no step in your favour unknown to him and your uncles: yet she owned, that they were too much governed by your brother. They would, however, give way in time, she knew, to a reconciliation: they designed no other; for they all still loved you.

Your brother and sister, she owned, were very jealous of your coming into favour again: yet could but Mr. Morden have kept his temper, and stood her son's

ſon's firſt ſallies, who (having always had the family grandeur in view) had carried his reſentment ſo high, that he knew not how to deſcend, the conferences, ſo abruptly broken off juſt now, would have ended more happily; for that ſhe had reaſon to think, that a few conceſſions on your part, with regard to your grandfather's eſtate, and your couſin's engaging for your ſubmiſſion as from proper motives, would have ſoftened them all.

Mr. Brand's account of your intimacy with the friend of the obnoxious man, ſhe ſaid, had, for the time, very unhappy effects; for before that ſhe had gained ſome ground: but afterwards dared not, nor indeed had inclination, to open her lips in your behalf. Your continued intimacy with that Mr. Belford was wholly unaccountable, and as wholly inexcuſable.

What made the wiſhed for reconciliation, ſhe ſaid, more difficult, was, firſt, that you yourſelf acknowledged yourſelf diſhonoured; (and it was too well known, that it was your own fault that you ever were in the power of ſo great a profligate) of conſequence, that their and your diſgrace could not be greater than it was: yet, that you refuſe to proſecute the wretch. Next, that the pardon and bleſſing hoped for muſt probably be attended with your marriage to the man they hate, and who hates them as much: 'Very diſagreeable 'circumſtances,' ſhe ſaid, 'I muſt allow, to found a reconciliation upon.'

As to her own part, ſhe muſt needs ſay, that if there were any hope that Mr. Lovelace would become a reformed man, the letter her couſin Morden had re'd to them from him to you, and the juſtice (as ſhe hoped it was) he did your character, though to his own condemnation, (his family and fortunes being unexceptionable) and all his relations earneſt to be related to you, were arguments that would have weight with her, could they have any with your father and uncles.

To my plea of your illneſs, ſhe could not but flatter herſelf, ſhe anſwered, that it was from lowneſs of ſpirits, and temporary dejection. A young creature, ſhe ſaid, ſo very conſiderate as you naturally were, and fallen ſo low, muſt have enough of that. Should they loſe you, which God forbid! the ſcene would then indeed be ſadly changed; for then thoſe who now moſt reſented, would be moſt grieved; all your fine qualities would riſe to their remembrance, and your unhappy error would be quite forgotten.

She wiſhed you would put yourſelf into your couſin's protection entirely, and have nothing more to ſay to Mr. Belford.

And I would recommend it to your moſt ſerious conſideration, my dear Miſs Clary, whether now, as your couſin (who is your truſtee for your grandfather's eſtate) is come, you ſhould not give over all thoughts of Mr. Lovelace's intimate friend for your executor; more eſpecially, as that gentleman's interfering in the concerns of your family, ſhould the ſad event take place, (which my heart aches but to think of) might be attended with thoſe conſequences which you are ſo deſirous, in other caſes, to obviate and prevent. And ſuppoſe, my dear young lady, you were to write one letter more to each of your uncles, to let them know how ill you are?—And to aſk their advice, and offer to be governed by it, in relation to the diſpoſition of your eſtate and effects?—Methinks I wiſh you would.

I find they will ſend you up a large part of what has been received from that eſtate, ſince it was yours; together with your current caſh, which you left behind you: and this by your couſin Morden, for fear you ſhould have contracted debts which may make you uneaſy.

They ſeem to expect, that you will wiſh to live at your grandfather's houſe, in a private manner, if your couſin prevail not upon you to go abroad for a year or two.

FRIDAY MORNING.

BETTY was with me juſt now. She tells me, that your couſin Morden is ſo much diſpleaſed with them all, that he has refuſed to lodge any more at your uncle Antony's; and has even taken up with inconvenient lodgings, till he is provided with others to his mind. This very much concerns them; and they repent their violent treatment of him: and the more, as he is reſolved, he ſays, to make you his ſole executrix, and heir to all his fortune.

What noble fortunes ſtill, my deareſt young lady, await you! I am thoroughly convinced, that it pleaſe God to preſerve your life and your health, that every body will ſoon be reconciled to you, and that you will ſee many happy days.

Your mother wiſhed me not to attend you as yet, becauſe ſhe hopes that [illegible] give myself that pleasure foun[illegible] every body's good liking, and even at their desire. Your cousin Morden's reconciliation with them, which they are very desirous of, I am ready to hope, will include theirs with you.

But if that should happen which I so much dread; and I not with you, I should never forgive myself. Let me, therefore, my dearest young lady, desire you to command my attendance, if you find any danger, and if you wish me peace of mind; and no consideration shall withhold me.

I hear that Miss Howe has obtained leave from her mother to see you; and intends next week to go to town for that purpose; and (as it is believed) to buy cloaths for her approaching nuptials.

Mr. Hickman's mother-in-law is lately dead. Her jointure of 60ol. a year is fallen to him; and she has, moreover, as an acknowledgment of his good behaviour to her, left him all she was worth, which was very considerable, a few legacies excepted to her own relations.

These good men are uniformly good: indeed could not elfe be good; and never lose the worse for being so. All the world agrees, he will make that fine young lady an excellent husband: and I am sorry they are not as much agreed in her making him an excellent wife. But I hope a woman of her principles would not encourage his addresses, if, whether she at present love him or not, she thought she could not love him; or if she preferred any other man to him.

Mr. Pocock undertakes to deliver this; but fears it will be Saturday night first, if not Sunday morning.

May the Almighty protect and bless you!—I long to see you—My dearest young lady, I long to see you; and to fold you once more to my fond heart. I dare to say, happy days are coming. Be but cheerful. Give way to hope.

Whether for this world, or the other, you must be happy. Wish to live, however, were it only because you are so well fitted in mind to make everyone happy who has the honour to know you. What signifies this transitory eclipse? You are as near perfection, by all I have heard, as any creature in this world can be: for here is your glory—You are brightened and purified, as I may say, by your sufferings!—How I long to hear your whole sad, yet instructive story, from your own lips!

For Miss Howe's sake, who, in her new engagements will so much want you; for your cousin Morden's sake, for your mother's sake, if I must go on farther in your family; and yet I can say, for all their sakes; and for my sake, my dearest Miss Clary; let your resumed and accustomed magnanimity bear you up. You have many things to do which I know not the person who will do, if you leave us.

Join your prayers then to mine, that God will spare you to a world that wants you and your example; and, although your days may seem to have been numbered, who knows but that, with the good King Hezekiah, you may have them prolonged? Which God grant, if it be his blessed will, to the prayers of your

JUDITH NORTON.

LETTER II.

MR. BELFORD, TO ROBERT LOVELACE, ESQ.

MONDAY, SEPT. 4.

THE lady would not read the letter she had from Mrs. Norton, till she had received the communion, for fear it should contain any-thing that might disturb that happy calm, which she had been endeavouring to obtain for it. And when that solemn office was over, she was so composed, she said, that she thought she could receive any news, however affecting, with tranquillity.

Nevertheless, in reading it, she was forced to leave off several times through weakness and a dimness in her sight, of which she complained; if I may say complained; for so easy and soft were her complaints, that they could hardly be called such.

She was very much affected at divers parts of this letter. She wept several times, and sighed often. Mrs. Lovick told me, that these were the gentle exclamations she broke out into, as she read:—Her unkind, her cruel brother!—'How unsisterly!—Poor dear woman!' seeming to speak of Mrs. Norton. Her kind cousin!—'O these flaming spirits!' And then reflecting upon herself more than once—'What a deep error is mine!—What evils have I been the occasion of!'

When I was admitted to her presence, 'I have received,' said she, 'a 'long and not very pleasing letter from 'my dear Mrs. Norton. It will soon 'be in your hands. I am advised against 'appointing you to the office you have 'so kindly accepted of: but you must 'resent

The affecting Scene between BELFORD & CLARISSA who is supported by Mrs. LOVICK and Mrs. SMITH, Interrupted by a Servant from her Cousin.

Pubd by Alexr Hogg Nov.r 29 1783.

'reſent nothing of theſe things. My 'choice will have an odd appearance to 'them: but it is now too late to alter 'it, if I would.

'I would ſain write an anſwer to it,' continued ſhe: 'but I have no diſtinct 'ſight, Mr. Belford, no ſteadineſs of 'fingers.—This miſtineſs, however, 'will perhaps be gone by-and-by.—
—Then turning to Mrs Lovick, 'I 'don't think I am dying yet—not 'actually dying, Mrs. Lovick—For I 'have no bodily pain—No numbneſſes; 'no ſigns of immediate death, I think. '—And my breath, which uſed of late 'to be ſo ſhort, is now tolerable—My 'head clear, my intellects free—I think 'I cannot be dying yet—I ſhall have 'agonies, I doubt—Life will not give 'up ſo bleſſedly eaſy, I fear—Yet how 'merciful is the Almighty, to give his 'poor creature ſuch a ſweet ſerenity! '—'Tis what I have prayed for!—'What encouragement, Mrs. Lovick, 'ſo near one's diſſolution, to have it 'to hope, that one's prayers are an-'ſwered!'

Mrs. Smith, as well as Mrs. Lovick, was with her. They were both in tears; nor had I, any more than they, power to ſay a word in anſwer: yet ſhe ſpoke all this, as well as what follows, with a ſurpriſing compoſure of mind and countenance.

'But, Mr. Belford,' ſaid ſhe, aſſuming a ſtill ſprightlier air and accent, 'let 'me talk a little to you, while I am thus 'able to ſay what I have to ſay.'

'Mrs. Lovick, don't leave us,' [for the women were riſing to go]—'Pray 'ſit down—and do you, Mrs. Smith, ſit 'down too.—Dame Shelbourne, take 'this key, and open that upper drawer. 'I will move to it.'

She did, with trembling knees.—'Here, Mr. Belford, is my will. It is 'witneſſed by three perſons of Mr. 'Smith's acquaintance.

'I dare to hope, that my couſin Mor-'den will give you aſſiſtance, if you re-'queſt it of him. My couſin Morden 'continues his affection for me: but as 'I have not ſeen him, I leave all the 'trouble upon you, Mr. Belford. This 'deed may want forms; and it does, no 'doubt: but the leſs, as I have my 'grandfather's will almoſt by heart, and 'have often enough heard that canvaſſed. 'I will lay it by itſelf in this corner;' putting it at the further end of the drawer.

She then took up a parcel of letters, incloſed in one cover, ſealed with three ſeals of black-wax: 'This,' ſaid ſhe, 'I 'ſealed up laſt night. The cover, ſee, 'will let you know what is to be done 'with what it incloſes. This is the in-'perſcription;' [holding it cloſe to her eyes, and rubbing them] "As ſoon as "I am certainly dead, this is to be broke "open by Mr. Belford."—'Here, Sir, I 'put it,' [placing it by the will.]—'Theſe folded papers are letters and 'copies of letters, diſpoſed according to 'their dates. Miſs Howe will do with 'thoſe as you and ſhe ſhall think fit. If 'I receive any more, or more come 'when I cannot receive them, they may 'be put into this drawer,' [pulling out and puſhing in the looking-glaſs drawer] 'to be given to Mr. Belford, be 'they from whom they will.—You'll be 'ſo kind as to obſerve that, Mrs. Lo-'vick—and Dame Shelbourne.

'Here, Sir,' proceeded ſhe, 'I put 'the keys of my apparel,' [putting them into the drawer with her papers.] 'All 'is in order, and the inventory upon 'them, and an account of what I have 'diſpoſed of: ſo that nobody need to 'aſk Mrs. Smith any queſtions.

'There will be no immediate need to 'open or inſpect the trunks which con-'tain my wearing apparel.—Mrs. Nor-'ton will open them, or order ſome-'body to do it for her, in your pre-'ſence, Mrs. Lovick; for ſo I have di-'rected in my will. They may be ſeal-'ed up now: I ſhall never more have 'occaſion to open them.'

She then, though I expoſtulated with her to the contrary, cauſed me to ſeal them up with my ſeal.

After this, ſhe locked the drawer where were her papers; firſt taking out her book of meditations, as ſhe called it; ſaying, ſhe ſhould, perhaps, have uſe for that; and then deſired me to take the key of that drawer; for ſhe ſhould have no further occaſion for that neither.

All this in ſo compoſed and cheerful a manner, that we were equally ſurprized and affected with it.

'You can witneſs for me, Mrs. 'Smith—and ſo can you, Mrs. Lovick,' proceeded ſhe—'if any one aſk after my 'life and converſation, ſince you have 'known me, that I have been very or-'derly; have kept good hours; and 'never have lain out of your houſe but 'when I was in priſon; and then you 'know I could not help it.'

O, Lovelace! that thou hadſt heard her, or ſeen her, unknown to herſelf, on this occaſion;—not one of us could ſpeak a word.

'I shall leave the world in perfect charity,' proceeded she. And turning towards the women—'Don't be so much concerned for me, my good friends. This is all but needful preparation; and I shall be very happy.'

Then again rubbing her eyes, which she said were misty, and looking more intently round upon each, particularly on me—'God bless you all!' said she, 'how kindly you are concerned for me! Who says, I am friendless? Who says, I am abandoned, and among strangers?—Good Mr. Belford, don't be so generously humane!—Indeed,' [putting her handkerchief to her charming eyes] 'you will make me less happy, than I am sure you wish me to be.'

While we were thus solemnly engaged, a servant came with a letter from her cousin Morden:—'Then,' said she, 'he is not come himself!'

She broke it open; but every line, she said, appeared two to her: so that being unable to read it herself, she desired I would read it to her. I did so; and wished it were more consolatory to her: but she was all patient attention; tears, however, often trickling down her cheeks. By the date, it was written yesterday; and this is the substance of it.

He tells her, that the Thursday before he had procured a general meeting of her principal relations, at her father's; though, not without difficulty, her haughty brother opposing it, and, when met, rendering all his endeavours to reconcile them to her ineffectual. He censures him, as the most ungovernable young man he ever knew: some great sickness, he says, some heavy misfortune is wanted to bring him to a knowledge of himself, and of what is due from him to others; and he wishes that he were not her brother, and his cousin. Nor does he spare her father and uncles for being so implicitly led by him.

He tells her, that he parted with them all in high displeasure, and thought never more to darken any of their doors: that he declared as much to her two uncles, who came to him on Saturday, to try to accommodate with him; and who found him preparing to go to London to attend her; and that, notwithstanding their pressing entreaties, he determined so to do, and not to go with them to Harlowe Place, or to either of their own houses; and accordingly dismissed them with such an answer.

But that her noble letter, as he calls it, of Aug. 31, being brought him about an hour after their departure, he thought it might affect them as much as it did him; and give them the exalted opinion of her virtue which was so well deserved; he therefore turned his horse's head back to her uncle Antony's, instead of forwards towards London.

That accordingly arriving there, and finding her two uncles together, he re'd to them the affecting letter; which left none of the three a dry eye: that the absent, as is usual in such cases, bearing all the load, they accused her brother and sister; and besought him to put off his journey to town, till he could carry with him the blessings which she had formerly in vain solicited for; and (as they hoped) the happy tidings of a general reconciliation.'

That not doubting but his visit would be the more welcome to her, if these good ends could be obtained, he the more readily complied with their desires. But not being willing to subject himself to the possibility of receiving fresh insults from her brother, he had given her uncles a copy of her letter, for the family to assemble upon; and desired to know, as soon as possible, the result of their deliberations.

He tells her, that he shall bring her up the accounts relating to the produce of her grandfather's estate, and adjust them with her; having actually in his hands the arrears due to her from it.

He highly applauds the noble manner in which she resents your usage of her. It is impossible, he owns, that you can either deserve her, or to be forgiven. But as you do justice to her virtue, and offer to make her all the reparation now in your power; and as she is so very earnest with him not to resent that usage; and declares, that you could not have been the author of her calamities but through a strange concurrence of unhappy causes! and as he is not at a loss to know how to place to a proper account that strange concurrence; he desires her not to be apprehensive of any vindictive measures from him.

Nevertheless (as may be expected) he inveighs against you; as he finds that she gave you no advantage over her. But he forbears to enter further into this subject, he says, till he has the honour to see her, and the rather, as she seems so much determined against you. However, he cannot but say, that he thinks you a gallant man, and a man of sense; and that you have the reputation of being being thought a generous man in every inſtance but where the ſex is concerned. In ſuch, he owns, that you have taken inexcuſable liberties. And he is ſorry to ſay, that there are very few young men of fortune but who allow themſelves in the ſame. Both ſexes, he obſerves, too much love to have each other in their power: yet he hardly ever knew man or woman who was very fond of power, make a right uſe of it.

If ſhe be ſo abſolutely determined againſt marrying you, as ſhe declares ſhe is, he hopes, he ſays, to prevail upon her to take (as ſoon as her health will permit) a little tour abroad with him, as what will probably eſtabliſh it; ſince travelling is certainly the beſt phyſick for all thoſe diſorders which owe their riſe to grief or diſappointment. An abſence of two or three years will endear her to every-one, on her return, and every one to her.

He expreſſes his impatience to ſee her. He will ſet out, he ſays, the moment he knows the reſult of her family's determination; which, he doubts not, will be favourable. Nor will he wait long for that.

When I had re'd the letter through to the languiſhing lady, 'And ſo, my 'friends,' ſaid ſhe, 'have I heard of 'a patient who actually died, while five 'or ſix principal phyſicians were in a 'conſultation, and not agreed upon what 'name to give his diſtemper. The pa-'tient was an emperor, the Emperor 'Joſeph, I think.'

I aſked, if I ſhould write to her couſin, as he knew not how ill ſhe was, to haſten up?

By no means, ſhe ſaid; ſince, if he were not already ſet out, ſhe was perſuaded that ſhe ſhould be ſo low by the time he could receive my letter, and come, that his preſence would but diſcompoſe and hurry her and afflict him.

I hope, however, ſhe is not ſo very near her end. And without ſaying any more to her, when I retired, I wrote to Colonel Morden, that if he expects to ſee his beloved couſin alive, he muſt loſe no time in ſetting out. I ſent this letter by his own ſervant.

Dr. H. ſent away his letter to her father by a particular hand this morning.

Mrs. Walton the milliner has alſo juſt now acquainted Mrs. Smith, that her huſband had a letter brought by a ſpecial meſſenger from parſon Brand, within this half hour, incloſing the copy of one he had written to Mr. John Harlowe, recanting his officious one.

And as all theſe, and the copy of the lady's letter to Colonel Morden, will be with them pretty much at a time, the devil's in the family if they are not ſtruck with a remorſe that ſhall burſt open the double-barred doors of their hearts.

Will engages to reach you with this (late as it will be) before you go to reſt. He begs that I will teſtify for him the hour and the minute I ſhall give it him. It is juſt half an hour after ten.

I pretend to be (now by uſe) the ſwifteſt ſhort-hand writer in England, next to yourſelf. But were matter to ariſe every hour to write upon, and I had nothing elſe to do, I cannot write ſo faſt as you expect. And let it be remembered, that your ſervants cannot bring letters or meſſages before they are written or ſent.

J. BELFORD.

LETTER III.

DR. H. TO JAMES HARLOWE, SENIOR, ESQ.

SIR, LONDON. SEPT. 4.

IF I may judge of the hearts of other parents by my own, I cannot doubt but you will take it well to be informed, that you have yet an opportunity to ſave yourſelf and family great future regret, by diſpatching hither ſome one of it with your laſt bleſſing, and your lady's, to the moſt excellent of her ſex.

I have ſome reaſon to believe, Sir, that ſhe has been repreſented to you in a very different light from the true one. And this is it that induces me to acquaint you, that I think her, on the beſt grounds, abſolutely irreproachable in all her conduct which has paſſed under my eye, or come to my ear; and that her very misfortunes are made glorious to her, and honourable to all that are related to her, by the uſe ſhe has made of them; and by the patience and reſignation with which ſhe ſupports herſelf in a painful, lingring, and diſpiriting decay! and by the greatneſs of mind with which ſhe views her approaching diſſolution. And all this from proper motives; from motives in which a dying ſaint might glory.

She knows not that I write. I muſt indeed acknowledge, that I offered to do ſo ſome days ago, and that very preſſingly: nor did ſhe refuſe me from obſtinacy.—She ſeemed not to know what that is—But deſired me to forbear for two days only, in hopes that her newly-arrived couſin, who, as ſhe heard, soliciting for her, would be able to succeed in her favour.

I hope I shall not be thought an officious man on this occasion; but if I am, I cannot help it; being driven to write, by a kind of parental and irresistible impulse.

But, Sir, whatever you think fit to do, or permit to be done, must be speedily done; for she cannot, I verily think, live a week; and how long of that short space she may enjoy her admirable intellects to take comfort in the favours you may think proper to confer upon her, cannot be said. I am, SIR, your most humble servant,

R. H.

LETTER IV.

MR. BELFORD, TO WILLIAM MORDEN, ESQ.

SIR, LONDON, SEPT. 4.

THE urgency of the case, and the opportunity by your servant, will sufficiently apologize for this trouble from a stranger to your person; who, however, is not a stranger to your merit.

I understand you are employing your good offices with the parents of Miss Clarissa Harlowe, and other relations, to reconcile them to the most meritorious daughter and kinswoman, that ever family had to boast of.

Generously as this is intended by you, we here have too much reason to think all your solicitudes on this head will be unnecessary: for it is the opinion of every-one, who has the honour of being admitted to her presence, that she cannot live over three days: so that if you wish to see her alive, you must lose no time to come up.

She knows not that I write. I had done it sooner, if I had had the least doubt that before now she would not have received from you some news of the happy effects of your kind mediation in her behalf. I am, SIR, your most humble servant, J. BELFORD.

LETTER V.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

[IN ANSWER TO LETTER II.]

UXBRIDGE, TUESDAY MORN. BETWEEN 4 AND 5.

AND can it be, that this admirable creature will so soon leave this cursed world! For cursed I shall think it, and more cursed myself, when she is gone. O, Jack! thou who canst sit so cool, and, like Addison's angel, direct, and even enjoy, the storm, that tears up my happiness by the roots; blame me not for my impatience, however unreasonable! If thou knewest, that already I feel the torments of the damned, in the remorse that wrings my heart, on looking back upon my past actions by her, thou wouldst not be the devil thou art, to halloo on a worrying conscience, which, without thy merciless aggravations, is altogether intolerable.

I know not what I write, nor what I would write. When the company that used to delight me is as uneasy to me as my reflections are painful, and I can neither help nor divert myself, must not every servant about me partake in a perturbation so sincere!

Shall I give thee a faint picture of the horrible uneasiness with which my mind struggles? And faint indeed it must be; for nothing but outrageous madness can exceed it; and that only in the apprehension of others; since, as to the sufferer, it is certain, that actual distraction (take it out of it's lucid intervals) must be an infinitely more happy state than the state of suspence and anxiety, which often brings it on.

Forbidden to attend the dear creature, yet longing to see her, I would give the world to be admitted once more to her beloved presence. I ride towards London three or four times a day, resolving pro and con, twenty times in two or three miles; and at last ride back; and, in view of Uxbridge, loathing even the kind friend, and hospitable house, turn my horse's head again towards the town, and resolve to gratify my humour, let her take it as she will; but, at the very entrance of it, after infinite canvassings, once more alter my mind, dreading to offend and shock her, lest, by that means, I should curtail a life so precious.

Yesterday, in particular, to give you an idea of the strength of that impatience, which I cannot avoid suffering to break out upon my servants, I had no sooner dispatched Will, than I took horse to meet him on his return.

In order to give him time, I loitered about on the road, riding up this lane to the one highway, down that to the other, just as my horse pointed; all the way cursing my very being; and though so lately looking down upon all the world, wishing to change conditions with the poorest beggar that cried to me for charity as I rode by him—and throwing him him money, in hopes to obtain by his prayers the bleſſing my heart pants after.

After I had ſauntered about an hour or two, (which ſeemed three or four tedious ones) fearing I had ſlipt the fellow, I enquired at every turnpike, whether a ſervant in ſuch a livery had not paſſed through in his return from London, on a full gallop; for woe had been to the dog, had I met him on a ſluggiſh trot! And leſt I ſhould miſs him at one end of Kenſington, as he might take either the Acton or Hammerſmith road; or at the other, as he might come through the Park, or not; how many ſcore times did I ride backwards and forwards from the Palace to the Gore, making myſelf the ſubject of obſervation to all paſſengers whether on horſeback or on foot; who, no doubt, wondered to ſee a well-dreſſed and well-mounted man, ſometimes ambling, ſometimes prancing (as the beaſt had more fire than his maſter) backwards and forwards in ſo ſhort a compaſs!

Yet all this time, though longing to eſpy the fellow, did I dread to meet him, leſt he ſhould be charged with fatal tidings.

When at diſtance I ſaw any man galloping towards me, my reſemblance-forming fancy immediately made it to be him; and then my heart bounded to my mouth, as if it would have choaked me. But when the perſon's nearer approach undeceived me, how did I curſe the varlet's delay, and thee by turns! And how ready was I to draw my piſtol at the ſtranger, for having the impudence to gallop; which none but my meſſenger, I thought, had either right or reaſon to do! For all the buſineſs of the world, I am ready to imagine, ſhould ſtand ſtill on an occaſion ſo melancholy and ſo intereſting to me. Nay, for this week paſt, I could cut the throat of any man or woman I ſee laugh, while I am in ſuch dejection of mind.

I am now convinced that the wretches who fly from a heavy ſcene, labour under ten times more diſtreſs in the intermediate ſuſpence and apprehenſion, than they could have, were they preſent at it, and to ſee and know the worſt: ſo capable is fancy or imagination, the more immediate offspring of the ſoul, to outgo fact, let the ſubject be either joyous or grievous.

And hence, as I conceive, it is, that all pleaſures are greater in the expectation, or in the reflection, than in fruition; as all pains, which preſs heavy upon both parts of that unequal union by which frail mortality holds it's precarious tenure, are ever moſt acute in the time of ſuffering: for how eaſy ſit upon the reflection the heavieſt misfortunes, when ſurmounted!—But moſt eaſy, I confeſs, thoſe in which body has more concern than ſoul. This, however, is a point of philoſophy I have neither time nor head juſt now to weigh: ſo take it as it falls from a madman's pen.

Woe be to either of the wretches who ſhall bring me the fatal news that ſhe is no more! For it is but too likely that a ſhriek-owl ſo hated will never whoot or ſcream again; unleſs the ſhock, that will probably diſorder my whole frame on ſo ſad an occaſion, (by unſteadying my hand) ſhall divert my aim from his head, heart, or bowels, if it turn not againſt my own.

But, ſurely, ſhe will not, ſhe cannot yet die! Such a matchleſs excellence—

'——— whoſe mind
'Contains a world, and ſeems for all things
'fram'd,'

could not be lent to be ſo ſoon demanded back again!

But may it not be, that thou, Belford, art in a plot with the dear creature, (who will not let me attend her to convince myſelf) in order to work up my ſoul to the deepeſt remorſe; and that, when ſhe is convinced of the ſincerity of my penitence, and when my mind is made ſuch wax, as to be fit to take what impreſſion ſhe pleaſes to give it, ſhe will then raiſe me up with the joyful tidings of her returning health and acceptance of me!

What would I give to have it ſo!—And when the happineſs of hundreds, as well as the peace and reconciliation of ſeveral eminent families, depend upon her reſtoration and happineſs, why ſhould it not be ſo?

But let me preſume it will. Let me indulge my former hope, however improbable—I will; and enjoy it too.—And let me tell how extatick my delight would be on the unravelling of ſuch a plot as this!

Do, dear Belford, let it be ſo!—'And, 'O my deareſt, and ever-dear Clariſſa, 'keep me no longer in this cruel ſuſ-'pence; in which I ſuffer a thouſand 'times more than ever I made thee ſuf-'fer! Nor fear thou that I will reſent, 'or recede, on an eclairciſſement ſo de-'ſirable:

'liable: for I will adore thee for ever, 'and, without reproaching thee for the 'pangs thou haſt tortured me with, 'confeſs thee as much my ſuperior in 'noble and generous contrivances, as 'thou art in virtue and honour!'

But, once more—Should the worſt happen—ſay not what that worſt is—and I am gone from this hated iſland—Gone for ever—And may eternal—But I am crazed already—and will therefore conclude myſelf, thine more than my own, (and no great compliment neither)

LETTER VI.

MR. BELFORD, TO ROBERT LOVELACE, ESQ.

TUESDAY, SEPT. 9, IN THE MORN. AT MR. SMITH'S.

WHEN I read yours of this morning, I could not help pitying you for the account you give of the dreadful anxiety and ſuſpence you labour under. I wiſh from my heart all were to end as you are ſo willing to hope: but it will not be; and your ſuſpence, if the worſt part of your torment, as you ſay it is, will ſoon be over; but, alas! in a way you wiſh not.

I attended the lady juſt now. She is extremely ill: yet is ſhe aiming at an anſwer to her Norton's letter, which ſhe began yeſterday in her own chamber, and has writen a good deal: but in a hand not like her own fine one, as Mrs. Lovick tells me, but much larger, and the lines crooked.

I have accepted of the offer of a room adjoining to the widow Lovick's, till I ſee how matters go; but unknown to the lady; and I ſhall go home every night, for a few hours. I would not loſe a ſentence that I could gain from lips ſo inſtructive, nor the opportunity of receiving any command from her, for an eſtate.

In this my new apartment, I now write, and ſhall continue to write, as occaſions offer, that I may be the more circumſtantial: but I depend upon the return of my letters, or copies of them, on demand, that I may have together all that relates to this affecting ſtory; which I ſhall re-peruſe with melancholy pleaſure to the end of my life.

I think I will ſend thee Brand's letter to Mr. John Harlowe, recanting his baſe ſurmiſes. It is a matchleſs piece of pedantry; and may perhaps a little divert thy deep chagrin: ſome time hence at leaſt it may, if not now.

What wretched creatures are there in the world!—What ſtrangely-mixed characters!—So ſenſible and ſo ſilly at the ſame time!—What a various, what a fooliſh creature, is man!

THREE O'CLOCK.

THE lady has juſt finiſhed her letter, and has entertained Mrs. Lovick, Mrs. Smith, and me, with a noble diſcourſe on the vanity and brevity of life, to which I cannot do juſtice in the repetition: and indeed I am ſo grieved for her, that, ill as ſhe is, my intellects are not half ſo clear as hers.

A few things which made the ſtrongeſt impreſſion upon me, as well from the ſentiments themſelves, as from her manner of uttering them, I remember. She introduced them thus:

'I am thinking,' ſaid ſhe, 'what a 'gradual and happy death God Al-'mighty (bleſſed be his name) affords 'me! Who would have thought, that, 'ſuffering what I have ſuffered, and 'abandoned as I have been, with ſuch 'a tender education as I have had, I 'ſhould be ſo long a dying!—But ſee 'how by little and little it has come to 'this.—I was firſt taken off from the 'power of walking: then I took a coach '—A coach grew too violent an exer-'ciſe: then I took a chair—The priſon 'was a large DEATH-STRIDE upon me '—I ſhould have ſuffered longer elſe!—'Next, I was unable to go to church; 'then to go up or down ſtairs: now hardly 'can move from one room to another: and 'a leſs room will ſoon hold me.—My eyes 'begin to fail me, ſo that at times I 'cannot ſee to read diſtinctly; and now 'I can hardly write, or hold a pen.—'Next, I preſume, I ſhall know nobody, 'nor be able to thank any of you—I 'therefore now once more thank you, 'Mrs. Lovick—and you, Mrs. Smith '—and you, Mr. Belford—while I can 'thank you, for all your kindneſs to 'me.—And thus by little and little, in 'ſuch a gradual ſenſible death, as I am 'bleſſed with, God dies away in us, as I 'may ſay, all human ſatisfaction, in 'order to ſubdue his poor creatures to 'Himſelf.'

Thou mayeſt gueſs how affected we all were at this moving account of her progreſſive weakneſs. We heard it with wet eyes; for what with the womens example, and what with her moving eloquence, I could no more help it than they. But we were ſilent, nevertheleſs; less; and she went on applying herself to me—

'O Mr. Belford! this is a poor transitory life in it's best enjoyments. We 'flutter about here and there, with all 'our vanities about us, like painted 'butterflies, for a gay, but a very short 'season, till at last we lay ourselves 'down in a quiescent state, and turn into 'vile worms: and who knows in what 'form, or to what condition, we shall 'rise again?

'I wish you would permit me, a 'young creature, just turned of nineteen 'years of age, blooming and healthy as 'I was a few months ago, now nipt by 'the cold hand of death, to influence 'you, in these my last hours, to a life of 'regularity and repentance for any past 'evils you may have been guilty of. 'For, believe me, Sir, that now, in 'this last stage, very few things will bear 'the test, or be passed as laudable, if 'pardonable, at our own bar, much less 'at a more tremendous one, in all we 'have done, or delighted in, even in a 'life not very offensive neither, as we 'may think!—Ought we not then to 'study in our full day, before the dark 'hours approach, so to live, as may 'afford reflections that will soften the 'agony of the last moments when they 'come, and let in upon the departing 'soul a ray of Divine mercy to illumi-'nate it's passage into an awful eter-'nity?'

She was ready to faint, and chusing to lie down, I withdrew; I need not say, with a melancholy heart: and when I was got to my new taken apartment, my heart was still more affected by the sight of the solemn letter the admirable lady had so lately finished. It was communicated to me by Mrs. Lovick; who had it to copy for me; but it was not to be delivered to me till after her departure. However, I trespassed so far, as to prevail upon the widow to let me take a copy of it; which I did directly in character.

I send it inclosed. If thou canst read it, and thy heart not bleed at thy eyes, thy remorse can hardly be so deep as thou hast inclined me to think it is.

LETTER VII.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MRS. NORTON.

IN ANSWER TO LETTER I.

MY DEAREST MRS. NORTON,

I Am afraid I shall not be able to write all that is upon my mind to say to you upon the subject of your last. Yet I will try.

As to my friends, and as to the sad breakfasting, I cannot help being affected for them. What, alas! has not my mother, in particular, suffered by my rashness!—Yet to allow so much for a son!—so little for a daughter!—But all now will soon be over, as to me. I hope they will bury all their resentments in my grave.

As to your advice in relation to Mr. Belford, let me only say, that the unhappy reprobation I have met with, and my short time, must be my apology now.—I wish I could have written to my mother and my uncles as you advise. And yet, favours come so slowly from them!

The granting of one request only now remains as a desirable one from them. Which, nevertheless, when granted, I shall not be sensible of. It is that they will be pleased to permit my remains to be laid with those of my ancestors—Placed at the feet of my dear grandfather, as I have mentioned in my will. This, however, as they please. For, after all, this vile body ought not so much to engage my cares. It is a weakness—But let it be called a natural weakness, and I shall be excused; especially when a reverential gratitude shall be known to be the foundation of it.—You know, my dear woman, how my grandfather loved me. And you know how much I honoured him, and that from my very infancy to the hour of his death. How often since have I wished, that he had not loved me so well!

I wish not now, at the writing of this, to see even my cousin Morden.—O my blessed woman! My dear maternal friend! I am entering upon a better tour, than to France or Italy either!—Or even than to settle at my once beloved Dairy House!—All these prospects and pleasures, which used to be so agreeable to me in health, how poor seem they to me now!

Indeed, indeed, my dear mamma Norton, I shall be happy!—I know I shall!—I have charming forebodings of happiness already!—Tell all my dear friends, for their comfort, that I shall!—Who would not bear the punishments I have borne, to have the prospects and assurances I rejoice in!—Assurances I might not have had, were my own wishes to have been granted to me!

Neither do I want to see even you, my dear Mrs. Norton. Nevertheless I must, in justice to my own gratitude, declare that there was a time, could you have been permitted invited to come, without incurring displeasure from those whose esteem it is necessary for you to cultivate and preserve, that your presence and comfortings would have been balm to my wounded mind. But were you now, even by chance, and with reconciliatory tidings, to come, it would but add to your grief; and the sight of one I so dearly love, so happily fraught with good news, might but draw me back to wishes I have had great struggles to get above. And let me tell you for your comfort, that I have not left undone any-thing that ought to be done, either respecting mind or person; no, not to the minutest preparation: so that nothing is left for you to do for me. Every-one has her direction as to the last offices.—And my will, that I now write upon—O my dearest Mrs. Norton, all is provided!—All is ready!—And all will be as decent as it should be!

—And pray let my Miss Howe know, that by the time you will receive this, and the your signification of the contents of it, it will, in all probability, be too late for her to do me the inestimable favour, as I should once have thought it, to be me. God will have no rivals in the hearts of those he sanctifies. By various methods he deadens all other sensations, or rather absorbs them all in the love of Him.

I shall, nevertheless, love you, my mamma Norton, and my Miss Howe, whose love to me has passed the love of women, to my latest hour!—But yet, I am now above the quick sense of those pleasures, which once most delighted me: and once more I say, that I do not wish to see objects so dear to me, which might bring me back again into sense, and rival my supreme love.

TWICE have I been forced to leave off. I wished, that my last writing might be to you, or to Miss Howe, if it might not be to my dearest ma——

Mamma, I would have wrote—Is the word distinct?—My eyes are so misty!—If, when I apply to you, I break off in half-words, do you supply them—The kindest are your due.—Be sure take the kindest, to fill up chasms with, if any chasms there be—

ANOTHER breaking off!—But the new day seems to rise upon me with healing in it's wings. I have gotten, I think, a recruit of strength: spirits, I bless God, I have not of late wanted.

Let my dearest Miss Howe purchase her wedding-garments—And may all temporal blessings attend the charming preparation!—Blessings will, I make no question, notwithstanding the little cloudinesses that Mr. Hickman encounters with now-and-then, which are but prognosticks of a future golden day to him: for her heart is good, and her head not wrong.—But great merit is coy, and that coyness has not always it's foundation in pride: but if it should seem to be pride, take off the skin-deep covering, and, in her, it is noble diffidence, and a love that wants but to be assured!

Tell Mr. Hickman I write this, and write it, as I believe, with my last pen; and bid him bear a little at first, and forbear; and all the future will be crowning gratitude, and rewarding love: for Miss Howe has great sense, fine judgment, and exalted generosity; and can such a one be ungrateful or easy under those obligations which his assiduity and obligingness (when he shall be so happy as to call her his) will lay her under to him?

As for me, never bride was so ready as I am. My wedding garments are bought—And though not fine or gaudy to the sight, though not adorned with jewels, and set off with gold and silver; (for I have no beholders eyes to wish to glitter in) yet will they be the easiest, the happiest suit, that ever bridal maiden wore—for they are such as carry with them a security against all those anxieties, pains, and perturbations, which sometimes succeed to the most promising outsettings.

And now, my dear Mrs. Norton, do I wish for no other.

'O hasten, good God, if it be thy 'blessed will, the happy moment that I 'am to be decked out in this all-quiet-'ing garb! And sustain, comfort, bless, 'and protect with the all-shadowing 'wing of thy mercy, my dear parents, 'my uncles, my brother, my sister, my 'cousin Morden, my ever dear and 'ever-kind Miss Howe, my good Mrs. 'Norton, and every deserving person 'to whom they wish well!' is the ardent prayer, first and last, of every beginning hour, as the clock tells it me, (Hours now are days, nay, years) of your now not sorrowful or afflicted, but happy,

CLARISSA HARLOWE.

LETTER VIII.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

WEDN. MORN. SEPT. 6 HALF AN HOUR AFTER THREE.

I Am not the ſavage which you and my worſt enemies think me. My ſoul is too much penetrated by the contents of the letter which you incloſed in your laſt, to ſay one word more to it, than that my heart has bled over it from every vein!—I will fly from the ſubject—But what other can I chuſe, that will not be as grievous, and lead into the ſame?

I could quarrel with all the world; with thee, as well as the reſt; obliging as thou ſuppoſeſt thyſelf for writing to me hourly. How dareſt thou (though unknown to her) to preſume to take an apartment under the ſame roof with her?—I cannot bear to think, that thou ſhouldſt be ſeen, at all hours, paſſing to and repaſſing from her apartments, while I, who have ſo much reaſon to call her mine, and once was preferred by her to all the world, am forced to keep aloof, and hardly dare to enter the city where ſhe is!

If there be any-thing in Brand's letter that will divert me, haſten it to me. But nothing now will ever divert me, will ever again give me joy or pleaſure! I can neither eat, drink, nor ſleep. I am ſick of all the world.

Surely it will be better when all is over—when I know the worſt the Fates can do againſt me—Yet how ſhall I bear that worſt?—O, Belford, Belford! write it not to me! But, if it muſt happen, get ſomebody elſe to write; for I ſhall curſe the pen, the hand, the head, and the heart, employed in communicating to me the fatal tidings. But what is this ſaying, when already I curſe the whole world except her—Myſelf moſt?

In fine, I am a moſt miſerable being. Life is a burden to me. I would not bear it upon theſe terms for one week more, let what would be my lot; for already is there a hell begun in my own mind. Never more mention to me, let her or who will ſay it, the priſon—I cannot bear it—May damnation ſeize quick the accurſed woman, who could ſet death upon taking that large ſtride, as the dear creature calls it!—I had no hand in it!—But her relations, her implacable relations, have done the buſineſs. All elſe would have been got over. Never perſuade me but it would. The fire of youth, and the violence of paſſion, would have pleaded for me to good purpoſe, with an individual of the ſex, which loves to be addreſſed with paſſionate ardour, even to tumult, had it not been for that cruelty and unforgivingneſs, which (the object and the penitence conſidered) have no example, and have aggravated the heinouſneſs of my faults.

Unable to reſt, though I went not to bed till two, I diſpatch this ere the day-dawn—Who knows what this night, this diſmal night, may have produced!

I muſt after my meſſenger. I have told the varlet I will meet him, perhaps at Knightſbridge, perhaps in Piccadilly; and I truſt not myſelf with piſtols, not only on his account, but my own; for piſtols are too ready a miſchief.

I hope thou haſt a letter ready for him. He goes to thy lodgings firſt, for ſurely thou wilt not preſume to take thy reſt in an apartment near hers. If he miſs thee there, he flies to Smith's, and brings me word whether in being, or not.

I ſhall look for him through the air as I ride, as well as on horſeback; for if the prince of it ſerve me, as well as I have ſerved him, he will bring the dog by his ears, like another Habakkuk, to my ſaddle-bow, with the tidings that my heart pants after.

Nothing but the excruciating pangs the condemned ſoul feels, at it's entrance into the eternity of the torments we are taught to fear, can exceed what I now feel, and have felt for almoſt this week paſt; and mayeſt thou have a ſpice of thoſe, if thou haſt not a letter ready written for thy

LOVELACE.

LETTER IX.

MR. BELFORD, TO ROBERT LOVELACE, ESQ.

TUESDAY, SEPT. 5. SIX O'CLOCK.

THE lady remains exceedingly weak and ill. Her intellects, nevertheleſs, continue clear and ſtrong, and her piety and patience are without example. Every-one thinks this night will be her laſt. What a ſhocking thing is that to ſay of ſuch an excellence! She will not, however, ſend away her letter to her Norton, as yet. She endeavored in vain to ſuperſcribe it: ſo deſired me to do it. Her fingers will not hold her pen with the requiſite ſteadineſs. She has, I fear, written and re'd her laſt!

EIGHT O'CLOCK.

SHE is ſomewhat better than ſhe was. The doctor has been here, and thinks should hold out yet a day or two. He [illegible] her, as for some time past, only some little cordials to take when ready to faint. She seemed disappointed, when he told her she might yet live two or three days; and said, She longed for dissolution!—Life was not so easily extinguished, she saw, as some imagined. Death from grief, was, she believed, the favourite of death. 'But God's will must 'be done!'—Her only prayer was now for submission to it: for she doubted not but by the Divine Goodness she should be an happy creature, as soon as she could be divested of these rags of mortality.

Of her own accord she mentioned you; which, till then, she had avoided to do. She asked, with great serenity, where you were?

I told her where; and your motives for being so near; and read to her a few lines of yours of this morning, in which you mention your wishes to see her, your sincere affliction, and your resolution not to approach her without her consent.

I would have re'd more; but she said, 'Enough, Mr. Belford, enough! '—Poor man, does his conscience be'gin to find him!—Then need not any'body to wish him a greater punish'ment!—May it work upon him to an 'happy purpose!'

I took the liberty to say, that as she was in such a frame, that nothing now seemed capable of discomposing her, I could wish that you might have the benefit of her exhortations, which, I dared to say, while you were so seriously affected, would have a greater force upon you than a thousand sermons; and how happy you would think yourself, if you could but receive her forgiveness on your knees.

'How can you think of such a thing, 'Mr. Belford?' said she, with some emotion: 'my composure is owing, 'next to the Divine Goodness blessing 'my earnest supplications for it, to the 'not seeing him. Yet let him know, 'that I now again repeat, that I for'give him.—And may God Almighty,' clasping her fingers, and lifting up her eyes, 'forgive him too; and perfect 'his repentance, and sanctify it to him! '—Tell him I say so! And tell him, 'that if I could not say so with my 'whole heart, I should be very uneasy, 'and think that my hopes of mercy to 'myself were but weakly founded; and 'that I had still, in my harboured re'sentments, some hankerings after a life 'which he has been the cause of short'ening.'

The divine creature then turning aside her head—'Poor man!' said she, 'I once could have loved him. This 'is saying more than ever I could say 'of any other man out of my own fa'mily! Would he have permitted me 'to have been an humble instrument to 'have made him good, I think I could 'have made him happy! But tell him 'not this, if he be really penitent—It 'may too much affect him!'—There she paused.

Admirable creature!—Heavenly forgiver!—Then resuming—'But pray 'tell him, that if I could know, that 'my death might be a means to reclaim 'and save him, it would be an inex'pressible satisfaction to me!

'But let me not, however, be made 'uneasy with the apprehension of see'ing him. I cannot bear to see him!'

Just as she had done speaking, the minister, who had so often attended her, sent up his name; and was admitted.

Being apprehensive, that it would be with difficulty that you could prevail upon that impetuous spirit of yours, not to invade her in her dying hours, and of the agonies into which a surprize of this nature would throw her; I thought this gentleman's visit afforded a proper opportunity to renew the subject; and (having asked her leave) acquainted him with the topick we had been upon.

The good man urged, That some condescensions were usually expected, on these solemn occasions, from pious souls like hers, however satisfied with themselves, for the sake of shewing the world, and for example sake, that all resentments against those who had most injured them were subdued: and if she would vouchsafe to a heart so truly penitent, as I had represented Mr. Lovelace's to be, that personal pardon, which I had been pleading for, there would be no room to suppose the least lurking resentment remained; and it might have very happy effects upon the gentleman.

'I have no lurking resentment, Sir,' said she—'This is not a time for re'sentment: and you will be the rea'dier to believe me, when I can-assure 'you,' (looking at me) 'that even 'what I have most rejoiced in, the truly 'friendly love that has so long subsisted 'between my Miss Howe and her Cla'rissa, although to my last gasp it will 'be the dearest to me of all that is dear 'in this life, has already abated of it's 'fervor; has already given place to

'supremer

'supremer fervors: and shall the remembrance of Mr. Lovelace's personal insults, which I bless God, never corrupted that mind which her friendship so much delighted, be stronger in these hours with me, than the remembrance of a love as pure as the human heart ever boasted? Tell therefore the world, if you please, and (if, Mr. Belford, you think what I said to you before, not strong enough) tell the poor man, that I not only forgive him, but have such earnest wishes for the good of his soul, and that from considerations of it's immortality, that could my penitence avail for more sins than my own, my last tear should fall for him by whom I die!'

Our eyes and hands expressed to us both, what our lips could not utter.

'Say not, then,' proceeded she, 'nor 'let it be said, that my resentments are 'unsubdued!—And yet these eyes, lifted 'up to Heaven, as witness to the truth 'of what I have said, shall never, if I 'can help it, behold him more!—For 'do you not consider, Sir, how short my 'time is; what much more important 'subjects I have to employ it upon; and 'how unable I should be (so weak as I 'am) to contend even with the avowed 'pentence of a person in strong health, 'governed by passions unabated, and 'always violent?—And now I hope 'you will never urge me more on this 'subject.'

The minister said, It were pity ever to urge this plea again.

You see, Lovelace, that I did not forget the office of a friend, in endeavouring to prevail upon her to give you her last forgiveness personally. And I hope, as she is so near her end, you will not invade her in her last hours; since she must be extremely discomposed at such an interview; and it might make her leave the world the sooner for it.

This reminds me of an expression which she used on your barbarous hunting her at Smith's, on her return to her lodgings; and that with a serenity unexampled, (as Mrs. Lovick told me, considering the occasion, and the trouble given her by it, and her indisposition at the time:) 'He will not let me die de'cently,' said the angelick sufferer!—'He will not let me enter into my Ma'ker's presence, with the composure 'that is required in entering into the 'drawing-room of an earthly prince!'

I cannot, however, forbear to wish, that the heavenly creature could have prevailed upon herself, in these her last hours, to see you; and that for my sake, as well as yours: for although I am determined never to be guilty of the crimes, which, till within these few past weeks have blackened my former life; and for which, at present, I most heartily hate myself; yet should I be less apprehensive of a relapse, if (wrought upon by the solemnity which such an interview must have been attended with) you had become a reformed man: for no devil do I fear, but one in your shape.

It is now eleven o'clock at night. The lady, who retired to rest an hour ago, is, as Mrs. Lovick tells me, in a sweet slumber.

I will close here. I hope I shall find her the better for it in the morning. Yet, alas! how frail is hope! how frail is life; when we are apt to build so much on every shadowy relief: although in such a desperate case as this, sitting down to reflect, we must know, that it is but shadowy!

I will inclose Brand's horrid pedantry. And for once am aforehand with thy ravenous impatience.

LETTER X.

MR. BRAND, TO MR. JOHN WALTON.

SAT. NIGHT, SEPT. 2.

DEAR MR. WALTON,

I Am obliged to you for the very handsomely penned (and elegantly written) letter which you have sent me on purpose to do justice to the character of the younger Miss Harlowe: and yet I must tell you, that I had reason, before that came, to think (and to know indeed) that we were all wrong: and so I had employed the greatest part of this week, in drawing up an apologetical letter to my worthy patron Mr. John Harlowe, in order to set all matters right between me and them, and (as far as I could) between them and Miss. So it required little more than connection and transcribing, when I received yours; and it will be with Mr. Harlowe aforesaid to-morrow morning; and this, and the copy of that, will be with you on Monday morning.

You cannot imagine how sorry I am, that you, and Mrs. Walton, and Mrs. Barker, and I myself, should have taken matters up so lightly (judging, alas a-day! by appearance and conjecture) where character and reputation are concerned. Horace says truly—

'Et semel emissum volat irrevocabile verbum.'

That

That is, 'Words once spoken cannot be recalled.' but (Mr. Walton) they may be contradicted by other words; and we may confess ourselves guilty of a mistake; and express our concern for being mistaken; and resolve to make our mistake a warning to us for the future: and this is all that can be done; and what every worthy mind will do; and what nobody can be readier to do, than we four undesigning offenders; (as I see by your letter, on your part; and as you will see by the inclosed copy, on mine) which, if it be received as I think it ought, (and as I believe it will) must give me a speedy opportunity to see you, when I visit the lady; to whom (as you will see in it) I expect to be sent up with the olive-branch.

The matter in which we all erred, must be owned to be very nice; and (Mr. Belford's character considered) appearances ran very strong against the lady: but all that this serveth to shew, is, That in doubtful matters the wisest people may be mistaken; for so saith the poet—

'Fallitur in dubiis hominum sollertia rebus.'

If you have an opportunity, you may (as if from yourself, and unknown to me) shew the inclosed to Mr. Belford, who (you tell me) resenteth the matter very heinously; but not to let him see, or hear read, those words that relate to him, in the paragraph at the bottom of the second page, beginning ['But yet I do insist upon it,'] to the end of that paragraph; for one would not make one's self enemies you know: and I have reason to think, that this Mr. Belford is as passionate and fierce a man as Mr. Lovelace. What pity it is the lady could find no worthier a protector! You may paste those lines over with blue or black paper, before he seeth it; and if he insisteth upon taking a copy of my letter, (for he, or anybody, that seeth it, or heareth it read, will, no doubt, be glad to have by them the copy of a letter so full of the sentiments of the noblest writers of antiquity, and so well adapted, as I will be bold to say they are, to the point in hand; I say, if he insisteth upon taking a copy) let him give you the strongest assurances not to suffer it to be printed, on any account; and I make the same request to you, that you will not: for if any-thing be to be made of a man's works, who, but the author, should have the advantage? And if the Spectators, the Tatlers, the Examiners, the Guardians, and other of our polite papers, make such a strutting with a single verse, or so, by way of motto, in the front of each day's paper; and if other authors pride themselves in finding out and embellishing the title pages of their books with a verse or adage from the classical writers; what a figure would such a letter as the inclosed make so full fraught with admirable precepts, and à propos quotations, from the best authority?

I have been told, that a certain noble lord, who once sat himself down to write a pamphlet in behalf of a great minister, after taking infinite pains to no purpose to find a Latin motto, gave commission to a friend of his to offer to any one, who could help him to a suitable one, but of one or two lines, a hamper of claret. Accordingly, his lordship had a motto found him from Juvenal; which he unhappily mistaking, (not knowing Juvenal was a poet) printed as a prose sentence in his title-page.

If then one or two lines were of so much worth, (A hamper of claret! No less!) of what inestimable value would such a letter as mine be deemed?—And who knoweth but that this noble p—r, (who is now living) if he should happen to see this letter shining with such a glorious string of jewels, might give the writer a scarf, in order to have him always at hand, or be a means (some way or other) to bring him into notice? And I will be bold to say, (bad as the world is) a man of sound learning wanteth nothing but an initiation, to make his fortune.

I hope (my good friend) that the lady will not die: I shall be much grieved, if she doth; and the more, because of mine unhappy misrepresentation: so will you, for the same cause: so will her parents and friends. They are very rich and very worthy gentlefolks.

But let me tell you, by-the-by, that they had carried the matter against her so far, that I believe in my heart they were glad to justify themselves by my report: and would have been less pleased, had I made a more favourable one: and in their hearts they doat upon her. But now they are all (as I hear) inclined to be friends with her, and forgive her; her brother, as well as the rest.

But their cousin, Colonel Morden, a very fine gentleman, had had such high words with them, and they with him, that they know not how to stoop, lest it should look like being frighted into an accommodation. Hence it is, that I have taken the greater liberty to press the reconciliation; and I hope in such good season, that they will all be pleased with it: for can they have a better handle to save their pride all around, around, than by my mediation? And let me tell you, (inter nos, betwixt ourselves) very proud they all are.

By this honest means, (for by dishonest ones I would not be Archbishop of Canterbury) I hope to please every body; to be forgiven, in the first place, by the lady, (whom, being a lover of learning and learned men, I shall have great opportunities of obliging—For, when she departed from her father's house, I had but just the honour of her notice, and she seemed highly pleased with my conversation;) and next, to be thanked and respected by her parents, and all her family; as I am (I bless God for it) by my dear friend Mr. John Harlowe; who indeed is a man that professeth a great esteem for men of erudition; and who (with singular delight, I know) will run over with me the authorities I have quoted, and wonder at my memory, and the happy knack I have of recommending mine own sense of things in the words of the greatest sages of antiquity.

Excuse me, my good friend, for this seeming vanity. The great Cicero (you must have heard, I suppose) had a much greater spice of it, and wrote a long letter, begging and praying to be flattered: but if I say less of myself, than other people (who know me) say of me, I think I keep a medium between vanity and false modesty; the latter of which oftentimes gives itself the lye, when it is declaring off the compliments, that every-body gives it as it's due: an hypocrisy, as well as folly, that (I hope) I shall for ever scorn to be guilty of.

I have another reason (as I may tell to you, my old school-fellow) to make me wish for this fine lady's recovery and health; and that is (by some distant intimations) I have heard from Mr. John Harlowe, that it is very likely (because of the slur she hath received) that she will chuse to live privately and penitently—and will probably (when she cometh into her estate) keep a chaplain to direct her in her devotions and penitence—If she doth, who can stand a better chance than myself?—And as I find (by your account, as well as by every body's) that she is innocent as to intention, and is resolved never to think of Mr. Lovelace more, who knoweth what (in time) may happen?—And yet it must be after Mr. Lovelace's death, (which may possibly happen sooner than he thinketh of, by means of his detestable courses;) for after all, a man who is of publick utility, ought not (for the finest woman in the world) to lay his throat at the mercy of a man who boggleth at nothing.

I beseech you, let not this hint go further, than to yourself, your spouse, and Mrs. Barker. I know I may trust my life in your hands and theirs. There have been (let me tell ye) unlikelier things come to pass, and that with rich widows, (some of quality, truly!) whose choice, in their first marriages, hath (perhaps) been guided by motives of convenience, or mere corporalities, as I may say; but who by their second have had for their view the corporal and spiritual mingled; which is the most eligible (no doubt) to substance composed of both, as men and women are.

Nor think, (Sir) that, should such a thing come to pass, either would be disgraced, since the lady in me, would marry a gentleman and a scholar: and as to mine own honour, as the slur would bring her high fortunes down to an equivalence with my mean ones, (if fortune only, and not merit, be considered) so hath not the life of this lady, been so tainted, (either by length of time, or naughtiness of practice) as to put her on a foot with the cast Abigails that too, too often, (God knoweth) are thought good enough for a young clergyman, who, perhaps is drawn in by a poor benefice, and (if the wicked one be not quite worn out) groweth poorer and poorer upon it, by an increase of family he knoweth not whether is most his, or his noble (ignoble rather) patron's.

But all this apart, and in confidence.

I know you made at school but a small progress in languages. So I have restrained myself from many illustrations from the classicks, that I could have filled this letter with, as I have done the inclosed one: and, being at a distance, I cannot explain them to you, as I do to my friend Mr. John Harlowe; and who (after all) is obliged to me for pointing out to him many beauties of the authors I quote, which otherwise would lie concealed from him, as they must from every common observer.—But this (too) inter nos—For he would not take it well to have it known—Jays (you know, old school-fellow, jays, you know) will strut in peacock's feathers.

But whither am I running? I never know where to end, when I get upon learned topicks. And albeit I cannot compliment you with the name of a learned man; yet are you a sensible man; and (as such) must have pleasure in learned men, and in their writings.

In this confidence, (Mr. Walton) with my kind respects to the good ladies, (your spouse and sister) and in hopes, for the young lady's sake, soon to follow this long, long, long epiſtle, in perſon, I conclude myſelf your loving and faithful friend,

ELIAS BRAND.

You will, perhaps, Mr. Walton, wonder at the meaning of the lines drawn under many of the words and ſentences, (UNDERSCORING we call it;) and were my letters to be printed, thoſe would be put in a different character. Now, you muſt know, Sir, that we learned men do this to point out to the readers, who are not ſo learned, where the jet of our arguments lieth, and the emphaſis they are to lay upon thoſe words; whereby they will take in readily our ſenſe and cogency. Some pragmatical people have ſaid, that an author who doth a great deal of this, either calleth his readers fools, or tacitly condemneth his own ſtyle, as ſuppoſing his meaning would be dark without it, or that all his force lay in words. But all of thoſe with whom I have converſed in the learned way, think as I think. And to give a very pretty, though familiar illuſtration, I have conſidered a page diſtinguiſhed by different characters, as a verdant field overſpread with butter-flowers and daiſies, and other ſummer-flowers. Theſe the poets liken to enamelling—Have you not read in the poets of enamelled meads, and ſo-forth?

LETTER X'.

MR. BRAND, TO JOHN HARLOWE, ESQ.

SAT. NIGHT, SEPT. 2.

WORTHY SIR,

I AM under no ſmall concern, that I ſhould (unhappily) be the occaſion (I am ſure I intended nothing like it) of widening of differences by light miſreport, when it is the duty of one of my function (and no leſs conſiſting with my inclination) to heal and reconcile.

I have received two letters to ſet me right: one from a particular acquaintance (whom I ſet to enquire of Mr. Belford's character;) and that came on Tueſday laſt, informing me, that your unhappy niece was greatly injured in the account I had had of her, (for I had told him of it, and that with very great concern, I am ſure, apprehending it to be true.) So I then ſet about writing to you, to acknowledge the error. And had gone a good way in it, when the ſecond letter came (a very handſome one it is, both in ſtyle and penmanſhip) from my friend Mr. Walton, (though I am ſure it cannot be his inditing) expreſſing his ſorrow, and his wife's, and his ſiſter-in-law's likewiſe, for having been the cauſe of miſleading me, in the account I gave of the ſaid young lady; whom they now ſay, (upon further enquiry) they find to be the moſt unblameable, and moſt prudent, and (it ſeems) the moſt pious young lady, that ever (once) committed a great error; as (to be ſure) hers was, in leaving ſuch worthy parents and relations for ſo vile a man as Mr. Lovelace: but what ſhall we ſay?—Why, the divine Virgil tells us—

'Improbe Amor, quid non mortalia pectora cogis?'

For my part, I was but too much afraid, (for we have great opportunities, you are ſenſible, Sir, at the univerſity, of knowing human nature from books, the calm reſult of the wiſe mens wiſdom, as I may ſay—

('Haurit aquam cribro, qui diſcere vult ſine libro,') uninterrupted by the noiſe and vanities, that will mingle with perſonal converſation, which (in the turbulent world) is not to be enjoyed but over a bottle, where you have an hundred fooliſh things paſs to one that deſerveth to be remembered; I was but too much afraid, I ſay, that ſo great a ſlip might be attended with ſtill greater and worſe: for your Horace, and my Horace, the moſt charming writer that ever lived among the Pagans, (for the lyrick kind of poetry, I mean; for, to be ſure, Homer and Virgil would otherwiſe be firſt named in their way) well obſerveth, (and who underſtood human nature better than he?)—

'Nec vera virtus, cum ſemel excidit,
'Curat reponi deterioribus.'

Who, that can draw knowledge from it's fountain-head, the works of the ſages of antiquity, (improved by the comments of the moderns) but would prefer to all others the ſilent quiet life, which contemplative men lead in the ſeats of learning, were they not called out (according to their dedication) to the ſervice and inſtruction of the world?

Now, Sir, another favourite poet of mine (and not the leſs a favourite for being a Chriſtian) telleth us, that it is the cuſtom of ſome, when in a fault, to throw the blame upon the backs of others—

'—— Hominum quoque mos eſt,
'Quæ nos cunque premunt, alii ne imponere
'tergo.' MANT.

But

But I, though (in this caſe) miſled, (well intendedly, nevertheleſs, both in the miſleaders and miſled, and therefore entitled to lay hold of that plea, if anybody is ſo entitled) will not, however, be claſſed among ſuch extenuators; but (contrarily) will always keep in mind that verſe, which comforteth in miſtake, as well as inſtructeth; and which I quoted in my laſt letter—

'Errare eſt hominis, ſed non perſiſtere;'

And will own, that I was very raſh to take up with conjectures and conſequences drawn from probabilities, where (eſpecially) the character of ſo fine a lady was concerned.

Notwithſtanding, Miſs Clariſſa Harlowe (I muſt be bold to ſay) is the only young lady that ever I heard of, (or indeed read of) that, having made ſuch a falſe ſtep, ſo ſoon (of her own accord, as I may ſay) recovered herſelf, and conquered her love of the deceiver; (A great conqueſt, indeed!) and who flieth him, and reſolveth to die, rather than to be his; which now to her never-dying honour, (I am well aſſured) is the caſe—And, in juſtice to her, I am now ready to take to myſelf (with no ſmall vexation) that of Ovid—

'Heu! patior telis vulnera facta meis.'

But yet I do inſiſt upon it, that all that part of my information, which I took upon mine own perſonal enquiry, which is what relates to Mr. Belford and his character, is literally true; for there is not any-where to be met with a man of a more libertine character as to women, Mr. Lovelace excepted, than he beareth.

And ſo, Sir, I muſt deſire of you, that you will not let any blame lie upon my intention; ſince you ſee how ready I am to accuſe myſelf of too lightly giving ear to a raſh information, (not knowing it ſo to be, however:) for I depended the more upon it, as the people I had it from are very ſober, and live in the fear of God: and indeed when I wait upon you, you will ſee by their letter, that they muſt be conſcientious good people: wherefore, Sir, let me be entitled, from all your good family, to that of my laſt-named poet—

'Aſpera conſiſ verba remitte reo.'

And now, Sir, (what is much more becoming of my function) let me, inſtead of appearing with the face of an accuſer, and a raſh cenſurer, (which in my heart I have not deſerved to be thought) aſſume the character of a reconciler; and promiſe (by way of penance to myſelf for my fault) to be ſent up as a meſſenger of peace to the pious young lady; for they write me word abſolutely, (and, I believe in my heart, truly) that the doctors have given her over, and that ſhe cannot live. Alas! alas! what a ſad thing would that be, if the poor bough, that was only deſigned (as I very well know, and am fully aſſured) to be bent, ſhould be broken!

Let it not, dear Sir, ſeem to the world, that there was any-thing in your reſentments (which, while meant for reclaiming, were juſt and fit) that hath the appearance of violence, and fierce wrath, and inexorability, (as it would look to ſome, if carried to extremity, after repentance and contrition and humiliation, on the fair offender's life:) for all this while (it ſeemeth) ſhe hath been a ſecond Magdalen in her penitence, and yet not ſo bad as a Magdalen in her faults, (faulty, nevertheleſs, as ſhe hath been once, the Lord knoweth!—

'Nam vitiis nemo ſine naſcitur: optimus ille eſt
'Qui minimis urgetur,——(ſaith Horace.)

Now, Sir, if I may be named for this bleſſed employment, (for, 'Bleſſed is the peace-maker!') I will haſten to London; and (as I know Miſs had always a great regard to the function I have the honour to be of) I have no doubt of making myſelf acceptable to her, and to bring her, by ſound arguments, and good advice, into a liking of life, which muſt be the firſt ſtep to her recovery: for, when the mind is made eaſy, the body will not long ſuffer; and the love of life is a natural paſſion, that is ſoon revived, when fortune turneth about, and ſmileth.

The ſweet Lucan truly obſerveth—

'——Fatis debentibus annos
'Mors invita ſubit.'——

And now, Sir, let me tell you what ſhall be the tenor of my pleadings with her, and comfortings of her, as ſhe is, as I may ſay, a learned lady; and as I can explain to her thoſe ſentences, which ſhe cannot ſo readily conſtrue herſelf: and this in order to convince you (did you not already know my qualifications) how well qualified I am for the Chriſtian office to which I commend myſelf.

I will, IN THE FIRST PLACE, put her in mind of the common courſe of things in this ſublunary world, in which joy and ſorrow, ſorrow and joy, ſucceed one another by turns; in order to convince her, that her griefs have been but according to that common courſe of things—

'Gaudia poſt luctus veniunt, poſt gaudia luctus.'

SECONDLY, I will remind her of her own notable deſcription of ſorrow, when ſhe was once called upon to diſtinguiſh wherein ſorrow, grief, and melancholy, differed from each other; which ſhe did impromptu, by their effects, in a truly admirable manner, to the high ſatisfaction of every-one: I myſelf could not, by ſtudy, have diſtinguiſhed better, nor more conciſely—'SORROW,' ſaid ſhe, 'wears—GRIEF tears—but MELANCHOLY ſoothes.'

My inference to her ſhall be, that ſince a happy reconciliation will take place, grief will be baniſhed—ſorrow diſmiſſed—and only ſweet melancholy remain to ſoothe and indulge her contrite heart, and ſhew to all the world the penitent ſenſe ſhe hath of her great error.

THIRDLY, That her joys, when reſtored to health and favour, will be the greater, the deeper her griefs were.

'Gaudia, quæ multo parta labore, placent.'

FOURTHLY, That having really been guilty of a great error, ſhe ſhould not take impatiently the correction and anger with which ſhe hath been treated.

'Leniter, ex merito quicquid putiare ferendum
'eſt.'

FIFTHLY, That virtue muſt be eſtabliſhed by patience; as ſaith Prudentius—

'Hæc virtus vidua eſt, quam non patientia
'firmat.'

SIXTHLY, That, in the words of Horace, ſhe may expect better times, than (of late) ſhe had reaſon to look for—

'Grata ſuperveniet, quæ non ſperabitur, hora.'

SEVENTHLY, That ſhe is really now in a way to be happy, ſince, according to Ovid, ſhe can count up all her woe—

'Felix, qui patitur quæ numerare poteſt.'

And thoſe comforting lines—

'Eſtque ſerena dies poſt longos gratior imbres,
'Et poſt triſte malum gratior ipſa ſalus.'

EIGHTHLY, That, in the words of Mantuan, her parents and uncles could not help loving her all the time they were angry at her—

'Æqua tamen ſemper mens eſt, & amica voluntas,
'Sit licet in natos facies auſtera parentum.'

NINTHLY, That the ills ſhe hath met with may be turned (by the good uſe to be made of them) to her everlaſting benefit; for that—

'Cum ſurit atque ferit, Deus olim parcere quærit.'

TENTHLY, That ſhe will be able to give a fine leſſon (a very fine leſſon) to all the young ladies of her acquaintance, of the vanity of being lifted up in proſperity, and the weakneſs of being caſt down in adverſity; ſince no one is ſo high, as to be above being humbled; ſo low, as to need to deſpair: for which purpoſe the advice of Auſonius—

'Dum fortuna juvat, caveto tolli:
'Dum fortuna tonat, caveto mergi.'

I ſhall tell her, that Lucan ſaith well, when he calleth adverſity the element of patience—

'——Gaudet patientia duris.'

That—

'Fortunam ſuperat virtus, prudentia famam.'

That while weak ſouls are cruſhed by fortune, the brave mind maketh the fickle deity afraid of it—

'Fortuna fortes metuit, ignavos premit.'

ELEVENTHLY, That if ſhe take the advice of Horace—

'Fortiaque adverſis opponite pectora rebus,'

it will delight her hereafter, (as Virgil ſaith) to revolve her paſt troubles—

'——Forſan & hæc olim meminiſſe juvabit.'

And, to the ſame purpoſe, Juvenal, ſpeaking of the prating joy of mariners, after all their dangers are over—

'Gaudent ſecuri narrare pericula nautæ.'

Which ſuiting the caſe ſo well, you'll forgive me, Sir, for popping down in Engliſh metre, as the tranſlative impulſe (pardon a new word, and yet we ſcholars are not fond of authenticating new words) came upon me uncalled for—

'The ſeaman, ſafe on ſhore, with joy doth 'tell
'What cruel dangers him at ſea befel.'

With theſe, Sir, and an hundred more wiſe adages, which I have always at my fingers-end, will I (when reduced to form and method) entertain Miſs; and as ſhe is a well-read, and (I might ſay, but for this one great error) a wiſe young lady, I make no doubt but I ſhall prevail upon her, if not by mine own arguments, by thoſe of wits and capacities that have a congeniality (as I may ſay) to her own, to take heart—

'—— Nor of the laws of fate complain,
'Since, tho' it has been cloudy, now't clears
'up again.'

Oh! what wiſdom is there in theſe noble claſſical authors! A wiſe man will (upon ſearching searching into them) always find that they speak his sense of men and things. Hence it is, that they so readily occur to my memory on every occasion—Though this may look like vanity, it is too true to be omitted: and I see not why a man may not know those things of himself, which every-body seeth and saith of him; who, nevertheless, perhaps, know not half so much as he, in other matters.

I know but of one objection, Sir, that can lie against my going; and that will arise from your kind care and concern for the safety of my person, in case that fierce and terrible man, the wicked Mr. Lovelace, (of whom every-one standeth in fear) should come cross me, as he may be resolved to try once more to gain a footing in Miss's affections: but I will trust in Providence for my safety, while I shall be engaged in a cause so worthy of my function; and the more trust in it, as he is a learned man, as I am told.

Strange too, that so vile a rake (I hope he will never see this!) should be a learned man; that is to say, that a learned man should find leisure to be a rake. Although, possibly a learned man may be a sly sinner, and take opportunities, as they come in his way—Which, however, I do assure you, I never did.

I repeat, That as he is a learned man, I shall vest myself, as I may say, in classical armour; beginning meekly with him (for, Sir, bravery and meekness are qualities very consistent with each other, and in no persons so shiningly exert themselves, as in the Christian priesthood; beginning meekly with him, I say) from Ovid—

'Corpora magnanimo satis est prostrasse leoni.'

So that, if I should not be safe behind the shield of mine own prudence, I certainly should behind the shields of the ever-admirable classicks: of Horace particularly; who, being a rake (and a jovial rake too) himself, must have great weight with all learned rakes.

And who knoweth but I may be able to bring even this Goliath in wickedness, although in person but a little David myself, (armed with the slings and stones of the ancient sages) to a due sense of his errors? And what a victory would that be!

I could here, Sir, pursuing the allegory of David and Goliath, give you some of the stones (Hard arguments may be called stones, since they knock down a pertinacious opponent) which I could pelt him with, were he to be wroth with me; and this in order to take from you, Sir, all apprehensions for my life or my bones; but I forbear them till you demand them of me, when I have the honour to attend you in person.

And now (my dear Sir) what remaineth, but that having shewn you (what yet, I believe, you did not doubt) how well qualified I am to attend the lady with the olive-branch, I beg of you to dispatch me with it out of hand? For if she be so very ill, and if she should not live to receive the grace, which (to my knowledge) all the worthy family design her, how much will that grieve you all! And then, Sir, of what avail will be the eulogies you shall all, peradventure, join to give to her memory? For, as Martial wisely observeth—

'—Post cineres gloria sera venit.'

Then, as Ausonius layeth it down with equal propriety, that those favours which are speedily conferred are the most graceful and obliging.

And to the same purpose Ovid—

'Gratia ab officio, quod mora tardat, abest.'

And, Sir, whatever you do, let the lady's pardon be as ample, and as cheerfully given, as she can wish for it; that I may be able to tell her, that it hath your hands, your countenances, and your whole hearts, with it—For, as the Latin verse hath it, (and I presume to think I have not weakened its sense by my humble advice)—

'Dat bene, dat multum, qui dat cum munere vultum.'

And now, Sir, when I survey this long letter, (albeit I see it enamelled, as a beautiful meadow is enamelled by the spring or summer flowers, very glorious to behold!) I begin to be afraid that I may have tired you; and the more likely, as I have written without that method or order, which I think constituteth the beauty of good writing: which method or order, nevertheless, may be the better excused in a familiar epistle, (as this may be called) you pardoning, Sir, the familiarity of the word: but yet not altogether here, I must needs own; because this is a letter and not a letter, as I may say; but a kind of short and pithy discourse, touching upon various and sundry topics, every one of which might be a fit theme to enlarge upon, even to volumes: if this epistolary discourse (then let me call it) should be pleasing to you, (as I am inclined to think it will because of the sentiments and aphorisms of the wisest of the ancients, which glow through it like so many dazzling stars beams) I will (at my leiſure) work it up into a methodical diſcourſe; and perhaps may one day print it, with a dedication to my honoured patron, (if, Sir, I have your leave) ſingly at firſt, (but not till I have thrown out anonymouſly two or three ſmaller things, by the ſucceſs of which I ſhall have made myſelf of ſome account in the commonwealth of letters) and afterwards in my works—Not for the vanity of the thing, (however) I will ſay, but for the uſe it may be of to the publick; for (as one well obſerveth) 'Though 'glory always followeth virtue, yet it ſhould 'be conſidered only as it's ſhadow.'

'Contemnit laudem virtus, licet uſque ſequatur
'Gloria virtutem, corpus ut umbra ſuum.'

A very pretty ſaying, and worthy of all men's admiration!

And now, (moſt worthy Sir, my very good friend and patron) referring the whole to yours, and to your two brothers, and to young Mr. Harlowe's conſideration, and to the wiſe conſideration of good Mr. dam Harlowe, and her excellent daughter Miſs Arabella Harlowe; I take the liberty to ſubſcribe myſelf, what I truly am, and ever ſhall delight to be, in all caſes, and at all times, your and their moſt ready and obedient as well as faithful ſervant,

LETTER XII.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

[IN ANSWER TO LETTER XVII.]

WEDN. MORN. SEPT. 6.

AND is ſhe ſomewhat better?—Bleſſings upon thee without number or meaſure! Let her ſtill be better and better! Tell me ſo at leaſt, if ſhe be not ſo: for thou knoweſt not what a joy that poor temporary reprieve, that ſhe will hold out yet a day or two, gave me.

But who told this hard-hearted and death-pronouncing doctor, that ſhe will hold it no longer? By what warrant ſays he this? What preſumption in theſe parading ſolemn fellows of a college, which will be my contempt to the lateſt hour of my life, if this brother of it (eminent as he is deemed to be) cannot work an ordinary miracle in her favour, or rather in mine!

Let me tell thee, Belford, that already he deſerves the utmoſt contempt, for ſuffering this charming clock to run down ſo low. What muſt be his art, if it could not wind it up in a quarter of the time he has attended her, when, at his firſt viſits, the ſprings and wheels of life and motion were ſo good, that they ſeemed only to want common care and oiling!

I am obliged to you for endeavouring to engage her to ſee me. 'Twas acting like a friend. If ſhe had vouchſafed me that favour, ſhe ſhould have ſeen at her feet the moſt abject adorer that ever kneeled to juſtly offended beauty.

What ſhe bid you, and what ſhe forbid you, to tell me; (the latter for tender conſiderations) That ſhe forgives me; and that, could ſhe have made me a good man, ſhe could have made me a happy one! That ſhe even loved me! At ſuch a moment to own that ſhe once loved me! Never before loved any man! That ſhe prays for me! That her laſt tear ſhould be ſhed for me, could ſhe by it ſave a ſoul, doomed, without her, to perdition!—O, Belford! Belford! I cannot bear it!—What a dog, what a devil have I been to a goodneſs ſo ſuperlative!—Why does ſhe not inveigh againſt me?—Why does ſhe not execrate me?—O the triumphant ſubduer! Ever above me!—And now to leave me ſo infinitely below her!

'Marry and repair, at any time.' This, wretch that I was! was my plea to myſelf To give her a lowering ſenſibility; to bring her down from among the ſtars which her beamy head was ſurrounded by, that my wife, ſo greatly above me, might not deſpiſe me; this was one of my reptile motives, owing to my more reptile envy, and to my conſciouſneſs of inferiority to her!—Yet ſhe, from ſtep to ſtep, from diſtreſs to diſtreſs, to maintain her ſuperiority; and, like the ſun, to break out upon me with the greater refulgence for the clouds that I had contrived to caſt about her—And now to eſcape me thus!—No power left me to repair her wrongs!—No alleviation to my ſelf-reproach!—No dividing of blame with her!

Tell her, O tell her, Belford, that her prayers and wiſhes, her ſuperlatively generous prayers and wiſhes, ſhall not be vain: that I can, and do repent—and long have repented—Tell her of my frequent deep remorſes—It was impoſſible that ſuch remorſes ſhould not at laſt produce effectual remorſe—Yet ſhe muſt not leave me—She muſt live, if ſhe would wiſh to have my contrition trition perfect—For what can deſpair produce?

I WILL do every-thing you would have me do, in the return of your letters. You have infinitely obliged me by this laſt, and by preſſing for an admiſſion for me, though it ſucceeded not.

Once more, how could I be ſuch a villain to ſo divine a creature! Yet love her all the time, as never man loved woman!—Curſe upon my contriving genius! Curſe upon my intriguing head, and upon my ſeconding heart!—To ſport with the fame, with the honour, with the life, of ſuch an angel of a woman!—O my damned incredulity! That, believing her to be a woman, I muſt hope to find her a woman! On my incredulity, that there could be ſuch virtue (virtue for virtue's ſake) in the ſex, founded I my hope of ſucceeding with her.

But ſay not, Jack, that ſhe muſt leave us yet. If ſhe recover, and if I can but re-obtain her favour, then indeed, will life be life to me. The world never ſaw ſuch an huſband as I will make. I will have no will but hers. She ſhall conduct me in all my ſteps. She ſhall open and direct my proſpects, and turn every motion of my heart as ſhe pleaſes.

You tell me, in your letter, that at eleven o'clock ſhe had ſweet reſt; and my ſervant acquaints me, from Mrs. Smith, that ſhe has had a good night. What hopes does this fill me with! I have given the fellow five guineas for his good news, to be divided between him and his fellow-ſervant.

Dear, dear Jack! confirm this to me in thy next—For Heaven's ſake do!—Tell the doctor I will make him a preſent of a thouſand guineas if he recover her. Aſk if a conſultation be neceſſary.

Adieu, dear Belford! Confirm, I beſeech thee, the hopes that now, with ſovereign gladneſs, have taken poſſeſſion of a heart, that, next to hers, is Thine.

LETTER XIII.

MR. BELFORD, TO ROBERT LOVELACE, ESQ.

WED. MORN. EIGHT O'CLOCK, (6 SEPT.)

YOUR ſervant arrived here before I was ſtirring. I ſent him to Smith's to enquire how the lady was; and ordered him to call upon me when he came back. I was pleaſed to hear ſhe had tolerable reſt. As ſoon as I had diſpatched him with the letter I had written over night, I went to attend her.

I found her up, and dreſſed; in a white ſattin night-gown. Ever elegant; but now more ſo, than I had ſeen her for a week paſt: her aſpect ſerenely cheerful.

She mentioned the increaſed dimneſs of her eyes, and the tremor which had invaded her limbs. 'If this be dying,' ſaid ſhe, 'there is nothing at all ſhock-'ing in it. My body hardly ſenſible of 'pain, my mind at eaſe, my intellects 'clear and perfect as ever. What a 'good and gracious God have I!—For 'this is what I always prayed for.'

I told her, It was not ſo ſerene with you.

'There is not the ſame reaſon for it,' replied ſhe. 'Tis a choice comfort, Mr. 'Belford, at the winding up of our 'ſhort ſtory, to be able to ſay, I have 'rather ſuffered injuries myſelf, than of-'fered them to others. I bleſs God, 'though I have been unhappy, as the 'world deems it, and once I thought 'more ſo than at preſent I think I ought 'to have done; ſince my calamities 'were to work out for me my ever-'laſting happineſs; yet have I not wil-'fully made any one creature ſo. I 'have no reaſon to grieve for any-thing 'but for the ſorrow I have given my 'friends.

'But pray, Mr. Belford, remember 'me in the beſt manner to my couſin 'Morden; and deſire him to comfort 'them, and to tell them, that all would 'have been the ſame, had they accepted 'of my true penitence, as I wiſh and as 'I truſt the Almighty has done.'

I was called down, it was to Harry, who was juſt returned from Miſs Howe's, to whom he carried the lady's letter. The ſtupid fellow, being bid to make haſte with it, and return as ſoon as poſſible, ſtaid not till Miſs Howe had it, ſhe being at the diſtance of five miles, although Mrs. Howe would have had him ſtay, and ſent a man and horſe purpoſely with it to her daughter.

WEDNESDAY MORNING, 10 O'CLOCK.

THE poor lady is juſt recovered from a fainting fit, which has left her at death's door. Her late tranquillity and freedom from pain ſeemed but a lightening, as Mrs. Lovick and Mrs. Smith call it.

By my faith, Lovelace, I had rather part part with all the friends I have in the world, than with this lady. I never knew what a virtuous, a holy friendſhip, as I may call mine to her, was before. But to be ſo new to it, and to be obliged to forego it ſo ſoon, what an affliction! Yet, thank Heaven, I loſe her not by my own fault!—But 'twould be barbarous not to ſpare thee now.

She has ſent for the divine who viſited her before, to pray with her.

LETTER XIV.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

KENSINGTON, WEDNESDAY NOON.

LIKE Æſop's Traveller, thou bloweſt hot and cold, life and death, in the ſame breath, with a view, no doubt, to diſtract me. How familiarly doſt thou uſe the words, dying, dimneſs, tremor! Never did any mortal ring ſo many changes on ſo few bells. Thy true father, I dare ſwear, was a butcher, or an undertaker, by the delight thou ſeemeſt to take in ſcenes of death and horror. Thy barbarous reflection, that thou loſeſt her not by thy own fault, is never to be forgiven. Thou haſt but one way to atone for the torments thou giveſt me, and that is, by ſending me word that ſhe is better, and will recover. Whether it be true or not, let me be told ſo, and I will go abroad rejoicing and believing it, and my wiſhes and imaginations ſhall make out the reſt.

If ſhe live but one year, that I may acquit myſelf to myſelf, (no matter for the world!) that her death is not owing to me, I will compound for the reſt.

Will neither vows nor prayers ſave her! I never prayed in my life, put all the years of it together, as I have done for this fortnight paſt: and I have moſt ſincerely repented of all my baſeneſs to her—And will nothing do?

But after all, if ſhe recover not, this reflection muſt be my comfort, and it is truth; That her departure will be owing rather to wilfulneſs, to downright female wilfulneſs, than to any other cauſe.

It is difficult for people who purſue the dictates of a violent reſentment, to ſtop where firſt they deſigned to ſtop.

I have the charity to believe, that even James and Arabella Harlowe, at firſt, intended no more by the confederacy they formed againſt this their angel ſiſter, than to diſgrace and keep her down, leſt (ſordid wretches!) their uncles ſhould follow the example her grandfather had ſet, to their detriment.

So this lady, as I ſuppoſe, intended only at firſt to vex and plague me; and, finding ſhe could do it to purpoſe, her deſire of revenge inſenſibly became ſtronger in her than the deſire of life: and now ſhe is willing to die, as an event which ſhe thinks will cut my heart-ſtrings aſunder. And ſtill, the more to be revenged, puts on the Chriſtian, and forgives me.

But I'll have none of her forgiveneſs! My own heart tells me, I do not deſerve it; and I cannot bear it!—And what is it but a mere verbal forgiveneſs, as oſtentatiouſly as cruelly given with a view to magnify herſelf, and wound me deeper! A little, dear, ſpecious—But let me ſtop—leſt I blaſpheme!

READING over the above, I am aſhamed of my ramblings: but what wouldeſt have me do?—Seeſt thou not that I am but ſeeking to run out of myſelf, in hope to loſe myſelf; yet, that I am unable to do either!

If ever thou lovedſt but half ſo fervently as I love—But of that thy heavy ſoul is not capable.

Send me word by the next, I conjure thee, in the names of all her kindred ſaints and angels, that ſhe is living, and likely to live!—If thou ſendeſt ill news, thou wilt be anſwerable for the conſequence, whether it be fatal to the meſſenger, or to thy

LOVELACE.

LETTER XV.

MR. BELFORD, TO ROBERT LOVELACE, ESQ.

WEDNESDAY, 11 O'CLOCK.

DR. H. has juſt been here. He tarried with me till the miniſter had done praying by the lady; and then we were both admitted. Mr. Goddard, who came while the doctor and the clergyman were with her, went away with them when they went. They took a ſolemn and everlaſting leave of her, as I have no ſcruple to ſay; bleſſing her, and being bleſſed by her: and wiſhing (when it came to their lot) for an exit, as happy as hers is likely to be.

She had again earneſtly requeſted of the doctor his opinion how long it was now probable that ſhe could continue: and he told her, that he apprehended ſhe would hardly ſee to-morrow night. She ſaid, She ſhould number the hours with greater pleaſure than ever ſhe numbered numbered any in her life, on the moſt joyful occaſion.

How unlike poor Belton's laſt hours, hers! See the infinite difference in the effects, on the ſame awful and affecting occaſion, between a good and a bad conſcience!

This moment a man is come from Miſs Howe with a letter. Perhaps I ſhall be able to ſend you the contents.

She endeavoured ſeveral times with earneſtneſs, but in vain, to read the letter of her dear friend. The writing, ſhe ſaid, was too fine, for her groſſer ſight, and the lines ſtaggered under her eye. And indeed ſhe trembled ſo, ſhe could not hold the paper: and at laſt deſired Mrs. Lovick to read it to her, the meſſenger waiting for an anſwer.

Thou wilt ſee, in Miſs Howe's letter, how different the expreſſion of the ſame impatience, and paſſionate love, is, when dictated by the gentler mind of a woman, from that which reſults from a mind ſo boiſterous and knotty, as thine. For Mrs. Lovick will tranſcribe it; and I ſhall ſend it—To be re'd in this place, if thou wilt.

MISS HOWE, TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

'TUESDAY, SEPT. 5.

'O MY DEAREST FRIEND!

'WHAT will become of your poor 'Anna Howe! I ſee by your 'writing, as well as read by your own 'account, (which, were you not very, 'very ill, you would have touched more 'tenderly) how it is with you! Why 'have I thus long delayed to attend 'you! Could I think, that the com-'fortings of a faithful friend were as 'nothing to a gentle mind in diſtreſs, 'that I could be prevailed upon to for-'bear viſiting you ſo much as once in 'all this time! I, as well as every-body 'elſe, to deſert and abandon my dear 'creature to ſtrangers! What will be-'come of me, if you be as bad as my 'apprehenſions make you!

'I will ſet out this moment, little 'as the encouragement is that you give 'me to do ſo! My mother is willing I 'ſhould! Why, O why, was ſhe not be-'fore willing!

'Yet ſhe perſuades me too (leſt I 'ſhould be fatally affected were I to find 'my fears too well juſtified) to wait the 'return of this meſſenger, who rides 'our ſwifteſt horſe.—God ſpeed him 'with good news to me.—Elſe—But, 'Oh! my deareſt, deareſt friend, what 'elſe!—One line from your own hand 'by him!—Send me but one line to bid 'me attend you! I will ſet out the 'moment, the very moment, I receive 'it. I am now actually ready to do 'ſo! And if you love me, as I love 'you, the ſight of me will revive you 'to my hopes.—But why, why, when 'I can think this, did I not go up 'ſooner!

'Bleſſed Heaven! deny not to my 'prayers, my friend, my admoniſher, 'my adviſer, at a time ſo critical to my-'ſelf.

'But methinks, your ſtyle and ſenti-'ments are too well connected, too full 'of life and vigour, to give cauſe for ſo 'much deſpair as your ſtaggering pen 'ſeems to forbode.

'I am ſorry I was not at home [I 'muſt add thus much, though the ſer-'vant is ready mounted at the door] 'when Mr. Belford's ſervant came with 'your affecting letter. I was at Miſs 'Lloyd's. My mamma ſent it to me; 'and I came home that inſtant. But he 'was gone. He would not ſtay, it ſeems. 'Yet I wanted to aſk him an hundred 'thouſand queſtions. But why delay I 'thus my meſſenger? I have a multi-'tude of things to ſay to you—To ad-'viſe with you about!—You ſhall di-'rect me in every-thing. I will obey 'the holding up of your finger. But, if 'you leave me—what is the world, or 'any-thing in it, to your

'ANNA HOWE?'

The effect this letter had on the lady, who is ſo near the end which the fair writer ſo much apprehends and deplores, obliged Mrs. Lovick, to make many breaks in reading it, and many changes of voice.

'This is a friend,' ſaid the divine lady, (taking the letter in her hand, and kiſſing it) 'worth wiſhing to live 'for.—O my dear Anna Howe! How 'uninterruptedly ſweet and noble has 'been our friendſhip!—But we ſhall one 'day meet (and this hope muſt comfort 'us both) never to part again! Then, 'diveſted of the ſhades of body, ſhall 'we be all light and all mind!—Then 'how unalloyed, how perfect, will be 'our friendſhip! Our love then will 'have one and the ſame adorable ob-'ject, and we ſhall enjoy it and each 'other to all eternity!'

She ſaid, her dear friend was ſo earneſt for a line or two, that ſhe fain would write if ſhe could: and ſhe tried; but to no purpose. She could dictate, however, she believed; and desired Mrs. Lovick would take pen and paper. Which she did, and then she dictated to her. I would have withdrawn; but at her desire staid.

She wandered a good deal, at first. She took notice that she did. And when she got into a little train, not pleasing herself, she apologized to Mrs. Lovick for making her begin again and again; and said, that the third time should go, let it be as it would.

She dictated the farewel part, without hesitation; and when she came to the blessing and subscription, she took the pen, and dropping on her knees, supported by Mrs. Lovick, wrote the conclusion; but Mrs. Lovick was forced to guide her hand.

You will find the sense surprizingly entire, her weakness considered.

I made the messenger wait, while I transcribed it. I have endeavoured to imitate the subscriptive part; and in the letter made pauses, where, to the best of my remembrance, she paused. In nothing that relates to this admirable lady, can I be too minute.

'WEDN. NEAR 3 O'CLOCK.

'MY DEAREST MISS HOWE,

'YOU must not be surprized—nor 'grieved—that Mrs. Lovick 'writes for me. Although I cannot 'obey you, and write with my pen, yet 'my heart writes by hers—Accept it so '—It is the nearest to obedience I can!

'And now, what ought I to say? 'What can I say?—But why should you 'not know the truth? Since soon you 'must—Very soon.

'Know then, and let your tears be 'those, if of pity, of joyful pity! for 'I permit you to shed a few, to em'balm, as I may say a fallen blossom. '—Know then, that the good doctor, 'and the pious clergyman, and the 'worthy apothecary, have just now—'with joint benedictions—taken their 'last leave of me: and the former bids 'me hope—Do, my dearest, let me say 'hope—hope for my enlargement be'fore to-morrow's sun set.

'Adieu, therefore, my dearest friend! '—Be this your consolation, as it is 'mine, that in God's good time we 'shall meet in a blessed eternity, never 'more to part!—Once more, then, a'dieu—and be happy!—Which a ge'nerous nature cannot be, unless—to 'it's power—it makes others so too.

'God for ever bless you! prays, 'dropt on my bended knees, although 'supported upon them, your obliged, 'grateful, affectionate,

'CL. HARLOWE.'

When I had transcribed and sealed this letter, by her direction, I gave it to the messenger myself; who told me that Miss Howe waited for nothing but his return, to set out for London.

Thy servant is just come; so I will close here. Thou art a merciless master. The two fellows are battered to death by thee, to use a female word; and all female words, though we are not sure of their derivation, have very significant meanings. I believe, in their hearts, they wish the angel in the heaven that is ready to receive her, and thee at the proper place, that there might be an end to their flurries; another word of the same gender.

What a letter hast thou sent me—Poor Lovelace!—is all the answer I will return.

Five o'clock.] Colonel Morden is this moment arrived.

LETTER XVI.

MR. BELFORD. IN CONTINUATION.

EIGHT IN THE EVENING.

I Had but just time, in my former, to tell you, that Colonel Morden was arrived. He was on horseback, attended by two servants, and alighted at the door, just as the clock struck five. Mrs. Smith was then below in her back shop, weeping, her husband with her, who was as much affected as she; Mrs. Lovick having left them a little before, in tears likewise; for they had been bemoaning one another; joining in opinion, that the admirable lady would not live the night over. She had told them, it was her opinion too, from some numbnesses, which she called the forerunners of death, and from an increased inclination to doze.

The colonel, as Mrs. Smith told me afterwards, asked with great impatience, the moment he alighted, how Miss Harlowe was? She answered, alive: but, she feared, drawing on apace. 'Good God!' said he, with his hands and eyes lifted up! 'Can I see her? My name is 'Morden. I have the honour to be 'nearly related to her.—Step up, pray; 'and let her know [She is sensible, I 'hope] that I am here. Who is with her?

'Nobody but her nurse, and Mrs. 'Lovick, a widow gentlewoman, who 'is

'is as careful of her, as if she were her 'mother.'

'And more careful too,' interrupted he, 'or she is not careful at all——'

'Except a gentleman be with her, 'one Mr. Belford,' continued Mrs. Smith, 'who has been the best friend 'she has had.'

'If Mr. Belford be with her, surely 'I may—But pray step up, and let Mr. 'Belford know, that I shall take it for a 'favour to speak with him first.'

Mrs. Smith came up to me in my new apartment. I had but just dispatched your servant, and was asking her nurse if I might be again admitted? Who answered, that she was dozing in the elbow-chair, having refused to lie down, saying, she should soon, she hoped, lie down for good.

The colonel, who is really a fine gentleman, received me with great politeness. After the first compliments, 'My 'kinswoman, Sir,' said he, 'is more o'bliged to you than to any of her own 'family. For my part, I have been en'deavouring to move so many rocks in 'her favour; and, little thinking the 'dear creature so very bad, have neg'lected to attend her, as I ought to 'have done the moment I arrived; and 'would, had I known how ill she was, 'and what a task I should have had 'with the family—But, Sir, your friend 'has been excessively to blame; and 'you being so intimately his friend, has 'made her fare the worse for your civi'lities to her.—But are there no hopes 'of her recovery?'

'The doctors have left her with the 'melancholy declaration, that there are 'none.'

'Has she had good attendance, Sir? 'A skilful physician: I hear these good 'folks have been very civil and oblig'ing to her.'

'Who could be otherwise?' said Mrs. Smith, weeping: 'she is the 'sweetest lady in the world!'

'The character,' said the colonel, lifting up his eyes and one hand, 'that 'she has from every living creature!—'Good God! How could your accursed 'friend—'

'And how could her cruel parents?' interrupted I.—'We may as easily ac'count for him, as for them.'

'Too true!' returned he, 'the vile'ness of the profligates of our sex con'sidered, whenever they can get any of 'the other into their power.'

I satisfied him about the care that had been taken of her, and told him of the friendly and even paternal attendance she had had from Dr. H. and Mr. Goddard.

He was impatient to attend her, having not seen her, as he said, since she was twelve years old; and that then she gave promises of being one of the finest women in England.

'She was so,' replied I, 'a very few 'months ago: and, though emaciated, 'she will appear to you to have confirm'ed those promises: for her features 'are so regular and exact, her propor'tion so fine, and her manner so inimi'tably graceful, that were she only skin 'and bone, she must be a beauty.'

Mrs. Smith, at his request, stept up, and brought us down word, that Mrs. Lovick and her nurse were with her; and that she was in so found a sleep, leaning upon the former in her elbow-chair, that she neither heard her enter the room, nor go out. The colonel begged, if not improper, that he might see her, though sleeping. He said, that his impatience would not let him stay till she awaked. Yet he would not have her disturbed; and should be glad to contemplate her sweet features, when she saw not him; and asked, if she thought he could not go in, and come out, without disturbing her?

She believed he might, she answered; for her chair's back was towards the door.

He said, he would take care to withdraw, if she awoke, that his sudden appearance might not surprize her.

Mrs. Smith, stepping up before us, bid Mrs. Lovick and the nurse not stir, when we entered: and then we went up softly together.

We beheld the lady in a charming attitude. Dressed, as I told you before, in her virgin white, she was sitting in her elbow-chair, Mrs. Lovick close by her, in another chair, with her left arm round her neck, supporting it, as it were; for, it seems, the lady had bid her do so, saying, she had been a mother to her, and she would delight herself in thinking she was in her mamma's arms; for she found herself drowsy; perhaps, she said, for the last time she should be so.

One fated cheek rested upon the good woman's bosom, the kindly warmth of which had overspread it with a faint, but charming flush; the other paler, and hollow, as if already iced over by death. Her hands white as the lily, with her meandring veins more transparently blue than ever I had seen even hers; (veins ſo ſoon, alas! to be choaked up by the congealment of that purple ſtream, which already ſo languidly creeps rather than flows through them!) her hands hanging lifeleſsly, one before her, the other graſped by the right-hand of the kind widow, whoſe tears bedewed the ſweet face which her motherly boſom ſupported, though unfelt by the fair ſleeper; and either inſenſibly to the good woman, or what ſhe would not diſturb her to wipe off, or to change her poſture: her aſpect was ſweetly calm and ſerene: and though ſhe ſtarted now-and-then, yet her ſleep ſeemed eaſy; her breath indeed ſhort and quick; but tolerably free, and not like that of a dying perſon.

In this heart-moving attitude ſhe appeared to us when we approached her, and came to have her lovely face before us.

The colonel, ſighing often, gazed upon her with his arms folded, and with the moſt profound and affectionate attention; till at laſt, on her ſtarting, and fetching her breath with greater difficulty than before, he retired to a ſcreen, that was drawn before her houſe, as ſhe calls it, which, as I have heretofore obſerved, ſtands under one of the windows. This ſcreen was placed there, at the time ſhe found herſelf obliged to take to her chamber; and in the depth of our concern, and the fulneſs of other diſcourſe at our firſt interview, I had forgotten to apprize the colonel of what he would probably ſee.

Retiring thither, he drew out his handkerchief, and overwhelmed with grief, ſeemed unable to ſpeak: but, on caſting his eye behind the ſcreen, he ſoon broke ſilence; for, ſtruck with the ſhape of the coffin, he lifted up a purpliſh-coloured cloth that was ſpread over it, and, ſtarting back, 'Good God!' ſaid he, 'what's here?'

Mrs. Smith ſtanding next him, 'Why,' ſaid he, with great emotion, 'is my couſin ſuffered to indulge her ſad reflections with ſuch an object before her?'

'Alas! Sir,' replied the good woman, 'who ſhould controul her? We 'are all ſtrangers about her, in a manner: and yet we have expoſtulated 'with her upon this ſad occaſion.'

'I ought,' ſaid I, (ſtepping ſoftly up to him, the lady again falling into a doze) 'to have apprized you of this. I was 'here when it was brought in, and 'never was ſo ſhocked in my life. But 'ſhe had none of her friends about her, 'and no reaſon to hope for any of them 'to come near her; and, aſſured ſhe 'ſhould not recover, ſhe was reſolved 'to leave as little as poſſible, eſpecially 'as to what related to her perſon, to 'her executor. But it is not a ſhocking 'object to her, though it be to every-'body elſe.'

'Curſe upon the hard-heartedneſs of 'thoſe,' ſaid he, 'who occaſioned her 'to make ſo ſad a proviſion for herſelf! 'What muſt her reflections have been, 'all the time ſhe was thinking of it, and 'giving orders about it? And what muſt 'they be, every time ſhe turns her head 'towards it? Theſe uncommon genius's '—But indeed ſhe ſhould have been con-'trouled in it, had I been here.'

The lady fetched a profound ſigh, and, ſtarting, it broke off our talk; and the colonel then withdrew farther behind the ſcreen, that his ſudden appearance might not ſurprize her.

'Where am I?' ſaid ſhe. 'How 'drowſy I am! How long have I dozed? '—Don't go, Sir,' (for I was retiring.) 'I am very ſtupid, and ſhall be more 'and more ſo, I ſuppoſe.'

She then offered to raiſe herſelf; but being ready to faint through weakneſs, was forced to ſit down again, reclining her head on her chair back; and, after a few moments, 'I believe now, my 'good friends,' ſaid ſhe, 'all your kind 'trouble will ſoon be over. I have ſlept, 'but am not refreſhed, and my fingers 'ends ſeem numbed—have no feeling!' (holding them up)—'Tis time to ſend 'the letter to my good Norton.'

'Shall I, Madam, ſend my ſervant 'poſt with it?'

'O no, Sir, I thank you. It will 'reach the dear woman too ſoon (as ſhe 'will think) by the poſt.'

I told her this was not poſt-day.

'Is it Wedneſday ſtill,' ſaid ſhe: 'Bleſs me! I know not how the time 'goes: but very tediouſly, 'tis plain. 'And now I think I muſt ſoon take to 'my bed. All will be moſt conveniently, 'and with leaſt trouble, over there—'Will it not, Mrs. Lovick?—I think, 'Sir,' turning to me, 'I have left nothing 'to theſe laſt incapacitating hours. No-'thing either to ſay or do. I bleſs God, 'I have not. If I had, how unhappy 'ſhould I be! Can you, Sir, remind me 'of any-thing neceſſary to be done or 'ſaid to make your office eaſy?'

'If, Madam, your couſin Morden 'ſhould come, you would be glad to ſee 'him, I preſume?'

'I am too weak to wiſh to ſee my 'couſin now. It would but diſcompoſe 'me,'

'me, and him too. Yet, if he come 'while I can ſee, I will ſee him, were it 'but to thank him for former favours, 'and for his preſent kind intentions to 'me. Has any-body been here from 'him?'

'He has called, and will be here, 'Madam, in half an hour; but he feared 'to ſurprize you.'

'Nothing can ſurprize me now, ex'cept my mamma were to favour me 'with her laſt bleſſing in perſon. That 'would be a welcome ſurprize to me 'even yet. But did my couſin come 'purpoſely to town to ſee me?'

'Yes, Madam. I took the liberty to 'let him know, by a line laſt Monday, 'how ill you were.'

'You are very kind, Sir. I am and 'have been greatly obliged to you. But 'I think I ſhall be pained to ſee him 'now, becauſe he will be concerned to 'ſee me. And yet, as I am not ſo ill as 'I ſhall preſently be—the ſooner he 'comes, the better. But if he come, 'what ſhall I do about the ſcreen? He 'will chide me, very probably; and I 'cannot bear chiding now. Perhaps,' [leaning upon Mrs. Lovick and Mrs. Smith] 'I can walk into the next apart'ment to receive him.'

She motioned to riſe; but was ready to faint again, and forced to ſit ſtill.

The colonel was in a perfect agitation behind the ſcreen, to hear this diſcourſe; and twice, unſeen by his couſin, was coming from it towards her; but retreated, for fear of ſurprizing her too much.

I ſtept to him, and favoured his retreat; ſhe only ſaying, 'Are you going, 'Mr. Belford? Are you ſent for down? 'Is my couſin come?' For ſhe heard ſomebody ſtep ſoftly acroſs the room, and thought it to be me; her hearing being more perfect than her ſight.

I told her, I believed he was; and ſhe ſaid, 'We muſt make the beſt of it, 'Mrs. Lovick—and Mrs. Smith.—I 'ſhall otherwiſe moſt grievouſly ſhock 'my poor couſin: for he loved me dear'ly once. Pray give me a few of the 'doctor's laſt drops in water, to keep 'up my ſpirits for this one interview; 'and that is all, I believe, that can con'cern me now.'

The colonel (who heard all this) ſent in his name; and I, pretending to go down to him, introduced the afflicted gentleman; ſhe having firſt ordered the ſcreen to be put as cloſe to the window as poſſible, that he might not ſee what was behind it; while he, having heard what ſhe had ſaid about it, was determined to take no notice of it.

He folded the angel in his arms as ſhe ſat, dropping down on one knee; for, ſupporting herſelf upon the two elbows of the chair, ſhe attempted to riſe, but could not. 'Excuſe, my dear couſin,' ſaid ſhe, 'excuſe me, that I cannot 'ſtand up—I did not expect this favour 'now. But I am glad of this opportu'nity to thank you for all your gene'rous goodneſs to me.'

'I never, my beſt-beloved and dear'eſt couſin,' ſaid he, (with eyes run'ning over) 'ſhall forgive myſelf, that I 'did not attend you ſooner. Little did 'I think you were ſo ill; nor do any of 'your friends believe it. If they did—'

'If they did,' repeated ſhe, interrupting him, 'I ſhould have had more com'paſſion from them. I am ſure I ſhould. 'But pray, Sir, how did you leave 'them? Are you reconciled to them? 'If you are not, I beg, if you love your 'poor Clariſſa, that you will: for every 'widened difference augments but my 'fault; ſince that is the foundation of 'all.'

'I had been expecting to hear from 'them in your favour, my dear couſin,' ſaid he, 'for ſome hours, when this 'gentleman's letter arrived, which haſ'tened me up; but I have the account 'of your grandfather's eſtate to make 'up with you, and have bills and drafts 'upon their banker for the ſums due to 'you; which they deſire you may re'ceive, leſt you ſhould have occaſion for 'money. And this is ſuch an earneſt 'of an approaching reconciliation, that 'I dare to anſwer for all the reſt being 'according to your wiſhes, if—'

'Ah! Sir,' interrupted ſhe, with frequent breaks and pauſes, 'I wiſh, I wiſh, 'this does not rather ſhew, that were I 'to live, they would have nothing more 'to ſay to me. I never had any pride 'in being independent of them: all my 'actions, when I might have made my'ſelf more independent, ſhew this—But 'what avail theſe reflections now?—I 'only beg, Sir, that you—and this gen'tleman—to whom I am exceedingly 'obliged—will adjuſt thoſe matters—'according to the will I have written.—'Mr. Belford will excuſe me; but it 'was in truth more neceſſity than choice, 'that made me think of giving him the 'trouble he ſo kindly accepts.—Had I 'had the happineſs to ſee you, my cou'ſin, ſooner—or to know that you ſtill 'honoured me with your regard—I 'ſhould not have had the aſſurance to

'ask this favour of him.—But—though 'the friend of Mr. Lovelace, he is a man 'of honour, and he will make peace 'rather than break it. And, my dear 'coufin, let me beg of you—to contri- 'bute your part to it—and remember, 'that, while I have nearer relations 'than my coufin Morden, dear as you 'are, and alway were to me, you have 'no title to avenge my wrongs upon him 'who has been the occafion of them. 'But I wrote to you my mind on this 'fubject, and my reafons; and I hope I 'need not further urge them.'

'I muft do Mr. Lovelace fo much juf- 'tice,' anfwered he, wiping his eyes, 'as 'to witnefs, how fincerely he repents 'him of his ungrateful bafenefs to you, 'and how ready he is to make you all 'the amends in his power. He owns his 'wickednefs, and your merit. If he did 'not, I could not pafs it over, though 'you have nearer relations: for, my 'dear coufin, did not your grandfather 'leave me in truft for you? And fhould 'I think myfelf concerned for your for- 'tune, and not for your honour? But 'fince he is fo defirous to do you juftice, 'I have the lefs to fay; and you may 'make yourfelf entirely eafy on that ac- 'count.'

'I thank you—thank you, Sir,' faid fhe:—'All is now as I wifhed: but I 'am very faint—very weak. I am forry 'I cannot hold up—that I cannot bet- 'ter deferve the honour of this vifit: 'but it will not be——' And faying this, fhe funk down in her chair, and was filent.

Hereupon we both withdrew, leaving word, that we would be at the Bedford Head, if any-thing extraordinary happened.

We befpoke a little repaft, having neither of us dined; and, while it was getting ready, you may guefs at the fubject of our difcourfe. Both joined in lamentation for the lady's defperate ftate: admired her manifold excellences: feverely condemned you, and her friends. Yet, to bring him into better opinion of you, I read to him fome paffages from your laft letters, which fhewed your concern for the wrongs you had done her, and your deep remorfe: and he faid, It was a dreadful thing to labour under the fenfe of a guilt fo irremediable.

We procured Mr. Goddard (Dr. H. not being at home) once more to vifit her, and to call upon us in his return. He was fo good as to do fo; but he tarried with her not five minutes; and told us, That fhe was drawing on apace; that he feared fhe would not live till morning; and that fhe wifhed to fee Colonel Morden directly.

The colonel made excufes where none were needed; and though our little refection was juft brought in, he went away immediately.

I could not touch a morfel; and took pen and ink to amufe myfelf, and oblige you; knowing how impatient you would be for a few lines: for, from what I have recited, you will fee it was impoffible I could withdraw to write, when your fervant came at half an hour after five, or have an opportunity for it till now; and this is accidental: and yet your poor fellow was afraid to go away with the verbal meffage I fent; importing, as no doubt he told you, that the colonel was with us, the lady exceffively ill, and that I could not ftir to write a line.

TEN O'CLOCK.

THE colonel fent to me afterwards, to tell me, that the lady having been in convulfions, he was fo much difordered, that he could not poffibly attend me.

I have fent every half-hour to know how fhe does: and juft now I have the pleafure to hear, that her convulfions have left her; and that fhe is gone to reft in a much quieter way than could be expected.

Her poor coufin is very much indifpofed; yet will not ftir out of the houfe while fhe is in fuch a way; but intends to lie down on a couch, having refufed any other accommodation.

LETTER XVII.

MR. BELFORD. IN CONTINUATION.

SOHO, SIX O'CLOCK, SEPT. 7.

THE lady is ftill alive. The colonel having juft fent his fervant to let me know that fhe enquired after me about an hour ago, I am dreffing to attend her. Joel begs of me to difpatch him back, though but with one line to gratify your prefent impatience. He expects, he fays, to find you at Knightfbridge, let him make what haffe he can back; and if he has not a line or two to pacify you, he is afraid you will piftol him; for he apprehends that you are hardly yourfelf. I therefore difpatch this; and will have another ready as foon as I can, with particulars. But you muft have a little patience; for how can I withdraw every half-hour to write, if I am admitted to the lady's prefence, or if I am with the colonel?

SMITH'S,

EIGHT O'CLOCK, EIGHT IN THE MORNING.

THE lady is in a ſlumber. Mrs. Lovick, who ſat up with her, ſays, ſhe had a better night than was expected; for although ſhe ſlept little, ſhe ſeemed eaſy; and the eaſier for the pious frame ſhe was in; all her waking moments being taken up in devotion, or in an ejaculatory ſilence; her hands and eyes often lifted up, and her lips moving with a fervour worthy of theſe her laſt hours.

TEN O'CLOCK.

THE colonel being earneſt to ſee his couſin as ſoon as ſhe awoke, we were both admitted. We obſerved in her, as ſoon as we entered, ſtrong ſymptoms of her approaching diſſolution, notwithſtanding what the women had flattered us with from her laſt night's tranquillity. The colonel and I, each loth to ſay what we thought, looked upon one another with melancholy countenances.

The colonel told her, He ſhould ſend a ſervant to her uncle Antony's, for ſome papers he had left there; and aſked, If ſhe had any commands that way?

She thought not, ſhe ſaid, ſpeaking more inwardly than ſhe did the day before. She had indeed a letter ready to be ſent to her good Norton; and there was a requeſt intimated in it: but it was time enough, if the requeſt were ſignified to thoſe whom it concerned when all was over. However, it might be ſent them by the ſervant who was going that way. And ſhe cauſed it to be given to the colonel for that purpoſe.

Her breath being very ſhort, ſhe deſired another pillow. Having two before, this made her in a manner ſit up in her bed; and ſhe ſpoke then with more diſtinctneſs; and, ſeeing us greatly concerned, forgot her own ſufferings to comfort us; and a charming lecture ſhe gave us, though a brief one, upon the happineſs of a timely preparation, and upon the hazards of a late repentance, when the mind, as ſhe obſerved, was ſo ſo much weakened, as well as the body, as to render a poor ſoul hardly able to contend with it's natural infirmities.

'I beſeech ye, my good friends,' proceeded ſhe, 'mourn not for one who 'mourns not, nor has cauſe to mourn, 'for herſelf. On the contrary, rejoice 'with me, that all my worldly troubles 'are ſo near their end.—Believe me, 'Sirs, that I would not, if I might, 'chuſe to live, although the pleaſanteſt 'part of my life were to come over 'again; and yet eighteen years of it, out 'of nineteen, have been very pleaſant. 'To be ſo much expoſed to temptation, 'and to be ſo liable to fail in the trial, 'who would not rejoice, that all her 'dangers are over!—All I wiſhed was 'pardon and bleſſing from my dear pa'rents. Eaſy as my departure ſeems 'to promiſe to be, it would have been 'ſtill eaſier, had I had that pleaſure. 'BUT GOD ALMIGHTY WOULD NOT 'LET ME DEPEND FOR COMFORT 'UPON ANY BUT HIMSELF.'

She then repeated her requeſt, in the moſt earneſt manner, to her couſin, that he would not heighten her fault, by ſeeking to avenge her death; to me, that I would endeavour to make up all breaches, and uſe the power I had with my friend, to prevent all future miſchiefs from him, as well as that which this truſt might give me, to prevent any to him.

She made ſome excuſes to her couſin, for having not been able to alter her will, to join him in the executorſhip with me; and to me, for the trouble ſhe had given, and yet ſhould give me.

She had fatigued herſelf ſo much, (growing ſenſibly weaker) that ſhe ſunk her head upon her pillows, ready to faint; and we withdrew to the window, looking upon one another; but could not tell what to ſay; and yet both ſeemed inclinable to ſpeak: but the motion paſſed over in ſilence. Our eyes only ſpoke; and that in a manner neither's were uſed to; mine, at leaſt, not till I knew this admirable creature.

The colonel withdrew to diſmiſs his meſſenger, and ſend away the letter to Mrs. Norton. I took the opportunity to retire likewiſe; and to write thus far. And Joel returning to take it; I now cloſe here.

ELEVEN O'CLOCK.

LETTER XVIII.

MR. BELFORD. IN CONTINUATION.

THE colonel tells me, That he has written to Mr. John Harlowe, by his ſervant, that they might ſpare themſelves the trouble of debating about a reconciliation; for that his dear couſin would probably be no more, before they could reſolve.

He aſked me after his couſin's means of ſubſiſting; and whether ſhe had accepted of any favour from me: he was ſure, he ſaid, ſhe would not from you.

I acquainted him with the truth of her parting with ſome of her apparel.

This wrung his heart; and bitterly did did he exclaim as well againſt you, as againſt her implacable relations.

He wiſhed he had not come to England at all, or had come ſooner; and hoped I would apprize him of the whole mournful ſtory, at a proper ſeaſon. He added, that he had thoughts, when he came over, of fixing here for the remainder of his days: but now, as it was impoſſible his couſin could recover, he would go abroad again, and reſettle himſelf at Florence or Leghorn.

THE lady has been giving orders, with great preſence of mind, about her body; directing her nurſe and her maid of the houſe to put her into her coffin as ſoon as ſhe is cold. Mr. Belford, ſhe ſaid, would know the reſt by her will.

SHE has juſt now given from her boſom, where ſhe always wore it, a miniature picture ſet in gold of Miſs Howe: ſhe gave it to Mrs. Lovick, deſiring her to fold it up in white paper, and direct it, 'To Charles Hickman, Eſq.' and to give it to me, when ſhe was departed, for that gentleman.

She looked upon the picture, before ſhe gave it her—'Sweet and ever-amiable Friend — Companion — Siſter — Lover!' ſaid ſhe—And kiſſed it four ſeveral times, once at each tender appellation.

YOUR other ſervant is come.—Well may you be impatient!—Well may you!—But do you think I can leave off in the middle of a converſation, to run and ſet down what offers, and ſend it away piece-meal as I write?—If I could, muſt I not loſe one half, while I put down the other?

This event is nearly as intereſting to me as it is to you. If you are more grieved than I, there can be but one reaſon for it; and that's at your heart!—I had rather loſe all the friends I have in the world, (yourſelf in the number) than this divine lady; and ſhall be unhappy whenever I think of her ſufferings, and of her merit; though I have nothing to reproach myſelf by reaſon of the former.

I ſay not this, juſt now, ſo much to reflect upon you, as to expreſs my own grief; though your conſcience, I ſuppoſe, will make you think otherwiſe.

Your poor fellow, who ſays, that he begs for his life in deſiring to be diſpatched back with a letter, tears this from me—Elſe perhaps (for I am juſt ſent for down) a quarter of an hour would make you—not eaſy indeed—but certain—And that, in a ſtate like yours, to a mind like yours, is a relief.

THURSDAY AFTERNOON, 4 O'CLOCK.

LETTER XIX.

MR. BELFORD, TO RICHARD MOWBRAY, ESQ.

THURSDAY AFTERNOON.

DEAR MOWBRAY,

I Am glad to hear you are in town.—Throw yourſelf, the moment this comes to your hand, (if poſſible with Tourville) in the way of the man who leaſt of all men deſerves the love of the worthy heart; but moſt that of thine and Tourville; elſe the news I ſhall moſt probably ſend him within an hour or two, will make annihilation the greateſt bleſſing he has to wiſh for.

You will find him between Piccadilly and Kenſington, moſt probably on horſeback, riding backwards and forwards in a crazy way; or put up, perhaps, at ſome inn or tavern in the way; a waiter poſſibly, if ſo, watching for his ſervant's return to him from me.

HIS man Will is juſt come to me. He will carry this to you in his way back, and be your director. Hie away in a coach, or any how. Your being with him may ſave either his or a ſervant's life.—See the bleſſed effects of triumphant libertiniſm!—Sooner or later it comes home to us, and all concludes in gall and bitterneſs!—Adieu.

J. BELFORD.

LETTER XX.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

CURSE upon the colonel, and curſe upon the writer of the laſt letter I received, and upon all the world! Thou to pretend to be as much intereſted in my Clariſſa's fate as myſelf! 'Tis well for one of us, that this was not ſaid to me, inſtead of written—Living or dying, ſhe is mine—and mine only. Have I not earned her dearly?—Is not damnation likely to be the purchaſe to me, though a happy eternity will be hers?

An eternal ſeparation!—O God!—O God!—How can I bear that thought!—But yet there is life!—Yet, therefore, hope—Enlarge my hope, and thou ſhalt be my good genius, and I will forgive thee every thing.

For this laſt time—But it muſt not, ſhall not, be the laſt—Let me hear, the moment moment thou receiveſt this—what I am to be—For, at preſent, I am

The moſt miſerable of men.

ROSE AT KNIGHTSBRIDGE, 5 O'CLOCK.

My fellow tells me, that thou art ſending Mowbray and Tourville to me. I want them not. My ſoul's ſick of them, and of all the world; but moſt of myſelf. Yet, as they ſend me word they will come to me immediately, I will wait for them, and for thy next. —O Belford! let it not be—But haſten it, haſten it, be what it may.

LETTER XXI.

MR. BELFORD, TO ROBERT LOVELACE, ESQ.

SEVEN O'CLOCK, THURSDAY EVENING, SEPT. 7.

I Have only to ſay at preſent—Thou wilt do well to make a tour to Paris; or wherever elſe thy deſtiny ſhall lead thee!!!—

JOHN BELFORD.

LETTER XXII.

MR. MOWBRAY, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

UXBRIDGE, SEPT. 7, BETWEEN 11 AND 12 AT NIGHT.

DEAR JACK,

I Send by poor Lovelace's deſire, for particulars of the fatal breviate thou ſenteſt him this night. He cannot bear to ſet pen to paper; yet wants to know every minute paſſage of Miſs Harlowe's departure. Yet, why he ſhould, I cannot ſee; for if ſhe's gone, ſhe's gone; and who can help it?

I never heard of ſuch a woman in my life. What great matters has ſhe ſuffered, that grief ſhould kill her thus?

I wiſh the poor fellow had never known her. From firſt to laſt, what trouble ſhe has coſt him! The charming fellow has been half loſt to us ever ſince he purſued her. And what is there in one woman more than another, for matter of that?

It was well we were with him when your note came. You ſhewed your true friendſhip in your foreſight. Why, Jack, the poor fellow was quite beſide himſelf—Mad as any man ever was in Bedlam.

Will brought him the letter juſt after we had joined him at the Bohemia Head; where he had left word at the Roſe at Knightſbridge he ſhould be; for he had been ſauntering up and down, backwards and forwards, expecting us, and his fellow. Will, as ſoon as he delivered it, got out of his way; and when he opened it, never was ſuch a piece of ſcenery. He trembled like a devil at receiving it: fumbled at the ſeal, his fingers in a palſy, like Tom Doleman's; his hand ſhake, ſhake, ſhake, that he tore the letter in two, before he could come at the contents: and when he had re'd them, off went his hat to one corner of the room, his wig to the other—'Damnation ſeize the world!' and a whole volley of ſuch-like execrations wiſhes; running up and down the room, and throwing up the ſaſh, and pulling it down, and ſmiting his forehead with his double fiſt, with ſuch force as would have felled an ox, and ſtamping and tearing, that the landlord ran in, and faſter out again. And this was the diſtraction ſcene for ſome time.

In vain was all Jemmy or I could ſay to him. I offered once to take hold of his hands, becauſe he was going to do himſelf a miſchief, as I believed, looking about for his piſtols, which he had laid upon the table, but which Will, unſeen, had taken out with him, [A faithful honeſt dog, that Will! I ſhall for ever love the fellow for it] and he hit me a damned dowſe of the chops, as made my noſe bleed. 'Twas well 'twas he; for I hardly knew how to take it.

Jemmy raved at him, and told him, How wicked it was in him, to be ſo brutiſh to abuſe a friend, and run mad for a woman. And then he ſaid, He was ſorry for it; and then Will ventured in with water and a towel; and the dog rejoiced, as I could ſee by his look, that I had it rather than he.

And ſo, by degrees, we brought him a little to his reaſon, and he promiſed to behave more like a man. And ſo I forgave him: and we rode on in the dark to here at Doleman's. And we tried to ſhame him out of his mad ungovernable fooliſhneſs: for we told him, as how ſhe was but a woman, and an obſtinate perverſe woman too; and how could he help it?

And you know, Jack, (As we told him moreover) that it was a ſhame to manhood, for a man, who had ſerved twenty and twenty women as bad or worſe, let him have ſerved Miſs Harlowe never ſo bad, ſhould give himſelf ſuch obſtropulous airs, becauſe ſhe would die: and we adviſed him never to attempt tempt a woman proud of her character and virtue, as they call it, any more: for why? The conqueſt did not pay trouble; and what was there in one woman more than another? Hay, you know, Jack!—And thus we comforted him, and adviſed him.

But yet his damned addled pate runs upon this lady as much now ſhe's dead, as it did when ſhe was living. For, I ſuppoſe, Jack, it is no joke: ſhe is certainly and bona fide dead? I'n't ſhe? If not, thou deſerveſt to be doubly damned for thy fooling, I tell thee that. So he will have me write for particulars of her departure.

He won't hear the word dead on any account. A ſqueamiſh puppy! How love unmans and ſoftens! And ſuch a noble fellow as this too! Rot him for an ideot, and an oaf! I have no patience with the looliſh duncical dog—Upon my ſoul, I have not!

So ſend the account, and let him howl over it, as I ſuppoſe he will.

But he muſt and ſhall go abroad: and in a month or two Jemmy, and you, and I, will join him, and he'll ſoon get the better of this chicken-hearted folly, never fear; and will then be aſhamed of himſelf: and then we'll not ſpare him; though now, poor fellow, it were pity to lay on him ſo thick as he deſerves. And do thou, till then, ſpare all reflections upon him; for, it ſeems, thou haſt worked him unmercifully.

I was willing to give thee ſome account of the hand we have had with the roaring fellow, who had certainly been a loſt man, had we not been with him; or he would have killed ſomebody or other. I have no doubt of it. And now he is but very middling; ſits grinning like a man in ſtraw; curſes and ſwears, and is confounded gloomy: and creeps into holes and corners, like an old hedge-hog hunted for his greaſe.

And ſo adieu, Jack. Tourville, and all of us, wiſh for thee; for no one has the influence upon him that thou haſt.

R. MOWBRAY.

As I promiſed him that I would write for the particulars above-ſaid, I write this after all are gone to bed; and the fellow is to ſet out with it by day-break.

LETTER XXIII.

MR. BELFORD, TO ROBERT LOVELACE, ESQ.

THURSDAY NIGHT.

I May as well try to write; ſince, were I to go to bed, I ſhall not ſleep. I never had ſuch a weight of grief upon my mind in my life, as upon the demiſe of this admirable woman; whoſe ſoul is now rejoicing in the regions of light.

You may be glad to know the particulars of her happy exit. I will try to proceed; for all is huſh and ſtill; the family retired; but not one of them, and leaſt of all her poor couſin, I dare ſay, to reſt.

At four o'clock, as I mentioned in my laſt, I was ſent for down; and, as thou uſedſt to like my deſcriptions, I will give thee the woeful ſcene that preſented itſelf to me, as I approached the bed.

The colonel was the firſt that took my attention, kneeling on the ſide of the bed, the lady's right-hand in both his, which his face covered, bathing it with his tears; although ſhe had been comforting him, as the women ſince told me, in elevated ſtrains, but broken accents.

On the other ſide of the bed ſat the good widow; her face overwhelmed with tears, leaning her head againſt the bed's head in a moſt diſconſolate manner; and turning her face to me, as ſoon as ſhe ſaw me, 'O, Mr. Belford,' cried ſhe, with folded hands—'The dear 'lady—' A heavy ſob permitted her not to ſay more.

Mrs. Smith, with claſped fingers, and uplifted eyes, as if imploring help from the Only Power which could give it, was kneeling down at the bed's feet, tears in large drops trickling down her cheeks.

Her nurſe was kneeling between the widow and Mrs. Smith, her arms extended. In one hand ſhe held an ineffectual cordial, which ſhe had juſt been offering to her dying miſtreſs; her face was ſwoln with weeping; (though uſed to ſuch ſcenes as this) and ſhe turned her eyes towards me, as if ſhe called upon me by them to join in the helpleſs ſorrow; a freſh ſtream burſting from them as I approached the bed.

The maid of the houſe with her face upon her folded arms, as ſhe ſtood leaning againſt the wainſcot, more audibly expreſſed her grief than any of the others.

The lady had been ſilent a few minutes, and ſpeechleſs, as they thought, moving her lips without uttering a word; one hand, as I ſaid, in her couſin's. But when Mrs. Lovick on my approach pronounced my name, 'O! Mr. Belford,' ſaid ſhe, with a faint inward voice, but very diſtinct nevertheleſs—'Now!—'Now!' [in broken periods ſhe ſpoke]—'I bleſs God for his mercies to his poor 'creature—will all ſoon be over—A 'few—

'few—a very few moments—will end 'this ſtrife—And I ſhall be happy!

'Comfort here, Sir,'—turning her head to the colonel—'Comfort my couſin—See! the blame—able kindneſs—'He would not wiſh me to be happy—'ſo ſoon!'

Here ſhe ſtopt, for two or three minutes, earneſtly looking upon him: then reſuming, 'My deareſt couſin,' ſaid ſhe, 'be comforted—What is dying but the 'common lot?—The mortal frame may 'ſeem to labour—But that is all!—It is 'not ſo hard to die, as I believed it to 'be!—The preparation is the difficulty '—I bleſs God, I have had time for 'that—The reſt is worſe to beholders, 'than to me!—I am all bleſſed hope—'Hope itſelf.' She look'd what ſhe ſaid, a ſweet ſmile beaming over her countenance.

After a ſhort ſilence, 'Once more, 'my dear couſin,' ſaid ſhe, but ſtill in broken accents, 'commend me moſt dutifully to my father and mother.'—There ſhe ſtopt. And then proceeding—'To my ſiſter—To my brother—To my 'uncles—And tell them, I bleſs them 'with my parting breath—for all their 'goodneſs to me—Even for their diſpleaſure, I bleſs them—Moſt happy 'has been to me my puniſhment here! 'Happy indeed!'

She was ſilent for a few moments, lifting up her eyes, and the hand her couſin held not between his. Then, 'O, 'death!' ſaid ſhe, 'where is thy ſting?' [The words I remember to have heard in the burial-ſervice read over my uncle and poor Belton.] And after a pauſe—'It is good for me that I was afflicted!' Words of Scripture, I ſuppoſe.

Then turning towards us, who were loſt in ſpeechleſs ſorrow—'O dear, dear 'gentlemen,' ſaid ſhe, 'you know not 'what foretaſtes—what aſſurances—' And there ſhe again ſtopped, and look'd up, as if in a thankful rapture, ſweetly ſmiling.

Then turning her head towards me—'Do you, Sir, tell your friend, that I 'forgive him!—And I pray to God to 'forgive him!'—Again pauſing, and lifting up her eyes, as if praying that He would. 'Let him know how happily I 'die:—and that ſuch as my own, I wiſh 'to be his laſt hour.'

She was again ſilent for a few moments: and then reſuming—'My ſight 'fails me!—Your voices only—' [for we both applauded her Chriſtian, her divine frame, though in accents as broken as her own;] 'and the voice of grief 'is alike in all.—Is not this Mr. Mor-'den's hand?' preſſing one of his with that he had juſt let go.—'Which is Mr. 'Belford's?' holding out the other. I gave her mine. 'God Almighty bleſs 'you both,' ſaid ſhe, 'and make you 'both—in your laſt hour—for you muſt 'come to this—happy as I am!'

She pauſed again, her breath growing ſhorter; and, after a few minutes, 'And 'now, my deareſt couſin, give me your 'hand—Nearer—ſtill nearer—' drawing it towards her; and ſhe preſſed it with her dying lips—'God protect you, dear, 'dear Sir—And once more, receive my 'beſt and moſt grateful thanks—And 'tell my dear Miſs Howe—and vouch-'ſafe to ſee, and to tell my worthy Nor-'ton—She will be one day, I fear not, 'though now lowly in her fortunes, a 'ſaint in Heaven—Tell them both, that 'I remember them with thankful bleſ-'ſings in my laſt moments!—And pray 'God to give them happineſs here for 'many, many years, for the ſake of 'their friends and lovers; and an hea-'venly crown hereafter; and ſuch aſ-'ſurances of it, as I have, through the 'all-ſatisfying merits of my bleſſed Re-'deemer.'

Her ſweet voice and broken periods methinks ſtill fill my ears, and never will be out of my memory.

After a ſhort ſilence, in a more broken and faint accent—'And you, Mr. 'Belford,' preſſing my hand, 'may God 'preſerve you, and make you ſenſible of 'all your errors—You ſee, in me, how 'all ends—May you be—' And down ſunk her head upon her pillow, ſhe fainting away, and drawing from us her hands.

We thought ſhe was then gone; and each gave way to a violent burſt of grief.

But ſoon ſhewing ſigns of returning life, our attention was again engaged; and I beſought her, when a little recovered, to complete in my favour her half-pronounced bleſſing. She waved her hand to us both, and bowed her head ſix ſeveral times, as we have ſince recollected, as if diſtinguiſhing every perſon preſent; not forgetting the nurſe and the maid-ſervant; the latter having approached the bed, weeping, as if crouding in for the divine lady's laſt bleſſing; and ſhe ſpoke faltering and inwardly—'Bleſs—bleſs—bleſs—you all—'And now—And now—' [holding up her almoſt lifeleſs hands for the laſt time] 'Come—O come—Bleſſed Lord—'JESUS!'

And with theſe words, the laſt but half half pronounced, expired:—such a ſmile, ſuch a charming ſerenity overſpreading her ſweet face at the inſtant, as ſeemed to manifeſt her eternal happineſs already begun.

O, Lovelace!—but I can write no more!

I RESUME my pen to add a few lines. While warm, though pulſeleſs, we preſſed each her hand with our lips; and then retired into the next room.

We looked at each other, with intent to ſpeak: but, as if one motion governed, as one cauſe affected both, we turned away ſilent.

The colonel ſighed as if his heart would burſt: at laſt, his face and hands uplifted, his back towards me, 'Good 'Heaven!' ſaid he to himſelf, 'ſupport 'me!—And is it thus, O flower of na-'ture!'—Then pauſing—'And muſt we 'no more—Never more!—My bleſſed, 'bleſſed couſin!' uttering ſome other words, which his ſighs made inarticulate:—And then, as if recollecting himſelf—'Forgive me, Sir!—Excuſe me, 'Mr. Belford!' And, ſliding by me, 'Anon I hope to ſee you, Sir.'—And down ſtairs he went, and out of the houſe, leaving me a ſtatue.

When I recovered, I was ready to repine at what I then called an unequal diſpenſation; forgetting her happy preparation, and ſtill happier departure; and that ſhe had but drawn a common lot; triumphing in it, and leaving behind her, every-one leſs aſſured of happineſs, though equally certain that the lot would one day be their own.

She departed exactly at forty minutes after ſix o'clock, as by her watch on the table.

And thus died Miſs CLARISSA HARLOWE, in the bloſſom of her youth and beauty: and who, her tender years conſidered, has not left behind her her ſuperior in extenſive knowledge, and watchful prudence; nor hardly her equal for unblemiſhed virtue, exemplary piety, ſweetneſs of manners, diſcreet generoſity, and true chriſtian charity: and theſe all ſet off by the moſt graceful modeſty and humility; yet on all proper occaſions, manifeſting a noble preſence of mind, and true magnanimity: ſo that ſhe may be ſaid to have been not only an ornament to her ſex, but to human nature.

A better pen than mine may do her fuller juſtice. Thine, I mean, O, Lovelace! For well doſt thou know how much ſhe excelled in the graces both of mind and perſon, natural and acquired, all that is woman. And thou alſo canſt beſt account for the cauſe of her immature death, through thoſe calamities which in ſo ſhort a ſpace of time, from the higheſt pitch of felicity, (every-one in a manner adoring her) brought her to an exit ſo happy for herſelf, but, that it was ſo early, ſo much to be deplored by all who had the honour of her acquaintance.

This taſk, then, I leave to thee: but now I can write no more, only that I am a ſympathizer in every part of thy diſtreſs, except (and yet it is cruel to ſay it) in that which ariſes from thy guilt.

ONE O'CLOCK, FRIDAY MORNING.

LETTER XXIV.

MR. BELFORD, TO ROBERT LOVELACE, ESQ.

NINE, FRIDAY NOON.

I Have no opportunity to write at length, having neceſſary orders to give on the melancholy occaſion. Joel, who got to me by ſix in the morning, and whom I diſpatched inſtantly back with the letter I had ready from laſt night, gives me but an indifferent account of the ſtate of your mind. I wonder not at it; but time (and nothing elſe can) will make it eaſier to you: if (that is to ſay) you have compounded with your conſcience; elſe it may be heavier every day than other.

TOURVILLE tells us what a way you are in. I hope you will not think of coming hither. The lady in her will deſires you may not ſee her. Four copies are making of it. It is a long one; for ſhe gives her reaſons for all ſhe wills. I will write to you more particularly as ſoon as poſſibly I can.

THREE letters are juſt brought by a ſervant in livery, directed, 'To Miſs 'Clariſſa Harlowe.' I will ſend copies of them to you. The contents are enough to make one mad. How would this poor lady have rejoiced to receive them!—And yet, if ſhe had, ſhe would not have been enabled to ſay, as ſhe nobly did, That God would not let her depend for comfort upon any but Himſelf.—And indeed for ſome days paſt ſhe had ſeemed to have got above all worldly conſiderations—Her fervent love, even for her Miſs Howe, as ſhe acknowledged, having given way to ſupremer fervors.

LETTER XXV.

MRS. NORTON, TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

WEDNESDAY, SEPT. 6.

AT length, my beſt-beloved Miſs Clary, every-thing is in the wiſhed train: for all your relations are unanimous in your favour. Even your brother and ſiſter are with the foremoſt to be reconciled to you.

I knew it muſt end thus! By patience, and perſevering ſweetneſs, what a triumph have you gained!

This happy change is owing to letters received from your phyſician, from your couſin Morden, and from Mr. Brand.

Colonel Morden will be with you no doubt before this can reach you, with his pocket-book filled with money-bills, that nothing may be wanting to make you eaſy.

And now, all our hopes, all our prayers, are, that this good news may reſtore you to ſpirits and health; and that (ſo long withheld) it may not come too late.

I know how much your dutiful heart will be raiſed with the joyful tidings I write you, and ſtill ſhall more particularly tell you of, when I have the happineſs to ſee you: which will be by next Saturday, at fartheſt; perhaps on Friday afternoon, by the time you can receive this.

For this day, being ſent for by the general voice, I was received by every-one with great goodneſs and condeſcenſion, and entreated (for that was the word they were pleaſed to uſe, when I needed no entreaty, I am ſure), to haſten up to you, and to aſſure you of all their affectionate regards to you: and your father bid me ſay a'l the kind things that were in my heart to ſay, in order to comfort and raiſe you up, and they would hold themſelves bound to make them good.

How agreeable is this commiſſion to your Norton! My heart will overflow with kind ſpeeches, never fear! I am alrea'y meditating what I ſhall ſay, to cheer and raiſe you up, in the names of every-one dear and near to you. And ſorry I am, that I cannot this moment ſet out, as I might, inſtead of writing, would they favour my eager impatience with their chariot; but as it was not offered, it would be preſumption to have aſked for it: and to-morrow a hired chaiſe-and pair will be ready; but at what hour I know not.

How I long once more to fold my dear precious young lady to my fond, my more than fond, my maternal boſom!

Your ſiſter will write to you, and ſend her letter, with this, by a particular hand.

I muſt not let them ſee what I write, becauſe of my wiſh about the chariot.

Your uncle Harlowe will alſo write, and (I doubt not) in the kindeſt terms: for they are all extremely alarmed and troubled at the dangerous way your doctor repreſents you to be in; as well as delighted with the character he gives you. Would to Heaven the good gentleman had written ſooner! And yet he writes, that you know not he has now written. But it is all our confidence, and our conſolation, that he would not have written at all, had he thought it too late.

They will preſcribe no conditions to you, my dear young lady; but will leave all to your own duty and diſcretion. Only your brother and ſiſter declare, they will never yield to call Mr. Lovelace brother: nor will your father, I believe, be eaſily brought to think of him for a ſon.

I am to bring you down with me as ſoon as your health and inclination will permit. You will be received with open arms. Every-one longs to ſee you. All the ſervants pleaſe themſelves, that they ſhall be permitted to kiſs your hands. The pert Betty's note is already changed; and ſhe now runs over in your juſt praiſes. What friends does proſperity make! What enemies adverſity! It always was, and always will be ſo, in every ſtate of life, from the throne to the cottage.—But let all be forgotten now on this jubilee change: and may you, my deareſt Miſs, be capable of rejoicing in this good news; as I know you will rejoice, if capable of any thing.

God preſerve you to our happy meeting! And I will, if I may ſay ſo, weary Heaven with my inceſſant prayers to preſerve and reſtore you afterwards!

I need not ſay how much I am, my dear young lady, your ever-affectionate, and devoted

JUDITH NORTON.

An unhappy delay as to the chaiſe, will make it Saturday morning before I can fold you to my fond heart.

LETTER XXVI.

MISS ARABELLA HARLOWE, TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

WEDN. MORNING, SEPT. 6.

DEAR SISTER,

WE have juſt heard that you are exceedingly ill. We all loved you as never young creature was loved: you are ſenſible of that, ſiſter Clary. And you have been very naughty—But we could not be angry always.

We are indeed more afflicted with the news of your being ſo very ill than I can expreſs: for I ſee not but, after this ſeparation, (as we underſtand that your misfortune has been greater than your fault, and that, however unhappy, you have demeaned yourſelf like the good young creature you uſed to be) we ſhall love you better, if poſſible, than ever.

Take comfort, therefore, ſiſter Clary, and don't be too much caſt down—Whatever your mortifications may be from ſuch noble proſpects over-clouded, and from the reflections you will have from within, on your faulty ſtep, and from the ſullying of ſuch a charming character by it, you will receive none from any of us: and, as an earneſt of your papa's and mamma's favour and reconciliation, they aſſure you by me of their bleſſing and hourly prayers.

If it will be any comfort to you, and my mother finds this letter is received as we expect, (which we ſhall know by the good effect it will have upon your health) ſhe will herſelf go to town to you. Mean time, the good woman you ſo dearly love will be haſtened up to you; and ſhe writes by this opportunity, to acquaint you of it, and of all our returning love.

I hope you will rejoice at this good news. Pray let us hear that you do. Your next grateful letter on this occaſion; eſpecially if it gives us the pleaſure of hearing you are better upon this news, will be received with the ſame (if not greater) delight, than we uſed to have in all your prettily penn'd epiſtles. Adieu, my dear Clary! I am, your loving ſiſter, and true friend,

ARABELLA HARLOWE.

LETTER XXVII.

TO HIS DEAR NIECE MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

WEDNESDAY, SEPT. 6.

WE were greatly grieved, my beloved Miſs Clary, at your fault; but we are ſtill more, if poſſible, to hear you are ſo very ill; and we are ſorry things have been carried ſo far.

We know your talents, my dear, and how movingly you could write, whenever you pleaſed; ſo that nobody could ever deny you any-thing; and, believing you depended on your pen, and little thinking you were ſo ill, and that you had lived ſo regular a life, and are ſo truly penitent, are much troubled every-one of us, your brother and all, for being ſo ſevere. Forgive my part in it, my deareſt Clary. I am your ſecond papa, you know. And you uſed to love me.

I hope you'll ſoon be able to come down, and, after a while, when your indulgent parents can ſpare you, that you will come to me for a whole month, and rejoice my heart, as you uſed to do. But if, through illneſs, you cannot ſo ſoon come down as we wiſh, I will go up to you; for I long to ſee you. I never more longed to ſee you in my life; and you was always the darling of my heart, you know.

My brother Antony deſires his hearty commendations to you, and joins with me in the tendereſt aſſurance, that all ſhall be well, and, if poſſible, better than ever; for we now have been ſo long without you, that we know the miſs of you, and even hunger and thirſt, as I may ſay, to ſee you, and to take you once more to our hearts: whence indeed you was never baniſhed ſo far as our concern for the unhappy ſtep made us think and you believe you were. Your ſiſter and brother both talk of ſeeing you in town: ſo does my dear ſiſter, your indulgent mother.

God reſtore your health, if it be his will: elſe, you know not what will become of your truly loving uncle and ſecond papa,

JOHN HARLOWE.

LETTER XXVIII.

MR. BELFORD, TO ROBERT LOVELACE, ESQ.

FRIDAY NIGHT, SEPT. 8, PAST TEN.

I Will now take up the account of our proceedings from my letter of laſt night, which contained the dying words of this incomparable lady.

As ſoon as we had ſeen the laſt ſcene cloſed (ſo bleſſedly for herſelf!) we left the body to the care of the good women, who, according to the orders ſhe had given them that very night, removed moved her into that laſt houſe which ſhe had diſplayed ſo much fortitude in providing.

In the morning, between ſeven and eight o'clock, according to appointment, the colonel came to me here. He was very much indiſpoſed. We went together, accompanied by Mrs. Lovick and Mrs. Smith, into the deceaſed's chamber. We could not help taking a view of the lovely corpſe, and admiring the charming ſerenity of her noble aſpect. The women declared, they never ſaw death ſo lovely before; and that ſhe looked as if in an eaſy ſlumber, the colour having not quite left her cheeks and lips.

I unlocked the drawer, in which (as I mentioned in a former) ſhe had depoſited her papers. I told you in mine of Monday laſt, that ſhe had the night before ſealed up with three black ſeals, a parcel inſcribed, 'As ſoon as I am certainly dead, this is to be broke open by Mr. Belford.' I accuſed myſelf for having not done it over night. But really I was then incapable of any-thing.

I broke it open accordingly, and found in it no leſs than eleven letters, each ſealed with her own ſeal, and black wax, one of which was directed to me.

I will incloſe a copy of it.

'TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

'SUNDAY EVENING, SEPT. 3.

'SIR,

'I TAKE this laſt and ſolemn occaſion to repeat to you my thanks for all your kindneſs to me at a time when I moſt needed countenance and protection.

'A few conſiderations I beg leave, as now at your peruſal of this, from the dead, to preſs upon you, with all the warmth of a ſincere friendſhip.

'By the time you will ſee this, you will have had an inſtance, I humbly truſt, of the comfortable importance of a pacified conſcience, in the laſt hours of one, who, to the laſt hour, will with your eternal welfare.

'The great Duke of Luxemburgh, as I have heard, on his death-bed, declared, that he would then much rather have had it to reflect upon, that he had adminiſtered a cup of cold water to a worthy poor creature in diſtreſs, than that he had won ſo many battles as he had triumphed for—And, as one well obſerves, all the ſentiments of worldly grandeur vaniſh at that unavoidable moment which decides the deſtiny of men.

'If then, Sir, at the tremendous hour, it be thus with the conquerors of armies, and the ſubduers of nations, let me in very few words (many are not needed) aſk, what, at that period, muſt be the reflections of thoſe (if capable of reflection) who have lived a life of ſenſe and offence; whoſe ſtudy and whoſe pride moſt ingloriouſly have been to ſeduce the innocent, and to ruin the weak, the unguarded and the friendleſs; made ſtill more friendleſs by their baſe ſeductions?—Oh! Mr. Belford, weigh, ponder, and reflect upon it, now, that in health, and in vigour of mind and body, the reflections will moſt avail you—What an ungrateful, what an unmanly, what a meaner than reptile pride is this!

'In the next place, Sir, let me beg of you, for my ſake, who AM, or, as now you will beſt read it, have been, driven to the neceſſity of applying to you to be the executor of my will, that you will bear according to that generoſity which I think to be in you, with all my friends, and particularly with my brother, (who is really a worthy young man, but perhaps a little too headſtrong in his firſt reſentments and conceptions of things) if any-thing, by reaſon of this truſt, ſhould fall out diſagreeably; and that you will ſtudy to make peace, and to reconcile all parties; and more eſpecially, that you, who ſeem to have a great influence upon your ſtill more headſtrong friend, will interpoſe, if occaſion be, to prevent further miſchief—For ſurely, Sir, that violent ſpirit may ſit down ſatisfied with the evils he has already wrought; and, particularly, with the wrongs, the heinous and ignoble wrongs, he has in me done to my family, wounded in the tendereſt part of it's honour.

'For your compliance with this requeſt I have already your repeated promiſe. I claim the obſervance of it, therefore, as a debt from you: and though I hope I need not doubt it, yet I was willing, on this ſolemn, this laſt occaſion, thus earneſtly to re-enforce it.

'I have another requeſt to make to you: it is only, that you will be pleaſed, by a particular meſſenger, to forward the encloſed letters as directed.

'And now, Sir, having the preſumption to think that an uſeful member is loſt to ſociety by means of the unhappy

'py ſtep which has brought my life ſo 'ſoon to it's period, let me hope, that I 'may be an humble inſtrument, in the 'hands of Providence, to reform a man 'of your abilities; and then I ſhall 'think that loſs will be more abundantly 'repaired to the world, while it will be, 'by God's goodneſs, my gain: and I 'ſhall have this farther hope, that once 'more I ſhall have an opportunity, in a 'bleſſed eternity, to thank you, as I 'now repeatedly do, for the good you 'have done to, and the trouble you 'will have taken for, Sir, your obliged 'ſervant,

'CLARISSA HARLOWE.'

The other letters are directed, To her father, To her mother, One to her two uncles, To her brother, To her ſiſter, To her aunt Hervey, To her couſin Morden, To Miſs Howe, To Mrs. Norton, and laſtly one to you, in performance of her promiſe, that a letter ſhould be ſent you when ſhe arrived at her father's houſe!——I will withold this laſt till I can be aſſured, that you will be fitter to receive it than Tourville tells me you are at preſent.

Copies of all theſe are ſealed up, and entitled—'Copies of my ten poſthumous letters, for J. Belford, Eſq.'—and put in among the bundle of papers left to my direction, which I have not yet had leiſure to open.

No wonder, while able, that ſhe was always writing, ſince thus only of late could ſhe employ that time, which heretofore, from the long days ſhe made, cauſed ſo many beautiful works to ſpring from her fingers. It is my opinion, that there never was a woman ſo young, who wrote ſo much, and with ſuch celerity. Her thoughts keeping pace, as I have ſeen, with her pen, ſhe hardly ever ſtopped or heſitated; and very ſeldom blotted out, or altered. It was a natural talent ſhe was miſtreſs of, among many other extraordinary ones. I gave the colonel his letter, and ordered Harry inſtantly to get ready to carry the others. Mean time (retiring into the next apartment) we opened the will. We were both ſo much affected in peruſing it, that at one time the colonel, breaking off, gave it to me to read on; at another I gave it back to him to proceed with; neither of us being able to read it through without ſuch tokens of ſenſibility as affected the voices of each.

Mrs. Lovick, Mrs. Smith, and her nurſe, were ſtill more touched, when we read thoſe articles in which they are reſpectively remembered: but I will avoid mentioning the particulars, (except in what relates to the thread of my narration) as in proper time I ſhall ſend you a copy of it.

The colonel told me, he was ready to account with me for the money and bills he had brought up from Harlowe Place; which would enable me, as he ſaid, directly to execute the legacy-parts of the will; and he would needs at that inſtant force into my hands a paper relating to that ſubject. I put it into my pocket-book, without looking into it; telling him, That as I hoped he would do all in his power to promote a literal performance of the will, I muſt beg his advice and aſſiſtance in the execution of it.

Her requeſt to be buried with her anceſtors, made a letter of the following import neceſſary, which I prevailed upon the colonel to write; being unwilling myſelf (ſo early at leaſt) to appear officious in the eye of a family which probably wiſhes not any communication with me.

'TO JAMES HARLOWE, JUN. ESQ.

'SIR,

'THE letter which the bearer of 'this brings with him, will, I preſume, 'make it unneceſſary to acquaint you 'and my couſins with the death of the 'moſt excellent of women. But I am 'requeſted by her executor, who will 'ſoon ſend you a copy of her laſt will, 'to acquaint her father (which I chuſe 'to do by your means) that in it ſhe 'earneſtly deſires to be laid in the family-vault, at the feet of her grandfather.

'If her father will not admit of it, 'ſhe has directed her body to be buried 'in the church-yard of the pariſh where 'ſhe died.

'I need not tell you, that a ſpeedy 'anſwer to this is neceſſary.

'Her beatification commenced yeſterday afternoon, exactly at forty minutes 'after ſix.

'I can write no more, than that I am 'yours, &c.

'WM. MORDEN.

'FRIDAY MORN. SEPT. 8.'

By the time this was written, and by the colonel's leave tranſcribed, Harry came booted and ſpurred, his horſe at the door; and I delivered him the letters to the family, with thoſe to Mrs. Norton and Miſs Howe, (eight in all) together together with the above of the colonel to Mr. James Harlowe: and gave him orders to make the utmoſt diſpatch with them.

The colonel and I have beſpoke mourning for ourſelves and ſervants.

LETTER XXIX.

MR. BELFORD, TO ROBERT LOVELACE, ESQ.

SAT. TEN O'CLOCK.

POOR Mrs. Norton is come. She was ſet down at the door; and would have gone up ſtairs directly. But Mrs. Smith and Mrs. Lovick being together and in tears, and the former hinting too ſuddenly to the truly venerable woman the fatal news, ſhe ſunk down at her feet, in fits; ſo that they were forced to breathe a vein, to bring her to herſelf, and to a capacity of exclamation: and then ſhe ran on to Mrs. Lovick and me, who entered juſt as ſhe recovered, in praiſe of the lady, in lamentations for her, and invectives againſt you: but yet ſo circumſcribed were her invectives, that I could obſerve in them the woman well-educated, and in her lamentations the paſſion chriſtianized, as I may ſay.

She was impatient to ſee the corpſe. The women went up with her. But they owned, that they were too much affected themſelves on this occaſion to deſcribe her extremely affecting behaviour.

With trembling impatience ſhe puſhed aſide the coffin lid. She bathed the face with her tears, and kiſſed her cheeks and forehead, as if ſhe were living. It was ſhe indeed: ſhe ſaid: her ſweet young lady! her very ſelf! Nor had death, which changed all things, a power to alter her lovely features! She admired the ſerenity of her aſpect. She no doubt was happy, ſhe ſaid, as ſhe had written to her ſhe ſhould be: but how many miſerable creatures had ſhe left behind her!—The good woman lamenting that ſhe herſelf had lived to be one of them.

It was with difficulty they prevailed upon her to quit the corpſe; and when they went into the next apartment, I joined them, and acquainted her with the kind legacy her beloved young lady had left her: but this rather augmented, than diminiſhed her concern. She ought, ſhe ſaid, to have attended her in perſon. What was the world to her, wringing her hands, now the child of her boſom, and of her heart, was no more? Her principal conſolation, however, was, that ſhe ſhould not long ſurvive her. She hoped, ſhe ſaid, that ſhe did not ſin, in wiſhing ſhe might not.

It was eaſy to obſerve, by the ſimilitude of ſentiments ſhewn in this and other particulars, that the divine lady owed to this excellent woman many of her good notions.

I thought it would divert the poor gentlewoman, and not altogether unſuitably, if I were to put her upon furniſhing mourning for herſelf; as it would rouze her, by a ſeaſonable and neceſſary employment, from that diſmal lethargy of grief, which generally ſucceeds the too violent anguiſh with which a gentle nature is accuſtomed to be torn upon the firſt communication of the unexpected loſs of a dear friend. I gave her therefore the thirty guineas bequeathed to her and to her ſon for mourning; the only mourning which the teſtatrix has mentioned: and deſired her to loſe no time in preparing her own, as I doubted not, that ſhe would accompany the corpſe, if it were permitted to be carried down.

The colonel propoſes to attend the herſe, if his kindred give him not freſh cauſe of diſpleaſure; and will take with him a copy of the will. And being intent to give the family ſome favourable impreſſions of me, he deſired me to permit him to take with him the copy of the poſthumous letter to me: which I readily granted. He is ſo kind as to promiſe me a minute account of all that ſhall paſs on the melancholy occaſion. And we have begun a friendſhip and ſettled a correſpondence, which but one incident can poſſibly happen to interrupt to the end of our lives. And that I hope will not happen.

But what muſt be the grief, the remorſe, that will ſeize upon the hearts of this hitherto inexorable family, on the receiving of the poſthumous letters, and that of the colonel appriſing them of what has happened! I have given requiſite orders to an undertaker, on the ſuppoſition that the body will be permitted to be carried down; and the women intend to fill the coffin with aromatick herbs.

The colonel has obliged me to take the bills and draughts which he brought up with him, for the conſiderable ſums accrued ſince the grandfather's death from the lady's eſtate.

I could have ſhewn to Mrs. Norton the copies of the two letters which ſhe miſſed by coming up. But her grief wants not the heightenings which the reading of them would have given her.

I HAVE been dipping into the copies of the poſthumous letters to the family, which Harry has carried down. Well may I call this lady divine. They are all calculated to give comfort rather than reproach, though their cruelty to her merited nothing but reproach. But were I in any of their places, how much rather had I, that ſhe had quitted ſcores with me by the moſt ſevere recrimination, than that ſhe ſhould thus nobly triumph over me by a generoſity that has no example! I will incloſe ſome of them, which I deſire you to return as ſoon as you can.

LETTER XXX.

TO THE EVER-HONOURED JAMES HARLOWE, SEN. ESQ.

MOST DEAR SIR,

WITH exulting confidence now does your emboldened daughter come into your awful preſence by theſe lines, who dared not but upon this occaſion to look up to you with hopes of favour and forgiveneſs; ſince, when this comes to your hands, it will be out of her power ever to offend you more.

And now let me bleſs you my honoured papa, and bleſs you, as I write, upon my knees, for all the benefits I have received from your indulgence: for your fond love to me in the days of my prattling innocence: for the virtuous education you gave me: and for, the crown of all, the happy end, which, through Divine Grace, by means of that virtuous education, I hope, by the time you will receive this, I ſhall have made. And let me beg of you, dear venerable Sir, to blot from your remembrance, if poſſible, the laſt unhappy eight months; and then I ſhall hope to be remembered with advantage for the pleaſure you had the goodneſs to take in your Clariſſa.

Still on her knees, let your poor penitent implore your forgiveneſs of all her faults and follies; more eſpecially of that fatal error which threw her out of your protection.

When you know, Sir, that I have never been faulty in my will: that ever ſince my calamity became irretrievable, I have been in a ſtate of preparation: that I have the ſtrongeſt aſſurance, that the Almighty has accepted my unfeigned repentance; and that by this time you will (as I humbly preſume to hope) have been the means of adding one to the number of the bleſſed; you will have reaſon for joy rather than ſorrow. Since, had I eſcaped the ſnares by which I was entangled, I might have wanted thoſe exerciſes which I look upon now as ſo many mercies diſpenſed to wean me betimes from a world that preſented itſelf to me with proſpects too alluring: and in that caſe (too eaſily ſatisfied with worldly felicity) I might not have attained to that bleſſedneſs, in which now, on your reading of this, I humbly preſume, (through the Divine Goodneſs) I am rejoicing.

That the Almighty, in his own good time, will bring you, Sir, and my ever-honoured mother, after a ſeries of earthly felicities, of which may my unhappy fault be the only interruption, (and very grievous I know that muſt have been) to rejoice in the ſame bleſſed ſtate, is the repeated prayer of, Sir, your now happy daughter,

CLARISSA HARLOWE.

LETTER XXXI.

TO THE EVER-HONOURED MRS. HARLOWE.

HONOURED MADAM,

THE laſt time I had the boldneſs to write to you, it was with all the conſciouſneſs of a ſelf-convicted criminal, ſupplicating her offended judge for mercy and pardon. I now, by theſe lines, approach you with more aſſurance; but, nevertheleſs, with the higheſt degree of reverence, gratitude, and duty. The reaſon of my aſſurance, my letter to my papa will give: and as I humbly on my knees implored his pardon, ſo now, in the ſame dutiful manner, do I ſupplicate yours, for the grief and trouble I have given you.

Every vein of my heart has bled for an unhappy raſhneſs; which (although involuntary as to the act) from the moment it was committed, carried with it it's own puniſhment; and was accompanied with a true and ſincere penitence.

God, who has been a witneſs of my diſtreſſes, knows, that great as they have been, the greateſt of all was the diſtreſs that I knew I muſt have given to you, Madam, and to my father, by a ſtep that had ſo very ugly an appearance in your eyes, and his; and indeed in the eyes of all my family: a ſtep ſo unworthy of your daughter, and of the education you had given her!

But

But HE, I presume to hope, has forgiven me; and at the instant this will reach your hands, I humbly trust, I shall be rejoicing in the blessed fruits of His forgiveness. And be this your comfort, my ever-honoured mamma, that the principal end of your pious care for me is attained, though not in the way so much hoped for.

May the grief which my fatal error has given to you both, be the only grief that shall ever annoy you in this world! —May you, Madam, long live to sweeten the cares, and heighten the comforts, of my papa!—May my sister's continued, and, if possible, augmented duty, happily make up to you the loss you have sustained in me! And whenever my brother and she change their single state, may it be with such satisfaction to you both, as may make you forget my offence; and remember me only in those days, in which you took pleasure in me! And, at last, may a happy meeting with your forgiven penitent, in the eternal mansions, augment the bliss of her, who, purified by sufferings, already, when this salutes your hands, presumes she shall be the happy, and for ever happy,

CLARISSA HARLOWE.

LETTER XXXII.

TO JAMES HARLOWE, JUN. ESQ.

SIR,

THERE was but one time, but one occasion, after the rash step I was precipitated upon, that I would hope to be excused looking up to you in the character of a brother and a friend. And NOW is that time, and THIS the occasion. NOW at reading this, will you pity your late unhappy sister! NOW will you afford to her memory that kind concern which you refused to her before!

I write, my brother, in the first place, to beg your pardon for the offence my unhappy step gave to you, and to the rest of a family so dear to me.

Virgin purity should not so behave as to be suspected: yet when you come to know all my story, you will find further room for pity, if not for more than pity, for your late unhappy sister!

O that passion had not been deaf!—that misconception would have given way to enquiry!—That your rigorous heart, if it could not itself be softened, (moderating the power you had obtained over every-one) had permitted other hearts more indulgently to expand!

But I write not to give pain. I had rather you should think me faulty still, than take to yourself the consequence that will follow from acquitting me.

Abandoning, therefore, a subject which I had not intended to touch upon, (for I hope, at the writing of this, I am above the spirit of recrimination) let me tell you, Sir, that my next motive for writing to you in this last and most solemn manner, is, To beg of you to forego any active resentments (which may endanger a life so precious to all your friends) against the man to whose elaborate baseness I owe my worldly ruin.

For, ought an innocent man to run an equal risque with a guilty one?—A more than equal risque, as the guilty one has been long enured to acts of violence, and is skilled in the arts of offence?

You would not arrogate to yourself God's province, who has said, 'Vengeance is mine, and I will repay it.'—If you would, I tremble for the consequence: for will it not be suitable to the Divine Justice to punish the presumptuous innocent (as you would be in this case) in the very error, and that by the hand of the self defending guilty —Reserving him for a future day of vengeance for his accumulated crimes?

Leave then the poor wretch to the Divine Justice. Let your sister's fault die with her. At least, let it not be revived in blood. Life is a short stage where longest. A little time hence, the now green head will be grey, if it lives this little time: and if Heaven will afford him time for repentance, why should not you?

Then think, my brother, what will be the consequence to your dear parents if the guilty wretch who has occasioned to them the loss of a daughter, should likewise deprive them of their best hope, and only son, more worth in the family account than several daughters?

Would you add, my brother, to those distresses which you hold your sister so inexcusable for having (although from involuntary and undesigned causes) given?

Seek not then, I beseech you, to extend the evil consequences of your sister's error. His conscience, when it shall please God to touch it, will be sharper than your sword.

I have still another motive for writing to you in this solemn manner: it is, to entreat you to watch over your passions. The principal fault I knew you to be guilty of, is, the violence of your temper when you think yourself in the right; which you would oftener be, but for that very violence.

You have several times brought your life into danger by it.

Is not the man guilty of a high degree of injustice, who is more apt to give contradiction, than able to bear it? How often, with you, has impetuosity brought on abasement? A consequence too natural.

Let me then caution you, dear Sir, against a warmth of temper, an impetuosity when moved, and you so ready to be moved, that may hurry you into unforeseen difficulties; and which it is in some measure a sin not to endeavour to restrain. God enable you to do it for the sake of your own peace and safety, as well present as future! and for the sake of your family and friends, who all see your fault, but are tender of speaking to you of it!

As for me, my brother, my punishment has been seasonable. God gave me grace to make a right use of my sufferings. I early repented. I never loved the man half so much as I hated his actions, when I saw what he was capable of. I gave up my whole heart to a better hope. God blessed my penitence and my reliance upon Him. And now I presume to say, I AM HAPPY.

May Heaven preserve you in safety, health, and honour, and long continue your life for a comfort and stay to your honoured parents! And may you, in the change of your single state, meet with a wife as agreeable to every-one else as to yourself, and be happy in a hopeful race, and not have one Clarissa among them, to embitter your comforts when she should give you most comfort! But may my example be of use to warn the dear creatures whom once I hoped to live to see and to cherish, of the evils with which this deceitful world abounds! are the prayers of your affectionate sister,

CL. HARLOWE.

LETTER XXXIII.

TO MISS HARLOWE.

NOW may you, my dear Arabella, unrestrained by the severity of your virtue, let fall a pitying tear on the past faults and sufferings of your late unhappy sister; since, now, she can never offend you more. The Divine Mercy, which first inspired her with repentance, (an early repentance it was; since it preceded her sufferings) for an error which she offers not to extenuate, although perhaps it were capable of some extenuation, has now, at the instant that you are reading this, as I humbly hope, blessed her with the fruits of it.

Thus already, even while she writes, in imagination, purified and exalted, she the more fearlessly writes to her sister; and NOW is assured of pardon for all those little occasions of displeasure which her frowarder youth might give you; and for the disgrace which her fall has fastened upon you, and upon her family.

May you, my sister, continue to bless those dear and honoured relations, whose indulgence so well deserves your utmost gratitude, with those cheerful instances of duty and obedience which have hitherto been so acceptable to them, and praise-worthy in you! And may you, when a suitable proposal shall offer, fill up more worthily that chasm, which the loss they have sustained in me has made in their family!

Thus, my Arabella! my only sister! and for many happy years, my friend! most fervently prays that sister, whose affection for you, no acts, no unkindness, no misconstruction of her conduct, could cancel! And who NOW, made perfect (as she hopes) through sufferings, stiles herself, the happy

CLARISSA HARLOWE.

LETTER XXXIV.

TO JOHN AND ANTONY HARLOWE, ESQRS.

HONOURED SIRS,

WHEN these lines reach your hands, your late unhappy niece will have known the end of all her troubles; and, as she humbly hopes, will be rejoicing in the mercies of a gracious God, who has declared, that he will forgive the truly penitent of heart.

I write, therefore, my dear uncles, and to you both in one letter, (since your fraternal love has made you both but as one person) to give you comfort, and not distress; for, however sharp my afflictions have been, they have been but of short duration; and I am betimes (happily as I hope) arrived at the end of a painful journey.

At the same time, I write to thank you both for all your kind indulgence to me, and to beg your forgiveness of my last, my only great fault to you and to my family.

The ways of Providence are unsearchable. Various are the means made use of by it, to bring poor sinners to a sense of of their duty. Some are drawn by love, others are driven by terrors, to their Divine Refuge. I had for eighteen years out of nineteen, rejoiced in the favour and affection of every-one. No trouble came near to my heart. I feemed to be one of thofe defigned to be drawn by the filken cords of love.—But, perhaps, I was too apt to value myfelf upon the love and favour of every-one: the merit of the good I delighted to do, and of the inclinations which were given me, and which I could not help having, I was, perhaps, too ready to attribute to myfelf; and now, being led to account for the cauſe of my temporary calamities, find, I had a ſecret pride to be puniſhed for, which I had not fathomed: and it was neceſſary, perhaps, that ſome ſore and terrible misfortunes ſhould befal me, in order to mortify that my pride, and that my vanity.

Temptations were accordingly ſent. I ſhrunk in the day of trial. My diſcretion, which had been ſo cried up, was found wanting when it came to be weighed in an equal balance. I was betrayed, fell, and became the bye-word of my companions, and a diſgrace to my family, which had prided itſelf in me perhaps too much. But as my fault was not that of a culpable will, when my pride was ſufficiently mortified, I was not ſuffered (although ſurrounded by dangers, and entangled in ſnares) to be totally loſt: but, purified by ſufferings, I was fitted for the change I have NOW, at the time you will receive this, ſo newly, and, as I humbly hope, ſo happily experienced.

Rejoice with me, then, dear Sirs, that I have weathered ſo great a ſtorm. Nor let it be matter of concern, that I am cut off in the bloom of youth. 'There 'is no inquiſition in the grave,' ſays the wiſe man, 'whether we lived ten 'or an hundred years; and the day of 'death is better than the day of our 'birth.'

Once more, dear Sirs, accept my grateful thanks for all your goodneſs to me, from my early childhood, to the day, the unhappy day, of my error!—Forgive that error!—And God give us a happy meeting in a bleſſed eternity; prays your moſt dutiful and obliged hiſ-woman, CLARISSA HARLOWE.

Mr. Belford gives the lady's poſthumous letters to Mrs. Hervey, Miſs Howe, and Mrs. Norton, at length likewiſe: but although every letter varies in ſtile as well as matter from the others; yet, as they are written on the ſame ſubject, and are pretty long, it is thought proper to abſtract them.

'That to her aunt Hervey is written 'in the ſame pious and generous ſtrain 'with thoſe preceding, ſeeking to give 'comfort rather than diſtreſs. "The "Almighty, I hope," ſays ſhe, "has "received and bleſſed my penitence, "and I am happy. Could I have been "more than ſo, at the end of what is "called a happy life of twenty, or thirty, "or forty years to come? And what "are twenty, or thirty, or forty years, "to look back upon? In half of any "of theſe periods, what friends might "not I have mourned for? what tempt-"ations from worldly proſperity might "I not have encountered with? And "in ſuch a caſe, immerſed in earthly "pleaſures, how little likelihood, that, "in my laſt ſtage, I ſhould have been "bleſſed with ſuch a preparation and "reſignation, as I have now been bleſſed "with."

'She proceeds as follows: "Thus "much, Madam, of comfort to you "and to myſelf from this diſpenſation. "As to my dear parents, I hope they "will conſole themſelves, that they "have ſtill many bleſſings left, which "ought to balance the troubles my er-"ror has given them: that, unhappy "as I have been to be the interrupter "of their felicities, they never, till this "my fault, knew any heavy evil: that "afflictions patiently borne, may be "turned into bleſſings: that uninter-"rupted happineſs is not to be expected "in this life: that, after all, they have "not, as I humbly preſume to hope, "the probability of the everlaſting per-"dition of their child to deplore: and "that, in ſhort, when my ſtory comes "to be fully known, they will have the "comfort to find, that my ſufferings "redound more to my honour than to "my diſgrace.

"Theſe conſiderations will, I hope, "make their temporary loſs of but one "child out of three, (unhappily cir-"cumſtanced too as ſhe was) matter of "greater conſolation than affliction. "And the rather, as we may hope for "a happy meeting once more, never to "be ſeparated either by time or of-"fences."

'She concludes this letter with an 'addreſs to her couſin Dolly Hervey, 'whom ſhe calls her amiable couſin; 'and thankfully remembers for the part 'ſhe took in her afflictions.—"O my

"dear couſin, let your worthy heart be "guarded againſt thoſe deluſions, which "have been fatal to my worldly happi-"neſs!—That pity, which you beſtowed "upon me, demonſtrates a gentleneſs of "nature, which may poſſibly ſubject you "to misfortunes, if your eye be per-"mitted to miſlead your judgment.—"But a ſtrict obſervance of your filial "duty, my deareſt couſin, and the pre-"cepts of ſo prudent a mother as you "have the happineſs to have, (enforced "by ſo ſad an example in your own fa-"mily as I have ſet) will, I make no "doubt, with the Divine Aſſiſtance, "be your guard and ſecurity."

'The poſthumous letter to Miſs 'Howe is extremely tender and affec-'tionate. She pathetically calls upon 'her to rejoice that all her Clariſſa's 'troubles are now at an end; that the 'ſtate of temptation and trial, of doubt 'and uncertainty, is now over with her; 'and that ſhe has happily eſcaped the 'ſnares that were laid for her ſoul: the 'rather to rejoice, as that her misfor-'tunes were of ſuch a nature, that it 'was impoſſible ſhe could be tolerably 'happy in this life.

'She thankfully acknowledges the 'favours ſhe had received from Mrs. 'Howe and Mr. Hickman; and ex-'preſſes her concern for the trouble ſhe 'has occaſioned to the former, as well 'as to her; and prays, that all the 'earthly bleſſings they uſed to wiſh to 'each other, may ſingly devolve upon 'her.

'She beſeeches her, That ſhe will 'not ſuſpend the day, which muſt ſup-'ply to herſelf the friend ſhe will have 'loſt in her, and give to herſelf a ſtill 'nearer and dearer relation.

'She tells her, That her choice (a 'choice made with the approbation of 'all her friends) has fallen upon a ſin-'cere, an honeſt, a virtuous, and, what 'is more than all, a pious man; a man, 'who, although he admires her perſon, 'is ſtill more in love with the graces of 'her mind. And as thoſe graces are 'improveable with every added year of 'life, which will impair the tranſitory 'ones of perſon, what a firm baſis, in-'fers ſhe, has Mr. Hickman choſen to 'build his love upon!

'She prays, That God will bleſs them 'together: and that the remembrance 'of her, and of what ſhe has ſuffered, 'may not interrupt their mutual hap-'pineſs; ſhe deſires them to think of 'nothing but what ſhe now is; and that 'a time will come, when they ſhall meet 'again, never to be divided.

'To the Divine Protection, mean 'time, ſhe commits her; and charges 'her, by the love that has always ſub-'ſiſted between them, that ſhe will not 'mourn too heavily for her; and again 'calls upon her, after a gentle tear, 'which ſhe will allow her to let fall in 'memory of their uninterrupted friend-'ſhip, to rejoice that ſhe is ſo early re-'leaſed; and that ſhe is purified by her 'ſufferings, and is made, as ſhe aſſuredly 'truſts, by God's goodneſs, eternally 'happy.'

The poſthumous letters to Mr. LOVELACE and Mr. MORDEN will be inſerted here-after: as will alſo the ſubſtance of that written to Mrs. NORTON.

LETTER XXXV.

MR. BELFORD, TO ROBERT LOVE-LACE, ESQ.

SAT. AFTERNOON, SEPT. 9.

I Underſtand, that thou breatheſt nothing but revenge againſt me, for treating thee with ſo much freedom; and againſt the accurſed woman and her infernal crew. I am not at all concerned for thy menaces againſt myſelf. It is my deſign to make thee feel. It gives me pleaſure to find my intention anſwered. And I congratulate thee, that thou haſt not loſt that ſenſe.

As to the curſed crew, well do they deſerve the fire here, that thou threat-eneſt them with, and the fire hereafter, that ſeems to await them. But I have this moment received news which will, in all likelihood, ſave thee the guilt of puniſhing the old wretch for her ſhare of wickedneſs as thy agent. But if that happens to her which is likely to hap-pen, wilt thou not tremble for what may befal the principal?

Not to keep thee longer in ſuſpence; laſt night, it ſeems, the infamous wo-man got ſo heartily intoxicated with her beloved liquor, arrack punch, at the expence of Colonel Salter, that, miſ-taking her way, ſhe fell down a pair of ſtairs, and broke her leg: and now, after a dreadful night, ſhe lies foaming, raving, roaring, in a burning fever, that wants not any other fire to ſcorch her into a feeling more exquiſite and durable than any thy vengeance could give her.

The wretch has requeſted me to come to her: and, leſt I ſhould refuſe a com-mon meſſenger, ſent her vile aſſociate,

Sally

Sally Martin; who not finding me at Soho, came hither; another part of her buſineſs being to procure the divine lady's pardon for the old creature's wickedneſs to her.

This devil incarnate, Sally, declares, that ſhe never was ſo ſhocked in her life, as when I told her the lady was dead.

She took out her ſalts to keep her from fainting; and when a little recovered, ſhe accuſed herſelf for her part of the injuries the lady had ſuſtained; as ſhe ſaid, Polly Horton would do for hers; and ſhedding tears, declared, that the world never produced ſuch another woman. She called her the ornament and glory of her ſex; acknowledged, that her ruin was owing more to their inſtigations, than even (ſavage as thou art) to thy own vileneſs; ſince thou wert inclined to have done her juſtice more than once, had they not kept up thy profligate ſpirit to it's height.

This wretch would fain have been admitted to a ſight of the corpſe; but I refuſed her requeſt with execrations.

She could forgive herſelf, ſhe ſaid, for every-thing but her inſults upon the admirable lady at Rowland's: ſince all the reſt was but in purſuit of a livelihood, to which ſhe had been reduced, and ſhe boaſted, from better expectations, and which hundreds follow as well as ſhe. I did not aſk her, By whom reduced?

At going away, ſhe told me, that the old monſter's bruiſes are of more dangerous conſequence than the fracture: that a mortification is apprehended: and that the vile wretch has ſo much compunction of heart, on recollecting her treatment of Miſs Harlowe, and is ſo much ſet upon procuring her forgiveneſs, that ſhe is ſure the news ſhe has to carry her, will haſten her end.

All theſe things I leave upon thy reflection.

MR. BELFORD, TO ROBERT LOVELACE, ESQ.

SAT. NIGHT.

YOUR ſervant gives me a dreadful account of your raving unmanageableneſs. I wonder not at it. But as nothing violent is laſting, I dare ſay, that your habitual gaiety of heart will quickly get the better of your phrenzy: and the rather do I judge ſo, as your fits are of the raving kind, (ſuitable to your natural impetuoſity) and not of that melancholy ſpecies which ſeizes ſlower ſouls.

For this reaſon I will proceed in writing to you, that my narrative may not be broken by your diſcompoſure; and that the contents of it may find you, and help you to reflection, when you ſhall be reſtored.

Harry is returned from carrying the poſthumous letters to the family, and to Miſs Howe; and that of the colonel, which acquaints James Harlowe with his ſiſter's death, and with her deſire to be interred near her grandfather.

Harry was not admitted into the preſence of any of the family. They were all aſſembled together, it ſeems, at Harlowe Place, on occaſion of the colonel's letter, which informed them of the lady's dangerous way; and were comforting themſelves, as Harry was told, with hopes that Mr. Morden had made the worſt of her ſtate, in order to quicken their reſolutions.

It is eaſy then to judge what muſt be their grief and ſurprize on receiving the fatal news which the letters Harry ſent in to them communicated.

He ſtaid there long enough to find the whole houſe in confuſion; the ſervants running different ways; lamenting and wringing their hands as they ran; the female ſervants particularly; as if ſomebody (poor Mrs. Harlowe, no doubt; and perhaps Mrs. Hervey too) were in fits.

Every-one was in ſuch diſorder, that he could get no commands, nor obtain any notice of himſelf. The ſervants ſeemed more inclined to execrate than welcome him—'O maſter; O young 'man!' cried three or four together, 'what diſmal tidings have you brought!' They helped him, at the very firſt word, to his horſe; which with great civility they had put up on his arrival: and he went to an inn; and purſued on foot his way to Mrs. Norton's; and finding her come to town, left the letter he carried down for her with her ſon, (a fine youth;) who when he heard the fatal news, burſt out into a flood of tears—firſt lamenting the lady's death, and then crying out, What, what, would become of his poor mother!—How would ſhe ſupport herſelf, when ſhe ſhould find, on her arrival in town, that the dear lady, who was ſo deſervedly the darling of her heart, was no more!

He proceeded to Miſs Howe's, with the letter for her. That lady, he was told, had juſt given orders for a young man, man, a tenant's ſon, to poſt to London, to bring her news of her dear friend's condition, and whether ſhe ſhould herſelf be encouraged, by an account of her being ſtill alive, to make her a viſit; every-thing being ordered to be in readineſs for her going up, on his return with the news ſhe wiſhed and prayed for with the utmoſt impatience. And Harry was juſt in time to prevent the man's ſetting out.

He had the precaution to deſire to ſpeak with Miſs Howe's woman or maid, and communicated to her the fatal tidings, that ſhe might break them to her young lady. The maid herſelf was ſo affected, that her old lady (who, Harry ſaid, ſeemed to be every-where at once) came to ſee what ailed her, and was herſelf ſo ſtruck with the communication, that ſhe was forced to ſit down in a chair: 'O the ſweet creature!' ſaid ſhe —'And is it come to this!—O my poor 'Nancy!'—How ſhall I be able to break 'the matter to my Nancy!'

Mr. Hickman was in the houſe. He haſtened in to comfort the old lady—But he could not reſtrain his own tears. He feared, he ſaid, when he was laſt in town, that this ſad event would ſoon happen: but little thought it would be ſo very ſoon!—'But ſhe is happy, I am 'ſure,' ſaid the good gentleman.

Mrs. Howe, when a little recovered, went up, in order to break the news to her daughter. She took the letter and her ſalts in her hand. And they had occaſion for the latter. For the houſekeeper ſoon came hurrying down into the kitchen, her face overſpread with tears—Her young miſtreſs had fainted away, ſhe ſaid—Nor did ſhe wonder at it. Never did there live a lady more deſerving of general admiration and lamentation, than Miſs Clariſſa Harlowe! and never was there a ſtronger friendſhip diſſolved by death than between her young lady and her.

She hurried with a lighted wax-candle, and with feathers, to burn under the noſe of her young miſtreſs; which ſhewed that ſhe continued in fits.

Mr. Hickman afterwards, with his uſual humanity, directed that Harry ſhould be taken care of all night; it being then the cloſe of day. He aſked him after my health. He expreſſed himſelf exceſſively afflicted, as well for the death of the moſt excellent of women, as for the juſt grief of the lady, whom he ſo paſſionately loves. But he called the departed lady an angel of light. 'We 'dreaded, ſaid he, '(tell your maſter) 'to read the letter ſent—But we needed not—'Tis a bleſſed letter—written 'by a bleſſed hand!—But the conſola-'tion ſhe aims to give, will for the pre-'ſent heighten the ſenſe we all ſhall have 'of the loſs of ſo excellent a creature! 'Tell Mr. Belford, that I thank God I 'am not the man who had the unmerit-'ed honour to call himſelf her brother.'

I know how terribly this great cataſtrophe (as I may call it, ſince ſo many perſons are intereſted in it) affects thee. I ſhould have been glad to have had particulars of the diſtreſs which the firſt communication of it muſt have given to the Harlowes. Yet who but muſt pity the unhappy mother?

LETTER XXXVII.

MR. BELFORD, TO ROBERT LOVELACE, ESQ.

SUNDAY MORN. 8 O'CLOCK, SEPT. 10.

I Staid at Smith's till I ſaw the laſt of all that is mortal of the divine lady.

As ſhe had directed rings by her will to ſeveral perſons, with her hair to be ſet in cryſtal, the afflicted Mrs. Norton cut off, before the coffin was cloſed, four charming ringlets; one of which the colonel took for a locket, which, he ſays, he will cauſe to be made, and wear next his heart in memory of his beloved couſin.

Between four and five in the morning, the corpſe was put into the herſe; the coffin before being filled, as intended, with flowers and aromatick herbs, and proper care taken to prevent the corpſe ſuffering (to the eye) from the joſtling of the herſe.

Poor Mrs. Norton is extremely ill. I gave particular directions to Mrs. Smith's maid (whom I have ordered to attend the good woman in a mourning chariot) to take care of her. The colonel, who rides with his ſervants, within view of the herſe, ſays, that he will ſee my orders in relation to her enforced.

When the herſe moved off, and was out of ſight, I locked up the lady's chamber, into which all that had belonged to her was removed.

I expect to hear from the colonel as ſoon as he is got down, by a ſervant of his own.

LETTER XXXVIII.

MR. MOWBRAY, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

UXBRIDGE, SUNDAY MORN. 9 O'CLOCK.

DEAR JACK,

I Send you incloſed a letter from Mr. Lovelace; which, though written in the the curſed algebra, I know to be ſuch a one as will ſhew what a queer way he is in; for he read it to us with the air of a tragedian. You will ſee by it what the mad fellow had intended to do, if we had not all of us interpoſed. He was actually ſetting out with a ſurgeon of this place, to have the lady opened and embalmed.—Rot me if it be not my full perſuaſion, that if he had, her heart would have been found to be either iron or marble.

We have got Lord M. to him. His lordſhip is alſo much afflicted at the lady's death. His ſiſters and nieces, he ſays, will be ready to break their hearts. What a rout's here about a woman! For after all ſhe was no more.

We have taken a pailful of black bull's blood from him; and this has lowered him a little. But he threatens Colonel Morden, he threatens you for your curſed reflections, [curſed reflections indeed, Jack!] and curſes all the world and himſelf, too.

Laſt night his mourning (which is full as deep as for a wife) was brought home, and his fellow's mourning too. And, though eight o'clock, he would put it on, and make them attend him in theirs.

Every-body blames him on this lady's account. But I ſee not for why. She was a vixen in her virtue. What a pretty fellow ſhe has ruined—Hey, Jack!—And her relations are ten times more to blame than he. I will prove this to the teeth of them all. If they could uſe her ill, why ſhould they expect him to uſe her well?—You or I, or Tourville, in his ſhoes, would have done as he has done. Are not all the girls forewarned?—Why then ſhould ſuch curſed quaxoms take him?—Who would have thought he had been ſuch poor blood? Now [Rot the puppy!] to ſee him ſit ſilent in a corner, when he has tired himſelf with his mock majeſty, and with his argumentation, (who ſo fond of arguing as he?) and teaching his ſhadow to make mouths againſt the wainſcot—The devil fetch me, if I have patience with him!

But he has had no reſt for theſe ten days: that's the thing!—You muſt write to him; and pr'ythee coax him, Jack, and ſend him what he writes for, and give him all his way: there will be no bearing him elſe. And get the lady buried as faſt as you can; and don't let him know where.

This letter ſhould have gone yeſterday. We told him it did. But were in hopes he would not have enquired after it again. But he raves as he has not any anſwer.

What he vouchſafed to read of other of your letters has given my lord ſuch a curioſity, as makes him deſire you to continue your accounts. Pray do: but not in your helliſh Arabick; and we will let the poor fellow only into what we think fitting for his preſent way.

I live a curſed dull poking life here. With what I ſo lately ſaw of poor Belton, and what I now ſee of this charming fellow, I ſhall be as crazy as he ſoon, or as dull as thou, Jack; ſo muſt ſeek for better company in town than either of you. I have been forced to read ſometimes to divert me; and you know I hate reading. It preſently ſets me into a fit of drowſineſs; and then I yawn and ſtretch like a devil.

I never wrote ſuch a long letter in my life. My wriſts and my fingers and thumb ache damnably. The pen is an hundred weight at leaſt. And my eyes are ready to drop out of my head upon the paper.—The cramp but this minute in my fingers. Rot the gooſe and the gooſe-quill! I will write no more long letters for a twelvemonth to come. Yet one word: we think the mad fellow coming to. Adieu.

LETTER XXXIX.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

UXBRIDGE, SAT. SEPT. 9.

JACK,

I Think it abſolutely right that my ever-dear and beloved lady ſhould be opened and embalmed. It muſt be done out of hand—this very afternoon. Your acquaintance Tomkins, and old Anderſon of this place, whom I will bring with me, ſhall be the ſurgeons. I have talked to the latter about it.

I will ſee every-thing done with that decorum which the caſe, and the ſacred perſon of my beloved, require.

Every-thing that can be done to preſerve the charmer from decay, ſhall alſo be done. And when ſhe will deſcend to her original duſt, or cannot be kept longer, I will then have her laid in my family-vault, between my own father and mother. Myſelf, as I am in my ſoul, ſo in perſon, chief mourner. But her heart, to which I have ſuch unqueſtionable pretenſions, in which once I had ſo large a ſhare, and which I will prize above my own, I will have. I will keep it in ſpirits. It ſhall never be out of my ſight. And all the charges of ſepulture too ſhall be mine.

Surely nobody will diſpute my right to her. Whoſe was ſhe living? whoſe is ſhe dead, but mine?—Her curſed parents, whoſe barbarity to her, no doubt, was the true cauſe of her death, have long ſince renounced her. She left them for me. She choſe me therefore: And I was her huſband. What though I treated her like a villain? Do I not pay for it now? Would ſhe not have been mine had I not? Nobody will diſpute but ſhe would. And has ſhe not forgiven me?—I am then in ſtatu quo prius with her—Am I not?—As if I had never offended? Whoſe then can ſhe be but mine?

I will free you from your executorſhip, and all your cares.

Take notice, Belford, that I do hereby actually diſcharge you, and every-body, from all the cares and troubles relating to her. And as to her laſt teſtament, I will execute it myſelf.

There were no articles between us, no ſettlements; and ſhe is mine, as you ſee I have proved to a demonſtration; nor could ſhe diſpoſe of herſelf but as I pleaſed. Damnation ſeize me then if I make not good my right againſt all oppoſers!

Her bowels, if her friends are very ſolicitous about them, and very humble and ſorrowful, (and none have they of their own) ſhall be ſent down to them—To be laid with her anceſtors—unleſs ſhe has ordered otherwiſe. For, except that, ſhe ſhall not be committed to the unworthy earth, ſo long as ſhe can be kept out of it; her will ſhall be performed in every-thing.

I ſend in the mean time for a lock of her hair.

I charge you ſtir not in any part of her will, but by my expreſs direction. I will order every-thing myſelf. For am I not her huſband? And being forgiven by her, am I not the choſen of her heart? What elſe ſignifies her forgiveneſs?

The two inſufferable wretches you have ſent me, plague me to death, and would treat me like a babe in ſtrings. Damn the fellows, what can they mean by it? Yet that crippled monkey Doleman joins with them. And, as I hear them whiſper, they have ſent for Lord M.—To controul me, I ſuppoſe.

What can they mean by this uſage? Sure all the world is run mad but myſelf. They treat me as they ought every-one of themſelves to be treated. The whole world is but one great bedlam. God confound it, and every-thing in it, ſince now my beloved Clariſſa Lovelace—no more Harlowe—Curſe upon that name, and every-one called by it!

What I write to you for is,

1. To forbid you intermeddling with any-thing relating to her. To forbid Morden intermeddling alſo. If I remember right, he has threatened me, and curſed me, and uſed me ill—And let him be gone from her, if he would avoid my reſentments.

2. To ſend me a lock of her hair inſtantly by the bearer.

3. To engage Tomkins to have every-thing ready for the opening and embalming. I ſhall bring Anderſon with me.

4. To get her will and every-thing ready for my peruſal and conſideration.

I will have poſſeſſion of her dear heart this very night; and let Tomkins provide a proper receptacle and ſpirits, till I can get a golden one made for it.

I will take her papers. And as no one can do her memory juſtice equal to myſelf, and I will not ſpare myſelf, who can better ſhew the world what ſhe was, and what a villain he, that could uſe her ill? And the world ſhall alſo ſee, what implacable and unworthy parents ſhe had.

All ſhall be ſet forth in words at length. No mincing of the matter. Names undiſguiſed as well as facts. For as I ſhall make the worſt figure in it myſelf, and have a right to treat myſelf as nobody elſe ſhall; who will controul me? who dare call me to account?

Let me know if the damn'd mother be yet the ſubject of the devil's own vengeance—if the old wretch be dead or alive? Some exemplary miſchief I muſt yet do. My revenge ſhall ſweep away that devil, and all my oppoſers of the cruel Harlowe family from the face of the earth. Whole hecatombs ought to be offered up to the manes of my Clariſſa Lovelace.

Although her will may in ſome reſpects croſs mine, yet I expect to be obſerved. I will be the interpreter of hers.

Next to mine, hers ſhall be obſerved; for ſhe is my wife; and ſhall be be to all eternity. I will never have another.

Adieu, Jack. I am preparing to be with you. I charge you, as you value my life or your own, do not oppoſe me in any-thing relating to my Clariſſa Lovelace.

My temper is entirely altered. I know not what it is to laugh, or ſmile, or be pleaſant. I am grown cholerick and impatient, and will not be controuled.

I write this in characters as I uſed to do, that nobody but you ſhould know what I write. For never was any man plagued with impertinents, as I am.

R. LOVELACE.

IN A SEPARATE PAPER INCLOSED IN THE ABOVE.

LET me tell thee in characters ſtill, that I am in a dreadful way juſt now. My brain is all boiling like a cauldron over a fiery furnace. What a devil is the matter with me, I wonder! I never was ſo ſtrange in my life.

In truth, Jack, I have been a moſt execrable villain. And when I conſider all my actions to this angel of a woman, and in her the piety, the charity, the wit, the beauty, I have helped to deſtroy, and the good to the world I have thereby been a means of fruſtrating, I can pronounce damnation upon myſelf. How then can I expect mercy anywhere elſe!

I believe I ſhall have no patience with you when I ſee you. Your damned ſtings and reflections have almoſt turned my brain.

But here Lord M. they tell me, is come! Damn him, and thoſe who ſent for him!

I know not what I have written. But her dear heart and a lock of her hair I will have, let who will be the gainſayers!—For is ſhe not mine?—Whoſe elſe can ſhe be?—She has no father or mother, no ſiſter, no brother; no relations but me. And my beloved is mine; and I am hers: and that's enough.—But oh!—

'She's out! The damp of death has quench'd
'her quite!
'Thoſe ſpicy doors, her lips, are ſhut, cloſe
'lock'd,
'Which never gale of life ſhall open more!'

And is it ſo? Is it indeed ſo?—Good God!—Good God!—But they will not let me write on. I muſt go down to this officious peer—Who the devil ſent for him?

LETTER XL.

MR. BELFORD, TO RICHARD MOWBRAY, ESQ.

SUNDAY, SEPT. 10. FOUR IN THE AFTERNOON.

I Have yours, with our unhappy friend's incloſed. I am glad my lord is with him. As I preſume that his phrenzy will be but of ſhort continuance, I moſt earneſtly wiſh, that on his recovery he could be prevailed upon to go abroad. Mr. Morden, who is inconſolable, has ſeen by the will, (as indeed he ſuſpected before he read it) that the caſe was more than a common ſeduction; and has dropt hints already, that he looks on himſelf, on that account, as freed from his promiſes made to the dying lady, which were, that he would not ſeek to avenge her death.

You muſt make the recovery of his health the motive for urging him on this head, for, if you hint at his own ſafety, he will not ſtir, but rather ſeek the colonel.

As to the lock of hair, you may eaſily pacify him (as you once ſaw the angel) with hair near the colour, if he be intent upon it.

At my lord's deſire I will write on, and in my common hand; that you may judge what is, and what is not, fit to be read to Mr. Lovelace at preſent. But as I ſhall not forbear reflections as I go along, in hopes to reach his heart on his recovery, I think it beſt to direct myſelf to him ſtill; and that as if he were not diſordered.

As I ſhall not have leiſure to take copies, and yet am willing to have the whole ſubject before me, for my own future contemplation: I muſt inſiſt upon a return of my letters ſome time hence. Mr. Lovelace knows that this is one of my conditions; and has hitherto complied with it.

Let me moſt earneſtly coniure thee, and the idle flutterer Tourville, from what you have ſeen of poor Belton's exit; from our friend Lovelace's phrenzy, and the occaſion of it; and from the terrible condition in which the wretch Sinclair lies; to ſet about an immediate change of life and manners. For my own part, I am determined, be your reſolutions what they may, to take the advice I give. As witneſs,

J. BELFORD.

LETTER XLI.

MR. BELFORD, TO ROBERT LOVELACE, ESQ.

O Lovelace! I have a ſcene to paint in relation to the wretched Sinclair, that, if I do it juſtice, will make thee ſeriouſly ponder and reflect, or nothing can. I will lead thee to it in order; and that in my uſual hand, that thy compeers may be able to read it as well as thyſelf.

When I had written the preceding letter, not knowing what to do with myſelf; recollecting and in vain wiſhing for delightful and improving converſation, which I had now for ever loſt; I thought I had as good begin the taſk, which I had for ſome time paſt reſolved to begin; that is to ſay, to go to church; and ſee if I could not reap ſome benefit from what I ſhould hear there. Accordingly, I determined to go to hear the celebrated preacher at St. James's church. But, as if the devil (for ſo I was then ready to conclude) thought himſelf concerned to prevent my intention, a viſit was made me, juſt as I was dreſſed, which took me off from my purpoſe.

From whom ſhould this viſit be, but from Sally Martin, accompanied by Mrs. Carter, the ſiſter of the infamous Sinclair! the ſame, I ſuppoſe I need not tell you, who keeps the bagnio near Bloomſbury.

Theſe told me that the ſurgeon, apothecary, and phyſician, had all given the wretched woman over; but that ſhe ſaid, She ſhould not die, nor be at reſt, till ſhe ſaw me: and they beſought me to accompany them in the coach they came in, if I had one ſpark of charity, of Chriſtian charity, as they called it, left.

I was very loth to be diverted from my purpoſe by a requeſt ſo unwelcome, and from people ſo abhorred; but at laſt went, and we got thither by ten: where a ſcene ſo ſhocking preſented itſelf to me, that the death of poor deſponding Belton is not, I think, to be compared with it.

The old wretch had once put her leg out by her rage and violence, and had been crying, ſcolding, curſing, ever ſince the preceding evening, that the ſurgeon had told her it was impoſſible to ſave her; and that a mortification had begun to ſhew itſelf; inſomuch that, purely in compaſſion to their own ears, they had been forced to ſend for another ſurgeon, purpoſely to tell her, though againſt his judgment, and (being a friend of the other) to ſeem to convince him, that he miſtook her caſe; and that if ſhe would be patient, ſhe might recover. But, nevertheleſs, her apprehenſions of death, and her antipathy to the thoughts of dying, were ſo ſtrong, that their impoſture had not the intended effect, and ſhe was raving, crying, curſing, and even howling, more like a wolf than a human creature, when I came; ſo that as I went up-ſtairs, I ſaid, 'Surely this noiſe, this howling, cannot 'be from the unhappy woman!'—Sally ſaid it was; and aſſured me, that it was nothing to the noiſe ſhe had made all night; and ſtepping into her room before me, 'Dear Madam Sinclair,' ſaid ſhe, 'forbear this noiſe! It is more like 'that of a bull than a woman!—Here 'comes Mr. Belford; and you'll fright 'him away if you bellow at this rate.'

There were no leſs than eight of her curſed daughters ſurrounding her bed when I entered; one of her partners, Polly Horton, at their head; and now Sally, her other partner, and Madam Carter, as they called her, (for they are all Madams with one another) made the number ten: all in ſhocking diſhabille, and without ſtays, except Sally, Carter and Polly; who, not daring to leave her, had not been in bed all night.

But when I approached the old wretch, what a ſpectacle preſented itſelf to my eyes!

Her misfortune has not at all ſunk, but rather, as I thought, increaſed her fleſh; rage and violence perhaps ſwelling her muſcular features. Behold her then, ſpreading the whole troubled bed with her huge quaggy carcaſe: her mill-poſt arms held up; her broad hands clenched with violence; her big eyes, goggling and flaming-red as we may ſuppoſe thoſe of a ſalamander; her matted griſly hair, made irreverend by her wickedneſs, (her clouted head-dreſs being half off, ſpread about her fat ears and brawny neck;) her livid lips parched, and working violently; her broad chin in convulſive motion; her wide mouth, by reaſon of the contraction of her forehead, (which ſeemed to be half-loſt in it's own frightful furrows) ſplitting her face, as it were, into two parts; and her huge tongue hideouſly rolling in it; having, puffing as if for breath; her bellows-ſhaped and various-coloured breaſts aſcending by turns to her chin, and deſcending out of ſight, with the violence of her gaſpings.

This was the ſpectacle, as recollecti-

on

on has enabled me to deſcribe it, that this wretch made to my eye, when I approached her bed-ſide, ſurrounded, as I ſaid, by her ſuffragans and daughters, who ſurveyed her with ſcouling frighted attention, which one might eaſily ſee had more in it of horror and ſelf-concern, (and ſelf-condemnation too) than of love or pity; as who ſhould ſay—'See! what we ourſelves muſt one day 'be!'

As ſoon as ſhe ſaw me, her naturally-big voice, more hoartened by her ravings, broke upon me:—'O Mr. Bel-'ford!—O Sir!—ſee what I am come 'to!—See what I am brought to!—To 'have ſuch a curſed crew about me, and 'not one of them to take care of me! 'But to let me tumble down-ſtairs ſo 'diſtant from the room I went from!—'ſo diſtant from the room I meant to go 'to!—Curſed, curſed be every careleſs 'devil!—May this or worſe be their fate 'every-one of them!'

And then ſhe curſed and ſwore moſt vehemently, and the more, as two or three of them were excuſing themſelves on the ſcore of their being at that time as unable to help themſelves as ſhe. As ſoon as ſhe had cleared the paſſage of her throat by the oaths and curſes which her wild impatience made her utter, ſhe began in a more hollow and whining ſtrain to bemoan herſelf.—'And here,' ſaid ſhe—'Heaven grant me patience!'—[clenching and unclenching her hands]—'am I to die thus miſerably!—of a 'broken leg in my old age!—ſnatched 'away by means of my own intemper-'ance!—Self-do! Self-undone!—No 'time for my affairs! No time to re-'pent!—And in a few hours—(Oh!—'Oh!'—with another long howling 'O—h! U—gh—o! a kind of ſcreaming key terminating it)—'who knows—'who can tell where I ſhall be?—Oh! 'that indeed I never, never had had a 'being!'

What could one ſay to ſuch a wretch as this, whoſe whole life had been ſpent in the moſt diffuſive wickedneſs, and who no doubt has numbers of ſouls to anſwer for? Yet I told her, She muſt be patient: that her violence made her worſe: and that, if ſhe would compoſe herſelf, ſhe might get into a frame more proper for her preſent circumſtances.

'Who, I?' interrupted ſhe: 'I get 'into a better frame! I, who can nei-'ther cry, nor pray! Yet already feel 'the torments of the damn'd! What 'mercy can I expect? What hope is 'left for me?—Then, that ſweet crea-'ture! That incomparable Miſs Har-'lowe! She, it ſeems, is dead and gone! '—O that curſed man! Had it not been 'for him! I had never had this, the 'moſt crying of all my ſins, to anſwer 'for!'

And then ſhe ſet up another howl.

'And is ſhe dead?—Indeed dead?' proceeded ſhe, when her howl was over. —'O what an angel have I been the 'means of deſtroying! For though it 'was that wicked man's fault that ever 'ſhe was in my houſe, yet it was mine—'and yours—and yours—and yours—'devils as we all were,'—[turning to Sally, to Polly, and to one or two more]—'that he did not do her juſtice! And 'that, that is my curſe, and will one 'day be yours!' And then again ſhe howled.

I ſtill adviſed patience. I ſaid, that if her time were to be ſo ſhort as ſhe apprehended, the more ought ſhe to endeavour to compoſe herſelf: and then ſhe would at leaſt die with more eaſe to herſelf—and ſatisfaction to her friends, I was going to ſay—But the word die put her into a violent raving, and thus ſhe broke in upon me. 'Die, did you 'ſay, Sir?—Die!—I will not—I cannot 'die!—I know not how to die!—Die, 'Sir!—And muſt I then die?—Leave 'this world!—I cannot bear it!—And 'who brought you hither, Sir?' [her eyes ſtriking fire at me] 'Who brought 'you hither to tell me I muſt die, Sir? '—I cannot, I will not leave this world. 'Let others die, who with for another! 'who expect a better!—I have had my 'plagues in this; but would compound 'for all future hopes, ſo as I may be 'nothing after this!'

And then ſhe howled and bellowed by turns.

By my faith, Lovelace, I trembled in every joint; and looking upon her who ſpoke this, and roared thus, and upon the company round me, I more than once thought myſelf to be in one of the infernal manſions.

Yet will I proceed, and try, for thy good, if I can ſhock thee but half as much with my deſcriptions, as I was ſhocked with what I ſaw and heard.

'Sally!—Polly!—Sifter Carter!' ſaid ſhe, 'did you not tell me I might re-'cover? Did not the ſurgeon tell me I 'might?'

'And ſo you may,' cried Sally; Mon-'ſieur Garon ſays you may, if you'll be 'patient. But, as I have often told you 'this bleſſed morning, you are readier 'to take deſpair from your own fears,

'than comfort, from all the hope we 'can give you.'

'Yet,' cried the wretch, interrupting, 'does not Mr. Belford (and to him 'you have told the truth, though you 'won't to me; does not he) tell me I 'shall die?—I cannot bear it! I cannot 'bear the thoughts of dying!'

And then, but that half a dozen at once endeavoured to keep down her violent hands, would she have beaten herself; as it seems she had often attempted to do from the time the surgeon popt out the word mortification to her.

'Well, but to what purpose,' said I, (turning aside to her sister, and to Sally and Polly) 'are these hopes given her, 'if the gentlemen of the faculty give her 'over? You should let her know the 'worst, and then she must submit; for 'there is no running away from death. 'If she has any matters to settle, put her 'upon settling them; and do not, by 'telling her she will live when there is 'no room to expect it, take from her 'the opportunity of doing needful 'things. Do the surgeons actually give 'her over?'

'They do,' whispered they. 'Her 'gross habit, they say, gives no hopes. 'We have sent for both surgeons, whom 'we expect every minute.'

Both the surgeons (who are French; for Mrs. Sinclair had heard Tourvills launch out in the praise of French surgeons) came in while we were thus talking. I retired to the farther end of the room, and threw up a window for a little air, being half-poisoned by the effluvia arising from so many contaminated carcases; which gave me no imperfect idea of the stench of gaols, which, corrupting the ambient air, gives what is called the prison distemper.

I came back to the bed-side when the surgeons had inspected the fracture; and asked them, If there were any expectation of her life?

One of them whispered me, There was none: that she had a strong fever upon her, which alone, in such a habit, would probably do the business; and that the mortification had visibly gained upon her since they were there six hours ago.

'Will amputation save her? Her af-'fairs and her mind want settling. A 'few days added to her life may be of 'service to her in both respects.'

They told me the fracture was high in her leg; that the knee was greatly bruised; that the mortification, in all probability, had spread half-way of the femur: and then, getting me between them, (three or four of the women joining us, and listening with their mouths open, and all the signs of ignorant wonder in their faces, as there appeared of self-sufficiency in those of the artists) did they by turns fill my ears with an anatomical description of the leg and thigh; running over with terms of art, of the tarsus, the metatarsus, the tibia, the patella, the os tali, the os tibiæ, the tibialis posticus and tibialis anticus, up to the os femoris, to the acetabulum of the os ischion, the great trochanter, glutæus, triceps, lividus, and little rotators; in short, of all the muscles, cartilages, and bones, that constitute the leg and thigh from the great toe to the hip; as if they would shew me, that all their science had penetrated their heads no farther than their mouths; while Sally lifted up her hands with a, 'Laud bless me! Are all 'surgeons so learned!'—But at last both the gentlemen declared, That if she and her friends would consent to amputation, they would whip off her leg in a moment.

Mrs. Carter asked, To what purpose, if the operation would not save her?

'Very true,' they said; but it might be a satisfaction to the patient's friends, that all was done that could be done.

And so the poor wretch was to be lanced and quartered, as I may say, for an experiment only! And, without any hope of benefit from the operation, was to pay the surgeons for tormenting her!

All the time that the surgeons ran on with their anatomical process, the wretched woman most frightfully roared and bellowed; which the gentlemen (who shewed themselves to be of the class of those who are not affected with the evils they do not feel) took no other notice of, than by raising their voices to be heard, as she raised hers—Being evidently more solicitous to increase their acquaintance, and to propagate the notion of their skill, than to attend to the clamours of the poor wretch whom they were called in to relieve; though by this very means, like the dog and the shadow in the fable, they lost both aims with me; for I never was deceived in one rule, which I made early; to wit, That the stillest water is the deepest, while the bubbling stream only betrays shallowness; and that stones and pebbles lie there so near the surface, to point out the best place to ford a river dry-shod.

As nobody cared to tell the unhappy wretch what every-one apprehended must follow, and what the surgeons convinced me soon would, I undertook to be the denuncer of her doom. Accordingly, the operators being withdrawn, I sat down by the bed-side, and said, 'Come, Mrs. Sinclair, let me advise 'you to forbear these ravings at the 'carelessness of those, who, I find, at 'the time, could take no care of them-'selves; and since the accident has hap-'pened, and cannot be remedied, to 'resolve to make the best of the matter: 'for all this violence but enrages the 'malady, and you will probably fall 'into a delirium, if you give way to it, 'which will deprive you of that reason 'which you ought to make the best of, 'for the time it may be lent you.'

She turned her head towards me, and hearing me speak with a determined voice, and seeing me assume as determined an air, became more calm and attentive.

I went on, telling her, that I was glad, from the hints she had given, to find her concerned for her past misspent life, and particularly for the part she had had in the ruin of the most excellent woman on earth: that if she would compose herself, and patiently submit to the consequence of an evil she had brought upon herself, it might possibly be happy for her yet. 'Mean time,' continued I, 'tell me, with temper and calmness, 'Why was you so desirous to see me?'

She seemed to be in great confusion of thought, and turned her head this way and that; and at last, after much hesitation, said, 'Alas, for me! I 'hardly know what I wanted with you. 'When I awoke from my intemperate 'trance, and found what a cursed way I 'was in, my conscience smote me, and 'I was for catching, like a drowning 'wretch, at every straw. I wanted to 'see every-body and any-body but those 'I did see; every-body who I thought 'could give me comfort. Yet could I 'expect none from you neither; for you 'had declared yourself my enemy, al-'though I had never done you harm: 'for what, Jackey,' in her old tone, whining through her nose, 'was Miss 'Harlowe to you?—But she is happy! '—But oh! what will become of me? '—Yet tell me, (for the surgeons have 'told you the truth, no doubt) tell me, 'Shall I do well again? May I recover? 'If I may, I will begin a new course of 'life: as I hope to be saved, I will.—'I'll renounce you all—every one of 'you,' [looking round her] 'and 'scrape all I can together, and live a 'life of penitence; and when I die, leave 'it all to charitable uses—I will, by my 'soul—Every doit of it to charity—But 'this once,' lifting up her rolling eyes, and folded hands, (with a wry-mouthed earnestness, in which every muscle and feature of her face bore it's part) 'this one 'time—Good God of Heaven and earth, 'but this once! this once!' repeating those words five or six times, 'spare thy 'poor creature, and every hour of my 'life shall be passed in penitence and 'atonement: upon my soul it shall!'

'Less vehement! a little less vehe-'ment!' said I—'It is not for me, who 'have led so free a life, as you but too 'well know, to talk to you in a re-'proaching strain, and to set before you 'the iniquity you have lived in, and the 'many souls you have helped to de-'stroy. But as you are in so penitent a 'way, if I might advise, you should send 'for a good clergyman, the purity of 'whose life and manners may make all 'these things come from him with a bet-'ter grace than they can from me.'

'How, Sir! What, Sir!' interrupting me. 'Send for a parson?—Then 'you indeed think I shall die! Then 'you think there is no room for hope! '——A parson, Sir!——Who sends for 'a parson, while there is any hope left? '—The sight of a parson would be death 'immediate to me!—I cannot, cannot 'die!—What! cut off in the midst of 'my sins!'

And then she began again to rave.

'I cannot bear,' said I, rising from my seat with a stern air, 'to see a rea-'sonable creature behave so outrage-'ously!—Will this vehemence, think 'you, mend the matter? Will it avail 'you any-thing? Will it not rather 'shorten the life you are so desirous to 'have lengthened, and deprive you of 'the only opportunity you can ever have 'to settle your affairs for both worlds? '—Death is but the common lot: and 'if it will be yours soon,' looking at her —'it will be also yours—and yours—and 'yours—' speaking with a raised voice, and turning to every trembling devil round her, [for they all shook at my forcible application]—'and mine also.—'And you have reason to be thankful,' turning again to her, 'that you did not 'perish in that act of intemperance which 'brought you to this: for it might have 'been your neck, as well as your leg; 'and then you had not had the oppor-'tunity you now have for repentance—

'And,

'And, the Lord have mercy upon you! 'into what a ſtate might you have a-'woke!'

Then did the poor wretch ſet up an inarticulate frightful howl, ſuch a one as I never before heard uttered, as if already pangs infernal had taken hold of her; and ſeeing every-one half-frighted, and me motioning to withdraw, 'O pity me, pity me, Mr. Bel-'ford,' cried ſhe, her words interrupted by groans—'I find you think I ſhall 'die!—And what I may be, and where, 'in a very few hours—Who can tell?'

I told her, it was in vain to flatter her: it was my opinion ſhe would not recover.

I was going to re-adviſe her to calm her ſpirits, and endeavour to reſign herſelf, and to make the beſt of the opportunity yet left her; but this declaration ſet her into a moſt outrageous raving. She would have torn her hair, and beaten her breaſt, had not ſome of the wretches held her hands by force, while others kept her as ſteady as they could, leſt ſhe ſhould again put out her new-ſet leg: ſo that, ſeeing her thus incapable of advice, and in a perfect phrenzy, I told Sally Martin, that there was no bearing the room; and that their beſt way was to ſend for a miniſter to pray by her, and to reaſon with her, as ſoon as ſhe ſhould be capable of it. And ſo I left them; and never was ſo ſenſible of the benefit of freſh air, as I was the moment I entered the ſtreet.

Nor is it to be wondered at, when it is conſidered, that to the various ill ſmells, that will be always found in a cloſe ſick-bed room, (for generally, when the phyſician comes, the air is ſhut out) this of Mrs. Sinclair was the more particulary offenſive, as, to the ſcent of plaiſters, ſalves, and ointments, were added the ſtenches of ſpirituous liquors, burnt and unburnt, of all denominations: for one or other of the creatures, under pretence of colicks, gripes, or qualms, were continually calling for ſupplies of theſe, all the time I was there. And yet this is thought to be a genteel houſe of the ſoft: and all the proſtitutes in it are proſtitutes of price, and their viſitors people of note.

O, Lovelace! what lives do moſt of us rakes and libertines lead! What company do we keep! And, for ſuch company, what ſociety renounce, or endeavour to make like theſe!

What woman, nice in her perſon, and of purity in her mind and manners, did ſhe know what miry wallowers the generality of men of our claſs are in themſelves, and conſtantly trough and ſty with, but would deteſt the thoughts of aſſociating with ſuch filthy ſenſualiſts, whoſe favourite taſte carries them to mingle with the dregs of ſtews, brothels, and common-ſewers?

Yet, to ſuch a choice are many worthy women betrayed, by that falſe and inconſiderate notion, raiſed and propagated, no doubt, by the author of all deluſion, That a reformed rake makes the beſt huſband. We rakes, indeed, are bold enough to ſuppoſe, that women in general are as much rakes in their hearts, as the libertines ſome of them ſuffer themſelves to be taken with, are in their practice. A ſuppoſition, therefore, which it behoves perſons of true honour of that ſex, to diſcountenance, by rejecting the addreſs of every man, whoſe character will not ſtand the teſt of that virtue which is the glory of a woman: and indeed, I may ſay, of a man too: why ſhould it not?

How, indeed, can it be, if this point be duly weighed, that a man who thinks alike of all the ſex, and knows it to be in the power of a wife to do him the greateſt diſhonour man can receive, and doubts not her will to do it, if opportunity offer, and importunity be not wanting: that ſuch a one, from principle, ſhould be a good huſband to any woman? And, indeed, little do innocents think, what a total revolution of manners, what a change of fixed habits, nay, what a conqueſt of bad nature, and what a portion of divine GRACE, is required, to make a man a good huſband, a worthy father, and true friend, from principle; eſpecially when it is conſidered, that it is not in a man's own power to reform when he will. This (to ſay nothing of my own experience) thou, Lovelace, haſt found in the progreſs of thy attempts upon the divine Miſs Harlowe. For whoſe remorſes could be deeper, or more frequent, yet more tranſient than thine!

Now, Lovelace, let me know if the word grace can be read from my pen without a ſneer from thee and thy aſſociates? I own that once it ſounded oddly in my ears. But I ſhall never forget what a grave man once ſaid on this very word—That with him it was a rake's ſhibboleth. [See Judges xii. 6.] He had always hopes of one who could bear the mention of it without ridiculing it; and ever gave him up for an abandoned man, who made a jeſt of it, or of him who uſed it.

Don't be diſguſted, that I mingle ſuch ſuch grave reflections as theſe with my narratives. It becomes me, in my preſent way of thinking, to do ſo, when I ſee in Miſs Harlowe, how all human excellence, and in poor Belton, how all inhuman libertiniſm, and am near ſeeing in this abandoned woman, how all diabolical profligacy, end. And glad ſhould I be for your own ſake, for your ſplendid family's ſake, and for the ſake of all your intimates and acquaintances, that you were labouring under the ſame impreſſions, that ſo we, who have been companions in (and promoters of one another's) wickedneſs, might join in a general atonement to the utmoſt of our power.

I came home reflecting upon all theſe things, more edifying to me than any ſermon I could have heard preached: and I ſhall conclude this long letter with obſerving, that although I left the wretched howler in a high phrenzy-fit, which was exceſſively ſhocking to the by-ſtanders; yet her phrenzy muſt be the happieſt part of her dreadful condition: for when ſhe is herſelf, as it is called, what muſt be her reflections upon her paſt profligate life, throughout which it has been her conſtant delight and buſineſs, devil-like, to make others as wicked as herſelf! What muſt her terrors be (a hell already begun in her mind!) on looking forward to the dreadful ſtate ſhe is now upon the verge of!—But I drop my trembling pen.

To have done with ſo ſhocking a ſubject at once, we ſhall take notice, That Mr. Belford, in a future letter, writes, that the miſerable woman, to the ſurprize of the operators themſelves, (through hourly increaſing tortures of body and mind) held out ſo long as till Thurſday, Sept. 21. And then died in ſuch agonies as terrified into a tranſitory penitence all the wretches about her.

LETTER XLII.

COLONEL MORDEN, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

SUNDAY NIGHT, SEPT. 10.

DEAR SIR,

ACCORDING to my promiſe, I ſend you an account of matters here. Poor Mrs. Norton was ſo very ill upon the road, that, ſlowly as the herſe moved, and the chariot followed, I was afraid we ſhould not have got her to St. Alban's. We put up there as I had intended. I was in hopes that ſhe would have been better for the ſtop: but I was forced to leave her behind me. I ordered the ſervant-maid you were ſo conſiderately kind as to ſend down with her, to be very careful of her; and left the chariot to attend her. She deſerves all the regard that can be paid her; not only upon my couſin's account, but on her own—She is an excellent woman.

When we were within five miles of Harlowe Place, I put on a hand-gallop. I ordered the herſe to proceed more ſlowly ſtill, the croſs-road we were in being rough; and having more time before us than I wanted; for I wiſhed not the herſe to be in till near duſk. I got to Harlowe Place about four o'clock. You may believe I found a mournful houſe. You deſire me to be very minute.

At my entrance into the court, they were all in motion. Every ſervant whom I ſaw had ſwelled eyes, and looked with ſo much concern, that at firſt I apprehended ſome new diſaſter had happened in the family. Mr. John and Mr. Antony Harlowe, and Mrs. Hervey, were there. They all helped on one another's grief, as they had before done each other's hardneſs of heart.

My couſin James met me at the entrance of the hall. His countenance expreſſed a fixed concern; and he deſired me to excuſe his behaviour the laſt time I was there.

My couſin Arabella came to me full of tears and grief.

'O, couſin!' ſaid ſhe, hanging upon my arm, 'I dare not aſk you any queſ-'tions!'—About the approach of the herſe, I ſuppoſe ſhe meant.

I myſelf was full of grief; and, without going farther or ſpeaking, ſat down in the hall in the firſt chair.

The brother ſat down on one hand of me, the ſiſter on the other. Both were ſilent. The latter in tears.

Mr. Antony Harlowe came to me ſoon after. His face was overſpread with all the appearance of woe. He requeſted me to walk into the parlour; where, as he ſaid, were all his fellow-mourners.

I attended him in. My couſins James and Arabella followed me.

A perfect concert of grief, as I may ſay, broke out the moment I entered the parlour.

My couſin Harlowe, the dear creature's father, as ſoon as he ſaw me, ſaid, 'O, couſin, couſin, of all our fa-'mily,

'mily, you are the only one who have 'nothing to reproach yourself with!—'You are a happy man!'

The poor mother bowing her head to me in speechless grief, sat with her handkerchief held to her eyes with one hand. The other hand was held by her sister Hervey, between both hers; Mrs. Hervey weeping upon it.

Near the window, sat Mr. John Harlowe, his face and his body turned from the sorrowing company; his eyes red and swelled.

My cousin Antony, at his re-entering the parlour, went towards Mrs. Harlowe—'Don't, dear sister!' said he.—Then towards my cousin Harlowe—'Don't, dear brother!—Don't thus 'give way—' And without being able to say another word, went to a corner of the parlour, and, wanting himself the comfort he would fain have given, sunk into a chair, and audibly sobbed.

Miss Arabella followed her uncle Antony, as he walked in before me, and seemed as if she would have spoken to the pierced mother some words of comfort. But she was unable to utter them, and got behind her mother's chair; and inclining her face over it, on the unhappy lady's shoulder, seemed to claim the consolation that indulgent parent used, but then was unable to afford her.

Young Mr. Harlowe, with all his vehemence of spirit, was now subdued. His self-reproaching conscience, no doubt, was the cause of it.

And what, Sir, must their thoughts be, which, at that moment, in a manner deprived them of all motion, and turned their speech into sighs and groans!—How to be pitied, how greatly to be pitied! all of them! But how much to be cursed that abhorred Lovelace, who, as it seems, by arts uncommon, and a villainy without example, has been the sole author of a woe so complicated and extensive!—God judge me, as—But I stop—The man (the man can I say?) is your friend!—He already suffers, you tell me in his intellect—Restore him, Heaven, to that—If I find the matter come out, as I apprehend it will—Indeed her own hint of his usage of her, as in her will, is enough—Nor think, my beloved cousin, thou darling of my heart! that thy gentle spirit, breathing charity and forgiveness to the vilest of men, shall avail him!—But once more I stop—Forgive me, Sir!—Who could behold such a scene, who could recollect it in order to describe it, (as minutely as you wished me to relate how this unhappy family were affected on this sad occasion) every-one of the mourners nearly related to himself, and not to be exasperated against the author of all!

As I was the only person (grieved as I was myself) from whom any of them, at that instant, could derive comfort; 'Let us not,' said I, 'my dear cousin,' approaching the inconsolable mother, 'give way to a grief, which, however 'just, can now avail us nothing. We 'hurt ourselves, and cannot recal the 'dear creature for whom we mourn. 'Nor would you wish it, if you knew 'with what assurances of eternal happi-'ness she left the world—She is happy, 'Madam!—Depend upon it, she is happy!—And comfort yourselves with 'that assurance!'

'O cousin, cousin!' cried the unhappy mother, withdrawing her hand from that of her sister Hervey, and pressing mine with it, 'You know not 'what a child I have lost!'—Then in a lower voice. 'And how lost!—That 'it is that makes the loss insupport-'able.'

They all joined in a kind of melancholy chorus, and each accused him and herself, and some of them one another. But the eyes of all, in turn, were cast upon my cousin James, as the person who had kept up the general resentment against so sweet a creature. While he was hardly able to bear his own remorse: nor Miss Harlowe hers; she breaking out into words, 'How taunt-'ingly did I write to her! How barba-'rously did I insult her! Yet how pa-'tiently did she take it!—Who would 'have thought she had been so near her 'end!—O brother, brother!—But for 'you!—But for you!'—'Double not 'upon me,' said he, 'my own woes! 'I have every-thing before me that 'has passed! I thought only to re-'claim a dear creature that had erred! 'I intended not to break her tender 'heart! But it was the villainous Love-'lace who did that—Not any of us! '—Yet, cousin, did she not attribute all 'to me?—I fear she did!—Tell me 'only, did she name me, did she speak 'of me in her last hours? I hope she, 'who could forgive the greatest villain 'on earth, and plead that he may be 'safe from our vengeance, I hope she 'could forgive me.'

'She died blessing you all; and jus-'tified rather than condemned your se-'verity to her.' Their

Then they ſet up another general lamentation. 'We ſee,' ſaid her father, 'enough, we ſee in her heart-piercing 'letters to us, what a happy frame ſhe 'was in a few days before her death— 'But did it hold to the laſt? Had ſhe 'no repinings? Had the dear child no 'heart-burnings?'

'None at all!—I never ſaw, and 'never ſhall ſee, ſo bleſſed a departure: 'and no wonder; for I never heard of 'ſuch a preparation. Every hour, for 'weeks together, was taken up in it. 'Let this be our comfort: we need only 'to wiſh for ſo happy an end for our'ſelves, and for thoſe who are neareſt 'to our hearts. We may any of us 'be grieved for acts of unkindneſs to 'her: but had all happened that once 'ſhe wiſhed for, ſhe could not have made 'a happier, perhaps not ſo happy an 'end.'

'Dear ſoul!' and 'Dear ſweet ſoul!' the father, uncles, ſiſter, my couſin Hervey, cried out all at once, in accents of anguiſh inexpreſſibly affecting.

'We muſt for ever be diſturbed for 'thoſe acts of unkindneſs to ſo ſweet 'a child!' cried the unhappy mother. '—Indeed! indeed!' [ſoftly to her ſiſter Hervey] 'I have been too paſſive, 'much too paſſive, in this caſe!—The 'temporary quiet I have been ſo ſtu'dious all my life to preſerve, has coſt 'me everlaſting diſquiet!'——There ſhe ſtopt.

'Dear ſiſter!' was all Mrs. Hervey could ſay.

'I have done but half my duty to the 'deareſt and moſt meritorious of chil'dren!' reſumed the ſorrowing mother. —'Nay, not half!—How have we har'dened our hearts againſt her!'—Again her tears denied paſſage to her words.

'My deareſt, deareſt ſiſter!' again was all Mrs. Hervey could ſay.

'Would to Heaven,' proceeded, exclaiming, the poor mother, 'I had but 'once ſeen her!' Then turning to my couſin James, and his ſiſter—'O my 'ſon!—O my Arabella!—If WE were 'to receive as little mercy—' And there again ſhe ſtopt, her tears interrupting her further ſpeech; every-one, all the time, remaining ſilent; their countenances ſhewing a grief in their hearts too big for expreſſion.

Now you ſee, Mr. Belford, that my deareſt couſin could be allowed all her merit!—What a dreadful thing is after-reflection upon a conduct ſo perverſe and unnatural?

O this curſed friend of yours, Mr. Belford! This deteſted Lov[illegible] To him, to him is owing—Pardon me, Sir. I will lay down my pen till I have recovered my temper.

ONE IN THE MORNING.

In vain, Sir, have I endeavoured to compoſe myſelf to reſt. You wiſhed me to be very particular, and I cannot help it. This melancholy ſubject fills my whole mind. I will proceed, though it be midnight.

About ſix o'clock the herſe came to the outward gate—The pariſh-church is at ſome diſtance; but the wind ſetting fair, the afflicted family were ſhock, juſt before it came, into a freſh fit of grief, on hearing the funeral bell tolled in a very ſolemn manner. A reſpect, as it proved, and as they all gueſſed, paid to the memory of the dear deceaſed, out of officious love, as the herſe paſſed near the church.

Judge, when their grief was ſo great in expectation of it, what it muſt be when it arrived.

A ſervant came in to acquaint us, with what it's lumbering heavy noiſe up the paved inner court-yard apprized us of before. He ſpoke not. He could not ſpeak. He looked, bowed, and withdrew.

I ſtept out. No one elſe could then ſtir. Her brother, however, ſoon followed me. When I came to the door, I beheld a ſight very affecting.

You have heard, Sir, how univerſally my dear couſin was beloved. By the poor and middling ſort eſpecially, no young lady was ever ſo much beloved. And with reaſon: ſhe was the common patroneſs of all the honeſt poor in her neighbourhood.

It is natural for us, in every deep and ſincere grief, to intereſt all we know in what is ſo concerning to ourſelves. The ſervants of the family, it ſeems, had told their friends, and thoſe theirs; that though, living, their dear young lady could not be received nor looked upon, her body was permitted to be brought home. The ſpace of time was ſo confined, that thoſe who knew when ſhe died, muſt eaſily gueſs near the time the herſe was to come. A herſe, paſſing through country villages, and from London, however ſlenderly attended, (for the chariot, as I have ſaid, waited upon poor Mrs. Norton) takes every-one's attention. Nor was it hard to gueſs whoſe this muſt be, though not adorned by eſcutcheons, when the croſs-roads to Harlowe Place were taken, as ſoon ſame as he came within ſix miles of it: ſo that the herſe, and the ſolemn tolling of the bell, had drawn together at leaſt fifty of the neighbouring men, women, and children, and ſome of good appearance. Not a ſoul of them, it ſeems, with a dry eye, and each lamenting the death of this admirable lady, who, as I am told, never ſtirred out, but ſomebody was the better for her.

Theſe, when the coffin was taken out of the herſe, crouding about it, hindered, for a few moments, it's being carried in; the young people ſtruggling who ſhould bear it; and yet, with reſpectful whiſperings, rather than clamorous contention. A mark of veneration I had never before ſeen paid, upon any occaſion, in all my travels, from the under-bred many, from whom noiſe is generally inſeparable in all their emulations.

At laſt ſix maidens were permitted to carry it in by the ſix handles.

The corpſe was thus borne, with the moſt ſolemn reſpect, into the hall, and placed for the preſent upon two ſtools there. The plates, and emblems, and inſcription, ſet every one gazing upon it, and admiring it. The more, when they were told, that all was of her own ordering. They wiſhed to be permitted a ſight of the corpſe; but rather mentioned this as their wiſh than as their hope. When they had all ſatisfied their curioſity, and remarked upon the emblems, they diſperſed with bleſſings upon her memory, and with tears and lamentations; pronouncing her to be happy; and inferring, were ſhe not ſo, what would become of them? While others ran over with repetitions of the good ſhe delighted to do. Nor were there wanting thoſe among them, who heaped curſes upon the man who was the author of her faſt.

The ſervants of the family then got about the coffin. They could not before: and that afforded a new ſcene of ſorrow: but a ſilent one; for they ſpoke only by their eyes, and by ſighs, looking upon the lid, and upon one another, by turns, with hands lifted up. The preſence of their young maſter poſſibly might awe them, and cauſe their grief to be expreſſed only in dumb ſhew.

As for Mr. James Harlowe, (who accompanied me, but withdrew when he ſaw the crowd) he ſtood looking upon the lid, when the people had left it, with a fixed attention: yet, I dare ſay, knew not a ſymbol or letter upon it at that moment, had the queſtion been aſked him. In a profound reverie he ſtood, his arms folded, his head on one ſide, and marks of ſtupefaction imprinted upon every feature.

But when the corpſe was carried into the leſſer parlour, adjoining to the hall, which ſhe uſed to call her parlour, and put upon a table in the midſt of the room, and her father and mother, the two uncles, her aunt Hervey, and her ſiſter, came in, joining her brother and me, with trembling feet, and eager woe, the ſcene was ſtill more affecting. Their ſorrow was heightened, no doubt, by the remembrance of their unforgiving ſeverity: and now ſeeing before them the receptacle that contained the glory of their family, who ſo lately was driven thence by their indiſcreet violence; never, never more to be reſtored to them! no wonder that their grief was more than common grief.

They would have withheld the mother, it ſeems, from coming in: but when they could not, though undetermined before, they all bore her company, led on by an impulſe they could not reſiſt. The poor lady but juſt caſt her eye upon the coffin, and then ſnatched it away, retiring with paſſionate grief towards the window; yet addreſſing herſelf, with claſped hands, as if to her beloved daughter: 'O my child, my 'child!' cried ſhe; 'thou pride of my 'hope! Why was I not permitted to 'ſpeak pardon and peace to thee!—O 'forgive thy cruel mother!'

Her ſon (his heart then ſoftened, as his eyes ſhewed) beſought her to withdraw: and her woman looking in at that moment, he called her to aſſiſt him in conducting her lady into the middle-parlour; and then returning, met his father going out the door, who alſo had but juſt caſt his eye on the coffin, and yielded to my intreaties to withdraw. His grief was too deep for utterance, till he ſaw his ſon coming in; and then, fetching a heavy groan, 'Never,' ſaid he, 'was ſorrow like 'my ſorrow!—O Son! Son!'—in a reproaching accent, his face turned from him.

I attended him through the middle-parlour, endeavouring to conſole him. His lady was there in agonies. She took his e.e. He made a motion towards her: 'O my dear,' ſaid he—But turning ſhort, his eyes as full as his heart, he haſtened through to the great parlour: and when there, he deſired me to leave him to himſelf.

The uncles and the ſiſter looked and turned away, very often, upon the emblems, in ſilent ſorrow. Mrs. Hervey would have read to them the inſcription —Theſe words ſhe did read, 'Here the 'wicked ceaſe from troubling—' But could read no farther. Her tears fell in large drops upon the plate ſhe was contemplating; and yet ſhe was deſirous of gratifying a curioſity that mingled impatience with her grief becauſe ſhe could not gratify it, although ſhe often wiped her eyes as they flowed.

Judge you, Mr. Belford, (for you have great humanity) how I muſt be affected. Yet was I forced to try to comfort them all.

But here I will cloſe this letter in order to ſend it to you in the morning early. Nevertheleſs, I will begin another, upon ſuppoſition that my doleful prolixity will not be diſagreeable to you. Indeed I am altogether indiſpoſed for reſt, as I mentioned before. So can do nothing but write. I have alſo more melancholy ſcenes to paint. My pen, if I may ſo ſay, is untired. Theſe ſcenes are freſh upon my memory: and I myſelf, perhaps, may owe to you the favour of a review of them, with ſuch other papers as you ſhall think proper to oblige me with, when heavy grief has given way to milder melancholy.

My ſervant, in his way to you with this letter, ſhall call at St. Alb-n's upon the good woman, that he may inform you how ſhe does. Miſs Arabella aſked me after her, when I withdrew to my chamber; to which ſhe complaiſantly accompanied me. She was much concerned at the bad way we left her in; and ſaid her mother would be more ſo.

No wonder that the dear departed, who foreſaw the remorſe that would fall to the lot of this unhappy family when they came to have the news of her death confirmed to them, was ſo grieved for their apprehended grief, and endeavoured to comfort them by her poſthumous letters. But it was ſtill a greater generoſity in her to try to excuſe them to me, as ſhe did when we were alone together, a few hours before ſhe died; and to aggravate more than (as far as I can find) ſhe ought to have done, the only error ſhe was ever guilty of. The more freely, however, perhaps (exalted creature!) that I might think the better of her friends, although at her own expence. I am, dear Sir, your faithful and obedient ſervant,

WHEN the unhappy mourners were all retired, I directed the lid of the coffin to be unſcrewed, and cauſed ſome freſh aromaticks and flowers to be put into it.

The corpſe was very little altered, notwithſtanding the journey. The ſweet ſmile remained.

The maids who brought the flowers were ambitious of ſtrewing them about it: they poured forth freſh lamentations over her; each wiſhing ſhe had been ſo happy as to have been allowed to attend her in London. One of them particularly, who is, it ſeems, my couſin Arabella's perſonal ſervant, was more clamorous in her grief than any of the reſt; and the moment ſhe turned her back, all the others allowed ſhe had reaſon for it. I enquired afterwards about her, and found, that this creature was ſet over my dear couſin, when ſhe was confined to her chamber by indiſcreet ſeverity.

Good Heaven! that they ſhould treat, and ſuffer thus to be treated, a young lady, who was qualified to give laws to all her family!

When my couſins were told, that the lid was unſcrewed, they preſſed in again, all but the mournful father and mother, as if by conſent. Mrs. Hervey kiſſed her pale lips. 'Flower of the world!' was all ſhe could ſay; and gave place to Miſs Arabella; who kiſſing the forehead of her whom ſhe had ſo cruelly treated, could only ſay, to my couſin James, (looking upon the corpſe, and him) 'O brother!'—While he, taking the fair lifeleſs hand, kiſſed it, and retreated with precipitation.

Her two uncles were ſpeechleſs. They ſeemed to wait each other's example, whether to look upon the corpſe, or not. I ordered the lid to be replaced; and then they preſſed forward, as the others again did, to take a laſt farewel of the caſket which ſo lately contained ſo rich a jewel.

Then it was that the grief of each found fluent expreſſion; and the fair corpſe was addreſſed to, with all the tenderneſs that the ſincereſt love and warmeſt admiration could inſpire; each according to their different degrees of relationſhip, as if none of them had before looked upon her. She was their very niece! both uncles ſaid—The in-joined faint! her uncle Harlowe—The ſame ſmiling ſiſter! Arabella—The dear creature! all of them—The ſame ſweet compoſure! The ſame natural dignity!—She was queſtionleſs happy! That ſweet ſmile betokened her being ſo!—Themſelves moſt unhappy!—And then, once more, the brother took the lifeleſs hand, and vowed revenge upon it, on the curſed author of all this diſtreſs.

The unhappy parents propoſed to take one laſt view and farewel of their once darling daughter. The father was got to the parlour-door, after the inconſolable mother: but neither of them were able to enter it. The mother ſaid, She muſt once more ſee the child of her heart, or ſhe ſhould never enjoy herſelf. But they both agreed to refer their melancholy curioſity till the next day; and hand in hand retired inconſolable, and ſpeechleſs both, their faces overſpread with woe, and turned from each other, as unable each to behold the diſtreſs of the other.

When all were withdrawn, I retired, and ſent for my couſin James, and acquainted him with his ſiſter's requeſt in relation to the diſcourſe to be pronounced at her interment; telling him how neceſſary it was, that the miniſter, whoever he were, ſhould have the earlieſt notice given him that the caſe would admit. He lamented the death of the Reverend Dr. Lewen, who, as he ſaid, was a great admirer of his ſiſter, as ſhe was of him, and would have been the fitteſt of all men for that office. He ſpoke with great aſperity of Mr. Brand, upon whoſe light enquiry after his ſiſter's character in town, he was willing to lay ſome of the blame due to himſelf. Mr. Melvill, Dr. Lewen's aſſiſtant, muſt, he ſaid, be the man; and he praiſed him for his abilities, his elocution, and unexceptionable manners; and promiſed to engage him early in the morning.

He called out his ſiſter, and ſhe was of his opinion. So I left this upon them.

They both, with no little warmth, hinted their diſapprobation of you, Sir, for their ſiſter's executor, on the ſcore of your intimate friendſhip with the author of her ruin.

You muſt not reſent any-thing I ſhall communicate to you of what they ſay on this occaſion: depending that you will not, I ſhall write with the greater freedom.

I told them how much my dear couſin was obliged to your friendſhip and humanity: the injunctions ſhe had laid you under, and your own inclination to obſerve them. I ſaid, That you were a man of honour: that you were deſirous of conſulting me, becauſe you would not willingly give offence to any of them; and that I was very fond of cultivating your favour and correſpondence.

They ſaid, There was no need of an executor out of their family; and they hoped that you would relinquiſh ſo unneceſſary a truſt, as they called it. My couſin James declared, that he would write to you as ſoon as the funeral was over, to deſire that you would do ſo, upon proper aſſurances that all that the will preſcribed ſhould be performed.

I ſaid, You were a man of reſolution: that I thought he would hardly ſucceed; for that you made a point of honour of it.

I then ſhewed them their ſiſter's poſthumous letter to you; in which ſhe confeſſes her obligations to you, and regard for you, and for your future welfare. You may believe, Sir, they were extremely affected with the peruſal of it.

They were ſurpriſed, that I had given up to you the produce of her grandfather's eſtate, ſince his death. I told them plainly, that they muſt thank themſelves if any-thing diſagreeable to them occurred from their ſiſter's deviſe; deſerted, and thrown into the hands of ſtrangers, as ſhe had been.

They ſaid, they would report all I had ſaid to their father and mother; adding, that great as their trouble was, they found they had more ſtill to come. But if Mr. Belford were to be the executor of her will, contrary to their hopes, they beſought me to take the trouble of tranſacting every-thing with you; that a friend of the man to whom they owed all their calamity, might not appear to them.

They were extremely moved at the text their ſiſter had choſen for the ſubject of the funeral diſcourſe. I had extracted from the will that article, ſuppoſing it probable, that I might not ſo ſoon have an opportunity to ſhew them the will itſelf, as would otherwiſe have been neceſſary, on account of the interment; which cannot be delayed.

Published by Alex.r Hogg, N.o 16 Paternoster Row Dec.r 21.1783.

Belle reſt as I, has written to Mr. Melvill, who has promiſed to draw up a brief eulogium on the deceaſed. Miſs Howe is expected here by-and-by, to ſee, for the laſt time, her beloved friend.

Miſs Howe, by her meſſenger, deſires ſhe may not be taken any notice of. She ſhall not tarry ſix minutes, was the word. Her deſire will be eaſily granted her.

Her ſervant, who brought the requeſt, if it were denied, was to return, and meet her; for ſhe was ready to ſet out in her chariot, when he got on horſeback.

If he met her not with the refuſal, he was to ſtay here till ſhe came. I am, Sir, your faithful humble ſervant,

MONDAY AFTERNOON, SEPT. 11.

SIR,

WE are ſuch bad company here to one another, that it is ſome relief to retire and write.

I was ſummoned to breakfaſt about half an hour after nine. Slowly did the mournful congreſs meet. Each, lifeleſs and ſpiritleſs, took our places, with ſwoln eyes, enquiring, without expecting any tolerable account, how each had reſted.

The ſorrowing mother gave for anſwer, That ſhe ſhould never more know what reſt was.

By the time we were well ſeated, the bell ringing, the outward gate opening, a chariot rattling over the pavement of the court-yard, put them into emotion.

I left them; and was juſt time enough to give Miſs Howe my hand, as ſhe alighted: her maid in tears remaining in the chariot.

I think you told me, Sir, you never ſaw Miſs Howe. She is a fine graceful young lady. A fixed melancholy on her whole aſpect, overclouded a vivacity and fire, which, nevertheleſs, darted now-and-then through the awful gloom. I ſhall ever reſpect her for her love to my dear couſin.

'Never did I think,' ſaid ſhe, as ſhe gave me her hand, 'to enter more theſe 'doors: but, living or dead, Clariſſa 'brings me after her any-whither!'

She entered with me the little parlour; and ſeeing the coffin, withdrew her hand from mine, and with impatience puſhed aſide the lid. As impatiently ſhe removed the face-cloth. In a wild air, ſhe claſped her uplifted hands together; and now looked upon the corpſe, now up to Heaven, as if appealing to that. Her boſom heaved and fluttered diſcernible through her handkerchief, and at laſt ſhe broke ſilence—'O Sir! —See you not here!—' See you not 'here!—the glory of her ſex!—Thus 'by the moſt villainous of yours—that —laid low!

'O my bleſſed friend!'—ſaid ſhe— 'My ſweet companion!—my lovely 'monitreſs!'—kiſſing her lips at every tender appellation—'And is this all!— 'Is it all, of my CLARISSA's ſtory!'

Then, after a ſhort pauſe, and a profound ſigh, ſhe turned to me, and then to her breathleſs friend. 'But is ſhe— 'can ſhe be—really dead!—O no!— 'She only ſleeps!—Awake, my beloved 'friend!—My ſweet clay-cold friend, 'awake!—Let thy Anna Howe revive 'thee—by her warm breath revive 'thee—my dear creature!'—And, kiſſing her again, 'Let my warm lips ani- 'mate thy cold ones!'

Then, ſighing again, as from the bottom of her heart, and with an air, as if diſappointed, that ſhe anſwered not, 'And can ſuch perfection end thus!— 'And art thou really and indeed flown 'from thine Anna Howe!—O my un- 'kind CLARISSA!'

She was ſilent a few moments, and then, ſeeming to recover herſelf, ſhe turned to me—'Forgive, forgive, Mr. 'Morden, this wild phrenzy!—I am 'not myſelf!—I never ſhall be!—You 'knew not the excellence—no, not half 'the excellence—that is thus laid low!' —Repeating, 'This cannot, ſurely, be 'all of my CLARISSA's ſtory!'

Again pauſing—'One tear, my be- 'loved friend, didſt thou allow me!— 'But this dumb ſorrow!—O for a tear 'to eaſe my full-ſwoln heart, that is 'juſt burſting!

'But why, Sir—why, Mr. Morden— 'was ſhe ſent hither?—Why not to us? '—She has no father, no mother, no 'relation—no, not one!—They had all 'renounced her. I was her ſympathi- 'zing friend—And had not I the beſt 'right to my dear creature's remains? '—And muſt names, without nature, 'be preferred to ſuch a love as mine!'

Again ſhe kiſſed her lips, each cheek, her forehead;—and ſighed as if her heart would break.

'But why, why,' ſaid ſhe, 'was I 'witheld from ſeeing my deareſt dear 'friend, before ſhe commenced angel? '—Delaying ſtill, and too eaſily ſa- 'tisfied

'fettled to delay, the friendly visit that 'my heart panted after; what pain will 'this reflection give me!—O my blessed 'friend! Who knows—who knows—had I come in time, what my cordial 'comfortings might have done for thee! '—But,' looking round her, as if she apprehended seeing some of the family, 'one more kiss, my angel, my friend, 'my ever-to-be-regretted, lost companion! And let me fly this hated house, 'which I never loved but for thy sake! '—Adieu, then, my dearest CLARISSA! '—Thou art happy, I doubt not, as thou 'assuredst me in thy last letter!—O may 'we meet, and rejoice together, where 'no villainous Lovelaces, no hard-hearted 'relations, will ever shock our innocence, 'or ruffle our felicity!'

Again she was silent, unable to go, though seeming to intend it; struggling, as it were, with her grief, and heaving with anguish: at last, happily, a flood of tears gushed from her eyes—'Now! '—Now!' said she—'shall I—shall I—'be easier. But for this kind relief, my 'heart would have burst asunder—'More, many more tears than these are 'due to my CLARISSA, whose counsel 'has done for me what mine could not 'do for her!—But why,' looking earnestly upon her, her hands clasped and lifted up—'But why do I thus lament 'the HAPPY? And that thou art so, is 'my comfort. It is—it is—my dear 'creature!'—kissing her again.

'Excuse me, Sir,' [turning to me, who was as much moved as herself;] 'I loved the dear creature, as never wo-'man loved another. Excuse my fran-'tick grief. How has the glory of her 'sex fallen a victim to villainy, and to 'hard-heartedness!'

'Madam,' said I, 'they all have it!—'Now indeed they have it—'

'And let them have it!—I should 'belye my love for the friend of my 'heart, were I to pity them!—But how 'unhappy am I,' [looking upon her] 'that I saw her not before these eyes 'were shut, before these lips were for 'ever closed!—Oh, Sir! you know not 'the wisdom that continually flowed 'from these lips when she spoke!—Nor 'what a friend I have lost!'

Then, surveying the lid, she seemed to take in at once the meaning of the emblems; and this gave her so much fresh grief, that though she several times wiped her eyes, she was unable to read the inscription and texts: turning therefore to me, 'Favour me, Sir, I pray 'you, by a line, with the description of 'these emblems, and with these texts: 'and if I might be allowed a lock of 'the dear creature's hair—'

I told her, that her executor would order both; and would also send her a copy of her last will; in which she would find the most grateful remembrances of her love for her, whom she calls the sister of her heart.

'Justly,' said she, 'does she call me 'so; for we had but one heart, but one 'soul, between us: and now my better 'half is torn from me—what shall I do?

But looking round her, on a servant's stepping by the door, as if again she had apprehended it was some of the family—'Once more,' said she, 'a solemn, an 'everlasting adieu!—Alas for me! a 'solemn, an everlasting adieu!'

Then again embracing her face with both her hands, and kissing it, and afterwards the hands of the dear deceased, first one, then the other, she gave me her hand, and, quitting the room with precipitation, rushed into her chariot; and, when there, with profound sighs, and a fresh burst of tears, unable to speak, she bowed her head to me, and was driven away.

The inconsolable company saw how much I had been moved, on my return to them. Mr. James Harlowe had been telling them what had passed between him and me: and, finding myself unfit for company, and observing, that they broke off talking at my coming in, I thought it proper to leave them to their consultations.

And here I will put an end to this letter; for indeed, Sir, the very recollection of this affecting scene has left me nearly as unable to proceed, as I was, just after it, to converse with my cousins. I am, Sir, with great truth, your most obedient humble servant,

IN CONTINUATION.

TUESDAY MORNING, SEPT. 12.

THE good Mrs. Norton is arrived, a little amended in her spirits: owing to the very posthumous letters, as I may call them, which you, Mr. Belford, as well as I, apprehended would have had fatal effects upon her.

I cannot but attribute this to the right turn of her mind. It seems she has been enured to afflictions; and has lived in a constant hope of a better life; and, having no acts of unkindness to the dear deceased deceaſed to reproach herſelf with, is moſt conſiderately reſolved to exert her utmoſt fortitude in order to comfort the ſorrowing mother.

O Mr. Belford, how does the character of my dear departed couſin riſe upon me from every mouth!—Had ſhe been my own child, or my ſiſter!—But do you think, that the man who occaſioned this great, this extended ruin—But I forbear.

The will is not to be looked into, till the funeral rites are performed. Preparations are making for the ſolemnity; and the ſervants, as well as principals of all the branches of the family, are put into cloſe mourning.

I have ſeen Mr. Melvill. He is a ſerious and ſenſible man. I have given him particulars to go upon in the diſcourſe he is to pronounce at the funeral: but had the leſs need to do this, as I find he is extremely well acquainted with the whole unhappy ſtory; and was a perſonal admirer of my dear couſin, and a ſincere lamenter of her misfortunes and death. The reverend Dr. Lewen, who is but very lately dead, was his particular friend, and had once intended to recommend him to her favour and notice.

I AM juſt returned from attending the afflicted parents, in an effort they made to ſee the corpſe of their beloved child. They had requeſted my company, and that of the good Mrs. Norton. A laſt leave, the mother ſaid, ſhe muſt take!

An effort, however, it was, and no more. The moment they came in ſight of the coffin, before the lid could be put aſide, 'O my dear,' ſaid the father, retreating, 'I cannot, I find I cannot, 'bear it!—Had I—Had I—Had I never 'been hard-hearted!'—Then turning round to his lady, he had but juſt time to catch her in his arms, and prevent her ſinking on the floor.—'O my deareſt life!' ſaid he, 'this is too much!—'Too much, indeed!—Let us, let us 'retire.' Mrs. Norton, who (attracted by the awful receptacle) had but juſt left the good lady, haſtened to her——'Dear, dear woman,' cried the unhappy parent, flinging her arms about her neck, 'bear me, bear me hence!—'O my child!—my child!—My own 'Clariſſa Harlowe!—Thou pride of my 'life ſo lately!—Never, never more, 'muſt I behold thee!'

I ſupported the unhappy father, Mrs. Norton the ſinking mother, into the next parlour. She threw herſelf on a ſettee there: he into an elbow-chair by her: the good woman at her feet, her arms claſped round her waiſt. The two mothers, as I may call them, of my beloved couſin, thus tenderly engaged!—What a variety of diſtreſs in theſe woeful ſcenes!

The unhappy father, in endeavouring to comfort his lady, loaded himſelf.—'Would to God, my dear,' ſaid he, 'would to God I had no more to charge 'myſelf with, than you have!—You re-'lented!—You would have prevailed 'upon me to relent!'

'The greater my fault,' ſaid ſhe, 'when I knew that diſpleaſure was car-'ried too high, to acquieſce as I did!—'What a barbarous parent was I, to let 'two angry children make me forget 'that I was mother to a third—To ſuch 'a third!'

Mrs. Norton uſed arguments and prayers to comfort her—'O my dear 'Norton,' anſwered the unhappy lady, 'you was the dear creature's more natu-'ral mother!—Would to Heaven I had 'no more to anſwer for than you have!'

Thus the unhappy pair unavailingly recriminated, till my couſin Hervey entered, and, with Mrs. Norton, conducted up to her own chamber the inconſolable mother. The two uncles, and Mr. Hervey, came in at the ſame time, and prevailed upon the afflicted father to retire with them to his—Both giving up all thoughts of ever more ſeeing the child whoſe death was ſo ſeverely regretted by them.

Time only, Mr. Belford, can combat with advantage ſuch a heavy deprivation as this. Advice will not do, while the loſs is recent. Nature will have way given to it, (and ſo it ought) till ſorrow has in a manner exhauſted itſelf; and then reaſon and religion will come in ſeaſonably with their powerful aids to raiſe the drooping heart.

I ſee here no face that is the ſame I ſaw at my firſt arrival. Proud and haughty every countenance then, unyielding to entreaty: now, how greatly are they humbled!—The utmoſt diſtreſs is apparent in every protracted feature, and in every burſting muſcle, of each diſconſolate mourner. Their eyes, which ſo lately flaſhed anger and reſentment, now are turned to every-one that approaches them, as if imploring pity!—Could ever wilful hard-heartedneſs be more ſeverely puniſhed?

The following lines of Juvenal are, upon upon the whole, applicable to this houſe and family: and I have revolved them many times ſince Sunday evening—

'Humani generis mores tibi noſſe volenti
'Sufficit una domus: paucos conſumere dies, &
'Dicere te miſerum, poſtquam illinc veneris,
'aude.'

Let me add, That Mrs. Norton has communicated to the family the poſthumous letter ſent her. This letter affords a foundation for future conſolation to them; but at preſent it has new-pointed their grief, by making them reflect on their cruelty to ſo excellent a daughter, niece, and ſiſter. I am, dear Sir, your very humble ſervant,

LETTER XLVI.

COLONEL MORDEN.

IN CONTINUATION.

THURSDAY NIGHT, SEPT. 14.

WE are juſt returned from the ſolemnization of the laſt mournful rite. My couſin James and his ſiſter, Mr. and Mrs. Hervey, and their daughter, a young lady whoſe affection for my departed couſin ſhall ever bind me to her; my couſins John and Antony Harlowe, myſelf, and ſome other more diſtant relations of the names of Fuller and Allinſon, (who, to teſtify their reſpect to the memory of the dear deceaſed, had put themſelves in mourning) ſelf-invited, attended it.

The father and mother would have joined in theſe laſt honours had they been able: but they were both very much indiſpoſed; and continue to be ſo.

The inconſolable mother told Mrs. Norton, that the two mothers of the ſweeteſt child in the world, ought not, on this occaſion, to be ſeparated. She therefore deſired her to ſtay with her.

The whole ſolemnity was performed with great decency and order. The diſtance from Harlowe Place to the church is about half a mile. All the way the corpſe was attended by great numbers of people of all conditions.

It was nine when it entered the church; every corner of which was crouded. Such a profound, ſuch a ſilent reſpect did I never ſee paid at the funeral of princes. An attentive ſadneſs overſpread the face of all.

The eulogy pronounced by Mr. Melvill was a very pathetick one. He wiped his own eyes often, and made everybody preſent ſtill oftener wipe theirs.

The auditors were moſt particularly affected, when he told them that the ſolemn text was her own choice.

He enumerated her fine qualities, naming with honour their late worthy paſtor for his authority.

Every enumerated excellence was witneſſed to in different parts of the church in reſpectful whiſpers by different perſons, as of their own knowledge, as I have ſince been informed.

When he pointed to the pew where (doing credit to religion by her example) ſhe uſed to ſit or kneel, the whole auditory, as one perſon, turned to the pew with the moſt reſpectful ſolemnity, as if ſhe had been herſelf there.

When the gentleman attributed condeſcenſion and mingled dignity to her, a buzzing approbation was given to the attribute throughout the church; and a poor neat woman under my pew added, that ſhe was indeed all graciouſneſs, and would ſpeak to any-body.

Many eyes ran over, when he mentioned her charities, her well-judged charities. And her reward was decreed from every mouth, with ſighs and ſobs from ſome, and theſe words from others, 'The poor will dearly miſs her.'

The cheerful giver whom God is ſaid to love, was allowed to be her: and a young lady, I am told, ſaid, 'It was 'Miſs Clariſſa Harlowe's care to find 'out the unhappy, upon a ſudden diſ-'treſs, before the ſighing heart was 'overwhelmed by it.'

She had a ſet of poor people, choſen for their remarkable honeſty and ineffectual induſtry. Theſe voluntarily paid their laſt attendance on their benefactreſs; and mingling in the church as they could croud near the aiſle where the corpſe was on ſtands, it was the leſs wonder that her praiſes from the preacher met with ſuch general and ſuch grateful whiſpers of approbation.

Some it ſeems there were, who knowing her unhappy ſtory, remarked upon the dejected looks of the brother, and the drowned eyes of the ſiſter; O what would they now give, they'd warrant, had they not been ſo hard-hearted!—Others purſued, as I may ſay, the ſevere father, and unhappy mother, into their chambers at home—They anſwered for their relenting, now, that it was too late!—What muſt be their grief!—No wonder they could not be preſent!

Several expreſſed their aſtoniſhment, as people do every hour, that a man could live whom ſuch perfections could not engage to be juſt to her; to be humane, mane, I may ſay.—And who, her rank and fortune conſidered, could be ſo diſregardful of his own intereſt, had he had no other motive to be juſt!

The good divine, led by his text, juſt touched upon the unhappy ſtep that was the cauſe of her untimely fate. He attributed it to the ſtate of things below, in which there could not be abſolute perfection. He very politely touched upon the noble diſdain ſhe ſhewed (though earneſtly ſolicited by a whole ſplendid family) to join intereſts with a man whom ſhe found unworthy of her eſteem and confidence: and who courted her with the utmoſt earneſtneſs to accept of him.

What he moſt inſiſted upon was, the happy end ſhe made; and thence drew conſolation to her relations, and inſtruction to the auditory.

In a word, his performance was ſuch as heightened the reputation which he had before in a very eminent degree obtained.

When the corpſe was to be carried down into the vault, (a very ſpacious one, within the church) there was great crouding to ſee the coffin-lid, and the devices upon it. Particularly two gentlemen muffled up in cloaks, preſſed forward. Theſe, it ſeems, were Mr. Mullins and Mr. Wyerley; both of them profeſſed admirers of my dear couſin.

When they came near the coffin, and caſt their eyes upon the lid, 'In that 'little ſpace,' ſaid Mr. Mullins, 'is 'included all human excellence!'—And then Mr. Wyerley, unable to contain himſelf, was forced to quit the church; and we hear is very ill.

It is ſaid that Mr. Solmes was in a remote part of the church wrapped round in a horſeman's coat: and that he ſhed tears ſeveral times. But I ſaw him not.

Another gentleman was there incognito, in a pew near the entrance of the vault, who had not been taken notice of, but for his great emotion when he looked over his pew, at the time the coffin was carried down to it's laſt place. This was Miſs Howe's worthy Mr. Hickman.

My couſins John and Antony, and their nephew James, choſe not to deſcend into the vault among their departed anceſtors.

Miſs Harlowe was extremely affected. Her conſcience, as well as her love, was concerned on the occaſion. She would go down with the corpſe of her dear, her only ſiſter, ſhe ſaid: but her brother would not permit it. And her overwhelmed eye purſued the coffin till ſhe could ſee no more of it: and then ſhe threw herſelf on the ſeat, and was near fainting away.

I accompanied it down, that I might not only ſatisfy myſelf, but you, Sir, her executor, that it was depoſited, as ſhe had directed, at the feet of her grandfather.

Mr. Melvill came down, contemplated the lid, and ſhed a few tears over it. I was ſo well ſatisfied with his diſcourſe and behaviour, that I preſented him on the ſolemn ſpot with a ring of ſome value; and thanked him for his performance.

And here I left the remains of my beloved couſin; having beſpoken my own place by the ſide of her coffin.

On my return to Harlowe Place, I contented myſelf with ſending my compliments to the ſorrowing parents, and retired to my chamber. Nor am I aſhamed to own, that I could not help giving way to a repeated fit of humanity, as ſoon as I entered it. I am, Sir, your moſt faithful and obedient ſervant,

WM. MORDEN.

P. S. You will have a letter from my couſin James, who hopes to prevail upon you to relinquiſh the executorſhip. It has not my encouragement.

LETTER XLVII.

MR. BELFORD, TO WILLIAM MORDEN, ESQ.

SATURDAY, SEPT. 16.

DEAR SIR,

I Once had thoughts to go down privately, in order, diſguiſed, to ſee the laſt ſolemnity performed. But there was no need to give myſelf this melancholy trouble, ſince your laſt letter ſo naturally deſcribes all that paſſed, that I have every ſcene before my eyes.

You croud me, Sir, methinks, into the ſilent ſlow proceſſion—Now with the ſacred bier do I enter the awful porch: now meaſure I, with ſolemn paces, the venerable aiſle: now, ambitious of a relationſhip to her, placed in a pew near to the eye-attracting coffin, do I liſten to the moving eulogy: now, through the buz of gaping, eye-ſwoln crowds, do I deſcend into the clammy vault, as a true executor, to ſee that part of her will performed with my own eyes. There, with a ſoul filled with muſing, do I number the ſurrounding monuments of mortality, and contemplate the preſent ſtillneſs of ſo many once buſy vanities, crouded all into one poor vaulted nook, as if the living grudged room for the corpſes of thoſe, for which, when animated, the earth, the air, and the waters, could hardly find room. Then ſeeing her placed at the feet of him whoſe earthly delight ſhe was; and who, as I find, aſcribes to the pleaſure ſhe gave him, the prolongation of his own life; ſighing, and with averted face, I quit the ſolemn manſion, the ſymbolick coffin, and, for ever, the glory of her ſex; and aſcend with thoſe, who, in a few years, after a very ſhort blaze of life, will fill up other ſpaces of the ſame vault, which now (while they mourn only for her, whom they jointly perſecuted) they preſs with their feet.

Nor do your affecting deſcriptions permit me here to ſtop: but, aſcended, I mingle my tears and my praiſes with thoſe of the numerous ſpectators. I accompany the afflicted mourners back to their uncomfortable manſion; and make one in the general concert of unavailing woe; till retiring as I imagine, as they retire, like them, in reality, I give up to new ſcenes of ſolitary and ſleepleſs grief; reflecting upon the perfections I have ſeen the end of; and having no relief but from an indignation, which makes me approve of the reſentments of others againſt the unhappy man, and thoſe equally unhappy relations of hers, to whom the irreparable loſs is owing.

Forgive me, Sir, theſe reflections; and permit me, with this, to ſend you what you declined receiving till the funeral was over—

He gives him then an account of the money and effects, which he ſends him down by this opportunity, for the legatees at Harlowe Place, and in its neighbourhood; which he deſires him to diſpoſe of according to the will.

He alſo ſends him an account of other ſteps he has taken in purſuance of the will; and deſires to know, if Mr. Harlowe expects the diſcharge of the funeral expences from the effects in his hands; and the reimburſement of the ſums advanced to the teſtatrix ſince her grandfather's death.

Theſe expeditious proceedings (ſays he) will convince Mr. James Harlowe, that I am reſolved to ſee the will completely executed; and yet, by my manner of doing it, that I deſire not to give unneceſſary mortifications to the family, ſince every-thing that relates to them ſhall paſs through your hands.

LETTER XLVIII.

MR. JAMES HARLOWE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

HARLOWE PLACE, FRIDAY NIGHT, SEPT. 15.

SIR,

I Hope, from the character my worthy couſin Morden gives you, that you will excuſe the application I make to you, to oblige a whole family in an affair that much concerns their peace, and cannot equally concern any-body elſe. You will immediately judge, Sir, that this is the executorſhip of which my ſiſter has given you the trouble by her laſt will.

We ſhall all think ourſelves extremely obliged to you, if you pleaſe to relinquiſh this truſt to our own family; the reaſons which follow pleading for our expectation of this favour from you:

Firſt, becauſe ſhe never would have had the thought of troubling you, Sir, if ſhe had believed any of her near relations would have taken it upon themſelves.

Secondly, I underſtand, that ſhe recommends to you in the will to truſt to the honour of any of our family, for the performance of ſuch of the articles as are of a domeſtick nature. We are any of us, and all of us, if you requeſt it, willing to ſtake our honours upon this occaſion: and all you can deſire, as a man of honour, is, that the truſt be executed.

We are the more concerned, Sir, to wiſh you to decline this office, becauſe of your ſhort and accidental knowledge of the dear teſtatrix, and long and intimate acquaintance with the man to whom ſhe owed her ruin, and we the greateſt loſs and diſappointment (her manifold excellences conſidered) that ever befel a family.

You will allow due weight, I dare ſay, to this plea, if you make our caſe your own: and ſo much the readier, when I aſſure you, that your interfering in this matter, ſo much againſt our inclinations, (excuſe, Sir, my plain-dealing) will probably occaſion an oppoſition in ſome points, where otherwiſe there might be none.

What therefore I propoſe is, not that my father ſhould aſſume this truſt: he is too much afflicted to undertake it—Nor yet myſelf—I might be thought too much concerned in intereſt: but that it may be allowed to devolve upon my two uncles; whoſe known honour, and whoſe affection to the dear deceaſed, nobody nobody ever doubted: and they will treat with you, Sir, through my couſin Morden, as to the points they will undertake to perform.

The trouble you have already had, will well entitle you to the legacy ſhe bequeathes you, together with the reimburſement of all the charges you have been at, and allowance of the legacies you have diſcharged, although you ſhould not have qualified yourſelf to act as an executor; as I preſume you have not yet done, nor will now do.

Your compliance, Sir, will oblige a family (who have already diſtreſs enough upon them) in the circumſtance that occaſions this application to you; and more particularly, Sir, your moſt humble ſervant,

JAMES HARLOWE, JUN.

I ſend this by one of my ſervants, who will attend your diſpatch.

LETTER XLIX.

MR. BELFORD, TO JAMES HARLOWE, JUN. ESQ.

SIR, SATURDAY, SEPT. 16.

YOU will excuſe my plain-dealing in turn: for I muſt obſerve, that if I had not the juſt opinion I have of the ſacred nature of the office I have undertaken, ſome paſſages in the letter you have favoured me with, would convince me that I ought not to excuſe myſelf from acting in it.

I need name only one of them. You are pleaſed to ſay, that your uncles, if the truſt be relinquiſhed to them, will treat with me, through Colonel Morden, as to the points they will undertake to perform.

Permit me, Sir, to ſay, that it is the duty of an executor to ſee every point performed, that can be performed. Nor will I leave the performance of mine to any other perſons, eſpecially where a qualifying is ſo directly intimated, and where all the branches of your family have ſhewn themſelves, with reſpect to the incomparable lady, to have but one mind.

You are pleaſed to urge, that ſhe recommends to me, the leaving to the honour of any of your family ſuch of the articles as are of a domeſtick nature. But admitting this to be ſo, does it not imply that the other articles are ſtill to obtain my care?—But even theſe, you will find by the will, ſhe gives not up; and to that I refer you.

I am ſorry for the hints you give of an oppoſition, where, as you ſay, there might be none, if I did not interfere. I ſee not, Sir, why your animoſity againſt a man who cannot be defended, ſhould be carried to ſuch a height againſt one who never gave you offence: and this only, becauſe he is acquainted with that man. I will not ſay all I might ſay on this occaſion.

As to the legacy to myſelf, I aſſure you, Sir, that neither my circumſtances, nor my temper, will put me upon being a gainer by the executorſhip. I ſhall take pleaſure to tread in the ſteps of the admirable teſtatrix in all I may; and rather will increaſe than diminiſh her poors fund.

With regard to the trouble that may attend the execution of the truſt, I ſhall not, in honour to her memory, value ten times more than this can give me. I have indeed two other executorſhips on my hands; but they ſit light upon me. And ſurvivors cannot better or more charitably beſtow their time.

I conceive that every article, but that relating to the poor's fund, (ſuch is the excellence of the diſpoſition of the moſt excellent of women) may be performed in two months time, at fartheſt.

Occaſions of litigation or offence ſhall not proceed from me. You need only apply to Colonel Morden, who ſhall command me in every-thing that the will allows me to oblige your family in. I do aſſure you, that I am as unwilling to obtrude myſelf upon it, as any of it can wiſh.

I own, that I have not yet proved the will; nor ſhall I do it till next week at ſooneſt, that you may have time for amicable objections, if ſuch you think fit to make through the colonel's mediation. But let me obſerve to you, Sir, That an executor's power, in ſuch inſtances as I have exerciſed it, is the ſame before the probate, as after it. He can even, without taking that out, commence an action, although he cannot declare upon it: and theſe acts of adminiſtration make him liable to actions himſelf. I am therefore very proper in the ſteps I have taken in part of the execution of this ſacred truſt; and want not allowance on the occaſion.

Permit me to add, That when you have peruſed the will, and coolly conſidered every-thing, it is my hope, that you will yourſelf be of opinion, that there can be no room for diſpute or oppoſition: and that if your family will join to expedite the execution, it will be the moſt natural and eaſy way of ſhutting up the whole affair, and to have done with a man, ſo cauſeleſsly, as to his own particular, the object of your diſlike, as is, Sir, your very humble ſervant (notwithſtanding)

JOHN BELFORD.

The WILL.

To which the following preamble, written on a ſeparate paper, was ſtitched with black ſilk.

'To my EXECUTOR.

'I Hope I may be excuſed for expatiating, in divers parts of this ſolemn laſt act, upon ſubjects of importance. For I have heard of ſo many inſtances of confuſion and diſagreement in families, and ſo much doubt and difficulty, for want of abſolute clearneſs in the teſtaments of departed perſons, that I have often concluded, (were there to be no other reaſons but thoſe which reſpect the peace of ſurviving friends) that this laſt act, as to it's deſignation and operation, ought not to be the laſt in it's compoſition or making; but ſhould be the reſult of cool deliberation; and (as is more frequently than juſtly ſaid) of a ſound mind and memory; which too ſeldom are to be met with but in ſound health. All pretences of inſanity of mind are likewiſe prevented, when a teſtator gives reaſons for what he wills; all cavils about words are obviated; the obliged are aſſured; and they enjoy the benefit for whom the benefit was intended. Hence have I, for ſome time paſt, employed myſelf in penning down heads of ſuch a diſpoſition; which, as reaſons offered, I have altered and added to; ſo that I never was abſolutely deſtitute of a will, had I been taken off ever ſo ſuddenly. Theſe minutes and imperfect ſketches enabled me, as God has graciouſly given me time and ſedateneſs, to digeſt them into the form in which they appear.

'I CLARISSA HARLOWE, now, by ſtrange melancholy accidents, lodging in the pariſh of St. Paul, Covent Garden, being of ſound and perfect mind and memory, as I hope theſe preſents, drawn up by myſelf, and written with my own hand, will teſtify; do [this —— day of ——] in the year of our Lord ——— make and publiſh this my laſt will and teſtament in manner and form following:

'In the firſt place, I deſire that my body may lie unburied three days after my deceaſe, or till the pleaſure of my father be known concerning it. But the occaſion of my death not admitting of doubt, I will not, on any account, that it be opened; and it is my deſire, that it ſhall not be touched but by thoſe of my own ſex.

'I have always earneſtly requeſted, that my body might be depoſited in the family-vault with thoſe of my anceſtors. If it might be granted, I could now wiſh, that it might be placed at the feet of my dear and honoured grandfather. But as I have, by one very unhappy ſtep, been thought to diſgrace my whole lineage, and therefore this laſt honour may be refuſed to my corpſe; in this caſe, my deſire is, that it may be interred in the church-yard belonging to the pariſh in which I ſhall die; and that in the moſt private manner, between the hours of eleven and twelve at night; attended only by Mrs. Lovick, and Mr. and Mrs. Smith, and their maid-ſervant.

'But it is my deſire, that the ſame fees and dues may be paid which are uſually paid for thoſe who are laid in the beſt ground, as it is called, or even in the chancel.—And I bequeathe five pounds to be given at the diſcretion of the church-wardens, to twenty poor people, the Sunday after my interment; and this whether I ſhall be buried here or elſewhere.

'I have already given verbal directions, that after I am dead, (and laid out in the manner I have ordered) I may be put into my coffin as ſoon as poſſible: it is my deſire, that I may not be unneceſſarily expoſed to the view of any-body; except any of my relations ſhould vouchſafe, for the laſt time, to look upon me.

'And I could wiſh, if it might be avoided without making ill-will between Mr. Lovelace and my executor, that the former might not be permitted to ſee my corpſe. But if, as he is a man very uncontroulable, and as I am nobody's, he inſiſt upon viewing her dead, whom he ONCE before ſaw in a manner dead, let his gay curioſity be gratified. Let him behold, and triumph over the wretched remains of one who has been made a victim to his barbarous perfidy: but let ſome good perſon, as by my deſire, give him a paper, whilſt he is viewing the ghaſtly ſpectacle, containing theſe few words only—"Gay, cruel heart!

'behold

"behold here the remains of the once-
"ruined, yet now happy, Clariſſa Har-
"lowe!—See what thou thyſelf muſt
"quickly be—and REPENT!"

'Yet, to ſhew that I die in perfect 'charity with all the world, I do moſt 'ſincerely forgive Mr. Lovelace the 'wrongs he has done me.

'If my father can pardon the errors 'of his unworthy child, ſo far as to 'ſuffer her corpſe to be depoſited at 'the feet of her grandfather, as above 'requeſted, I could wiſh (my misfor-'tunes being ſo notorious) that a ſhort 'diſcourſe might be pronounced over 'my remains, before they be interred. 'The ſubject of the diſcourſe I ſhall 'determine before I conclude this writ-'ing.

'So much written about what deſerves not 'the leaſt conſideration, and about what 'will be nothing when this writing comes 'to be opened and read, will be excuſed, 'when my preſent unhappy circumſtances 'and abſence from all my natural friends 'are conſidered.

'And now, with regard to the worldly 'matters which I ſhall die poſſeſſed of, 'as well as to thoſe which of right ap-'pertain to me, either by the will of my 'ſaid grandfather or otherwiſe; thus do 'I diſpoſe of them.

'In the firſt place, I give and be-'queathe all the real eſtates in or to 'which I have any claim or title by the 'ſaid will, to my ever-honoured father 'James Harlowe, Eſq. and that rather 'than to my brother and ſiſter, to whom 'I had once thoughts of deviſing them, 'becauſe, if they ſurvive my father, 'thoſe eſtates will aſſuredly veſt in them, 'or one of them, by virtue of his fa-'vour and indulgence, as the circum-'ſtances of things with regard to mar-'riage-ſettlements, or otherwiſe, may 'require; or, as they may reſpectively 'merit by the continuance of their 'duty.

'The houſe late my grandfather's, 'called The Grove, and by him, in ho-'nour of me, and of ſome of my volun-'tary employments, my Dairy Houſe, and 'the furniture thereof as it now ſtands, '(the pictures and large iron-cheſt of 'old plate excepted) I alſo bequeathe to 'my ſaid father; only begging it as a 'favour that he will be pleaſed to per-'mit my dear Mrs. Norton to paſs the 'remainder of her days in that houſe; 'and to have and enjoy the apartments 'in it known by the name of The Houſe-'keeper's Apartments, with the furniture 'in them; and which (plain and neat) 'was bought for me by my grandfather, 'who delighted to call me his houſe-'keeper; and which therefore in his 'life-time I uſed as ſuch: the office to 'go with the apartments. And I am 'the more earneſt in this recommen-'dation, as I had once thought to have 'been very happy there with the good 'woman; and becauſe I think her pru-'dent management will be as benefi-'cial to my father, as his favour can be 'convenient to her.

'But with regard to what has ac-'crued from that eſtate, ſince my grand-'father's death, and to the ſum of nine 'hundred and ſeventy pounds, which 'proved to be the moiety of the money 'that my ſaid grandfather had by him 'at his death, and which moiety he be-'queathed to me for my ſole and ſepa-'rate uſe; [as he did the other moiety 'in like manner to my ſiſter] and which 'ſum (that I might convince my brother 'and ſiſter, that I wiſhed not for an in-'dependence upon my father's pleaſure) 'I gave into my father's hands, toge-'ther with the management and produce 'of the whole eſtate deviſed to me—'Theſe ſums, however conſiderable 'when put together, I hope I may be 'allowed to diſpoſe of abſolutely, as my 'love and my gratitude (not confined 'only to my own family, which is very 'wealthy in all it's branches) may war-'rant: and which therefore I ſhall diſ-'poſe of in the manner hereafter men-'tioned. But it is my will, and expreſs 'direction, that my father's account of 'the above-mentioned produce may be 'taken and eſtabliſhed abſolutely (and 'without contravention or queſtion) as 'he ſhall be pleaſed to give it to my 'couſin Morden, or to whom elſe he 'ſhall be pleaſed to give it; ſo as that 'the ſaid account be not ſubject to liti-'gation, or to the controul of my ex-'ecutor, or of any other perſon.

'My father, of his love and bounty, 'was pleaſed to allow me the ſame quar-'terly ſums that he allowed my ſiſter for 'apparel and other requiſites; and '(pleaſed with me then) uſed to ſay, 'that thoſe ſums ſhould not be deducted 'from the eſtate and effects bequeathed 'to me by my grandfather: but having 'mortally offended him (as I fear it may 'be ſaid) by one unhappy ſtep, it may 'be expected that he will reimburſe 'himſelf thoſe ſums—It is therefore my 'will and direction, that he ſhall be al-'lowed to pay and ſatisfy himſelf for all 'ſuch quarterly or other ſums, which

'he

'he was ſo good as to advance me from 'the time of my grandfather's death; 'and that his account of ſuch ſums ſhall 'likewiſe be taken without queſtioning 'the money, however, which I left be- 'hind me in my eſcritoire, being to be 'taken in part of thoſe diſburſements.

'My grandfather, who, in his good- 'neſs and favour to me, knew no 'bounds, was pleaſed to bequeathe to 'me all the family pictures at his late 'houſe, ſome of which are very maſterly 'performances; with command, that if 'I died unmarried, or if married and 'had no deſcendants, they ſhould then 'go to that ſon of his (if more than one 'ſhould be then living) whom I ſhould 'think would ſet moſt value by them. 'Now, as I know that my honoured 'uncle, John Harlowe, eſq. was pleaſed 'to expreſs ſome concern that they were 'not left to him, as eldeſt ſon; and as 'he has a gallery where they may be 'placed to advantage; and as I have 'reaſon to believe, that he will be- 'queathe them to my father, if he ſur- 'vive him; who, no doubt, will leave 'them to my brother; I therefore be- 'queathe all the ſaid family pictures to 'my ſaid uncle John Harlowe. In theſe 'pictures, however, I include not one 'of my own, drawn when I was about 'fourteen years of age; which I ſhall 'hereafter in another article bequeathe.

'My ſaid honoured grandfather hav- 'ing a great fondneſs for the old family 'plate, which he would never permit 'to be changed, having lived, as he 'uſed to ſay, to ſee a great deal of it 'come into requeſt again in the revo- 'lution of faſhions; and having left 'the ſame to me, with a command to 'keep it entire; and with power at my 'death to bequeathe it to whomſoever 'I pleaſed that I thought would for- 'ward his deſire; which was, as he ex- 'preſſes it, that it ſhould be kept to the 'end of time; this family plate, which 'is depoſited in a large iron-cheſt, in 'the ſtrong room at his late dwelling- 'houſe, I bequeathe entire to my ho- 'noured uncle Antony Harlowe, Eſq. 'with the ſame injunctions which were 'laid on me; not doubting but he will 'confirm and ſtrengthen them by his 'own laſt will.

'I bequeathe to my ever-valued friend 'Mrs. Judith Norton, to whoſe piety 'and care, ſeconding the piety and care 'of my ever-honoured and excellent 'mother, I owe, morally ſpeaking, the 'qualifications, which for eighteen years 'of my life, made me beloved and re- 'ſpected, the full ſum of ſix hundred 'pounds, to be paid her within three 'months after my death.

'I bequeathe alſo to the ſame good 'woman thirty guineas, for mourning, 'for her and for her ſon, my foſter- 'brother.

'To Mrs. Dorothy Hervey, the only 'ſiſter of my honoured mother, I be- 'queathe the ſum of fifty guineas for a 'ring; and I beg of her to accept of 'my thankful acknowledgments for all 'her goodneſs to me from my infancy; 'and particularly for her patience with 'me, in the ſeveral altercations that 'happened between my brother and 'ſiſter, and me, before my unhappy de- 'parture from Harlowe Place.

'To my kind and much-valued cou- 'ſin Miſs Dolly Hervey, daughter of my 'aunt Hervey, I bequeath my watch and 'equipage, and my beſt Mechlin and 'Bruſſels head-dreſſes and ruffles; alſo 'my gown and petticoat of flowered 'ſilver of my own work; which having 'been made up but a few days before I 'was confined to my chamber, I never 'wore.

'To the ſame young lady, I be- 'queathe likewiſe my harpſichord, my 'chamber-organ, and all my muſick- 'books.

'As my ſiſter has a very pretty li- 'brary; and as my beloved Miſs Howe 'has alſo her late father's as well as her 'own; I bequeathe all my own books 'in general, with the caſes they are in, 'to my ſaid couſin Dolly Hervey. As 'they are not ill choſen for a woman's 'library, I know that ſhe will take the 'greater pleaſure in them (when her 'friendly grief is mellowed by time into 'a remembrance more ſweet than pain- 'ful) becauſe they were mine; and be- 'cauſe there are obſervations in many 'of them of my own writing; and ſome 'very judicious ones, written by the 'truly reverend Dr. Lewen.

'I alſo bequeathe to the ſame young 'lady twenty-five guineas for a ring, 'to be worn in remembrance of her true 'friend.

'If I live not to ſee my worthy couſin 'William Morden, Eſq. I deſire my 'humble and grateful thanks may be 'given to him for his favours and good- 'neſs to me; and particularly for his 'endeavours to reconcile my other 'friends to me, at a time when I was 'doubtful whether he would forgive 'me himſelf. As he is in great circum-

'ſtances,

'ſtances, I will only beg of him to accept of two or three trifles, in remembrance of a kinſwoman who always honoured him as much as he loved her. Particularly, of that piece of flowers which my uncle Robert, his father, was very earneſt to obtain, in order to carry it abroad with him.

'I deſire him likewiſe to accept of the little miniature picture ſet in gold, which his worthy father made me ſit for to the famous Italian maſter whom he brought over with him; and which he preſented to me, that I might beſtow it, as he was pleaſed to ſay, upon the man whom I ſhould be one day moſt inclined to favour.

'To the ſame gentleman I alſo bequeathe my roſe diamond ring, which was a preſent from his good father to me; and will be the more valuable to him on that account.

'I humbly requeſt Mrs. Annabella Howe, the mother of my dear Miſs Howe, to accept of my reſpectful thanks for all her favours and goodneſs to me, when I was ſo frequently a viſitor to her beloved daughter; and of a ring of twenty-five guineas price.

'My picture at full length, which is in my late grandfather's cloſet, (excepted in an article above from the family pictures) drawn when I was near fourteen years of age; about which time my dear Miſs Howe and I began to know, to diſtinguiſh, and to love one another, ſo dearly—I cannot expreſs how dearly—I bequeathe to that ſiſter of my heart: of whoſe friendſhip, as well in adverſity as proſperity, when I was deprived of all other comfort and comforters, I have had ſuch inſtances, as that our love can only be exceeded in that ſtate of perfection, in which I hope to rejoice with her hereafter, to all eternity.

'I bequeathe alſo to the ſame dear friend my beſt diamond ring, which, with other jewels, is in the private drawer of my eſcritoire: as alſo all my finiſhed and framed pieces of needle-work; the flower-piece excepted, which I have already bequeathed to my couſin Morden.

'Theſe pieces have all been taken down, as I have heard; and my relations will have no heart to put them up again: but if my good mother chuſes to keep back any one piece, (the above capital piece, as it is called, excepted) not knowing but ſome time hence ſhe may bear the ſight of it; I except that alſo from this general bequeſt; and direct it to be preſented to her.

'My whole-length picture in the Vandyke taſte, that uſed to hang in my own parlour, as I was permitted to call it, I bequeathe to my aunt Hervey, except my mother ſhould think fit to keep it herſelf.

'I bequeathe to the worthy Charles Hickman, Eſq. the locket, with the miniature-picture of the lady he beſt loves, which I have conſtantly worn, and ſhall continue to wear near my heart till the approach of my laſt hour. It muſt be the moſt acceptable preſent that can be made him, next to the hand of the dear original. And, O my dear Miſs Howe, let it not be long before you permit his claim to the latter—for indeed you know not the value of a virtuous mind in that ſex; and how preferable ſuch a mind is to one diſtinguiſhed by the more dazzling flights of unruly wit; although the latter were to be joined by that ſpecious outward appearance which too—too often attracts the haſty eye, and ſuſceptible heart.

'Permit me, my dear friends, this ſolemn apoſtrophe, in this laſt ſolemn act, to a young lady ſo deſervedly dear to me!

'I make it my earneſt requeſt to my dear Miſs Howe, that ſhe will not put herſelf into mourning for me. But I deſire her acceptance of a ring with my hair; and that Mr. Hickman will alſo accept of the like; each of the value of twenty-five guineas.

'I bequeathe to Lady Betty Lawrance, and to her ſiſter Lady Sarah Sadleir, and to the Right Honourable Lord M. and to their worthy nieces Miſs Charlotte and Miſs Martha Montague, each an enamelled ring, with a cypher Cl. H. with my hair in cryſtal, and round the inſide of each, the day, month, and year of my death: each ring, with brilliants, to coſt twenty guineas. And this as a ſmall token of the grateful ſenſe I have of the honour of their good opinions and kind wiſhes in my favour; and of their truly noble offer to me of a very conſiderable annual proviſion, when they apprehended me to be entirely deſtitute of any.

'To the reverend and learned Dr. Arthur Lewen, by whoſe inſtructions I have been equally delighted and benefited, I bequeathe twenty guineas for a ring. If it ſhould pleaſe God to call him to himſelf, before he can re'ceive this final bequeſt, it is my will, 'that his worthy daughter may have the 'benefit of it.

'ceive

'In token of the grateful ſenſe I have 'of the civilities paid me by Mrs. and 'Miſs Howe's domeſticks, from time 'to time, in my viſits there, I bequeathe 'thirty guineas to be divided among 'them, as their dear young miſtreſs 'ſhall think proper.

'To each of my worthy companions 'and friends, Miſs Biddy Lloyd, Miſs 'Fanny Alſton, Miſs Rachel Biddulph, 'and Miſs Cartwright Campbell, I be-'queathe five guineas for a ring.

'To my late maid-ſervant Hannah 'Burton, an honeſt, faithful creature, 'who loved me, reverenced my mother, 'and reſpected my ſiſter, and never 'ſought to do any-thing unbecoming of 'her character, I bequeathe the ſum of 'fifty pounds, to be paid within one 'month after my deceaſe, ſhe labouring 'under ill health: and if that ill health 'continue, I commend her for farther 'aſſiſtance to my good Mrs. Norton, to 'be put upon my poors fund, hereafter 'to be mentioned.

'To the coachman, groom, and two 'footmen, and five maids, at Harlowe 'Place, I bequeathe ten pounds each; to 'the helper, five pounds.

'To my ſiſter's maid Betty Barnes, 'I bequeathe ten pounds, to ſhew that 'I reſent not former diſobligations; 'which I believe were owing more to 'the inſolence of office, and to natural 'pertneſs, than to perſonal ill-will.

'All my wearing apparel, of what-'ever ſort, that I have not been oblig-'ed to part with, or which is not al-'ready bequeathed, (my linen excepted) 'I deſire Mrs. Norton will accept of.

'The trunks and boxes in which my 'cloaths are ſealed up, I deſire may not 'be opened, but in preſence of Mrs. 'Norton (or of ſome one deputed by 'her) and of Mrs. Lovick.

'To the worthy Mrs. Lovick above-'mentioned, from whom I have re-'ceived great civilities, and even ma-'ternal kindneſſes; and to Mrs. Smith, '(with whom I lodge) from whom alſo 'I have received great kindneſſes; I 'bequeathe all my linen, and all my 'unſold laces; to be divided equally be-'tween them, as they ſhall agree; or, 'in caſe of diſagreement, the ſame to 'be ſold, and the money ariſing to be 'equally ſhared by them.

'And I bequeathe to the ſame two 'good women, as a further token of my 'thankful acknowledgments of their 'kind love and compaſſionate concern 'for me, the ſum of twenty guineas 'each.

'To Mr. Smith, the huſband of Mrs. 'Smith above-named, I bequeathe the 'ſum of ten guineas, in acknowledg-'ment of his civilities to me.

'To Katharine, the honeſt maid-ſer-'vant of Mrs. Smith, to whom (having 'no ſervant of my own) I have been 'troubleſome, I bequeathe five guineas; 'and ten guineas more, in lieu of a ſuit 'of my wearing apparel, which once, 'with ſome linen, I thought of leaving 'to her. With this ſhe may purchaſe 'what may be more ſuitable to her lik-'ing and degree.

'To the honeſt and careful widow 'Anne Shelburne, my nurſe, over and 'above her wages, and the cuſtomary 'perquiſites, that may belong to her, 'I bequeathe the ſum of ten guineas. 'Hers is a careful, and (to perſons of 'ſuch humanity and tenderneſs) a me-'lancholy employment, attended in the 'latter part of life with great watching 'and fatigue, which is hardly ever 'enough conſidered.

'The few books I have at my pre-'ſent lodgings, I deſire Mrs. Lovick to 'accept of; and that ſhe be permitted, 'if ſhe pleaſe, to take a copy of my 'book of Meditations, as I uſed to call 'it; being extracts from the beſt books; 'which ſhe ſeemed to approve of, al-'though ſuited particularly to my own 'caſe. As for the book itſelf, perhaps 'my good Mrs. Norton will be glad to 'have it, as it is written all with my 'own hand.

'In the middle drawer of my eſcri-'toire at Harlowe Place, are many letters, 'and copies of letters, put up according 'to their dates, which I have written 'or received in a courſe of years, (ever 'ſince I learned to write) from and to 'my grandfather, my father and mo-'ther, my uncles, my brother and ſiſ-'ter, on occaſional little abſences; my 'late uncle Morden; my couſin Mor-'den; Mrs. Norton, and Miſs Howe, 'and other of my companions and 'friends, before my confinement at my 'father's: as alſo from the three reve-'rend gentlemen, Dr. Blome, Mr. 'Arnold, and Mr. Tomkins, now with 'God, and the very reverend Dr. 'Lewen, on ſerious ſubjects. As theſe 'letters exhibit a correſpondence that 'no perſon of my ſex need to be aſham-'ed of, allowing for the time of life 'when mine were written; and as many 'excellent things are contained in thoſe

'written

'written to me; and as Miss Howe, to 'whom most of them have been com- 'municated, wished formerly to have 'them, if she survived me: for these 'reasons I bequeathe them to my said 'dear friend Miss Anna Howe; and 'the rather, as she had for some years 'past a very considerable share in the 'correspondence.

'I do hereby make, constitute, and 'ordain, John Belford, of Edgeware, 'in the county of Middlesex, Esq. the 'sole executor of this my last will and 'testament; having previously obtain- 'ed his leave so to do. I have given the 'reasons which induced me to ask this 'gentleman to take upon him this trou- 'ble, to Miss Howe. I therefore refer 'to her on this subject.

'But I do most earnestly beg of him 'the said Mr. Belford, that in the exe- 'cution of his trust, he will (as he has 'repeatedly promised) studiously endea- 'vour to promote peace with, and sup- 'press resentments in, every-one; so 'as that all farther mischiefs may be 'prevented, as well from, as to his 'friend. And in order to this, I be- 'seech him to cultivate the friendship of 'my worthy cousin Morden; who, as 'I presume to hope, (when he under- 'stands it to be my dying request) will 'give him his advice and assistance in 'every article where it may be neces- 'sary: and who will perhaps be so good 'as to interpose with my relations, if 'any difficulty should arise about car- 'rying any of the articles of this my last 'will into execution, and to soften them 'into the wished for condescension:— 'for it is my earnest request to Mr. Bel- 'ford, that he will not seek by law, or 'by any sort of violence, either by word 'or deed, to extort the performance 'from them. If there be any articles of 'a merely domestick nature, that my re- 'lations shall think unfit to be carried 'into execution; such articles I leave 'entirely to my said cousin Morden and 'Mr. Belford to vary, or totally dis- 'pense with, as they shall agree upon 'the matter; or, if they two differ in 'opinion, they will be pleased to be 'determined by a third person, to be 'chosen by them both.

'Having been pressed by Miss Howe 'and her mother, to collect the parti- 'culars of my sad story, and given ex- 'pectation that I would, in order to do 'my character justice with all my friends 'and companions; but not having time 'before me for the painful task; it has 'been a pleasure to me to find, by ex- 'tracts kindly communicated to me by 'my said executor, that I may safely 'trust my fame to the justice done me 'by Mr. Lovelace, in his letters to him 'my said executor. And as Mr. Bel- 'ford has engaged to contribute what is 'in his power towards a compliment to 'be made of all that relates to my story, 'and knows my whole mind in this re- 'spect; it is my desire, that he will 'cause two copies to be made of this 'collection; one to remain with Miss 'Howe, the other with himself; and 'that he will shew or lend his copy, if 'required, to my aunt Hervey, for the 'satisfaction of any of my family; but 'under such restrictions as the said Mr. 'Belford shall think fit to impose; that 'neither any other person's safety may 'be endangered, nor his own honour 'suffer, by the communication.

'I bequeathe to my said executor, the 'sum of one hundred guineas, as a 'grateful, though insufficient acknow- 'ledgment of the trouble he will be at 'in the execution of the trust he has so 'kindly undertaken. I desire him like- 'wise to accept of twenty guineas for a 'ring: and that he will reimburse him- 'self for all the charges and expences 'which he shall be at in the execution 'of this trust.

'In the worthy Dr. H. I have found 'a physician, a father, and a friend. I 'beg of him, as a testimony of my gra- 'titude, to accept of twenty guineas for 'a ring.

'I have the same obligations to the 'kind and skilful Mr. Goddard, who 'attended me as my apothecary. His 'very moderate bill I have discharged 'down to yesterday. I have always 'thought it incumbent upon testators to 'shorten all they can the trouble of their 'executors. I know I under-rate the 'value of Mr. Goddard's attendances, 'when over and above what may accrue 'from yesterday, to the hour that will 'finish all, I desire fifteen guineas for a 'ring may be presented to him.

'To the reverend Mr. ———, who 'frequently attended me, and prayed 'by me in my last stages, I also be- 'queathe fifteen guineas for a ring.

'There are a set of honest, indigent 'people, whom I used to call my poor, 'and to whom Mrs. Norton conveys re- 'lief each month (or at shorter periods) 'in proportion to their necessities, from 'a sum I deposited in her hands, and 'from time to time recruited, as means 'accrued to me; but now nearly, if 'not wholly expended: now, that my 'fault may be as little aggravated as 'poſſible, by the ſufferings of the wor-'thy people whom Heaven gave me a 'heart to relieve; and as the produce 'of my grandfather's eſtate, (including 'the moſety of the ſums he had by him, 'and was pleaſed to give me, at his 'death, as above-mentioned) together 'with what I ſhall further appropriate 'to the ſame uſe in the ſubſequent arti-'cles, will, as I hope, more than an-'ſwer all my legacies and bequeſts; it 'is my will and deſire, that the remain-'der, be it little or much, ſhall become 'a fund to be appropriated, and I do 'hereby direct that it be appropriated, 'to the like purpoſes with the ſums 'which I put into Mrs. Norton's hands 'as aforeſaid—and this under the direc-'tion and management of the ſaid Mrs. 'Norton, who knows my whole mind in 'this particular. And in caſe of her 'death, or of her deſire to be acquitted 'of the management thereof, it is my 'earneſt requeſt to my dear Miſs Howe, 'that ſhe will take it upon herſelf, and 'that at her own death ſhe will transfer 'what ſhall remain undiſpoſed of at the 'time, to ſuch perſons, and with ſuch 'limitations, reſtrictions, and proviſoes, 'as ſhe ſhall think will beſt anſwer my 'intention. For, as to the manage-'ment and diſtribution of all or any 'part of it, while in Mrs. Norton's 'hands, or her own; I will, that it be 'entirely diſcretional, and without ac-'count, either to my executor, or any 'other perſon.

'Although Mrs. Norton, as I have 'hinted, knows my whole mind in this 'reſpect; yet it may be proper to men-'tion, in this laſt ſolemn act, that my 'intention is, that this fund be entirely 'ſet apart and appropriated to relieve 'temporarily, from the intereſt there-'of, (as I dare ſay it will be put out to 'the beſt advantage) or even from the 'principal, if need be, the honeſt, in-'duſtrious, labouring poor, only; when 'ſickneſs, lameneſs, unforeſeen loſſes, 'or other accidents, diſable them from 'following their lawful callings; or to 'aſſiſt ſuch honeſt people of large fami-'lies as ſhall have a child of good incli-'nations to put out to ſervice, trade, or 'huſbandry.

'It has always been a rule with me, 'in my little donations, to endeavour 'to aid and ſet forward the ſober and in-'duſtrious poor. Small helps, if ſeaſon-'ably afforded, will do for ſuch; and ſo 'the fund may be of more extenſive be-'nefit; an ocean of wealth will not be 'ſufficient for the idle and diſſolute: 'whom, therefore, ſince they will be 'always in want, it will be no charity to 'relieve, if worthier creatures would 'by relieving the others be deprived of 'ſuch aſſiſtance as may ſet the wheels of 'their induſtry going, and put them in 'a ſphere of uſeful action.

'But it is my expreſs will and direc-'tion, that let this fund come out to be 'ever ſo conſiderable, it ſhall be appli-'ed only in ſupport of the temporary exi-'gences of the perſons I have deſcribed; 'and that no one family or perſon re-'ceive from it, at one time, or in one 'year, more than the ſum of twenty 'pounds.

'It is my will and deſire, that the ſet 'of jewels which was my grandmother's, 'and preſented to me, ſoon after her 'death, by my grandfather, be valued; 'and the worth of them paid to my ex-'ecutor, if any of my family chuſe to 'have them; or otherwiſe that they be 'ſold, and go to the augmentation of 'my poor's fund.—But if they may be 'deemed an equivalent for the ſums my 'father was pleaſed to advance to me 'ſince the death of my grandfather, I 'deſire that they may be given up to 'him.

'I preſume, that the diamond neck-'lace, ſolitare, and buckles, which 'were properly my own, preſented by 'my mother's uncle Sir Joſias Brook-'land, will not be purchaſed by any 'one of my family, for a too obvious 'reaſon: in this caſe, I deſire, that they 'may be ſent to my executor, and that 'he will diſpoſe of them to the beſt ad-'vantage; and apply the money to the 'uſes of my will.

'In the beginning of this tedious 'writing, I referred to the latter part of 'it, the naming of the ſubject of the 'diſcourſe which I wiſhed might be de-'livered at my funeral, if permitted to 'be interred with my anceſtors. I think 'the following will be ſuitable to my 'caſe. I hope the alteration of the 'words her and ſhe, for him and he, may 'be allowable.

"Let not her that is deceived truſt in "vanity; for vanity ſhall be her re-"compence. She ſhall be accom-"pliſhed before her time; and her "branch ſhall not be green. She "ſhall ſhake off her unripe grape as "the vine, and ſhall caſt off her flower "as the olive." Job xv. 31, 32, 33.

'But if I am to be interred in town

'let

'let only the usual burial-service be read over my corpse.

'If my body be permitted to be carried down, I bequeath ten pounds to be given to the poor of the parish, at the discretion of the church-wardens, within a fortnight after my interment.

'If any necessary matter be omitted in this my will, or if any-thing appear doubtful or contradictory, as possibly may be the case; since, besides my inexperience in these matters, I am now, at this time very weak and ill; having put off the finishing hand a little too long, in hopes of obtaining the last forgiveness of my honoured friends; in which case I should have acknowledged the favour with a suitable warmth of duty, and filled up some blanks which I left to the very last, in a more agreeable manner to myself, than now I have been enabled to do—In case of such omissions and imperfections, I desire that my cousin Morden will be so good as to join with Mr. Belford in considering them, and in comparing them with what I have more explicitly written; and if, after that, any doubt remain, that they will be pleased to apply to Miss Howe, who knows my whole heart; and I desire that the construction of these three may be established: and I hereby establish it, provided it be unanimous, and direct it to be put in force, as if I had so written and determined myself.

'And now, O my blessed REDEEMER, 'do I, with a lively faith, humbly lay 'hold of thy meritorious death and 'sufferings: hoping to be washed clean 'in thy precious blood from all my 'sins; in the bare hope of the happy 'consequences of which, how light 'do those sufferings seem, (grievous 'as they were at the time) which, I 'confidently trust, will be a means, 'by thy grace, to work out for me a 'more exceeding and eternal weight 'of glory!

'CLARISSA HARLOWE.'

'Signed, sealed, published, and declared, 'the day and year above-written, by 'the said Clarissa Harlowe, as her last 'will and testament; contained in seven sheets of paper, all written with 'her own hand, and every sheet signed 'and sealed by herself, in the presence 'of us,

'JOHN WILLIAMS,
'ARTHUR BEDALL,
'ELIZABETH SWANTON.'

LETTER I.

COLONEL MORDEN, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

SAT. SEPT. 16.

I Have been employed in a most melancholy task. In reading the will of the dear deceased.

The unhappy mother and Mrs. Norton chose to be absent on the affecting occasion. But Mrs. Harlowe made it her earnest request, that every article of it should be fulfilled.

They were all extremely touched with the preamble.

The first words of the will—'I Clarissa Harlowe, now by strange melancholy accidents, lodging,' &c. drew tears from some, sighs from all.

The directions for her funeral, in case she were or were not permitted to be carried down; the mention of her orders having been given for the manner of her being laid out, and the presence of mind so visible throughout the whole, obtained their admiration, expressed by hands and eyes lifted up, and by falling tears.

When I read the direction, that her body was not to be viewed, except any of her relations should vouchsafe for the last time to look upon her; they turned away, and turned to me, three or four times alternately. Mrs. Hervey and Miss Arabella sobbed; the uncles wiped their eyes; the brother looked down; the father wrung his hands.

I was obliged to stop at the words, that she was nobody's.

But when I came to the address to be made to the accursed man, if he were not to be diverted from seeing her dead, whom once before he had seen in a manner dead—execration, and either vows or wishes of revenge, filled every mouth.

These were still more fervently renewed when they came to hear read her forgiveness of even this man.

You remember, Sir, on our first reading of the will in town, the observations I made on the foul play which it is evident the excellent creature met with from this abandoned man, and what I said upon the occasion. I am not used to repeat things of that nature.

The dear creature's noble contempt of the nothing, as she as nobly calls it, about which she had been giving such particular directions, to wit, her body; and her apologizing for the particularity of those directions from the circumstances she was in—had the same, and as strong an effect upon me, as when I first read the animated paragraph; and painted by my eye, (by turns cast upon them all) affected them all.

When the article was read which bequeathed to the father the grandfather's estate, and the reason assigned for it, (so generous and so dutiful) the father could sit no longer; but withdrew, wiping his eyes, and lifting up his spread hands at Mr. James Harlowe; who arose to attend him to the door, as Arabella likewise did—All he could say—'O son! 'son!—O girl! girl!'—As if he reproached them for the parts they had acted, and put him upon acting.

But yet, on some occasions, this brother and sister shewed themselves to be true will-disputants.

Let tongue and eyes express what they will, Mr. Belford, the first reading of a will, where a person dies worth anything considerable, generally affords a true test of the relations love to the deceased.

The cloaths, the thirty guineas for mourning to Mrs. Norton, with the recommendation of the good woman for housekeeper at the Grove, were thought sufficient, had the article of 6ool. which was called monstrous, been omitted. Some other passages in the will were called slights, and such whimsies as distinguish people of imagination from those of judgment.

My cousin Dolly Hervey was grudged the library. Miss Harlowe said, That as she and her sister never bought the same books, she would take that to herself, and would make it up to her cousin Dolly one way or other.

I intend, Mr. Belford, to save you the trouble of interposing—The library shall be my cousin Dolly's.

Mrs. Hervey could hardly keep her seat. On this occasion, however, she only said, That her late dear and ever-dear niece, was too good to her and hers. But, at another time, she declared with tears, that she could not forgive herself for a letter she wrote, looking at Miss Arabella, whom, it seems, unknown to any-body, she had consulted before she wrote it, and which, she said, must have wounded a spirit, that now, she saw, had been too deeply wounded before.

'O my aunt,' said Arabella, 'no 'more of that!—Who would have 'thought that the dear creature had 'been such a penitent?'

Mr. John and Mr. Antony Harlowe were so much affected with the articles in their favour, (bequeathed to them without a word or hint of reproach or recrimination) that they broke out into self-accusations; and lamented, that their sweet niece, as they called her, was now got above all grateful acknowledgment and returns. Indeed, the mutual upbraidings and grief of all present, upon those articles in which every-one was remembered for good, so often interrupted me, that the reading took up above six hours. But curses upon the accursed man were a refuge to which they often resorted to exonerate themselves.

How wounding a thing, Mr. Belford, is a generous and well-distinguished forgiveness! What revenge can be more effectual, and more noble, were revenge intended, and were it wished to strike remorse into a guilty or ungrateful heart! But my dear cousin's motives were all duty and love. She seems indeed to have been, as much as mortal could be, Love itself. Love sublimed by a purity, by a true delicacy, that hardly any woman before her could boast of.—O Mr. Belford, what an example would she have given in every station of life, (as wife, mother, mistress, friend)! had her lot fallen upon a man blessed with a mind like her own!

The 6ool. bequeathed to Mrs. Norton, the library to Miss Hervey, and the remembrances to Miss Howe, were not the only articles grudged. Yet to what purpose did they regret the pecuniary bequests, when the poors fund, and not themselves, would have had the benefit, had not those legacies been bequeathed?

But enough passed to convince me, that my cousin was absolutely right in her choice of an executor out of the family. Had she chosen one in it, I dare say that her will would have been no more regarded than if it had been the will of a dead king; than that of Louis XIV. in particular; so flagrantly broken through by his nephew the Duke of Orleans before he was cold. The only will of that monarch, perhaps, which was ever disputed.

But little does Mr. James Harlowe think, that while he is grasping at hundreds, he will, most probably, lose thousands, if he be my survivor. A man of a spirit so selfish and narrow shall not be my heir.

You will better conceive, Mr. Belford, than I can express, how much they were touched at the hint, that the dear creature had been obliged to part with some of her cloaths.

Silent reproach seized every-one of them, when I came to the passage where she mentions, that she deferred filling up some blanks, in hopes of receiving their last blessing and forgiveness.

the

I will only add, that they could not bear to hear read the concluding part, so solemnly addressed to her Redeemer. They all arose from their seats, and retuded out of the apartment we were in: and then, as I afterwards found, separated, in order to seek that consolation in solitary retirement, which, though they could not hope for from their own reflections, yet, at the time, they had less reason to expect in each other's company. I am, Sir, your faithful and obedient servant, WM. MORDEN.

LETTER LI.

MR. BELFORD, TO THE RIGHT HONOURABLE LORD M.

MY LORD, LONDON, SEPT. 14.

I Am very apprehensive, that the affair between Mr. Lovelace and the late excellent Miss Clarissa Harlowe will be attended with farther bad consequences, notwithstanding her dying injunctions to the contrary. I would therefore humbly propose, that your lordship, and his other relations, will forward the purpose your kinsman lately had to go abroad; where I hope he will stay till all is blown over. But as he will not stir, if he know the true motives of your wishes, the avowed inducement, as I hinted once to Mr. Mowbray, may be such as respects his own health both of person and mind. To Mr. Mowbray and Mr. Tourville all countries are alike; and they perhaps will accompany him.

I am glad to hear that he is in a way of recovery: but this the rather induces me to press the matter. And I think no time should be lost.

Your lordship has heard, that I have the honour to be the executor of this admirable lady's last will. I transcribe from it the following paragraph.

He then transcribes the article which so gratefully mentions this nobleman, and the ladies of his family, in relation to the rings she bequeathes them, about which he desires their commands.

LETTER LII.

MISS MONTAGUE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

M. HALL, FRIDAY, SEPT. 15.

SIR,

MY lord having the gout in his right-hand, his lordship, and Lady Sarah, and Lady Betty, have commanded me to inform you, that before your letter came, Mr. Lovelace was preparing for a foreign tour. We shall endeavour to hasten him away on the motives you suggest.

We are all extremely affected with the dear lady's death. Lady Betty and Lady Sarah have been indisposed ever since they heard of it. They had pleased themselves, as had my sister and self, with the hopes of cultivating her acquaintance and friendship after he was gone abroad, upon her own terms. Her kind remembrance of each of us has renewed, though it could not heighten, our regrets for so irreparable a loss. We shall order Mr. Finch, our goldsmith, to wait on you. He has our directions about the rings. They will be long, long worn in memory of the dear testatrix.

Every-body is assured, that you will do all in your power to prevent further ill consequences from this melancholy affair. My lord desires his compliments to you. I am, Sir, your humble servant,

CH. MONTAGUE.

THIS collection having run into a much greater length than was wished, it is thought proper to omit several letters that passed between Colonel Morden, Miss Howe, Mr. Belford, and Mr. Hickman, in relation to the execution of the lady's will, &c.

It is, however, necessary to observe on this subject, That the unhappy mother, being supported by the two uncles, influenced the afflicted father to over-rule all his son's objections, and to direct a literal observation of the will; and at the same time to give up all the sums which he was empowered by it to reimburse himself; as also to take upon himself to defray the funeral expences.

Mr. Belford so much obliges Miss Howe by his steadiness, equity, and dispatch, and by his readiness to contribute to the directed collection, that she voluntarily entered into a correspondence with him, as the representative of her beloved friend. In the course of which, he communicated to her (in confidence) the letters which passed between him and Mr. Lovelace, and, by Colonel Morden's consent, those which passed between that gentleman and himself.

Miss Howe, in hers of the 20th, acknowledging the receipt of the letters, and papers, and legacies, sent with Mr. Belford's letter, assures him, That so she shall be made of his communications, but what he shall approve of.

He had mentioned with compassion the distresses of the Harlowe family—'Persons of a pitiful nature,' says she, 'may pity them. I am not one of those. You, I think, pity the infernal man likewise; while I, from my heart, grudge him his phrenzy, because it deprives him of that remorse, which, I hope, on his recovery, will never leave him. At times, Sir, let me tell you, that I hate your whole sex for his sake; even men of unblameable characters, whom at those times I cannot but look upon as persons I have not yet found out.

'If my dear creature's personal jewels be sent up to you for sale, I desire that I may be the purchaser of them at the highest price—Of the necklace and solitaire particularly.

'O what tears did the perusal of my beloved's will cost me!—But I must not touch upon the heart-piercing subject. I can neither take it up, nor quit it, but with execration of the man whom all the world must execrate.'

Mr. Belford, in his answer, promises that she shall be the purchaser of the jewels, if they come into his hands.

He acquaints her, that the family had given Colonel Morden the keys of all that belonged to the dear departed: that the unhappy mother had (as the will allows) ordered a piece of needle-work to be set aside for her, and had desired Mrs. Norton to get the little book of Meditations transcribed, and to let her have the original, as it was all of her dear daughter's hand-writing; and as it might, when she could bear to look into it, administer consolation to herself. And that she had likewise reserved for herself her picture in the Vandyke taste.

Mr. Belford sends with this letter to Miss Howe the lady's memorandum-book; and promises to send her copies of the several posthumous letters. He tells her, that Mr. Lovelace being upon the recovery, he had inclosed the posthumous letter directed for him to Lord M. that his lordship might give it to him, or not, as he should find he could bear it. The following is a copy of that letter.

'TO MR. LOVELACE.

THURSDAY, AUG. 24.

'I Told you, in the letter I wrote to you on Tuesday last, that you should have another sent you when I had got into my father's house.

'I presume to say, that I am now, at your receiving of this, arrived there; and I invite you to follow me, as soon as you can be prepared for so great a journey.

'Not to allegorize further—My fate is now, at your perusal of this, accomplished. My doom is unalterably fixed: and I am either a miserable or happy being to all eternity. If happy, I owe it solely to the Divine Mercy; if miserable, to your undeserved cruelty.—And consider now, for your own sake, gay, cruel, fluttering, unhappy man; consider, whether the barbarous and perfidious treatment I have met with from you, was worthy the hazard of your immortal soul; since your wicked views were not to be effected but by the wilful breach of the most solemn vows that ever were made by man; and those aided by a violence and baseness unworthy of a human creature.

'In time then, once more, I wish you to consider your ways. Your golden dream cannot long last. Your present course can yield you pleasure no longer than you can keep off thought or reflection. A hardened insensibility is the only foundation on which your inward tranquillity is built. When once a dangerous sickness seizes you; when once effectual remorse breaks in upon you; how dreadful will be your condition! How poor a triumph will you then find it, to have been able, by a series of black perjuries, and studied baseness, under the name of gallantry or intrigue, to betray poor unexperienced young creatures, who perhaps knew nothing but their duty till they knew you!—Not one good action in the hour of languishing to recollect, not one worthy intention to revolve, it will be all reproach and horror; and you will wish to have it in your power to compound for annihilation.

'Reflect, Sir, that I can have no other motive in what I write, than your good, and the safety of other innocent creatures, who may be drawn in by your wicked arts and perjuries. You have not, in my wishes for your future welfare, the wishes of a supplant wife, endeavouring for her own sake, as well as for yours, to induce you to reform those ways. They are wholly as disinterested as undeserved. But I should mistrust my own penitence, were I capable of wishing to recompense evil for evil—if, black as your offences have been against me, I

'could not forgive, as I wish to be for'given.

'I repeat, therefore, that I do for'give you. And may the Almighty
'forgive you too! Nor have I, at the 'writing of this, any other essential re'grets than what are occasioned by the 'grief I have given to parents, who,
'till I knew you, were the most indul-
'gent of parents; by the scandal given 'to the other branches of my family;
'by the disreputation brought upon my
'sex; and by the offence given to vir'tue in my fall.

'As to myself, you have only robbed
'me of what once were my favourite
'expectations in the transient life I shall 'have quitted when you receive this.
'You have only been the cause that I 'have been cut off in the bloom of 'youth, and of curtailing a life that 'might have been agreeable to myself,
'or otherwise, as had suited the designs
'and ends of Providence. I have rea'son to be thankful, for being taken
'away from the evil of supporting my 'part of a yoke with a man so unhappy;
'I will only say, that, in all probability,
'every hour I had lived with him might 'have brought with it some new trou'ble. And I am (indeed through sharp 'afflictions and distresses) indebted to
'you, secondarily, as I humbly presume
'to hope, for so many years of glory,
'as might have proved years of danger,
'temptation, and anguish, had they been 'added to my mortal life.

'So, Sir, though no thanks to your 'intention, you have done me real ser-
'vice; and in return, I wish you hap'py. But such has been your life hi'therto, that you can have no time to
'lose, in setting about your repentance.
'Repentance to such as have lived only 'carelessly, and in the omission of their 'regular duties, and who never aimed 'to draw any poor creatures into evil,
'is not so easy a task, nor so much in
'our own power, as some imagine.
'How difficult a grace then to be ob'tained, where the guilt is premeditat-
'ed, wilful, and complicated!

'To say I once respected you with a 'preference, is what I ought to blush
'to own, since, at the very time, I was 'far from thinking you even a moral
'man; though I little thought that 'you, or indeed that any man breath-
'ing, could be—what you have proved 'yourself to be. But, indeed, Sir, I 'have long been greatly above you:
'for from my heart I have despised
'you, and all your ways, ever since I 'saw what manner of man you were.

'Nor is it to be wondered, that I 'should be able so to do, when that pre'ference was not grounded on ignoble
'motives. For I was weak enough, and 'presumptuous enough, to hope to be a 'means, in the hand of Providence, to 'reclaim a man, whom I thought wor'thy of the attempt.

'Nor have I yet, as you will see by
'the pains I take, on this solemn occa-
'sion, to awaken you out of your sen-
'sual dream, given over all hopes of 'this nature.

'Hear me, therefore, O Lovelace! I
'as one speaking from the dead—Lose
'no time—Set about your repentance
'instantly—Be no longer the instrument
'of Satan, to draw poor souls into those
'subtile snares, which at last shall en-
'tangle your own feet. Seek not to 'multiply your offences, till they be'come beyond the power, as I may say,
'of the Divine Mercy to forgive; since
'justice, no less than mercy, is an attri-
'bute of the Almighty.

'Tremble and reform, when you
'read what is the portion of the wicked man
'from God. Thus it is written.

"The triumphing of the wicked is "short, and the joy of the hypocrite
"but for a moment. He is cast into "a net by his own feet—He walketh
"upon a snare. Terrors shall make him
"afraid on every side, and shall drive
"him to his feet. His strength shall be "hunger-bitten, and destruction shall "be ready at his side. The first-born
"of death shall devour his strength.
"His remembrance shall perish from "the earth: and he shall have no name
"in the streets. He shall be chased out "of the world. He shall have neither
"son nor nephew among his people.
"They that have seen him shall say,
"Where is he?" "He shall fly away
"as a dream: he shall be chased away
"as a vision of the night. His meat is "the gall of asps within him. He shall "flee from the iron weapon, and the "bow of steel shall strike him through.
"A fire not blown shall consume him.
"The heavens shall reveal his iniquity,
"and the earth shall rise up against him.
"The worm shall feed sweetly on him.
"He shall be no more remembered.—
"This is the fate of him that knoweth
"not God."

'Whenever you shall be inclined to 'consult the Sacred Oracles, from 'whence the above threatenings are
'extracted,

'entreated, you will find doctrines and 'texts which a truly penitent and con'trite heart may lay hold of for it's 'consolation.

'May yours, Mr. Lovelace, become 'such! And may you be enabled to 'escape the fate denounced against the 'abandoned man, and be entitled to the 'mercies of a long suffering and gracious 'God, is the sincere prayer of

'CLARISSA HARLOWE.'

LETTER LIII.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

M. HALL, THURSDAY, SEPT. 14.

EVER since the fatal seventh of this month, I have been lost to myself, and to all the joys of life. I might have gone farther back than that fatal seventh; which, for the future, I will never see anniversarily revolve but in fables; only till that cursed day I had some gleams of hope now-and-then darting in upon me.

They tell me of an odd letter I wrote to you. I remember I did write. But very little of the contents of what I wrote, do I remember.

I have been in a cursed way. Methinks something has been working strangely retributive. I never was such a fool as to disbelieve a Providence: yet am I not for resolving into judgments every-thing that seems to wear an avenging face. Yet if we must be punished either here or hereafter for our misdeeds, better here, say I, than hereafter. Have I not then an interest to think my punishment already not only begun but compleated; since what I have suffered, and do suffer, passes all description?

To give but one instance of the retribution—Here I, who was the barbarous cause of the loss of senses for a week together to the most inimitable of women, have been punished with the loss of my own—Preparative to—Who knows what—When, O when, shall I know a joyful hour?

I am kept excessively low; and excessively low I am. This sweet creature's posthumous letter sticks close to me. All her excellences rise up hourly to my remembrance.

Yet dare I not indulge in these melancholy reflections. I find my head strangely working again — Pen, be gone.

MONDAY, SEPT. 18.

HEAVY, damnably heavy and sick in soul, by Jupiter! I must come into their expedient. I must see what change of climate may do.

You tell these fellows, and you tell me, of repenting and reforming: but I can do neither. He who can, must not have the extinction of a Clarissa Harlowe to answer for.—Harlowe!—Curse upon the name! And curse upon myself for not changing it, as I might have done! —Yet have I no need of urging a curse upon myself—I have it effectually.

'To say I once respected you with a 'preference'—In what stiff language does maidenly modesty on these nice occasions express itself!—To say I once loved you, is the English; and there is truth and ease in the expression.—'To say I 'once loved you,' then let it be; 'is 'what I ought to blush to own.'

'And dost thou own it?—Excellent 'creature! and dost thou then own it?' —What music in these words from such an angel!—What would I give that my Clarissa were in being, and could and would own that she loved me?

'But, indeed, Sir, I have long been 'greatly above you.'

'Long, my blessed charmer!—Long, 'indeed—For you have been ever greatly 'above me, and above your sex, and 'above all the world.'

'That preference was not grounded 'on ignoble motives.'

What a wretch was I, to be so distinguished by her, and yet to be so unworthy of her hope to reclaim me!

Then, how generous her motives! Not for her own sake merely, not altogether for mine, did she hope to reclaim me; but equally for the sake of innocents who might otherwise be ruined by me.

And now, why did she write this letter, and why direct it to be given me when an event the most deplorable had taken place, but for my good, and with a view to the safety of innocents she knew not? — And when was this letter written?—Was it not at the time, at the very time, that I had been pursuing her, as I may say, from place to place; when her soul was bowed down by calamity and persecution; and herself was denied all forgiveness from relations the most implacable?

'Exalted creature! — And couldst 'thou at such a time and so early, and in 'such circumstances, have so far subdued 'thy own just resentments, as to wish 'happiness to the principal author of all 'thy

'thy diſtreſſes? Wiſh happineſs to him
'who had robbed thee of all thy favou-
'rite expectations in this life? To him
'who had been the cauſe, that thou wert
'cut off in the bloom of youth?

'Heavenly aſpirer!—What a frame
'muſt thou be in, to be able to uſe the 'word ONLY, in mentioning theſe im'portant deprivations!—And as this 'was before thou puttedſt off mortality,
'may I not preſume that thou now,

"——with pitying eye,
"Not derogating from thy perfect bliſs,
"Survey'ſt all Heaven around, and wiſheſt
"for me?"

Conſider my ways.—'Dear life of my 'life! Of what avail is conſideration
'now, when I have loſt the dear crea-
'ture, for whoſe ſake alone it was worth
'while to have conſideration?—Loſt her
'beyond retrieving—Swallowed up by
'the greedy grave—For ever loſt her—
'That, that's the ſting—Matchleſs wo'man!—How does this reflection
'wound me!'

'Your golden dream cannot long
'laſt.'—'Divine propheteſs! my gold-
'en dream is already over. Thought
'and reflection are no longer to be kept
'off.—No longer continues that hardened
'inſenſibility thou chargeſt upon me.—
'Remorſe has broken in upon me.—
'Dreadful is my condition;—It is all
'reproach and horror with me!—A
'thouſand vultures in turn are preying
'upon my heart!'

But no more of theſe fruitleſs reflections—Since I am incapable of writing any-thing elſe; ſince my pen will ſlide into this gloomy ſubject, whether I will or not; I will once more quit it; nor will I again reſume it, till I can be more it's maſter, and my own.

All I took pen to write for, is however unwritten. It was, in few words, to wiſh you to proceed with your communications, as uſual. And why ſhould you not?—Since, in her ever-to-be-lamented death, I know every thing ſhocking and grievous—Acquaint me, then, with all thou knoweſt, which I do not know: how her relations, her cruel relations, take it; and whether now, the barbed dart of after-reflection ſticks not in their hearts, as in mine, up to the very feathers?

I WILL ſoon quit this kingdom. For now my Clariſſa is no more, what is there in it (in the world indeed) worth living for?—But ſhall I not firſt, by ſome maſterly miſchief, avenge her and myſelf upon her curſed family?

The accurſed woman, they tell me, has broken her leg. Why was it not her neck?—All, all, but what is owing to her relations, is the fault of that woman, and of her hell-born nymphs.
'The greater the virtue, the nobler the tri- 'umph,' was a ſentence for ever in their mouths—I have had it ſeveral times in my head to ſet fire to the execrable houſe; and to watch at the doors and windows, that not a devil in it eſcape the conſuming flames. Had the houſe ſtood by itſelf, I had certainly done it.

But, it ſeems, the old wretch is in the way to be rewarded without my help. A ſhocking letter is received of ſomebody's, in relation to her—Yours,
I ſuppoſe—Too ſhocking for me, they ſay, to ſee at preſent.

They govern me, as a child in ſtrings:
yet did I ſuffer ſo much in my fever, that I am willing to bear with them, till
I can get tolerably well.

At preſent, I can neither eat, drink, nor ſleep. Yet are my diſorders nothing to what they were: for, Jack, my brain was on fire day and night: and had it not been of the aſbeſtos kind, it had all been conſumed.

I had no diſtinct ideas, but of dark and confuſed miſery: it was all remorſe and horror indeed! Thoughts of hanging, drowning, ſhooting; then rage, violence, miſchief, and deſpair, took their turns with me. My lucid intervals ſtill worſe, giving me to reflect upon what I was the hour before, and what I was likely to be next, and perhaps for life—The ſport of enemies! the laughter of fools! and the hangingſleeved, go-carted property of hired ſlaves; who were perhaps to find their account in manacling and (abhorred thought!) in perſonally abuſing me by blows and ſtripes!

Who can bear ſuch reflections as theſe? To be made to fear only, to ſuch a one as me, and to fear ſuch wretches too?—What a thing was this, but re- motely to apprehend! And yet for a man to be in ſuch a ſtate as to render it neceſſary for his deareſt friends to ſuffer this to be done for his own ſake, and in order to prevent further miſchief?—
There is no thinking of theſe things!

I will not think of them, therefore:
but will either get a train of cheerful ideas, or hang myſelf, by to-morrow morning.

'——To be a dog, and dead,
'Were paradiſe, to ſuch a life as mine.'

LETTER LIV.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

WEDNESDAY, SEPT. 20.

I Write to demand back again my laſt letter. I own it was my mind at the different times I wrote it; and, whatever ailed me, I could not help writing it. Such a gloomy impulſe came upon me, and increaſed as I wrote, that, for my ſoul, I could not forbear running into the miſerable.

'Tis ſtrange, very ſtrange, that a man's conſcience ſhould be able to force his fingers to write whether he will or not; and to run him into a ſubject he more than once, at the very time, reſolved not to think of.

Nor is it leſs ſtrange, that (no new reaſon occurring) he ſhould, in a day or two more, ſo totally change his mind; have his mind, I ſhould rather ſay, ſo wholly illuminated by gay hopes and riſing proſpects, as to be aſhamed of what he had written.

For, on re-peruſal of a copy of my letter, which fell into my hands by accident, in the hand-writing of my couſin Charlotte, who, unknown to me, had tranſcribed it, I find it to be ſuch a letter as an enemy would rejoice to ſee.

This I know, that were I to have continued but one week more in the way I was in when I wrote the latter part of it, I ſhould have been confined, and in ſtraw, the next: for I now recollect, that all my diſtemper was returning upon me with irreſiſtible violence—and that in ſpite of water-gruel and ſoupe-maigre.

I own, that I am ſtill exceſſively grieved at the diſappointment this admirable woman made it ſo much her whimſical choice to give me. But, ſince it has thus fallen out; ſince ſhe was determined to leave the world; and ſince ſhe actually ceaſes to be; ought I, who have ſuch a ſhare of life and health in hand, to indulge gloomy reflections upon an event that is paſſed; and being paſſed, cannot be recalled?—Have I not had a ſpecimen of what will be my caſe, if I do?

For, Belford, ('tis a folly to deny it) I have been, to uſe an old word, quite beſtraught.

Why, why did my mother bring me up to bear no controul? Why was I ſo educated, as that to my very tutors it was a requeſt, that I ſhould not know what contradiction or diſappointment was?—Ought ſhe not to have known what cruelty there was in her kindneſs?

What a puniſhment, to have my firſt very great diſappointment touch my intellect!—And intellects, once touched—But that I cannot bear to think of—Only thus far; the very repentance and amendment wiſhed me ſo heartily by my kind and croſs dear, have been invalidated and poſtponed, and who knows for how long? the amendment at leaſt:—Can a madman be capable of either?

Once touched, therefore, I muſt endeavour to baniſh thoſe gloomy reflections, which might otherwiſe have brought on the right turn of mind; and this, to expreſs myſelf in Lord M.'s ſtyle, that my wits may not be ſent a woolgathering.

For, let me moreover own to thee, that Dr. Hale, who was my good Aſtolfo, [You read Arioſto, Jack] and has brought me back my wit-jar, had much ado, by ſtarving diet, by profuſe phlebotomy, by flaying bliſters, eyelet-hole-cupping, a dark room, a mid-night ſolitude in a mid-day ſun, to effect my recovery. And now, for my comfort, he tells me, that I may ſtill have returns upon full moons—Horrible! moſt horrible!—and muſt be as careful of myſelf at both equinoctials, as Cæſar was warned to be of the Ides of March.

How my heart ſickens at looking back upon what I was! Denied the ſun, and all comfort: all my viſitors, low-born, tip-toe attendants: even thoſe tip-toe ſlaves never approaching me but periodically, armed with gallipots, boluſſes, and cephalick draughts; delivering their orders to me in hated whiſpers; and anſwering other curtain-holding impertinents, enquiring how I was, and how I took their execrable potions, whiſperingly too! What a curſed ſtill-life was this!—Nothing active in me, or about me, but the worm that never dies.

Again I haſten from the recollection of ſcenes, which will, at times, obtrude themſelves upon me.

Adieu, Belford!

But return me my laſt letter—and build nothing upon it's contents. I muſt, I will, I have already, overcome theſe fruitleſs gloominеſſes. Every hour my conſtitution riſes ſtronger and ſtronger to befriend me; and, except a tributary ſigh now-and-then to the memory of my heart's beloved, it gives me hope, that I ſhall quickly be what I was—Life, ſpirit, ſpirit, gaiety, and once more the plague of a ſex, that has been my plague, and will be every man's plague at one time or other of his life. I repeat my deſire, however, that you will write to me as uſual. I hope you have good ſtore of particulars by you to communicate, when I can better bear to hear of the diſpoſitions that were made for all that was mortal of my beloved Clariſſa.

But it will be the joy of my heart to be told, that her implacable friends are plagued with remorſe. Such things as thoſe you may now ſend me: for company in miſery is ſome relief; eſpecially when a man can think thoſe he hates as miſerable as himſelf.

Once more, adieu, Jack!

LETTER LV.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

I Am preparing to leave this kingdom. Mowbray and Tourville promiſe to give me their company in a month or two.

I'll give thee my route.

I ſhall firſt to Paris; and, for amuſement and diverſion ſake, try to renew ſome of my old friendſhips: thence to ſome of the German courts: thence, perhaps, to Vienna: thence deſcend through Bavaria and the Tyrol to Venice, where I ſhall keep the carnival: thence to Florence and Turin: thence again over Mount Cenis to France: and, when I return again to Paris, ſhall expect to ſee my friend Belford, who, by that time, I doubt not, will be all cruſted and bearded over with penitence, ſelf-denial, and mortification; a very anchoret, only an itinerant one, journeying over in hope to cover a multitude of his own ſins, by proſelyting his old companions.

Thou haſt made good reſolutions. If thou keepeſt them not, thou wilt never be able to keep any. But nevertheleſs, the devil and thy time of life are againſt thee: and ſix to one thou faileſt. Were it only that thou haſt reſolved, ſix to one thou faileſt. And if thou doſt, thou wilt become the ſcoff of men, and the triumph of devils.—Then how will I laugh at thee! For this warning is not from principle. Perhaps I wiſh it were: but I never lyed to man, and hardly ever ſaid truth to woman. The firſt is what all free-livers cannot ſay: the ſecond what every one can. LOVELACE.

I believe Charlotte and you are in private league together. Letters, I find, have paſſed between her and you, and Lord M. I have been kept ſtrangely in the dark of late; but will ſoon break upon you all, as the ſun upon a midnight thief.

Remember that you never ſent me the copy of my beloved's will.

LETTER LVI.

MR. BELFORD, TO ROBERT LOVELACE, ESQ.

FRIDAY, SEPT. 22.

JUST as I was ſitting down to anſwer yours of the 24th and 18th, in order to give you all the conſolation in my power, came your revoking letter of Wedneſday.

I am really concerned and diſappointed, that your firſt was ſo ſoon followed by one ſo contrary to it.

The ſhocking letter you mention, which your friends withold from you, is indeed from me. They may now, I ſee, ſhew you any-thing. Aſk them, then, for that letter, if you think it worth while to read aught about the true mother of your mind.

I WILL ſuppoſe, that thou haſt juſt read the letter thou calleſt ſhocking, and which I intended to be ſo. And let me aſk, What thou thinkeſt of it? Doſt thou not tremble at the horrors the vileſt of women labours with, on the apprehenſions of death, and future judgment?—How fit the reflections that muſt have been raiſed by the peruſal of this letter upon thy yet unclofed eyelet-holes? Will not ſome ſerious thoughts mingle with thy melilot, and tear off the callus of thy mind, as that may flay the leather from thy back, and as thy epiſpaſticks may ſtrip the parchment from thy plotting head? If not, then indeed is thy conſcience ſeared, and no hopes will lie for thee.

Mr. Belford then gives an account of the wretched Sinclair's terrible exit, which he had juſt then received.

If this move thee not, I have news to acquaint thee with, of another diſmal cataſtrophe that is but within this hour come to my ear, of another of thy bleſſed agents. Thy TOMLINSON!—Dying, and, in all probability, before this can reach thee, dead, in Maidſtone gaol. As thou ſayeſt in thy firſt letter, ſomething ſtrangely retributive ſeems to be working.

This is his caſe. He was at the head of a gang of ſmugglers, endeavouring to carry off run-goods, landed laſt Tueſday, when a party of dragoons came up with them in the evening. Some of his comrades fled. M'Donald, being ſurrounded, attempted to fight his way through, and wounded his man; but having received a ſhot in his neck, and being cut deeply in the head by a broad-ſword, he fell from his horſe, was taken, and carried to Maidſtone goal: and there my informant left him, juſt dying, and aſſured of hanging if he recover.

Abſolutely deſtitute, he got a kinſman of his to apply to me, and, if in town, to the reſt of the confraternity, for ſomething, not to ſupport him was the word, (for he expected not to live till the fellow returned) but to bury him.

I never employed him but once, and then he ruined my project. I now thank Heaven that he did. But I ſent him five guineas, and promiſed him more, as from you, and Mowbray, and Tourville, if he live a few days, or to take his trial. And I put it upon you to make further enquiry of him, and to give him what you think fit.

His meſſenger tells me, That he is very penitent; that he weeps continually. He cries out, that he has been the vileſt of men: yet palliates, that his neceſſities made him worſe than he ſhould otherwiſe have been, [An excuſe which none of us can plead:] But that which touches him moſt of all, is a vile impoſture he was put upon, to ſerve a certain gentleman of fortune to the ruin of the moſt excellent woman that ever lived; and who, he had heard, was dead of grief.

Let me conſider, Lovelace—Whoſe turn can be next?—I wiſh it may not be thine. But ſince thou giveſt me one piece of advice, (which I ſhould indeed have thought out of character, hadſt thou not taken pains to convince me, that it proceeds not from principle) I will give thee another: and that is, Proſecute, as faſt as thou canſt, thy intended tour. Change of ſcene, and of climate, may eſtabliſh thy health: while this groſs air, and the approach of winter, may thicken thy blood; and, with the help of a conſcience that is upon the ſtruggle with thee, and like a cunning wreſtler watches it's opportunity to give thee another fall, may make thee miſerable for thy life.

I return your revoked letter. Don't deſtroy it, however. The ſame dialect may one day come in faſhion with you again.

As to the family at Harlowe Place, I have moſt affecting letters from Colonel Morden relating to their grief and compunction. But are you, to whom the occaſion is owing, entitled to rejoice in their diſtreſs?

I ſhould be ſorry, if I could not ſay, that what you have warned me of in ſport, makes me tremble in earneſt. I hope (for this is a ſerious ſubject with me, though nothing can be ſo with you) that I never ſhall deſerve, by my apoſtacy, to be the ſcoff of men, and the triumph of devils.

I have already begun my retributary purpoſes, as I may call them. I have ſettled an annual ſum for life upon poor John Loftus, whom I diſabled, while he was endeavouring to protect his young miſtreſs from my lawleſs attempts. I rejoice, that I ſucceeded not in that; as I do in recollecting many others of the like ſort, in which I miſcarried.

Poor Farley, who had become a bankrupt, I have ſet up again; but have declared, that the annual allowance I make her ſhall ceaſe, if I hear ſhe returns to her former courſes: and I have made her accountable for her conduct to the good widow Lovick; whom I have taken, at a handſome ſalary, for my houſekeeper at Edgware, (for I have let the houſe at Watford;) and ſhe is to diſpenſe the quarterly allotment to her, as ſhe merits.

This good woman ſhall have other matters of the like nature under her care, as we grow better acquainted: and I make no doubt that ſhe will anſwer my expectations, and that I ſhall be both confirmed and improved by her converſation: for ſhe ſhall generally ſit at my own table.

The undeſerved ſufferings of Miſs Clariſſa Harlowe, her exalted merit, her exemplary preparation, and her happy end, will be ſtanding ſubjects with us.

She ſhall read to me, when I have no company; write for me, out of books, paſſages ſhe ſhall recommend. Her years (turned of fifty) and her good character, will ſecure me from ſcandal; and I have great pleaſure in reflecting, that I ſhall be better myſelf for making her happy.

Then, whenever I am in danger, I will read ſome of the admirable lady's papers: whenever I would abhor my former ways, I will read ſome of thine, and copies of my own.

The conſequence of all this will be, that I ſhall be the delight of my own relations of both ſexes, who were wont to look look upon me as a loſt man. I ſhall have good order in my own family, becauſe I ſhall give a good example myſelf. I ſhall be viſited and reſpected, not perhaps by Lovelace, by Mowbray, and by Tourville, becauſe they cannot ſee me upon the old terms, and will not, perhaps, ſee me upon the new, but by the beſt and worthieſt gentlemen, clergy as well as laity, all around me. I ſhall look upon my paſt follies with contempt; upon my old companions with pity. Oaths and curſes ſhall be for ever baniſhed from my mouth: in their place ſhall ſucceed converſation becoming a rational being, and a gentleman. And inſtead of acts of offence, ſubjecting me perpetually to acts of defence, will I endeavour to atone for my paſt evils, by doing all the good in my power, and by becoming an univerſal benefactor to the extent of that power.

Now tell me, Lovelace, upon this faint ſketch of what I hope to do, and to be, if this be not a ſcheme infinitely preferable to the wild, the pernicious, the dangerous ones, both to body and ſoul, which we have purſued.

I wiſh I, could make my ſketch as amiable to you, as it appears to me. I wiſh it with all my ſoul: for I always loved you. It has been my misfortune that I did: for this led me into infinite riots and follies, of which, otherwiſe, I verily think, I ſhould not have been guilty.

You have a great deal more to anſwer for, than I have, were it only in the temporal ruin of this admirable woman. Let me now, while yet you have youth, and health, and intellect, prevail upon you: for I am afraid, very much afraid, that ſuch is the enormity of this ſingle wickedneſs, in depriving the world of ſuch a ſhining light, that if you do not quickly reform, it will be out of your power to reform at all; and that Providence, which has already given you the fates of your agents Sinclair and Tomlinſon to take warning by, will not let the principal offender eſcape, if he ſlight the warning.

You will, perhaps, laugh at me for theſe ſerious reflections. Do, if you will. I had rather you ſhould laugh at me for continuing in this way of thinking and acting, than triumph over me, as you threaten, on my ſwerving from purpoſes I have determined upon with ſuch good reaſon, and induced and warned by ſuch examples.

And ſo much for this ſubject at preſent.

I ſhould be glad to know when you intend to ſet out. I have too much concern for your welfare, not to wiſh you in a thinner air, and more certain climate.

What have Tourville and Mowbray to do, that they cannot ſet out with you? They will not covet my company, I dare ſay; and I ſhall not be able to endure theirs, when you are gone: take them therefore with you.

I will not, however, forſwear making you a viſit at Paris, at your return from Germany and Italy; but hardly with the hope of reclaiming you, if due reflection upon what I have ſet before you, and upon what you have written in your two laſt, will not by that time have done it.

I ſuppoſe I ſhall ſee you before you go. Once more I wiſh you were gone. This heavy iſland-air cannot do for you what that of the continent will.

I do not think I ought to communicate with you, as I uſed to do, on this ſide the Channel: let me, then, hear from you on the oppoſite ſhore, and you ſhall command the pen, as you pleaſe; and, honeſtly, the power, of

J. BELFORD.

LETTER LVII.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

TUESDAY, SEPT. 26.

FATE, I believe, in my conſcience, ſpins threads for tragedies, on purpoſe for thee to weave with.—Thy Watford uncle, poor Belton, the fair inimitable, [Exalted creature! and is ſhe to be found in ſuch a liſt!] the accurſed woman, and Tomlinſon, ſeem to have been all doomed to give thee a theme for the diſmal and the horrible:—and, by my ſoul, thou doſt work it going, as Lord M. would phraſe it.

That's the horrid thing: a man cannot begin to think, but cauſes for thought croud in upon him: the gloomy takes place, and mirth and gaiety abandon his heart for ever!

Poor M'Donald!—I am really ſorry for the fellow.—He was an uſeful, faithful, ſolemn varlet, who could act incomparably any part given him, and knew not what a bluſh was.—He really took honeſt pains for me in the laſt affair; which has coſt him and me ſo dearly in reflection. Often gravelled, as we both were, yet was he never daunted.—Poor M'Donald, I muſt once more ſay!

ſay!—For carrying on a ſolemn piece of roguery, he had no equal.

I was ſo ſolicitous to know if he were really as bad as thou haſt a knack of painting every-body whom thou ſingleſt out to exerciſe thy murdering pen upon, that I diſpatched a man and horſe to Maidſtone, as ſoon as I had thine; and had word brought me, that he died in two hours after he had received thy five guineas. And all thou wroteſt of his concern in relation to the ever-dear Miſs Harlowe, it ſeems, was true.

I can't help it, Belford!—I have only to add, that it is happy that the poor fellow lived not to be hanged; as it ſeems he would have been: for who knows, as he had got into ſuch a penitential ſtrain, what might have been in his dying ſpeech?

When a man has not great good to comfort himſelf with, it is right to make the beſt of the little that may offer. There never was any diſcomfort happened to mortal man, but ſome little ray of conſolation would dart in, if the wretch was not ſo much a wretch, as to draw, inſtead of undraw, the curtain to keep it out.

And ſo much, at this time, and for ever, for poor Captain Tomlinſon, as I call him.

Your ſolicitude to get me out of this heavy changeable climate exactly tallies with every-body's here. They all believe that travelling will eſtabliſh me. Yet I think I am quite well. Only theſe plaguy new's and full's, and the equinoctial's, fright me a little when I think of them; and that is always: for the whole family are continually ringing theſe changes in my ears, and are more ſedulouſly intent, than I can well account for, to get me out of the kingdom.

But wilt thou write often, when I am gone? Wilt thou then piece the thread where thou brokeſt it off? Wilt thou give me the particulars of their diſtreſs, who were my auxiliaries in bringing on the event that affects me?—Nay, principals, rather: ſince, ſay what thou wilt, what did I do worth a woman's breaking her heart for?

Faith and troth, Jack, I have had very hard uſage, as I have often ſaid:—to have ſuch a plaguy ill name given me, pointed at, ſcreamed out upon, run away from, as a mad dog would be; all my own friends ready to renounce me!—Yet I think I deſerve it all: for have I not been as ready to give up myſelf, as others are to condemn me?

What madneſs, what folly this!—Who will take the part of a man that condemns himſelf?—Who can? He that pleads guilty to an indictment, leaves no room for aught but the ſentence. Out upon me, for an impolitical wretch! I have not the art of the leaſt artful of any of our Chriſtian princes; who every day are guilty of ten times worſe breaches of faith; and yet, iſſuing out a manifeſto, they wipe their mouths, and go on from infraction to infraction, from robbery to robbery; commit devaſtation upon devaſtation; and deſtroy—for their glory! And are rewarded with the names of conquerors, and are dubb'd Le Grand; praiſed, and even deified, by orators and poets, for their butcheries and depredations.

While I, a poor, ſingle, harmleſs prowler; at leaſt comparatively harmleſs; in order to ſatisfy my hunger, ſteal but one poor lamb; and every mouth is opened, every hand is lifted up, againſt me.

Nay, as I have juſt now heard, I am to be manifeſted againſt, though no prince: for Miſs Howe threatens to have the caſe publiſhed to the whole world.

I have a good mind not to oppoſe it; and to write an anſwer to it, as ſoon as it comes forth, and exculpate myſelf, by throwing all the fault upon the old ones. And this I have to plead, ſuppoſing all that my worſt enemies can alledge againſt me were true—That I am not anſwerable for all the extravagant conſequences that this affair has been attended with; and which could not poſſibly be foreſeen. Proceed anon.

LETTER LVIII.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

BUT what a pretty ſcheme of life haſt thou drawn out for thyſelf, and thy old widow! By my ſoul, Jack, I was mightily taken with it. There is but one thing wanting in it; and that will come of courſe: only to be in the commiſſion, and one of the quorum. Thou art already provided with a clerk, as good as thou'lt want, in the widow Lovick; for thou underſtandeſt law, and the conſcience: a good lord-chancellor between ye!—I ſhould take prodigious pleaſure to hear thee decide in a baſtard caſe, upon thy new notions, and old remembrances.

But raillery apart. [All gloom at heart, by Jupiter! although the pen and the countenance aſſume airs of levity!]

If, after all, thou canſt ſo eaſily repent and reform, as thou thinkeſt thou canſt: if thou canſt thus ſhake off thy old ſins, and thy old habits: and if thy old maſter will ſo readily diſmiſs ſo tried and ſo faithful a ſervant, and permit thee thus calmly to enjoy thy new ſyſtem; no room for ſcandal; all temptation ceaſing: and if at laſt (thy reformation warranted and approved by time) thou marrieſt, and liveſt honeſt:—why, Belford, I cannot but ſay, that if all theſe IF's come to paſs, thou ſtandeſt a good chance to be a happy man!

All I think, as I told thee in my laſt, is, that the devil knows his own intereſt too well, to let thee off ſo eaſily. Thou thyſelf telleſt me, that we cannot repent when we will. And indeed I found it ſo: for, in my lucid intervals, I made good reſolutions: but as health turned it's blythe ſide to me, and opened my proſpects of recovery, all my old inclinations and appetites returned; and this letter, perhaps, will be a thorough conviction to thee, that I am as wild a fellow as ever, or in the way to be ſo.

Thou aſkeſt me, very ſeriouſly, if, upon the faint ſketch thou haſt drawn, thy new ſcheme be not infinitely preferable to any of thoſe which we have ſo long purſued?—Why, Jack—Let me reflect—Why, Belford—I can't ſay—I can't ſay—but it is. To ſpeak out—It is really, as Biddy in the play ſays, a good comfortable ſcheme.

But when thou telleſt me, that it was thy misfortune to love me, becauſe thy value for me made thee a wickeder man than otherwiſe thou wouldſt have been; I deſire thee to revolve this aſſertion: and I am perſuaded, that thou wilt not find thyſelf in ſo right a train as thou imagineſt.

No falſe colourings, no gloſſes, does a true penitent aim at. Debaſement, diffidence, mortification, contrition, are all near of a kin, Jack; and inſeparable from a repentant ſpirit.—If thou knoweſt not this, thou art not got three ſteps (out of threeſcore) towards repentance and amendment. And let me remind thee, before the grand accuſer come to do it, that thou wert ever above being a paſſive follower in iniquity. Though thou hadſt not ſo good an invention as he to whom thou writeſt, thou hadſt as active an heart for miſchief, as ever I met with in man.

Then for improving an hint, thou wert always a true Engliſhman. I never ſtarted a roguery, that did not come out of thy forge in a manner ready anvilled and hammered for execution, when I have ſometimes been at a loſs to make any-thing of it myſelf.

I AM actually now employed in taking leave of my friends in the country. I had once thought of taking Tomlinſon, as I called him, with me: but his deſtiny has fruſtrated that intention.

Next Monday I think to ſee you in town; and then you, and I, and Mowbray, and Tourville, will laugh off that evening together. They will both accompany me (as I expect you will) to Dover, if not croſs the water. I muſt leave you and them good friends. They take extremely amiſs the treatment you have given them in your laſt letters. They ſay, you ſtrike at their underſtandings. I laugh at them; and tell them, that thoſe people who have braſs, are the moſt apt to be angry when it is called in queſtion.

Make up all the papers and narratives you can ſpare me againſt the time. The will particularly I expect to take with me. Who knows but that thoſe things, which will help to ſecure you in the way you are got into, may convert me? R. L.

Mr. Belford returns a very ſerious anſwer to the preceding letter; which appears not.

LETTER LIX.

MR. BELFORD, TO COLONEL MORDEN.

THURSDAY, SEPT. 21.

GIVE me leave, dear Sir, to addreſs myſelf to you in a very ſerious and ſolemn manner, on a ſubject that I muſt not, cannot, diſpenſe with; as I promiſed the divine lady, that I would do every-thing in my power to prevent that further miſchief of which ſhe was ſo very apprehenſive.

I will not content myſelf with diſtant hints. It is with very great concern that I have juſt now heard of a declaration which you are ſaid to have made to your relations at Harlowe Place; That you will not reſt till you have avenged your couſin's wrongs upon Mr. Lovelace.

Far be it from me to offer to defend the unhappy man, or even unduly to extenuate his crime! But yet I muſt ſay, that the family, by their perſecutions of the dear lady at firſt, and by their implacableneſs afterwards, ought, at leaſt, to ſhare the blame with him. There is even great reaſon to believe, that a lady of ſuch a religious turn, her virtue neither to be ſurprized nor corrupted, her will inviolate, would have got over a mere perſonal injury; eſpecially as he would have done all that was in his power to repair it; and as, from the application of all his family in his favour, and other circumſtances attending his ſincere and voluntary offer, the lady might have condeſcended, with greater glory to herſelf, than if he had never offended.

When I have the pleaſure of ſeeing you next, I will acquaint you, Sir, with all the circumſtances of this melancholy ſtory; from which you will ſee, that Mr. Lovelace was extremely ill treated at firſt, by the whole family, this admirable lady excepted. This exception, I know, heightens his crime: but as his principal intention was but to try her virtue; and that he became ſo earneſt a ſuppliant to her for marriage; and as he has ſuffered ſo deplorably in the loſs of his reaſon, for not having it in his power to repair her wrongs; I preſume to hope that much is to be pleaded againſt ſuch a reſolution as you are ſaid to have made. I will read to you at the ſame time ſome paſſages from letters of his; two of which (one but this moment received) will convince you, that the unhappy man, who is but now recovering his intellects, needs no greater puniſhment than what he has from his own reflections.

I have juſt now read over the copies of the dear lady's poſthumous letters. I ſend them all to you, except that directed for Mr. Lovelace; which I reſerve till I have the pleaſure of ſeeing you. Let me entreat you to read once more that written to yourſelf; and that to her brother; which latter I now ſend you; as they are in point to the preſent ſubject.

I think, Sir, they are unanſwerable. Such, at leaſt, is the effect they have upon me, that I hope I ſhall never be provoked to draw my ſword again in a private quarrel.

To the weight theſe muſt needs have upon you, let me add, that the unhappy man has given no new occaſion of offence, ſince your viſit to him at Lord M.'s, when you was ſo well ſatisfied of his intention to atone for his crimes, that you yourſelf urged to your dear couſin her forgiveneſs of him.

Let me alſo (though I preſume to hope there is no need, when you coolly conſider every-thing) remind you of your own promiſe to your departing couſin; relying upon which, her laſt moments were the eaſier.

Reflect, my dear Colonel Morden, that the higheſt injury was to her: her family all have a ſhare in the cauſe: ſhe forgives it: why ſhould we not endeavour to imitate what we admire?

You aſked me, Sir, when in town, if a brave man could be a premeditatedly baſe one?—Generally ſpeaking, I believe bravery and baſeneſs are incompatible. But Mr. Lovelace's character, in the inſtance before us, affords a proof of the truth of the common obſervation, that there is no general rule but has it's exceptions: for England, I believe, as gallant a nation as it is deemed to be, has not in it a braver ſpirit than his; nor a man who has a greater ſkill at his weapons; nor more calmneſs with his ſkill.

I mention not this with a thought that it can effect Colonel Morden; who, if he be not withheld by SUPERIOR MOTIVES, as well as influenced by thoſe I have reminded him of, will tell me, that this ſkill, and this bravery, will make him the more worthy of being called upon by him.

To theſe SUPERIOR motives then I refer myſelf: and with the greater confidence; as a purſuit ending in blood would not, at this time, have the plea lie for it with any-body, which ſudden paſſion might have with ſome: but would be conſtrued by all, to be a cool and deliberate act of revenge for an evil abſolutely irretrievable: an act, of which a brave and noble ſpirit (ſuch as is the gentleman's to whom I now write) is not capable.

Excuſe me, Sir, for the ſake of my executorial duty and promiſe, keeping in eye the dear lady's perſonal injunctions, as well as written will, enforced by letters poſthumous. Every article of which (ſolicitous as we both are to ſee it duly performed) ſhe would have diſpenſed with, rather than farther miſchief ſhould happen on her account. I am, dear SIR, your affectionate and faithful ſervant,

J. BELFORD.

The following is the poſthumous letter to Colonel Morden, referred to in the above.

LETTER

LETTER LX.

SUPERSCRIBED,

TO MY BELOVED COUSIN WILLIAM MORDEN, ESQ.

TO BE DELIVERED AFTER MY DEATH.

MY DEAREST COUSIN,

AS it is uncertain from my preſent weak ſtate, whether, if living, I may be in a condition to receive as I ought the favour you intend me of a viſit, when you come to London, I take this opportunity to return you, while able, the humble acknowledgments of a grateful heart, for all your goodneſs to me from childhood till now: and more particularly for your preſent kind interpoſition in my favour—God Almighty for ever bleſs you, dear Sir, for the kindneſs you endeavoured to procure for me!

One principal end of my writing to you in this ſolemn manner, is, to beg of you, which I do with the utmoſt earneſtneſs, that when you come to hear the particulars of my ſtory, you will not ſuffer active reſentment to take place in your generous breaſt on my account.

Remember my dear couſin, that vengeance is God's province, and he has undertaken to repay it; nor will you, I hope, invade that province;—eſpecially as there is no neceſſity for you to attempt to vindicate my fame; ſince the offender himſelf, (before he is called upon) has ſtood forth, and offered to do me all the juſtice that you could have extorted from him, had I lived: and when your own perſon may be endangered by running an equal riſque with a guilty man.

Duelling, Sir, I need not tell you, who have adorned a publick character, is not only an uſurpation of the divine prerogative; but it is an inſult upon magiſtracy and good government. 'Tis an impious act. 'Tis an attempt to take away a life that ought not to depend upon a private ſword: an act, the conſequence of which is to hurry a ſoul (all it's ſins upon it's head) into perdition; endangering that of the poor triumpher—Since neither intend to give to the other that chance, as I may call it, for the divine mercy, in an opportunity for repentance, which each preſumes to hope for himſelf.

Seek not then, I beſeech you, Sir, to aggravate my fault, by a purſuit of blood, which muſt neceſſarily be deemed a conſequence of that fault. Give not the unhappy man the merit (were you aſſuredly to be the victor) of falling by your hand. At preſent he is the perfidious, the ungrateful deceiver; but will not the forfeiture of his life, and the probable loſs of his ſoul, be a dreadful expiation for having made me miſerable for a few months only, and through that miſery, by the divine favour, happy to all eternity?

In ſuch a caſe, my couſin, where ſhall the evil ſtop? And who ſhall avenge on you?—And who on your avenger?

Let the poor man's conſcience, then, dear Sir, avenge me. He will one day find puniſhment more than enough from that. Leave him to the chance of repentance. If the Almighty will give him time for it, why ſhould you deny it him?—Let him ſtill be the guilty aggreſſor; and let no one ſay, Clariſſa Harlowe is now amply revenged in his fall; or, in the caſe of yours, (which Heaven avert!) that her fault, inſtead of being buried in the grave, is perpetuated, and aggravated, by a loſs far greater than that of herſelf.

Often, Sir, has the more guilty been the vanquiſher of the leſs. An Earl of Shrewſbury, in the reign of Charles II. as I have read, endeavouring to revenge the greateſt injury that man can do to man, met with his death at Barn Elms, from the hand of the ignoble duke who had vilely diſhonoured him. Nor can it be thought an unequal diſpenſation, were it generally to happen, that the uſurper of the divine prerogative ſhould be puniſhed for his preſumption by the man whom he ſought to deſtroy, and who, however previouſly criminal, is put, in this caſe, upon a neceſſary act of ſelf-defence.

May Heaven protect you, Sir, in all your ways; and, once more I pray, reward you for all your kindneſs to me! A kindneſs ſo worthy of your heart, and ſo exceedingly grateful to mine: that of ſeeking to make peace, and to reconcile parents to a once beloved child; uncles to a niece late their favourite; and a brother and ſiſter to a ſiſter whom once they thought not unworthy of that tender relation. A kindneſs ſo greatly preferable to the vengeance of a murdering ſword.

Be a comforter, dear Sir, to my honoured parents, as you have been to me: and may we, through the divine goodneſs to us both, meet in that bleſſed eternity, into which, as I humbly truſt, I ſhall have entered when you read this!

So prays, and to her latest hour will pray, my dear cousin Morden, my friend, my guardian, but not my avenger.—[Dear Sir! remember that!—]

Your ever affectionate and obliged

CLARISSA HARLOWE.

LETTER LXI.

COLONEL MORDEN, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

SATURDAY, SEPT. 23.

DEAR SIR,

I Am very sorry that any-thing you have heard I have said should give you uneasiness.

I am obliged to you for the letters you have communicated to me; and still further for your promise to favour me with others occasionally.

All that relates to my dearest cousin I shall be glad to see, be it from whom it will.

I leave to your own discretion, what may or may not be proper for Miss Howe to see from a pen so free as mine.

I admire her spirit. Were she a man, do you think, Sir, she, at this time, would have your advice to take upon such a subject as that upon which you write?

Fear not, however, that your communications shall put me upon any measures that otherwise I should not have taken. The wickedness, Sir, is of such a nature, as admits not of aggravation.

Yet I do assure you, that I have not made any resolutions that will be a tie upon me.

I have indeed expressed myself with vehemence upon the occasion. Who could forbear to do so? But it is not my way to resolve in matters of moment, till opportunity brings the execution of my purposes within my reach. We shall see by what manner of spirit this young man will be actuated, on his recovery. If he continue to brave and defy a family which he has so irreparably injured—If—But resolutions depending upon future contingencies are best left to future determination, as I just now hinted.

Mean time, I will own, that I think my cousin's arguments unanswerable. No good man but must be influenced by them.—But, alas! Sir, who is good?

As to your arguments; I hope you will believe me, when I assure you, as I now do, that your opinion, and your reasonings, have, and will always have, great and deserved weight with me: and that I respect you still more than I did, if possible, for your expostulations in support of my cousin's pious injunctions to me. They come from you, Sir, with the greatest propriety, as her executor and representative; and likewise as you are a man of humanity, and a well-wisher to both parties.

I am not exempt from violent passions, Sir, any more than your friend; but then I hope they are only capable of being raised by other peoples insolence, and not by my own arrogance. If ever I am stimulated by my imperfections and my resentments to act against my judgment, and my cousin's injunctions; some such reflections as these that follow, will run away with my reason. Indeed they are always present with me.

In the first place; my own disappointment; who came over with the hope of passing the remainder of my days in the conversation of a kinswoman so beloved; and to whom I have a double relation, as her cousin and trustee.

Then I reflect, too, too often, perhaps, for my engagements to her in her last hours, that the dear creature could only forgive for herself. She, no doubt, is happy: but who shall forgive for a whole family, in all it's branches made miserable for their lives?

That the more faulty her friends were as to her, the more enormous his ingratitude, and the more inexcuseable—What, Sir! was it not enough, that she suffered what she did for him, but the barbarian must make her suffer for her sufferings for his sake?—Passion makes me express this weakly: passion refuses the aid of expression sometimes, where the propriety of a resentment prima facie declares expression to be needless. I leave it to you, Sir, to give this reflection it's due force.

That the author of this diffusive mischief perpetrated it premeditatedly, wantonly, in the gaiety of his heart—To try my cousin, say you, Sir?—To try the virtue of a Clarissa, Sir!—Has she then given him any cause to doubt her virtue?—It could not be.—If he avers that she did, I am indeed called upon—But I will have patience.

That he carried her, as now it appears, to a vile brothel, purposely to put her out of all human resource; himself out of the reach of all humane remorse: and that, finding ing her proof againſt all the common arts of deluſion, baſe and unmanly arts were there uſed to effect his wicked purpoſes. Once dead, the injured ſaint, in her will, ſays, he has ſeen her.

That I could not know this, when I ſaw him at M. Hall: that, the object of his attempts conſidered, I could not ſuppoſe there was ſuch a monſter breathing as he: that it was natural for me to impute her refuſal of him rather to tranſitory reſentment, to conſciouſneſs of human frailty, and mingled doubts of the ſincerity of his offers, than to villainies, which had given the irrevertible blow, and had at that inſtant brought her down to the gates of death, which in a very few days incloſed her.

That he is a man of defiance: a man who thinks to awe every-one by his inſolent darings, and by his pretenſions to ſuperior courage and ſkill.

That, diſgrace as he is to his name, and to the character of a gentleman, the man would not want merit, who, in vindication of the diſhonoured diſtinction, ſhould expunge and blot him out of the worthy liſt.

That the injured family has a ſon, who, however unworthy of ſuch a ſiſter, is of a temper vehement, unbridled, fierce; unequal therefore (as he has once indeed been found) to a contention with this man: the loſs of which ſon, by a violent death, on ſuch an occaſion, and by a hand ſo juſtly hated, would complete the miſery of the whole family: and who, nevertheleſs, reſolves to call him to account, if I do not: his very miſbehaviour perhaps to ſuch a ſiſter ſtimulating his perverſe heart to do her memory the more ſignal juſtice; though the attempt might be fatal to himſelf.

Then, Sir, to be a witneſs, as I am every hour, to the calamity and diſtreſs of a family to which I am related; every one of whom, however averſe to an alliance with him while it had not taken place, would no doubt have been ſoon reconciled to the admirable creature, had the man (to whom, for his family and fortunes, it was not a diſgrace to be allied) done her but common juſtice!

To ſee them hang their penſive heads; mope about, ſhunning one another; though formerly never uſed to meet but to rejoice in each other; afflicting themſelves with reflections, that the laſt time they reſpectively ſaw the dear creature, it was here, or there, at ſuch a place, in ſuch an attitude; and could they have thought that it would have been the laſt?—Every-one of them reviving inſtances of her excellences that will for a long time make their very bleſſings a curſe to them!

Her cloſet, her chamber, her cabinet, given up to me to diſfurniſh, in order to anſwer (now too late obliging!) the legacies bequeathed; unable themſelves to enter them; and even making uſe of leſs convenient back-ſtairs, that they may avoid paſſing by the doors of her apartment!

Her parlour locked up; the walks, the retirements, the ſummer-houſe in which ſhe uſed to purſue her charming works; that, in particular, from which ſhe went to the fatal interview, ſhunned, or hurried by, or over!

Her perfections, nevertheleſs, called up to remembrance, and enumerated: incidents and graces, unheeded before, or paſſed over in the groupe of her numberleſs perfections, now brought into notice, and dwelt upon!

The very ſervants allowed to expatiate upon theſe praiſeful topicks to their principals! Even eloquent in their praiſes! The diſtreſſed principals liſtening and weeping! Then to ſee them break in upon the zealous applauders, by their impatience and remorſe, and throw abroad their helpleſs hands, and exclaim; then again to ſee them liſten to hear more of her praiſes, and weep again—They even encouraging the ſervants to repeat how they uſed to be ſtopt by ſtrangers to aſk after her, and by thoſe who knew her, to be told of ſome new inſtances to her honour—How aggravating all this!

In dreams they ſee her, and deſire to ſee her: always an angel, and accompanied by angels: always clad in robes of light: always endeavouring to comfort them, who declare, that they ſhall never more know comfort!

What an example ſhe ſet! How ſhe indited! How ſhe drew! How ſhe wrought! How ſhe talked! How ſhe ſung! How ſhe played! Her voice, muſick! Her accent, harmony!

Her converſation how inſtructive! how ſought after! The delight of perſons of all ages, of both ſexes, of all ranks! Yet how humble, how condeſcending! Never were dignity and humility ſo illuſtriouſly mingled!

At other times, how generous, how noble, how charitable, how judicious in her charities! In every action laudable! In every attitude attractive! In every appearance, whether full-dressed, or in the housewife's more humble garb, equally elegant, and equally lovely! Like or resembling Miss Clarissa Harlowe, they now remember to be a praise denoting the highest degree of excellence, with every-one, whatever person, action, or rank, spoken of.—The desireable daughter; the obliging kinswoman; the affectionate sister, (all envy now subsided!) the faithful, the warm friend; the affable, the kind, the benevolent mistress!—Not one fault remembered! All their severities called cruelties: mutually accusing each other; each him and herself; and all to raise her character, and torment themselves.

Such, Sir, was the angel, of whom the vilest of men has deprived the world! You, Sir, who know more of the barbarous machinations and practices of this strange man, can help me to still more inflaming reasons, were they needed, why a man not perfect, may stand excused to the generality of the world, if he should pursue his vengeance; and the rather, as through an absence of six years, (high as just report, and the promises of her early youth from childhood, had raised her in his esteem) he could not till now know one half of her excellences—Till now! that we have lost, for ever lost, the admirable creature!

But I will force myself from the subject, after I have repeated that I have not yet made any resolutions that can bind me. Whenever I do, I shall be glad they may be such as may merit the honour of your approbation.

I send you back the copies of the posthumous letters. I see the humanity of your purpose, in the transmission of them to me; and I thank you most heartily for it. I presume, that it is owing to the same laudable consideration, that you kept back the copy of that to the wicked man himself.

I intend to wait upon Miss Howe in person with the diamond-ring, and such other of the effects bequeathed to her as are here. I am, Sir, your most faithful and obliged servant,

WM. MORDEN.

Mr. Belford, in his answer to this letter, further enforces the lady's dying instructions; and rejoices that the colonel has made no vindictive resolutions; and hopes every thing from his prudence and consideration, and from his promise given to the dying lady.

He refers to the seeing him in town an account of the dreadful ends of two of the greatest criminals in his cousin's affair.

'This, says he, 'together with Mr. 'Lovelace's disorder of mind, looks 'as if Providence had already taken 'the punishment of these unhappy 'wretches into it's own hands.'

He desires the colonel will give him a day's notice of his coming to town, lest otherwise he may be absent at the time—This he does, though he tells him not the reason, with a view to prevent a meeting between him and Mr. Lovelace; who might be in town (as he apprehended) about the same time, in his way to go abroad.

LETTER LXII.

COLONEL MORDEN, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

TUESDAY, SEPT. 26.

DEAR SIR,

I Cannot help congratulating myself as well as you, that we have already got through with the family every article of the will, where they have any concern.

You left me a discretional power, in many instances; and, in pursuance of it, I have had my dear cousin's personal jewels valued, and will account to you for them, at the highest price, when I come to town, as well as for other matters that you were pleased to entrust to my management.

These jewels I have presented to my cousin Dolly Hervey, in acknowledgment of her love to the dear departed. I have told Miss Howe of this; and she is as well pleased with what I have done, as if she had been the purchaser of them herself. As that young lady has jewels of her own, she could only have wished to purchase these because they were her beloved friend's.—The grandmother's jewels are also valued; and the money will be paid me for you, to be carried to the uses of the will.

Mrs. Norton is preparing, by general consent, to enter upon her office as housekeeper at The Grove. But it is my opinion, that she will not be long on this side Heaven.

I waited on Miss Howe myself, as I told you I would, with what was bequeathed to her and her mother. You will not be displeased, perhaps, if I make make a few obſervations with regard to the friendſhip that ſubſiſted between that young lady and my beloved couſin.

There never was a firmer and nobler friendſhip in women, than that between my dear couſin and Miſs Howe, to which this wretched man has given a period.

Friendſhip, generally ſpeaking, Mr. Belford, is too fervent a flame for female minds to manage: a light, that but in few of their hands burns ſteady, and often hurries the ſex into flight and abſurdity. Like other extremes, it is hardly ever durable. Marriage, which is the higheſt ſtate of friendſhip, generally abſorbs the moſt vehement friendſhips of female to female; and that whether the wedlock be happy, or not.

What female mind is capable of two fervent friendſhips at the ſame time?—This I mention as a general obſervation: but the friendſhip that ſubſiſted between theſe two ladies affords a remarkable exception to it: which I account for from thoſe qualities and attainments in both, which, were they more common, would furniſh more exceptions ſtill in favour of the ſex.

Both had an enlarged, and even a liberal education: both had minds thirſting after virtuous knowledge: great readers both: great writers—[And early familiar writing I take to be one of the greateſt openers and improvers of the mind, that man or woman can be employed in.]—Both generous. High in fortune; therefore above that dependence each on the other, that frequently deſtroys the familiarity which is the cement of friendſhip. Both excelling in different ways, in which neither fought to envy the other. Both bleſſed with clear and diſtinguiſhing faculties; with ſolid ſenſe; and from their firſt intimacy, [I have many of my lights, Sir, from Mrs. Norton] each ſeeing ſomething in the other to fear, as well as to love; yet making it an indiſpenſable condition of their friendſhip, each to tell the other of her failings; and to be thankful for the freedom taken. One by nature gentle; the other made ſo, by her love and admiration of her exalted friend—Impoſſible that there could be a friendſhip better calculated for duration.

Having now ſeen every-thing that relates to the will of my dear couſin brought to a deſirable iſſue, I will ſet about making my own. I ſhall follow the dear creature's example, and give my reaſons for every article, that there may be no room for after-contention.

What but a fear of death, a fear unworthy of a creature who knows that he muſt one day as ſurely die as he was born, can hinder any-one from making ſuch a diſpoſition?

I hope ſoon to pay my reſpects to you in town. Mean time, I am, with great reſpect, dear Sir, your faithful and affectionate humble ſervant,

WM. MORDEN.

LETTER LXIII.

MR. BELFORD, TO MISS HOWE.

THURSDAY, SEPT. 28.

MADAM,

I Do myſelf the honour to ſend you by this, according to my promiſe, copies of the poſthumous letters written by your exalted friend.

Theſe will be accompanied with other letters, particularly a copy of one from Mr. Lovelace, begun to be written on the 14th, and continued down to the 18th. You will ſee by it, Madam, the dreadful anguiſh that his ſpirits labour with, and his deep remorſe.

Mr. Lovelace ſent for this letter back. I complied; but I firſt took a copy of it. As I have not told him what I have done, ſo you will be pleaſed to forbear communicating of it to any-body but Mr. Hickman. That gentleman's peruſal of it will be the ſame as if nobody but yourſelf ſaw it.

One of the letters of Colonel Morden which I incloſe, you will obſerve, Madam, is only a copy. The true reaſon for which, as I will ingenuouſly acknowledge, is, ſome free, but reſpectful animadverſions which the colonel has made upon your declining to carry into execution your part of your dear friend's laſt requeſts. I have, therefore, in reſpect to that worthy gentleman, (having a caution from him on that head) omitted thoſe parts.

Will you allow me, Madam, however, to tell you, that I myſelf could not have believed that my inimitable teſtatrix's own Miſs Howe would have been the moſt backward in performing ſuch part of her dear friend's laſt will, as is entirely in her own power to perform—Eſpecially, when that performance would make one of the moſt deſerving men in England happy; and whom, I preſume, ſhe propoſes to honour with her hand.

Excuſe me, Madam, I have a moſt ſincere veneration for you; and would not diſoblige you for the world.

I will

I will not presume to make remarks on the letters I send you; nor upon the informations I have to give you of the dreadful end of two unhappy wretches, who were the greatest criminals in the affair of your adorable friend. These are the infamous Sinclair, and a person whom you have read of, no doubt, in the letters of the charming innocent, by the name of Captain Tomlinson.

The wretched woman died in the extremest tortures and despondency: the man from wounds got in defending himself in carrying on a contraband trade: both accusing themselves in their last hours, for the parts they had acted against the most excellent of women, as of the crime that gave them the deepest remorse.

Give me leave to say, Madam, that if your compassion be not excited for the poor man who suffers so greatly from his own anguish of mind, as you will observe by his letter he does; and for the unhappy family, whose remorse, as you will see by Colonel Morden's, is so deep;—your nature must. And yet I shall not wonder, if the just sense of the irreparable loss you have sustained, hardens a heart against pity, which, on a less extraordinary occasion, would want its principal grace, if it were not compassionate.

I am, Madam, with the greatest respect and gratitude, your most obliged and faithful humble servant,

J. BELFORD.

LETTER LXIV.

MISS HOWE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

SIR, SAT. SEPT. 30.

I Little thought I ever could have owed so much obligation to any man, as you have laid me under. And yet what you have sent me has almost broken my heart, and ruined my eyes.

I am surprized, though agreeably, that you have so soon, and so well, got over that part of the trust you have engaged in, which relates to the family.

It may be presumed, from the exits you mention of two of the infernal man's accomplices, that the thunder-bolt will not stop short of the principal. Indeed I have some pleasure to think it seems rolling along towards the devoted head that has plotted all the mischief. But let me, however, say, that although I think Mr. Morden not altogether in the wrong in his reasons for resentment, as he is the dear creature's kinsman and trustee; yet I think you very much in the right in endeavouring to dissuade him from it, as you are her executor, and act in pursuance of her earnest request.

But what a letter is that of the infernal man? I cannot observe upon it. Neither can I, for very different reasons, upon my dear creature's posthumous letters; particularly on that to him. Oh! Mr. Belford! what numberless perfections died, when my Clarissa drew her last breath!

If decency be observed in his letters; for I have not yet had patience to read above two or three of them, (besides this horrid one, which I return you inclosed;) I may some time hence be curious to look, by their means, into the hearts of wretches, which, though they must be the abhorrence of virtuous minds, will, when laid open, (as I presume they are in them) afford a proper warning to those who read them, and teach them to detest men of such profligate characters.

If your reformation be sincere, you will not be offended that I do not except you on this occasion.—And thus have I helped you to a criterion to try yourself by.

By this letter of the wicked man it is apparent, that there are still wickeder women. But see what a guilty commerce with the devils of your sex will bring those to, whose morals ye have ruined!—For these women were once innocent: it was man that made them otherwise. The first bad man, perhaps, threw them upon worse men: those upon still worse; till they commenced devils incarnate. The height of wickedness, or of shame, is not arrived at all at once, as I have somewhere heard observed.

But this man, this monster rather, for him to curse these women, and to curse the dear creature's family, (implacable as the latter were) in order to lighten a burden he voluntarily took up, and groans under, is meanness added to wickedness: and in vain will he one day find his low plea of sharing with her friends, and with those common wretches, a guilt which will be adjudged him as all his own; though they too may meet with their punishment: as it is evidently begun; in the first, in their ineffectual reproaches of one another; in the second—as you have told me.

This letter of the abandoned wretch I have not shewn to any-body; not even to Mr. Hickman: for, Sir, I must tell you, I do not as yet think it the same thing as only seeing it myself.

Mr. Hickman, like the rest of his sex, would would grow upon indulgence. One diſtinction from me would make him pay two to himſelf. Inſolent creepers, or encroachers, all of you! to ſhew any of you a favour to-day, you would expect it as a right to-morrow.

I am, as you ſee, very open and ſincere with you! and deſign in another letter to be ſtill more ſo, in anſwer to your call, and Colonel Morden's call, upon me, in a point that concerns me to explain myſelf upon to my beloved creature's executor, and to the colonel, as her only tender and only worthy relation.

I cannot but highly applaud Colonel Morden for his generoſity to Miſs Dolly Hervey.

O that he had arrived time enough to ſave my inimitable friend from the much nations of the vileſt of men, and from the envy and malice of the moſt ſelfiſh and implacable of brothers and ſiſters!

ANNA HOWE.

LETTER LXV.

MISS HOWE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

MONDAY, OCT. 2.

WHEN you queſtion me, Sir, as you do, and on a ſubject ſo affecting to me, in the character of the repreſentative of my beſt-beloved friend, and have in every particular hitherto acted up to that character, you are entitled to my regard: eſpecially as you are joined in your queſtioning of me by a gentleman whom I look upon as the deareſt and neareſt (becauſe worthieſt) relation of my dear friend: and who, it ſeems, has been ſo ſevere a cenſurer of my conduct, that your politeneſs will not permit you to ſend me his letter, with others of his; but a copy only, in which the paſſages reflecting upon me are omitted.

I preſume, however, that what is meant by this alarming freedom of the colonel, is no more than what you both have already hinted to me. As if you thought I were not inclined to pay ſo much regard to my beloved creature's laſt will, in my own caſe, as I would have others pay to it. A charge that I ought not to be quite ſilent under.

You have obſerved, no doubt, that I have ſeemed to value myſelf upon the freedom I take in declaring my ſentiments without reſerve upon every ſubject that I pretend to touch upon: and I can hardly queſtion that I have, or ſhall, in your opinion, by my unceremonious treatment of you upon ſo ſhort an acquaintance, run into the error of thoſe, who, wanting to be thought above hypocriſy and flattery, fall into ruſticity, if not ill-manners; a common fault with ſuch, who, not caring to correct conſtitutional failings, ſeek to gloſs them over by ſome nominal virtue; when all the time, perhaps, theſe failings are entirely owing to native arrogance; or, at leaſt, to a contracted ruſt, that they will not, becauſe it would give them pain, ſubmit to have filed off.

You ſee, Sir, that I can, however, be as free with myſelf as with you; and, by what I am going to write, you will find me ſtill more free: and yet I am aware, that ſuch of my ſex as will not aſſume ſome little dignity, and exact reſpect from yours, will render themſelves cheap; and perhaps, for their modeſty and diffidence, be repaid with ſcorn and inſult.

But the ſcorn I will endeavour not to deſerve; and the inſult I will not bear.

In ſome of the dear creature's papers which you have had in your poſſeſſion, and muſt again have, in order to get tranſcribed, you will find ſeveral friendly, but ſevere reprehenſions of me, on account of a natural, or, at leaſt, an habitual, warmth of temper, which ſhe was pleaſed to impute to me.

I was thinking to give you her charge againſt me in her own words from one of her letters delivered to me with her own hands, on taking leave of me on the laſt viſit ſhe honoured me with. But I will ſupply that charge by confeſſion of more than it imports; to wit, That I am haughty, uncontroulable, and violent in my temper; This, I ſay; impatient of contradiction, was my beloved's charge; [From any-body but her dear ſelf, ſhe ſhould have ſaid] and aim not at that affability, that gentleneſs next to meekneſs, which, in the letter I was going to communicate, ſhe tells me are the peculiar and indiſpenſable characteriſticks of a real fine lady; who, ſhe is pleaſed to ſay, ſhould appear to be gallleſs as a dove; and never ſhould know what warmth or high ſpirit is, but in the cauſe of religion or virtue: or in caſes where her own honour, the honour of a friend, or that of an innocent perſon, is concerned.

Now, Sir, as I needs muſt plead guilty to this indictment, do you think I ought not to reſolve upon a ſingle life?—I, who have ſuch an opinion of your ſex, that I think there is not one man in an hundred whom a woman of ſenſe and ſpirit can either honour or obey, though you make us promiſe both, in that ſolemn form of words which unites or rather binds us to you in marriage?

When I look round upon all the married people of my acquaintance, and ſee how they live, and what they bear who live beſt, I am confirmed in my diſlike to the ſtate.

Well do your ſex contrive to bring us up fools and ideots, in order to make us bear the yoke you lay upon our ſhoulders; and that we may not deſpiſe you from our hearts (as we certainly ſhould, if we were brought up as you are) for your ignorance, as much as you often make us do (as it is) for your inſolence.

Theſe, Sir, are ſome of my notions. And, with theſe notions let me repeat my queſtion, Do you think I ought to marry at all?

If I marry either a ſordid or an imperious wretch, can I, do you think, live with him? And ought a man of a contrary character, for the ſake of either of our reputations, to be plagued with me?

Long did I ſtand out againſt all the offers made me, and againſt all the perſuaſions of my mother; and, to tell you the truth, the longer, and with the more obſtinacy, as the perſon my choice would have firſt fallen upon, was neither approved by my mother, nor by my dear friend. This rivetted me to my pride, and to my oppoſition: for although I was convinced after a while, that my choice would neither have been prudent nor happy; and that the ſpecious wretch was not what he had made me believe he was; yet could I not eaſily think of any other man: and indeed, from the detection of him, took a ſettled averſion to the whole ſex.

At laſt Mr. Hickman offered himſelf; a man worthy of a better choice. He had the good fortune [He thinks it ſo] to be agreeable (and to make his propoſals agreeable) to my mother.

As to myſelf; I own, that were I to have choſen a brother, Mr. Hickman ſhould have been the man; virtuous, ſober, ſincere, friendly, as he is. But I wiſh not to marry: nor knew I the man in the world whom I could think deſerving of my beloved friend. But neither of our parents would let us live ſingle.

The accurſed Lovelace was propoſed warmly to her, at one time; and, while ſhe was yet but indifferent to him, they, by ungenerous uſage of him, (for then, Sir, he was not known to be Beelzebub himſelf) and by endeavouring to force her inclinations in favour firſt of one worthleſs man, then of another in antipathy to him, through her fooliſh brother's caprice, turned that indifference (from the natural generoſity of her ſoul) into a regard which ſhe never otherwiſe would have had for a man of his character.

Mr. Hickman was propoſed to me. I refuſed him again and again. He perſiſted: my mother his advocate. My mother made my beloved friend his advocate too. I told him my diſlike of all men: of him: of matrimony.—Still he perſiſted. I uſed him with tyranny: led indeed partly by my temper, partly by deſign; hoping thereby to get rid of him; till the poor man, (his character unexceptionably uniform) ſtill perſiſting, made himſelf a merit with me by his patience. This brought down my pride, [I never, Sir, was accounted very ungenerous, nor quite ungrateful] and gave me, at one time, an inferiority in my own opinion to him; which laſted juſt long enough for my friends to prevail upon me to promiſe him encouragement; and to receive his addreſſes.

Having ſo done, when the weather-glaſs of my pride got up again, I found I had gone too far to recede. My mother and my friend both held me to it. Yet I tried him, I vexed him, an hundred ways; and not ſo much neither with deſign to vex him, as to make him hate me, and decline his ſuit.

He bore this, however; and got nothing but my pity: yet ſtill my mother and my friend, having obtained my promiſe, [made, however, not to him, but to them] and being well aſſured that I valued no man more than Mr. Hickman, (who never once diſobliged me in word or deed, or look, except by his fooliſh perſeverance) inſiſted upon the performance.

While my dear friend was in her unhappy uncertainty, I could not think of marriage: and now, what encouragement have I?—She my monitreſs, my guide, my counſel, gone, for ever gone!—By whoſe advice and inſtructions I hoped to acquit myſelf tolerably in the ſtate into which I could not avoid entering. For, Sir, my mother is ſo partially Mr. Hickman's friend, that I am ſure, ſhould any difference ariſe, ſhe would always cenſure me, and acquit him: even were he ungenerous enough to remember me in his day.

This, Sir, being my ſituation, conſider ſider how difficult it is for me to think of marriage. Whenever we approve, we can find an hundred good reaſons to juſtify our approbation. Whenever we diſlike, we can find a thouſand to juſtify our diſlike. Every-thing in the latter caſe is an impediment: every ſhadow a bugbear.—Thus can I enumerate and ſwell perhaps only imaginary grievances; I muſt go whither he would have me to go: viſit whom he would have me to viſit: well as I love to write, (though now, alas! my grand inducement to write is over) it muſt be to whom he pleaſes: and Mrs. Hickman (who, as Miſs Howe, cannot do wrong) would hardly ever be able to do right. Thus, the tables turned upon me, I am reminded of my vowed obedience; Madam'd up perhaps to matrimonial perfection, and all the wedded warfare practiſed comfortably over between us, (for I ſhall not be paſſive under inſolent treatment) till we become curſes to each other, a bye-word to our neighbours, and the jeſt of our own ſervants.

But there muſt be bear and forbear, methinks ſome wiſe body will tell me: but why muſt I be teazed into a ſtate where that muſt be neceſſarily the caſe; when now I can do as I pleaſe, and wiſh only to be let alone to do as beſt pleaſes me? And what, in effect, does my mother ſay? 'Anna Howe, you now do 'every-thing that pleaſes you: you now 'have nobody to controul you: you go 'and you come; you dreſs and you un-'dreſs; you riſe and you go to reſt, juſt 'as you think beſt: but you muſt be 'happier ſtill, child!'

'As how, Madam?'

'Why, you muſt marry, my dear, 'and have none of theſe options; but, 'in every-thing, do as your huſband 'commands you.'

This is very hard, you will own, Sir, for ſuch a one as me to think of. And yet, engaged to enter into that ſtate, as I am, how can I help myſelf? My mother preſſes me; my friend, my beloved friend, writing as from the dead, preſſes me; and you, and Mr. Morden, as executors of her will, remind me; the man is not afraid of me; [I am ſure, were I the man, I ſhould not have half his courage;] and I think I ought to conclude to puniſh him (the only effectual way I have to do it) for his perverſe adherence and perſecution, with the grant of his own wiſhes; a puniſhment which many others who enjoy theirs very commonly experience.

Let me then aſſure you, Sir, that when I can find, in the words of my charming friend in her will, writing of her couſin Hervey, that my grief for her is mellowed by time into a remembrance more ſweet than painful, that I may not be utterly unworthy of the paſſion a man of ſome merit has for me, I will anſwer the requeſt of my dear friend, ſo often repeated, and ſo earneſtly preſſed; and Mr. Hickman ſhall find, if he continue to deſerve my gratitude, that my endeavours ſhall not be wanting to make him amends for the patience he has had, and muſt ſtill a little while longer have with me: and then will it be his own fault (I hope not mine) if our marriage anſwer not thoſe happy prognoſticks, which filled her generous preſaging mind, upon this view, as ſhe once, for my encouragement, and to induce me to encourage him, told me.

Thus, Sir, have I, in a very free manner, accounted to you, as to the executor of my beloved friend, for all that relates to you, as ſuch to know; and even for more than I needed to do, againſt myſelf: only that you will find as much againſt me in ſome of her letters; and ſo, loſing nothing, I gain the character of ingenuouſneſs with you.

And thus much for the double reprimand, on my delaying my part of the performance of my dear friend's will.

And now, while you are admoniſhing me on this ſubject, let me remind you of one great article relating to yourſelf: it is furniſhed me by my dear creature's poſthumous letter to you—I hope you will not forget, that the moſt benevolent of her ſex expreſſes herſelf as earneſtly concerned for your thorough reformation, as ſhe does for my marrying. You'll ſee to it then, that her wiſhes are as completely anſwered in that particular, as you are deſirous they ſhould be in all others.

I have, I own, diſobeyed her in one article; and that is, where ſhe deſires that I will not put myſelf into mourning. I could not help it.

I ſend this and mine of Saturday laſt together: and will not add another word, after I have told you, that I think myſelf your obliged ſervant,

A. Howe.

LETTER LXVI.

MR. BELFORD, TO MISS HOWE.

THURSDAY NIGHT, OCT. 5.

I Return you, Madam, my moſt reſpectful thanks for your condeſcending hint, in relation to the pious wiſhes of your exalted friend for my thorough reformation.

I will only ſay, that it will be my earneſt and unwearied endeavour to make thoſe generous wiſhes effectual: and I hope for the divine bleſſing upon ſuch my endeavours, or elſe I know they will be in vain.

I cannot, Madam, expreſs how much I think myſelf obliged to you for your further condeſcenſion, in writing to me ſo frankly the ſtate of your paſt and preſent mind, in relation to the ſingle and matrimonial life: If the lady by whom, as the executor of her inimitable friend, I am thus honoured, has failings, never were failings ſo lovely in woman!—How much more lovely, indeed, than the virtues of many of her ſex!

I might have ventured into the hands of ſuch a lady the colonel's original letter entire. The worthy gentleman exceedingly admires you; and this caution was the effect of his politeneſs only, and of his regard for you.

I ſend you, Madam, a letter from Lord M. to myſelf; and the copies of three others written in conſequence of that. Theſe will acquaint you with Mr. Lovelace's departure from England, and with other particulars, which you will be curious to know.

Be pleaſed to keep to yourſelf ſuch of the contents as your own prudence will ſuggeſt to you ought not to be ſeen by any-body elſe.

I am, Madam, with the profoundeſt and moſt grateful reſpect, your faithful and obliged humble ſervant,

JOHN BELFORD.

LETTER LXVII.

LORD M. TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

M. HALL, FRIDAY, SEPT. 29.

DEAR SIR,

MY kinſman Lovelace is now ſetting out for London; propoſing to ſee you, and then to go to Dover, and ſo embark. God ſend him well out of the kingdom!

On Monday he will be with you, I believe. Pray let me be favoured with an account of all your converſations; for Mr. Mowbray and Mr. Tourville are to be there too; and whether you think he is grown quite his own man again. What I moſtly write for is, to wiſh you to keep Colonel Morden and him aſunder; and to I give you notice of his going to town. I ſhould be very loth there ſhould be any miſchief between them, as you gave me notice that the colonel threatened my nephew. But my kinſman would not bear that; ſo nobody let him know that he did. But I hope there is no fear: for the colonel does not, as I hear, threaten now. For his own ſake, I am glad of that; for there is not ſuch a man in the world as my kinſman is ſaid to be, at all the weapons—As well he was not; he would not be ſo daring.

We ſhall all here miſs the wild fellow. To be ſure, there is no man better company when he pleaſes.

Pray, do you never travel thirty or forty miles? I ſhould be glad to ſee you here at M. Hall. It will be charity, when my kinſman is gone; for we ſuppoſe you will be his chief correſpondent: although he has promiſed to write to my nieces often. But he is very apt to forget his promiſes; to us his relations particularly. God preſerve us all; amen! prays your very humble ſervant,

M.

LETTER LXVIII.

MR. BELFORD, TO LORD M.

LONDON, TUESDAY NIGHT, OCT. 3.

MY LORD,

I Obey your lordſhip's commands with great pleaſure.

Yeſterday in the afternoon Mr. Lovelace made me a viſit at my lodgings. As I was in expectation of one from Colonel Morden about the ſame time, I thought proper to carry him to a tavern which neither of us frequented; (on pretence of an half appointment) ordering notice to be ſent me thither, if the colonel came: and Mr. Lovelace ſent to Mowbray, and Tourville, and Mr. Doleman of Uxbridge, (who came to town to take leave of him) to let them know where to find us.

Mr. Lovelace is too well recovered, I was going to ſay. I never ſaw him more gay, lively, and handſome. We had a good deal of bluſter about ſome parts of the truſt I have engaged in; and upon freedoms I had treated him with; in which, he would have it, that I had exceeded our agreed on limits; but on the arrival of our three old companions, and a nephew of Mr. Doleman's, (who had a good while been deſirous to paſs an hour with Mr. Lovelace) it blew off for the preſent.

Mr. Mowbray and Mr. Tourville had alſo taken ſome exceptions at the freedoms of my pen; and Mr. Lovelace, after his way, took upon him to reconcile reconcile us; and did it at the expence of all three; and with such an infinite run of humour and raillery, that we had nothing to do but to laugh at what he said, and at one another. I can deal tolerably with him at my pen; but in conversation he has no equal. In short, it was his day. He was glad, he said, to find himself alive; and his two friends, clapping and rubbing their hands twenty times in an hour, declared, that now once more he was all himself; the charmingest fellow in the world; and they would follow him to the farthest part of the globe.

I threw a bur upon his coat now-and-then; but none would stick.

Your lordship knows, that there are many things which occasion a roar of applause in conversation, when the heart is open, and men are resolved to be merry, which will neither bear repeating, nor thinking of afterwards. Common things, in the mouth of a man we admire, and whose wit has passed upon us for sterling, become, in a gay hour, uncommon. We watch every turn of such a one's countenance, and are resolved to laugh when he smiles, even before he utters what we are expecting to flow from his lips.

Mr. Doleman and his nephew took leave of us by twelve. Mowbray and Tourville grew very noisy by one; and were carried off by two. Wine never moves Mr. Lovelace, notwithstanding a vivacity which generally helps on over-gay spirits. As to myself, the little part I had taken in their gaiety, kept me unconcerned.

The clock struck three before I could get him into any serious or attentive way —So natural to him is gaiety of heart; and such strong hold had the liveliness of the evening taken of him. His conversation you know, my lord, when his heart is free, runs off to the bottom without any dregs.

But after that hour, and when we thought of parting, he became a little more serious: and then he told me his designs, and gave me a plan of his intended tour; wishing heartily, that I could have accompanied him.

We parted about four; he not a little dissatisfied with me; for we had some talk about subjects, which, he said, he loved not to think of; to wit, Miss Harlowe's will; my executorship; papers I had in confidence communicated to that admirable lady, (with no unfriendly design, I assure your lordship;) and he insisting upon, and I refusing, the return of the letters he had written to me, from the time that he had made his first addresses to her.

He would see me once again, he said; and it would be upon very ill terms if I complied not with his request. Which I bid him not expect. But, that I might not deny him every-thing, I told him, that I would give him a copy of the will; though I was sure, I said, when he read it, he would wish he had never seen it.

I had a message from him about eleven this morning, desiring me to name a place at which to dine with him, and Mowbray, and Tourville, for the last time: and soon after another from Colonel Morden, inviting me to pass the evening with him at the Bedford Head in Covent Garden. And that I might keep them at distance from one another, I appointed Mr. Lovelace at the Eagle in Suffolk Street.

There I met him, and the two others. We began where we left off at our last parting; and were very high with each other. But, at last, all was made up, and he offered to forget and forgive every-thing, on condition that I would correspond with him while abroad, and continue the series which had been broken through by his illness; and particularly give him, as I had offered, a copy of the lady's will.

I promised him: and he then fell to rallying me on my gravity, and on my reformation-schemes, as he called them. As we walked about the room, expecting dinner to be brought in, he laid his hand upon my shoulder; then pushed me from him with a curse; walking round me, and surveying me from head to foot; then calling for the observations of the others, he turned round upon his heel, and with one of his peculiar wild airs, 'Ha, ha, ha, ha,' burst he out, 'that these four-faced 'proselytes should take it into their 'heads that they cannot be pious, without forfeiting both their good nature 'and their good manners! — Why, 'Jack,' turning me about, 'pr'ythee look up, man!—Dost thou not 'know, that religion, if it has taken 'proper hold of thy heart, is the most 'cheerful countenance-maker in the world? —I have heard my beloved Miss Harlowe say so: and she knew, or nobody 'did. And was not her aspect a benign 'proof of the observation? But by these 'wamblings in thy cursed gizzard, and 'thy awkward grimaces, I see thou'rt

'But a novice in it yet!—Ah, Belford, 'Belford, thou haſt a confounded parcel 'of briars and thorns to trample over 'barefoot, before religion will illumine 'theſe gloomy features!'

I give your lordſhip this account, in anſwer to your deſire to know, if I think him the man he was.

In our converſation at dinner, he was balancing whether he ſhould ſet out the next morning, or the morning after. But finding he had nothing to do, and Colonel Morden being in town, I turned the ſcale; and he agreed upon ſetting out to-morrow morning: they to ſee him embark; and I promiſed to accompany them for a morning's ride; (as they propoſed their horſes) but ſaid, that I muſt return in the afternoon.

With much reluctance they let me go to my evening's appointment: they little thought with whom: for Mr. Lovelace had put it as a caſe of honour to all of us, whether, as he had been told that Mr. Morden and Mr. James Harlowe had thrown out menaces againſt him, he ought to leave the kingdom till he had thrown himſelf in their way.

Mowbray gave his opinion, that he ought to leave it like a man of honour as he was; and if he did not take thoſe gentlemen to taſk for their opprobrious ſpeeches, that at leaſt he ſhould be ſeen by them in publick before he went away; elſe they might give themſelves airs, as if he had left the kingdom in fear of them.

To this he himſelf ſo much inclined, that it was with difficulty I perſuaded him, that, as they had neither of them proceeded to a direct and formal challenge; as they knew he had not made himſelf difficult of acceſs; and as he had already done the family injury enough; and it was Miſs Harlowe's earneſt deſire, that he would be content with that; he had no reaſon, from any point of honour, to delay his journey; eſpecially as he had ſo juſt a motive for his going, as the eſtabliſhing of his health; and as he might return the ſooner, if he ſaw occaſion for it.

I found the colonel in a very ſolemn way. We had a good deal of diſcourſe upon the ſubject of certain letters which had paſſed between us in relation to Miſs Harlowe's will, and to her family. He has ſome accounts to ſettle with his banker; which, he ſays, will be adjuſted to-morrow; and on Thurſday he propoſes to go down again, to take leave of his friends; and then intends to ſet out directly for Italy.

I wiſh Mr. Lovelace could have been prevailed upon to take any other tour, than that of France and Italy. I did propoſe Madrid to him; but he laughed at me, and told me, that the propoſal was in character from a mule; and from one who was become as grave as a Spaniard of the old cut, at ninety.

I expreſſed to the colonel my apprehenſions, that his couſin's dying injunctions would not have the force upon him, that were to be wiſhed.

'They have great force upon me, Mr. 'Belford,' ſaid he; 'or one world would 'not have held Mr. Lovelace and me 'thus long. But my intention is to go 'to Florence; not to lay my bones 'there, as upon my couſin's death I told 'you I thought to do; but to ſettle all 'my affairs in thoſe parts, and then to 'come over, and reſide upon a little 'paternal eſtate in Kent, which is 'ſtrangely gone to ruin in my abſence. 'Indeed, were I to meet Mr. Lovelace, 'either here or abroad, I might not be 'anſwerable for the conſequence.'

He would have engaged me for to-morrow. But having promiſed to attend Mr. Lovelace on his journey, as I have mentioned, I ſaid, I was obliged to go out of town, and was uncertain as to the time of my return in the evening. And ſo I am to ſee him on Thurſday morning at my own lodgings.

I will do myſelf the honour to write again to your lordſhip to-morrow night. Mean time, I am, my lord, your lordſhip's, &c.

LETTER LXIX.

MR. BELFORD, TO LORD M.

MY LORD, WEDN. NIGHT, OCT. 4.

I Am juſt returned from attending Mr. Lovelace as far as Gad's Hill, near Rocheſter. He was exceeding gay all the way. Mowbray and Tourville are gone on with him. They will ſee him embark, and under ſail; and promiſe to follow him in a month or two; for they ſay, there is no living without him, now he is once more himſelf.

He and I parted with great and even ſolemn tokens of affection; but yet not without gay intermixtures, as I will acquaint your lordſhip.

Taking me aſide, and claſping his arms about me, 'Adieu, dear Belford!' 'ſaid he: 'may you proceed in the 'courſe you have entered upon!—

'Whatever

'Whatever airs I give myself, this 'charming creature has fast hold of me 'here,'—[clapping his hand upon his heart:]—'and I must either appear what 'you see me, or be what I so lately was '—O the divine creature!'

'But if I live to come to England, 'and you remain fixed in your present 'way, and can give me encouragement, 'I hope rather to follow your example, 'than to ridicule you for it. This will' —[for I had given him a copy of it]— 'I will make the companion of my soli-'tary hours. You have told me part of 'it's melancholy contents; and that, 'and her posthumous letter, shall be my 'study; and they will prepare me for 'being your disciple, if you hold on.

'You, Jack, may marry,' continued he; 'and I have a wife in my eye for 'you.—Only thou'rt such an awkward 'mortal—' [He saw me affected, and thought to make me smile:]—'But we 'don't make ourselves, except it be 'worse, by our dress. Thou art in 'mourning now, as well as I: but if 'ever thy ridiculous turn lead thee 'again to be Beau-Brocade, I will be-'dizen thee, as the girls say, on my re-'turn, to my own fancy, and accord-'ing to thy own natural appearance— 'Thou shalt doctor my soul, and I will 'doctor thy body: thou shalt see what a 'clever fellow I will make of thee.

'As for me, I never will, I never can, 'marry—That I will not take a few 'liberties, and that I will not try to start 'some of my former game, I won't pro-'mise—Habits are not easily shaken off '—But they shall be by way of wean-'ing. So return and reform shall go to-'gether.

'And now, thou sorrowful monkey, 'what aileth thee?—I do love him, my lord.

'Adieu!—And once more adieu!'—embracing me.—'And when thou 'thinkest thou hast made thyself an in-'terest out yonder,' (looking up) then 'put in a word for thy Lovelace.'

Joining company, he recommended me to write often; and promised to let me quickly hear from him; and that he would write to your lordship, and to all his family round; for he said, that you had all been more kind to him than he had deserved.

And so we parted.

I hope, my lord, for all your noble family's sake, that we shall see him soon return, and reform, as he promises.

I return your lordship my humble thanks for the honour of your invitation to M. Hall. The first letter I receive from Mr. Lovelace shall give me the opportunity of embracing it. I am, my lord, your most faithful and obedient servant, J. BELFORD.

LETTER LXX.

MR. BELFORD, TO LORD M.

THURSDAY MORNING, OCT. 5.

IT may be some satisfaction to your lordship, to have a brief account of what has just now passed between Colonel Morden and me.

We had a good deal of discourse about the Harlowe family, and those parts of the lady's will which still remain unexecuted; after which the colonel addressed himself to me in a manner which gave me some surprize.

He flattered himself, he said, from my present happy turn, and from my good constitution, that I should live a great many years. It was therefore his request, that I would consent to be his executor; since it was impossible for him to make a better choice, or pursue a better example, than his cousin had set.

His heart, he said, was in it: there were some things in his cousin's will and his analogous: and he had named one person with me, with whom he was sure I would not refuse to be joined: and to whom he intended to apply for his consent, when he had obtained mine. [Intimating, as far as I could gather, that it was Mr. Hickman, son of Sir Charles Hickman; to whom I know your lordship is not a stranger: for he said, Every-one who was dear to his beloved cousin, must be so to him: and he knew, that the gentleman whom he had thoughts of, would have, besides my advice and assistance, the advice of one of the most sensible ladies in England.]

He took my hand, seeing me under some surprize: 'You must not hesitate, 'much less deny me, Mr. Belford. In-'deed you must not. Two things I will 'assure you of: that I have, as I hope, 'made every thing so clear, that you 'cannot have any litigation: and that 'I have done so justly, and I hope it 'will be thought so generously, by all 'my relations, that a mind like yours 'will rather have pleasure than pain in 'the execution of this trust. And this 'is what I think every honest man, who 'hopes to find an honest man for his 'executor, should do.'

I told him, that I was greatly obliged to to him for his good opinion of me: that it was ſo much every man's duty to be an honeſt man, that it could not be interpreted as vanity to ſay, that I had no doubt to be found ſo. But if I accepted of this truſt, it muſt be on condition—

I could name no condition, he ſaid, interrupting me, which he would refuſe to comply with.

This condition, I told him, was, that as there was as great a probability of his being my ſurvivor, as I his, he would permit me to name him for mine; and, in that caſe, a week ſhould not paſs before I made my will.

With all his heart, he ſaid; and the readier, as he had no apprehenſions of ſuddenly dying; for what he had done and requeſted was really the effect of the ſatisfaction he had taken in the part I had already acted as his couſin's executor; and in my ability, he was pleaſed to add: as well as in purſuance of his couſin's advice in the preamble of her will; to wit; 'That this was a work 'which ſhould be ſet about in full health, 'both of body and mind.'

I told him, that I was pleaſed to hear him ſay, that he was not in any apprehenſion of ſuddenly dying; as this gave me aſſurance that he had laid aſide all thoughts of acting contrary to the dying requeſt of his beloved couſin.

'Does it argue,' ſaid he, ſmiling, 'that if I were to purſue a vengeance 'ſo juſtifiable in my own opinion, I 'muſt be in apprehenſion of falling by 'Mr. Lovelace's hand?—I will aſſure 'you, that I have no fears of that ſort '—But I know this is an ungrateful 'ſubject to you. Mr. Lovelace is your 'friend; and I will allow, that a good 'man may have a friendſhip for a bad 'one, ſo far as to wiſh him well, without countenancing him in his evil.

'I will aſſure you,' added he, 'that 'I have not yet made any reſolutions 'either way. I have told you what 'force my couſin's repeated requeſts 'have with me. Hitherto they have 'witheld me—But let me quit this ſub-'ject.

'This, Sir,' [giving me a ſealed-up parcel] 'is my will. It is witneſſed. I 'made no doubt of prevailing upon 'you to do me the requeſted favour. I 'have a duplicate to leave with the o-'ther gentleman; and an atteſted copy, 'which I ſhall depoſit at my banker's. 'At my return, which will be in ſix or 'eight months at fartheſt, I will allow 'you to make an exchange of yours, if 'you will have it ſo. I have now only 'to take leave of my relations in the 'country. And ſo God proteſt you, 'Mr. Belford! You will ſoon hear of 'me again.'

He then very ſolemnly embraced me, as I did him: and we parted.

I heartily congratulate your lordſhip on the narrow eſcape each gentleman has had from the other: for I apprehend, that they could not have met without fatal conſequences.

Time, I hope, which ſubdues all things, will ſubdue their reſentments. I am, my lord, your lordſhip's moſt faithful and obedient ſervant,

J. BELFORD.

Several other letters paſſed between Miſs Howe and Mr. Belford, relating to the diſpoſition of the papers and letters; to the poor's fund; and to other articles of the lady's will; wherein the method of proceeding in each caſe was adjuſted. After which the papers were returned to Mr. Belford, that he might order the two directed copies of them to be taken.

In one of theſe leters Mr. Belford requeſts Miſs Howe to give the character of the friend ſhe ſo dearly loved: a taſk, he imagines, that will be as agreeable to herſelf, as worthy of her pen.

I am more eſpecially curious to know, ſays he, what was that particular diſpoſition of her time, which I find mentioned in a letter which I have juſt dipt into, where her ſiſter is enviouſly reproaching her on that ſcore. This information may perhaps enable me, ſays he, to account for what has often ſurprized me: how, at ſo tender an age, this admirable lady became miſtreſs of ſuch extraordinary and ſuch various qualifications.

LETTER LXXI.

MISS HOWE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

SIR, THURSDAY, OCT. 12.

YOU are curious to know the particular diſtribution of her time; which you ſuppoſe will help you to account for what you own yourſelf ſurprized at; to wit, how ſo young a lady could make herſelf miſtreſs of ſo many accompliſhments.

I will premiſe, that ſhe was from infancy enured to riſe early in a morning, by an excellent, and, as I may ſay, a learned woman, Mrs. Norton, to whoſe care, wiſdom, and example, ſhe was beholden for the ground work of her taſte and acquirements, which meeting with with ſuch aſſiſtances from the divines I have named, and with ſuch a genius, made it the leſs wonder that ſhe ſurpaſſed moſt of her age and ſex.

Her ſex, did I ſay? What honour to the other did this imply! When one might challenge the proudeſt pedant of them all, to ſay he has been diſciplined into greater improvement, than ſhe had made from the mere force of genius and application. But it is demonſtrable to all who know how to make obſervations on their acquaintance of both ſexes, arrogant as ſome are of their ſuperficialities, that a lady at eighteen, take the world through, is more prudent and converſable than a man at twenty-five. I can prove this by nineteen inſtances out of twenty in my own knowledge. Yet how do theſe poor boaſters value themſelves upon the advantages their education gives them! Who has not ſeen ſome one of them, juſt come from the univerſity, diſdainfully ſmile at a miſtaken or ill-pronounced word from a lady, when her ſenſe has been clear, and her ſentiments juſt; and when he could not himſelf utter a ſingle ſentence fit to be repeated, but what he had borrowed from the authors he had been obliged to ſtudy, as a painful exerciſe to ſlow and creeping parts? But how I digreſs!

This excellent young lady uſed to ſay, It was incredible to think what might be done by early riſing, and by long days well filled up.

It may be added, That ſhe had calculated according to the practice of too many, ſhe had actually lived more years at ſixteen, than they had at twenty ſix.

She was of opinion, That no one could ſpend their time properly, who did not live by ſome rule: who did not appropriate the hours, as near as might be, to particular purpoſes and employments.

In conformity to this ſelf-ſet leſſon, the uſual diſtribution of the twenty-four hours, when left to her own choice, was as follows:

For REST ſhe allotted SIX Hours only.

She thought herſelf not ſo well, and ſo clear in her intellects, [ſo much alive, ſhe uſed to ſay] if ſhe exceeded this proportion. If ſhe ſlept not, ſhe choſe to riſe ſooner. And in winter had her fire laid, and a taper ready burning to light it; not loving to give trouble to ſervants, whoſe harder work, and later hours of going to-bed, ſhe uſed to ſay, required conſideration.

I have blamed her for her greater regard to them than to herſelf. But this was her anſwer: 'I have my choice: 'who can wiſh for more? Why ſhould I 'oppreſs others, to gratify myſelf? You 'ſee what free-will enables one to do; 'while impoſition would make a light 'burden heavy.'

Her Firſt THREE Morning Hours

Were generally paſſed in her ſtudy, and in her cloſet-duties: and were occaſionally augmented by thoſe ſhe ſaved from reſt: and in theſe paſſed her epiſtolary amuſements.

TWO Hours ſhe generally allotted to Domeſtick Management.

Theſe, at different times of the day, as occaſions required; all the houſekeeper's bills, in eaſe of her mother, paſſing through her hands. For ſhe was a perfect miſtreſs of the four principal rules of arithmetick.

FIVE Hours to her Needle, Drawings, Muſick, &c.

In theſe ſhe included the aſſiſtance and inſpection ſhe gave to her own ſervants, and to her ſiſter's ſervants, in the needle-works required for the family: for her ſiſter, as I have above hinted, is a MODERN. In theſe ſhe alſo included Dr. Lewen's converſation-viſits; with whom likewiſe ſhe held a correſpondence by letters. That reverend gentleman delighted himſelf and her twice or thrice a week, if his health permitted, with theſe viſits: and ſhe always preferred his company to any other engagement.

TWO Hours ſhe allotted to her Two firſt Meals.

But if converſation, or the deſire of friends, or the falling in of company or gueſts, required it to be otherwiſe, ſhe never ſcrupled to oblige; and would on ſuch occaſions borrow, as ſhe called it, from other diſtributions. And as ſhe found it very hard not to exceed in this appropriation, ſhe put down

ONE Hour more to Dinner-time Converſation.

To be added or ſubtracted, as occaſions offered, or the deſire of her friends required; and yet found it difficult, as ſhe often ſaid, to keep this account even; eſpecially if Dr. Lewen obliged them with his company at their table: which, however, he ſeldom did; for, being being a valetudinarian, and in a regimen, he generally made his visits in the afternoon.

ONE Hour to Visits to the neighbouring Poor;

To a select number of whom, and to their children, she used to give brief instructions, and good books: and as this happened not every day, and seldom above twice a week, she had two or three hours at a time to bestow in this benevolent employment.

The remaining FOUR Hours

Were occasionally allotted to supper, to conversation, or to reading after supper to the family. This allotment she called Her Fund, upon which she used to draw, to satisfy her other debts: and in this she included visits received and returned, shews, spectacles, &c. which, in a country-life, not occurring every day, she used to think a great allowance, no less than two days in six, for amusements only: and she was wont to say, that it was hard if she could not steal time out of this fund, for an excursion of even two or three days in a month.

If it be said, that her relations, or the young neighbouring ladies, had but little of her time, it will be considered, that besides these four hours in the twenty four, great part of the time she was employed in her needle-works, she used to converse as she worked: and it was a custom she had introduced among her acquaintance, that the young ladies in their visits used frequently, in a neighbourly way, (in the winter evenings especially) to bring their work with them; and one of half a dozen of her select acquaintance used by turns to read to the rest as they were at work.

This was her usual method when at her own command, for six days in the week.

The SEVENTH DAY

She kept as it ought to be kept: and as some part of it was frequently employed in works of mercy, the hour she allotted to visiting the neighbouring poor was occasionally supplied from this day, and added to her fund.

But I must observe, that when in her grandfather's life-time, she was three or four weeks at a time his housekeeper and guest, as also at either of her uncles, her usual distribution of time was varied: but still she had an eye to it as nearly as circumstances would admit.

When I had the happiness of having her for my guest, for a fortnight or so, she likewise dispensed with her rules, in mere indulgence to my foibles, and idler habits; for I also (though I had the benefit of an example I so much admired) am too much of a modern. Yet, as to morning-risings, I had corrected myself by such a precedent, in the summer-time; and can witness to the benefit I found by it in my health; as also to the many useful things I was enabled by that means with ease and pleasure to perform. And in her account-book I have found this memorandum since her ever-to-be lamented death: — 'From such a day to such a day, all holidays, at my dear Miss Howe's.' At her return: 'Account resumed, such a day,' naming it; and then she proceeded regularly, as before.

Once a week she used to reckon with herself; when, if within the 144 hours, contained in the six days, she had made her account even, she noted it accordingly: if otherwise, she carried the debit to the next week's account; as thus: 'Debtor to the article of benevolent visits,' so many hours. And so of the rest.

But it was always an especial part of her care, that whether visiting or visited, she shewed in all companies an entire ease, satisfaction, and cheerfulness, as if she kept no such particular account, and as if she did not make herself answerable to herself for her occasional exceedings.

This method, which to others will appear perplexing and unnecessary, her early hours, and custom, had made easy and pleasant to her.

And, indeed, as I used to tell her, greatly as I admired her in all methods, I could not bring myself to this, might I have had the world for my reward.

I had indeed too much impatience in my temper, to observe such a regularity in accounting between me and myself. I satisfied myself in a lump-account, as I may call it, if I had nothing greatly wrong to reproach myself with, when I looked back on a past week, as she had taught me to do.

For she used indulgently to say, 'I 'do not think ALL I do necessary for 'another to do: nor even for myself: 'but when it is more pleasant for me 'to keep such an account, than to let 'it alone, why may I not proceed in 'my supererogatories?—There can be 'no harm in it. It keeps up my attention to accounts; which one day 'may be of use to me in more material 'instances.

inſtances. Thoſe who will not keep a ſtrict account, ſeldom long keep any, 'I neglect not more uſeful employ-'ments for it. And it teaches me to 'be covetous of time; the only thing 'of which we can be allowably cove-'tous; ſince we live but once in this 'world; and when gone, are gone from 'it for ever.'

She always reconciled the neceſſity under which theſe interventions, as ſhe called them, laid her, of now-and-then breaking into ſome of her appropria-tions; ſaying, There was good ſenſe, and good manners too, in the common leſſon, 'When at Rome, do as they do at 'Rome:' and that to be eaſy of perſua-ſion, in matters where one could oblige without endangering virtue, or worthy habits, was an apoſtolical excellency; ſince, if a perſon conformed with a view of making herſelf an intereſt in her friend's affections, in order to be heeded in greater points, it was imitating his example, who became all things to all men, that he might gain ſome. Nor is it to be doubted, had life been ſpared her, that the ſweetneſs of her temper, and her cheerful piety, would have made virtue and religion appear ſo lovely, that her example would have had no ſmall influence upon the minds and manners of thoſe who would have had the honour of converſing with her.

O Mr. Belford! I can write no fur-ther on this ſubject. For, looking into the account-book for other particulars, I met with a moſt affecting memoran-dum; which being written on the ex-treme edge of the paper, with a fine pen, and in the dear creature's ſmalleſt hand, I ſaw not before.—This it is;—written, I ſuppoſe, at ſome calamitous period after the day named in it—Help me to curſe, to blaſt the monſter who gave occaſion for it!—

'APRIL 10. The account concluded!—
'And with it all my worldly hopes and
'proſpects!!!'

I TAKE up my pen; but not to apo-logize for my execration.—Once more I pray to God to avenge me of him!—Me, I ſay—For mine is the loſs—Hers the gain.

O Sir! You did not, you could not know her, as I knew her! Never was ſuch an excellence!—So warm, yet ſo cool a friend!—So much what I wiſh to be, but never ſhall be!—For, alas! my ſtay, my adviſer, my monitreſs, my directreſs is gone!—for ever gone!—She honoured me with the title of her ſiſter of her heart: but I was only ſo in the love I bore her, (a love beyond a ſiſter's—infinitely beyond her ſiſter's!) in the hatred I have to every mean and ſordid action; and in my love of virtue; for, otherwiſe, I am of a high and haughty temper, as I have acknowledg-ed heretofore, and very violent in my paſſions.

In ſhort, ſhe was the neareſt perfec-tion of any creature I ever knew. She never preached to me leſſons which ſhe practiſed not herſelf. She lived the life ſhe taught. All humility, meekneſs, ſelf-accuſing, others acquitting, though the ſhadow of the fault was hardly hers, the ſubſtance theirs, whoſe only honour was their relation to her.

To loſe ſuch a friend, ſuch a guide—If ever my violence was juſtifiable, it is upon this recollection! For ſhe only lived to make me ſenſible of my fail-ings, but not long enough to enable me to conquer them; as I was reſolved to endeavour to do.

Once more then let me execrate—But now violence and paſſion again pre-dominate!—And how can it be other-wiſe?

But I force myſelf from this ſubject, having loſt the purpoſe for which I re-ſumed my pen.

A. Lowe.

LETTER LXXII.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

PARIS, OCT. 14.

'——Timor & mine
'Scandunt eodem quo dominus; neque
'Decedit ærata triremi; &
'Poſt equitem ſedet atra cura.'

IN a language ſo expreſſive as the Engliſh, I hate the pedantry of tag-ging or prefacing what I write with Latin ſcraps; and ever was a cenſurer of the motto-mongers among our weekly and daily ſcribblers. But theſe verſes of Horace are ſo applicable to my caſe, that, whether on ſhip-board, whether in my poſt-chaiſe, or in my inn at night, I am not able to put them out of my head. Dryden once I thought ſaid very well in theſe bouncing lines—

'Man makes his fate according to his mind.
'The weak, low ſpirit, Fortune makes her 'ſlave:
'But ſhe's a drudge, when hector'd by the 'brave.

"If fate weave common thread, I'll change the dress,
And with new purple weave a nobler piece."

And in these—

"Let Fortune empty her whole quiver on me,
I have a soul, that, like an ample shield,
Can take in all, and verge enough for more.
Fate was not mine: nor am I Fate's——
Souls know no conquerors."——

But, in the first quoted lines, considering them closely, there is nothing but blustering absurdity: in the other, the poet says not truth, for CONSCIENCE is the conqueror of souls: at least it is the conqueror of mine: and who ever thought it a narrow one?—But this is occasioned partly by poring over the affecting will, and posthumous letter. What an army of texts has she drawn up in array against me in the letter!—But yet, Jack, do they not shew me, that two or three thousand years ago, there were as wicked fellows as myself?—They do—And that's some consolation.

But the generosity of her mind displayed in both, is what stings me most. And the more still, as it is now out of my power any way in the world to be even with her.

I ought to have written to you sooner. But I loitered two days at Calais, for an answer to a letter I wrote to engage my former travelling valet, De la Tour; an ingenious, ready fellow, as you have heard me say. I have engaged him, and he is now with me.

I shall make no stay here; but intend for some of the electoral courts. That of Bavaria, I think, will engage me longest. Perhaps I may step out of my way (if I can be out of my way anywhere) to those of Dresden and Berlin: and it is not impossible that you may have one letter from me at Vienna. And then perhaps I may fall down into Italy by the Tirol; and so, taking Turin in my way, return to Paris; where I hope to see Mowbray and Tourville: nor do I despair of you.

This a good deal differs from the plan I gave you. But you may expect to hear from me as I move; and whether I shall pursue this route or the other.

I have my former lodgings in the Rue St. Antoine: which I shall hold, notwithstanding my tour: so they will be ready to accommodate any two of you, if you come hither before my return: and for this I have conditioned.

I write to Charlotte; and that is writing to all my relations at once.

Do, thou, Jack, inform me duly of every-thing that passes.—Particularly, how thou proceedest in thy reformation-scheme: how Mowbray and Tourville go on in my absence: whether thou hast any chance for a wife; [I am the more solicitous on this head, because thou seemest to think, that thy mortification will not be complete, nor thy reformation secure, till thou art shackled:] how the Harlowes proceed in their penitentials: if Miss Howe be married, or near being so: how honest Doleman goes on with his empirick, now he has dismissed his regulars, or they him; and if any likelihood of his perfect recovery. Be sure be very minute: for every trifling occurrence relating to those we value, becomes interesting, when we are at a distance from them. Finally, prepare thou to piece thy broken thread, if thou wouldst oblige thy

LOVELACE.

LETTER LXXIII.

MR. BELFORD, TO ROBERT LOVELACE, ESQ.

LONDON, OCT. 25.

I Write, to shew you, that I am incapable of slighting even the minutest requests of an absent and distant friend. Yet you may believe, that there cannot be any great alterations in the little time that you have been out of England, with respect to the subjects of your enquiry. Nevertheless I will answer to each, for the reason above given; and for the reason you mention, that even trifles, and chit-chat, are agreeable from friend to friend, and of friends, and even of those to whom we give the importance of deeming them our foes, when we are abroad.

First, then as to my reformation-scheme, as you call it, I hope I go on very well. I wish you had entered upon the like, and could say so too. You would then find infinitely more peace of mind, than you are likely ever otherwise to be acquainted with. When I look back upon the sweep that has been made among us in the two or three past years, and forward upon what may still happen, I hardly think myself secure; though of late I have been guided by other lights than those of sense and appetite, which have hurried so many of our confraternity into worldly ruin, if not into eternal punishment.

I am

I am very earneſt in my wiſhes to be admitted into the nuptial ſtate. But I think I ought to paſs ſome time as a probationary, till, by ſteadineſs in my good reſolutions, I can convince ſome woman, whom I could love and honour, and whoſe worthy example might confirm my morals, that there is one libertine who had the grace to reform, before age and diſeaſe put it out of his power to ſin on.

The Harlowes continue inconſolable; and I dare ſay will to the end of their lives.

Miſs Howe is not yet married; but I have reaſon to think will ſoon. I have the honour of correſponding with her; and the more I know of her, the more I admire the nobleneſs of her mind. She muſt be conſcious, that ſhe is ſuperior to half our ſex, and to moſt of her own; which may make her give way to a temper naturally haſty and impatient: but, if ſhe meet with condeſcenſion in her man, [And who would not veil to a ſuperiority ſo viſible, if it be not exacted with arrogance?] I dare ſay ſhe will make an excellent wife.

As to Doleman, the poor man goes on trying and hoping with his empirick. I cannot but ſay, that as the latter is a ſenſible and judicious man, and not raſh, opinionative, or over-ſanguine, I have great hopes (little as I think of quacks and noſtrum-mongers in general) that he will do him good, if his caſe will admit of it. My reaſons are, that the man pays a regular and conſtant attendance upon him; watches, with his own eye, every change, and new ſymptom of his patient's malady: varies his applications as the indications vary: fetters not himſelf to rules laid down by the fathers of the art, who lived many hundred years ago, when diſeaſes, and the cauſes of them, were different, as the modes of living were different from what they are now, as well as climates and accidents: that he is to have his reward, not in daily fees; but (after the firſt five gnineas for medicines) in proportion as the patient himſelf ſhall find amendment.

As to Mowbray and Tourville; what novelties can be expected, in ſo ſhort a time, from men, who have not ſenſe enough to ſtrike out or purſue new lights, either good or bad: now, eſpecially, that you are gone, who were the ſoul of all enterprize, and in particular their ſoul. Beſides, I ſee them but ſeldom. I ſuppoſe they'll be at Paris before you can return from Germany; for they cannot live without you: and you gave them ſuch a ſpecimen of your recovered volatility, in the laſt evening's converſation, as equally delighted them, and concerned me.

I wiſh, with all my heart, that thou wouldſt bend thy courſe towards the Pyreneans. I ſhould then (if thou wilt not to thy couſin Montague an account of what is moſt obſervable in thy tour) put in for a copy of thy letters. I wonder thou wilt not; ſince then thy ſubjects would be as new to thyſelf, as to thy

LETTER LXXIV.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

PARIS, OCT. 16—27.

I Follow my laſt of the 14—24th, on occaſion of a letter juſt now come to hand from Joſeph Leman. The fellow is conſcience-ridden, Jack; and tells me, That he cannot reſt either day or night for the miſchiefs which he fears he has been, and may ſtill further be the means of doing. He wiſhes, if it pleaſe God, and if it pleaſe me, that he had never ſeen my honour's face.

And what is the cauſe of his preſent concern, as to his own particular? Why, but the ſlights and contempt which he perceives from every-one of the Harlowes; from thoſe particularly, he ſays, whom he has endeavoured to ſerve as faithfully as his engagements to me would let him ſerve them? And I always made him believe, he tells me, (poor weak ſoul as he was from his cradle!) that ſerving me was ſerving both, in the long run. But this, and the death of his dear young lady, is a grief, he declares, that he ſhall never claw off, were he to live to the age of Matthew-Salem: althoff, and howſomever, he is ſure, that he ſhall not live a month to an end; being ſtrangely ſhaken, and his ſtomach nothing like what it was: and Mrs. Betty being alſo (now ſhe has got his love) very croſs and ſlighting: but, thank his God for puniſhing her! ſhe is in a poor way herſelf.

But the chief occaſion of repenting my honour now, is not his own private ſcruples, althoff they are very great; but to prevent future miſchiefs to me! For he can aſſure me, that Colonel Morden has ſet out from them all, with a full reſolution to have his will of me: and he is well aſſured, that he ſaid, and ſwore to it, as how he was reſolved that he would either have my honour's heart's-blood, or I ſhould have his; or ſome ſuch-like ſad advantage: and that all the family rejoice in it, and hope I shall come short home.

This is the substance of Joseph's letter; and I have one from Mowbray, which also hints to the same effect. And I recollect now, that you was very importunate with me to go to Madrid, rather than to France and Italy, the last evening we passed together.

What I desire of you, is, by the first dispatch, to let me faithfully know all that you know on this head.

I can't bear to be threatened, Jack. Nor shall any man, unquestioned, give himself airs in my absence, if I know it, that shall make me look mean in anybody's eyes: that shall give my friends pain for me: that shall put them upon wishing me to change my intentions, or my plan, to avoid him. Upon such despicable terms as these, think you, that I could bear to live?

But why, if such were his purpose, did he not let me know it before I left England? Was he unable to work himself up to a resolution, till he knew me to be out of the kingdom?

As soon as I can inform myself where to direct to him, I will write to know his purpose; for I cannot bear suspence, in such a case as this: that solemn act, were it even to be marriage or hanging, which must be done to-morrow, I had rather should be done to-day. My mind tires and sickens with impatience on ruminating upon scenes that can afford neither variety nor certainty. To dwell twenty days in expectation of an event that may be decided in a quarter of an hour, is grievous.

If he come to Paris although I should be on my tour, he will very easily find out my lodgings: for I every day see some or other of my countrymen, and divers of them have I entertained here. I go frequently to the opera and to the play, and appear at court, and at all public places. And, on my quitting this city, will leave a direction whither my letters from England, or elsewhere, shall from time to time be forwarded. Were I sure, that his intention is what Joseph Leman tells me it is, I would stay here, or shorten his course to me, let him be where he would.

I cannot get off my regrets on account of this dear lady for the blood of me. If the colonel and I are to meet, as he has done me no injury, and loves the memory of his cousin, we shall engage with the same sentiments, as to the object of our dispute; and that, you know, is no very common case.

In short, I am as much convinced that I have done wrong, as he can be; and regret it as much. But I will not bear to be threatened by any man in the world, however conscious I may be of having deserved blame.

Adieu, Belford! Be sincere with me. No palliation, as thou valuest thy

LETTER LXXV.

MR. BELFORD, TO ROBERT LOVELACE, ESQ.

LONDON, OCT. 26.

I Cannot think, my dear Lovelace, that Colonel Morden has either threatened you in those gross terms mentioned by the vile, hypocritical, and ignorant Joseph Leman, or intends to follow you. They are the words of people of that fellow's class; and not of a gentleman: not of Colonel Morden, I am sure. You'll observe, that Joseph pretends not to say that he heard him speak them.

I have been very solicitous to sound the colonel, for your sake, and for his own, and for the sake of the injunctions of the excellent lady to me, as well as to him, on that subject. He is (and you will not wonder that he should be) extremely affected; and owns that he has expressed himself in terms of resentment on the occasion. Once he said to me, That had his beloved cousin's case been that of a common seduction, her own credulity or weakness contributing to her fall; he could have forgiven you. But, in so many words he assured me, that he had not taken any resolutions; nor had he declared himself to the family in such a way as should bind him to resent: on the contrary, he has owned, that his cousin's injunctions have hitherto had the force upon him which I could wish they should have.

He went abroad in a week after you. When he took his leave of me, he told me, That his design was to go to Florence; and that he would settle his affairs there; and then return to England, and here pass the remainder of his days.

I was indeed apprehensive, that if you and he were to meet, something unhappy might fall out: and as I knew that you proposed to take Italy, and very likely Florence, in your return to France, I was very solicitous to prevail upon you to take the court of Spain into your plan. I am still so. And if you are not to be prevailed upon to do that, let me intreat you to avoid Florence or Leghorn in your return, ſince you have viſited both heretofore. At leaſt, let not the propoſal of a meeting come from you.

It would be matter of ſerious reflection to me, if the very fellow, this Joſeph Leman, who gave you ſuch an opportunity to turn all the artillery of his maſters againſt themſelves, and to play them upon one another to favour your plotting purpoſes, ſhould be the inſtrument, in the devil's hand, (unwittingly too) to avenge them all upon you: for ſhould you even get the better of the colonel, would the miſchief end there?—It would but add remorſe to your preſent remorſe; ſince the interview muſt end in death; for he would not, I am confident, take his life at your hand. The Harlowes would, moreover, proſecute you in a legal way. You hate them; and they would be gainers by his death: rejoicers in yours—And have you not done miſchief enough already?

Let me therefore (and through me all your friends) have the ſatisfaction to hear, that you are reſolved to avoid this gentleman. Time will ſubdue all things. Nobody doubts your bravery. Nor will it be known, that your plan is changed through perſuaſion.

Young Harlowe talks of calling you to account. This is a plain evidence, that Mr. Morden has not taken the quarrel upon himſelf for their family.

I am in no apprehenſion of any-body but Colonel Morden. I know it will not be a means to prevail upon you to oblige me, if I ſay, that I am well aſſured, that this gentleman is a ſkilful ſwordſman; and that he is as cool and ſedate as ſkilful. But yet I will add, that if I had a value for my life, he ſhould be the laſt man, except yourſelf, with whom I would chuſe to have a contention.

I have, as you required, been very candid and ſincere with you. I have not aimed at palliation. If you ſeek not Colonel Morden, it is my opinion he will not ſeek you: for he is a man of principle. But if you ſeek him, I believe he will not ſhun you.

Let me re-urge [it is the effect of my love for you!] that you know your own guilt in this affair, and ſhould not be again an aggreſſor. It would be pity, that ſo brave a man as the colonel ſhould drop, were you and he to meet: and on the other hand, it would be dreadful, that you ſhould be ſent to your account unprepared for it, and purſuing a freſh violence. Moreover, ſeeeſt thou not, in the deaths of two of thy principal agents, the hand-writing upon the wall againſt thee?

My zeal on this occaſion may make me guilty of repetition. Indeed I know not how to quit the ſubject. But if what I have written, added to your own remorſe and conſciouſneſs, cannot prevail, all that I might further urge would be ineffectual.

Adieu, therefore! Mayeſt thou repent of the paſt! and may no new violences add to thy heavy reflections, and overwhelm thy future hopes! are the wiſhes of thy true friend,

JOHN BELFORD.

LETTER LXXVI.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

MUNICH, NOV. 11—28.

I Received yours this moment, juſt as I was ſetting out for Vienna.

As to going to Madrid, or one ſingle ſtep out of the way to avoid Colonel Morden, let me periſh, if I do!—You cannot think me ſo mean a wretch.

And ſo you own, that he has threatened me; but not in groſs and ungentlemanly terms, you ſay. If he has threatened me like a gentleman, I will reſent his threats like a gentleman. But he has not done as a man of honour, if he has threatened at all behind my back. I would ſcorn to threaten any man to whom I knew how to addreſs myſelf, either perſonally, or by pen and ink.

As to what you mention of my guilt; of the hand-writing on the wall; of a legal proſecution, if he meet his fate from my hand; of his ſkill, coolneſs, courage, and ſuch like poltroon ſtuff; what can you mean by it? Surely you cannot believe, that ſuch inſinuations as thoſe will weaken either my hands or my heart.—No more of this ſort of nonſenſe, I beſeech you, in any of your future letters.

He had not taken any reſolutions, you ſay, when you ſaw him. He muſt and will take reſolutions, one way or other, very quickly; for I wrote to him yeſterday, without waiting for this or your anſwer to my laſt. I could not avoid it. I could not (as I told you in that) live in ſuſpence. I have directed my letter to Florence. Nor could I ſuffer my friends to live in ſuſpence as to my ſafety. But I have couched it in ſuch moderate terms, that he has fairly his option. He will be the challenger, if he take it in the ſenſe in which he may ſo handſomely friendly a call taking it. And if he does, it will demonstrate, that malice and revenge were the predominant passions with him; and that he was determined but to settle his affairs, and then take his reflections, as you phrase it.—Yet, if we are to meet, [for I know what my option would be, in his case, on such a letter, complaisant as it is] I wish he had a worse, I a better cause. It would be a sweet revenge to him, were I to fall by his hand. But what should I be the better for killing him?

I will inclose the copy of the letter I sent him.

On re-perusing yours in a cooler moment, I cannot but thank you for your friendly love, and good intentions. My value for you, from the first hour of our acquaintance till now, I have never found misplaced; regarding at least your intention: thou must, however, own a good deal of blunder of the over-do and under-do kind, with respect to the part thou actedst between me and the beloved of my heart. But thou art really an honest fellow, and a sincere and warm friend. I could almost wish I had not written to Florence till I had received thy letter now before me. But it is gone. Let it go. If he wish peace, and to avoid violence, he will have a fair opportunity to embrace the one, and shun the other.—If not—he must take his fate.

But be this as it may, you may contrive to let young Harlowe know [He is a menacer, too!] that I shall be in England in March next, at farthest.

This of Bavaria is a gallant and polite court. Nevertheless, being uncertain whether my letter may meet with the colonel at Florence, I shall quit it, and set out, as I intended, for Vienna; taking care to have any letter or message from him conveyed to me there: which will soon bring me back hither, or to any other place to which I shall be invited.

As I write to Charlotte, I have nothing more to add, after compliments to all friends, than that I am wholly yours,

LOVELACE.

'MR. LOVELACE, TO WILLIAM MORDEN, ESQ.'

[INCLOSED IN THE ABOVE.]

'SIR, 'MUNICH, NOV. 10—21.

'I Have heard, with a great deal of 'surprize, that you have thought 'fit to throw out some menacing ex'pressions against me.

'I should have been very glad, that 'you had thought I had punishment 'enough in my own mind, for the 'wrongs I have done to the most ex'cellent of women; and that it had 'been possible for two persons so ar'dently joining in one love, (especially 'as I was desirous, to the utmost of my 'power, to repair those wrongs) to have 'lived, if not on amicable terms, in 'such a way, as not to put either to the 'pain of hearing of threatenings thrown 'out in absence, which either ought to 'be despised for, if he had not spirit to 'take notice of them.

'Now, Sir, if what I have heard be 'owing only to warmth of temper, or 'to sudden passion, while the loss of all 'other losses the most deplorable to me 'was recent, I not only excuse, but 'commend you for it. But if you are 'really determined to meet me on any 'other account, [which, I own to you, 'is not, however, what I wish] it would 'be very blameable, and very unworthy 'of the character I desire to maintain, 'as well with you as with every other 'gentleman, to give you a difficulty in 'doing it.

'Being uncertain when this letter may 'meet you, I shall set out to-morrow 'for Vienna; where any letter directed 'to the post-house in that city, or to 'Baron Windisgrat's, (at the Favorita) 'to whom I have commendations, will 'come to hand.

'Mean time, believing you to be a 'man too generous to make a wrong 'construction of what I am going to 'declare, and knowing the value which 'the dearest of all creatures had for you, 'and your relation to her, I will not 'scruple to assure you, that the most 'acceptable return will be, that Colonel 'Morden chuses to be upon an amica'ble, rather than upon any other foot'ing, with his sincere admirer, and humble 'servant, 'R. LOVELACE.'

LETTER LXXVII.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

LINTZ, { NOV. 28. / DEC. 9.

I AM now on my way to Trent, in order to meet Colonel Morden, in pursuance of his answer to my letter inclosed in my last. I had been at Presburgh, and had intended to visit some other cities of Hungary: but having obliged myself to return first to Vienna, I there met with his letter: which follows.

'MUNICH,

'MUNICH, { NOV. 21. DEC. 2.

'SIR,

'YOUR letter was at Florence four 'days before I arrived there.

'That I might not appear unworthy 'of your favour, I set out for this city 'the very next morning. I knew not 'but that the politeness of this court 'might have engaged, beyond his in-'tention, a gentleman who has only 'his pleasure to pursue.

'But being disappointed in my hope 'of finding you here, it becomes me to 'acquaint you, that I have such a de-'sire to stand well in the opinion of a 'man of your spirit, that I cannot hesi-'tate a moment upon the option, which 'I am sure Mr. Lovelace in my situa-'tion (thus called upon) would make.

'I own, Sir, that I have, on all oc-'casions, spoken of your treatment of 'my ever-dear cousin as it deserved. It 'would have been very surprizing if I 'had not. And it behoves me (now 'you have given me so noble an oppor-'tunity of explaining myself) to con-'vince you, that no words fell from my 'lips, of you, merely because you were 'absent. I acquaint you, therefore, 'that I will attend your appointment; 'and would, were it to the farthest part 'of the globe.

'I shall stay some days at this court; 'and if you please to direct for me at 'M. Klienfurt's in this city, whether 'I remain here or not, your commands 'will come safely and speedily to the 'hands of, Sir, your most humble ser-'vant, 'WM. MORDEN.'

So you see, Belford, that the colonel, by his ready, his even eagerly-expressed acceptance of the offered interview, was determined. And is it not much better to bring such a point as this to an issue, than to give pain to friends for my safety, or continue in suspence myself; as I must do, if I imagined that another had aught against me?

This was my reply:

'VIENNA, { NOV. 25. DEC. 6.

'SIR,

'I Have this moment the favour of 'yours. I will suspend a tour I 'was going to take into Hungary, and 'instantly set out for Munich: and, if 'I find you not there, will proceed to 'Trent. This city, being on the con-'fines of Italy, will be most convenient, 'as I presume, to you, in your return 'to Tuscany; and I shall hope to meet 'you in it on the 3d—14th, of De-'cember.

'I shall bring with me only a French 'valet and an English footman. Other 'particulars may be adjusted when I 'have the honour to see you. Till 'when, I am, Sir, your most obedient 'servant, 'R. LOVELACE.'

Now, Jack, I have no manner of apprehention of the event of this meeting. And I think I must say, he seeks me; not I him. And so let him take the consequence.

What is infinitely nearer to my heart, is, my ingratitude to the most excellent of women—My premeditated ingratitude!—Yet all the while enabled to distinguish and to adore her excellence, in spite of the mean opinion of the sex which I had imbibed from early manhood.

But this lady has asserted the worthiness of her sex, and most gloriously has she exalted it with me now. Yet, surely, as I have said and written an hundred times, there cannot be such another woman.

But as my loss in her departure is the greatest of any man's, and as she was nearer to me, than to any other person in the world, and once she herself wished to be so, what an insolence in any man breathing to pretend to avenge her on me!—Happy! happy! thrice happy! had I known how to value, as I ought to have valued, the glory of such a preference!

I will not aggravate to myself this aggravation of the colonel's pretending to call me to account for my treatment of a lady so much my own, lest, in the approaching interview, my heart should relent for one so nearly related to her, and who means honour and justice to her memory; and I should thereby give him advantages which otherwise he cannot have. For I know that I shall be inclined to trust to my skill, to save a man who was so much and so justly valued by her; and shall be loth to give way to my resentment, as a threatened man. And in this respect only I am sorry for his skill, and his courage, lest I should be obliged, in my own defence, to add a chalk to a score that is already too long.

INDEED, indeed, Belford, I am, and shall be, to my latest hour, the most miserable of beings. Such exalted generosity!—Why didst thou put into my craving hands the copy of her will? Why sentest thou to me the posthumous letter?—What though I was earnest to see for the will? Thou knewest what they then were, [I did not;] and that it would be cruel to oblige me.

The meeting of twenty Colonel Mordens, were there twenty to meet in turn, would be nothing to me, would not give me a moment's concern, as to my own safety: but my reflections upon my vile ingratitude to so superior an excellence will ever be my curse.

Had she been a Miss Howe to me, and treated me as if I were an Hickman, I had had a call for revenge; and policy (when I had intended to be an husband) might have justified my attempts to humble her. But a meek and gentle temper was hers, though a true heroine, whenever honour or virtue called for an exertion of spirit.

Nothing but my cursed devices stood in the way of my happiness. Remembrest thou not, how repeatedly, from the first, I poured cold water upon her rising flame, by meanly and ungratefully turning upon her the injunctions, which virgin delicacy, and filial duty, induced her to lay me under before I got her into my power?

Did she not tell me, and did I not know it, if she had not told me, that she could not be guilty of affectation or tyranny to the man whom she intended to marry? I knew, as she once upbraided me, that from the time I had got her from her father's house, I had a plain path before me. True did she say, and I triumphed in the discovery, that from that time I held her soul in suspence a hundred times. My ipecacuanha trial alone was enough to convince an infidel, that she had a mind in which love and tenderness would have presided, had I permitted the charming buds to put forth and blow.

She would have had no reserve, as once she told me, had I given her cause of doubt. And did she not own to thee, that once she could have loved me; and, could she have made me good, would have made me happy? O, Belford! here was love; a love of the noblest kind! A love, as she hints in her posthumous letter, that extended to the soul; and which she not only avowed in her dying hours, but contrived to let me know it after death, in that letter filled with warnings and exhortations, which had for their sole end my eternal welfare!

The cursed woman, indeed, endeavoured to excite my vengeance, and my pride, by preaching to me eternally her dislike, her want of love, and her contempt of me. And my pride was, at times, too much excited by their vile insinuations. But had it even been as they said; well might she, who had been used to be courted and admired by every desiring eye, and worshipped by every respectful heart—Well might such a woman be allowed to draw back, when she found herself kept in suspence, as to the great question of all, by a designing and intriguing spirit; pretending awe and distance, as reasons for reining-in a fervor, which, if real, cannot be reined in—Divine creature! Her very doubts, her reserves, (so justly doubting) would have been my assurance, and my glory!—And what other trial needed her virtue! What other needed a purity so angelick, (blessed with such a command in her passions in the bloom of youth) had I not been a villain—and a wanton, a conceited, a proud fool, as well as a villain?

These reflections sharpened, rather than their edge by time abated, accompany me in whatever I do, and wherever I go; and mingle with all my diversions and amusements. And yet I go into gay and splendid company. I have made new acquaintance in the different courts I have visited. I am both esteemed and sought after, by persons of rank and merit. I visit the colleges, the churches, the palaces. I frequent the theatre: am present at every publick exhibition; and see all that is worth seeing, that I had not seen before, in the cabinets of the curious: am sometimes admitted to the toilette of an eminent toast, and make one with distinction at the assemblies of others—Yet can think of nothing, nor of anybody, with delight, but of my CLARISSA. Nor have I seen one woman with advantage to herself, but as she resembles, in stature, air, complexion, voice, or in some feature, that charmer, that only charmer of my soul.

What greater punishment, than to have these astonishing perfections, which she was mistress of, strike my remembrance with such force, when I have nothing left me, but the remorse of having deprived myself and the world of such a blessing? Now-and-then, indeed, am I capable of a gleam of comfort, arising (not ungenerously) from the moral certainty which I have of her everlasting happiness, in spite of all the machinations and devices which I set on foot to ensnare her virtue, and to bring down so pure a mind to my own level.

* For can I be, at worst, [Avert that worst,
* O thou SUPREME, who only canst avert
* it!]

'So much a wretch, so very far abandon'd,
'But that I muſt, even in the horrid'ſt gloom,
'Reap intervenient joy, at leaſt ſome reſpite
'From pain and anguiſh, in her bliſs—'

If I find myſelf thus miſerable abroad, I will ſoon return to England, and follow your example, I think—turn hermit, or ſome plaguy thing or other, and ſee what a conſtant courſe of penitence and mortification will do for me. There is no living at this rate—D—n me if there be!

If any miſhap ſhould befal me, you'll have the particulars of it from De la Tour. He indeed knows but little of Engliſh: but every modern tongue is yours. He is a truſty and ingenious fellow: and, if any-thing happen, will have ſome other papers, which I have ready ſealed up, for you to tranſmit to Lord M. And ſince thou art ſo expert and ſo ready at executorſhips, pr'ythee, Belford, accept of the office from me, as well as for my Clariſſa—CLARISSA LOVELACE let me call her.

By all that's good, I am bewitched to her memory. Her very name, with mine joined to it, raviſhes my ſoul, and is more delightful to me than the ſweeteſt muſick.

Had I carried her [I muſt ſtill recriminate] to any other place than that accurſed woman's—For the potion was her invention and mixture; and all the perſiſted-in violence was at her inſtigation, and at that of her wretched daughters, who have now amply revenged upon me their own ruin, which they lay at my door—

But this looks ſo like the confeſſion of a thief at the gallows, that poſſibly thou wilt be apt to think, I am intimidated in proſpect of the approaching interview. But far otherwiſe. On the contrary, moſt cheerfully do I go to meet the colonel; and I would tear my heart out of my breaſt with my own hands, were it capable of fear or concern on that account.

Thus much only I know, that if I ſhould kill him, [which I will not do, if I can help it] I ſhall be far from being eaſy in my mind: that ſhall I never more be. But as the meeting is evidently of his own ſeeking, againſt an option fairly given to the contrary, and I cannot avoid it, I'll think of that hereafter. It is but repenting and mortifying for all at once: for I am as ſure of victory, as I am that I now live, let him be ever ſo ſkilful a ſwordſman; ſince, beſides that I am no unfleſhed novice, this is a ſport, that, when provoked to it, I love as well as my food. And, moreover, I ſhall be as calm and undiſturbed as the biſhop at his prayers: while he, as is evident by his letter, muſt be actuated by revenge and paſſion.

Doubt not, therefore, Jack, that I ſhall give a good account of this affair. Mean time, I remain, yours moſt affectionately, &c.

LOVELACE.

LETTER LXXVIII.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

TRENT, DEC. 3—14.

TO-MORROW is to be the day, that will, in all probability, ſend either one or two ghoſts to attend the manes of my CLARISSA.

I arrived here yeſterday; and enquiring for an Engliſh gentleman of the name of Morden, ſoon found out the colonel's lodgings. He had been in town two days; and left his name at every probable place.

He was gone to ride out; and I left my name, and where to be found; and in the evening he made me a viſit.

He was plaguy gloomy. That was not I. But yet he told me, that I had acted like a man of true ſpirit in my firſt letter; and with honour, in giving him ſo readily this meeting. He wiſhed I had in other reſpects; and then we might have ſeen each other upon better terms than now we did.

I ſaid there was no recalling what was paſſed; and that I wiſhed ſome things had not been done as well as he.

To recriminate now, he ſaid, would be as exaſperating as unavailable. And as I had ſo cheerfully given him this opportunity, words ſhould give place to buſineſs.—'Your choice, Mr. Lovelace, 'of time, of place, of weapon, ſhall be 'my choice.'

'The two latter be yours, Mr. Mor-'den. The time to-morrow, or next 'day, as you pleaſe.'

'Next day, then, Mr. Lovelace; 'and we'll ride out to-morrow, to fix 'the place.'

'Agreed, Sir.'

'Well; now, Mr. Lovelace, do you 'chuſe the weapon.'

I ſaid, I believed we might be upon an equal foot with the ſingle rapier; but, if he thought otherwiſe, I had no objection to a piſtol.

'I will only ſay,' replied he, 'that 'the chances may be more equal by the

'ſword, becauſe we can neither of us 'be to ſeek in that: and you would 'ſtand,' ſays he, 'a worſe chance, as I 'apprehend, with a piſtol: and yet I 'have brought two, that you may take 'your choice of either: for,' added he, 'I never miſſed a mark at piſtol-'diſtance, ſince I knew how to hold a 'piſtol.'

I told him, that he ſpoke like himſelf: that I was expert enough that way, to embrace it, if he choſe it; though not ſo ſure of my mark as he pretended to be. 'Yet the devil's in't, colonel, if 'I, who have ſlit a bullet in two upon 'a knife's edge, hit not my man. So I 'have no objection to a piſtol, if it be 'your choice. No man, I'll venture to 'ſay, has a ſteadier hand or eye than I 'have.'

'They may both be of uſe to you, 'Sir, at the ſword, as well as at the 'piſtol: the ſword therefore be the 'thing, if you pleaſe.'

'With all my heart.'

We parted with a ſolemn ſort of ceremonious civility: and this day I called upon him; and we rode out together to fix upon the place: and both being of one mind, and hating to put off for the morrow what could be done to-day, would have decided it then: but De la Tour, and the colonel's valet, who attended us, being unavoidably let into the ſecret, joined to beg we would have with us a ſurgeon from Brixen, whom La Tour had fallen in with there, and who had told him he was to ride next morning to bleed a perſon in a fever, at a lone cottage, which, by the ſurgeon's deſcription, was not far from the place where we then were, if it were not that very cottage within ſight of us.

They undertook ſo to manage it, that the ſurgeon ſhould know nothing of the matter till his aſſiſtance was called in. And La Tour being, as I aſſured the colonel, a ready contriving fellow, [whom I ordered to obey him as myſelf, were the chance to be in his favour] we both agreed to defer the deciſion till to-morrow, and to leave the whole about the ſurgeon to the management of our two valets; enjoining them abſolute ſecreſy: and ſo rode back again by different ways.

We fixed upon a little lone valley for the ſpot—Ten to-morrow morning the time—And ſingle rapier the word. Yet I repeatedly told him, that I valued myſelf ſo much upon my ſkill in that weapon, that I would wiſh him to chuſe any other.

He ſaid, it was a gentleman's weapon; and he who underſtood it not, wanted a qualification that he ought to ſuffer for not having: but that, as to him, one weapon was as good as another, throughout all the inſtruments of offence.

So, Jack, you ſee I take no advantage of him! but my devil muſt deceive me, if he take not his life or his death at my hands before eleven to-morrow morning.

His valet and mine are to be preſent; but both ſtrictly enjoined to be impartial and inactive: and, in return for my civility of the like nature, he commanded his to be aſſiſting to me, if he fell.

We are to ride thither, and to diſmount when at the place; and his footman and mine are to wait at an appointed diſtance, with a chaiſe to carry off to the borders of the Venetian territories the ſurvivor, if one drop, or to aſſiſt either or both, as occaſion may demand.

And thus, Belford, is the matter ſettled.

A ſhower of rain has left me nothing elſe to do: and therefore I write this letter; though I might as well have deferred it till to-morrow twelve o'clock, when I doubt not to be able to write again, to aſſure you how much I am yours, &c. LOVELACE.

LETTER LXXIX.

TRANSLATION OF A LETTER FROM F. J. DE LA TOUR.

TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ. NEAR SOHO-SQUARE, LONDON.

SIR, TRENT, DEC. 18, N. S.

I Have melancholy news to inform you of, by order of the Chevalier Lovelace. He ſhewed me his letter to you before he ſealed it; ſignifying, that he was to meet the Chevalier Morden on the 15th. Wherefore, as the occaſion of the meeting is ſo well known to you, I ſhall ſay nothing of it here.

I had taken care to have ready within a little diſtance, a ſurgeon and his aſſiſtant, to whom, under an oath of ſecreſy, I had revealed the matter, (though I did not own it to the two gentlemen;) ſo that they were prepared with bandages, and all things proper. For well was I acquainted with the bravery and ſkill of my chevalier; and had heard the character of the other; and knew the animoſity of both. A poſt-chaiſe was ready, ready, with each of their footmen at a little diſtance.

The two chevaliers came exactly at their time: they were attended by Monſieur Margate, (the colonel's gentleman) and myſelf. They had given orders over-night, and now repeated them in each other's preſence, that we ſhould obſerve a ſtrict impartiality between them: and that if one fell, each of us ſhould look upon himſelf, as to any needful help or retreat, as the ſervant of the ſurvivor, and take his commands accordingly.

After a few compliments, both the gentlemen, with the greateſt preſence of mind that ever I beheld in men, ſtript to their ſhirts, and drew.

They parried with equal judgment ſeveral paſſes. My chevalier drew the firſt blood, making a deſperate puſh, which, by a ſudden turn of his antagoniſt, miſſed going clear through him, and wounded him on the fleſhy part of the ribs of his right-ſide; which part the ſword tore out, being on the extremity of the body: but, before my chevalier could recover himſelf, the colonel, in return, puſhed him into the inſide of the left-arm, near the ſhoulder: and the ſword (raking his breaſt as it paſſed) being followed by a great effuſion of blood, the colonel ſaid, 'Sir, I believe 'you have enough.'

My chevalier ſwore by G—d, he was not hurt: 'twas a pin's point: and ſo made another paſs at his antagoniſt; which he, with a ſurprizing dexterity, received under his arm, and run my dear chevalier into the body: who immediately fell; ſaying, 'The luck is 'yours, Sir—O my beloved Clariſſa! '—Now art thou—' Inwardly he ſpoke three or four words more. His ſword dropt from his hand. Mr. Morden threw his down, and ran to him, ſaying in French—'Ah, Monſieur! you are a 'dead man!—Call to God for mercy!'

We gave the ſignal agreed upon to the footmen; and they to the ſurgeons; who inſtantly came up.

Colonel Morden, I found, was too well uſed to the bloody work; for he was as cool as if nothing extraordinary had happened, aſſiſting the ſurgeons, though his own wound bled much. But my dear chevalier fainted away two or three times running, and vomited blood beſides.

However, they ſtopped the bleeding for the preſent; and we helped him into the voiture; and then the colonel ſuffered his own wound to be dreſſed; and appeared concerned that my chevalier was between whiles (when he could ſpeak, and ſtruggle) extremely outrageous.—Poor gentleman! he had made quite ſure of victory!

The colonel, againſt the ſurgeons advice, would mount on horſeback to paſs into the Venetian territories; and generouſly gave me a purſe of gold to pay the ſurgeons; deſiring me to make a preſent to the footman; and to accept of the remainder, as a mark of his ſatisfaction in my conduct; and in my care and tenderneſs of my maſter.

The ſurgeons told him, that my chevalier could not live over the day.

When the colonel took leave of him, Mr. Lovelace ſaid, 'You have well re-'venged the dear creature.'

'I have, Sir,' ſaid Mr. Morden: 'and 'perhaps ſhall be ſorry that you called 'upon me to this work, while I was 'balancing whether to obey, or diſ-'obey, the dear angel.'

'There is a fate in it!' replied my chevalier—'A curſed fate!—Or this 'could not have been!—But be ye all 'witneſſes, that I have provoked my 'deſtiny, and acknowledge, that I fall 'by a man of honour.'

'Sir,' ſaid the colonel, with the piety of a confeſſor, (wringing Mr. Lovelace's hand) 'ſnatch theſe few fleeting mo-'ments, and commend yourſelf to 'God.'

And ſo he rode off.

The voiture proceeded ſlowly with my chevalier; yet the motion ſet both his wounds bleeding afreſh; and it was with difficulty they again ſtopped the blood.

We brought him alive to the neareſt cottage; and he gave orders to me to diſpatch to you the packet I herewith ſend ſealed up; and bid me write to you the particulars of this moſt unhappy affair; and give you thanks, in his name, for all your favours and friendſhip to him.

Contrary to all expectation, he lived over the night: but ſuffered much, as well from his impatience and diſappointment, as from his wounds; for he ſeemed very unwilling to die.

He was delirious, at times, in the two laſt hours; and then ſeveral times cried out, as if he had ſeen ſome frightful ſpectre, 'Take her away! Take her 'away!' but named nobody. And ſometimes praiſed ſome lady, (that Clariſſa, I ſuppoſe, whom he had invoked when he received his death's wound) calling her, 'Sweet excellence! Divine crea'ture! Fair ſufferer!'—And once he ſaid, 'Look down, bleſſed Spirit, look 'down!'—And there ſtopt—his lips, however, moving.

At nine in the morning, he was ſeized with convulſions, and fainted away; and it was a quarter of an hour before he came out of them.

His few laſt words I muſt not omit, as they ſhew an ultimate compoſure; which may adminiſter ſome conſolation to his honourable friends.

'Bleſſed—' ſaid he, addreſſing himſelf no doubt to Heaven; for his dying eyes were lifted up—A ſtrong convulſion prevented him for a few moments ſaying more—But recovering, he again with great fervor (lifting up his eyes, and his ſpread hands) pronounced the word 'Bleſſed!' then, in a ſeeming ejaculation, he ſpoke inwardly ſo as not to be underſtood: at laſt, he diſtinctly pronounced theſe three words,

'LET THIS EXPIATE!'

And then, his head ſinking on his pillow, he expired; at about half an hour after ten.

He little thought, poor gentleman! his end ſo near: ſo had given no direction about his body. I have cauſed it to be embowelled, and depoſited in a vault, till I have orders from England.

This is a favour that was procured with difficulty; and would have been refuſed, had he not been an Engliſhman of rank: a nation with reaſon reſpected in every Auſtrian government—For he had refuſed ghoſtly attendance, and the ſacraments in the Catholick way. May his ſoul be happy, I pray God!

I have had ſome trouble alſo on account of the manner of his death, from the magiſtracy here: who have taken the requiſite informations in the affair. And it has coſt ſome money. Of which, and of the dear chevalier's effects, I will give you a faithful account in my next. And ſo, waiting at this place your commands, I am, SIR, your moſt faithful and obedient ſervant,

F. J. DE LA TOUR.

CONCLUSION,

Suppoſed to be written by Mr. BELFORD.

WHAT remains to be mentioned for the ſatisfaction of ſuch of the readers as may be preſumed to have intereſted themſelves in the fortunes of thoſe other principles in the ſtory, who ſurvived Mr. Lovelace, will be found ſummarily related as follows:

The news of Mr. LOVELACE'S unhappy end was received with as much grief by his own relations, as it was with exultation by the Harlowe-family, and by Miſs Howe. His own family were moſt to be pitied, becauſe, being ſincere admirers of the inimitable lady, they were greatly grieved for the injuſtice done her; and now had the additional mortification of loſing the only male of it, by a violent death.

That his fate was deſerved, was ſtill a heightening of their calamity, as they had, for that very reaſon, and his unpreparedneſs for it, but too much ground for apprehenſion with regard to his future happineſs. While the other family, from their unforgiving ſpirit, and even the noble young lady abovementioned, from her lively reſentments, found his death ſome little, ſome temporary alleviation, of the heavy loſs they had ſuſtained, principally through his means.

Temporary alleviation, we repeat, as to the Harlowe-family; for THEY were far from being happy or eaſy in their reflections upon their own conduct.—And ſtill the leſs, as the inconſolable mother reſted not, till ſhe had procured, by means of Colonel Morden, large extracts from ſome of the letters that compoſe this hiſtory, which convinced them all, that the very correſpondence which Clariſſa, while with them, renewed with Mr. Lovelace, was renewed for their ſakes, more than for her own: that ſhe had given him no encouragement contrary to her duty, and to that prudence for which ſhe was ſo early noted: that had they truſted to a diſcretion which they owned ſhe had never brought into queſtion, ſhe would have extricated them and herſelf (as ſhe once propoſed to her mother) from all difficulties as to Lovelace: that ſhe, if any woman ever could, would have given a glorious inſtance of a paſſion conquered, or at leaſt kept under, by reaſon, and by piety; the man being too immoral to be implicitly beloved.

The unhappy parents and uncles, from the perusal of these extracts, too evidently for their peace, saw, that it was entirely owing to the avarice, the ambition, the envy, of her implacable brother and sister, and the senseless confederacy entered into by the whole family, to compel her to give her hand to a man she must despise, or she had not been a CLARISSA, and to their consequent persecution of her, that she ever thought of quitting her father's house: and that even when she first entertained such a thought, it was with intent, if possible, to procure for herself a private asylum with Mrs. Howe, or at some other place of safety, (but not with Mr. Lovelace, nor with any of the ladies of his family, though invited by the latter) from whence she might propose terms which ought to have been complied with, and which were entirely consistent with her duty—That though she found herself disappointed of the hoped-for refuge and protection, she intended not, by meeting Mr. Lovelace, to put herself into his power; all that she aimed at by taking that step, being to endeavour to pacify so fierce a spirit, lest he should (as he indeed was determined to do) pay a visit to her friends which might have been attended with fatal consequences; but was spirited away by him in such a manner, as made her an object of pity, rather than of blame.

These extracts further convinced them all, that it was to her unaffected regret, that she found, that marriage was not in her power afterwards for a long time; and at last, but on one occasion, when their unnatural cruelty to her (on a new application she had made to her aunt Hervey, to procure mercy and pardon) rendered her incapable of receiving his proffered hand; and so obliged her to suspend the day; intending only to suspend it, till recovered.

They saw with equal abhorrence of Lovelace, and of their own cruelty, and with the highest admiration of her, That the majesty of her virtue had awed the most daring spirit in the world, so that he durst not attempt to carry his base designs into execution, till, by wicked potions, he had made her senses the previous sacrifice.

But how did they in a manner adore her memory! How did they recriminate upon each other! when they found, that she had not only preserved herself from repeated outrage, by the most glorious and intrepid behaviour, in defiance, and to the utter confusion, of all his libertine notions; but had the fortitude, constantly, and with a noble disdain, to reject him.—Whom?—Why, the man she once could have loved, kneeling for pardon, and begging to be permitted to make her the best reparation then in his power to make her; that is to say, by marriage. His fortunes high and unbroken. She his prisoner at the time in a vile house: rejected by all her friends; upon repeated application to them, for mercy and forgiveness, rejected—Mercy and forgiveness, and a last blessing, afterwards imploring; and that as much to lighten their future remorses, as for the comfort of her own pious heart—Yet, though savagely refused, on a supposition that she was not so near her end as was represented, departed, forgiving and blessing them all.

Then they recollected, that her posthumous letters, instead of reproaches, were filled with comfortings: that she had in her last will, in their own way, laid obligations upon them all; obligations which they neither deserved nor expected; as if she thought to repair the injustice which self-partiality made some of them conclude done to them by her grandfather in his will.

These intelligences and recollections were perpetual subjects of recrimination to them: heightened their anguish for the loss of a child who was the glory of their family; and not seldom made them shun each other, (at the times they were accustomed to meet together) that they might avoid the mutual reproaches of eyes that spoke, when tongues were silent—Their stings also sharpened by time! What an unhappy family was this! Well might Colonel Morden, in the words of Juvenal, challenge all other miserable families to produce such a growing distress as that of the Harlowes (a few months before so happy!) was able to produce—

'Humani generis mores tibi nôsse volenti
'Sufficit una domus: pavcos consume dies, &
'Dicere te miserum, postquam illinc veneris,
'aude.'

Mrs. HARLOWE lived about two years and an half, after the lamented death of her CLARISSA.

Mr. HARLOWE had the additional affliction to survive his lady about half a year; her death, by new-pointing his former anguish and remorse, hastening his own.

Both, in their last hours, however, comforted comforted themſelves, that they ſhould be reſtored to their BLESSED daughter, as they always (from the time that they were acquainted with the above particulars of her ſtory, and with her happy exit) called her.

They both lived, however, to ſee their ſon James, and their daughter Arabella, married: but not to take joy in either of their nuptials.

Mr. JAMES HARLOWE married a woman of family, an orphan; and is obliged, at a very great expence, to ſupport his claim to eſtates, which were his principal inducement to make his addreſſes to her; but which, to this day, he has not recovered; nor is likely to recover; having very powerful adverſaries to contend with, and a title to aſſert, which admits of litigation; and he not bleſſed with ſo much patience as is neceſſary to perſons embarraſſed in law.

What is further obſervable with regard to him, is, that the match was entirely of his own head, againſt the advice of his father, mother, and uncles, who warned him of marrying in this lady a law-ſuit for life. His ungenerous behaviour to his wife, for what ſhe cannot help, and for what is as much her misfortune as his, has occaſioned ſuch eſtrangements between them, (ſhe being a woman of ſpirit) as, were the law-ſuits determined, even more favourably than probably they will be, muſt make him unhappy to the end of his life. He attributes all his misfortunes, when he opens himſelf to the few friends he has, to his vile and cruel treatment of his angelick ſiſter. He confeſſes theſe misfortunes to be juſt, without having temper to acquieſce in the acknowledged juſtice. One month in every year he puts on mourning, and that month commences with him on the 7th of September, during which he ſhuts himſelf up from all company. Finally, he is looked upon, and often calls himſelf,

THE MOST MISERABLE OF BEINGS.

ARABELLA's fortune became a temptation to a man of quality to make his addreſſes to her: his title an inducement with her to approve of him. Brothers and ſiſters, when they are not friends, are generally the ſharpeſt enemies to each other. He thought too much was done for her in the ſettlements. She thought not enough. And for ſome years paſt, they have ſo heartily hated each other, that if either know a joy, it is in being told of ſome new misfortune or diſpleaſure that happens to the other. Indeed, before they came to an open rupture, they were continually loading each other, by way of exonerating themſelves, (to the additional diſquiet of the whole family) with the principal guilt of their implacable behaviour and ſordid cruelty to their admirable ſiſter.—May the reports that are ſpread of this lady's further unhappineſs from her lord's free life; a fault ſhe juſtly thought ſo odious in Mr. Lovelace, (though that would not have been an inſuperable objection with her to his addreſſes;) and of his publick ſlights and contempt of her, and even ſometimes of his perſonal abuſes, which are ſaid to be owing to her impatient ſpirit, and violent paſſions; be utterly groundleſs.—For, what a heart muſt that be, which would wiſh ſhe might be as great a torment to herſelf, as ſhe had aimed to be to her ſiſter? Eſpecially as ſhe regrets to this hour, and declares that ſhe ſhall, to the laſt of her life, her cruel treatment of that ſiſter; and (as well as her brother) is but too ready to attribute to that her own unhappineſs.

Mr. ANTHONY and Mr. JOHN HARLOWE are ſtill [at the writing of this] living: but often declare, that, with their beloved niece, they loſt all the joy of their lives: and lament, without reſerve, in all companies, the unnatural part they were induced to take againſt her.

Mr. SOLMES is alſo ſtill living, if a man of his caſt may be ſaid to live; for his general behaviour and ſordid manners are ſuch as juſtify the averſion the excellent lady had to him. He has, moreover, found his addreſſes rejected by ſeveral women of far inferior fortunes (great as his own are) to thoſe of the lady to whom he was encouraged to aſpire.

Mr. MOWBRAY and Mr. TOURVILLE having loſt the man in whoſe converſation they ſo much delighted; ſhocked and awakened by the ſeveral unhappy cataſtrophes before their eyes; and having always rather ductile and dictating hearts; took their friend Belford's advice: converted the remainder of their fortunes into annuities for life; and retired, the one into Yorkſhire, the other into Nottinghamſhire, of which counties they are natives: their friend Belford managing their concerns for them, and correſponding with them, and having more and more hopes every time time he ſees them, (which is once or twice a year, when they come to town) that they will become more and more worthy of their names and families.

As thoſe ſiſters in iniquity, SALLY MARTIN and POLLY HORTON, had abilities and education ſuperior to what creatures of their caſt generally can boaſt of: and as their hiſtories are no where given in the preceding papers, in which they are frequently mentioned; it cannot fail of gratifying the reader's curioſity, as well as anſwering the good ends deſigned by the publication of this work, to give a brief account of their parentage, and manner of training-up, preparative to the vile courſes they fell into, and of what became of them, after the dreadful exit of the infamous Sinclair.

SALLY MARTIN was the daughter of a ſubſtantial mercer at the court-end of the town; to whom her mother, a grocer's daughter in the city, brought a handſome fortune; and both having a gay turn, and being fond of the faſhions which it was their buſineſs to promote: and which the wives and daughters of the uppermoſt tradeſmen (eſpecially in that quarter of the town) generally affect to follow; it was no wonder that they brought up their daughter accordingly: nor that ſhe, who was a very ſprightly and ready-witted girl, and reckoned very pretty and very genteel, ſhould every year improve upon ſuch examples.

She early found herſelf miſtreſs of herſelf. All ſhe did was right: all ſhe ſaid was admired. Early, very early, did ſhe diſmiſs bluſhes from her cheek. She could not bluſh, becauſe ſhe could not doubt: and ſilence, whatever was the ſubject, was as much a ſtranger to her, as diffidence.

She never was left out of any party of pleaſure, after ſhe had paſſed her ninth year; and, in honour of her prattling vein, was conſidered as a principal perſon in the frequent treats and entertainments which her parents, fond of luxurious living, gave with a view to increaſe their acquaintance for the ſake of their buſineſs; not duly reflecting, that the part they ſuffered her to take in what made for their intereſt, would probably be a means to quicken the appetites, and ruin the morals of their daughter, for whoſe ſake, as an only child, they were ſolicitous to obtain wealth.

The CHILD ſo much a woman, what muſt the WOMAN be?

At fifteen or ſixteen, ſhe affected, both in dreſs and manners, to ape ſuch of the quality, as were moſt apiſh. The richeſt ſilks in her father's ſhop were not too rich for her. At all publick diverſions ſhe was the leader, inſtead of the led, of all her female kindred and acquaintance, though they were a third older than herſelf. She would buſtle herſelf into a place, and make room for her more baſhful companions, through the frowns of the firſt poſſeſſors, at a crouded theatre, leaving every-one near her amazed at her ſelf-conſequence, wondering ſhe had no ſervant to keep place for her; whiſperingly enquiring who ſhe was; and then ſitting down admiring her fortitude.

She officiouſly made herſelf of conſequence to the moſt noted players; who, as one of their patroneſſes, applied to her for her intereſt on their benefit-nights. She knew the chriſtian, as well as ſur-name of every pretty fellow who frequented publick places; and affected to ſpeak of them by the former.

Thoſe who had not obeyed the call her eyes always made upon all of them for notice at her entrance, or before ſhe took her ſeat, were ſpoken of with haughtineſs, as Jacks, or Toms; while her favourites, with an affectedly-endearing familiarity, and a prettineſs of accent, were Jackeys and Tommys; and if they ſtood very high in her graces, Dear Devils, and Agreeable Toads.

She ſat in judgment, and an inexorable judge ſhe was, upon the actions and conduct of every man and woman of quality and faſhion, as they became the ſubjects of converſation. She was deeply learned in the ſcandalous Chronicle: ſhe made every character, every praiſe, and every cenſure, ſerve to exalt herſelf. She ſhould ſcorn to do ſo or ſo!— Or, That was ever her way; and juſt what ſhe did, or liked to do; and judging herſelf by the vileneſs of the moſt vile of her ſex, ſhe wiped her mouth, and ſat down ſatisfied with her own virtue.

She had her chair to attend her where-ever ſhe went, and found people among her betters, as her pride ſtooped to call ſome of the moſt inſignificant people in the world, to encourage her viſits.

She was practiſed in all the arts of the card-table: a true Spartan girl; and had even courage, occaſionally, to wrangle off a detection. Late hours (turning night into day, and day into night) were the almoſt unavoidable conſequences of her frequent play. Her parents pleaſed themſelves that their

Sally had a charming conſtitution: and as long as ſhe ſuffered not in her health, they were regardleſs of her morals.

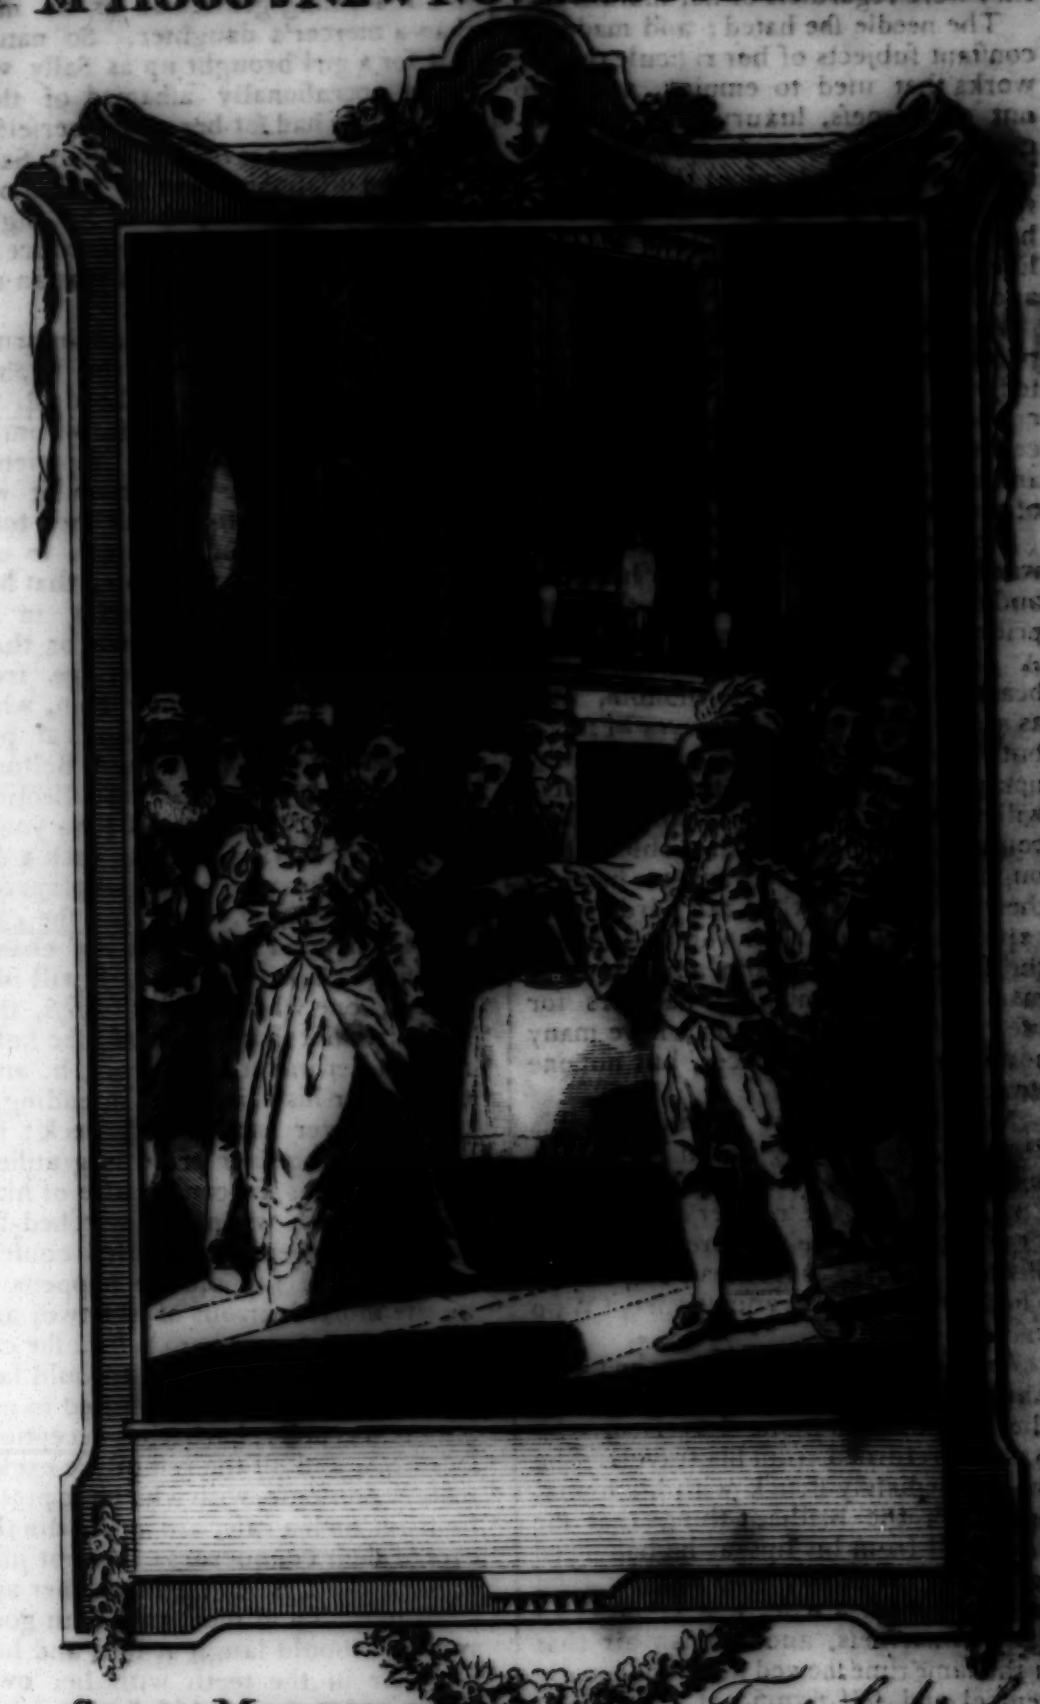
The needle ſhe hated: and made the conſtant ſubjects of her ridicule the fine works that uſed to employ, and keep out of idleneſs, luxury, and extravagance, and at home, (were they have been of no other ſervice) the women of the laſt age, when there were no Vauxhalls, Ranelaghs, Marybones, and ſuch like places of diverſion, to dreſs out for, and gad after.

And as to family-management, her parents had not required any knowledge of that ſort from her; and ſhe conſidered it as a qualification only neceſſary for hirelings, and the low-born, and as utterly unworthy of the attention of a modern fine lady.

Her twentieth year, to her own equal wonder and regret, paſſed over her head, and ſhe had not had one offer that her pride would admit her to accept of. A girl from fifteen to eighteen, her beauty then beginning to bloſſom, will, as a new thing, attract the eyes of men: but if ſhe make her face cheap at publick places, ſhe will find, that new faces will draw more attention than fine faces conſtantly ſeen. But this obſervation ought young ladies always to have in their heads, that they can hardly ever expect to gratify their vanity, and at the ſame time gain the admiration of men worthy of making partners for life. They may, in ſhort, have many admirers at publick places, but not one lover.

Sally Martin knew nothing of this doctrine. Her beauty was in it's bloom, and yet ſhe found herſelf neglected.—'Sally Martin, the mercer's daughter: 'ſhe never fails being here;'—was the anſwer, and the accompanying obſervation, made to every queſtioner, 'Who 'is that lady?'

At laſt, her deſtiny approached. It was at a maſquerade that ſhe firſt ſaw the gay, the handſome Lovelace, who was juſt returned from his travels. She was immediately ſtruck with his figure, and with the brilliant things that ſhe heard fall from his lips as he happened to ſit near her. He, who was not then looking out for a wife, was taken with Sally's ſmartneſs, and with an air that at the ſame time ſhewed her to be equally genteel and ſelf-ſignificant; and ſigns of approbation mutually paſſing, he found no difficulty in acquainting himſelf where to viſit her next day. And yet it was ſome mortification to a perſon of her ſelf-conſequence, and gay appearance, to ſubmit to be known by ſo fine a young gentleman as no more than a mercer's daughter. So natural is it for a girl brought up as Sally was, to be occaſionally aſhamed of thoſe whoſe folly had ſet her above herſelf.



But whatever it might be to Sally, it was no diſappointment to Mr. Lovelace, to find his miſtreſs of no higher degree; becauſe he hoped to reduce her ſoon to the loweſt condition that an unhappy woman can fall into.

But when Miſs Martin had informed herſelf, that her lover was the nephew and preſumptive-heir of Lord M. ſhe thought him the very man for whom ſhe had been ſo long and ſo impatiently looking out; and for whom it was worth her while to ſpreak her toils. And here it may not be amiſs to obſerve, that it is very probable, that Mr. Lovelace had Sally Martin in his thoughts, and perhaps two or three more whoſe hopes of marriage from him had led them to their ruin, when he drew the following whimſical picture, in a letter to his friend Belford, not inſerted in the preceding collection.

'Methinks,' ſays he, 'I ſee a young 'couple in courtſhip, having each a de'ſign upon the other: the girl plays off: 'ſhe is very happy, as ſhe is: ſhe can'not be happier: ſhe will not change 'her ſingle ſtate: the man, I will ſup'poſe, is one who does not confeſs, that 'he deſires not that ſhe ſhould: ſhe holds 'ready a net under her apron; he ano'ther under his coat; each intending to 'throw it over each other's neck; ſhe 'over his, when her pride is gratified, 'and ſhe thinks ſhe can be ſure of him; 'he over hers, when the watched-for 'yielding moment has carried conſent 'too far—And ſuppoſe he happens to 'be the more dextrous of the two, and 'whips his net over her, before ſhe can 'caſt hers over him; how, I would fain 'know, can ſhe be juſtly entitled to cry 'out upon cruelty, barbarity, deception, 'ſacrifices, and all the reſt of the excla'matory nonſenſe, with which the pretty 'fools, in ſuch a caſe, are apt to din the 'ears of their conquerors? Is it not juſt, 'thinkeſt thou, when ſhe makes her ap'peals to gods and men, that both gods 'and men ſhould laugh at her, and hit'ting her in the teeth with her own 'felonious intentions, bid her ſit down 'patiently under her deſerved diſap'pointment?'

In ſhort, Sally's parents, as well as herſelf, encouraged Mr. Lovelace's viſits ſits. They thought they might truſt to a diſcretion in her which ſhe herſelf was too wiſe to doubt. Pride they knew ſhe had. And that, in theſe caſes, is often called diſcretion.—'Lord help the ſex,' ſays Lovelace, 'if they had not pride!' —Nor did they ſuſpect danger from that ſpecious air of ſincerity, and gentleneſs of manners, which he could aſſume or lay aſide whenever he pleaſed.

The ſecond maſquerade, which was no more than their third meeting abroad, completed her ruin, from ſo practiſed, though ſo young a deceiver; and that before ſhe well knew ſhe was in danger: for, having prevailed on her to go off with him about twelve o'clock to his aunt Forbes's, a lady of honour and fortune, to whom he had given reaſon to expect her future niece, [the only hint of marriage he ever gave her] he carried her to the houſe of the wicked woman, who bears the name of Sinclair in theſe papers: and there, by promiſes, which ſhe underſtood in the favourable ſenſe, (for where a woman loves, ſhe ſeldom doubts enough for her own ſafety) obtained an eaſy conqueſt over a virtue that was little more than nominal.

He found it not difficult to induce her to proceed in the guilty commerce, till the effects of it became too apparent to be hid. Her parents then (in the firſt fury of their diſappointment, and vexation, for being deprived of all hopes of ſuch a ſon-in-law) turned her out of doors.

Her diſgrace thus publiſhed, ſhe became hardened; and, protected by her ſeducer, whoſe favourite miſtreſs ſhe then was, ſhe was ſo incenſed againſt her parents for an indignity ſo little ſuiting with her pride, and the head they had always given her, that ſhe refuſed to return to them, when, repenting of their paſſionate treatment of her, they would have been reconciled to her: and, becoming the favourite daughter of her mother Sinclair, at the perſuaſions of that abandoned woman, ſhe practiſed to bring on an abortion, which ſhe effected, though ſhe was ſo far gone, that it had like to have coſt her life.

Thus, unchaſtity her firſt crime, murder her next, her conſcience became ſeared; and, young as ſhe was, and fond of her deceiver, ſoon grew indelicate enough, having ſo thorough-paced a ſchool-miſtreſs, to do all ſhe could to promote the pleaſures of a man who had ruined her; ſcrupling not, with a ſpirit truly diabolical, to endeavour to draw in others to follow her example. And it is hardly to be believed what miſchiefs of this ſort ſhe was the means of effecting; woman confiding in, and daring woman; and ſhe a creature of ſpecious appearance, and great art.

POLLY HORTON was the daughter of a gentlewoman, well deſcended; whoſe huſband, a man of family, and of honour, was a captain in the Guards.

He died when Polly was about nine years of age, leaving her to the care of her mother, a lively young lady of about twenty-ſix; with a genteel proviſion for both.

Her mother was extremely fond of her Polly; but had it not in herſelf to manifeſt the true, the genuine fondneſs of a parent, by a ſtrict and guarded education; dreſſing out, and viſiting, and being viſited, by the gay of her own ſex, and caſting out her eye abroad, as one ready to try her fortune again in the married ſtate.

This induced thoſe airs, and a love to thoſe diverſions, which make a young widow, of ſo lively a turn, the unfitteſt tutoreſs in the world, even to her own daughter.

Mrs. Horton herſelf having had an early turn to muſick, and that ſort of reading, which is but an earlier debauchery for young minds, preparative to the groſſer at riper years; to wit, romances and novels, ſongs and plays, and thoſe without diſtinction, moral or immoral, ſhe indulged her daughter in the ſame taſte; and at thoſe hours, when they could not take part in the more active and lively amuſements and kill-times, as ſome call them, uſed to employ Miſs to read to her; happy enough in her own imagination, that while ſhe was diverting her own ears, and ſometimes, as the piece was, corrupting her own heart, and her child's too, ſhe was teaching Miſs to read, and improve her mind; for it was the boaſt of every tea-table half-hour, That Miſs Horton, in propriety, accent, and emphaſis, ſurpaſſed all the young ladies of her age: and, at other times, complimenting the pleaſed mother—'Bleſs me, Madam, with what a ſurprizing 'grace Miſs Horton reads!—She enters into 'the very ſpirit of her ſubject—This ſhe 'could have from nobody but you!' An intended praiſe; but, as the ſubjects were, would have been a ſevere ſatire in the mouth of an enemy!—While the fond, the inconſiderate mother, with a delighted air, would cry, 'Why, I cannot but 'ſay, Miſs Horton does credit to her tutoreſs!' And then a 'Come hither, my beſt love!' and, with a kiſs of approbation, 'What 'a pleaſure to your dear papa, had he lived 'to ſee your improvements, my charmer!'—

Concluding with a ſigh of ſatisfaction; her eyes turning round upon the circle, to take in all the ſilent applauſes of theirs. But little thought the fond, the fooliſh mother, what the plant would be, which was ſpringing up from theſe ſeeds! Little imagined ſhe, that her own ruin, as well as her child's, was to be the conſequence of this fine education; and that, in the ſame ill-fated hour, the honour both of mother and daughter was to become a ſacrifice to the intriguing invader!

This the laughing girl, when abandoned to her evil deſtiny, and in company with her ſiſter Sally, and others, each recounting their ſettings-out, their progreſs, and their fall, frequently related to be her education and manner of training-up.

This, and to ſee a ſucceſſion of humble ſervants buzzing about a mother, who took too much pride in addreſſes of that kind, what a beginning, what an example, to a conſtitution of tinder, ſo prepared to receive the ſpark ſtruck, from the ſteely forehead, and flinty heart, of ſuch a libertine, as at laſt it was their fortune to be encountered by!

In ſhort, as Miſs grew up under the influences of ſuch a directreſs, and of books ſo light and frothy, with the inflaming additions of muſick, concerts, operas, plays, aſſemblies, balls, and the reſt of the rabble of amuſements of modern life, it is no wonder, that, like early fruit, ſhe was ſoon ripened to the hand of the inſidious gatherer.

At fifteen, ſhe owned, ſhe was ready to fancy herſelf the heroine of every novel, and of every comedy ſhe read, ſo well did ſhe enter into the ſpirit of her ſubject: ſhe glowed to become the object of ſome hero's flame; and perfectly longed to begin an intrigue, and even to be run away with by ſome enterprizing lover: and yet had neither confinement nor check to apprehend from her indiſcreet mother: which ſhe thought abſolutely neceſſary to conſtitute a Partheniſſa!

Nevertheleſs, with all theſe fine modern qualities, did ſhe complete her nineteenth year, before ſhe met with any addreſs of conſequence: one-half of her admirers being afraid, becauſe of her gay turn, and but middling fortune, to make ſerious applications for her favour! while others were kept at diſtance, by the ſuperior airs ſhe aſſumed; and a third ſort, not ſufficiently penetrating the foibles either of mother or daughter, were kept off by the ſuppoſed watchful care of the former.

But when the man of intrepidity and intrigue was found, never was heroine ſo ſoon ſubdued, never goddeſs ſo eaſily ſtript of her celeſtials! For, at the opera, a diverſion at which neither ſhe nor her mother ever miſſed to be preſent, ſhe beheld the ſpecious Lovelace; beheld him inveſted with all the airs of heroick inſult, reſenting a ſlight affront offered to his Sally Martin, by two gentlemen who had known her in her more hopeful ſtate, one of whom Mr. Lovelace obliged to ſneak away with a broken head, given with the pummel of his ſword, the other with a bloody noſe; neither of them well ſupporting that readineſs of offence, which, it ſeems, was a part of their known characters to be guilty of.

The gallantry of this action drawing every by-ſtander on the ſide of the hero, 'O the brave man!' cried Polly Horton aloud to her mother, in a kind of rapture; 'How needful the protection of the brave to the fair!' with a ſoftneſs in her voice, which ſhe had taught herſelf, to ſuit her fancied high condition of life.

A ſpeech ſo much in his favour, could not but take the notice of a man who was but too ſenſible of the advantages which his fine perſon, and noble air, gave him over the gentler hearts, who was always watching every female eye, and who had his ears continually turned to every affected voice; for that was one of his indications of a proper ſubject to be attempted—'Affectation of every ſort,' he uſed to ſay, 'is a certain ſign of a turned head; of a faulty judgment: and upon ſuch a baſis I ſeldom build in vain.'

He inſtantly reſolved to be acquainted with a young creature, who ſeemed ſo ſtrongly prejudiced in his favour. Never man had a readier invention for all ſorts of miſchief. He gave his Sally her cue. He called her ſiſter in their hearing. And Sally whiſperingly gave the young lady, and her mother, in her own way, the particulars of the affront ſhe had received; making herſelf an angel of light, to caſt the brighter ray upon the character of her heroick brother. She particularly praiſed his known and approved courage; and mingled with her praiſes of him, ſuch circumſtances relating to his birth, his fortune, and endowments, as left him nothing to do but to fall in love with the enamoured Polly.

Mr. Lovelace preſently ſaw what turn to give to his profeſſions: ſo brave a man! yet of manners ſo gentle! hit the young lady's taſte: nor could ſhe ſuſpect the heart, that ſuch an aſpect covered. 'This was the man! the very man!' ſhe whiſpered whiſpered to her mother: and, when the opera was over, his ſervant procuring a coach, he undertook, with his ſpecious ſiſter, to ſet them down at their own lodgings, though ſituated a quite different way from his: and there were they prevailed upon to alight, and partake of a ſlight repaſt.

Sally preſſed them to return the favour to her at her aunt Forbes's, and hoped it would be before her brother went to his own ſeat.

They promiſed her, and named their evening.

A ſplendid entertainment was provided. The gueſts came, having in the interim found all that was ſaid of his name, and family, and fortune, to be true. Perſons of ſo little ſtrictneſs in their own morals, took it not into their heads to be very inquiſitive after his.

Muſick and dancing had their ſhare in the entertainment: theſe opened their hearts, already half-opened by love: the aunt Forbes, and the lover's ſiſter, kept them open by their own example: the hero ſung, vowed, promiſed: their gratitude was moved, their delights were augmented, their hopes increaſed; their confidence was engaged; all their appetites up in arms; the rich wines co-operating; beat quite off their guard, and not thought enough remaining for ſo much as ſuſpicion; Miſs, detached from her mother by Sally, ſoon fell a ſacrifice to the ſucceſsful intriguer.

The widow herſelf, half intoxicated and raiſed as ſhe was with artful mixtures, and inflamed by love, unexpectedly tendered by one of the libertines, his conſtant companions, (to whom an opportunity was contrived to be given to be alone with her, and that cloſely followed by importunity) fell into her daughter's error. The conſequences of which, in length of time, becoming apparent, grief, ſhame, remorſe, ſeized her heart, (her own indiſcretion not allowing her to arraign her daughter's) and ſhe ſurvived not her delivery; leaving Polly with child likewiſe: who, when delivered, being too fond of the gay deluder to renounce his company, even when ſhe found herſelf deluded, fell into a courſe of extravagance and diſſoluteneſs; ran through her fortune in a very little time; and, as an high preferment, at laſt, with Sally, was admitted a quarter partner with the deteſtable Sinclair.

All that is neceſſary to add to the hiſtory of theſe unhappy women, will be comprized in a very little compaſs.

After the death of the profligate Sinclair, they kept on the infamous trade with too much ſucceſs; till an accident happened in the houſe—A gentleman of family killed in it in a fray, contending with another for a new-vamp'd face. Sally was accuſed of holding the gentleman's arm, while his more favoured adverſary ran him through the heart, and then made off. And ſhe being tried for her life, narrowly eſcaped.

This accident obliged them to break up houſe-keeping; and not having been frugal enough of their ill-gotten gains, (laviſhing upon one, what they got by another) they were compelled, for ſubſiſtence ſake, to enter themſelves as under-managers in ſuch another houſe as their own had been. In which ſervice, ſoon after, Sally died of a fever and ſurfeit got by a debauch: and the other, about a month after, by a violent cold, occaſioned through careleſſneſs in a ſalivation.

Happier ſcenes open for the remaining characters; for it might be deſcending too low to mention the untimely ends of Dorcas, and of William, Mr. Lovelace's wicked ſervant; and the pining and conſumptive ones of Betty Barnes and Joſeph Leman, unmarried both, and in leſs than a year after the happy death of their excellent young lady.

The good Mrs. NORTON paſſed the ſmall remainder of her life, as happily as ſhe wiſhed, in her beloved foſter-daughter's dairy-houſe, as it uſed to be called: as ſhe wiſhed, we repeat; for ſhe had too ſtrong aſpirations after another life, to be greatly attached to this.

She laid out the greateſt part of her time in doing good by her advice, and by the prudent management of the fund committed to her direction. Having lived an exemplary life from her youth upwards; and ſeen her ſon happily ſettled in the world; ſhe departed with eaſe and calmneſs, without pang or agony, like a tired traveller, falling into a ſweet ſlumber: her laſt words expreſſing her hope of being reſtored to the child of her boſom; and to her own excellent father and mother, to whoſe care and pains ſhe owed that good education to which ſhe was indebted for all her other bleſſings.

The poors fund, which was committed to her care, ſhe reſigned, a week before her death, into the hands of Mrs. Hickman, according to the direction of the will, and all the accounts and diſburſements with it; which ſhe had kept with ſuch an exactneſs, that the lady declares, ſhe will follow her method, and only wiſhes to diſcharge the truſt as well.

Miss Howe was not to be perſuaded to quit her mourning for her dear friend, until ſix months were fully expired: and then ſhe made Mr. HICKMAN one of the happieſt men in the world. A woman of her fine ſenſe and underſtanding, married to a man of virtue and good-nature, (who had not paſt capital errors to reflect upon, and to abate his joys, and whoſe behaviour to Mrs. Hickman is as affectionate, as it was reſpectful to Miſs Howe) could not do otherwiſe. They are already bleſſed with two fine children; a daughter, to whom, by joint conſent, they have given the name of her beloved friend; and a ſon, who bears that of his father.

She has allotted to Mr. Hickman, who takes delight in doing good, (and that as much for it's own ſake, as to oblige her) his part of the management of the poor's fund; to be accountable for it, as ſhe pleaſantly ſays, to her. She has appropriated every Thurſday morning for her part of that management; and takes ſo much delight in the taſk, that ſhe declares it to be one of the moſt agreeable of her amuſements. And the more agreeable, as ſhe teaches every-one whom ſhe benefits, to bleſs the memory of the departed friend; to whom ſhe attributes the merit of all her own charities, as well as the honour of thoſe which ſhe diſpenſes in purſuance of her will.

She has declared, that this fund ſhall never fail while ſhe lives. She has even engaged her mother to contribute annually to it. And Mr. Hickman has appropriated twenty pounds a year to the ſame. In conſideration of which ſhe allows him to recommend four objects yearly to partake of it.—Allows, is her ſtyle; for ſhe aſſumes the whole prerogative of diſpenſing this charity; the only prerogative ſhe does or has occaſion to aſſume. In every other caſe, there is but one will between them; and that is generally his or hers, as either ſpeaks firſt, upon any ſubject, be it what it will. Mrs. HICKMAN, ſhe ſometimes as pleaſantly as generouſly tells him, muſt not quite forget that ſhe was once MISS HOWE, becauſe if he had not loved her as ſuch, and with all her foibles, ſhe had never been MRS. HICKMAN. Nevertheleſs ſhe ſeriouſly, on all occaſions, and that to others, as well as to himſelf, confeſſes, that ſhe owes him unreturnable obligations for his patience with her in HER day, and for his generous behaviour to her in HIS.

And ſtill the more highly does ſhe eſteem and love him, as ſhe reflects upon his paſt kindneſs to her beloved friend; and on that dear friend's good opinion of him. Nor is it leſs grateful to her, that the worthy man joins moſt ſincerely with her in all thoſe reſpectful and affectionate recollections, which make the memory of the departed precious to ſurvivors.

Mr. BELFORD was not ſo deſtitute of humanity and affection, as to be unconcerned at the unhappy fate of his moſt intimate friend. But when he reflects upon the untimely ends of ſeveral of his companions, but juſt mentioned in the preceding hiſtory—On the ſhocking deſpondency and death of his poor friend Belton—On the ſignal juſtice which overtook the wicked Tomlinſon—On the dreadful exit of the infamous Sinclair—On the deep remorſes of his more valued friend—And, on the other hand, on the example ſet him by the moſt excellent of her ſex—and on her bleſſed preparation, and happy departure—And when he conſiders, as he often does with awe and terror, that his wicked habits were ſo rooted in his depraved heart, that all theſe warnings, and this lovely example, ſeemed to be but neceſſary to enable him to ſubdue them, and to reform; and that ſuch awakening calls are hardly ever afforded to men of his caſt, or (if they are) but ſeldom attended with ſuch happy effects in the prime of youth, and in the full vigour of conſtitution:—when he reflects upon all theſe things, he adores the mercy, which through theſe calls has ſnatched him as a brand out of the fire: and thinks himſelf obliged to make it his endeavour to find out, and to reform, any of thoſe who may have been endangered by his means; as well as to repair to the utmoſt of his power, any damage or miſchiefs which he may have occaſioned to others.

With regard to the truſt with which he was honoured by the inimitable lady, he had the pleaſure of acquitting himſelf of it in a very few months, to everybody's ſatisfaction; even to that of the unhappy family; who ſent him their thanks on the occaſion. Nor was he, at delivering up his accounts, contented with reſigning the legacy bequeathed to him, to the uſes of the will. So that the poors fund, as it is called, is become a very conſiderable ſum; and will be a laſting bank for relief of objects who beſt deſerve relief.

There was but one earthly bleſſing which remained for Mr. Belford to wiſh for, in order, morally ſpeaking, to ſecure to him all his other bleſſings; and that was, the greateſt of all worldly ones, a virtuous and prudent wife. So free a liver as he had been, he did not think that he could be worthy of ſuch a one, till, upon an impartial examination of himſelf, he found the pleaſure he had in his new reſolutions ſo great, and his abhorrence of his former courſes ſo ſincere, that he was the leſs apprehenſive of a deviation.

Upon this preſumption, having alſo kept in his mind ſome encouraging hints from Mr. Lovelace; and having been ſo happy as to have it in his power to oblige Lord M. and that whole noble family, by ſome ſervices grateful to them, (the requeſt for which from his unhappy friend was brought over, among other papers, with the dead body, by De la Tour) he beſought that nobleman's leave to make his addreſſes to Miſs CHARLOTTE MONTAGUE, the eldeſt of his lordſhip's two nieces: and making at the ſame time ſuch propoſals of ſettlements as were not objected to, his lordſhip was pleaſed to uſe his powerful intereſt in his favour. And his worthy niece having no engagement, ſhe had the goodneſs to honour Mr. Belford with her hand; and thereby made him as completely happy as a man can be, who has enormities to reflect upon, which are out of his power to atone for, by reaſon of the death of ſome of the injured parties, and the irreclaimableneſs of others.

Happy is the man who, in the time of health and ſtrength, ſees and reforms the errors of his ways!—But how much more happy is he, who has no capital and wilful errors to repent of!—How unmixed and ſincere muſt the joys of ſuch a one come to him!

Lord M. added bountifully in his life time, as did alſo the two ladies his ſiſters, to the fortune of their worthy niece. And as Mr. Belford has been bleſſed with a ſon by her, his lordſhip at his death [which happened juſt three years after the untimely one of his unhappy nephew] was pleaſed to deviſe to that ſon, and to his deſcendants for ever, (and in caſe of his death unmarried, to any other children of his niece) his Hertfordſhire eſtate, (deſigned for Mr. Lovelace) which he made up to the value of a moiety of his real eſtates; bequeathing alſo a moiety of his perſonal to the ſame lady.

Miſs PATTY MONTAGUE, a fine young lady, [to whom her noble uncle, at his death, deviſed the other moiety of his real and perſonal eſtates, including his ſeat in Berkſhire] lives at preſent with her excellent ſiſter Mrs. Belford, to whom ſhe removed upon Lord M.'s death: but, in all probability, will ſoon be the lady of a worthy baronet, of ancient family, fine qualities, and ample fortunes, juſt returned from his travels, with a character ſuperior to the very good one he ſet out with: a caſe that very ſeldom happens, although the end of travel is improvement.

Colonel MORDEN, who, with ſo many virtues and accompliſhments, cannot be unhappy, in ſeveral letters to the executor, with whom he correſponds from Florence, [having given his unhappy affair with Mr. Lovelace, changed his purpoſe of coming ſo ſoon to reſide in England as he had intended] declares, that although he thought himſelf obliged either to accept of what he took to be a challenge, as ſuch; or tamely to acknowledge, that he gave up all reſentment of his couſin's wrongs; and in a manner to beg pardon for having ſpoken freely of Mr. Lovelace behind his back; and although at the time he owns he was not ſorry to be called upon, as he was, to take either the one courſe or the other; yet now, coolly reflecting upon his beloved couſin's reaſonings againſt duelling; and upon the price it had too probably coſt the unhappy man; he wiſhes he had more fully conſidered thoſe words in his couſin's poſthumous letter—'If God 'will allow him time for repentance, 'why ſhould you deny it him?'

To conclude—The worthy widow Lovick continues to live with Mrs. Belford; and by her prudent behaviour, piety, and uſefulneſs, has endeared herſelf to her lady, and to the whole family.

THE END OF CLARISSA.

MEMOIRS

OF THE LIFE AND WRITINGS OF SAMUEL RICHARDSON, Esq.

Author of thoſe celebrated and valuable Novels—PAMELA, SIR CHARLES GRANDISON, and CLARISSA HARLOWE.

THIS very celebrated Engliſh writer was born in the year of the Revolution, 1688, and bred to the buſineſs of a Printer, which he exerciſed all his life with diſtinguiſhed eminence. Though he underſtood no language but his own, yet he raiſed himſelf to a conſiderable degree of merit, and acquired a ſtill more conſiderable portion of fame, as an author in the romance way. His Pamela, Clariſſa, and Sir Charles Grandiſon, have been univerſally read; and they ſhew a wonderful power over the paſſions, in which his ſtrength chiefly lay. His purpoſe was to promote virtue and moral perfection. Indeed nothing has fallen from Richardſon's pen but what breathes the moſt beautiful morality, and tends either to inſtil or to confirm the moſt rigid and exalted principles of virtue. His works bear the ſtamp of a good mind, as well as of an original genius. In his Novels we at once diſcover this laudable, though rare, purity of intention, happily joined to a peculiar and almoſt unequalled power of fixing the attention. The two latter of theſe romances are longer than the firſt; on which account, ſome readers are too apt to be deterred from entering on the peruſal of them, but, from experience, this idea ſoon gives place to an agreeable anxiety, which puts it in a manner out of their power to lay by the book till they have entirely got through it.

The former part of Pamela appears to have been purpoſely written in a plain, homely ſtyle; yet is this ſtyle managed with ſuch art, that, though it may at firſt occaſion a momentary diſguſt, we can hardly travel through many pages before this unfavourable impreſſion wears off, and then we muſt acknowledge it to be the moſt winning and perſuaſive, yet at the ſame time the moſt natural and proper, that the wit of man could have imagined. The tender tale ſo winds about our hearts, that we think we are converſing with the amiable heroine; and it is but upon reflection, we can be perſuaded we are only reading a fiction. It is true we meet with many perfections in this work: It exhibits to our view a moſt engaging and intereſting object: It ſets up a moſt noble and exemplary model for imitation: We ſee in it a complete pattern of worth, modeſty, innocence, and beauty, not only free from all diſguiſe or affectation, but almoſt totally unconſcious of the power of her native charms;—charms which never ſtrike ſo ſure, ſo irreſiſtibly, as when their fair poſſeſſor ſeems ignorant of her having them; and regardleſs what effect they may produce on the beholder.—We ſee this weak and helpleſs creature aſſailed on the one hand, by the moſt alluring temptations; terrified, on the other, by threats and ill-uſage; ſurrounded, in ſhort, by ſnares of every kind, without any other guard, than a ſtrict virtue, and a ſtrong ſenſe of religion and duty. We ſee her at laſt, by a ſtrenuous perſeverance in thoſe honeſt principles, and the aſſiſtance of that Providence which always combats on the ſide of helpleſs innocence, baffle every attempt upon her chaſtity, and finally meet with the reward ſo juſtly due to the excellence of her character, and ſo well merited by repeated unſucceſsful trials of her honour, and repeated conqueſts of her virtue over human infirmity, and female frailty.—While ſhe is purſuing her artleſs ſtory, every ſentence of the ſweet ruſtic attracts our notice, and cannot fail of making the deepeſt impreſſion on any heart ſuſceptible of the delicate pleaſure reſulting from a tender ſenſation; a pleaſure which thoſe who have not felt, can conceive no idea of, and therefore know not how to value; but which thoſe happy few who have experienced it, would not forego the luxury of taſting for all the wealth of kingdoms.

Sir Charles Grandiſon abounds with ſtrokes of ſentiment, and contains many admirable paſſages. The madneſs of Clementina is particularly ſtriking, and has been praiſed in the higheſt terms by that diſpaſſionate and judicious critic Mr. Warton. "Of all the repreſentations of madneſs," ſays he, in his ingenious Eſſay on Pope, "that of Clementina, in the Hiſtory of Sir Charles Grandiſon, is the moſt deeply "intereſting. I know not whether even the madneſs of Lear is wrought up and "expreſſed by ſo many ſtrokes of nature and genuine paſſion. Shall I ſay it is

"pedantry

"pedantry to prefer and compare the madneſs of Oreſtes in Euripides to this of "Clementina?"—Theſe circumſtances, which Mr. Warton in the above paſſage takes notice of, form the great enchantment of Richardſon's ſtyle. A ſuperficial reader is apt haſtily to pronounce them tedious and diſguſting; but to an accurate obſerver, and a man of taſte, they will appear in quite a different light. Such an one will diſcover infinite art in their contrivance and connection; he will conſider them collectively, and then he will readily own that no impreſſion can be ſtronger than that which, ſtealing on by almoſt imperceptible degrees, is at laſt made by their concurrence and united force.

As to Clariſſa, which I mention laſt, becauſe it is generally looked upon as this author's maſter-piece, all praiſe muſt fall ſhort of its deſert. M. Rouſſeau, whoſe penetration and ſuſceptibility muſt give him an undoubted title to judge of any work of imagination, and whoſe acknowledged taſte muſt make his judgment of the greateſt weight, has given it as his opinion, that Clariſſa is the very beſt novel that was ever yet written in any language—Theſe are his words:—"There never "was a romance wrote in any language equal, nor even near to Clariſſa."

It muſt be owned, that the author of this celebrated romance has laviſhed ſuch invincible charms on his heroine; has repreſented her ſo tender, ſo virtuous, ſo amiable; has given her ſuch very exalted, yet not over-ſtrained ſentiments, and has made her withal ſo completely, ſo wretchedly unfortunate (the conſequence of one ſingle fatal error in conduct) that her intereſts become in a manner our own; and none but the moſt unfeeling breaſt can avoid being moved in the ſtrongeſt manner by the ſevere and unmerited calamities that pour down on the lovely mourner.

In order to prevent that uniform tediouſneſs which is often found in performances of conſiderable length, Mr. Richardſon has, in this inſtance, very wiſely endeavoured to diverſify the ſtyles of the ſeveral letters, according to the different ſituations or characters of the perſons who are ſuppoſed to write them. A moment's conſideration will be ſufficient to make one perceive the extreme difficulty of ſuch an attempt; yet it is not in this part of the work that our author has been the leaſt ſucceſsful.

Notwithſtanding the very forcible manner in which Clariſſa affects us, and the inimitable beauties which it is on all hands allowed to contain, it has had ſome ſevere critics. However, amongſt its admirers, a certain French writer of reputation has not heſitated to give it as his opinion, that nothing could be taken out of it without diſfiguring the work.—Says he, "A man of genius propoſed that I ſhould "prune Clariſſa. God forbid, I replied, that I ſhould commit ſuch an act of "barbarity. Peruſe the immortal Clariſſa, beſtow every attention on it, and you "will find that there are no indifferent traits in this vaſt picture; that every "beauty is in its proper place; and that there are pretended longeurs, which, in "the laſt volumes, make the woes of Clariſſa your own, plunge you into her miſerable ſituation, and make you in a manner die with her. The perſon followed "my advice, and found that nothing could be retrenched in this admirable work."

Be this as it may, the Novel we have been ſpeaking of, we aſſert, will bear the teſt of the ſevereſt criticiſm. Whatever defects may, with juſtice, be imputed to it, are but trifling, and it bids fair to be the favourite entertainment of ſucceeding ages, as it confeſſedly is of the preſent.

In his private character, Mr. Richardſon was a ſilent plain man, who ſeldom exhibited his parts in company. He heard the ſentiments of others ſometimes with attention, and ſeldom gave his own, rather deſirous of gaining friendſhip by his modeſty than his parts. In his latter years he appeared almoſt buried within himſelf; and if ever he was alive, it was when his own works were the ſubject of applauſe. Upon ſuch a topic he ſeemed to dwell with delight. This turn of temper led him to improve his fortune with mechanical aſſiduity; and having no violent paſſions, nor any deſire of being triflingly diſtinguiſhed from others, he at laſt became rich, and left his family in eaſy independence.

A ſtroke of the palſy carried Mr. Richardſon off, after a few days illneſs, July 4, 1761. Beſides the Novels above-mentioned, he is the author of an Eſop's Fables, a Tour through Britain, 4 vols. and a volume of Familiar Letters upon buſineſs, and other ſubjects.

No. 63, of THIS WORK,

COMMENCING WITH THE HISTORY and ADVENTURES of the RENOWNED

DON QUIXOTE,

DE LA MANCHA.

Containing a Complete Entertaining Narrative of the wonderful Atchievements of that incomparable HERO and KNIGHT ERRANT, from his firſt great Purſuits after FAME IMMORTAL, till the cloſe of his celebrated Career; together with the curious Incidents of his faithful Squire SANCHO PANZA, which muſt afford the higheſt Entertainment during the Hours of eaſe and leiſure.——This celebrated Novel will be comprized in only 12 Numbers, making the Sixth Volume of this WORK.

The Valuable and Entertaining Novel of GIL BLAS will follow in regular ſucceſſion at Number 75, and be completed in only 10 Numbers.

To which will be added, a Supplement, containing Elegant Tranſlations of Foreign Novels, commencing with Number 85, and finally concluding at Number 94. We can aſſure the Public that the NEW NOVELIST MAGAZINE, including the Supplement, will not exceed the moderate Quantity of only 94 Numbers, comprizing the moſt celebrated Novels worth Reading and Preſervation, making Eight elegant Volumes in Octavo, and at a Price not exceeding the Charge of Binding the Small inferior Editions—which renders the Binding alone of Novels in the Pocket Size ſo exceedingly expenſive to the Purchaſers.
